The Saṅgha found out his deceit. In the Dhamma Hall they were talking it over, “Friend, monk So-and-so, after embracing the Buddha’s dispensation, which leads to safety, still practises deceit.” The Teacher on coming in [2.269] asked what they were discussing together. They told him. Said he, “Monks, it is not the only time this monk has been a deceitful person; for a deceitful person he was before, when he shammed simply for the sake of warming himself at the fire.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family. When he grew up, and his own son was of an age to run about, his wife died; he took the child on his hip, and departed into the Himālayas, where he became an ascetic, and brought up his son to the same life, dwelling in a hut of leaves.

It was the rainy season, and the heaven poured down its floods incessantly: a monkey wandered about, tormented with the cold, chattering and rattling his teeth. The Bodhisatta fetched a great log, lit a fire, and lay down upon his pallet. His son sat by him, and massaged his feet. [2.188]

Now the monkey had found a dress belonging to some dead ascetic. He clad himself in the upper and lower garment, throwing the skin over one shoulder; he took the pole and waterpot, and in this sage’s dress he came to the leaf-hut for the fire: and there he stood, in his borrowed plumes.
The lad caught sight of him, and cried out to his father, “See, father – there is an ascetic, trembling with cold! Call him here; he shall warm himself.” Thus addressing his father, he uttered the first verse:

1. “A holy sage stands shivering at our gate,
   A sage, to peace and goodness consecrate.
   O father! Bid the holy man come in,
   That all his cold and misery may abate.”

The Bodhisatta listened to his son; he rose up, and looked; then he knew it was a monkey, and repeated the second verse: (2.270)

2. “No holy sage is he: it is a vile
   And loathsome monkey, greedy all to spoil
   That he can touch, who dwells among the trees;
   Once let him in, our home he will defile.”

With these words, the Bodhisatta seized a firebrand, and scared away the monkey; and he leaped up, and whether he liked the wood or whether he didn’t, he never returned to that place any more. The Bodhisatta cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and to the young ascetic he explained how to focus on the Meditation Object; and he too let the Super Knowledges and Attainments spring up within him. And both of them, without a break in their Absorption, became destined to the Brahmā Realm.

Thus did the Teacher discourse by way of showing how this man was not then only, but always, a deceitful person. This ended, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths some reached the First Path, some the Second, and yet some the Third, “The hypocritical monk was the monkey, Rāhula was the son, and I was the ascetic myself.”
Book III. Tikanipāta
The Section with Three Verses

Ja 251 Saṅkappajātaka
The Story about having (Lustful) Thoughts (3s)

Alternative Title: Saṅkapparāgajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk, on seeing a woman, becomes discontent with his monastic life. The Buddha tells a story of how one holy ascetic was tempted and lost his powers when he saw the queen naked one day, and how he retired from his place in the king’s garden back to the Himālayas, and regained his powers.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Lust, Desire, Women.

“No archer.” [2.189] {2.271} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a discontented monk.

A young nobleman, living in Sāvatthi, gave his heart to the dispensation of the Treasures, 535 and embraced the ascetic life. But one day, as he went his rounds in Sāvatthi, he happened to see a woman dressed in decorative apparel. Passion sprang up in his heart; he became disconsolate. When his teachers, counsellors and friends saw him thus, they at once asked him the cause. Seeing that he longed to return to the world, they said to one another, “My friend, the Teacher can remove the defilements of those who are tormented by lust and the like, and by declaring the Truths, he brings them to enjoy the fruition of sanctity. Come, let us lead him to the Teacher.”

So to the Teacher they brought him. Said he, “Why do you bring me this youth against his will, monks? They told him the reason. “Is this true,” he asked, “that you are discontent, as they say?” He assented. The Teacher asked the reason, and he recounted what had happened. Said he, “O monk, it has happened before that these women have caused impurity to spring up even in pure beings whose defilements have been stayed by the power of Absorption. Why should not vain men like you be defiled, when defilement comes even to the pure? Even men of the highest repute have fallen into dishonour; how much more the impure! Shall not the wind that shakes Mount Sineru also stir a heap of old leaves? [2.272] This troubled the enlightened Buddha himself, sitting on his throne, and shall it not trouble such a one as you?” and at their request he told them a story.

---

535 The Buddha, the Dhamma, the Saṅgha.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a great brahmin family, which had wealth to the amount of eight hundred millions of money. He grew up, and received his education at Taxila, and returned to Benares. There he married a wife; and on his parents’ death, he performed their obsequies. [2.190]

Then, as he inspected his treasure, he reflected: “The treasure is still here, but they who gathered it are here no more!” He was overcome with grief, and the sweat poured from his body.

He lived a long time at home, and gave much in alms; he mastered his passions; then he left his weeping friends, and went into the Himālayas, where he built a hut in a delightful spot, and lived upon the wild fruits and roots of the forest, which he found in his goings to and fro. Before long he cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and lived awhile in the bliss of Absorption.

Then a thought came to him. He would go amongst mankind, to buy salt and seasoning; thus his body would grow strong, and he would wander about on foot. “All that shall give alms to a virtuous man like me,” he thought, “and greet me with respect, shall fill the heavenly regions.” So down he came from the Himālayas, and by and by, as he tramped onwards, he came to Benares at the time of the sun setting. He looked about for a place to stay, and spied the royal park. “Here,” said he, “is a place fit for retirement; here will I dwell.” So he entered the park, and sat at the foot of a tree, and spent the night in the joy of Absorption.

Next day in the forenoon, having seen to his bodily needs, and adjusted his matted hair, his skin and robes of bark, he took up his alms-bowl; all his senses were quiet, his pride was calmed, he bore himself nobly, looking no more than a plough’s length before him; by the glory of his appearance, which was perfect in every way, \{2.273\} he drew upon him the eyes of the world. In this fashion he entered the city, and begged from door to door, till he came to the king’s palace.

Now the king was upon his terrace, walking to and fro. He spied the Bodhisatta through a window. He was pleased with his bearing, “If,” he thought, “there is such a thing as perfect quietude, it must be found in this man.” So he sent one of his courtiers, bidding him fetch the ascetic. The man came up with a greeting, and took his alms-bowl, saying: “The king sends for you, sir.”

“Noble friend,” replied the Bodhisatta, “the king does not know me!”

“Then, sir, please remain here until I return.” So he told the king what the beggar had said.

Then said the king, “We have no confidential priest: go, fetch him,” and at the same time he beckoned out of the window, calling to him, “Here, come in, sir!”

The Bodhisatta gave up his alms-bowl to the courtier, and mounted upon the terrace. Then the king greeted him, and set him upon the king’s couch, and offered him all the foods and meats prepared for himself. When he had eaten, he put a few questions to him; and the answers which \[2.191\] were given pleased him ever more and more, so that with a word of respect, he asked,

“Good sir, where do you live? Whence did you come here?”

“I dwell in the Himālayas, mighty king, and from the Himālayas have I come.”

The king asked, “Why?” “In the rainy season, O king, we must seek a fixed abode.”

“Then,” the king said, “abide here in my royal park, you shall not lack for the four things needful; I shall acquire the merit which leads to heaven.”

The promise was given; and having broken his fast he went with the Bodhisatta into the grounds, and caused a hut of leaves to be built there. A covered walk he had made, and prepared all the places for his living by night and by day. All the furniture and requisites for an ascetic’s life he had brought, and bidding him be comfortable he gave him in charge to the park-keeper.

For twelve years after this, \{2.274\} the Bodhisatta had his dwelling in that place.
Once it so happened that a frontier district rose in rebellion. The king desired to go himself to quell it. Calling his queen, he said: “Lady, either you or I must stay behind.”

“Why do you say that, my lord?” she asked.

“For the sake of the good ascetic.”

“I will not neglect him,” said she. “Mine be it to attend upon the holy father; do you go away without anxiety.”

So the king departed; and then the queen waited attentively upon the Bodhisatta.

Now the king was gone; at the fixed season the Bodhisatta came.

When it pleased him, he would come to the palace, and take his meal there. One day, he tarried a long time. The queen had made ready all his food; she bathed and adorned herself, and prepared a low seat; with a clean robe thrown loosely over her, she reclined, waiting for the Bodhisatta to come. Now the Bodhisatta noted the time of day; he took up his alms-bowl, and passing through the air, came up to the great window. She heard his bark robes rustle, and as she rose hastily, her yellow dress slipped.

The Bodhisatta let this unusual sight penetrate his senses, and looked upon her with desire. Then the evil passion that had been calmed by the power of his Absorption, rose as a cobra rises spreading his hood, from the basket in which he is kept: he was like a milky tree struck by the axe. As his passion gained force, his Absorption gave way, his senses lost their purity; he was as it were a crow with a broken wing. He could not sit down as before, and take his meal; not though she begged him to be seated, could he take his seat. So the queen placed all the food together in his alms-bowl; but that day he could not do as he used to do after his meal, and go out of the window through the air; taking the food, he went down by the great staircase, and so into the grove.

When he came there, he could eat nothing. He set down the food at the foot of his bench, murmuring, “What a woman! Lovely hands, lovely feet! What a waist, what thighs!” and so forth. Thus he lay for seven days. The food all went bad, and was covered with a cloud of black flies.
Then the king returned, having reduced his frontier to order. The city was all decorated; he went round it in solemn procession, keeping it always on the right, and then proceeded to the palace. Next he entered the grove, wishing to see the Bodhisatta. He noticed the dirt and rubbish about the hermitage, and thinking he must be gone, he pushed back the hut door, and stepped in. There lay the ascetic. “He must he ill,” thought the king. So he had the putrid food thrown away, and the hut set in order, and then asked,

“What is the matter, sir?”

“Sire, I am wounded!”

Then the king thought: “I suppose my enemies must have done this. They could not get a chance at me, so they determined to do a mischief to what I love.” So he turned him over, looking for the wound; but no wound could he see. Then he asked, “Where’s the place, sir?”

“No one has hurt me,” replied the Bodhisatta, “only I have wounded my own heart.” And he rose, and sat upon a seat, and repeated the following verses:

1. “No archer drew an arrow to his ear
   To deal this wound; no feathered shaft is here
   Plucked from a peacock’s wing, and decked out fine
   By skilful fletchers: ’tis this heart of mine.

2. Once cleansed from passion by my own firm will,
   And keen intelligence, which through desire
   Has dealt the wound that bids me fair to kill,
   And burns through all the limbs of me like fire. {2.276}

3. I see no wound from which the blood might flow:
   My own heart’s folly ’tis that pierces so.”

Thus did the Bodhisatta explain matters to the king by these three verses. Then he made the king retire from the hut, and by focusing on the Meditation Object induced Absorption; and so he recovered his interrupted Absorption. Then he left the hut, and sitting in the air, exhorted the king. After this he declared that he would go up to the Himālayas.

The king would have dissuaded him, but he said: “O king, see what humiliation has come upon me while I dwelt here! I cannot live here.” And although the king entreated him, he rose up into [2.193] the air, and departed to the Himālayas, where he abode his life long, and then went to the Brahmā Realm. [2.277]

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk became an Arahant, and some entered the First Path, some the Second, and some the Third Paths, “Ānanda was the king, and I was the ascetic.”

Ja 252 Tilamuṭṭhijātaka
The Story about the Fistful of Sesame Seeds (3s)

In the present one monk is always getting angry, even at the slightest annoyance. The Buddha tells a story from the past about how a student vowed vengeance on his teacher for reprimanding him, but when the time came, was persuaded it had been for his own good.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the angry monk = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Anger, Restraint.

“Now I bethink me.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a passionate man. We learn that there was a monk who was full of bitterness. No matter how little was said to him, he fell into a rage and spoke roughly; showing wrath, hatred, and mistrust.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks discussed the matter. “Friend, how angry and bitter is monk So-and-so! He goes snapping about for all the world like salt in the fire. Though he has adopted this peaceful dispensation, yet he cannot even restrain his anger.” The Teacher heard this and sent a monk to fetch the man in question. “Are you really as passionate as they say?” he asked. The man said he was. Then the Teacher added, “This is not the first time, monks, that this man has been passionate. He was just the same before,” and he told them a story.

In the past, Brahmadatta the king of Benares had a son named prince Brahmadatta. Now kings of former times, though there might be a famous teacher living in their own city, often used to send their sons to foreign countries afar off to complete their education, that by this means they might learn to quell their pride and highmindedness, and endure heat or cold, and be made acquainted with the ways of the world. So did this king. Calling his boy to him – now the lad was sixteen years old – he gave him one-soled sandals, a sunshade of leaves, and a thousand pieces of money, with these words: “My son, get you to Taxila, and study there.” [2.278]

The boy obeyed. He bade his parents farewell, and in due course arrived at Taxila. There he enquired for the teacher’s dwelling, and reached it at the time when the teacher had finished his lecture, and [2.194] was walking up and down at the door of the house. When the lad set eyes upon the teacher, he loosed his shoes, closed his sunshade, and with a respectful greeting stood still where he was. The teacher saw that he was weary, and welcomed the newcomer. The lad ate, and rested a little. Then he returned to the teacher, and stood respectfully by him.

“Where have you come from?” he asked. “From Benares.”

“What brings you here?” “I came to learn,” replied the lad.

“Well, have you brought a teacher’s fee? Or do you wish to attend on me in return for teaching you?”

“I have brought a fee with me,” and with this he laid at the teacher’s feet his purse of a thousand pieces.

The resident pupils attend on their teacher by day, and at night they learn of him: but they who bring a fee are treated like the eldest sons in his house, and thus they learn. And this teacher, like the rest, gave schooling to the prince on every light and lucky day. Thus the young prince was taught.

Now one day, he went to bathe along with his teacher. There was an old woman, who had prepared some white seeds, and strewed them out before her: there she sat, watching them. The youth looked upon these white seeds, and desired to eat;

---

536 There are four nakhattas called laku, ‘light’; there is another reading subhanakkhattena, ‘every fair day’. The meaning is by no means clear. [Subhanakkhatta means ‘an auspicious occasion’.]
he picked up a handful, and ate them. “That fellow must be hungry,” thought she; but she said nothing, and sat silent.

Next day the same thing happened at the same time. Again the woman said nothing to him.

On the third day, he did it again; then the old dame cried out, saying: “The great Teacher is letting his pupils rob me!” and uplifting her arms she raised a lamentation.

The Teacher turned back. {2.279} “What is it, mother?” he asked.

“Teacher, I have been parching some seeds, and your pupil took a handful and ate them! This he has done today, he did it yesterday, and he did it the day before! Surely he will eat me out of house and home!”

“Don’t cry, mother: I will see that you are paid.”

“Oh, I want no payment, master: only teach your pupil not to do it again.”

“See here, then, mother,” said he; and he caused two lads to take the [2.195] young fellow by his two hands, and smote him thrice upon the back with a bamboo stick, bidding him take care not to do it again.

The prince was very angry with his teacher. With a bloodshot glare, he eyed him from his head to foot. The teacher observed how angry he was, and how he eyed him.

The youth applied himself to his work, and finished his courses. But the offence he hid away in his heart, and determined to murder his teacher. When the time came for him to go away, he said to him, “O my Teacher, when I receive the kingdom of Benares, I will send for you. Then come to me, I pray.” And so he exacted a promise most affectionately.

He returned to Benares, and visited his parents, and showed proof of what he had learned. Said the king, “I have lived to see my son again, and while I yet live, I will see the magnificence of his rule.” So he made his son king in his stead.

When the prince enjoyed the splendour of royalty, he remembered his grudge, and anger rose within him. “I will be the death of that fellow!” he thought, and sent off a messenger to fetch his teacher.
“I shall never be able to appease him while he is young,” thought the teacher; so he did not come. But when the prince’s time of rule was half over, he thought he could appease him then; and he came, and stood at the king’s door, and sent to say that the teacher from Taxila had arrived. The king was glad, and caused the brahmin to be led in. Then his anger rose, and his eyes grew bloodshot. He beckoned to those about him. “Hah, the place which my teacher struck still hurts me today! He has come here with death written upon his forehead, {2.280} to die! Today his life must end!” and he repeated the first two verses:

1. “Now I bethink me, for a few poor seeds, in days of yore,
You seized me by the arm, and beat me with a stick full sore.

2. Brahmin, are you in love with death, and do you nothing fear
For seizing me and beating me, that now you venture here?”

Thus he threatened him with death. As he heard, the teacher uttered the third verse:

3. “The gently born\textsuperscript{537} who uses blows ungentleness to quell
This is the right message, not wrath: the wise all know it well.” [2.196]

“And so, great king, understand this yourself. Know that this is no just cause for anger. Indeed, if you had not been taught this lesson by me, you would have gone on taking cakes and sweets, fruit, and the like, until you became covetous through these acts of theft; then by degrees you would have been lured on to house-breaking, highway robbery, and murder about the villages; the end would have been, that you would have been taken red-handed and haled before the king for a public enemy and a robber; and you would have come in fear of public punishment, when the king should say, ‘Take this man, and punish him according \textsuperscript{537} The Commentator explains what ‘gentle breeding’ means. It may be used of conduct, both in men and animals; as:– ‘\textit{Tis gentle to respect old age, red Goose: Go where you will: I set your husband loose:} [196] or of form, ‘noble,’ ‘thoroughbred’: as in \textsuperscript{281} \textit{Your mien shows breeding, and your clear calm eye: You must have left some noble family. What made you wish to leave your home and wealth To be an ascetic for your soul’s health?} and adds yet this other: \textit{Clad in a semblance of fair piety But all deceitful, boldly forth leapt he, A babbler of vain sayings, mean and base, Intemperate, the ruin of his race.} (The last four lines occur in Suttanipāta, verse 89.)

to his crimes.’ Whence could have come all this prosperity which you now enjoy? Is it not through me that you have attained to such magnificence?’

Thus did his teacher talk over the king. {2.282} And the courtiers, who stood round, said when they heard his speech, “Of a truth, my lord, all your magnificence really belongs to your teacher!”

At once the king recognised the goodness of his teacher, and said to him, “All my power I give to you, my teacher! Receive the kingdom!” But the other refused, saying: “No, my lord king; I have no wish for the kingdom.”

And the king sent to Taxila for the teacher’s wife and family; he gave them great power, and made him the royal priest; he treated him like a father, and obeyed his admonitions; and after bestowing gifts and doing good deeds he became destined for paradise.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths; at the conclusion of the Truths the passionate monk attained the Fruit of the Third Path, and many others entered on the First, or Second, or Third Paths. “At that time the passionate monk was the king; but the Teacher was I myself.”

Ja 253 Maṇikaṇṭhajātaka

The Story about (the Nāga King) Maṇikaṇṭha (3s)

In the present the monks go round importuning people to give them workers and goods for the huts they are building. The Buddha reproves them and tells a story of how even the Nāgas dislike being begged from, with the story of one ascetic who begged for his friend the Nāga’s jewel, only to be abandoned by him.

The Bodhisatta = the elder (brother) (jeṭṭha),
Ānanda = the younger (brother) (kaniṭṭha).

Present Source: Ja 253 Maṇikaṇṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 323 Brahmadatta, Ja 403 Aṭṭhisena,

---

538 I think this Jātaka is represented on the Stūpa of Bharhut. In pl. XLII. 1 we see a man sitting before a hut, apparently conversing with a great five-headed cobra. The story is also told in the Vinayapiṭaka, Suttavibhaṅga, vi. 1. 3.
Present Compare: Vin Sd 6 (3.144).

Keywords: Importunity, Begging, Devas.

“Rich food and drink.” [2.197] This story the Teacher told while he was dwelling at the shrine of Aggāḷava, near Āḷavī, about the rules for building cells.

Some monks who lived in Āḷavī were begging from all quarters the materials for houses which they were getting made for themselves. They were for ever asking, “Give us a man, give us somebody to do servant’s work,” and so forth. Everybody was annoyed at this begging and solicitation. So much annoyed were they, that at sight of these monks they were startled and scared away.

It happened that the venerable monk Mahākassapa entered Āḷavī, and traversed the place in quest of alms. The people, as soon as they saw the elder, ran away as before. After mealtime, having returned from his rounds, he summoned the monks, and thus addressed them, “Once Āḷavī was a good place for alms; why is it so poor now?” They told him the reason.

Now the Fortunate One was at the time dwelling at the Aggāḷava shrine. The elder came to the Fortunate One, and told him all about it. The Teacher convened the monks touching this matter. “I hear,” said he, “that you are building houses and worrying everybody for help. Is this true?” They said it was. Then the Teacher rebuked them, adding these words, “Even in the serpent world, monks, full as it is of the seven precious stones, this kind of begging is distasteful to the serpents. How much more to men, from whom it is as hard to get a rupee as it is to skin a flint!” and he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a rich brahmin’s son. When he was old enough to run about, his mother gave birth to another wise being. Both the brothers, when they grew up, were so deeply pained at their parents’ death, that they became ascetics, and dwelt in leaf-huts 539 The introductory story occurs in the Vinaya, Suttavibhaṅga, Saṅghādisesa, vi. 1. The wrong was importunity.

540 Reading saṁyācikāya (as in Suttavibhaṅga).
541 Reading patipajjīsu.
which they made at a bend of the Ganges river. The elder had his lodge by the upper Ganges, and the younger by the lower river.

One day, a Nāga king whose name was Maṇikaṇṭha [Jewel-throat] left his dwelling-place, and taking the shape of a man, walked along the river bank until he came to the younger brother's hermitage. He greeted [2.198] the owner, and sat down at one side. They conversed pleasantly together; and such friends did they become, that there was no living apart for them. Often and often came Maṇikaṇṭha to visit the younger recluse, and sat talking and chatting; and when he left, so much did he love the man, he put off his shape, and encircled the ascetic with snake's folds, and embraced him, with his great hood upon his head; there he lay a little, till his affection was satisfied; then he let go his friend's body, and bidding him farewell, returned to his own place. For fear of him, the ascetic grew thin; he became squalid, lost his colour, grew yellower and yellower, and the veins stood out upon his skin.

It happened one day that he paid a visit to his brother. “Why, brother,” said he, “what makes you so thin? How did you lose your colour? Why are you so yellow, and why do your veins stand out like this upon your skin?” The other told him all about it.

“Come tell me,” said the first, “do you like him to come or not?” [2.284] “No, I don't.”

“Well, what ornament does the Nāga king wear when he visits you?”

“A precious jewel!”

“Very well. When he comes again, before he has time to sit down, ask him to give you the jewel. Then he will depart without embracing you in his serpent folds. Next day stand at your door, and ask him for it there; and on the third ask him just as he emerges from the river. He will never visit you again.”

The younger promised so to do, and returned to his hut. On the morrow, when the serpent had come, as he stood there the ascetic cried, “Give me your beautiful jewel!” The serpent hurried away without sitting down. On the day following, the ascetic stolid at his door, and called out as the serpent came, “You would not give me your jewel yesterday! Now today you must!” And the serpent slipped off without entering the hut. On the third day, the man called out just as the serpent was emerging from the water, “This is the third day that I have asked you for it: come, give this jewel to me!” And the serpent, speaking from his place in the water, refused, in the words of these two verses:

1. “Rich food and drink in plenty I can have
   By means of this fine jewel which you crave:
   You ask too much; the gem I will not give;
   Nor visit you again while I shall live.

2. Like lads who wait with tempered sword in hand,
   You scare me as my jewel you demand,
   You ask too much – the gem I will not give,
   Nor ever visit you while I shall live!” [2.199] [2.285]

With these words, the king of the Nāgas plunged beneath the water, and went to his own place, never to return.

Then the ascetic, not seeing his beautiful Nāga king again, became thinner and thinner still; he grew more squalid, lost his colour worse than before, and grew more yellow, and the veins rose thicker on his skin!

The elder brother thought he would go and see how his brother was getting on. He paid him a visit, and found him yellower than he had been before.

“Why, how is this? Worse than ever!” said he.

His brother replied, “It is because I never see the lovely king of the Nāgas!”

“This ascetic,” said the elder, on hearing his answer, “cannot live without his Nāga king,” and he repeated the third verse:

3. “Importune not a man whose love you prize,
   For begging makes you hateful in his eyes.
   The brahmin begged the Nāga’s gem so sore
   He disappeared and never came back more.”

Then he counselled his brother not to grieve, and with this consolation, left him and returned to his own hermitage. And after that [2.286] the two brothers cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and became destined for the Brahmā Realm.
The Teacher added, “Thus, monks, even in the world of Nāgas, where are the seven precious stones in plenty, begging is disliked by the Nāgas: how much more by men!” And, after teaching them this lesson, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Ānanda was the younger brother, but the elder was I myself.”

Ja 254 Kuṇḍakakucchisindhavajātaka

The Story about Rice Powder and the Sindh Horse (3s)

In the present one poor old woman has the chance to invite Ven. Sāriputta for a meal, and the rich folk of the city send along riches so she has enough to offer. The Buddha tells how in the past a woman had raised a foal with all love and kindness, and how he became the finest horse in the king’s collection.

The Bodhisatta = the horse dealer (assavāṇijja),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Sāriputta = the (thoroughbred) Sindh horse (Sindhava),
the old woman = the same in the past (mahallikā).

Keywords: Generosity, Worth, Animals.

“Grass and the scum of gruel.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about the elder Sāriputta.

It once fell out that the Buddha had been spending the rainy season in Sāvatthi, and afterwards had been on alms pilgrimage. On his return, the inhabitants determined to welcome his homecoming and they made their gifts to the Buddha and his following. They posted the clerk who used to sound the [2.200] call for preaching, to distribute the monks amongst all comers, according to the number they wished to provide for.

There was one poor old woman, who had prepared one portion. The monks were assigned, some to this giver, some to that. At sunrise, the poor woman came to the clerk, and said: “Give a monk to me!” He answered, “I have already distributed them all; but elder Sāriputta is still in the monastery, and you may give your portion to him.” At this she was delighted, and waited by the gate of Jetavana until the elder came out. She gave him greeting, took his bowl from his hand, and leading him to her house, offered him a seat.

Many pious families heard a rumour that some old woman had got Ven. Sāriputta to sit down at her door. Amongst those who heard it was king Pasenadi of Kosala.
He at once sent her food of all sorts, together with a garment and a purse of a thousand pieces, with the request, “Let whoever is entertaining the monk, put on this robe, and spend this money, and thus entertain the elder.” As the king did, so did Anāthapiṇḍika, the younger Anāthapiṇḍika, the lay sister Visākhā (a great lady), all sent the same: other families sent one hundred, two hundred or so, as their means allowed. Thus in a single day the old woman got as much as a hundred thousand pieces of money.

Our elder drank the broth which she gave him, and ate her food, and the rice that she cooked; then he thanked her, and so edified her that she was converted. Then he returned to the monastery.

In the Dhamma Hall, the monks discussed the elder’s goodness. “Friend, the Captain of the Dhamma has rescued an old housewife from poverty. He has been her mainstay. The food she offered he did not disdain to eat.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were talking of now as they sat together. They told him. And he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Sāriputta has been the refuge of this old woman; nor the first time he did not disdain to eat the food she offered. He did the same before.” And he told a story of the past.

It happened once upon a time, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, that the Bodhisatta was born into a trader’s family in the northern province. Five hundred people of that country, horse-dealers, used to convey horses to Benares, and sell them there.

Now a certain dealer took the road to Benares with five hundred horses for sale. On this road, not far off Benares, there is a town, where had formerly lived a rich merchant. A vast dwelling once was his; but his family had gradually gone down in the world, and only one old woman was left, who lived in the family house. The dealer took up his lodging for a certain hire in that house, and kept his horses nearby.

On that very day, as luck would have it, a thoroughbred mare of his foaled. He tarried two or three days, and then taking his horses with him went off to visit the king. Thereat the old woman asked him for the hire of the house. “All right, mother, I’ll pay you,” said he. {2.288}
“When you pay me, my son,” she said then, “give me this foal, and deduct its value from the hire.” The dealer did as she asked and went his way. The woman loved the foal like a son; and she fed him upon parched rice drippings, on leftovers, and grass.

Some time after, the Bodhisatta, on his way with five hundred horses, took lodging in this house. But the horses scented this highbred foal, that fed on red rice-powder, and not one of them would enter the place. Then said the Bodhisatta to the dame, “There seems to be some horse in the place, mother?”

“Oh, my son, the only horse there is a young foal which I keep here as tenderly as it were my son!” “Where is he, mother?” “Gone out to graze.” “When will he return?” “Oh, he’ll soon come back.”

The Bodhisatta kept the horses without, and sat down to wait until the foal should come in; and soon the foal returned from his walk. When he set eyes on the fine foal with his belly full of rice powder, the Bodhisatta noted his marks, and he thought: “This is a priceless thoroughbred; I must buy him off the old woman.”

By this time the foal had entered the house and gone to his own stable. At once all the horses were able to go in too.

There abode the Bodhisatta for a few days, and attended to his horses. Then as he made to go, “Mother,” said he to the old woman, “let me buy this foal off you.”

“What are you saying! One mustn’t sell one’s own foster child!” “What do you give him to eat, mother?” “Rice boiled, and rice gruel, and parched rice; leftovers and grass; and rice-broth to drink.”

“Well, mother, if I get him, I’ll feed him on the daintiest of fare; when he stands, he shall have a cloth awning spread over him; I will give him a carpet to stand on.”

“Will you, my son? Then take this child of mine, and go, and may he be happy!”

And the Bodhisatta paid a separate price for the foal’s four feet, for his tail and for his head; six purses of a thousand pieces of money he laid down, one for each; and he caused the dame to robe herself in a new dress, and decked her with ornaments, and set her in front of the foal. And the foal opened his eyes, and looked upon his mother, and shed tears. She stroked his back, and said: “I have received the recompense for what I have done for you: go, my son!” and then he departed.

Next day the Bodhisatta thought he would make trial of the foal, whether he knew his own power or no. So after preparing common food, he caused red rice gruel to be poured out, presented to him in a bucket. But this he could not swallow; and refused to touch any such food. Then the Bodhisatta to test him, uttered the first verse:

1. “Grass and the scum of gruel you thought good
   In former times: why don’t you eat your food?” [2.202]

On hearing which, the foal answered with the two other couplets following:

2. “When people do not know one’s birth and breed,
   Rice-scum is good enough to serve one’s need.

3. But I am chief of steeds, as you are ware;
   Therefore from you I will not take this fare.” [2.290]

Then answered the Bodhisatta, “I did this to try you; do not be angry,” and he cooked the fine food and offered it to him. When he came to the king’s courtyard, he set the five hundred horses on one side, and on the other an embroidered awning, under which he laid a carpet, with a canopy of stuff over it; and here he lodged the foal.

The king coming to inspect the horses asked why this horse was housed apart.

“O king,” was the reply, “if this horse be not kept apart, he will let loose these others.” “Is he a beautiful horse?” the king asked. “Yes, O king.” “Then let me see his paces.”

The owner caparisoned him, and mounted on his back. Then he cleared the courtyard of men, and rode the horse about in it. The whole place appeared to be encircled with lines of horses, without a break!

Then said the Bodhisatta, “See my horse’s speed, O king!” and let him have his head. Not a man could see him at all! Then he fastened a red leaf upon the horse’s flank; and they saw just the leaf. And then he rode him over the surface of a pond in a certain garden of the city. Over he went, and not even the tips of his hoofs were wet. Again, he galloped over lotus leaves, \(^2.291\) without even pushing one of them under water.

When his master had thus showed off the steed's magnificent paces, he dismounted, clapped his hands, and held out one, palm upwards. The horse got upon it, and stood on the palm of his master's hand, with his four feet close together. And the Bodhisatta said: "O mighty king! Not even the whole circle of the ocean would be space enough for this horse to show off all his skill." The king was so pleased that he gave him half of his kingdom: the horse he installed as his horse of state, sprinkling him with ceremonial water. Dear was he and precious to the king, and great honour was done him; and his dwelling place was made like the chamber where the king dwelt, all beautiful: the floor was sprinkled with all the four manners of perfumes, the walls were hung with wreaths of flowers and frequent garlands; up in the roof was an awning of cloth spangled with golden stars; it was all like a lovely pavilion round about. A lamp of scented oil burnt always; and in the retiring closet was set a golden jar. His food was always fit for a king. And after he came there, \(^2.203\) the lordship over all Jambudīpa came into this king's hand. And the king did good deeds and generosity according to the Bodhisatta's admonition, and became destined for paradise.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, and at the conclusion of the Truths many entered the First Path, or the Second, or the Third. "At that time the old woman was the same, Sāriputta was the thoroughbred, Ānanda was the king, and the horsedealer was I myself."

Ja 255 Sukajātaka

The Story about the (Greedy) Parrot (3s)

In the present one monk dies through overeating. The Buddha tells a story of a greedy parrot who, despite being warned against it, used to fly to an island to get mangoes, and one day drank too much mango juice and fell into the water and died on his way back to land.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the parrots (sukarājā), the monk who didn’t know the limit in food = the parrot king’s son (sukarājaputta).

Keywords: Greed, Gluttony, Animals, Birds.
“What time the bird.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a monk who died of over-eating. (2.292)

On his death, the monks assembled in the Dhamma Hall, and discussed his demerits in this fashion, “Friend, monk So-and-so was ignorant how much he could safely eat. So he ate more than he could digest, and died in consequence.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they talked of now as they sat together; and they told him. “Monks,” he said, “this is not the first time our friend died of surfeit; the same has happened before.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, when king Brahmadatta reigned over Benares, the Bodhisatta became a parrot, and dwelt in the Himālayas region. He was king over several thousands of his kind, who lived on the seaward side of the Himālayas; and one son was his. When his son grew up to be strong, the father parrot’s eyes became weak. The truth is, that parrots fly with great swiftness; wherefore when they be old it is the eye that weakens first. His son kept his parents in the nest, and would bring them food to feed them.

It happened one day that our young parrot went to the place where he found his food, and alighted upon a mountain-top. Thence he looked over the ocean, and beheld an island, in which was a mango grove full of sweet golden fruit. So next day, at the time of the fetching of food, he rose in the air and flew to this grove of mangoes, where he sucked the mango juice, [2.204] and took of the fruit, and bore it home to his mother and father. As the Bodhisatta ate of it, he knew the taste.

“My son,” said he, “this is a mango of such and such an island,” naming it. “Even so, father!” replied the young parrot. “Parrots that go there, my son, have not length of life,” he said. “Go not to that island again!” But the son obeyed him not, and went yet again.

Then one day it befell that he went as usual, and drank much of the mango juice. With a mango in his beak {2.293} he was passing over the ocean, when he grew worn out with so long carrying, and sleep mastered him; sleeping he flew on, and the fruit which he carried fell from out of his beak. And by degrees he left his path, and sinking down skimmed the surface of the water, till in the end he fell in. And then a fish caught and devoured him. When he should have returned, he returned not, and the Bodhisatta knew that he must have fallen into the water. Then his parents, receiving no sustenance, pined away and died.

The Teacher, having told this tale, after Fully Awakening, uttered the following verses:

1. “What time the bird without excess did eat,
   He found the way, and brought his mother meat.

2. But once he ate too much, forgot the mean,
   He fell; and afterward was no more seen.

3. So be not greedy; modest be in all.
   To spare is safe; greed goes before a fall.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths at the conclusion of which many persons entered the First Path, or the Second, or Third, or Fourth, and identified the Jātaka, “At that time, the monk who had over-eaten was the young parrot, and the king of the parrots was I myself.”

Ja 256 Jarudapānajātaka
The Story about the Old Well (3s)

Alternative Title: Jarūdapānajātaka (Cst)

In the present some merchants leave from Jetavana to go and make their fortune. When they come across a well and start digging they find great riches, and soon return again. The Buddha tells a story of how some people in a past life had found similar riches but refused to stop digging and were killed by the Nāgas who got angry at the destruction.

The Bodhisatta = the elder caravan leader (satthavāhajāthaka), Sāriputta = the king of the Nāgas (Nāgarājā).

---

542 The Commentator adds the following lines: Be moderate in eating wet or dry, And this thy hunger’s need will satisfy. Who eats with care, whose belly is not great, Will be a holy hermit soon or late. [2.294] Four or five mouthfuls, – then a drink is right; Enough for any earnest eremite. A careful moderate eater has small pain, Slowly grows old, lives twice as long again. And these: When sons bring meat to fathers in the wood, Like ointment to the eye, ’tis very good. Thus for bare life, with weariness forspent, He nourished him upon such nourishment.
Keywords: Greed, Moderation, Devas.

“Some merchants.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about some traders whose home was at Sāvatthi.

The tradition is that these men had acquired wares in Sāvatthi, which they loaded on carts. When the time came for them to set about their business, they gave an invitation to the Tathāgata, and offered him rich alms; they received the Refuges, were strengthened in the Precepts, and took their leave of the Teacher with these words, “Sir, we are going a long way. When we have parted with our wares, if we are fortunate and return in safety, we will come and wait upon you again.” Then they set off on their journey.

In a difficult part of their road they observed a disused well. There was no water in it that they could see, and they were athirst; so they resolved to dig deeper. As they dug, they came upon successive layers of minerals of all sorts, from iron to lapis lazuli. This find contented them; they filled their wagons with these treasures, and got back safe to Sāvatthi. They stowed away the treasure which they had brought; and then bethought them, that having been so lucky they would give food to the Saṅgha. So they invited the Tathāgata, and made him presents; and when they had respectfully greeted him, and sat down on one side, they recounted how they had found their treasure. Said he, “You, good laymen, are content with your find, and accept your wealth and your livelihood with all moderation. But in other days there were men not content, immoderate, who refused to do as wise men advised them, and so lost their life.” And he told at their request a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a business man; and grew up to be a great merchant. At one time he had filled his wagons with goods, and in company with a large caravan he came to this very same wood and saw this very same well. No sooner had the traders seen it, than they wanted to drink, and began to dig, and as they dug they came upon a quantity of metal and gems. But though they got a great deal of treasure, they were discontented. “There must be another treasure here, better than this!” they thought, and they dug and dug.
Then said the Bodhisatta to them, “ Merchants, greed is the root of destruction. You have won a great deal of wealth; with this be content, and dig no more.” But they digged yet the more notwithstanding.

Now this well was haunted by serpents. The Nāga king, incensed at the falling of clods and earth, slew them with the breath of his nostrils, all saving the Bodhisatta, and destroyed them; and he came up from the Nāga world, and put the oxen to the carts, filled them with jewels, and seating the Bodhisatta upon a fine wagon, he made certain young Nāgas drive the carts, and brought him to Benares. He led him into his house, set the treasure in order, and went away again to his own place in the Nāga land. And the Bodhisatta spent his treasure, so that he made much stir throughout all Jambudīpa by his generosity, and, having undertaken the deeds of virtue, and kept the holy day, at the end of his life he came to heaven.

The Teacher, after telling this tale, after Fully Awakening, uttered the following lines:

1. “Some merchants, wanting water, dug the ground
   In an old well, and there a treasure found:
   Tin, iron, copper, lead, silver and gold,
   Beryls and pearls and jewels manifold.

2. But not content, still more they did desire,
   And fiery serpents slew them all with fire.
   Dig if you will, but dig not to excess;
   For too much digging is a wickedness.

3. Digging bestowed a treasure on these men;
   But too much digging lost it all again.”

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Sāriputta was the Nāga king, and the master of the caravan was I myself.”

Nāsikavātena. Perhaps this throws light on the disease ahivātarogo, p. 55 note.
The Section with Three Verses – 928

Ja 257 Gāmaṇicāṇḍajātaka

The Story about (the ex-Minister) Gāmaṇicanda (3s)

Alternative Title: Gāmaṇicandajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are discussing the Buddha’s wisdom. The Buddha tells them about a former life in which he had been a wise king, how he had extricated a former minister from false accusations, and the many problems and riddles that he solved.

The Bodhisatta = king Ādāsamukha, Ānanda = (the ex-Minister) Gāmaṇicanda.

Keywords: Wisdom, Riddles, Devas.

“It is not a clever builder.” [2.207] [2.297] This story the Teacher told while sojourning at Jetavana, about the praise of wisdom. In the Dhamma Hall sat the monks, praising the wisdom of the One with Ten Powers, “The Tathāgata has wisdom great and wide, wisdom witty and quick, wisdom sharp and penetrating. He excels this world and the world of gods in wisdom.”

The Teacher entered, and asked what they were talking of now as they sat there. They told him. He answered, “This is not the first time, monks, that the Tathāgata has been wise; he was the same before.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, monks, when Janasandha was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of his chief queen. His face was resplendent, wearing a look of auspicious beauty, like a golden mirror well polished. On the day of his naming they called him Ādāsamukha [Mirror-face].

Within the space of seven years his father caused him to be taught the Three Vedas, and all the duties of this world; and then he died, when the lad was seven years old. The courtiers performed the king’s obsequies with great pomp, and made the offerings for the dead; and on the seventh day they gathered together in the palace court, and talked together. The prince was very young, they thought, and he could not simply be made king.

---

544 Problems to be solved are a common part of the machinery of fairy tales; e.g. Grimm, no. 29, The Devil with the Three Golden Hairs, and the editors’ notes.
Before they made him king, they would test him. So they prepared a court of justice, and set a divan. Then they came into the prince’s presence, and they said: “You must come, my lord, to the law-court.” To this the prince agreed; and with a great company he repaired there, and sat upon the dais.

Now at the time when the king sat down for judgement, the courtiers had dressed up a monkey, in the garb of a man who is skilled in the lore which tells what are good sites for a building. They made him go upon two feet, and brought him into the judgement hall. [2.208]

“My lord,” they said, “in the time of the king your father this man was one who divined by magic as to desirable sites, and well did he know his art. {2.298} Down in the earth as deep as seven cubits he can see a fault. By his help there was a place chosen for the king’s house; let the king provide for him, and give him a post.”

The prince scanned him from head to foot. “This is no man, but a monkey,” he thought, “and monkeys can destroy what others have made, but of themselves can neither make anything nor carry out such a thing.” And so he repeated the first verse to his court:

1. “It is not a clever builder, but an ape with a wrinkled face;
   He can destroy what others make; that is the way of his race.”

“It must be so, my lord!” said the courtiers, and took him away. But after a day or two they dressed this same creature in grand clothes, and brought him again to the judgement hall. “In the king your father’s time, my lord, this was a judge who dealt justice. You should take him to help you in awarding justice.”

The prince looked at him. He thought: “A man with mind and reason is not so hairy as all that. This witless ape cannot dispense justice,” and he repeated the second verse:

2. “There’s no wit in this hairy creature; he breeds no confidence;
   He knows nought, as my father taught: the animal has no sense!” {2.299}

“So it must be, my lord!” said the courtiers, and led him away. Yet once again did they dress up the very same monkey, and bring him to the hall of judgement. “Sire,” they said, “in the time of the king your father this man did his duty to father and mother, and paid respect to old age in his family. You should keep him with you.”
Again the prince looked at him, and thought: “Monkeys are fickle of mind; such a thing they cannot do.” And then he repeated the third verse:

3. “One thing Dasaratha\(^{545}\) has taught me: no help such a creature would send
To father or mother, to sister or brother, or any who call him friend!”

“So must it be, my lord!” answered they, and took him away again. And they said amongst themselves, “’Tis a wise prince; he will be able to rule,” \(^{2.300}\) and they made the Bodhisatta king; and throughout the city by beat of drum they made proclamation, saying: “The edicts of king Ādāsamukha!”

From that time the Bodhisatta reigned righteously; and his wisdom was noised abroad throughout all Jambudīpa. To show forth the matter of \(^{2.209}\) this wisdom of his, these fourteen problems were brought to him to decide:

An ox, a lad, a horse, a basket-knight,
A householder, a prostitute, and a young dame,
A snake, a deer, a partridge, and a sprite,
A snake, ascetics, a young priest I name.

This happened as we shall now explain. When the Bodhisatta was inaugurated king, a certain servant of king Janasandha, named Gāmanicaṇḍa, thus considered within himself, “This kingdom is glorious if it be governed by aid of those who are of an age with the king. Now I am old, and I cannot wait upon a young prince: so I will get me a living by farming in the country.” So he departed from the city a distance of three leagues, and lived in a certain village. But he had no oxen for farming. And so, after rain had fallen, he begged the loan of two oxen from a friend; all day long he ploughed with them, and then he gave them grass to eat, and went to the owner's house to give them back again. At the moment it happened that the owner sat at a meal with his wife; and the oxen entered the house, quite at home. As they entered, the master was raising his plate, and the wife putting hers down. Seeing that they did not invite him to share the meal, Gāmanicaṇḍa departed without formally making over the oxen. During the night, thieves broke into the cow-pen, and stole the oxen away.

\(^{545}\) Dasaratha is another name for his father (Commentator).
Early on the morrow, the owner of these oxen entered the cow-shed, but cattle there were none; he perceived that they had been stolen away by thieves. “I'll make Gāmaṇi pay for it!” he thought, and to Gāmaṇi he went. \(2.301\)

“I say, return me my oxen!” cried he. “Are not they in their stall?” “Now did you return them to me?” “No, I didn’t.” “Here’s the king’s officer: come along.”

Now this people have a custom that they pick up a bit of stone or a potsherd, and say, “Here’s the king’s officer; come along!” If any man refuses to go, he is punished. So when Gāmaṇi heard the word “Officer,” he went along.

So they went together towards the king’s court. On the way, they came to a village where dwelt a friend of Gāmaṇi’s. Said he to the other, “I say, I’m very hungry. Wait here till I go in and get me something to eat!” and he entered his friend’s house.

But his friend was not at home. The wife said: “Sir, there is nothing cooked. Wait but a moment; I will cook at once and set before you.”

She climbed a ladder to the grain store, and in her haste she fell to the ground. And as she was seven months gone with child, a miscarriage followed.

At that moment, in came the husband, and saw what had happened. “You have struck my wife,” cried he, “and brought her labour upon her untimely! Here’s a king’s officer for you – come along!” and he carried him off. After this they went on, the two of them, with Gāmaṇi between.

As they went, there was a horse at a village gate; and the groom could not stop it, but it ran along with them. The horsekeeper called out to Gāmaṇi, “Uncle\(^{546}\) Caṇḍaṅgaṅaṅaṅi, hit the horse with something, and head him back!” Gāmaṇi picked up a stone, and threw it at the horse. The stone struck his foot, and broke it like the stalk of a castor-oil plant.

Then the man cried, “Oh, you’ve broken my horse’s leg! Here’s a king’s officer for you!” and he laid hold of him.

\(^{546}\) It is worth noting that this term of affection means a mother’s brother.
Gāmaṇi was thus three men’s prisoner. As they led him along, he thought: “These people will denounce me to the king.” (2.302) I can’t pay for the oxen; much less the fine for causing an untimely birth; and then where shall I get the price of the horse? I were better off dead.” So, as they went along, he saw a wood nearby the road, and in it a hill with a precipice on one side of it. In the shadow of it were two basket-makers, father and son, weaving a mat.

Said Gāmaṇi, “I say, I want to retire for a moment: wait here, while I go aside,” and with these words he climbed the hill, and threw himself down the precipice. He fell upon the back of the elder basket-maker, and killed him on the spot. Gāmaṇi got up, and stood still. “Ah, you villain! You've murdered my father!” cried the younger basket-maker, “here’s the king’s officer!” He seized Gāmaṇi’s hands, and came out of the thicket.

“What’s this?” asked the others. “The villain has murdered my father!” So on they went, the four of them, with Gāmaṇi in the middle.

They came to the gate of another village. The headman was there, who hailed Gāmaṇi, “Uncle Caṇḍa, whither away?” “To see the king,” says Gāmaṇi. “Oh indeed, to see the king. I want to send him a message; will you take it?” “Yes, that I will.”

“Well – I am usually handsome, rich, honoured, and healthy; but now I am miserable and have the jaundice too. Ask the king why this is. (2.211) He is a wise man, so they say; he will tell you, and you can bring me his message again.” To this the other agreed.

At another village a prostitute called out to him, “Whither bound, Uncle Caṇḍa?” “To see the king,” says he. “They say the king is a wise man; take him a message from me,” says the woman. (2.303) “Previously I used to make great gains; now I don’t get the worth of a betel-nut, and nobody courts me. Ask the king how this may be, and then you can tell me.”

At a third village, there was a young woman who told Gāmaṇi, “I can live neither with my husband nor with my own family. Ask the king how this is, and then tell me.”

A little further on there was a snake living in an ant-hill near the road. He saw Gāmaṇi, and called out, “Whither away, Caṇḍa?” “To see the king.”
“The king is wise; take him a message from me. When I go out to get my food, I leave this ant-hill faint and famishing, and yet I fill the entrance hole with my body, and I get out with difficulty, dragging myself along. But when I come in again, I feel satisfied, and fat, yet I pass quickly through the hole without touching the sides. How is this? Ask the king, and bring me his answer.”

And further on a deer saw him, and said: “I can’t eat grass anywhere but underneath this tree. Ask the king the reason.” And again a partridge said: “When I sit at the foot of this ant-heap, and utter my note, I can make it prettily; but nowhere else. Ask the king why.” And again, {2.304} a Tree Devatā saw him, and said: “Whither away, Caṇḍa?” “To the king.”

“The king’s a wise man, they say. In former times I was highly honoured; now I don’t receive so much as a handful of twigs. Ask the king what the reason is.”

And further on again he was seen by a Nāga king, who spoke to him thus, “The king is said to be a wise man: then ask him this question. Heretofore the water in this pool has been clear as crystal. Why is it that now it has become turbid, with scum all over it?”

Further on, not far from a town, certain ascetics who dwelt in a park saw him, and said, in the same way, “They say the king is wise. Of yore there were in this park sweet fruits in plenty, now they have grown tasteless and dry. Ask him what the reason is.” Further on again, he was accosted by some brahmin students who were in a hall at the gate of a town. They said to him, [2.212] “Where are you going, Caṇḍa, eh?” “To the king,” says Caṇḍa.

“Then take a message for us. Till now, whatever passage we learned was bright and clear; now it does not stay with us, it is not understood, but all is darkness – it is like water in a leaky jar. Ask the king what the reason is.”

Gāmanīcaṇḍa came before the king with his fourteen questions. When the king saw him, he recognised him. “This is my father’s servant, who used to dandle me in his arms. Where has he been living all this time?” And “Caṇḍa,” said he, “where have you been living all this time? {2.305} We have seen nothing of you for a long while; what brings you here?”
“Oh, my lord, when my lord the late king went to heaven, I departed into the country and kept myself by farming. Then this man summoned me for a suit regarding his cattle, and here he has brought me.”

“If you had not been brought here, you had never come; but I’m glad that you were brought anyhow. Now I can see you. Where is that man?”

“Here, my lord.” “It is you that summoned our friend Caṇḍa?” “Yes, my lord.” “Why?” “He refuses to give back my pair of oxen!” “Is this so, Caṇḍa?”

“Hear my story too, my lord!” said Caṇḍa; and told him the whole story. When he had heard the tale, the king accosted the owner of the oxen. “Did you see the oxen,” said he, “entering the stall?” “No, my lord,” the man replied.

“Why, man, did you never hear my name? They call me king Ādāsamukha. Speak out honestly.” “I saw them, my lord!” said he.

“Now, Caṇḍa,” said the king, “you failed to return the oxen, and therefore you are his debtor for them. But this man, in saying that he had not seen them, told a direct lie. Therefore you with your own hands shall pluck his eyes out, and you shall yourself pay him twenty-four pieces of money as the price of the oxen.” Then they led the owner of the oxen out of doors.

“If I lose my eyes, what do I care for the money?” thought he. And he fell at Gāmanī’s feet, and besought him, “O master Caṇḍa, keep those twenty-four pieces, and take these too!” and he gave him other pieces, and ran away.

The second man said: “My lord, this fellow struck my wife, and made her miscarry.” “Is this true, Caṇḍa?” asked the king. Caṇḍa begged for a hearing, and told the whole story.

“Did you really strike her, and cause her to miscarry?” asked the king. “No, my lord! I did no such thing.”

“Now, can you” he asked the other, “can you heal the miscarriage which he has caused?” “No, my lord, I cannot.” “Now, what do you want to do?” “I ought to have a son, my lord.”

“Now then, Caṇḍa – you take the man’s wife to your house; and when a son shall be born to you, hand him over to the husband.”
Then this man also fell at Caṇḍa’s feet, crying, “Don’t break up my home, master!” threw down some money, and made off.

The third man then accused Caṇḍa of lamming his horse’s foot. Caṇḍa as before told what had happened. Then the king asked the owner, “Did you really bid Caṇḍa strike the horse, and turn him back?” “No, my lord, I did not.” But on being pressed, he admitted that he had said so.

“This man,” said the king, “has told a direct lie, in saying that he did not tell you to head back the horse. You may tear out his tongue; and then pay him a thousand pieces for the horse’s price, which I will give you.” But the fellow even gave him another sum of money, and departed.

Then the basket-maker’s son said: “This fellow is a murderer, and he killed my father!” “Is it so, Caṇḍa?” asked the king. “Hear me, my lord,” said Caṇḍa, and told him about it.

“Now, what do you want?” asked the king. “My lord, I must have my father.” {2.307} “Caṇḍa,” said the king, “this man must have a father. But you cannot bring him back from the dead. Then take his mother to your house, and do you be a father to him.”

“Oh, master!” cried the man, “don’t break up my dead father’s home!” He gave Gāmaṇi a sum of money, and hurried away.

Thus Gāmaṇi won his suit, and in great delight he said to the king, “My lord, I have several questions for you from several persons; may I tell you them?” “Say on,” said the king.

So Gāmaṇi told them all in reverse order, beginning with the young brahmins. The king answered them in turn.

To the first question, he answered, “In the place where they lived there used to be a crowing chicken that knew the time. When they heard his crow, they used to rise up, and repeat their texts, until the sun rose, and thus they did not forget [2.214] what they learned. But now there is a chicken that crows out of season; he crows at dead of night, or in broad day. When he crows in the depth of night, up they rise, but they are too sleepy to repeat the text. When he crows in broad day, they rise up, but they have not the chance to repeat their texts. Thus it is, that whatever they learn, they soon forget."

To the second question, he answered, “Formerly these men used to do all the duties of the ascetic, such as focusing on the Meditation Object. Now they have neglected the ascetic’s duties, and they do what they ought not to do; the fruits which grow in the park they give to their attendants; they live in a sinful way, exchanging their alms. This is why this fruit does not grow sweet. If they once more with one consent do their duty as ascetics, again the fruit will grow sweet for them. Those ascetics know not the wisdom of kings; tell them to live the ascetic life.”

He heard the third question, and answered, “Those serpent chiefs quarrel one with another, and that is why the water becomes turbid. If they make friends as before, the water will be clear again.”

After hearing the fourth, “The Tree Devatā,” said he, “used formerly to protect men passing through the wood, and therefore she received many offerings. Now she gives them no protection, and so she receives no offerings. If she protects them as before, she will receive choice offerings again. She knows not that there are kings in the world. Tell her, then, to guard the men who go up into that wood.”

And on hearing the fifth, “Under the ant-hill where the partridge finds himself able to utter a pleasant cry is a crock of treasure; dig it up and get it.”

To the sixth he answered, “On the tree under which the deer found he could eat grass, is a great honey-comb. He craves the grass on which this honey has dropped, and so he can eat no other. You get the honeycomb, send the best of it to me, and eat the rest yourself.”

Then on hearing the seventh, “Under the snake’s ant-heap lies a large treasure-crock, and there he lives guarding it. So when he goes out, from greed for this treasure his body sticks fast; but after he has fed, his desire for the treasure prevents his body from sticking, and he goes in quickly and easily. Dig up the treasure, and keep it.”

---

547 Some staying at home, while others beg for all, to save trouble. See p. 57, note 1.
Then he replied to the eighth question, “Between the villages where dwell the young woman’s husband and her parents 2.309 lives a lover of hers in a certain house. She remembers him, and her desire is toward him; therefore she cannot stay in her husband’s house, but says she will go and see her parents, and on the way she stays a few days with her lover. When she has been at home a few days, again she remembers him, and saying she will return to her husband, she goes again to her lover. Go, tell her there are kings in the land; say, she must dwell with her husband, 2.215 and if she will not, let her have a care, the king will cause her to be seized, and she shall die.”

He heard the ninth, and to this he said: “The woman used formerly to take a price from the hand of one, and not to go with another until she was off with him, and that is how she used to receive much. Now she has changed her manner, and without leave of the first she goes with the last, so that she receives nothing, and none seek after her. If she keeps to her old custom, it will be as it was before. Tell her that she should keep to that.”

On hearing the tenth, he replied, “That village headman used once to deal justice indifferently, so that men were pleased and delighted with him; and in their delight they gave him many a present. This is what made him handsome, rich, and honoured. Now he loves to take bribes, and his judgement is not fair; so he is poor and miserable, and jaundiced. If he judges once again with righteousness, he will be again as he was before. He knows not that there are kings in the land. Tell him that he must use justice in giving judgement.”

And Gāmaṇicaṇḍa told all these messages, as they were told to him. And the king having resolved all these questions by his wisdom, like Buddha omniscient, 2.310 gave rich presents to Gāmaṇicaṇḍa; and the village where Caṇḍa dwelt he gave to him, as a brahmin’s gift, and let him go.

Caṇḍa went out of the city, and told the king’s answer to the brahmin youths, and the ascetics, to the serpent and to the Tree Devatā; he took the treasure from the place where the partridge sat, and from the tree beneath which the deer did eat, he took the honeycomb, and sent honey to the king; he broke into the snake’s ant-

---

548 Literally, “until she had made him enjoy his money’s worth,” ajirāpetvā.
hill, and gathered the treasure out of it; and to the young woman, and the prostitute, and the village headman he said even as the king had told him. Then he returned to his own village, and dwelt there so long as he lived, and afterward passed away to fare according to his deeds. And king Ādāsamukha also gave alms, and wrought goodness, and finally after his death went to swell the hosts of heaven.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, to show that not only now is the Tathāgata wise, but wise he was before, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths many persons entered on the First Path, or the Second, or the Third, or the Fourth. “At that time Ānanda was Gāmanicanda; but king Ādāsamukha was I myself.”

Ja 258 Mandhātujātaka

The Story about (the Ancient King) Mandhātu (3s)

In the present one monk sees a woman and finds discontent in his monk’s life. The Buddha tells him a story of a king of old, who, no matter how rich and powerful he became, over earth and heaven, was still dissatisfied. Finally he conceived the idea to kill Sakka, King of the Devas, and was thrown back down to earth, where he died.

The Bodhisatta = king Mandhātu (Mandhāturājā).

Keywords: Greed, Desire.

“Wherever sun and moon.” [2.216] This story the Teacher told during a stay at Jetavana, about a discontented monk.

We are told that this monk, in traversing Sāvatthi for his alms, saw a finely dressed woman and fell in love with her. Then the monks led him to the Dhamma Hall, and informed the Teacher that he was discontent. The Teacher asked whether it were true; and was answered, yes, it was. [2.311] “Monk,” said the Teacher, “when will you ever satisfy this lust, even while you are a householder? Such lust is as deep as the ocean, nothing can satisfy it. In former days there have been supreme monarchs, who attended by their retinue of men held sway over the four great continents encircled by two thousand isles, ruling even in the heaven of the Four Great Kings, even when they were kings of the gods in the Heaven of the Thirty Three, even in the abode of the Thirty Six Sakkas – even these failed to satisfy their lust, and died before they could do so; when will you be able to satisfy it?” And he told a story of the past.

See Divyāvadāna, p. 210; Thibetan Tales, p. 1-20, King Māndhātar. This king is named as one of the four persons who have attained in their earthly bodies to glory in the city of the gods; Milinda, iv. 8. 25 (ii. p. 145 in the translation, Sacred Books of the East).

Long ago, in the early ages of the world, there lived a king named Mahāsammata, and he had a son Roja, who had a son Vararoja, who had a son Kalyāṇa, who had a son Varakalyāṇa, and Varakalyāṇa had a son named Uposatha, and Uposatha had a son Mandhātā. Mandhātā was endowed with the Seven Jewels and the four Supernormal Powers; and he was a great monarch. When he clenched his left hand, and then touched it with his right, there fell a rain of seven kinds of jewels, knee-deep, as though a celestial rain-cloud had arisen in the sky; so wondrous a man was he. Eighty-four thousand years he was a prince, the same number he took some share in ruling the kingdom, and even so many years he ruled as supreme king; his life lasted for countless ages.

One day, he could not satisfy some desire, so he showed signs of discontent. “Why are you cast down, my lord?” the courtiers asked him. “When the power of my merit is considered, what is this kingdom? Which place seems worth desiring?” “Heaven, my lord.” [2.217]

So rolling along the Wheel Jewel, with his suite (2.312) he went to the heaven of the Four Great Kings. The four kings, with a great throng of gods, came to meet him in state, bearing celestial flowers and perfumes; and having escorted him into their heaven, gave him rule over it. There he reigned in state, and a long time went by. But not there either could he satisfy his craving; and so he began to look sick with discontent.

“Oh, mighty king,” said the four monarchs, “are you unsatisfied? “And the king replied, “What place is more lovely than this heaven?”

They answered, “My lord, we are like servants. The Heaven of the Thirty-Three is more lovely than this!”

Mandhātā set the Wheel Jewel rolling, and with his court all round him turned his face to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. And Sakka, King of the Gods, bearing celestial flowers and perfumes, in the midst of a great throng of gods, came to meet him in state, and taking charge of him showed him the way he should go. At the time when the king was marching amidst the throng of gods, his eldest son took the Wheel Jewel, and descending to the paths of men, came to his own city.

Sakka led Mandhātā into the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, and gave him half of his own kingdom. After that the two of them ruled together. Time went on, until Sakka had lived for sixty times a hundred thousand years, and thirty millions of years, then was born on earth again; another Sakka grew up, and he too reigned, and lived his life, and was born on earth. In this way six and thirty Sakkas followed one after another. Still Mandhātā reigned with his crowd of courtiers round him. As time went on, the force of his passion and desire grew stronger and stronger.

“What is half a realm to me?” said he in his heart, “I will kill Sakka, and reign alone!” But kill Sakka he could not. This desire and greed of his was the root of his misfortune. The power of his life began to wane; old age seized upon him; \[2.313\] but a human body does not disintegrate in heaven. So from heaven he fell, and descended in a park. The gardener made known his coming to the royal family; they came and appointed him a resting-place in the park; there lay the king in lassitude and weariness.

The courtiers asked him, “My lord, what word shall we take from you?”

“Take from me,” said he, “this message to the people: ‘Mandhātā, king of kings, having ruled supreme over the four quarters of the globe, with all the two thousand islands round about, for a long time having reigned over the people of the Four Great Kings, having been king of Heaven during the lifetime of six and thirty Sakkas, now lies dead.’ ” With these words he died, and went to fare according to his deeds. \[2.218\]

This tale ended, the Teacher after Fully Awakening uttered the following verses:

1. “Wherever sun and moon their courses run
   All are Mandhātā’s servants, every one:
   Where’er earth’s quarters see the light of day,
   There king Mandhātā holds imperial sway."
2. Not though a rain of coins fall from the sky\textsuperscript{550} Could anything be found to satisfy.
Pain is desire, and sorrow is unrest:
He that knows this is wise, and he is blessed.

3. Where longing is, there pleasure takes his wings,
Even though desire be set on heavenly things.
Disciples of the Supreme Buddha try
To crush out all desire eternally.” (2.314)

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Four Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk and many others attained to the Fruit of the First Path. “At that time, I was the great king Mandhātā.”

Ja 259 Tirīṭavacchajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin) Tirīṭavaccha (3s)

In the present the king of Kosala gives 1,000 robes to Ven. Ānanda, who then gives 500 to monks in need, and 500 to his attendant monk, who passes them to other novices. The king asks the Buddha if this is right, and the latter tells a story of how when he was an ascetic in a previous life he had saved the king’s life, and had been honoured because of it. The honour was questioned, but the king stood by his decision.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 92 Mahāsāra,
Quoted at: a 157 Guṇa, Ja 259 Tirīṭavaccha, Ja 302 Mahā-assāroha.

Keywords: Gratitude, Obligation.

“When all alone.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about the gift of a thousand garments, how the venerable Ānanda received five hundred garments from the women of the household of the king of Kosala, and five \textsuperscript{550} See Dhp verses 186 and 187, which are the last two of these verses.

hundred from the king himself. The circumstances have been described above, in the Sigālajātaka [Ja 152], of the Second Book.\footnote{This is another name for Ja 157 Guṇajātaka. I include the story here.}

This was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana how elder Ānanda received a present of a thousand robes. The elder had been preaching to the ladies of the king of Kosala’s palace as described above in the Mahāsārajātaka [Ja 92].

As he preached there in the manner described, a thousand robes, worth each a thousand pieces of money, were brought to the king. Of these the king gave five hundred to as many of his queens. The ladies put these aside and made them a present to our elder, and then the next day in their old ones went to the palace where the king took breakfast. The king remarked, “I gave you dresses worth a thousand pieces each. Why are you not wearing them?” “My lord,” they said, “we have given them to the elder.” “Has elder Ānanda got them all?” he asked. They said: “Yes, he has.” “The Supreme Buddha,” said he, “allows only three robes. Ānanda is doing a little trade in cloth, I suppose!”

He was angry with the elder; and after breakfast, visited him in his cell, and after greeting, sat down, with these words: “Pray, sir, do my ladies learn or listen to your preaching?”

“Yes, sire; they learn what they ought, and what they ought to hear, they hear.”

“Oh, indeed. Do they only listen, or do they make you presents of upper garments or under-garments?”

“Today, sire, they have given me five hundred robes worth a thousand pieces each.”

“And you accepted them, sir?”

“Yes, sire, I did.”

“Why, sir, didn’t the Teacher make some rule about three robes?”
“True, sire, for every monk three robes is the rule, speaking of what he uses for himself. But no one is forbidden to accept what is offered; and that is why I took them – to give them to monks whose robes are worn out.”

“But when these monks get them from you, what do they do with their old ones?”

“Make them into a cloak.”

“And what about the old cloak?”

“That they turn into a shirt.”

“And the old shirt?”

“That serves for a coverlet.”

“Sire, it is not permitted to waste the gifts of the faithful; so they chop up the old towel into bits, and mix the bits with clay, which they use for mortar in building their houses.”

“A gift, sir, ought not to be destroyed, not even a towel.”

“Well, sir king, we destroy no gifts, but all are used somehow.”

This conversation pleased the king so much, that he sent for the other five hundred robes which remained, and gave them to the elder. Then, after receiving his thanks, he greeted the elder in solemn state, and went his way.

The elder gave the first five hundred robes to monks whose robes were worn out. But the number of his fellow monastics was just five hundred. One of these, a young monk, was very useful to the elder; sweeping out his cell, serving him with food and drink, giving him toothbrush and water for cleansing his mouth, looking after the privies, living rooms, and sleeping rooms, and doing all that was needed for hand, foot, or back. To him, as his by right for all his great service, the elder gave all the five hundred robes which he had received afterwards. The young monk in his turn distributed them among his fellow-students. These all cut them up, dyed them yellow as a kaṇikāra flower; then dressed therein they waited upon the Teacher, greeted him, and sat down on one side.
“Sir,” they asked, “is it possible for a holy disciple who has entered on the First Path to be a respecter of persons in his gifts?” “No, monks, it is not possible for holy disciples to be respecters of persons in their gifts.” “Sir, our spiritual teacher, the Treasurer of the Dhamma, gave five hundred robes, each worth a thousand pieces, to a young monk; and he has divided them amongst us.” “Monks, in giving these Ānanda was no respecter of persons. That young fellow was a very useful servant; so he made the present to his own attendant for the sake of his service, for goodness' sake, and by right, thinking that one good turn deserves another, and with a wish to do what gratitude demands. In former days, as now, wise men acted on the principle one good turn deserves another.” And then, at their request, he told them a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisattva was born as the son of a brahmin in Kāsi. On his nameday they called him Teacher Tirīṭavaccha. In due time he grew up, and studied at Taxila. He married and settled down, but his parents' death so distressed him that he became an ascetic, and lived in a woodland dwelling, feeding upon the roots and fruits of the forest. [2.219]

While he lived there, a disturbance arose on the frontiers of Benares. The king repaired there, but was worsted in the fight; fearing for his life, he mounted an elephant, and fled away covertly through the forest. In the morning, Tirīṭavaccha had gone abroad to gather wild fruit, and meanwhile the king came upon his hut. “An ascetic's hut!” said he; down he came from his elephant, weary with wind and sun, and athirst; he looked about for a waterpot, but none could he find. At the end of the covered walk he spied a well, but he could see no rope and bucket for the drawing of water. His thirst was too great to bear; he took off the girth which passed under the elephant's belly, made it fast on the edge, and let himself down into the well. But it was too short; so he tied on to the end of it his lower garment, and let himself down again. Still he could not reach the water. He could just touch it with his feet: he was very thirsty! “If I can but quench my thirst,” he thought, “death itself will be sweet!” So down he dropped, and drank his fill; but he could not get up again, so he remained standing there in the well. And the elephant, so well trained was he, stood still, waiting for the king.

In the evening, the Bodhisattva returned, laden with wild fruits, and espied the elephant. “I suppose,” he thought, “the king is come; but nothing is to be seen save
The armed elephant. What’s to do?” And he approached the elephant, which stood and waited for him. He went to the edge of the well, and saw the king at the bottom. “Fear nothing, O king!” he called out; then he placed a ladder, and helped the king out; he massaged the king’s body, and anointed him with oil; after which he gave him of the fruits to eat, \(2.316\) and loosed the elephant’s armour. Two or three days the king rested there; then he went away, after making the Bodhisatta promise to pay him a visit.

The royal forces were encamped nearby the city; and when the king was perceived coming, they flocked around him.

After a month and half a month, the Bodhisatta returned to Benares, and settled in the park. Next day he came to the palace to ask for food. The king had opened a great window, and stood looking out into the courtyard; and so seeing the Bodhisatta, and recognising him, he descended and gave him greeting; he led him to a dais, and set him upon the throne under a white umbrella; his own food the king gave him to eat, and ate himself of it. Then he took him to the garden, and caused a covered walk and a dwelling to be made for him, and furnished him with all the necessaries of an ascetic; then giving him in charge of a gardener, he bade farewell, and departed. After this, the Bodhisatta took his food in the king’s dwelling: great was the respect and honour paid to him.

But the courtiers could not endure it. “If a soldier,” they said, “were to receive such honour, how would he behave!” They betook \(2.220\) them to the viceroy, “My lord, our king is making too much of an ascetic! What can he have seen in the man? You speak with the king about it.” The viceroy consented, and they all went together before the king. And the viceroy greeted the king, and uttered the first verse:
1. “There is no wit in him that I can see;
   He is no kinsman, nor a friend of you;
   Why should this ascetic with three bits of wood,\(^{552}\)
   Tirīṭavaccha, have such splendid food?”  \(\text{[2.317]}\)

The king listened. Then he said, addressing his son,

“My son, you remember how once I went to the marches, and how I was conquered in war, and came not back for a few days?”

“I remember,” said he.

“This man saved my life,” said the king; and he told him all that had happened.

“Well, my son, now that this my preserver is with me, I cannot requite him for what he has done, not even were I to give him my kingdom.” And he recited the two verses following:

2. “When all alone, in a grim thirsty wood,
   He, and no other, tried to do me good;
   In my distress he lent a helping hand;
   Half-dead he drew me up and made me stand.

3. By his sole doing I returned again
   Out of death’s jaws back to the world of men.
   To recompense such kindness is but fair;
   Give a rich offering, nor stint his share.”  \(\text{[2.318]}\)

So spake the king, as though he were causing the moon to rise up in the sky; and as the virtue of the Bodhisatta was declared, so was declared his own virtue everywhere; and his takings increased, and the honour shown to him. After that neither his viceroy nor his courtiers nor any one else did say anything against him to the king. The king lived in the Bodhisatta's admonition; and he gave alms and did good, and at the last went to swell the hosts of heaven. And the Bodhisatta, having cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, became destined to the Brahmā Realm.

---

\(^{552}\) To hang his waterpot upon.
Then the Teacher added, “Wise men of old gave help too,” and having thus concluded his discourse, he identified the Jātaka as follows, “Ānanda was the king, and I was the ascetic.”

Ja 260 Dūtajātaka

The Story about (Belly’s) Messenger (3s)

In the present one monk is very greedy in all his doings, troubling the supporters with his excessive needs. The Buddha tells a story of man who, in order to eat at the king’s table, told him he had a message for him. Having eaten his fill he spoke on how greed is driven by the belly’s need, thereby pleasing the king.

The Bodhisatta = king Bhojanasuddhika (Bhojanasuddhikāriyā), the greedy monk = the greedy man (lolapurisa).

Present Source: Ja 434 Cakkavāka,
Quoted at: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 260 Dūta, Ja 395 Kāka.

Keywords: Greed, Gluttony.

“O king, the belly’s messenger.” [2.221] This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about a monk who was addicted to covetousness. The circumstances will be given at large under the Kākajātaka [Ja 434], in Book the Ninth.

He was, it was said, greedy after the Buddhist requisites and casting off all duties of master and pastor, entered Sāvatthī quite early, and after drinking excellent rice-gruel served with many a kind of solid food in the house of Visākhā, and after eating in the daytime various dainties, paddy, meat and boiled rice, not satisfied with this he went about thence to the house of Culla Anāthapiṇḍika, and the king of Kosala, and various others.

So one day a discussion was raised in the Dhamma Hall concerning his greediness. When the Teacher heard what they were discussing, he sent for that monk and asked him if it were true that he was greedy, and he said: “Yes.”

---

553 [Another name for Ja 434 Cakkavākajātaka. I include the story here.]
Here again the Teacher told the monk, \(\text{[2.319]}\) “You were greedy before, monk, as you are now; and in olden days for your greed you had your head cleft with a sword.”\(^{554}\) Then he told a story about the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king over Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as his son. He grew up, and finished his education at Taxila. On his father’s death, he inherited the kingdom, and he was very dainty in his eating; accordingly he earned the name of king Bhojanasuddhika [Pure Food]. There was so much extravagance about his eating, that on one dish he spent a hundred thousand pieces. When he ate, he ate not within doors; but as he wished to confer merit\(^{555}\) upon many people by showing them the costly array of his meals, he caused a pavilion adorned with jewels to be set up at the door, and at the time of eating, he had this decorated, and there he sat upon a royal dais made all of gold, under a white parasol with princesses all around him, and ate the food of a hundred delicate flavours from a dish which cost a hundred thousand pieces of money.

Now a certain greedy man saw the king’s manner of eating, and desired to have a taste. Unable to master his craving, he girt up his loins tight, and ran up to the king, calling out loudly, “Messenger! Messenger! O king” with his hands held up. (At that time and in that nation, if a man called out “Messenger!” no one would stay him; and so it was that the multitude divided and gave way for him to pass.)

The man ran up swiftly, and catching a piece of rice from the king’s dish, he put it in his mouth. The swordsman drew his sword, to cleave the man’s head. But the king stayed him. “Smite not,” said he; then to the man, “fear nothing, eat on!” He washed his hands, and sat down. \([2.222]\) \([2.320]\)

After the meal, the king caused his own drinking water and betel nut to be given to the man, and then said: “Now my man, you had tidings, you said. What are your tidings?”

\(^{554}\) [The story must have had an alternative ending at one time. As it stands at present, the king is pleased with him, and praises his wisdom.]

\(^{555}\) The Talmud says that one should always run to meet the kings of Israel and even gentile kings.
“O king, I am a messenger from craving and the belly. Says craving to me, Go! And sent me here as her messenger,” and with these words he spake the first two verses:

1. “O king, the belly’s messenger you see:
O lord of chariots, do not angry be!
For belly’s sake men very far will go,
Even to ask a favour of a foe.

2. O king, the belly’s messenger you see;
O lord of chariots, do not angry be!
The belly holds beneath his puissant sway
All men upon the earth both night and day.”

When this the king heard, he said: “That is true; belly-messengers are these; urged by craving they go to and fro, and craving makes them go. How prettily this man has put it!” he was pleased with him, and uttered the third verse:

3. “Brahmin, a thousand red kine I present
To you; thereto the bull, for complement.
One messenger may to another give;
For belly’s messengers are all that live.”

So said the king; and continued, “I have heard something I never heard before, or thought of, said by this great man.” And so pleased was he, that he showered honours upon him. {2.321}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the greedy monk reached the Fruit of the Third Path, and many others entered the other Paths. “The greedy man is the same in both stories, and I was king Bhojanasuddhika.”

Ja 261 Padumajātaka

The Story about (Begging for) Lotuses (3s)

In the present Ven. Ānanda helps some monks get lotus flowers to worship the Bodhi tree at Sāvatthi. The Buddha then tells a story of how some people had tried to cheat the caretaker of a lotus tank, and were rebuffed. The one who spoke honestly, however, was given flowers.

The Bodhisatta = the treasurer’s son who got the lotuses (padumalābhī seṭṭhiputto).
“Cut, and cut, and cut again.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about some monks who made offering of garlands under Ānanda’s tree. The circumstances will be given in the Kāliṅgabodhijātaka [Ja 479].

This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana about worship of the Bodhi tree performed by elder Ānanda.

When the Tathāgata had set forth on pilgrimage, for the purpose of gathering in those who were ripe for conversion, the citizens of Sāvatthi proceeded to Jetavana, their hands full of garlands and fragrant wreaths, and finding no other place to show their reverence, laid them by the gateway of the perfumed chamber and went off. This caused great rejoicings. But Anāthapiṇḍika got to hear of it; and on the return of the Tathāgata visited elder Ānanda and said to him, “This monastery, sir, is left unprovided while the Tathāgata goes on pilgrimage, and there is no place for the people to do reverence by offering fragrant wreaths and garlands. Will you be so kind, sir, as to tell the Tathāgata of this matter, and learn from him whether or not it is possible to find a place for this purpose.” The other, quite willingly, did so, asking, “How many shrines are there?” “Three, Ānanda.” “Which are they?” “Shrines for a relic of the body, a relic of use or wear, a relic of memorial” “Can a shrine be made, sir, during your life?” “No, Ānanda, not a body-shrine; that kind is made when a Buddha enters Nibbāna. A shrine of memorial is improper because the connection depends on the imagination only. But the great Bodhi tree used by the Buddhas is fit for a shrine, be they alive or be they dead.” “Sir, while you are away on pilgrimage the great monastery of Jetavana is unprotected, and the people have no place where they can show their reverence. Shall I plant a seed of the great Bodhi tree before the gateway of Jetavana?” “By all means so do, Ānanda, and that shall be as it were an abiding place for me.”

The elder told this to Anāthapiṇḍika, and Visākhā, and the king. Then at the gateway of Jetavana he cleared out a pit for the Bodhi tree to stand in, and said to the chief elder, Moggallāna, “I want to plant a Bodhi tree in front of Jetavana.
Will you get me a fruit of the great Bodhi tree?” The elder, willingly, passed through the air to the platform under the Bodhi tree. He placed in his robe a fruit that was dropping from its stalk but had not reached the ground, brought it back, and delivered it to Ānanda. The elder informed the king of Kosala that he was to plant the Bodhi tree that day. So in the evening time the king came with a great concourse, bringing all things necessary; then also Anāthapiṇḍika and Visākhā came and a crowd of the faithful besides.

In the place where the Bodhi tree was to be planted the elder had placed a golden jar, and in the bottom of it was a hole; all was filled with earth moistened with fragrant water. He said: “O king, plant this seed of the Bodhi tree,” giving it to the king. But the king, thinking that his kingdom was not to be in his hands for ever, and that Anāthapiṇḍika ought to plant it, passed the seed to Anāthapiṇḍika, the great merchant. Then Anāthapiṇḍika stirred up the fragrant soil and dropped it in. The instant it dropped from his hand, before the very eyes of all, it sprang up as broad as a plough-head a Bodhi sapling, fifty cubits tall; on the four sides and upwards shot forth five great branches of fifty cubits in length, like the trunk. So stood the tree, a very lord of the forest already; a mighty miracle! The king poured round the tree jars of gold and of silver, in number eight hundred, filled with scented water, beauteous with a great quantity of blue water-lilies, and caused to be set there a long line of vessels all full, and a seat he had made of the seven precious things, golden dust he had sprinkled about it, a wall was built round the precincts, he erected a gate chamber of the seven precious things. Great was the honour paid to it.

The elder, approaching the Tathāgata, said to him, “Sir, for the people’s good, accomplish under the Bodhi tree which I have planted that height of Attainment to which you attained under the great Bodhi tree.” “What is this you say, Ānanda?” replied he. “There is no other place can support me, if I sit there and attain to that which I attained in the enclosure of the great Bodhi tree.” “Sir,” said Ānanda, “I pray you for the good of the people, to use this tree for the rapture of Attainment, in so far as this spot of ground can support the weight.” The Teacher used it during one night for the rapture of Attainment.

The elder informed the king, and all the rest, and called it by the name of the Bodhi Festival.
This tree was called [2.223] Ānanda’s tree, because Ānanda planted it.\textsuperscript{556} All Jambudīpa heard tell how the elder had planted this tree by the gate of Jetavana.

Some monks who lived in the country thought they would make offerings before Ānanda’s tree. They journeyed to Jetavana, did their devotions to the Teacher, and next day wended their way to Sāvatthi, to the Lotus Street; but not a garland could they get. So they told Ānanda, how they had wished to make an offering to the tree, but that not a garland was to be had in all the Lotus Street. The elder promised to fetch some; so he went off to the Lotus Street, and returned with many handfuls of blue lotus, which he gave them. With these they made their offering to the tree.

When the monks got wind of this, they began discussing the elder’s merits in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, some brothers of little merit from the country could not get a single nosegay in the Lotus Bazaar; but the elder went and fetched them some.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were talking of as they sat there; and they told him. Said he, [2.322] “Monks, this is not the first time that a clever tongue has gained a garland for clever speaking; it was the same before.”\textsuperscript{557}

And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a rich merchant’s son. In the town was a tank, in which the lotus flowered. A man who had lost his nose looked after the tank.

It happened one day that they proclaimed holiday in Benares; and the three sons of this rich man thought that they would put wreaths upon them, and go a merrymaking. “We'll flatter up the old lacknose fellow, and then we'll beg some flowers of him.” So at the time when he used to pluck the lotus flowers, to the tank they went, and waited. And one of them uttered the first verse:

\textsuperscript{556} [In the story Anāthapiṇḍaka does the actual planting, monks not being allowed to dig the earth. We may understand it as being due to Ānanda that the tree was planted.]

\textsuperscript{557} [Note that nothing was said in the Introduction to indicate that Ven Ānanda had used clever speaking to gain the lotuses for the monks, so the story hardly fits.]
The Section with Three Verses – 953

1. “Cut, and cut, and cut again,
   Hair and whiskers grow amain;
   And your nose will grow like these,
   Give me just one lotus, please!”

But the man was angry, and gave none. Then the second said the second verse:

2. “In the autumn seeds are sown
   Which before long are fully grown;
   May your nose sprout up like these.
   Give me just one lotus, please!”

Again the man was angry, and gave no lotus. Then the third of them repeated the third verse:

3. “Babbling fools! To think that they Can get a lotus in this way.
   Say they yes, or say they no,
   Noses cut no more will grow.
   See, I ask you honestly:
   Give a lotus, sir, to me!” [2.224] [2.323]

On hearing this the lake keeper said: “The other two lied, but you have spoken the truth. You deserve to have some lotuses.” So he gave him a great bunch of lotus, and went back to his lake.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “The boy who got the lotus was I myself.”

Ja 262 Mudupāṇijātaka
The Story about the Soft Hand (3s)

In the present one monk is discontent owing to his love of women. The Buddha tells a story of one princess who successfully managed to elope with her lover, even though the king held her by the hand while she bathed.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Love, Wilfulness, Women.

“A soft hand.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a discontented monk. They brought him to the Dhamma Hall, and the Teacher asked him if he were really discontent? He replied, “Yes, he was.” Then said the Teacher, “O monks! It is impossible to keep women from going after their desires. In olden days, even wise men could not guard their own daughters; while they stood holding their fathers’ hand, without their fathers’ knowing, because of defilements she ran away with a man,” and he told them a story.

In the past, while king Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his queen consort. Growing up, he was educated at Taxila, and on his father’s death he became king in his stead, and reigned righteously.

There dwelt with him a daughter and a nephew, both together in his house. One day as he sat with his court, he said: “When I am dead my nephew will be king, and my daughter will be his chief queen.”

Afterwards, when they were grown up, he was sitting again amidst his court; and he said to them, “I will bring home some other man’s daughter for my nephew, and my own daughter will I marry into another king’s family. In this way I shall have many relations.” The courtiers agreed. Then the king assigned to the nephew a house outside the palace, and forbade his coming to the palace.

But these two were in love with each other. Thought the youth, “How shall I get the king’s daughter outside the house? Ah, I have it.” He gave a present to the nurse.

“What am I to do for this, master?” she asked. “Well, mother, I want to get a chance of bringing the princess out of doors.” “I will talk it over with the princess,” said she, “and then tell you.” “Very good, mother,” he replied.

To the princess she came. “Let me pick the bugs off of your head,” said she.

She sat the princess upon a low stool, and herself sitting on a higher one, she put the princess’s head upon her lap, and in looking for the bugs, she scratched the princess’s head. The princess understood. She thought: “She has scratched me with my cousin the prince’s nail, not her own. Mother,” asked she, “have you been with the prince?”

“Yes, my daughter.” “And what did he say?” “He asked how he could find a way of getting you out of doors.” “If he is wise, he will know,” said the princess; and
The woman learned it, and returned to the prince.

“Well, mother, what did the princess say?” he asked. “Nothing, {2.325} but only sent you this verse,” replied she; and she repeated it. The prince took it in, and dismissed her.

The prince understood exactly what was meant. He found a beautiful and soft-handed page lad, and prepared him. He bribed the keeper of a state elephant, and having trained the elephant to be impassive, he bided his time. Then, one Uposatha of the dark fortnight, just after the middle watch, rain fell from a thick black cloud. “This is the day the princess meant,” thought he; he mounted the elephant, and placed the lad of the soft hands on its back, and set out. Opposite the palace he fastened the elephant to the great wall of an open courtyard, and stood before a window getting drenched.

Now the king watched his daughter, and let her rest nowhere but upon a little bed, in his presence. She thought to herself, “Today the prince will come!” and lay down without going to sleep. “Father,” said she, “I want to bathe.”

“Come along, my daughter,” said the king. Holding her hands, he led her to the window; he lifted her, and placed her on a lotus ornament outside it, holding her by one hand. As she bathed herself, she held out a [2.226] hand to the prince. He loosed off the bangles from her arm, and fastened them on the arm of his page boy; then he lifted the lad, and placed him upon the lotus beside the princess. {2.326} She took his hand, and placed it in her father’s, who took it, and let go his daughter’s hand. Then she loosed the ornaments from her other arm, and fastened them on the other hand of the lad, which she placed in her father’s, and went away with the prince. The king thought the lad to be his own daughter; and when the bathing was over, he put him to sleep in the royal bedchamber, shut the door, and set his seal on it; then setting a guard, he retired to his own chamber, and lay down to rest.
When the daylight came, he opened the door, and there he saw this lad. “What’s this?” cried he. The lad told how she was fled along with the prince. The king was cast down. “Not even if one goes along and holds hands,” thought the king, “can one guard a woman. Thus women are impossible to guard,” and he uttered these other two verses:

2. “Though soft of speech, like rivers hard to fill,
   Insatiate, nought can satisfy their will:
   Down, down they sink: a man should flee afar
   From women, when he knows what kind they are.

3. Whomso they serve for gold or for desire,
   They burn him up like fuel in the fire.”

So saying, the Great Being added, “I must support my nephew,” so with great honour he gave his daughter to this very man, and made him viceroy. And the nephew at his uncle’s death became king himself.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the discontented monk was firmly established in the Fruit of the First Path, “In those days, I was the king.”

Ja 263 Cullapalobhanajātaka

The Short Story about Enticement (3s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷapalobhanajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is discontent owing to his love of women. The Buddha tells a story about how in a previous he had fallen in love through a woman’s voice, had run 558 The following verses are given by the commentator: ‘Where women rule, the seeing lose their sight, The strong grow weak, the mighty have no might. Where women rule, virtue and wisdom fly: Reckless the prisoners in durance lie. Like highway robbers, all they steal away From their poor victims, careless come what may Reflection, virtue, truth, and reasoning Self-sacrifice, and goodness – everything. As fire burns fuel, for each careless wight They burn fame, glory, learning, wit, and might. The word for fire is the archaic jātaveda, used already in no. 35. See note in vol. i. p. 90.

---

away with her, but when she tempted an ascetic, spurned her, and took up the ascetic life himself.

The Bodhisatta = the prince (who didn’t like women) Anitthigandha.

Present Source: Ja 263 Cullapalobhana,
Quoted at: Ja 507 Mahāpalobhana.

Keywords: Dislike, Purity, Women.

“This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, also about a discontented monk. The Teacher had him brought into the Dhamma Hall, and asked if it were true that he was discontent. Yes, said he, it was.

“Women,” said the Teacher, “in olden days made even believing souls do wrong.”

Then he told a story.

In the past Brahmadatta, the king of Benares, was childless. He said to his queen, “Let us offer prayer for a son.” They offered prayer. After a long time, the Bodhisatta came down from the Brahmā Realm, and was conceived by his queen. So soon as he was born, he was bathed, and given to a serving woman to nurse. As he took the breast, he cried. He was given to another; but while a woman held him, he would not be quiet. So he was given to a man servant; and as soon as the man took him, he was quiet. After that men used to carry him about. When they suckled him, they would milk the breast for him, or they gave him the breast from behind a screen. Even when he grew older, they could not show him a woman.

The king caused to be made for him a separate place for sitting and so on, and a separate room for meditation, all by himself.

When the lad was sixteen years old, the king thought thus within himself. “Other son have I none, and this one enjoys no pleasures. He will not even wish for the kingdom. What’s the good of such a son?”

And there was a certain dancing girl, clever at dance and song and music, young, able to gain ascendance over any man she came across. She approached the king, and asked what he was thinking about; the king told her what it was. {2.329}

“Let be, my lord,” said she, “I will allure him, I will make him love me.”
“Well, if you can allure my son, who has never had any dealings whatsoever with women, he shall be king, and you shall be his chief queen!” “Leave that to me, my lord,” said she, “and don’t be anxious.”

So she came to the people of the guard, and said: “At dawn of day I will go to the sleeping place of the prince, and outside the room where he meditates apart I will sing. If he is angry, you must tell me, and I will go away; but if he listens, speak my praises.” This they agreed to do. [2.228]

So in the morning time she took her stand in that place, and sang with a voice of honey, so that the music was as sweet as the song, and the song as sweet as the music. The prince lay listening. Next day, he commanded that she should stand near and sing. The next day, he commanded her to stand in the private chamber, and the next, in his own presence; and so by and by desire arose in him; he went the way of the world, and knew the joy of love. “I will not let another have this woman,” he resolved; and taking his sword, he ran amuck through the street, chasing the people. The king had him captured, and banished him from the city along with the girl.

Together they journeyed to the jungle, away down the Ganges. There, with the river on one side and the sea on the other, they made a hut, and there they lived. She sat indoors, and cooked the roots and bulbs; the Bodhisatta brought wild fruits from the forest.

One day, when he was away in search of fruits, an ascetic from an island in the sea, who was going his rounds to get food, saw smoke as he passed through the air, and alighted beside this hut.

“Sit down until it is cooked,” said the woman; then her woman’s charms seduced his soul, and brought it down from his Absorption, making a breach in his purity. And he, like a crow with broken wing, {2.330} unable to leave her, sat there the whole day till he saw the Bodhisatta coming, and then ran off quickly in the direction of the sea. “This must be an enemy,” he thought, and drawing his sword set off in chase.

But the ascetic, making as though he would rise in the air, fell down into the sea. Then thought the Bodhisatta, “That man is doubtless an ascetic who came here through the air; and now that his Absorption is broken, he has fallen into the sea. I must go help him.” And standing on the shore he uttered these verses:

1. “Not through the sea, but by Supernormal Powers,
   You journeyed hither at an earlier hour;
   Now by a woman’s evil company
   You have been made to plunge beneath the sea.

2. Full of seductive wiles, deceitful all,
   They tempt the most pure-hearted to his fall.
   Down, down they sink: a man should flee afar
   From women, when he knows what kind they are.

3. Whomso they serve, for gold or for desire,
   They burn him up like fuel in the fire.”

When the ascetic heard these words which the Bodhisatta spake, he stood up in the midst of the sea, and resuming his interrupted trance, he rose through the air, and went away to his dwelling place. Thought the Bodhisatta, “That ascetic, with so great a burden, goes through the air like a fleck of cotton. [2.331] Why should not I, like him, cultivate Absorption, and pass through the air!” So he returned to his hut, and led the woman among mankind again; then he told her to be gone, and himself went into the jungle, where he built him a hut in a pleasant spot, and became an ascetic; by focusing on the Meditation Object, he cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths; now at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk became established in the Fruit of the First Path. “At that time,” said he, “I was myself the youth that had never had anything to do with women.”

---

559 The Commentator gives the following lines in his note: Hallucination, sorrow, and disease, Mirage, distress (and solid bonds are these), The snare of death, deep-seated in the mind Who trusts in these is vilest of his kind.
The Section with Three Verses – 960

Ja 264 Mahāpanādajātaka\(^{560}\)

The Story about (the King of Mithilā) Mahāpanāda (3s)

In the present the Buddha goes to teach in one village where there was a young and very rich gentleman, who, when he heard the Buddha teach he gave up his previous life and became a monk. When one day they were crossing a river the Buddha asked him to show the palace he had lived in in a previous life, which had sunk under the waters. He did so, and the Buddha then told the story of his previous fame and fortune.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, Bhaddaji = (king) (of Mithilā) Mahāpanāda.

Keywords: Repute, Glory, Devas.

"'Twas king Panāda." This story the Teacher told when he was settled on the bank of the Ganges, about the miraculous power of elder Bhaddaji.

On one occasion, when the Teacher had passed the rains at Sāvatthi, he thought he would show kindness to a young gentleman named Bhaddaji. So with all the monks who were with him, he made his way to the city of Bhaddiya, and stayed three months in Jātiyā Grove, waiting until the young man should mature and perfect his knowledge. Now young Bhaddaji was a magnificent person, the only son of a rich merchant in Bhaddiya, with a fortune of eight hundred millions. He had three houses for the three seasons, in each of which he stayed four months; and after spending this period in one of them, he used to migrate with all his kith and kin to another in the greatest pomp. On these occasions all the town was eager to see the young man’s magnificence; and between these houses used to be erected seats in circles on circles and tiers above tiers.

When the Teacher had been there three months, he informed the townspeople that he intended to leave. Begging him to wait until the morrow, the townsfolk on the following day collected magnificent gifts for the Buddha and his attendant monks; and set up a pavilion in the midst of the town, decorating it and laying out seats; then they announced that the hour had come. The Teacher [2.230] with his company went and took their seats there. Everybody gave generously to them.

---

After the meal was over, the Teacher in a voice sweet as honey returned thanks to them.

At this moment, young Bhaddaji was passing from one of his residences to another. But that day not a soul came to see his splendour; only his own people were about him. So he asked his people how it was. Usually all the city was eager to see him pass from house to house; circles on circles and tiers above tiers the seats were built; but just then there was nobody but his own followers! What could be the reason?

The reply was, “My lord, the Supreme Buddha has been spending three months near the town, and this day he leaves. He has just finished his meal, and is holding a discourse. All the town is there listening to his words.”

“Oh, very well, we will go and hear him too,” said the young man. So, in a blaze of ornaments, with his crowd of followers about him, he went and stood on the skirt of the crowd; as he heard the discourse, he threw off all his defilements, and attained to supreme fruition and became an Arahat.

The Teacher, addressing the merchant of Bhaddiya, said: “Sir, your son, in all his splendour, while hearing my discourse has become an Arahat; this very day he should either embrace the ascetic life, or enter Nibbāna.”

“Sir,” replied he, “I do not wish my son to enter Nibbāna. Admit him to the monastic order; this done, come with him to my house tomorrow.”

The Fortunate One accepted this invitation; he took the young gentleman to the monastery, admitted him to the Saṅgha, and afterward to the lower and higher ordinations. For a week the youth's parents showed generous hospitality to him.

After remaining these seven days, the Teacher went on alms pilgrimage, taking the young man with him, and arrived at a village called Koṭi. The villagers of Koṭi gave generously to the Buddha and his followers. At the end of this meal, the Teacher began to express his thanks. While this was being done, the young gentleman went outside the village, and by a landing-place of the Ganges he sat down under a tree, and plunged in Absorption, thinking that he would rise as soon as the Teacher should come. When the elders of greatest age approached, he did not rise, but he rose as soon as the Teacher came. The unconverted folk were angry because he behaved as though he were a monk of long standing, not rising up even when he saw the eldest monks approach.

The villagers constructed rafts. This done, \{2.333\} the Teacher asked where Bhaddaji was. “There he is, sir.” “Come, Bhaddaji, come aboard my raft.” The elder rose, and followed him to his raft. When they were in mid-river, the Teacher asked him a question.

“Bhaddaji, where is the palace you lived in when Great Panāda was king?” “Here, under the water,” was the reply. The worldly monks said one to the other, “Elder Bhaddaji is declaring his knowledge!” Then the Teacher bade him disperse the doubt of his fellow-students.

In a moment, the elder, with a bow to his Teacher, moving by his Supernormal Powers, took the whole pile of the palace on his finger, and rose in the air bearing the palace with him (it covered a space of twenty-five leagues); then he made a hole in it and showed himself to the present inhabitants of the palace below, and tossed the building above the water first one league, then two, then three. Then those who had been his kinsfolk in this former existence, who had now become fish or turtles, water-snakes or frogs, because they loved the palace so much, and had come to life in the very same place, wriggled out of it when it rose up, and tumbled over and over into the water again. When the Teacher saw this, he said: “Bhaddaji, your relations are in trouble.” At his Teacher’s words the elder let the palace go, and it sank to the place where it had been before.

The Teacher passed to the further side of the Ganges. Then they prepared \[2.231\] him a seat just on the river bank. On the seat prepared for the Buddha, he sat, like the sun fresh risen pouring forth his rays. Then the monks asked him when it was that elder Bhaddaji had lived in that palace. The Teacher answered, “In the days of king Great Panāda,” and went on to tell them a story of the past.

In the past, a certain Suruci was king of Mithilā, which is a town in the kingdom of Videha. He had a son, named Suruci likewise, and he again had a son, Mahāpanāda. They obtained possession of that mansion. They obtained it by a deed done in a former existence. A father and son made a hut of leaves with canes and branches of the fig tree, as a dwelling for a Paccekabuddha.

---

\[561\] For an explanation of this phrase, \textit{aṇṇaṁ vyākaroti}, see \textit{Mahāvagga} r. v. 19 with the translators’ note (\textit{Sacred Books of the East, Vinaya Texts} ii. p. 10).

The rest of the story will be told in the Surucijātaka [Ja 489], Book XIV. {2.334}

When they died, they were born in the heaven of the Thirty-Three, and dwelt in the six heavens of sense one after the other in direct and in reverse succession, enjoying great majesty among the gods. These two after dying in that region were desirous of winning to the upper Deva world. Sakka perceiving that one of them would be the Tathāgata, went to the door of their mansion, and saluting him as he arose and came to meet him, said: “Sir, you must go into the world of men.” But he said: “O king, the world of men is hateful and loathsome: they who dwell there do good and give alms longing for the world of the gods. What shall I do when I get there?” “Sir, you shall enjoy in perfection all that can be enjoyed in that world; you shall dwell in a palace made with stones of price, five and twenty leagues in height. Do consent.” He consented.

When Sakka had received his promise, in the guise of a sage he descended into the king’s park, and showed himself soaring above those women to and fro in the air, while he chanted, “To whom shall I give the blessing of a son, who craves the blessing of a son?” “To me, sir, to me!” thousands of hands were uplifted. Then he said: “I give sons to the virtuous: what is your virtue, what your life and conversation?” They drew down their uplifted hands, saying: “If you would reward virtue, go seek Sumedhā.” He went his ways through the air, and hovered at the window of her bedchamber. Then they went and told her, saying: “See, my lady, a King of the Devas has come down through the air, and stands at your bedchamber window, offering you the boon of a son!” With great pomp she proceeded there, and opening the window, said: “Is this true, sir, that I hear, how you offer the blessing of a son to a virtuous woman?” “It is, and so I do.” “Then grant it to me.” “What is your virtue, tell me; and if you please me, I grant you the boon.” Then declaring her virtue she recited these fifteen verses.

“I am king Ruci’s consort-queen, the first he ever wed;
With Suruci ten thousand years my wedded life I led.

Suruci king of Mithilā, Videha’s chief place,
I never lightly held his wish, nor deemed him mean or base,
In deed or thought or word, behind his back, nor to his face.
If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.

The parents of my husband dear, so long as they held sway,
And while they lived, would ever give me training in the way.

My passion was to hurt no life, and willingly do right:
I served them with extremest care unwearied day and night.

If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.

No less than sixteen thousand dames my fellow-wives have been:
Yet, brahmin, never jealousy nor anger came between.

At their good fortune I rejoice; each one of them is dear;
My heart is soft to all these wives as though myself it were.

If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.

Slaves, messengers, and servants all, and all about the place,
I give them food, I treat them well, with cheerful pleasant face.

If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.

Ascetics, brahmins, any man who begging here is seen,
I comfort all with food and drink, my hands all washen clean.

If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.

The eighth of either fortnight, the fourteenth, fifteenth days,
And the especial fast I keep, I walk in holy ways.

If this be true, O holy one, so may that son be given:
But if my lips are speaking lies, then burst my head in seven.”

Indeed not a hundred verses, nor a thousand, could suffice to sing the praise of her virtues: yet Sakka allowed her to sing her own praises in these fifteen verses, nor did he cut the tale short though he had much to do elsewhere; then he said: “Abundant and marvellous are your virtues,” then in her praise he recited a couple of verses:
“All these great virtues, glorious dame, O daughter of a king,
Are found in you, which of thyself, O lady, you do sing.

A warrior, born of noble blood, all glorious and wise,
Videha’s righteous emperor, your son, shall soon arise.”

When these words she heard, in great joy she recited two verses, putting a question to him:

“Unkempt, with dust and dirt begrimed, high-poised in the sky,
You speakest in a lovely voice that pricks me to the heart.

Are you a mighty god, O sage and dwell in heaven on high?
O tell me whence you comest here, O tell me who you are!”

He told her in six verses:

“Sakka the hundred-eyed you see, for so the gods me call
When they are wont to assemble in the heavenly judgement hall.

When women virtuous, wise, and good here in the world are found,
True wives, to husband’s mother kind even as in duty bound,

When such a woman wise of heart and good in deed they know,
To her, though woman, they divine, the gods themselves will go.

So lady, you, through worthy life, through store of good deeds done,
A princess born, all happiness the heart can wish, have won.

So you do reap your deeds, princess, by glory on the earth,
And after in the world of gods a new and heavenly birth.

O wise, O blessed! So live on, preserve your conduct right:
Now I to heaven must return, delighted with your sight.”

“I have business to do in the world of gods,” said he, “therefore I go; but do you be vigilant.” With this advice he departed.

In the morning time, the Devaputta Naḷakāra was conceived within her womb. When she discovered it, she told the king, and he did what was necessary for a woman with child. At the end of ten months she brought forth a son, and they gave him Mahāpanāda for his name. All the people of the two countries came crying out, “My lord, we bring this for the boy’s milk-money,” and each dropped a coin in the king’s courtyard: a great heap there was of them. The king did not wish to accept this, but they would not take the money back, but said as they departed, “When the boy grows up, my lord, it will pay for his keep.”

The lad was brought up amid great magnificence; and when he came of years, aye, no more than sixteen, he was perfect in all accomplishments. The king thinking of his son’s age, said to the queen, “My lady, when the time comes for the ceremonial sprinkling of our son, let us make him a fine palace for that occasion.” She was quite willing. The king sent for those who had skill in divining the auspicious place for a building, and said to them, “My friends, get a master-mason, and build me a palace not far from my own. This is for my son, whom we are about to consecrate as my successor.” They said it was well, and proceeded to examine the surface of the ground. At that moment Sakka’s throne became hot. Perceiving this, he at once summoned Vissakamma, and said: “Go, my good Vissakamma, make for prince Mahāpanāda a palace half a league in length and breadth and five and twenty leagues in height, all with stones of price.”

Vissakamma took on the shape of a mason, and approaching the workmen said: “Go and eat your breakfast, then return.” Having thus got rid of the men, he struck on the earth with his staff; in that instant up rose a palace, seven storeys high, of the aforesaid size.

Now for Mahāpanāda these three ceremonies were done together: the ceremony for consecrating the palace, the ceremony for spreading above him the royal umbrella, the ceremony of his marriage. At the time of the ceremony all the people of both countries gathered together, and spent seven years feasting, nor did the king dismiss them: their clothes, their ornaments, their food and their drink and all the rest of it, these things were all provided by the royal family. At the seven years’ end they began to grumble, and king Suruci asked why. “O king,” they said, “while we have been revelling at this feast seven years have gone by. When will the feast come to an end?” He answered, “My good friends, all this while my son has never once laughed. So soon as he shall laugh, we will disperse again.”

Then the crowd went beating the drum and gathered the tumblers and jugglers together. Thousands of tumblers were gathered, and they divided themselves into seven bands and danced; but they could not make the prince laugh. Of course he that had seen the dancing of dancers divine could not care for such dancers as these. Then came two clever jugglers, Bhaṇḍukaṇṇa and Paṇḍukaṇṇa, Crop-ear and Yellow-ear, and say they, “We will make the prince laugh.” Bhaṇḍukaṇṇa made a great mango tree, which he called Sanspareil, grow before the palace door: then he threw up a ball of string, and made it catch on a branch of the tree, and then up he climbed into the Mango Sanspareil. Now the Mango Sanspareil they say is Vessavaṇa’s mango. And the slaves of Vessavaṇa took him, as usual, chopped him up by the various limbs and threw down the bits. The other jugglers joined the pieces together, and poured water upon them. The man donned upper and under garments of flowers, and rose up and began dancing again. Even the sight of this did not make the prince laugh. Then Paṇḍukaṇṇa had some firewood piled in the courtyard and went into the fire with his troop. When the fire was burnt out, the people sprinkled the pile with water. Paṇḍukaṇṇa with his troop rose up dancing with upper and under garments of flowers.

When the people found they could not make him laugh, they grew angry. Sakka, perceiving this, sent down a divine dancer, bidding him make prince Mahāpanāda laugh. Then he came and remained poised in the air above the royal courtyard, and performed what is called the Half-body dance: one hand, one foot, one eye, one tooth, go dancing, throbbing, flickering to and fro, all the rest stood still. Mahāpanāda, when he saw this, gave a little smile. But the crowd roared and roared with laughter, could not cease laughing, laughed themselves out of their wits, lost control of their limbs, rolled over and over in the royal courtyard, and that was the end of the festival.

The Teacher, having finished telling this story, after Fully Awakening uttered these verses here following:

1. “ ’Twas king Panāda who this palace had,
   A thousand bowshots high, in breadth sixteen.

2. A thousand bowshots high, in banners clad;
   A hundred storeys, all of emerald green.

3. Six thousand men of music to and fro
   In seven companies did dance withal:
   As Bhaddaji has said, ’twas even so:
   I, Sakka, was your slave, at beck and call.” [2.335]

At that moment the worldly monks became resolved of their doubt.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Bhaddaji was the Mahāpanāda, and I was Sakka.”

Ja 265 Khurappajātaka

The Story about the Arrow (3s)

In the present one monk has almost given up on the struggle. The Buddha tells him a story about a forester who acted as a guide for a merchant and was willing to lay down his life to ensure his client was delivered to his destination safely.

The Bodhisatta = the elder watchman (ārakkhaḷthaka).

Keywords: Effort, Determination.

“When many a bow.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a monk who had lost all energy. The Teacher asked, was it true that this monk had lost his energy. Yes, he replied. “Why,” asked he, “have you slackened your energy, after embracing this dispensation? In days of yore, wise men were energetic even in matters which do not lead to escape,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a forester. When he grew up, he took the lead of a band of five hundred foresters, and lived in a village at the entrance to the forest. He used to hire himself out to guide men through it.

Now one day a man of Benares, a merchant’s son, arrived at that village with a caravan of five hundred wagons. Sending for the Bodhisatta, he offered him a thousand pieces to be his guide through the forest. He agreed, and received the money from the merchant’s hand; and as he took it, he mentally devoted his life to the merchant’s service. Then he guided him into the forest.

In the midst of the forest, up rose five hundred robbers. As for the rest of the company, no sooner did they see these robbers, than they grovelled upon their belly: the head forester alone, shouting and leaping and dealing blows, put to flight all the five hundred robbers, and led the merchant across the wood in safety. Once across the forest, the merchant encamped his caravan; he gave the chief forester choice meats of every kind, and himself having broken his fast, sat pleasantly by him, and talked with him thus, “Tell me,” said he, “how it was that even when five hundred robbers, with arms in their hands, were spread all around, you felt not even any fear in your heart?” And he uttered the first verse:

1. “When many a bow the shaft at speed let fly –
   Hands grasping blades of tempered steel were nigh –
   When Death had marshalled all his dread array –
   Why, ’mid such terror, felt you no dismay?”

On hearing this the forester repeated the two verses following:

2. “When many a bow the shaft at speed let fly –
   Hands grasping blades of tempered steel were nigh –
   When Death had marshalled all his dread array –
   I felt a great and mighty joy this day.

3. And this my joy gave me the victory;
   I was resolved to die, if need should be;
   He must contemn his life, who would fulfil Heroic deeds and be a hero still.” [2.337]

Thus did he send forth his words like a shower of arrows; and having explained how he had done heroically through being free from the desire to live, he parted from the young merchant, and returned to his own village; where after giving alms and doing good he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the disheartened monk became an Arahat. “At that time I was the chief of the foresters.”

Ja 266 Vāttagasindhavajātaka

The Story about the Thoroughbred Horse Vāttaga (3s)

In the present one young woman falls in love with a householder, and her friends bring him to her. Playing hard to get she is unresponsive to his advances, and he leaves her never to return, which leads to her pining away. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past involving an ass and a thoroughbred horse.

The Bodhisatta = the (thoroughbred) horse Vāttaga, the woman = the female donkey (gadrabhī).

Keywords: Love, Rejection, Animals.
“He for whose sake.” [2.233] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain landowner.

At Sāvatthi, we learn, a handsome woman saw this man, who was also handsome, and fell in love. The passion within her was like a fire burning her body through and through. She lost her senses, both of body and of mind; she cared nothing for food; she only lay down hugging the frame of the bedstead.

Her friends and handmaidens asked her what troubled her at heart that she lay hugging the bedstead; what was the matter, they wished to know. The first few times she answered nothing; but as they continued pressing her, she told them what it was.

“Don't worry,” they said, “we'll bring him to you,” and they went and had a talk with the man. At first he refused, but by their much asking he at last consented. They got his promise to come at a certain hour on a fixed day, and told the woman.

She prepared her chamber, and dressed herself in her finery, and sat on the bed waiting until he came. He sat down beside her. Then a thought came into her mind. {2.338} “If I accept his advances at once, and make myself cheap, my pride will be humbled. To let him have his will the very first day he comes would be out of place. I will be capricious today, and afterwards I will give way.” So no sooner had he touched her, and begun to dally, she caught his hands, and spoke roughly to him, bidding him go away, as she did not want him. He shrank back angrily, and went off home.

When the women found out what she had done, and that the man had gone off, they reproached her. “Here you are,” they said, “in love with somebody, and lie down refusing to take nourishment; we had great difficulty in persuading the man, but at last we bring him; and then you have nothing to say to him!” She told them why it was, and they went off; warning her that she would get talked about.

The man never even came to look at her again. When she found she had lost him, she would take no nourishment, and soon died. When the man heard of her death, he took a quantity of flowers, scents, and perfumes, and went to Jetavana, where he saluted the Teacher and sat on one side.

The Teacher asked him, “How is it, lay brother, that we never see you here?” He told him the whole story, adding that he had avoided waiting on the Buddha all this time for shame. Said the Teacher, “Layman, on this occasion the woman sent for you through her passion, and then would have nothing to do with you and sent you away angry; and just so in olden days, she fell in love with wise persons, sent for them, and when they came refused to have anything to do with them, and thus plagued them and sent them back again.” Then at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Sindh horse, and they called him Vātagga [Great Wind]; and he was the king’s horse of ceremony. The grooms used to take him to bathe in the Ganges. There a certain female ass saw him, and fell in love. [2.234]

Trembling with passion, {2.339} she neither ate grass nor drank water; but pined away and became thin, until she was nothing but skin and bone. Then a foal of hers, seeing her pining away, said: “Why do you eat no grass, mother, and drink no water; and why do you pine away, and lie trembling in this place or that? What is the matter?” She would not say; but after he had asked again and again, she told him the matter.

Then her foal comforted her, saying: “Mother, do not be troubled; I will bring him to you.”

So when Vātagga went down to bathe, the foal said, approaching him, “Sir, my mother is in love with you: she takes no food, and she is pining away to death. Give her life!”

“Good, my lad, I will,” said the horse. “When my bath is over, the grooms let me go awhile to exercise on the river bank. Do you bring your mother to that place.”

So the foal fetched his mother, and turned her loose in the place; then he hid himself nearby.

The groom let Vātagga go for a run; he spied the female ass, and came up to her.

Now when the horse came up and began to sniff at her, thought the ass to herself, “If I make myself cheap, and let him have his way as soon as he has come here, my honour and pride will perish. I must make as though I did not wish it.” So she gave him a kick on the lower jaw, and scampered away. It broke his jaw, and half killed him. “What does she matter to me?” thought Vātagga; he felt ashamed and made off.

Then the ass repented, and lay down on the spot in grief. And her son the foal came up, and asked her a question in the following lines:

1. “He for whose sake you thin and yellow grew,
   And would not eat a bite,
   That dear beloved one is come to you;
   Why do you take to flight?”

Hearing her son’s voice, the ass repeated the second verse:

2. “If at the very first, when by her side
   He stands, without delay
   A woman yields, all humbled is her pride:
   Therefore I ran away.”

In these words she explained the feminine nature to her son. [2.235]

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, repeated the third verse:

3. “If she refuse a suitor nobly born
   Who by her side would stay,
   As Kundalī mourned Vātagga, she'll mourn
   For many a long day.”

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, this landowner entered on the Fruit of the First Path, “This woman was the female ass, and I was Vātagga.”

Ja 267 Kakkaṭajātaka

The Story about (the Immense) Crab (3s)

In the present a landowner goes into the country and is attacked by thieves, but his wife manages to secure his release. The Buddha tells a story of an immense crab who used to kill elephants, and how, when an elephant was once caught by the crab, his mate flattered the crab, and secured her husband's release, which led to the crab's destruction.

---

The Bodhisatta = the elephant (vāraṇa), the laywoman = his elephant wife (kareṇukā).

Keywords: Faithfulness, Animals.

“Gold-clawed creature.” [2.341] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a certain woman.

We are told that a certain landowner of Sāvatthi, with his wife, was on a journey into the country for the purpose of collecting debts, when he fell among robbers. Now the wife was very beautiful and charming. The robber chief was so taken by her that he purposed killing the husband to get her. But the woman was good and virtuous, a devoted wife. She fell at the robber's feet, crying, “My lord, if you kill my husband for love of me, I will take poison, or stop my breath, and kill myself too! With you I will not go. Do not kill my husband uselessly!” In this way she begged him off.

They both got back safe to Sāvatthi. Then it occurred to them as they passed the monastery in Jetavana, that they would visit it and salute the Teacher. So to the perfumed cell they went, and after salutation sat down on one side. The Teacher asked them where they had been. “To collect our debts,” they replied. “Did your journey pass off without mishap?” he asked next. “We were captured by robbers on the way,” said the husband, “and the chief wanted to murder me; but my wife here begged for me, and I owe my life to her.” Then said the Teacher, “You are not the only one, layman, whose life she has saved. In days of yore she saved the lives of other wise men.” And then at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there was a great lake in the Himālayas, wherein was a great golden crab. Because he lived there, the place was known as the crab lake. The crab was very large, as big round as a threshing floor; it would catch elephants, and kill [2.236] and eat them; and from fear of it [2.342] the elephants did not go down and browse there.

Now the Bodhisatta was conceived by the mate of an elephant, the leader of a herd, living nearby this crab lake. The mother, in order to be safe till her delivery, sought another place on a mountain, and there she was delivered of a son; who in due time grew to years of wisdom, and was great and mighty, and prospered, and he was like a purple mountain of collyrium.

He chose another elephant for his mate, and he resolved to catch this crab. So with his mate and his mother, he sought out the elephant herd, and finding his father, proposed to go and catch the crab.

“You will not be able to do that, my son,” said he.

But he begged the father again and again to give him leave, until at last he said: “Well, you may try.”

So the young elephant collected all the elephants beside the crab lake, and led them close by the lake. “Does the crab catch them when they go down, or while they are feeding, or when they come up again?”

They replied, “When the beasts come up again.” “Well then,” said he, “do you all go down to the lake and eat whatever you see, and come up first; I will follow last behind you.” And so they did.

Then the crab, seeing the Bodhisatta coming up last, caught his feet tight in his claw, like a smith who seizes a lump of iron in a huge pair of tongs. The Bodhisatta’s mate did not leave him, but stood there close by him. The Bodhisatta pulled at the crab, but could not make him budge. Then the crab pulled, and drew him towards himself. At this in deadly fear the elephant roared and roared; hearing which all the other elephants, in deadly terror, ran off trumpeting, and dropping excrement. Even his mate could not stand, but began to make off. Then to tell her how he was held a prisoner, he uttered the first verse, hoping to stay her from her flight:
1. “Gold-clawed\textsuperscript{563} creature with projecting eyes,
Lake-bred, hairless, clad in bony shell,
He has caught me! Hear my woful cries!
Mate! Don’t leave me – for you love me well!”

Then his mate turned round, and repeated the second verse to his comfort:

2. “Leave you? Never! Never will I go –
Noble husband, with your years threescore.
All four quarters of the earth can show
None so dear as you have been of yore.” [2.237]

In this way she encouraged him; and saying: “Noble sir, now I will talk to the crab a while to make him let you go,” she addressed the crab in the third verse: [2.344]

3. “Of all the crabs that in the sea,
Ganges, or Nerbudda be,
You are best and chief, I know:
Hear me – let my husband go!”

As she spoke thus, the crab’s fancy was smitten with the sound of the female voice, and forgetting all fear he loosed his claws from the elephant’s leg, and suspected nothing of what he would do when he was set free. Then the elephant lifted his foot, and stepped upon the crab’s back; and at once his eyes startled out. The elephant shouted the joy-cry. Up ran the other elephants all, pulled the crab along and set him upon the ground, and trampled him to mincemeat. His two claws broken from his body lay apart. And this crab lake, being near the Ganges, when there was a flood in the Ganges, was filled with Ganges water; when the water subsided it ran from the lake into the Ganges. Then these two claws were lifted and floated along the Ganges. One of them reached the sea, the other was found by the ten royal brothers while playing in the water, and they took it and made of it the little drum called Ānaka. The Asuras found that which reached the sea, and made it into the drum called Āḷambara. These afterwards being worsted in battle \textsuperscript{563} Siṅgī means either ‘horned’ or ‘gold,’ and the commentator gives both interpretations.

As the word suggested both to the writer, I use a word which expresses both in English.
with Sakka, ran off and left it behind. Then Sakka caused it to be kept for his own use; and it is of this they say, “There is thunder like the Āḷambara cloud!”

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths both husband and wife attained the Fruit of the First Path. {2.345} “In those days, this lay sister was the female elephant, and I myself was her mate.”

Ja 268 Ārāmadūsajātaka

The Story about Spoiling the Park (3s)

Alternative Title: Ārāmadūsakajātaka (Cst)

In the present while on walking tour the monks come to a certain village and notice that there is an area of barren land. Upon enquiry it turns out a village lad had dug up the trees to water the roots by size. The Buddha tells a story of a monkey in the past who ordered his troop to do the same, thereby ruining the king’s gardens.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (paṇḍitapurisa), the boy who ruined the park = the elder monkey (vānarajeṭṭhaka).

Past Compare: Ja 46 Ārāmadūsaka, Ja 268 Ārāmadūsa.

Keywords: Foolishness, Inconsideration, Animals.

“Best of all.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in the country near Dakkhiṇāgiri, about a gardener’s son.

After the rains, the Teacher left Jetavana, and went on alms pilgrimage in the [2.238] district about Dakkhiṇāgiri. A layman invited the Buddha and his company, and made them sit down in his grounds while he gave them rice and cakes. Then he said: “If any of the masters care to see over the grounds, they might go along with the gardener,” and he ordered the gardener to supply them with any fruit they might fancy.

______________________________

564 This is the same story as No. 46 (vol. i. of the translation, p. 118); it is briefer, and the verses are not the same. See Folk-Lore Journal, iii. 251; Cunningham, Bharhut, v.v. 5.
By and by they came upon a bare spot. “What is the reason,” they asked, “that this spot is bare and treeless?” “The reason is,” answered the gardener, “that a certain gardener’s son, who had to water the saplings, thought he had better give them water in proportion to the length of the roots; so he pulled them all up to see, and watered them accordingly. The result was that the place became bare.”

The monks returned, and told this to their Teacher. Said he, “Not only now has the lad destroyed a plantation; he did just the same before,” and then he told them a story.

In the past, when a king named Vissasena was reigning over Benares, proclamation was made of a holiday. The park keeper thought he would go and keep holiday; so calling the monkeys that lived in the park, he said:

“This park is a great blessing to you. I want to take a week’s holiday. Will you water the saplings on the seventh day?” “Oh, yes,” said they; he gave them the watering-skins, and went his way.

The monkeys drew water, and began to water the roots.

The eldest monkey cried out, “Wait, now! It’s hard to get water always. We must be careful about it. Let us pull up the plants, and see the length of their roots; if they have long roots, they need plenty of water; but short ones need but a little.” “True, true,” they agreed; then some of them pulled up the plants; then others put them in again, and watered them.

The Bodhisatta at the time was a young gentleman living in Benares. Something or other took him to this park, and he saw what the monkeys were doing.

“If that is the wisdom of the chief, what must the rest of you be like!” said he; and to explain the matter, he uttered the first verse:

1. “Best of all the troop is this:
   What intelligence is his!
   If he was chosen as the best,
   What sort of creatures are the rest!”

Hearing this remark, the monkeys rejoined with the second verse:
2. “Brahmin, you know not what you say
   Blaming us in such a way!
   If the root we do not know,
   How can we tell the trees that grow?” [2.239]

To which the Bodhisatta replied by the third, as follows:

3. “Monkeys, I have no blame for you,
   Nor those who range the woodland through.
   The monarch is a fool, to say
   ‘Please tend my trees while I’m away.’” [2.347]

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The lad who destroyed the park was the monkey chief, and I was the wise man.”

Ja 269 Sujātajātaka

The Story about (Visākhā’s Sister) Sujātā (3s)

In the present one woman is the bane of all around her, speaking harshly to all, high and low. The Buddha explains the seven different types of wives, and asks which she is, thereby getting her to reflect and change her character. He then tells a story of how a king instructed his mother by showing how all love a sweet voice, like a cuckoo’s, and none love a harsh one, like a jay’s.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Sujātā = his mother (Bārāṇasirāpañño mātā).

Keywords: Harsh speech, Kindly speech, Women.

“Those who are dowered.” This story the Teacher told while living in Jetavana about one Sujātā, a daughter-in-law of Anāthapiṇḍika, daughter of the great merchant Dhanañjaya, and youngest sister of Visākhā.

We are told that she entered the house of Anāthapiṇḍika full of haughtiness, thinking how great a family she had come from, and she was obstinate, violent, passionate, and cruel; refused to do her part towards her new father and mother, or her husband; and went about the house with harsh words and hard blows for everyone.
The Section with Three Verses – 979

One day, the Teacher and five hundred monks visited Anāthapiṇḍika’s house, and took their seats. The great merchant sat beside the Fortunate One, hearkening to his discourse. At the same time Sujātā happened to be scolding the servants.

The Teacher ceased speaking, and asked what that noise was. The merchant explained that it was his rude daughter-in-law; that she did not behave properly towards her husband or his parents, she gave no alms, and had no good points; faithless and unbelieving, she went about the house scolding day and night. The Teacher bade send for her.

The woman came, and after saluting the Teacher, she stood on one side. Then the Teacher addressed her thus:

“Sujātā, there are seven kinds of wife a man may have; of which sort are you?”
She replied, “Sir, you speak too shortly for me to understand; please explain.”
“Well,” said the Teacher, “listen attentively,” and he uttered the following verses:

“One is bad-hearted, nor compassionsates
The good; loves others, but her lord she hates.
Destroying all that her lord’s wealth obtains,\footnote{It is not clear whether \textit{vadhena kitassa} is ‘the thing bought by his wealth,’ or the ‘person’; probably both.} \[2.240\]
This wife the title of Destroyer gains.

Whate’er the husband gets for her by trade,
Or skilled profession, or the farmer’s spade, \[2.348\]
She tries to filch a little out of it.
For such a wife the title Thief is fit.

Careless of duty, lazy, passionate,
Greedy, foul-mouthed, and full of wrath and hate,
Tyrannical to all her underlings –
All this the title High and Mighty brings.

Who evermore compassionsates the good,
Cares for her husband as a mother would,
Guards all the wealth her husband may obtain –
This wife the title Motherly will gain.
She who respects her husband in the way
Young sisters reverence to elders pay,
Modest, obedient to her husband’s will,
The Sisterly is this wife’s title still.

She whom her husband’s sight will always please
As friend that friend after long absence sees,
High-bred and virtuous, giving up her life
To him – this one is called the Friendly wife.

Calm when abused, afraid of violence,
No passion, full of dogged patience,
True-hearted, bending to her husband’s will,
Slave is the title given to her still.” {2.349}

“These, Sujātā, are the seven wives a man may have. Three of these, the Destructive wife, the Dishonest wife, and Madam High and Mighty are reborn in hell; the other four in the Fifth Heaven.

“They who are called Destroyer in this life,
The High and Mighty, or the Thievish wife,
Being angry, wicked, disrespectful, go
Out of the body into hell below.

They who are called the Friendly in this life,
Motherly, Sisterly, or Slavish wife,
By virtue and their long self-mastery
Pass into heaven when their bodies die.”

While the Teacher was explaining these seven kinds of wives, Sujātā attained to the Fruit of the First Path; and when the Teacher asked to which class she belonged, she answered, “I am a slave, sir!” and respectfully saluting the Tathāgata, gained pardon of him.

Thus by one admonition the Teacher tamed the shrew; and after the meal, when he had declared their duties amidst the Saṅgha, he entered his scented chamber.

Now the monks gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, and sang the Teacher’s praises. “Friend, by a single admonition the Teacher has tamed a shrew, and raised her to Fruition of the First Path!” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were talking of as they sat together. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time that I have tamed Sujātā by a single admonition.” And he proceeded to tell a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta reigned over Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his queen consort. When he grew up [2.241] he received his education at Taxila, and after the death of his father, became king and ruled in righteousness.

His mother was a passionate woman, cruel, harsh, shrewish, ill-tongued. The son wished to admonish his mother; but he felt he must not do anything so disrespectful; so he kept on the look-out for a chance of dropping a hint.

One day he went down into the grounds, and his mother went with him. {2.350} A blue jay screeched on the road. At this all the courtiers stopped their ears, crying: “What a harsh voice, what a shriek! Don’t make that noise!”

While the Bodhisatta was walking through the park with his mother, and a company of players, a cuckoo, perched amid the thick leaves of a Sāl566 tree, sang with a sweet note. All the bystanders were delighted at her voice; clasping their hands, and stretching them out, they besought her, “Oh, what a soft voice, what a kind voice, what a gentle voice! Sing away, birdie, sing away!” and there they stood, stretching their necks, eagerly listening.

The Bodhisatta, noting these two things, thought that here was a chance to drop a hint to the queen-mother. “Mother,” said he, “when they heard the jay’s cry on the road, everybody stopped their ears, and called out: ‘Don’t make that noise! Don’t make that noise!’ And stopped up their ears: for harsh sounds are liked by nobody.” And he repeated the following verses:

1. “Those who are dowered with a lovely hue,
   Though ne’er so fair and beautiful to view,
   Yet if they have a voice all harsh to hear
   Neither in this world nor the next are dear.

566 Shorea Robusta.
2. There is a bird that you may often see;
Ill-favoured, black, and speckled though it be,
Yet its soft voice is pleasant to the ear:
How many creatures hold the cuckoo dear!

3. Therefore your voice should gentle be and sweet,
Wise-speaking, not puffed up with self-conceit.
And such a voice – how sweet the sound of it!
Explains the meaning of the holy writ.”

When the Bodhisatta had thus admonished his mother with these three verses, he won her over to his way of thinking; and ever afterwards she followed a right course of living. And he having by one word made his mother a self-denying woman afterwards passed away to fare according to his deeds. [2.242] [2.351]

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he thus identified the Jātaka, “Sujātā was the mother of the king of Benares, and I was the king himself.”

Ja 270 Ulūkajātaka

The Story about (the Sour-Looking) Owl (3s)

In the present the crows attack the owls by day, and the owls attack the crows by night. The Buddha tells a story of how their enmity came about in the first age of the world when an owl was chosen for king, and a crow objected.
The Bodhisatta = the goose consecrated over the kingdom (rajje abhisittahaṁsapoto).

Keywords: Enmity, Fighting, Animals, Birds.

“The owl is king.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about a quarrel between crows and owls.

At the period in question, the crows used to eat owls during the day, and at night, the owls flew about, nipping off the heads of the crows as they slept, and thus killing them. There was a certain monk who lived in a cell on the outskirts of Jetavana. When the time came for sweeping, there used to be a quantity of crows’ heads to throw away, which had dropped from the tree, enough to fill seven or eight pots. He told this to the monks.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks began to talk about it. “Friend, monk So-and-so finds ever so many crows’ heads to throw away every day in the place where he lives!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about as they sat together. They told him. They went on to ask how long it was since the crows and owls fell quarrelling. The Teacher replied, “Since the time of the first age of the world,” and then he told them a story.

In the past, the people who lived in the first cycle of the world gathered together, and took for their king a certain man, handsome, auspicious, commanding, altogether perfect. The quadrupeds also gathered, and chose for king the lion; and the fish in the ocean chose them a fish called Ānanda.

Then all the birds in the Hiṁālayas assembled upon a flat rock, crying, “Among men there is a king, and among the beasts, and the fish have one too; but amongst us birds king there is none. We should not live in anarchy; we too should choose a king. Fix on someone fit to be set in the king’s place!”

They searched about for such a bird, and chose the owl, “Here is the bird we like,” said they. And a bird made proclamation three times to all that there would be a vote taken on this matter.

After patiently hearing this announcement twice, on the third time up rose a crow, and cried out, “Stay now! If that is what he looks like when he is being consecrated king, what will he look like when he is angry? If he only looks at us in anger, we shall be scattered like sesame seeds thrown on a hot [2.243] plate. I don’t want to make this fellow king!” and enlarging upon this he uttered the first verse: {2.353}

1. “The owl is king, you say, o’er all bird-kind:
With your permission, may I speak my mind?”

The birds repeated the second, granting him leave to speak:

2. “You have our leave, sir, so it be good and right:
For other birds are young, and wise, and bright.”

Thus permitted, he repeated the third:

3. “I like not (with all deference be it said)
To have the owl anointed as our head.
Look at his face! If this good humour be,
What will he do when he looks angrily?”

Then he flew up into the air, cawing out, “I don’t like it! I don’t like it!” The owl rose and pursued him. Thenceforward those two nursed enmity one towards another. And the birds chose a golden goose for their king, and dispersed. {2.354}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time, the wild goose chosen for king was I myself.”

Ja 271 Udapānadūsakajātaka
The Story about Spoiling the Well (3s)

In the present one jackal fouls the well he drinks from, and is driven off by the novices. The Buddha tells a story of how a similar event happened in a previous life and how he had admonished the jackal who avowed that his ancestors did ever behave this way.

The Bodhisatta = the leader of a group (gaṇasatthā), the jackal = the one who fouled a well (udapānadūsaka).

Keywords: Civility, Custom, Animals.

“This well a forest-ascetic.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Isipatana, about a jackal that fouled a well.

We learn that a jackal used to foul a well where the monks used to draw water, and then used to make off. One day the novices pelted him with clods of earth, and made it uncomfortable for him. After that he never came to look at the place again.

The monks heard of this and began to discuss it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, the jackal that used to foul our well has never come near it since the novices chased him away with clods!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about now as they sat together. They told him. Then he replied, “Monks, this is not the first time that this jackal fouled a well. He did the same before,” and then he told a story of the past. [2.244]

In the past, in this place near Benares called Isipatana was that very well. At that time the Bodhisatta was born of a good family. When he grew up he embraced the ascetic life, and with a body of followers dwelt at Isipatana. A certain jackal fouled the well as has been described, and took to his heels. One day, the ascetics surrounded him, and having caught him somehow, they led him before the Bodhisatta. He addressed the jackal in the lines of the first verse:

1. “This well a forest-ascetic has made
   Who long has lived an ascetic in the glade.
   And after all his trouble and his toil
   Why did you try, my friend, the well to spoil?” [2.355]

On hearing this, the jackal repeated the second verse:

2. “This is the Dhamma of the jackal race,
   To foul when they have drunk in any place:
   My sires and grandfathers always did the same;
   So there is no just reason for your blame.”

Then the Bodhisatta replied with the third:

3. “If this is ‘law’ in jackal polity
   I wonder what their ‘lawlessness’ can be!
   I hope that I have seen the last of you,
   Your actions, lawful and unlawful too.”

Thus the Great Being admonished him, and said: “Do not go there again.” Thenceforward he did not even pause to look at it.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “The jackal that fouled the well is the same in both cases; and I was the chief of the ascetic band.”

Ja 272 Vyagghajātaka
The Story about the Tiger (3s)

Alternative Title: Byagghajātaka (Cst)

In the present Kokālika wants to bring the two chief disciples to his home town, but they refuse to go. The Buddha tells a story of a Tree Devatā who drove away a tiger and a lion because of the carnage they brought into the forest. But once gone, men entered and cut down all the trees for cultivation.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Devatā (Paṇḍitadevatā),
Moggallāna = the tiger (vyaggha),
Sāriputta = the lion (sīha),
Kokālika = the foolish Devatā (apaṇḍitā Devatā).

Present Source: Ja 481 Takkāriya,
Quoted at: Ja 117 Tittira, Ja 215 Kacchapa, Ja 272 Vyaggha, Ja 331 Kokālika.

Keywords: Greed, Devas, Animals.

“What time the nearness.” [2.356] This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about Kokālika. The circumstances of this story will be given in the Thirteenth Book, and the Takkāriyajātaka [Ja 481].

During one rainy season the two chief disciples, desiring to leave the multitude and to dwell apart, took leave of the Teacher, and went into the kingdom where Kokālika was. They repaired to the residence of Kokālika, and said this to him, “Monk Kokālika, since for us it is delightful to dwell with you, and for you to dwell with us, we would abide here three months.” “How,” said the other, “will it be delightful for you to dwell with me?” They answered, “If you tell not a soul that the two chief disciples are dwelling here, we shall be happy, and that will be our delight in dwelling with you.” “And how is it delightful for me to dwell with you?” “We will teach the Dhamma to you for three months in your home, and we will discourse to you, and that will be your delight in dwelling with us.” “Dwell here, monks,” said he, “so long as you will,” and he allotted a pleasant residence to them. There they dwelt in the fruition of the Attainments, and no man knew of their dwelling in that place.

---

568 Kokālika was a follower of Devadatta.

When they had thus past the rains they said to him, “Monk, now we have dwelt with you, and we will go to visit the Teacher,” and asked his leave to go. He agreed, and went with them on the rounds for alms in a village over against the place where they were. After their meal the elders departed from the village. Kokālika leaving them, turned back and said to the people, “Lay brethren, you are like brute animals. Here the two chief disciples have been dwelling for three months in the monastery opposite, and you knew nothing of it: now they are gone.” “Why did you not tell us, sir?” the people asked.

Then they took ghee and oil and medicines, raiment and clothes, and approached the elders, saluting them and saying: “Pardon us, sirs we knew not you were the chief disciples, we have learned it but today by the words of the venerable monk Kokālika. Pray have compassion on us, and receive these medicines and clothes.” Kokālika went after the elders with them, for he thought: “The elders are frugal, and content with little; they will not accept these things, and then they will be given to me.” But the elders, because the gift was offered at the instigation of a monk, neither accepted the things themselves nor had them given to Kokālika. The lay folk then said: “Sirs, if you will not accept these, come here once again to bless us.” The elders promised, and proceeded to the Teacher’s presence.

Now Kokālika was angry, because the elders neither accepted those things themselves, nor had them given to him. The elders, however, having remained a short while with the Teacher, each chose five hundred monks as their following, and with these thousand monks went on pilgrimage seeking alms, as far as Kokālika’s country. The lay folk came out to meet them, and led them to the same monastery, and showed them great honour day by day.

Great was the store given them of clothes and of medicines. Those monks who went out with the elders dividing the garments gave of them to all the monks which had come, but to Kokālika gave none, neither did the elders give him any. Getting no clothes Kokālika began to abuse and revile the elders, “Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire; they would not accept before what was offered them, but these things they do accept. There is no satisfying them, they have no regard for another.” But the elders, perceiving that the man was harbouring evil on their account, set out with their followers to depart; nor would they return, not though the people begged them to stay yet a few days longer.

Then a young monk said: “Where shall the elders stay, laymen? Your own particular elder does not wish them to stay here.” Then the people went to Kokālika, and said: “Sir, we are told you do not wish the elders to stay here. Go to! Either appease them and bring them back, or away with you and live elsewhere!”

Here again Kokālika said: “I will bring Sāriputta and Moggallāna back with me.” So having left Kokālika’s country, he travelled to Jetavana, greeted the Teacher, and went on to the elders. He said: “Friends, the citizens of Kokālika’s country summon you. Let us go there!” “Go yourself, friend, we won’t,” was the answer. After this refusal he went away by himself.

The monks got talking about this in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend! Kokālika can’t live either with Sāriputta and Moggallāna, or without them! He can’t put up with their room or their company!” The Teacher came in, and enquired what they were all talking about together. They told him. He said: “In olden days, just as now, Kokālika couldn’t live with Sāriputta and Moggallāna, or without them.” And he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā living in a wood. Not far from his abode lived another Tree Devatā, in a great monarch of the forest. In the same forest dwelt a lion and a tiger. For fear of them no one did till the earth, or cut down a tree, no one could even pause to look at it, and the lion and tiger used to kill and eat all manner of creatures; and what remained after eating, they left on the spot and departed, so that the forest was full of foul decaying stench.

The other spirit, being foolish and knowing neither reason nor unreason, one day bespoke thus the Bodhisatta, “Good friend, the forest is full of foul stench all because of this lion and this tiger. I will drive them away.”
Said he, “Good friend, it is just these two creatures [2.357] that protect our homes. Once they are driven off, our homes will be made desolate. If men see not the lion and the tiger tracks, they will cut all the forest down, make it all one open space, and till the land. Please do not do this thing!” and then he uttered the first two verses:

1. “What time the nearness of a bosom friend
   Threatens your peace to end,
   If you are wise, guard your supremacy
   Like the apple of your eye.

2. But when your bosom friend does more increase
   The measure of your peace,
   Let your friend’s life in everything right through
   Be dear as yours to you.”

When the Bodhisatta had thus explained the matter, the foolish Devatā notwithstanding did not lay it to heart, but one day assumed an awful shape, and drove away the lion and tiger. The people, no longer seeing their footmarks, divined that the lion and tiger must have gone to another wood, and cut down one side of this wood.

Then the Devatā came up to the Bodhisatta [2.358] and said to him, “Ah, friend, I did not do as you said, but drove the creatures away; and now men have found out that they are gone, and they are cutting down the wood! What is to be done?” The reply was, that they were [2.246] gone to live in such and such a wood; the Devatā must go and fetch them back. This the Devatā did; and, standing in front of them, repeated the third verse, with a respectful salute:

3. “Come back, O tigers! To the wood again,
   And let it not be levelled with the plain;
   For, without you, the axe will lay it low;
   You, without it, for ever homeless go.”

This request they refused, saying: “Go away! We will not come.” The Devatā returned to the forest alone. And the men after a very few days cut down all the wood, made fields, and brought them under cultivation.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “Kokālika was then the foolish Devatā, Sāriputta the lion, Moggallāna the tiger, and the wise Devatā was I myself.”

Ja 273 Kacchapajātaka
The Story about (the Biting) Turtle (3s)

In the present two persons of high rank are always arguing with each other, and not even the king can prevent them. The Buddha tells a story of how a monkey attacked a turtle and was bitten in return, and how the Bodhisatta persuaded the turtle to let the monkey go.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the two soldiers = the turtle and the monkey (kacchapavānarā).

Present Source: Ja 154 Uraga,
Quoted at: Ja 165 Nakula, Ja 273 Kacchapa.

Keywords: Quarrels, Determination.

The following translation is by Ānandajoti Bhikkhu.

What is that pile of food. {2.359} The Teacher taught this, while living at Jeta’s Wood, concerning the settling of a quarrel between two ministers of the king of Kosala. The Story of the Present has been told in the Section with Two Verses.\(^{569}\)

It seems the king of Kosala had two ministers, who were attendants and leaders of a guild, who, whenever one saw the other, quarrelled. They naturally became enemies in the whole city. Neither the king, nor relatives, were able to reconcile them.

\(^{569}\) Specifically in Ja 154 Uragajātaka, which I include here.
Then one day in the morning the Teacher, while looking round to see who was capable of being released from bondage, saw these two had the supporting conditions for the Path of Stream-Entry.

And on another day he entered Sāvatthī alone for alms, and stood at the door of one of their houses. After coming out, taking the bowl, leading the Teacher inside the residence, he had him sit down on the prepared seat.

While sitting there the Teacher taught about the advantages of developing loving-kindness, and when he knew his mind was ready, he explained the truths, and at the end of the truths he was established in the Fruit of Stream-Entry.

The Teacher, knowing he had the state of Stream-Entry, after making him take the bowl, rose and went to the door of the other's house.

After he had come out, he paid respects to the Teacher, saying: “Enter, venerable sir,” and after entering he made him sit down. The other minister also took the bowl, and entered together with the Teacher. The Teacher praised the eleven advantages of loving-kindness, and when he knew his mind was ready, he explained the truths, and at the end of the truths he was also established in the Fruit of Stream-Entry.

These two both having Stream-Entry, confessed their offences to each other, and after asking forgiveness, and being reconciled and on good terms, their intentions were one and the same.

That very day face to face with the Fortunate One they ate together.
The Teacher, after he had finished the meal duties, returned to the monastery.

Carrying a lot of garlands, incense, creams, and ghee, honey and molasses, they entered together with the Teacher.

The Teacher, having explained the duties to the monastic Saṅgha, and given advice, entered into the Perfumed Hut.

The next morning, amongst the monastics in the Dhamma Hall, this talk about the Teacher’s virtues arose: “Friends, the Teacher tames the untamed, these two ministers were striving for a long time, but neither was the king able to bring about reconciliation, and nor were their relatives, friends and so on able, but in just one day the Realised One tamed them.”

After the Teacher came, he asked: “And what, monastics, are you discussing while sitting here?”

“Namely, this,” they said.

“Now, monastics, I have reconciled these two people, and before I also reconciled them,” and after saying that, he delivered a story about the past.

In the past, when King Brahmadatta was ruling in Benares, the Bodhisatta, after being reborn in a brahmin family in the Kāsi country, maturing, and learning all the crafts at Taxila, abandoned sensual pleasures, and went forth in the seer’s going forth. He built an ashram on the bank of the Gaṅges in the foothills of the Himālayas, and there, after the Super Knowledges and Attainments had arisen, he dwelt enjoying the joy of the Absorptions.
It seems in this Birth the Bodhisatta had supreme impartiality, and fulfilled the Perfection of Equanimity.

As he was sitting at the door to his leaf hut one cheeky, immoral, monkey came, and tried to insert his male organ into his ears.

The Bodhisatta, without resisting, being impartial, sat right there.

Then one day one turtle, after rising out of the water, after opening its mouth on the river bank, slept there warming himself in the sunshine.

Having seen that, the agitated monkey inserted his penis into his mouth.

After the turtle woke up, he bit his male organ like someone closing a casket, and strong pain arise.

Unable to bear the pain, the monkey said: “I will go into the presence of anyone who can free me from this suffering,” and he thought: “Another cannot free me from this suffering, none have the skill, except this ascetic. It is suitable for me to go into his presence.”

Holding the turtle with both hands, he went into the presence of the Bodhisatta.

The Bodhisatta joking with the immoral monkey spoke the first verse:

1. “What is that (2.360) pile of food, like a brahmin with a handful? Where did you go for alms? What funeral did you attend?”

Having heard that, the immoral monkey spoke the second verse:

2. “I am a foolish monkey, having touched the untouchable, If you release me, bless you, free, I will go to the mountain.”

Having compassion the Bodhisatta, conversing with the turtle, spoke the third verse:
3. “The Kassapas are turtles, and the Koṇḍaññas are monkeys, Kassapa, free up Koṇḍañña, from having intercourse with you.”

The turtle, having heard the Bodhisatta’s word, pleased with his reasoning, released the monkey’s male organ.

The monkey, the moment he was free, paid respects to the Bodhisatta and ran away without turning back to that place, nor did he even look back.

The turtle paid respects to the Bodhisatta and went to his own place.

The Bodhisatta, without falling away from his meditation, crossed over to the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher after delivering the Dhamma teaching, and revealing the truths, made the connection of the Jātaka: “At that time the two ministers were the turtle and the monkey, and I was the ascetic.”

Ja 274 Lolajātaka

The Story about the Greedy (Crow) (3s)

In the present one monk is very greedy. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who deceived his friend the pigeon in order to get access to a kitchen, which he stole from. But there the cook caught and plucked him and left him to die.

The Bodhisatta = the pigeon (pārāvata),
the greedy monk = the greedy crow (lolaṅka).

Past Compare: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 274 Lola, Ja 275 Rucira, Ja 375 Kapota.

Keywords: Greed, Deception, Animals, Birds.

The same story occurs in vol. i. p. 112 (no. 42). It has been also translated and slightly shortened by the writer, in Jacobs’ Indian Fairy Tales, page 222. The two birds and the nest-basket seem to be figured on the Bharhut Stūpa (Cunningham, pl. XLv. 7).
“Who is this tufted crane.” [2.248] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana about a greedy monk. He too was brought to the Dhamma Hall, when the Teacher said: “It is not only now that he is greedy; he was greedy before, and his greed lost him his life; and by his means wise men of old were driven out of house and home.” Then he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a rich merchant’s cook of that town hung up a nest-basket in the kitchen to win merit by it. The Bodhisatta at that time was a pigeon; and he came and lived in it.

Now a greedy crow as he flew over the kitchen was attracted by the fish which lay about in great variety. He fell hungering after it. “How in the world can I get some?” [2.362] thought he. Then his eye fell upon the Bodhisatta. “I have it!” thought he, “I'll make this creature do my work.” And this is how he carried out his resolve.

When the pigeon went out to seek his day's food, behind him, following, came the crow.

“What do you want with me, Mr. Crow?” said the pigeon. “You and I don’t feed alike.”

“Ah, but I like you,” says the crow. “Let me be your humble servant, and feed with you.”

The pigeon agreed. But when they went feeding together, the crow only pretended to eat with him; ever and anon he would turn back, peck to bits some lump of cow-dung, and get a worm or two. When he had had his bellyful, up he flew, “Hello, Mr. Pigeon! What a time you take over your meal! You never know where to draw the line. Come, let’s be going back before it is too late.” And so they did. When they got back together, the cook, seeing that their pigeon had brought a friend, hung up another basket.

In this way things went on for four or five days. Then a great purchase of fish came to the rich man’s kitchen. How the crow longed [2.249] for some! There he lay, from early morn, groaning and making a great noise.

In the morning, the pigeon said to the crow: “Come along, old fellow, breakfast!”

“You can go,” said he, “I have such a fit of indigestion!”
“A crow with indigestion? Nonsense!” said the pigeon. “Even a lamp-wick hardly stays any time in your stomach; and anything else you digest in a trice, as soon as you eat it. Now you do what I tell you. [2.363] Don’t behave in this way just for seeing a little fish!”

“Why, sir, what are you saying? I tell, you I have a bad pain inside!”

“All right, all right,” said the pigeon, “only do take care.” And away he flew.

The cook got all the dishes ready, and then stood at the kitchen door, mopping the sweat off him. “Now’s my time!” thinks Mr. Crow, and alights on a dish with some dainty food in it. Click! The cook heard the noise, and looked round. Ah! In a twinkling he caught the crow, and plucked off all his feathers, except one tuft on the top of his head; then he powdered ginger and cinnamon, and mixed it up with buttermilk, and rubbed it in well all over the bird’s body. “That’s for spoiling my master’s dinner, and making me throw it away!” said he, and threw him into his basket. Oh, how it hurt!

By and by, in came the pigeon from his hunt. The first thing he saw was our crow, making a great to-do. What fun he did make of him, to be sure! He broke into poetry, as follows:

1. “Who is this tufted crane I see
   Where she has no right to be?
   Come out! My friend the crow is near,
   Who will do you harm, I fear!” [2.364]

To this the crow answered with another verse:

571 The epithet “whose grandfather is the cloud (lit. swift one)” is added. I hope the reader will pardon its omission; it is unmanageable. The commentator explains it by the curious superstition:—Cranes are conceived at the sound of thunder. Hence thunder is called their father, and the thundercloud their grandfather.
2. “No tufted crane am I – no, no!
Nothing but a greedy crow.
I would not do as I was told
So I’m plucked, as you behold.”

And the pigeon rejoined with a third:

3. “You’ll come to grief again, I know
It is your nature to do so.
If people make a dish of meat,
’Tis not for little birds to eat.” [2.250]

Then the pigeon flew away, saying: “I can’t live with this creature.” And the crow lay there groaning until he died.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the greedy monk reached the Fruit of the Third Path. “The greedy monk in those days was the greedy crow; and I was the pigeon.”

Ja 275 Rucirajātaka

The Story about the Pretty (Crane) (3s)

In the present one monk is very greedy. The Buddha tells how this monk was also greedy in a previous life when, as a crow, he deceived his friend the pigeon in order to get access to a kitchen, which he stole from. But there the cook caught and plucked him and left him to die.

The Bodhisatta = the pigeon (pārāvata),
the greedy monk = the greedy crow (lola).

Past Compare: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 274 Lola, Ja 275 Rucira, Ja 375 Kapota.

Keywords: Greed, Deception, Animals, Birds.

“Who is this pretty crane.” [2.365] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about some greedy monk. The two stories are just the same as the last.

---

572 [Rucirajātaka had no title in the print edition. This title is taken from the text.]
This story the Teacher told in Jetavana about a greedy monk. He too was brought to the Dhamma Hall, when the Teacher said: “It is not only now that he is greedy; he was greedy before, and his greed lost him his life; and by his means wise men of old were driven out of house and home.” Then he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a rich merchant's cook of that town hung up a nest-basket in the kitchen to win merit by it. The Bodhisatta at that time was a pigeon; and he came and lived in it.

Now a greedy crow as he flew over the kitchen was attracted by the fish which lay about in great variety. He fell hungering after it. “How in the world can I get some?” thought he. Then his eye fell upon the Bodhisatta. “I have it!” thought he, “I'll make this creature do my work.” And this is how he carried out his resolve.

When the pigeon went out to seek his day's food, behind him, following, following, came the crow.

“What do you want with me, Mr. Crow?” said the pigeon. “You and I don't feed alike.”

“Oh, but I like you,” says the crow. “Let me be your humble servant, and feed with you.”

The pigeon agreed. But when they went feeding together, the crow only pretended to eat with him; ever and anon he would turn back, peck to bits some lump of cow-dung, and get a worm or two. When he had had his bellyful, up he flew, “Hello, Mr. Pigeon! What a time you take over your meal! You never know where to draw the line. Come, let’s be going back before it is too late.” And so they did. When they got back together, the cook, seeing that their pigeon had brought a friend, hung up another basket.

In this way things went on for four or five days. Then a great purchase of fish came to the rich man's kitchen. How the crow longed for some! There he lay, from early morn, groaning and making a great noise.

In the morning, the pigeon said to the crow: “Come along, old fellow, breakfast!”

“You can go,” said he, “I have such a fit of indigestion!”
“A crow with indigestion? Nonsense!” said the pigeon. “Even a lamp-wick hardly stays any time in your stomach; and anything else you digest in a trice, as soon as you eat it. Now you do what I tell you. Don’t behave in this way just for seeing a little fish!”

“Why, sir, what are you saying? I tell, you I have a bad pain inside!”

“All right, all right,” said the pigeon, “only do take care.” And away he flew.

The cook got all the dishes ready, and then stood at the kitchen door, mopping the sweat off him. “Now’s my time!” thinks Mr. Crow, and alights on a dish with some dainty food in it. Click! The cook heard the noise, and looked round. Ah! In a twinkling he caught the crow, and plucked off all his feathers, except one tuft on the top of his head; then he powdered ginger and cinnamon, and mixed it up with buttermilk, and rubbed it in well all over the bird’s body. “That’s for spoiling my master’s dinner, and making me throw it away!” said he, and threw him into his basket. Oh, how it hurt!

By and by, in came the pigeon from his hunt. The first thing he saw was our crow, making a great to-do. What fun he did make of him, to be sure!

And these are the verses:

1. “Who is this pretty crane, and why
   Does he in my crow’s basket lie?
   An angry bird, my friend the crow!
   This is his nest, I’d have you know!

2. Do you not know me, friend, indeed?
   Together we were used to feed!
   I would not do as I was told,
   So now I’m plucked, as you behold.

3. You’ll come to grief again, I know
   It is your nature to do so.
   When people make a dish of meat
   ’Tis not for little birds to eat.”

As before, the Bodhisattva said: “I can’t live here any more,” and flew away somewhere else.
When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the greedy monk attained the Fruit of the Third Path. “The greedy monk was the crow, and I was the pigeon.”

Ja 276 Kurudhammajātaka

The Story about the Righteousness of the Kurus (3s)

In the present one monk kills a goose with a slingshot. When the Buddha heard of this he told a story of how the people in the land of the Kurus used to keep the precepts, rain fell on time, and the people were prosperous. When afflictions fell on a neighbouring kingdom an embassy was sent to find out the secret of the Kurus’ success. The people in Kuru were so scrupulous they had doubts about their virtue over even the smallest of faults.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Kuru (Kururājā), Māyādevī = his mother (janettiyā),
Rāhulamātā = his queen (mahesī),
Nandapanḍita = the viceroy (uparājā),
Kassapa = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Anuruddha = the charioteer (sārathi),
Sāriputta = the wealthy man (seṭṭhi),
Moggallāna = the tax collector (doṇamāpaka),
Kaccāyana = the surveyor (rajjugāhaka),
Puṇṇa = the gatekeeper (dovārika),
Uppalavaṇṇā = the courtesan (gaṇikā).

Present Compare: Ja 107 Sālittaka, Ja 276 Kurudhamma, Dhp-a XXV.2
Haṁsaghātakabhikkhu,
Past Compare: Cp 3 Kurudhammacariyā.

Keywords: Virtue, Scrupulousness, Devas.

“Knowing your faith.” [2.251] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a monk that killed a wild goose. [2.366] Two monks, great friends, who came from Sāvatthi, and had embraced the ascetic life, after taking the higher orders used generally to go about together. One day they came to the river

---

573 cf. Cariyāpitaka, i. 3; Dhp p. 416. In this story the king appears as a rain-maker, and on certain occasions dresses like the gods.
Aciravatī. After a bath, they stood on the sand, basking in the sunlight and talking pleasantly together. At this moment two wild geese flew over their heads. One of the young fellows picked up a stone. “I’m going to hit that goose bird in the eye!” says he. “You can’t,” says the other. “That I can,” says the first, “and not only that – I can hit either this eye or that eye, as I please.” “Not you!” says the other. “Look here, then!” says the first; and picking up a three-cornered stone, threw it after the bird. The bird turned its head on hearing the pebble whizz through the air. Then the other, seizing a round pebble, threw it so that it hit the near eye and came out of the other. The goose with a loud cry turned over and over and fell at their very feet.

The monks who were standing about saw what had occurred, and ran up, reproaching him. “What a shame,” they said, “that you, who have embraced such a dispensation as ours, should take the life of a living creature!” They made him go before the Tathāgata with them. “Is what they say true?” asked the Teacher. “Have you really taken the life of a living creature?” “Yes, sir,” replied the monk. “Monk,” said he, “how is it that you have done this thing, after embracing so great a dispensation? Wise men of old, before the Buddha appeared, though they lived in the world, and the worldly life is impure, felt remorse about mere trifles; but you, who have embraced this great dispensation, have no scruples. A monk ought to hold himself in control in deed, word, and thought.” Then he told a story.

In the past, when Dhanañjaya was king of Indapatta City, in the Kuru kingdom, the Bodhisatta was born as a son of his queen consort. By and by he grew up, and was educated at Taxila. His father made him viceroy, and afterwards on his father’s death he became king, and grew in the Kuru righteousness, keeping the ten royal duties. The Kuru righteousness means the five precepts; these the Bodhisatta observed, and kept pure; as did the Bodhisatta, even so did queen-mother, queen-consort, younger brother, viceroy, family priest, brahmin, driver, courtier, charioteer, treasurer, master of the granaries, noble, porter, courtesan, slave girl – all did the same.574

574 [Additional note from Vol. IV:] I have to thank Fick (Soc. Glied. p. 87 note) for a correction of the list of righteous persons, which should run thus: “…younger brother
King, mother, consort, viceroy, family priest too,
Driver and charioteer and treasurer,
And he that governed the king’s granaries,
Porter, and courtesan, eleven in all,
Observed the rules of Kuru righteousness. [2.252]

Thus all these did observe the five precepts, and kept them untarnished. The king built six alms houses – one at each of the four city gates, one in the midst of the city, and one at his own door; daily he distributed 600,000 pieces of money in alms, by which he stirred up the whole of Jambudīpa. All Jambudīpa was overspread by his love and delight in generosity.

At this period there was in the city of Dantapura, in the kingdom of Kāliṅga, a king named Kāliṅga. In his realms the rain fell not, and because of the drought there was a famine in the land. The people thought that lack of food might produce a pestilence; and there was fear of drought, and fear of famine – these three fears were ever present before them. The people wandered about destitute here and there, leading their children by the hand. All the people in the kingdom gathered together, and came to Dantapura; and there at the king’s door they made outcry.

As the king stood, by the window, he heard the noise, and asked why the people were making all that noise. [2.368]

“Oh, sire,” was the reply, “three fears have seized upon all your kingdom: there falls no rain, the crops fail, there is a famine. The people, starving, diseased, and destitute, are wandering about with their little ones by the hand. Make rain for us, O king!”

Said the king, “What used former monarchs to do, if it would not rain?”

“Former monarchs, O king, if it would not rain, used to give alms, to keep the holy day, to make vows of virtue, and to lie down seven days in their chamber on a grass pallet: then the rain would fall.”

(who was) viceroy, brahmin family priest, courtier-charioteer, treasurer, noble master of the granaries, porter, slave-girl courtesan.”
“Very good,” the king said; and even so did he. Still even so there came no rain. The king said to his court,

“As you bade me, so I have done; but there is no rain. What am I to do?”

“O king, in the city of Indapatta, there is a state elephant, named Añjanavasabho [Black Bull]. It belongs to Dhanañjaya, the Kuru king. This let us fetch; then the rain will come.”

“But how can we do that? The king and his army are not easy to overcome.”

“O king, there is no need to fight him. The king is fond of giving, he loves giving: were he but asked, he would even cut off his head in all its magnificence, or tear out his gracious eyes, or give up his very kingdom. There will be no need even to plead for the elephant. He will give it without fail.”

“But who is able to ask him?” said the king.

“The brahmins, great king!”

The king summoned eight brahmins from a brahmin village, and with all honour and respect sent them to ask for the elephant. They took [2.253] money for their journey, and donned travelling garb, and without resting past one night in a place, travelled quickly until after a few days they took their meal at the alms-hall in the city gate. When they had satisfied their bodily wants, they asked, “When does the king come to the alms house?”

The answer was, {2.369} “On three days in the fortnight – fourteenth, fifteenth, and eighth; tomorrow is the full moon, so he will come tomorrow.”

So early the next morning, the brahmins went, and entered by the eastern gate. The Bodhisatta also, washed and anointed, all adorned and rarely arrayed, mounted upon a fine elephant richly caparisoned, came with a great company to the alms-hall at the eastern gate. There he dismounted, and gave food to seven or eight people with his own hand. “In this manner give,” said he, and mounting his elephant departed to the south gate. At the eastern gate the brahmins had had no chance, owing to the force of the royal guard; so they proceeded to the south, and watched when the king should come. When the king reached a rising ground not far from the gate, they raised their hands, and hailed the king victorious. The king guided his animal with the jewelled goad to the place where they were. “Well, brahmins, what is your wish?” asked he. Then the brahmins declared the virtues of the Bodhisattva in the first verse:

1. “Knowing your faith and virtue, Lord, we come; For this beast’s sake our wealth we spent at home.”

To this the Bodhisatta made answer, “Brahmins, if all your wealth has been exhausted in getting this elephant, never mind – I give him to you with all his splendour.” Thus comforting them, he repeated these two verses:

2. “Whether or no you serve for livery, Whatever creature shall come here to me, As my preceptors taught me long ago, All that come here shall always welcome be.

3. This elephant to you for gift I bring: ’Tis a king’s portion, worthy of a king! Take him, with all his trappings, golden chain, Driver and all, and go your ways again.”

Thus spake the Great Being, mounted upon his elephant’s back; then, dismounting, he said to them, “If there is a spot on him unadorned, I will adorn it and then give him to you.” Thrice he went about the creature, turning towards the right, and examined him; but he found no spot on him without adornment. Then he put the trunk into the brahmins’ hands; he besprinkled him with scented water from a fine golden vase, and made him over to them. The brahmins accepted the elephant with his belongings, and seating themselves upon his back rode to Dantapura, and handed him over to their king. But although the elephant was come, no rain fell yet.

Then the king asked again, “What can be the reason?”

They said: “Dhanañjaya, the Kuru king, observes the Kuru righteousness; therefore in his realms it rains every ten or fifteen days. That is the power of the king’s goodness. If in this animal there is any good, how little it must be!” Then \[575\] i.e. we spent all we had on food, trusting that you would give us the elephant when we asked for it.

said the king, “Take this elephant, caparisoned as he is, with all his belongings, and give it back to the king. Write upon a golden plate the Kuru righteousness which he observes, and bring it here.” With these words he dispatched the brahmins and courtiers.

These came before the king, and restored his elephant, saying: “My lord, even when your elephant came, no rain fell in our country. They say that you observe the Kuru righteousness. Our king is wishful himself to observe it; and he has sent us, bidding us write it upon a golden plate, and bring it to him. Tell us this righteousness!”

“Friends,” says the king, “indeed I did once observe this righteousness; but now I am in doubt about this very point. This righteousness does not bless my heart now: therefore I cannot give it you.”

Why, you may ask, did not virtue bless the king any longer? Well, every third year, in the month of Kattikā the kings used to hold a festival, called the Kattikā Festival. While keeping this feast, the kings used to deck themselves out in great magnificence, and dress up like gods; they stood in the presence of a Yakkha named Cittarāja [King of Many Colours], and they would shoot to the four points of the compass arrows wreathed in flowers, and painted in divers colours. This king then, in keeping the feast, stood on the bank of a lake, in the presence of Cittarāja, and shot arrows to the four quarters. They could see whither three of the arrows went; but the fourth, which was shot over the water, this they saw not. Thought the king, “Perchance the arrow which I have shot has fallen upon some fish!” As this doubt arose, the thought of life-taking made a flaw in his virtue; that is why his virtue did not bless him as before. This the king told them; and added, “Friends, I am in doubt about myself, whether or no I do observe the Kuru righteousness; but my mother keeps it well. You can get it from her.”

“But, O king,” they said, “you had no intent to take life. Without the intent of the heart there is no taking of life. Give us the Kuru righteousness which you have kept!” [2.255]

---

576 October-November.
“Write, then,” said he. And he caused them to write upon the plate of gold, ‘Slay not the living; take not what is not given; \(2.373\) walk not evily in lust; speak no lies; drink no strong drink.’ \(^{577}\) Then he added,

“Still, it does not bless me; you had better learn it from my mother.”

The messengers saluted the king, and visited the queen-mother. “Lady,” they said, “they say you keep the Kuru righteousness: pass it on to us!”

Said the queen-mother, “My sons, indeed I did once keep this righteousness, but now I have my doubts. This righteousness does not make me happy, so I cannot give it to you.” Now we are told that she had two sons, the elder being king, and the younger viceroy. A certain king sent to the Bodhisatta perfumes of fine sandalwood worth a hundred thousand pieces, and a golden neckband worth a hundred thousand. And he, thinking to do his mother honour, sent the whole to her. Thought she, “I do not perfume myself with sandalwood, I do not wear necklets. I will give them to my sons’ wives.” Then the thought occurred to her, “My elder son’s wife is my lady; she is the chief queen: to her will I give the gold necklet; but the wife of the younger is a poor creature – to her I will give the sandal perfume.” And so to the one she gave the necklet, and the perfume gave she to the other. Afterward she bethought her, “I keep the Kuru righteousness; whether they be poor or whether they be not poor is no matter. It is not seemly that I should pay court to the elder. Perchance by not doing this I have made a flaw in my virtue!” And she began to doubt; that is why she spoke as she did.

The messengers said: “When it is in your hands, a thing is given even as you will. If you have scruples about a thing so small as that, what other wrong would you ever do? Virtue is not broken by a thing of that kind. \(2.374\) Give us the Kuru righteousness!” And from her also they received it, and wrote it upon the golden plate.

“All the same, my sons,” said the queen-mother, “I am not happy in this righteousness. But my daughter-in-law observes it well. Ask her for it.”

\(^{577}\) [These of course are the five virtues (pañcasīla) every Buddhist is expected to observe.]
So they took their leave respectfully, and asked the daughter in the same way as before. And, as before, she replied, “I cannot, for I keep it myself no longer!” Now one day as she sat at the lattice window, looking down she saw the king making a solemn procession about the city; and behind him on the elephant’s back sat the viceroy. She fell in love with him, and thought: “What if I were to strike up a friendship with him, and his brother were to die, and then he were to become king, and take me to wife!” Then it flashed across her mind, “I who keep the Kuru righteousness, who am married to a husband, I have looked with love upon another man! Here is a flaw in my virtue!” Remorse seized upon her. This she told the messengers.

Then they said: “Wrong is not the mere uprising of a thought. If you feel remorse for so small a thing as this, what transgression could you ever commit? Not by such a small matter is virtue broken; give us this righteousness!” And she likewise told it to them, and they wrote it upon a golden plate. But she said: “However, my sons, my virtue is not perfect. But the viceroy observes these rules well; go you and receive them from him.”

Then again they repaired to the viceroy, and as before asked him for the Kuru righteousness. Now the viceroy used to go and pay his devotions to the king at evening; and when they came to the palace courtyard, in his carriage, if he wished to eat with the king, and spend the night there, he would throw his reins and goad upon the yoke; and that was a sign for the people to depart; and next morning early they would come again, and stand awaiting the viceroy’s departure. And the charioteer would attend the carriage, and come again with it early in the morning, and wait by the king’s door. But if the viceroy would depart at the same time, he left the reins and goad there in the chariot, and went in to wait upon the king. Then the people, taking it for a sign that he would presently depart, stood waiting there at the palace door. One day he did thus, and went in to wait upon the king. But as he was within, it began to rain; and the king, remarking this, would not let him go away, so he took his meal, and slept there. But a great crowd of people stood expecting him to come out, and there they stayed all night in the wet. Next day the viceroy came out, and seeing the crowd standing there drenched, thought he, “I, who keep the Kuru righteousness, have put all this crowd to discomfort! Surely here is a flaw in my virtue!” and he was seized with remorse. So he said to the messengers, “Now doubt has come upon me if indeed I do keep this righteousness; therefore I cannot give it to you,” and he told them the matter.
“But,” they said, “you never had the wish to plague those people. What is not intended is not counted to one’s score. If you feel remorse for so small a thing, in what would you ever transgress?” So they received from him too the knowledge of this righteousness, and wrote it on their golden plate. “However,” said he, “this righteousness is not perfected in me. But my family priest keeps it well; go, ask him for it.” Then again they went on to the family priest.

Now the family priest one day had been going to wait upon the king. On the road he saw a chariot; sent to the king by another king, coloured like the young sun. “Whose chariot is it?” he asked. “It is sent for the king,” they said. Then he thought: “I am an old man; if the king were to give me that chariot, how nice it would be to ride about in it!” When he [2.257] came before the king, and stood by after greeting him with the prayer for prosperity, [2.376] they showed the chariot to the king. “That is a most beautiful carriage,” said the king, “give it to my teacher.” But the family priest did not like taking it; no, not though he was begged again and again. Why was this? Because the thought came into his mind, “I, who practise the Kuru righteousness, have coveted another’s goods. Surely this is a flaw in my virtue!” So he told the story to these messengers, adding, “My sons, I am in doubt about the Kuru righteousness; this righteousness does not bless me now; therefore I cannot teach it to you.”

But the messengers said: “Not by mere uprisings of covetise is virtue broken. If you feel a scruple in so small a matter, what real transgression would you ever do?” And from him also they received the righteousness, and wrote it on their golden plate. “Still, this goodness does not bless me now,” said he, “but the royal driver carefully practises it. Go and ask him.” So they found the royal driver, and asked him.

---

578 Some difference there must be between rājju-gāhaha-امacco and sāratthi (the same words occur in Dhp. p. 416). I would suggest that the former is the more important, and may answer to the Greek παραιβάτης, Sanskrit savyēṣṭher. [Additional note from Vol. IV:] Fick explains the rājju-gāhaka-amacco as a kind of royal surveyor for tax purposes, which suits the context. The rājju will be his chain, symbol of office (Soc. Glied. 7 note).
Now the driver one day was measuring a field. Tying a cord to a stick, he gave one end to the owner of the field to hold, and took the other himself. The stick tied to the end of the cord which he held came to a crab’s lurk-hole. He thought: “If I put the stick in the hole, the crab in the hole will be hurt: if I put it on the other side, the king’s property will lose; and if I put it on this side, the farmer will lose. What’s to be done?” Then he thought again, “The crab ought to be in his hole; but if he were, he would show himself,” so he put the stick in the hole. The crab made a clicking sound inside. Then he thought: “The stick must have struck upon the crab, and it must have killed him! I observe the Kuru righteousness, and now here’s a flaw in it!” \[2.377\] So he told them this, and added, “So now I have my doubts about it, and I cannot give it to you.”

Said the messengers, “You had no wish to kill the crab. What is done without intent is not counted to the score; if you feel a scruple about so small a matter, what real transgression would you ever do?” And they took the righteousness from his lips likewise, and wrote it on their golden plate. “However,” said he, “though this does not bless me, the charioteer practise it carefully; go and ask him.”

So they took their leave, and sought out the charioteer. Now the charioteer one day drove the king into his park in the carriage. There the king took his pleasure during the day, and at evening returned, and entered the chariot. But before he could get back to the city, at the time of sunset a storm cloud arose. The charioteer, fearing the king might get wet, touched up the team with the goad: the steeds sped swiftly home. \[2.258\]

Ever since, going to the park or coming from it, from that spot they went at speed. Why was this? Because they thought there must be some danger at this spot, and that was why the charioteer had touched them with the goad. And the charioteer thought: “If the king is wet or dry, ’tis no fault of mine; but I have given a touch of the goad out of season to these well-trained steeds, and so they run at speed again and again till they are tired, all by my doing. And I observe the Kuru righteousness! Surely there’s a flaw in it now!” This he told the messengers, and said: “For this cause I am in doubt about it, and I cannot give it to you.”

“But,” they said, “you did not mean to tire the horses, and what is done without meaning is not set down to the score. If you feel a scruple about so small a matter, what real transgression could you ever commit?” And they learned the righteousness from him also, \(2.378\) and wrote it down upon their golden plate. But the charioteer sent them in search of a certain wealthy man, saying: “Even though this righteousness does not bless me, he keeps it carefully.”

So to this rich man they came, and asked him. Now he one day had gone to his paddy field, and seeing a head of rice bursting the husk, went about to tie it up with a wisp of rice; and taking a handful of it, he tied the head to a post. Then it occurred to him, “From this field I have yet to give the king his due, and I have taken a handful of rice from an untithed field! I, who observe the rules of Kuru righteousness! Surely I must have broken them!” And this matter he told to the messengers, saying: “Now I am in doubt about this righteousness, and so I cannot give it to you.”

“But,” they said, “you had no thought of thieving; without this one cannot be proclaimed \(579\) guilty of theft. If you feel scruples in such a small matter, when will you ever take what belongs to another man?” And from him too they received the righteousness, and wrote it down on their golden plate. He added, “Still, though I am not happy in this matter, the Master of the Royal Granaries keeps these rules well. Go, ask him for them.” So they betook them to the Master of the Granaries.

Now this man, as he sat one day at the door of the granary, causing the rice of the king’s tax to be measured, took a grain from the heap which was not yet measured, and put it down for a marker. At that moment rain began to fall. The official counted up the markers, so many, and then swept them all together and dropped them upon the heap which had been measured. Then he ran in quickly and sat in the gate-house. “Did I throw the markers on the measured heap or the unmeasured?” he wondered; and the thought came into his mind – \(2.379\) “If I threw them on what was already measured, the king’s property has been increased, \(2.259\) and the owners have lost; I keep the Kuru righteousness; and now here’s a flaw!” So he told this to the messengers, adding that therefore he had his doubts about it, and could not give it to them.

But the messengers said: “You had no thought of theft, and without this no one can be declared guilty of dishonesty. If you feel scruples in a small matter like this, when would you ever steal any thing belonging to another?” And from him too they received the righteousness, and wrote it on their golden plate. “But,” added he, “although this virtue is not perfect in me, there is the gatekeeper, who observes it well: go and get it from him.” So they went off and asked the gatekeeper.

---

\(^{579}\) i.e. in the \(\text{Sa} \text{ṅgha (ñatti is a ‘resolution’).}\)

Now it so happened that one day, at the time for closing the city gate, he cried aloud three times. And a certain poor man, who had gone into the woodland gathering sticks and leaves with his youngest sister, hearing the sound came running up with her. Says the door keeper, “What! Don’t you know that the king is in the city? Don’t you know that the gate of this town is shut betimes? Is that why you go out into the woods, making love?” Said the other, “No, master, it is not my wife, but my sister.” Then the porter thought: “How unseemly to address a sister as a wife! And I keep the rules of the Kurus; surely I must have broken them now!” This he told the messengers, adding, “In this way I have my doubts whether I really keep the Kuru righteousness, and so I cannot give it to you.”

But they said: “You said it because you thought so; [2.380] this does not break your virtue. If you feel remorse on so slight a cause, how could you ever tell a lie with intent?” And so they took down those virtues from him too, and wrote them on their golden plate.

Then he said: “But though this virtue does not bless me, there is a courtesan who keeps it well; go and ask her.” And so they did. She refused as the others had done, for the following reason. Sakka, King of the Devas, designed to try her goodness; so putting on the shape of a youth, he gave her a thousand pieces, saying: “I will come by and by.” Then he returned to heaven, and did not visit her for three years. And she, for honour’s sake, for three years took not so much as a piece of betel from another man. By degrees she got poor; and then she thought: “The man who gave me a thousand pieces has not come these three years; and now I have grown poor. I cannot keep body and soul together. Now I must go tell the Chief Justices, and get my wage as before.” So to the court she came, and said: “There was a man three years ago gave me a thousand pieces, and never came back; whether he be dead I know not. I cannot keep body and soul together; what am I to do, my lord?” Said he, “If he does not come for three years, what can you do? Earn your wage as before.” As soon as she left the court, after this award, there came a man who offered her a thousand. As she held out her hands to take it, Sakka showed himself. Said she, “Here is the man who gave me [2.260] a thousand pieces three years ago: I must not take your money,” and she drew back her hand. Then Sakka caused his own proper shape to be seen, and hovered in the air, shining like the sun fresh risen, and gathered all the city together. Sakka, in the midst of the crowd, [2.381] said: “To test her goodness I gave her a thousand pieces three years ago. Be like her, and like her keep your honour,” and with this admonition, he filled her dwelling with jewels of seven kinds, and saying: “Henceforth be vigilant,” he comforted her, and went away to heaven. So for this cause she refused, saying: “Because before I had earned one wage I held out my hand for another, therefore my virtue is not perfect, and so I cannot give it to you.”

To this the messengers replied, “Merely to hold out the hand is not a breach of virtue: that virtue of yours is the highest perfection!” And from her, as from the rest, they received the rules of virtue, and wrote them on their golden plate. They took it with them to Dantapura, and told the king how they had fared.

Then their king practised the Kuru precepts, and fulfilled the five precepts. And then in all the realm of Kāliṅga the rain fell; the three fears were allayed; the land became prosperous and fertile. The Bodhisatta all his life long gave alms and did good, and then with his subjects went to fill the heavens.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and explained the Jātaka tale. At the conclusion of the Truths, some entered the First Path, some the Second, some entered the Third, and some became Arahats. And the Jātaka tale is thus explained:

Uppalavaṇṇā was the courtesan, Puṇṇa the porter, and the driver was Kaccāna; Kolita, the measurer;
The rich man, Sāriputta; he who drove
The chariot, Anuruddha; and the priest
Was Kassapa the elder; he that was
The viceroy, now is Nandapanḍita;
Rāhula’s mother has the queen-consort,
The queen-mother was Māyā; and the king
Was the Bodhisatta. Thus is it clear.
Ja 277 Romakajātaka

The Story about the Feathered One (3s)

In the present Devadatta goes about trying to kill the Buddha, who tells a story of a previous birth in which a sham ascetic took a liking to pigeon’s flesh and tried to kill the pigeons who would visit him hoping to hear some wisdom.

The Bodhisatta = the elder pigeon (pārāvatajeṭṭhaka),
Sāriputta = the virtuous ascetic (sīlavatāpasa),
Devadatta = the cheating ascetic (kūṭatāpasa).

Keywords: Treachery, Falsity, Animals, Birds.

“Here in the hills.” {2.382} This story was told by the Teacher when at the Bamboo Grove, about attempted murder. The circumstances explain themselves.580 [2.261]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a pigeon, and with a large flock of pigeons he lived amidst the woodland in a cave of the hills. There was an ascetic, a virtuous man, who had built himself a hut near a frontier village not far from the place where the pigeons were, and there in a cave of the hills he lived. Him the Bodhisatta visited from time to time, and heard from him things worth hearing.

After living there a long time, the ascetic went away; and there came a sham ascetic, and lived there. The Bodhisatta, attended by his flock of pigeons, visited him and greeted him respectfully; they spent the day in hopping about the ascetic’s abode, and picking up food before the cave, and returned home in the evening. There the sham ascetic lived for more than fifty years.

One day the villagers gave him some pigeon’s flesh which they had cooked. He was taken with the flavour, and asked what it was. “Pigeon,” said they. He 580 [The Pāli actually says: The story of the present is evident. It means to refer the reader to the story about Devadatta going about to murder the Buddha, as is referred to in many of these Introductions.]

thought: “There come flocks of pigeons to my hermitage; I must kill some of them to eat.”

So he got rice and ghee, milk and cummin and pepper, and put it by all ready; in a corner of his robe he hid a staff, and sat down at the hut door watching for the pigeons’ coming.

The Bodhisatta came, with his flock, and spied out what wicked thing this sham ascetic would be doing. “That wicked ascetic sitting there goes under false pretences! Perhaps he has been feeding on some of our kind; I’ll find him out!”

So he alighted to leeward, and scented him. “Yes,” said he, “the man wants to kill us and eat us; we must not go near him,” and away he flew with his flock. On seeing that he kept aloof, the ascetic thought: “I will speak words of honey to him, and make friends, and then kill and eat him!” and he uttered the two first verses:

1. “Here in the hills, for one and fifty years,
O feathered fowl! The birds would visit me,
Nothing suspecting, knowing nought of fears,
In sweet security!

2. These very children of the eggs now seem
To fly suspicious to another hill.
Have they forgotten all their old esteem?
Are they the same birds still?”

Then the Bodhisatta stepped back and repeated the third:

3. “We are no fools, and we know you;
We are the same, and you are too:
You have designs against our weal,
So, heretic, this fear we feel.”

“They have found me out!” thought the false ascetic. He threw his staff at the bird, but missed him. “Get away!” said he, “I’ve missed you!”

“You have missed us,” said the Bodhisatta, “but you shall not miss the four hells! If you stay here, I’ll call the villagers and make them catch you for a thief. Run off, quick!” Thus he threatened the man, and flew away. The ascetic could live there no longer.
The Teacher having ended this discourse, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the ascetic; the first ascetic, the good one, was Sāriputta; and the chief of the pigeons was I myself.”

Ja 278 Mahisajātaka

The Story about (the Virtuous King of) the Buffalos (3s)

Alternative Title: Mahiṣaṁsarakājātaka (Cst)

In the present a monkey voids on the back of a tame elephant who forebears, but later a different elephant tramples him to death for the same offense. The Buddha tells a similar story about two buffaloes and a monkey in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the virtuous king of the buffaloes (sīlavā mahiṣarājā), the monkey = the corrupt monkey (duṭṭhamakkaṭa), the corrupt elephant = the corrupt buffalo (duṭṭhamahiṇsa).

Past Compare: Cp 15 Mahisarakacariyā, Jm 33 Mahiṣa.

Keywords: Insult, Offense, Devas, Animals.

“Why do you patiently.” {2.385} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain impertinent monkey. At Sāvatthi, we are told, was a tame monkey in a certain family; and it ran into the elephant’s stable, and perching on the back of a virtuous elephant, voided excrement, and began to walk up and down. The elephant, being both virtuous and patient, did nothing. But one day in this elephant’s place stood a wicked young one. The monkey thought it was the same, and climbed upon its back. The elephant seized him in his trunk, and dashing him to the ground, trod him to pieces.

This became known in the meeting of the Saṅgha; and one day they all began to talk about it. “Monks, have you heard how the impertinent monkey mistook a bad elephant for a good one, and climbed on his back, and how he lost his life for it?” In came the Teacher, and asked, “Monks, what are you talking of as you sit here?” and they told him. “This is not the first time,” said he, “that this impertinent monkey behaved so; he did the same before,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the Himālayas region as a buffalo. He grew up strong and big, and ranged the hills and mountains, peaks and caves, tortuous woods a many. Once, as he went, he saw a pleasant tree, and took his food, standing under it. [2.263]

Then an impertinent monkey came down out of the tree, and getting on his back, voided excrement; then he took hold of one of the buffalo’s horns, and swung down from it by his tail, disporting himself. The Bodhisatta, being full of patience, kindness, and sympathy, took no notice at all of his misconduct. This the monkey did again and again.

But one day, the spirit that belonged to that tree, standing upon the tree-trunk, asked him, saying, [2.386] “My lord buffalo, why do you put up with the rudeness of this bad monkey? Put a stop to him!” and enlarging upon this theme he repeated the first two verses as follows:

1. “Why do you patiently endure each freak
   This mischievous and selfish ape may wreak?

2. Crush underfoot, transfix him with your horn!
   Stop him or even children will show scorn.”

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, replied, “If, Tree Devatā, I cannot endure this monkey’s ill-treatment without abusing his birth, lineage, and powers, how can my wish ever come to fulfilment? But the monkey will do the same to any other, thinking him to be like me. And if he does it to any fierce buffaloes, they will destroy him indeed. When some other has killed him, I shall be delivered both from pain and from blood-guiltiness.” And saying this he repeated the third verse:

3. “If he treats others as he now treats me,
   They will destroy him; then I shall be free.”

A few days after, the Bodhisatta went elsewhere, and another buffalo, a savage beast, went and stood in his place. The wicked monkey, [2.387] thinking it to be the old one, climbed upon his back and did as before. The buffalo shook him off upon the ground, and drove his horn into the monkey’s heart, and trampled him to mincemeat under his hoofs.

When the Teacher had ended this teaching, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the bad buffalo was he who now is the bad elephant, the bad monkey was the same, but the virtuous noble buffalo was I myself.”
Ja 279 Satapattajātaka
The Story about the Woodpecker (3s)

In the present the group of six monks try to prevent others from correcting them in matters of Dhamma and Vinaya. The Buddha tells a story of a youth who collected a thousand pieces of money, and mistaking friends for foes, and foes for friends came into a forest full of thieves.

The Bodhisatta = the elder thief (corajethaka).

Keywords: Opinionated, Stubborn, Animals, Birds.

“As the youth upon his way.” [2.264] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about Paṇḍuka and Lohita. Of the Group of Six, two – Mettiya and Bhumma – lived nearby Rājagaha; two, Assaji and Punabbasu, near Kiṭagiri, and at Jetavana near Sāvatthi the two others, Paṇḍuka and Lohita. They questioned matters laid down in the Dhamma; whoever were their friends and intimates, they would encourage, saying: “You are no worse than these, brother, in birth, lineage, or character; if you give up your opinions, they will have much the better of you,” and by saying this kind of thing they prevented their giving up their opinions, and thus strifes and quarrels and contentions arose.

The monks told this to the Fortunate One. The Fortunate One assembled the monks for that cause, to make explanation; and causing Paṇḍuka and Lohita to be summoned, addressed them, “Is it true, monks, that you really yourselves question certain matters, and prevent people from giving up their opinions?” “Yes,” they replied. “Then,” said he, “your behaviour is like that of the man and the crane,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born to a certain family in a Kāsi village. When he grew up, instead of earning a livelihood by farming or trade, {2.388} he gathered five hundred robbers, and became their chief, and lived by highway robbery and housebreaking.

Now it so happened that a landowner had given a thousand pieces of money to someone, and died before receiving it back again.

Some time after, his wife lay on her deathbed, and addressing her son, said: “Son, your father gave a thousand pieces of money to a man, and died without getting it back; if I die too, he will not give it to you. Go, while I yet live, get him to fetch it and give it back.”

So the son went, and got the money.

The mother died; but she loved her son so much, that she suddenly reappeared as a jackal on the road by which he was coming. At that time, the robber chief with his band lay by the road in wait to plunder travellers. And when her son had got to the entrance of the wood, the jackal returned again and again, and sought to stay him; saying: “My son, don’t enter the wood! There are robbers there, who will slay you and take your money!” [2.265]

But the man understood not what she meant. “Ill luck!” said he, “here’s a jackal trying to stop my way!” he said; and he drove her off with sticks and clods, and into the wood he went.

And a woodpecker flew towards the robbers, crying out, “Here’s a man with a thousand pieces in his hand! Kill him, and take them!” The young fellow did not know what it was doing, so he thought: “Good luck! Here’s a lucky bird! Now there is a good omen for me!” He saluted respectfully, crying, “Give voice, give voice, my lord!”

The Bodhisatta, who knew the meaning of all sounds, observed what these two did, and thought: “That jackal must be the man’s mother; so she tries to stop him, and tell him that he will be killed and robbed; but the woodpecker must be some adversary, and that is why it says ‘Kill him, and take the money;’ and the man does not know what is happening, [2.389] and drives off his mother, who wishes his welfare, while the woodpecker, who wishes him ill, he worships, under the belief that it is a well-wisher. The man is a fool.”

(Now the Bodhisattas, even though they are great beings, sometimes take the goods of others by being born as wicked men; this they say comes from a fault in the horoscope.)

---

581 The word implies a creature not born in the natural way, but taking shape without the need of parents.
582 [Rouse translated satapatta as Crane, but this seems to be unattested.]
So the young man went on, and by and by fell in with the robbers. The Bodhisatta caught him, and, “Where do you live?” said he. “In Benares.” “Where have you been?” “There was a thousand pieces due to me in a certain village; and that is where I have been.” “Did you get it?” “Yes, I did.” “Who sent you?”

“Teacher, my father is dead, and my mother is ill; it was she sent me, because she thought I should not get it if she were dead.”

“And do you know what has happened to your mother now?” “No, master.”

“She died after you left; and so much did she love you, that she at once became a jackal, and kept trying to stop you for fear you should get killed. She it was that you scared away. But the woodpecker was an enemy, who came and told us to kill you, and take your money. You are such a fool that you thought your mother was an ill-wisher, when she wished you well, and thought the woodpecker was a well-wisher when it wished ill to you. He did you no good, but your mother was very good to you. Keep your money, and be off!” And he let him go. [2.266]

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he repeated the following verses:

1. “As the youth upon his way
   Thought the jackal of the wood
   Was a foe, his path to stay,
   While she tried to do him good:
   That woodpecker his friend deeming
   Which to ruin him was scheming.

2. Such another, who is here,
   Has his friends misunderstood;
   They can never win his ear
   Who advise him for his good. [2.390]
3. He believes when others praise –
Awful terrors prophesying:
As the youth of olden days
Loved the crane above him flying.\(^{583}\)

When the Teacher had enlarged upon this theme, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the robber chief was I myself.”

Ja 280 Puṭadūsakajātaka

The Story about Spoiling the Basket (3s)

In the present while the monks are in a park the small son of a gardener destroys the baskets his father makes as he drops them. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past in which monkeys destroyed the gardener’s baskets.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (pañḍitapurisa), the boy who spoiled the baskets = the monkey (vānara).

Keywords: Destructive behaviour, Animals.

“No doubt the king.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about one who destroyed baskets. At Sāvatthi, we learn, a certain courtier invited the Buddha and his company, and made them sit in his park. \([2.391]\) As he was distributing to them, during the meal, he said: “Let those who wish to walk about the park, do so.” The monks walked about the park. At that time the gardener climbed up a tree which had leaves upon it, and said, taking hold of some of the large leaves, “This will do for flowers, this one for fruit,” and making them into baskets he dropped them to the foot of the tree. His little son destroyed each as soon as it fell. The monks told this to the Teacher. “Monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time that this lad has destroyed baskets: he did it before.” And he told them a story. \([2.267]\)

---

\(^{583}\) The commentator adds the following lines: The friend who robs another without ceasing; He that protests, protests incessantly; The friend who flatters for the sake of pleasing; The boon companion in debauchery; These four the wise as enemies should fear, And keep aloof, if there be danger near. [The verses are from DN. 31.]
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a certain family of Benares. When he grew up, and was living in the world as a householder, it happened that for some reason he went into a park, where a number of monkeys lived. The gardener was throwing down his baskets as we have described, and the chief of the monkeys was destroying them as they fell. The Bodhisatta, addressing him, said: “As the gardener drops his baskets, the monkey thinks he is trying to please him by tearing them up,” \(^{584}\) and repeated the first verse:

1. “No doubt the king of beasts is clever
   In making baskets; he would never Destroy what’s made with so much bother,
   Unless he meant to make another.”

On hearing this the monkey repeated the second verse:

2. “Neither my father nor my mother
   Nor I myself could make another.
   What others make, we tear to pieces:
   The proper way of monkeys, this is!” \(^{2.392}\)

And the Bodhisatta responded with the third:

3. “If this is proper monkey nature,
   What’s the improper way of such a creature!
   Be off – it does not matter whether You're proper or improper – both together!”

With these words of blame he departed.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the monkey was the boy who has been destroying the baskets; but the wise man was I myself.”

\(^{584}\) Should we read, “...Kātukāmo ti maññe” ti?
In the present Rāhula’s mother, after ordaining falls ill. Ven. Rāhula asks what is to be done, and she asks for mango juice, which Ven. Sāriputta then procures for her which cures her. The Buddha tells a story of a queen in the past who desired a ‘middle mango’ and how a faithful parrot procured one for her.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic who lived in the garden (uyyāne nivutthatāpaso), Sāriputta = the ascetic who gave the mango (ambapakkadāyako tāpaso), Ānanda = the parrot (suka),
Rāhulamātā = the queen (devī).

Presentation Source: Ja 281 Abbhantarajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 292 Supatta.

Keywords: Health, Desires, Devas, Women.

“There grows a tree.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about the elder Sāriputta giving mango juice to the nun Bimbādevī. When the Supreme Buddha inaugurated the universal reign of the dispensation, while living in a room at Vesāli, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, along with five hundred of the Śākiya clan, asked for initiation, and received initiation and full orders. Afterwards the five hundred nuns became Arahats on hearing the preaching of Nandaka. But when the Teacher was living near Śāvatthi, the mother of Rāhula thought to herself, “My husband on embracing the ascetic life has become omniscient; my son too has become an ascetic, and lives with him. What am I to do in the midst of the house? I will enter on this life, and go to Śāvatthi, and I will live looking upon the Supreme Buddha and my son continually.” So she betook herself to a nunnery, and entered the order, and went and lived in a cell at Śāvatthi, in company of her teachers and preceptors, beholding the Teacher and her beloved son. The novice Rāhula came and saw his mother.

One day, the nun was afflicted with flatulence; and when her son came to see her, she could not get to see him, but some others came and told him she was ill. Then he went in, and asked his mother, “What ought you to take?” “Son,” said she, “at home this pain used to be cured by mango juice flavoured with sugar; but now we live by begging, and where can we get it?” Said the novice, “I'll get it for you,” and departed.

Now the preceptor of his reverence Rāhula was [Sāriputta], the Captain of the Dhamma, his teacher was the great Moggallāna, his uncle was the elder Ānanda, and his father was the Supreme Buddha: thus he had great luck. However, he went to no other save only to his preceptor; and after greeting him, stood before him with a sad look. “Why do you seem sad, Rāhula?” asked the elder. “Sir,” he replied, “my mother is ill with flatulence.” “What must she take?” “Mango juice and sugar does her good.” “All right, I'll get some; don't trouble about it.”

So next day he took the lad to Sāvatthi, and seating him in a waiting-room, went up to the palace. The king of Kosala bade the elder be seated. At that very moment the gardener brought a basket of sweet mangoes ripe for food. The king removed the skin, sprinkled sugar, crushed them up himself, and filled the elder's bowl for him. The elder returned to the place of waiting and gave them to the novice, bidding him give them to his mother; and he did so. No sooner had the nun eaten, than her pain was cured. The king also sent messengers, saying: “The elder did not sit here to eat the mango juice. Go and find out whether he gave it to any one.”

The messenger went along with the elder, and found out, and then returned to tell the king. Thought the king, “If the Teacher should return to a worldly life, he would be a Universal Monarch; the novice Rāhula would be his treasure the crown prince, the holy nun would be his treasure the empress, and all the universe would belong to them. I must go and attend upon them. Now they are living close by there is no time to be lost.” So from that day he continually gave mango syrup to the nun.

It became known among the monks how the elder gave mango syrup to the holy nun. [2.394] And one day they fell talking in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, I hear that the elder Sāriputta comforted nun Bimbādevī with mango syrup.” The Teacher came in and asked, “What are you talking about now?” When they told him, “This is not the first time, monks, that Rāhula’s mother was comforted with mango syrup by the elder; the same happened before,” and he told them a story.

---

585 Two of the seven ratanas, or Treasures of the Empire of an universal monarch.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family living in a village of Kāsi. When he grew up, he was educated at Taxila, settled down into family life, and on the death of his parents embraced the ascetic life. After that he remained in the region of the Himālayas, cultivating the Super Knowledges and Attainments. A body of sages gathered round him, and he became their teacher. [2.269]

At the end of a long time he came down from the hills to get salt and seasoning, and in the course of his wanderings arrived at Benares, where he lived in a park. And at the glory of the virtue of this company of holy men the palace of Sakka shook. Sakka reflected, and perceived what it was. He thought: “I will do an injury to their dwelling; then their stay will be disturbed; they will be too much distressed to have tranquillity of mind. Then I shall be comfortable again.” As he thought how to do it, he hit upon a plan. “I will enter the chamber of the chief queen, just at the middle watch of the night, and hovering in the air, I will say – ‘Lady, if you eat a midmost mango, 586 you will conceive a son, 587 who shall become a Universal Monarch.’ She will tell the king, and he will send to the orchard for a mango fruit: I will cause all the fruit to disappear. They will tell the king that there is none, and when he asks who eats it, they will say ‘The ascetics.’ ” So just in the middle watch, he appeared in the queen’s chamber, and hovering in the air, revealed his godhead, and conversing with her, repeated the first two verses: [2.395]

1. “There grows a tree, with fruit divine thereon;
   Men call it middlemost: and if one be
   With child, and eat of it, she soon enough
   Will bear one who will rule the whole wide earth.

---

586 The phrase is meant to be enigmatical. It is explained below.
587 The idea of conception by eating of fruit and in other abnormal ways is fully discussed in The Legend of Perseus, E. S. Hartland, vol. i. chaps. 4-6.
2. Lady, you are a mighty queen indeed;
The king, your husband, holds you very dear.
Bid him procure the mango for your need,
And he the midmost fruit will bring you here.”

These verses did Sakka recite to the queen; and then bidding her be careful, and make no delay, but tell the matter to the king herself, he encouraged her, and went back to his own place.

Next day, the queen lay down, as though ill, giving instructions to her maidens. The king sat upon his throne, under the white umbrella, and looked on at the dancing. Not seeing his queen, he asked a handmaid where she was. “The queen is sick,” replied the girl.

So the king went to see her; and sitting by her side, stroked her back, and asked, “What is the matter, lady?” “Nothing,” said she, “but that I have a craving for something.” “What is it you want, lady?” he asked again. “A middle mango, my lord.” “Where is there such a thing as a middle mango?” [2.270]

“I don’t know what a middle mango is; but I know that I shall die if I don’t get one.” “All right, we will get you one; don’t trouble about it.”

So the king consoled her, and went away. He took his seat upon the royal divan, and sent for his courtiers. [2.396] “My queen has a great craving for a middle mango. What is to be done?” said he.

Someone told him, “A middle mango is one which grows between two others. Send to your park, and find a mango growing between two others; pluck its fruit and let us give it to the queen.” So the king sent men to do after this manner.

But Sakka by his power made all the fruit disappear, as though it had been eaten. The men who came for the mangoes searched the whole park through, and not a mango could they find; so back they went to the king, and told him that mangoes there were none.

“Who is it eats the mangoes?” asked the king. “The ascetics, my lord.”

“Give the ascetics a drubbing, and bundle them out of the park!” he commanded. The people heard and obeyed: Sakka’s wish was fulfilled. The queen lay on and on, longing for the mango.
The king could not think what to do. He gathered his courtiers and his brahmins, and asked them, “Do you know what a middle mango is?”

Said the brahmins, “My lord, a middle mango is the portion of the gods. It grows in the Himālayas, in the Golden Cave. So we have heard by immemorial tradition.”

“Well, who can go and get it?” “A human being cannot go; we must send a young parrot.”

At that time there was a fine young parrot in the king’s family, as big as the nave of the wheel in the princes’ carriage, strong, wise, and had skill in means. This parrot the king sent for, and thus addressed him, “Dear parrot, I have done a great deal for you: you live in a golden cage; you have sweet grain to eat on a golden dish; you have sugared water to drink. There’s something I want you to do for me.” “Speak on, my lord,” said the parrot.

“Son, my queen has a craving for a middle mango; this mango grows in the Himālayas, in the Golden Mountain; it is the gods’ portion, no human being can go there. You must bring the fruit back from thence.”

“Very good, my king, I will,” said the parrot. Then the king gave him sweetened grain to eat, on a golden plate, and sugar-water to drink; and anointed him beneath the wings with oil a hundred times refined; then he took him in both hands, and standing at a window, let him fly away.

The parrot, on the king’s errand, flew along in the air, beyond the ways of men, till he came to some parrots which dwelt in the first hill-region of the Himālayas. “Where is the middle mango?” he asked them, “tell me the place.”

“We know not,” they said, “but the parrots in the second range of hills will know.”

The parrot listened, and flew away to the second range. After that he went on to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth. There too the parrots said: “We do not know, but those in the seventh range will know.” So he went on there, and asked where the middle mango tree grew. “In such and such a place, on the Golden Hill,” they said.
“I have come for the fruit of it,” said he, “guide me there, and procure the fruit for me.”

“That is the portion of the king Vessavaṇa. It is impossible to get near it. The whole tree from the roots upwards is encircled with seven iron nets; it is guarded by thousands of millions of Kumbhaṇḍa Rakkhasas; if they see any one, he’s done for. The place is like the fire of the dissolution and the fire of hell. Do not ask such a thing!”

“If you will not go with me, then describe the place to me,” said he.

So they told him to go by such and such a way. He listened carefully to their instructions. He did not show himself by day; but at dead of night, when the Rakkhasas were asleep, he approached the tree, and began softly to climb on one of its roots, when clink! went the iron net {2.398} the Rakkhasas awoke – saw the parrot, and seized him, crying, “Thief!” Then they discussed what was to be done with him.

Says one, “I’ll throw him into my mouth, and swallow him!” Says another, “I’ll crush him and knead him in my hands and scatter him in bits!” Says a third, “I’ll split him in two, and cook him on the coals and eat him!”

The parrot heard them deliberating. Without any fear he addressed them, “I say, Rakkhasas, whose men are you?”

“We belong to king Vessavaṇa.”

“Well, you have one king for your master, and I have another for mine. The king of Benares sent me here to fetch a fruit of the middle mango tree. Then and there I gave my life to my king, and here I am. He who loses his life for parents or master is born at once in heaven. Therefore I shall pass at once from this animal form to the world of the gods!” and he repeated the third verse:

3. “Whatever be the place which they attain
   Who, by heroic self-forgetfulness,
   Strive with all zeal a master’s end to gain –
   To that same place I soon shall win access.” [2.272]

After this fashion did he discourse, repeating this verse. The Rakkhasas listened, and were pleased in their heart. “This is a righteous creature,” they said, “we must not kill him – let him go!” So they let him go, and said: “I say, parrot, you’re free! Go unharmed out of our hands!” (2.399)

“Do not let me return empty-handed,” said the parrot, “give me a fruit off the tree!”

“Parrot,” they said, “it is not our business to give you fruit off this tree. All the fruit on this tree is marked. If there is one fruit wrong we shall lose our lives. If Vessavaṇa is angry and looks but once, a thousand Rakkhasas are broken up and scattered like parched peas hopping about on a hot plate. So we cannot give you any. But we will tell you a place where you can get some.”

“I care not who gives it,” said the parrot, “but the fruit I must have. Tell me where I may get it.”

“In one of the tortuous paths of the Golden Mountain lives an ascetic, by name Jotirasa, who watches the sacred fire in a leaf-thatched hut, called Kañcanapatti or Goldleaf, a favourite of Vessavaṇa; and Vessavaṇa sends him constantly four fruits from the tree; go to him.”

The parrot took his leave, and came to the ascetic; he gave him greeting, and sat down on one side. The ascetic asked him, “Where have you come from?” “From the king of Benares.” “Why are you come?”

“Teacher, our queen has a great craving for the fruit of the middle mango, and that is why I am come. Howbeit the Rakkhasas would not give me any themselves, but sent me to you.”

“Sit down, then, and you shall have one,” said the ascetic. Then came the four which Vessavaṇa used to send. The ascetic ate two of them, gave the parrot one to eat, and when this was eaten he hung the fourth by a string, and made it fast around the parrot’s neck, and let him go, “Off with you, now!” said he. The parrot flew back and gave it to the queen. She ate it, and satisfied her craving, but still all the same she had no son. (2.400)

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka in these words, “At that time Rāhula’s mother was the queen, Ānanda was the parrot, Sāriputta was the ascetic who gave the mango fruit, but the ascetic who lived in the park was I myself.”
The Section with Three Verses – 1029

Ja 282 Seyyajātaka
The Story about the Best (3s)

In the present an innocent courtier is thrown into prison, but later released and honoured by the king. The Buddha tells a story of how a man intrigued in the palace in Benares, was exiled and enticed a foreign king to attack his former country. The king of Benares, rather than cause the deaths of others, allowed himself to be captured, and the conqueror, seeing his virtue, relented and set him free.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
Ānanda = the king of the thieves (corārājā).

Present Source: Ja 282 Seyya,
Quoted at: Ja 303 Ekarāja, Ja 351 Maṇikuṇḍala,
Present Compare: Ja 355 Ghata.

Keywords: Patience, Righteousness.

“It is best that you should know.” [2.273] This tale the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a courtier of the king of Kosala. This man was very useful to the king, we are told, and did everything that had to be done. Because he was very useful, the king did him great honour. The others were jealous, and concocted a slander, and calumniated him. The king believed their saying, and without enquiring into his guilt, bound him in chains, though virtuous and innocent, and cast him into prison. There he dwelt all alone; but, by reason of his virtue, he had peace of mind, and with mind at peace he understood the conditions of existence, and attained the fruition of the First Path. By and by the king found that he was guiltless, and broke his chains and gave him honour more than before.

The man wished to pay his respects to the Teacher; and taking flowers and perfumes, he went to the monastery, and did reverence to the Tathāgata, and sat respectfully aside. The Teacher talked graciously with him. “We have heard that ill fortune befell you,” said he. “Yes, sir, but I made my ill fortune into good; and as I sat in prison, I produced the fruition of the First Path.” “Good friend,” said the Teacher, “you are not the only one who has turned evil into good; for wise men in the olden time turned evil into good just as you did.” And he told a story of the past.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his queen consort. He grew up and was educated at Taxila; and on his father’s death he became king, and kept the ten royal rules: he gave alms, practised virtue, and observed the sacred day.

Now one of his courtiers intrigued among the king’s wives. The servants noticed it, and told the king that so and so was carrying on an intrigue. The king found out the very truth of the matter, and sent for him. “Never show yourself before me again,” said he, and banished him. The man went off to the court of a neighbouring king, and then all happened as described above in the Mahāsīlavajātaka [Ja 51].

Driven thus from the realm, that minister left the Kāsi country, and, entering the service of the king of Kosala, gradually rose to be that monarch’s confidential adviser. One day he said to the king of Kosala, “Sire, the kingdom of Benares is like a goodly honeycomb untainted by flies; its king is feebleness itself; and a trifling force would suffice to conquer the whole country.”

Hereon, the king of Kosala reflected that the kingdom of Benares was large, and, considering this in connection with the advice that a trifling force could conquer it, he grew suspicious that his adviser was a hireling instigated to lead him into a trap. “Traitor,” he cried, “you are paid to say this!”

“Indeed I am not,” answered the other, “I do but speak the truth. If you doubt me, send men to massacre a village over his border, and see whether, when they are caught and brought before him, the king does not let them off scot-free and even load them with gifts.”

“He shows a very bold front in making his assertion,” thought the king, “I will test his counsel without delay.” And accordingly he sent some of his creatures to harry a village across the Benares border. The ruffians were captured and brought before the king of Benares, who asked them, saying: “My children, why have you killed my villagers?”

“Because we could not make a living,” said they.

“Then why did you not come to me?” said the king. “See that you do not do the like again.”
And he gave them presents and sent them away. Back they went and told this to the king of Kosala. But this evidence was not enough to nerve him to the expedition; and a second band was sent to massacre another village, this time in the heart of the kingdom. These too were likewise sent away with presents by the king of Benares. But even this evidence was not deemed strong enough; and a third party was sent to plunder the very streets of Benares! And these, like their forerunners, were sent away with presents!

Having thrice tested him, the king, believing the word of the courtier came with a great army before Benares with intent to take it. When this was known to the chief warriors of the king of Benares, five hundred in number, they said to the king, “Such and such a king has come here, wasting the country, with intent to take Benares – here, let us go and capture him!”

“I want no kingdom that must be kept by doing harm,” said the king. “Do nothing at all.” [2.274]

The marauding king surrounded the city. Again the courtiers approached the king, and said: “My lord, be advised – let us capture him!”

“Nothing can be done,” said the king. “Open the city gates.” Then, surrounded by his court, he sat down in state upon the great dais.

The marauder entered the town, felling the men at the four gates and ascended the terrace. There he took prisoner the king with all his court, threw chains upon them and cast them into prison. The king, as he sat in prison, pitied the marauder, and an Absorption based on loving-kindness was stirred in him. By reason of this pity, the other king felt great torment in his body; he burnt all through as though with a twofold flame; and smitten with great pain, he asked what the matter was.

They replied, “You have cast a righteous king into prison, that is why this is come upon you.”

He went and craved pardon of the Bodhisatta, and restored his kingdom, saying: “Your kingdom be your own. [2.402] Henceforward leave your enemies for me to deal with.” He punished the evil counsellor, and returned to his own city.

The Bodhisatta sat in state upon his high dais, in festal array, with his court around him; and addressing them repeated the first two verses:
1. " ’Tis best that you should know, the better part
Is evermore the better thing to do.
By treating one with kindliness of heart,
I saved a hundred men from death their due.

2. Therefore to all the world I bid you show
The grace of kindliness and friendship dear;
And then alone to heaven you shall not go.
O people of the Kāsi country, hear!"

Thus the Great Being praised virtue in the way of pittyng the great multitude; and leaving the white umbrella in the great city of Benares, twelve leagues in extent, retired to the Himālayas, and embraced the ascetic life. {2.403}

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, repeated the third verse:

3. “These are the words that I, king Kaṁsa, said,
I the great ruler of Benares town.
I laid my bow, I laid my quiver down,
And my self-mastery I perfected.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the marauding king, but the king of Benares was I myself.”

Ja 283 Vaḍḍhakīsūkarajātaka

The Story about the Carpenter’s Boar (3s)

Alternative Title: Vaḍḍhakīsūkarajātaka (Cst)

In the present after Ajātasattu killed his father he fell into fighting with his uncle, Pasenadi. The latter kept getting defeated till his courtiers overheard two monks discussing the art of war. The Buddha tells a story about boars that were living in terror of a tiger, until one boar came along who taught them how to band together and fight off their foe. They also disposed off a false ascetic who plotted against them.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
(the elder monk) Dhanuggahatissa = the old boar (vaḍḍhakīsūkara).

Past Compare: Ja 283 Vaḍḍhakīsūkara, Ja 492 Tacchasūkara.

Keywords: War, Strategy, Devas, Animals.
“The best, the best you always.” [2.275] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana about the elder Dhanuggahatissa. Mahākosala, the father of king Pasenadi, when he married his daughter, the lady Kosala, to king Bimbisāra, gave a village of Kāsi, producing a revenue of a hundred thousand, for bath and perfume money. When Ajātasattu murdered the king his father, the lady Kosala died of grief. Then thought king Pasenadi, “Ajātasattu has killed his father, my sister has died from sympathy with her husband’s misfortune; I will not give the Kāsi town to the parricide.” So he refused to give it to Ajātasattu. About this village there was war betwixt these two from time to time. Ajātasattu was fierce and strong, and Pasenadi was a very old man, so he was beaten again and again, and the people of Mahākosala were generally conquered.

Then the king asked his courtiers, “We are constantly being beaten; what is to be done?” “My lord,” they said, “the venerable fathers are skilled in incantations. We must hear the word of the monks who dwell in Jetavana.” Then the king dispatched couriers, bidding them listen to the converse of the monks at a suitable time.

Now at the time there were two old elders living in a leaf-hut close to the monastery, whose names were elder Utta and elder Dhanuggahatissa. [2.404] Dhanuggahatissa had slept through the first and second watch of the night; and awaking in the last watch, he broke some sticks, lit a fire, and sitting down said: “Utta, my friend!” “What is it, friend Tissa?” “Are you not asleep?” “Now we are awake, what’s to do?” “Get up, now, and sit by me.” So he did, and began to talk to him. “That stupid, pot-bellied Kosala never has a jar full of boiled rice without letting it spoil; how to plan a war he knows not a bit. He is always being beaten and forced to pay.” “But what should he do?” Now just then the couriers stood listening to their talk.

The elder Dhanuggahatissa discussed the nature of war. “War, sir,” said he, “consists of three kinds: the lotus army, the wheel army, and the wagon army.”

---

588 These are technical terms in Sanskrit also (padmavyūho, śakaṭa°, cakra°); see Manu 7. 188, 7. 187, and B. R. dict. s.v. The ‘wheel’ explains itself: the ‘wagon’ was a wedge-shaped phalanx; the ‘lotus,’ as noted by Bühler (translation of Manu in Sacred Books
If those who wish to capture Ajātasattu will post garrisons in two hill-forts right away in the hills, and pretend that they are weak, and watch till they get him among the hills, and bar his passage, leap out from the two forts and take him in front and in the rear, and shout aloud, they will quickly have him like a landed fish, like a frog in the fist; and so they will be able to secure him.” All this the couriers told their king. The king caused the drum to be beaten for the attack, arranged his army wagon-wise, took Ajātasattu alive; his daughter, princess Vajirā he gave in marriage to his sister’s son, and dismissed her with the Kāsi village for her bath-money.

This event became known among the Saṅgha. One day, they were all talking about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, I hear that the king of Kosala conquered Ajātasattu through the instructions of Dhanuggahatissa.” The Teacher [2.276] came in, “What do you sit here talking about now, monks?” asked he. They told him. He said: “This is not the first time that Dhanuggahatissa was clever in discussing war,” and he told them a story. [2.405]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a Tree Devatā. At that time there were some carpenters settled in a village near Benares. One of them, on going into the forest to get wood, found a young boar fallen in a pit, which he took home and kept. He grew big, with curved tusks, and was a well-mannered creature. Because the carpenter kept him, he went by the name of Carpenter’s Boar [Vaḍḍhakisūkara]. When the carpenter was chopping up a tree, the boar used to turn the tree over with his snout, and with his teeth fetch hatchet and adze, chisel and mallet, and pull along the measuring line by the end. The carpenter was afraid somebody might eat him up; so he took him and let him go in the forest. The boar ran into the forest, looking for a safe and pleasant place to live in; and at last he espied a great cave up in a mountain side, with plenty of bulbs, and roots, and fruits, a pleasant living-place. Some hundreds of other boars saw him and approached him.

of the East page 246), is “equally extended on all sides and perfectly circular, the centre being occupied by the king.”
Said he to them, “You are just what I am looking for, and here I have found you. This seems a nice place; and here I mean to live now with you.”

“A nice place it certainly is,” they said, “but dangerous.”

“Ah,” said he, “as soon as I saw you, I wondered how it was that those who dwell in so plentiful a place could be so meagre in flesh and blood. What is it you are afraid of?”

“There is a tiger comes in the morning, and every one he sees he seizes and carries off.” “Does this always happen, or only now and then?” “Always.” “How many tigers are there?” “Only one.” “What—one alone too many for all of you!” “Yes, sir.”

“I'll catch him, if you only do what I tell you. Where does this tiger live?” “On that hill yonder.”

So at night he drilled the boars and prepared them for war; explaining to them the science. \(2.406\) “War is of three kinds – the lotus army, the wheel army, and the wagon army,” and he arranged them after the lotus pattern. He knew the place of vantage; so, said he, “Here we must set our battle.” The mothers and their suckling brood he placed \(2.277\) in the middle; around these he put the sows that had no young; around these, the little boars; around these, those which were rather young; around these, all whose tusks were grown; around these, the boars fit for battle, strong and powerful, by tens and by twenties; thus he placed them in serried ranks. Before his own position he had a round hole dug; behind it, a pit getting gradually deeper and deeper, shaped like a winnowing basket.\(^{589}\) As he moved about amongst them, followed by sixty or seventy boars, bidding them be of good courage, the dawn broke.

The tiger awoke. “Time now!” thought he. He trotted up till he caught sight of them; then stopped still upon the plateau, glaring at the crowd of boars. “Glare back!” cried the Carpenter’s Boar, with a signal to the rest. They all glared. The tiger opened his mouth, and drew a long breath: the boars all did the same. The tiger relieved himself: so did the boars. Thus whatever the tiger did, the boars did after him.

\(^{589}\) The winnowing basket has low walls on three sides, two of them sloping towards the open end. See a picture in Grierson, Bihar Peasant Life, 118.

“Why, what’s this!” the tiger wondered. “They used to take to their heels as soon as they saw me – indeed, they were too much frightened even to run. Now so far from running, they actually stand up against me! Whatever I do, they mimic. There’s a fellow yonder on a commanding position: he it is who has organised the rabble. Well, I don’t see how to get the better of them.” And he turned away and went back to his lair.

Now there was a sham ascetic, who used to get a share of the tiger’s prey. This time the tiger returned empty-handed. Noticing this, the ascetic repeated the following verse. [2.407]

1. “The best, the best you always brought before
   When you went hunting after the wild boar.
   Now empty-handed you consume with grief,
   Today where is the strength you had of yore?”

At this address, the tiger repeated another verse:

2. “Once they would hurry-scurry all about
   To find their holes, a panic-stricken rout.
   But now they grunt in serried ranks compact:
   Invincible, they stand and face me out.”

“Oh, don’t be afraid of them!” urged the ascetic. “One roar and one leap will frighten them out of their wits, and send them pell-mell.” The tiger yielded to this insistence. Plucking up his courage, he went back and stood upon the plateau.

Carpenter’s Boar stood between the two pits. “See Teacher! Here’s the scoundrel again!” cried the boars. “Oh, don’t be afraid,” said he, “we have him now.” [2.278]

With a roar the tiger leapt upon Carpenter’s Boar. At the very instant he sprang, the boar dodged and dropped straight into the round hole. The tiger could not stop, but tumbled over and over and fell all of a heap in the jaws of the other pit, where it got very narrow. Up jumped the boar out of his hole, and quick as lightning ran his tusk into the tiger’s thighs, tore him about the kidneys, buried his fangs in the creature’s sweet flesh, and wounded his head. Then he tossed him out of the pit, crying aloud, “Here’s your enemy for you!” They who came first had tiger to eat; but they who came after went about sniffing at the others’ mouths, and asking what tiger’s flesh tasted like!

But the boars were still uneasy. “What’s the matter now?” asked our hog, who had noticed their movements.

“Teacher,” they said, “it’s all very well to kill one tiger, but the sham ascetic can bring ten tigers more!” “Who is he?” “A wicked ascetic.”

“The tiger I have killed; do you suppose a man can hurt me? Come along, and we’ll get hold of him.” So they all set forth.

Now the man had been wondering why the tiger was so long in coming. “Could the boars have caught him?” he thought. At last he started to meet him on the way; and as he went, there came the boars! He snatched up his belongings, and off he ran. The boars tore after him. He threw away his encumbrances, and with all speed climbed up a fig tree.

“Now, Teacher, it’s all up!” cried the herd. “The man has climbed a tree!”

“What tree?” their leader asked.

They replied, “A fig tree.”

“Oh, very well,” said the leader. “The sows must bring water, the young ones dig about the tree, the tuskers tear at the roots, and the rest surround it and watch.”

They did their several tasks as he bade them; he meanwhile charged full at a great thick root, [2.409] ’twas like an axe-blow; and with this one blow he felled the tree to the ground. The boars who were waiting for the man, knocked him down, tore him to pieces, gnawed the bones clean in a moment!

Now they perched Carpenter’s Boar on the tree-trunk. They filled the dead man’s shell with water, and sprinkled the boar to consecrate him for their king; a young sow they consecrated to be his consort.

This, the saying goes, is the origin of the custom still observed. When people make a king now-a-days, he is placed on a fine chair of fig-wood, and sprinkled out of three shells.

A Devatā that dwelt in that forest beheld this marvel. Appearing [2.279] before the boars in a cleft of his tree-trunk, he repeated the third verse:
3. “Honour to all the tribes assembled be!
A wondrous union I myself did see!
How tuskers once a tiger overcame
By federal strength and tusked unity!”

After this discourse the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Dhanuggaha the elder was the Carpenter’s Boar, and I was the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 284 Sirijātaka

The Story about (Good) Luck (3s)

In the present a Devatā works to dissuade her landlord, Anāṭhapiṇḍika, from his allegiance to the Buddha, and is expelled from her home for the trouble. To make up she recovers three great fortunes her host had lost. A brahmin then tries, but fails to steal, Anāṭhapiṇḍika’s luck. When the Buddha hears of this he tells a story about an elephant trainer who had his share of a bird who could bring good luck and three days later became king.

The Bodhisatta (Sammāsambuddha) = the family ascetic (kulūpakatāpasa), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 40 Khadiraṅgārajātaka, Quoted at: Ja 284 Siri, Ja 340 Visayha.

Keywords: Fortune, Destiny, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Whatever riches they who strive.” This story the Teacher told about a brahmin who stole good luck. [2.410] The circumstances of this birth-tale are given above in the Khadiraṅgajātaka [Ja 40].

For Anāṭhapiṇḍika, who had lavished fifty-four crores on the dispensation of the Buddha over the monastery alone, and who valued naught else save only the Three Jewels, used to go every day while the Teacher was at Jetavana to attend the Great Services – once at daybreak, once after breakfast, and once in the evening. There were intermediate services too; but he never went empty-handed, for fear the novices and lads should look to see what he had brought with him. When he went in the early morning, he used to have rice-gruel taken up; after breakfast, ghee, butter, honey, molasses, and the like; and in the evening, he brought perfumes, garlands and cloths. So much did he expend day after day, that his expense knew no bounds. Moreover, many traders borrowed money from him on their bonds – to the amount of eighteen crores; and the great merchant never called the money in. Furthermore, another eighteen crores of the family property, which were buried in the riverbank, were washed out to sea, when the bank was swept away by a storm; and down rolled the brazen pots, with fastenings and seals unbroken, to the bottom of the ocean. In his house, too, there was always rice standing ready for 500 monks – so that the merchant’s house was to the Saṅgha like a pool dug where four roads meet, yes, like mother and father was he to them. Therefore, even the Supreme Buddha used to go to his house, and the Eighty Chief Elders too; and the number of other monks passing in and out was beyond measure.

Now his house was seven stories high and had seven portals; and over the fourth gateway dwelt a Devatā who was a heretic. When the Supreme Buddha came into the house, she could not stay in her abode on high, but came down with her children to the ground-floor; and she had to do the same whenever the Eighty Chief Elders or the other elders came in and out. Thought she, “So long as the ascetic Gotama and his disciples keep coming into this house I can have no peace here; I can’t be eternally coming downstairs to the ground floor. I must contrive to stop them from coming any more to this house.” So one day, when the business manager had retired to rest, she appeared before him in visible shape.

“Who is that?” said he. “It is I,” was the reply, “the Devatā who lives over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “You don’t see what the merchant is doing. Heedless of his own future, he is drawing upon his resources, only to enrich the ascetic Gotama. He engages in no commerce; he undertakes no business. Advise the merchant to attend to his business, and arrange that the ascetic Gotama with his disciples shall come no more into the house.”

Then said he, “Foolish Devatā, if the merchant does spend his money, he spends it on the dispensation of the Buddha, which leads to safety. Even if he were to seize me by the hair and sell me for a slave, I will say nothing. Begone!”

Another day, she went to the merchant’s eldest son and gave him the same advice. And he flouted her in just the same manner. But to the merchant himself she did not so much as dare to speak on the matter.

Now by dint of unending munificence and of doing no business, the merchant’s incomings diminished and his estate grew less and less; so that he sank by degrees into poverty, and his table, his dress, and his bed and food were no longer what they had once been. Yet, in spite of his altered circumstances, he continued to entertain the Saṅgha, though he was no longer able to feast them. So one day when he had made his bow and taken his seat, the Teacher said to him, “Householder, are gifts being given at your house?” “Yes, sir,” said he, “but there’s only a little sour husk-porridge, left over from yesterday.” “Be not distressed, householder, at the thought that you can only offer what is unpalatable. If the heart be good, the food given to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and their disciples, cannot but be good too. And why? Because of the greatness of the fruit thereof. For he who can make his heart acceptable cannot give an unacceptable gift – as is to be testified by the following passage:

For, if the heart have faith, no gift is small To Buddhas or to their disciples true.

’Tis said no service can be reckoned small That's paid to Buddhas, lords of great renown.

Mark well what fruit rewarded that poor gift Of pottage – dried-up, sour, and lacking salt.”

Also, he said this further thing, “Householder, in giving this unpalatable gift, you are giving it to those who have entered on the Noble Eightfold Path. Whereas I, when in Velāma’s time I stirred up all Jambudīpa by giving the seven things of price, and in my largesse poured them forth as though I had made into one mighty stream the five great rivers – I yet found none who had reached the Three Refuges or kept the Five Precepts; for rare are those who are worthy of offerings. Therefore, let not your heart be troubled by the thought that your gift is unpalatable.” And so saying, he repeated the Velāmakasutta [AN 9.20].

Now that Devatā who had not dared to speak to the merchant in the days of his magnificence, thought that now he was poor he would hearken to her, and so, entering his chamber at dead of night she appeared before him in visible shape, standing in mid-air. “Who’s that?” said the merchant, when he became aware of her presence. “I am the Devatā, great merchant, who dwells over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “To give you counsel.” “Proceed, then.” “Great merchant, you take no thought for your own future or for your own children. You have expended vast sums on the dispensation of the ascetic Gotama; in fact, by long-continued expenditure and by not undertaking new business you have been brought by the ascetic Gotama to poverty. But even in your poverty you do not shake off the ascetic Gotama! The ascetics are in and out of your house this very day just the same! What they have had of you cannot be recovered. That may be taken for certain. But henceforth don’t you go yourself to the ascetic Gotama and don’t let his disciples set foot inside your house. Do not even turn to look at the ascetic Gotama but attend to your trade and traffic in order to restore the family estate.”

590 The first two lines are from the Vimānavatthu, page 44.
The Section with Three Verses – 1041

Then he said to her, “Was this the counsel you wanted to give me?” “Yes, it was.”

Said the merchant, “The One with Ten Powers has made me proof against a hundred, a thousand, yes against a hundred thousand Devatās such as you are! My faith is strong and steadfast as Mount Sineru! My substance has been expended on the dispensation that leads to safety. Wicked are your words; it is a blow aimed at the dispensation of the Buddhas by you, you wicked and impudent wretch. I cannot live under the same roof with you; be off at once from my house and seek shelter elsewhere!”

Hearing these words of that converted man and elect disciple, she could not stay, but repairing to her dwelling, took her children by the hand and went forth. But though she went, she was minded, if she could not find herself a lodging elsewhere, to appease the merchant and return to dwell in his house; and in this mind she went to the tutelary deity of the city and with due salutation stood before him. Being asked what had brought her there, she said: “My lord, I have been speaking imprudently to Anāthapiṇḍika, and he in his anger has turned me out of my home. Take me to him and make it up between us, so that he may let me live there again.” “But what was it you said to the merchant?” “I told him for the future not to support the Buddha and the Saṅgha, and not to let the ascetic Gotama set foot again in his house. This is what I said, my lord.” “Wicked were your words; it was a blow aimed at the dispensation. I cannot take you with me to the merchant.” Meeting with no support from him, she went to the Four Great Kings of the world. And being repulsed by them in the same manner, she went on to Sakka, King of Devas, and told him her story, beseeching him still more earnestly, as follows, “Deva, finding no shelter, I wander about homeless, leading my children by the hand. Grant me of your majesty some place wherein to dwell.”

And he too said to her, “You have done wickedly; it was a blow aimed at the Conqueror’s dispensation. I cannot speak to the merchant on your behalf. But I can tell you one way whereby the merchant may be led to pardon you.” “Pray tell me, Deva.” “Men have had eighteen crores of the merchant on bonds. Take the semblance of his agent, and without telling anybody repair to their houses with the bonds, in the company of some young Yakkhas. Stand in the middle of their houses with the bond in one hand and a receipt in the other, and terrify them with your Yakkha power, saying, ‘Here’s your acknowledgment of the debt. Our merchant did not move in the matter while he was affluent; but now he is poor, and you must pay up the money you owe.’ By your Yakkha power obtain all those eighteen crores of gold and fill the merchant’s empty treasuries. He had another treasure buried in the banks of the river Aciravatī, but when the bank was washed away, the treasure was swept into the sea. Get that back also by your supernatural power and store it in his treasuries. Further, there is another sum of eighteen crores lying unowned in such and such a place. Bring that too and pour the money into his empty treasuries. When you have atoned by the recovery of these fifty-four crores, ask the merchant to forgive you.” “Very good, Deva,” said she. And she set to work obediently, and did just as she had been bidden. When she had recovered all the money, she went into the merchant’s chamber at dead of night and appeared before him in visible shape standing in the air.

The merchant asking who was there, she replied, “It is I, great merchant, the blind and foolish Devatā who lived over your fourth gateway. In the greatness of my infatuate folly I knew not the virtues of a Buddha, and so came to say what I said to you some days ago. Pardon me my fault! At the instance of Sakka, King of Devas, I have made atonement by recovering the eighteen crores owing to you, the eighteen crores which had been washed down into the sea, and another eighteen crores which were lying unowned in such and such a place – making fifty-four crores in all, which I have poured into your empty treasure-chambers. The sum you expended on the monastery at Jetavana is now made up again. While I have nowhere to dwell, I am in misery. Bear not in mind what I did in my ignorant folly, great merchant, but pardon me.”
As before, the heretical spirit that lived in the gate tower of Anāthapiṇḍika’s house, doing penance, brought four and fifty crores of gold and filled the store-rooms, and became a friend of the great man. He led her before the Teacher. The Teacher discoursed to her. She heard, and entered on the First Path. Thenceforward the great man’s honour was great as before.

Now there was living in Sāvatthi a brahmin, versed in lucky marks, who thought on this wise. “Anāthapiṇḍika was poor, and then became famous. What if I make as though I went to see him, and steal his luck?” So to the house he went, and was welcomed hospitably. After exchanging civilities, the host asked why he had come. The brahmin was looking about to see where the man’s luck lay. Now Anāthapiṇḍika had a white chicken, white as a scoured shell, which he kept in a golden cage, and in the comb of this chicken lay the great man’s luck. The brahmin looked about and spied where the luck lay. “Noble sir,” said he, “I teach magic charms to five hundred young fellows. We are plagued by a chicken that crows at the wrong time. Your chicken crows at the right time. For him I have come; will you give him to me?” “Yes,” said the other: and at the instant the word was uttered, the hick left the cockscomb, and settled in a jewel put away in the pillow. The brahmin observed that the luck had gone into this jewel, and asked for it too. As soon as the owner agreed to give it, the luck left the jewel, and settled in a club for self-defence which lay upon the pillow. The brahmin saw it and asked again. “Take it, and take your leave,” said the owner; and in an instant the luck left the club, and settled on the head of the owner’s chief wife, who was named the lady Puññalakkhaṇā. The thievish brahmin thought, when he saw this, “This is an inalienable article which I cannot ask for.”

Then he told the great man, “Noble sir,” said he, “I came to your house to steal your luck. The luck was in the comb of your chicken. But when you gave me the chicken, the luck passed into this jewel; when you gave me the jewel it passed into your stick; when you gave the stick to me, it went out of it and passed into the head of the lady Puññalakkhaṇā. Surely this is inalienable, I can never get it. It is impossible to steal your luck – keep it, then!” and rising from his seat, he departed.

Anāthapiṇḍika determined to tell the Tathāgata; so he came to the monastery, and after respectfully greeting him, sat on one side, and told the Buddha all about it. The Teacher listened, and said: “Householder, now-a-days the luck of one man
In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family in the realm of Kāsi. On growing up, he was educated at Taxila, and lived among his family; but when his parents died, much distressed he retired to the life of a recluse in the Himālayas, and there he cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments.

A long time passed, and he came down to inhabited parts for salt and savouring, and took up his quarters in the gardens of the king of Benares. Next day, on his begging rounds, he came to the door of an elephant-trainer. This man took a fancy to his ways and manners, fed him, and gave him lodging in his own grounds, waiting upon him continually.

Now it happened just then that a man whose business it was to gather firewood failed to get back to town from the woods in time. He lay down for the night in a temple, placing a bundle of sticks under his head for a pillow. At this temple there were a number of chickens quite free, which had perched close by on a tree. Towards morning, one of them, who was roosting high, let fall a dropping on the back of a bird below. “Who dropped that on me?” cried this one. “I did,” cried the first. “And why?” “Didn't think,” said the other; and then did it again. Hereupon they both began to abuse each other, crying, “What power have you? what power have you?” At last the lower one said: “Anybody who kills me, and eats my flesh roasted on the coals, gets a thousand pieces of money in the morning!” And the one above answered, “Pooh, pooh, don’t boast about a little thing like that! Anybody who eats my fleshy parts will become king; if he eats my outside, he’ll become commander-in-chief or chief queen, according as he’s man or woman; if he eats the flesh by my bones, he’ll get the post of Royal Treasurer, if he be a householder; or, if a holy man, will become the king’s favourite!”

The stick-picker heard all this, and pondered. “Now if I become king, there’ll be no need of a thousand pieces of money.” Quietly he climbed the tree, caught the topmost chicken and killed him: he fastened him in a fold of his dress, saying to himself, “Now I’ll be king!” As soon as the gates were opened, in he walked. He plucked the fowl, and cleaned it, and gave it to his wife, bidding her make the meat nice for eating. She got ready the meat with some rice, and set it before him, bidding her lord eat.
“Good wife,” said he, “there’s great virtue in this meat. By eating it I shall become king, and you my queen!” So they took the meat and rice down to the Ganges bank, intending to bathe before eating it. Then, putting meat and rice down upon the bank, in they went to bathe.

Just then a breeze stirred up the water, which washed away the meat. Down the river it floated, till it came in sight of an elephant-trainer, a great personage, who was giving his elephants a bath lower down. “What have we here?” said he, and picked it up. “It’s fowl and rice, my lord,” was the reply. He bade wrap it up, and seal it, and sent it home to his wife, with a message to open it for him when he returned.

The stick-picker also ran off, with his belly puffed out with sand and water which he had swallowed.

Now a certain ascetic, who had divine vision, the favourite family priest of the elephant-trainer, was thinking to himself, “My patron friend does not leave his post with the elephants. When will he attain promotion?” As he thus pondered, he saw this man by his divine eye, and perceived what was doing. He went on before, and sat in the patron’s house.

When the master returned, {2.413} he greeted him respectfully and sat down on one side. Then, sending for the parcel, he ordered food and water to be brought for the ascetic. The ascetic did not accept the food which was offered him; but said: “I will divide this food.” The master gave him leave. Then separating the meat into portions, he gave to the elephant-trainer the fleshy parts, the outside to his wife, and took the flesh about the bones for his own share. After the meal was over, he said: “On the third day from this you will become king. Take care what you do!” and away he went.

On the third day a neighbouring king came and beleaguered Benares. The king told his elephant-trainer to dress in the royal robes, biding him go mount his elephant and fight. He himself put on a disguise, and mingled with the ranks; swift came an arrow, and pierced him, so that he perished then and there. The trainer, learning that the king was dead, sent for a great quantity of money, and beat the drum, proclaiming, “Let those who want money, advance, and fight!” The warrior host in a twinkling slew the hostile king.
The Section with Three Verses – 1046

After the king’s obsequies the courtiers deliberated who was to be [2.282] made king. They said: “While our king was yet alive, he put his royal robes upon the elephant-trainer. This very man has fought and won the kingdom. To him the kingdom shall be given!” And they consecrated him king, and his wife they made the chief queen. The Bodhisatta became his confidant.

After this discourse the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, gave utterance to the two verses following:

1. “Whatever riches they who strive amain
   Without the aid of luck can ever gain,
   All that, by favour of the goddess Luck,
   Both skilled and unskilled equally obtain.

2. All the world over many meet our sight,
   Not only good, but creatures different quite,
   Whose lot it is fruition to possess
   Of wealth in store which is not theirs by right.” [2.414]

After this the Teacher added, “Good air, these beings have no other resource but their merit won in previous births; this enables you to obtain treasures in places where there is no mine.” Then he recited the following discourse.591

“There is a treasury of all good things
   Which both to gods and men their wishes brings.
   Fine looks, voice, figure, form, and sovereignty
   With all its pomp, lies in that treasury.

   Lordship and government, imperial bliss,
   The crown of heaven, within that treasure is.
   All human happiness, the joys of heaven,
   Nibbāna’s self, from out that store is given.

   True ties of friendship, wisdom’s liberty,
   Firm self-control, lies in that treasury.
   Emancipation, understanding, training fit
   To make Paccekabuddhas come from it.

591 Khuddakapāṭha, p. 14. [i.e. Nidhikanḍasutta, Khp 8, vs 10-16.]
Thus hath this merit a virtue magical;
The wise and steadfast praise it one and all.” [2.415]

Lastly the fowl repeated the third verse, explaining the treasures in which lay the luck of Anāthapiṇḍika,

3. “A fowl, a gem, a club, a wife
All these with lucky marks were rife.
For all these treasures, be it known,
A good and sinless man did own.”

Then he identified the Jātaka, “Elder Ānanda was the king, and the family priest was the Supreme Buddha.”

Ja 285 Maṇisūkarajātaka

The Story about the Jewel and the Pigs (3s)

In the present the outside sects are struggling and try to sully the reputation of the Buddha and the Saṅgha by staging a murder and blaming it on them, before being found out, and reduced to even lower standing. The Buddha tells a story of boars who tried to sully a jewel, only to make it shine forth stronger.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa).

Present Compare: Dhp-a XXII.1 Sundarīparibbājikā.

Keywords: Slander, Blame, Animals.

“To hell shall go he.” [2.283] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about the murder of Sundarī. At that time we learn that the Bodhisatta was honoured and respected. The circumstances were the same as in the Kandhaka;592 this is an abstract of them. The Saṅgha of the Fortunate One had received gain and honour like five rivers pouring in a mighty flood; the heretics, finding that gain and honour came to them no longer, becoming dim like fireflies at sunrise, they collected together, and took counsel, “Ever since the ascetic Gotama appeared, our gain and glory has gone from us. Not a soul ever knows that we exist. Who will help us to bring reproach on Gotama, and prevent him from getting all this?”

592 This story is given in Udāna, iv. 8 (p. 43). Khandhaka seems to mean the Vinaya (Childers s. v., Journal of the Pali Text Society 1888 s. v.), but I cannot find the story there. [The text actually reads: Kandhake, which may be a misprint for Khandhake, but either way this does seem to be a mistake, as the story is not told in the Vinaya. The Burmese edition reads: ...vatthu Udāne āgatam-eva, which is correct.]

Then an idea occurred to them. “Sundarī will make us able to do it.” So when one day Sundarī visited the heretics’ grove, they gave her greeting, but said nothing more. She addressed them again and again, but received no answer. “Has anything annoyed the holy fathers?” she asked. “Why, sister,” they said, “do not you see how the ascetic Gotama annoys us, depriving us of alms and honour?” “What can I do about it?” she said. “You, sister, are fair and lovely. You can bring disgrace upon Gotama, and your words will influence a great many, and you can thus restore our gains and good repute.” She agreed, and took her leave.

After this she used to take flowers and scents and perfumes, camphor, condiments and fruits, and at evening time, when a great crowd had entered the city after hearing the Teacher’s discourse, she would set her face towards Jetavana. If any asked where she was going, she would say, “To the ascetic Gotama; I live with him in one perfumed chamber.” Then she spent the night in a heretical settlement, and in the morning entered the road which led from Jetavana into the city. If any asked her where she was going, she replied, “I have been with the ascetic Gotama in one perfumed chamber, and he made love to me.”

After the lapse of some days they hired some ruffians to kill Sundarī before Gotama’s chamber and throw her body into the dust-heap. And so they did. Then the heretics made a hue and cry after Sundarī, and informed the king. He asked where their suspicions pointed. They answered that she had gone the last few days to Jetavana, but what happened afterwards they did not know. He sent them to search for her. Acting on this permission, they took his own servants, and went to Jetavana, where they hunted about till they found her in the dust-heap. Calling for a litter, they brought the body into the town, and told the king that the disciples of Gotama had killed Sundarī, and thrown her in the dust-heap, in order to cloak the wrong of their teacher.

The king bade them scour the city. All through the streets they went, crying, “Come and see what has been done by the monastics of the Sakya prince!” and came back to the palace door. The king had placed the body of Sundarī upon a platform, and had it watched in the cemetery. All the populace, except the holy disciples, went about inside the town, outside the town, in the parks and in the woods, abusing the monks, and crying out, “Come and see what the monastics of the Sakya prince have done!” The monks told all this to the Tathāgata. Said the Teacher, “Well, go and reprove these people in these words: [2.284]
The Section with Three Verses – 1049

“To hell shall go he that delights in lies,
And he who having done a thing, denies: [2.417]
Both these, when death has carried them away,
As men of evil deeds elsewhere shall rise.”

The king directed some men to find out whether Sundarī had been killed by anybody else. Now the ruffians had drunk the blood-money, and were quarrelling together. Said one to another, “You killed Sundarī with one blow, and then threw her in the dust-heap, and here you are, buying liquor with the blood-money!” “All right, all right,” said the king’s messengers; and they caught the ruffians and dragged them before the king. “Did you kill her?” asked the king. They said: “Yes, they did.” “Who bade you?” “The heretics, my lord.” The king had the heretics summoned. “Lift up Sundarī,” said he, “and carry her round the city, crying as you go: ‘This woman Sundarī wanted to bring disgrace upon the ascetic Gotama; we had her murdered; the guilt is not Gotama’s, nor his disciples;’ the guilt is ours!’ ” They did so.

A multitude of the unconverted believed, and the heretics were kept out of mischief by receiving the punishment for murder. Thenceforward the Buddha’s reputation grew greater and greater.

And then one day they began to gossip in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, the heretics thought to blacken the Buddha, and they only blackened themselves: ever since, our gains and glory have increased!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about? They told him. “Monks,” said he, “it is impossible to make the Buddha impure. Trying to stain the Buddha, is like trying to stain a gem of the greatest brilliance. In bygone ages people have wished to stain a fine jewel, and no matter how they tried, they failed to do it.” And he told them a story.

593 Dhp v. 306; Suttanipāta, v. 661.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family. When he grew up, perceiving the suffering that arises from desire, he went away, and traversed three ranges of the Himālayas, where he became an ascetic, and lived in a hut of leaves.

Near his hut was a crystal cave, in which lived thirty boars. Near the cave a lion used to range. [2.418] His shadow used to be reflected in the crystal. The boars used to see this reflection, and terror made them lean and thin-blooded. Thought they, “We see the reflection because this crystal is clear. We will make it dirty and discolour it.” So they got some mud from a pool close by, and rubbed and rubbed the crystal with it. But the crystal, being constantly polished by the boars’ bristles, got brighter than ever.

They did not know how to manage it; so they determined to ask the ascetic how they might sully the crystal. To him therefore they came, and after respectful greeting, they sat down beside him, and gave utterance to these two verses:

1. “Seven summers we have been
    Thirty in a crystal cave.
    Now we are keen to dull the sheen –
    But dull it we can not. [2.285]

2. Though we try with all our might
    To obscure its brilliancy,
    Still more bright shines forth the light,
    What can the reason be?”

The Bodhisatta listened, then he repeated the third verse:

3. “Tis precious crystal, spotless, bright, and pure;
    No glass – its brilliancy for ever sure.
    Nothing on earth its brightness can impair.
    Boars, you had best betake yourselves elsewhere.”

And so they did, on hearing this answer. The Bodhisatta lost himself in Absorption, and became destined to the Brahmā Realm.

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time, I was the ascetic.”
The Story about (the Pig) Sālūka (3s)

In the present a monk is seduced by a sensual young woman. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of how an ox envied a pig, until he found out the pig was being fattened for slaughter, then he became satisfied with his lot.

The Bodhisatta = (the ox) Mahālohita, Ānanda = (his brother) Cullalohita,
the dissatisfied monk = (the pig) Sālūka,
the sensual girl = the same in the past (thullakumārikā).

Present Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 30 Muṇika, Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 286 Sālūka, Ja 348 Arañña, Ja 435 Haliddirāga,
Present Compare: Vin Mv 1 (1.35).

Keywords: Seduction, Dissatisfaction, Women, Animals.

“Envy not what Sālūka eats.” [2.419] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about the temptation springing from a sensual girl. The circumstances will be explained in the Cullanāradakassapa [Ja 477] story.

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about the allurements of a sensual girl.

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.” At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But

---

594 Compare No. 30, Vol. i. p. 75, and No. 477; parallels are quoted by Benfey, Pañcatantra pref. pp. 228, 229. Æsop’s fable of the Calf and the Ox will occur to the reader. See also Rhys Davids’ note to his translation of No. 30.
from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.”

So the Teacher asked this monk whether it was true he had fallen in love. Yes, he said. “With whom?” the Teacher asked. “With a sensual girl.” “That woman, monk,” said the Teacher, “is your bane; long ago, as now, you became food for the crowd through your desire to marry her.” Then at the request of the monks he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was an ox named Mahālohiṭa [Big Red], and he had a young brother called Cullalohita [Little Red]. Both of them worked for a family in some village. [2.286]

There was in this family a grown-up girl, who was asked in marriage by another family. Now in the first family a pig called Sālūka [Celery],595 was being fattened, on purpose to serve for a feast on the wedding-day; it used to sleep in a sty.596

One day, Cullalohita said to his brother, “Brother, we work for this family, and we help them to get their living. Yet they only give us grass and straw, while they feed that pig with rice porridge, and let it sleep in a sty; and what can it do for them?”

“Brother,” said Big Redcoat, “don’t covet his porridge. They want to make a feast of him on our young lady’s wedding-day, that’s why they are fattening him up. Wait a few days, and you’ll see him dragged out of his sty, killed, chopped into bits, and eaten up by the visitors.” So saying, he composed the first two verses: {2.420}

1. “Envy not what Sālūka eats;
   Deadly is the food he gets.
   Be content and eat your chaff:
   It means long life on your behalf.

---

595 Lit. edible lotus root.
596 Heṭṭhamaṇca, ‘perhaps the platform outside the house under the eaves, a favourite resort.’ Cp. Rhys Davids, Buddhist Birth Stories, p. 277.
2. By and by the guest will come,
With his gossips all and some.
All chopped up poor Sālūka
With his big flat snout will lie.”

A few days after, the wedding guests came, and Sālūka was killed and made a meal of. Both oxen, seeing what became of him, thought their own chaff was the best.

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, repeated the third verse by way of explanation:

3. “When they saw the flat-snout lie
All chopped up, ‘Poor Sālūka,’
Said the oxen, ‘Best by half
Surely is our humble chaff!’”

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the monk in question attained the fruition of the First Path. “At that time, the sensual girl was the same, the lovesick monk was Sālūka, Ānanda was Cullalohita, and I was Mahālohitā myself.”

Ja 287 Lābhagarahajātaka
The Story about the Reproach of Gains (3s)

In the present one monk speaks against the qualities one has to develop in order to get material gains. The Buddha remarks that this is not the first time he spoke like this, he did so also in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the monk who blamed (true) gains = the young brahmin (māṇava).

Keywords: Gains, Bad behaviour.

“He that hath madness.” [2.287] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a fellow monastic of the elder Sāriputta. (2.421) This monk came and greeted the elder, and sitting on one side, he asked him to tell the way in which one could get gains, and how he could get robes and the like. The elder replied, “Friend, there are four qualities which make a man successful in getting gains. He must get rid of modesty from his heart, must resign his orders, must seem to be mad even if he is not; he must speak slander; he must behave like a dancer; he must use unkind words everywhere.” Thus he explained how a man gets great gains. The monk objected to this method, and went away. The elder went to his Teacher, and told him about it. The Teacher said: “This is not the first time that this monk spoke in dispraise of gains; he did the same before,” and then, at the request of the elder, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. When he grew up to the age of sixteen years, he had already mastered the three Vedas and the eighteen accomplishments; and he became a far-famed teacher, who educated a body of five hundred young men. One young man, a youth of virtuous life, approached his teacher one day with the question, “How is it these people get gains?

The teacher answered, “My son, there are four qualities which procure gains for those people,” and he repeated the first verse:

1. “He that hath madness, he that slanders well,
That hath an actor’s tricks, ill tales does tell,
Such is the man that wins prosperity
Where all are fools: let this your maxim be.” [2.422]

The pupil, on hearing his master’s words, expressed his disapproval of gain-getting in the two following verses:

2. “Shame upon him that gain or glory wins
By dire destruction and by wicked sins.

3. With bowl in hand a homeless life I’ll lead
Rather than live in wickedness and greed.” [2.423]

Thus did the youth praise the quality of the ascetic life; and straight became an ascetic, and craved alms with righteousness, cultivating the Attainments, until he became destined to the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse he thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the monk who disapproved of gain was the young man, but his teacher was I myself.”
The Section with Three Verses – 1056

Ja 288 Macchuddānajātaka
The Story about a String of Fish (3s)

In the present one merchant tries to cheat his partner out of the proceeds of their joint partnership. When the Buddha hears of it he tells a story of how one brother tried to cheat another, and how a Devatā helped the first regain his fortune, which had been swallowed by a fish.

The Bodhisatta = the elder brother (jeṭṭhabhātā), the deceitful merchant = the younger brother (kaniṭṭhabhātā).

Present Source: Ja 98 Kūṭavāṇija, Quoted at: Ja 288 Macchuddāna.

Keywords: Cheating, Greed, Devas, Animals, Fish.

“Who could believe the story.” [2.288] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about a dishonest merchant. The circumstances have been told above.\(^{597}\)

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a cheating merchant. There were two merchants in partnership at Sāvatthi, we are told, who travelled with their merchandise and came back with the proceeds. And the cheating merchant thought to himself, “My partner has been badly fed and badly lodged for so many days past that he will die of indigestion now he has got home again and can feast to his heart’s content on dainties manifold. My plan is to divide what we have made into three portions, giving one to his orphans and keeping two for myself.” And with this object he made some excuse day by day for putting off the division of the profits.

Finding that it was in vain to press for a division, the honest partner went to the Teacher at the monastery, made his salutation, and was received kindly. “It is a very long time,” said the Buddha, “since you came last to see me.” And hereupon the merchant told the Teacher what had befallen him.

\(^{597}\) [Although not as clear as we might like, this seems to refer to Ja 98 Kūṭavāṇijajātaka, the story from which I include here.]
“This is not the first time, lay-follower,” said the Teacher, “that this man has been a cheating merchant; he was no less a cheat in times past. As he tries to defraud you now, so did he try to defraud the wise and good of other days.” So saying, at the merchant’s request, the Teacher told this story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the family of a landed proprietor.

When he grew up, he became a wealthy man. He had a young brother. Afterwards their father died. They determined to arrange some business of their father’s. This took them to a village, where they were paid a thousand pieces of money. On their way back, as they waited on a riverbank for the boat, they ate a meal out of a leaf-basket. The Bodhisatta threw what he left into the Ganges for the fishes, giving the merit to the river Devatā. The Devatā accepted this with gratification, which increased her divine power, and on thinking over this increase of her power, became aware what had happened. The Bodhisatta laid his upper garment upon the sand, and there he lay down and went to sleep.

Now the young brother was of a rather thievish nature. He wanted to filch the money from the Bodhisatta and keep it himself; so he packed a parcel of gravel to look like the parcel of money, and put them both away.

When they had got aboard, and were come to mid-river, the younger brother stumbled against the side of the boat, and dropped overboard the parcel of gravel, as he thought, but really the money.

“Monk, the money’s overboard!” he cried. “What’s to be done?” “What can we do? What’s gone is gone. Never mind about it,” replied the other.

But the river Devatā thought how pleased she had been with the merit she had received, and how her divine power had been increased, and resolved to take care of his property. So by her power she made a big-mouthed fish swallow the parcel, and took care of it herself.

When the thief got home, he chuckled over the trick he had served his brother, and undid the remaining parcel. There was nothing but gravel to be seen! His heart dried up; he fell on his bed, and clutched the bedstead. [2,289]
Now some fishermen just then cast their nets for a draught. By power of the river Devatā, this fish fell into the net. The fishermen took it to town to sell. People asked what the price was.

“A thousand pieces and seven annas,” said the fishermen. Everybody made fun of them. “We have seen a fish offered for a thousand pieces!” they laughed.

The fishermen brought their fish to the Bodhisatta’s door, and asked him to buy it. “What’s the price?” he asked. “You may have it for seven annas,” they said.

“What did you ask other people for it?” “From other people we asked a thousand rupees and seven alms; but you may have it for seven annas,” they said.

He paid seven annas for it, and sent it to his wife. She cut it open, and there was the parcel of money! She called the Bodhisatta. He gave a look, and recognising his mark, knew it for his own. He thought: “These fishermen asked other people the price of a thousand rupees and seven annas, but because the thousand rupees were mine, they let me have it for seven annas only! If a man does not understand the meaning of this, nothing will ever make him believe,” and then he repeated the first verse:

1. “Who could believe the story, were he told,
   That fishes for a thousand should be sold?
   They’re seven pence to me: how I could wish
   To buy a whole string of this kind of fish!”

When he had said this, he wondered how it was that he had recovered his money.

At the moment the river Devatā hovered invisibly in the air, and declared: “I am the spirit of the Ganges. You gave the remains of your meal to the fishes, and let me have the merit. Therefore I have taken care of your property,” and she repeated a verse:

2. “You fed the fish, and gave a gift to me.
   This I remember, and your piety.”

Then the Devatā told about the mean trick which the younger brother had played. Then she added, “There he lies, with his heart dried up within him. There is no prosperity for the cheat. But I have brought you your own, and I warn you not to lose it. Don’t give it to your young thief of a brother, but keep it all yourself.” Then she repeated the third verse:

3. “There’s no good fortune for the wicked heart,
   In Devatā’s respect he has no part;
   Who cheats his brother of paternal wealth
   And works out evil deeds by craft and stealth.” [2.290]

Thus spoke the spirit, not wishing that the treacherous villain should receive the money. But the Bodhisatta said: “That is impossible,” and all the same sent the brother five hundred.

After this discourse, the Teacher declared the Truths: at the conclusion of which the merchant entered upon the fruition of the First Path, and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the younger brother was the dishonest merchant, but the elder was I myself.”

Ja 289 Nānacchandajātaka
The Story about Various Desires (3s)

Alternative Title: Nānacchandajātaka (Cst)

In the present the Buddha is growing older and is looking for a permanent attendant to help him. All are willing, but the Buddha turns them down. Ven. Ānanda says he will do it if he is granted eight boons, and he is chosen. The Buddha then tells a story of how a poor brahmin had seen a king escape from thieves and the boons he asked for his family.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā), Ānanda = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa).

Present Source: Ja 456 Junha,
Quoted at: Ja 289 Nānacchanda.

Keywords: Recompense, Just reward.
“We live in one house.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about the venerable Ānanda’s asking for eight boons.\textsuperscript{598} The circumstances will be explained in the Juṅhajātaka [Ja 456], in the Eleventh Book. \{2.427\}

This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana about the boons received by elder Ānanda. During the twenty years of his first Buddhahood the Fortunate One’s attendants were not always the same: sometimes elder Nāgasamāla, sometimes Nāgīra, Upavāṇa, Sunakkhatta, Cunda, Sāgala, sometimes Meghiya waited upon the Fortunate One. One day the Fortunate One said to the monks, “Now I am old, monks: and when I say, ‘Let us go in this way,’ some of the Saṅgha go by another way, some drop my bowl and robe on the ground. Choose out one monk to attend always upon me.”

Then they all rose up, beginning with elder Sāriputta, and laid their joined hands to their heads, crying, “I will serve you, sir, I will serve you!” But he refused them, saying: “Your prayer is forestalled! Enough.” Then the monks said to the elder Ānanda, “Do you, friend, ask for the post of attendant.” The elder said: “If the Fortunate One will not give me the robe which he himself has received, if he will not give me his dole of food, if he will not grant me to dwell in the same fragrant cell, if he will not have me with him to go where he is invited; but if the Fortunate One will go with me where I am invited, if I shall be granted to introduce the company at the moment of coming, which comes from foreign parts and foreign countries to see the Fortunate One, if I shall be granted to approach the Fortunate One as soon as doubt shall arise, if whenever the Fortunate One shall discourse in my absence he will repeat his discourse to me as soon as I shall return: then I will attend upon the Fortunate One.” These eight boons he craved, four negative and four positive. And the Fortunate One granted them to him.

After that he attended continually upon his Teacher for five and twenty years. So having obtained the preeminence in the five points, and having gained seven blessings - blessing of Dhamma, blessing of instruction, blessing of the knowledge of causes, blessing of inquiry as to one’s good, blessing of dwelling in a holy place, blessing of enlightened devotion, blessing of potential Buddhahood - in the presence of the Buddha he received the heritage of eight boons, and became famous in the Buddha’s dispensation, and shone as the moon in the heavens.

\textsuperscript{598} [Mistranslated in the original as “...taking a valuable article.”]

One day they began to talk about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, the Tathāgata has satisfied elder Ānanda by granting his boons.” The Teacher entered, and asked, “What are you speaking of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. Then he said: “It is not now the first time, monks, but in former days as now I satisfied Ānanda with a boon; in former days, as now, whatsoever he asked, I gave him.” And so saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his queen consort. He grew up, and was educated at Taxila; and became king on his father’s death. There was a family priest of his father’s who had been removed from his post, and being very poor lived in an old house.

One night it happened that the king was walking about the city in disguise, to explore it. Some thieves, their work done, had been drinking in a wine-shop, and were carrying some more liquor home in a jar. They spied him there in the street, and crying, “Halloo, who are you?” they knocked him down, and took his upper robe; then, they picked up their jar, and off they went, scaring him the while.

The aforesaid brahmin chanced at the time to be in the street observing the constellations. He saw how the king had fallen into unfriendly hands, and called to his wife; quickly she came, asking what it was. Said he, 599 “Wife, our king has got into the hands of his enemies!” “Why, [2.291] your reverence,” said she, “what dealings have you with the king? His brahmans will see to it.” This the king heard, and, going on a little, called out to the rascals, “I’m a poor man, masters – take my robe and let me go!” As he said this again and again, they let him go out of pity. He took note of the place they lived in, and turned back again.

Said the brahmin to his wife, “Wife, our king has got away from the hands of his enemies!” The king heard this as before; and entered his palace.

When dawn came, the king summoned his brahmans, and asked then a question. “Have you been taking observations?” “Yes, my lord.”

599 sā is a mistake for so.
“Was it lucky or unlucky?” “Lucky, my lord.”

“No eclipse?” “No, my lord, none.”

Said the king, “Go and fetch me the brahmin from such and such a house,” giving them directions.

So they fetched the old family priest, and the king proceeded to question him.

{2.428} “Did you take observations last night, master?” “Yes, my lord, I did.”

“Was there any eclipse?” “Yes, my lord: last night you fell into the hands of your enemies, and in a moment you got free again.”

The king said: “That is the kind of man a star-gazer ought to be.” He dismissed the other brahmans; he told the old one that he was pleased with him, and bade him ask a boon. The man asked leave to consult with his family, and the king allowed him.

The man summoned wife and son, daughter-in-law and maidservant, and laid the matter before them. “The king has granted me a boon; what shall I ask?”

Said the wife, “Get me a hundred milch kine.”

The son, named Chatta, said: “For me, a chariot drawn by fine lily-white thoroughbreds.”

Then the daughter-in-law, “For me, all manner of trinkets, earrings set with gems, and so forth!”

And the maidservant, whose name was Puṇṇā, “For me, a pestle and mortar, and a winnowing basket.”

The brahmin himself wanted to have the revenue of a village as his boon. So when he returned to the king, and the king wanted to know whether his wife had been asked, the brahmin replied, “Yes, my lord [2.292] king; but those who are asked are not all of one mind,” and he repeated a couple of verses:

1. “We live in one house, O king,
   But we don’t all want the same thing.
   My wife’s wish – a hundred kine;
   A prosperous village is mine;
2. The student’s of course is a carriage and horses,
   Our girl wants an earring fine.
   While poor little Puṇṇā, the maid,
   Wants pestle and mortar, she said!”

“All right,” said the king, “they shall all have what they want,” and repeated the remaining lines: [2.429]

3. “Give a hundred kine to the wife,
   To the brahmin a village for life,
   And a jewelled earring to the daughter:
   A carriage and pair be the student's share,
   And the maid gets her pestle and mortar.”

Thus the king gave the brahmin what he wished, and great honour besides; and bidding him thenceforward busy himself about the king’s business, he kept the brahmin in attendance upon himself.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the brahmin was Ānanda, but the king was I myself.”

Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsajātaka
The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue (3s)

Alternative Title: Sīlavīmaṁsakajātaka (Cst)

In the present a brahmin seeks to find out if the king favours him for his birth, or for his goodness, so he starts stealing a penny a day from the king. When the king finds out he decides to punish him, until the brahmin explains his actions. The Buddha tells a story of similar happenings in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin priest who measured his own virtue (sīlavīmaṁsako purohito brāhmaṇo).

Present Source: Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsa,
Quoted at: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsana, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsa,

I hope the indulgent reader will pardon the rime.
Past Compare: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsana, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsana, Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsana, Ja 362 Sīlavīmaṁsana.

Keywords: Honour, Virtue.

“Virtue is lovely.” This story the Teacher told at Jātavāna, about a brahmin who put his reputation to the test. The circumstances which gave rise to it, and the story itself, are both given in the Sīlavīmaṁsajātaka [Ja 86], in the First Book.

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jātavāna, about a brahmin who put to the test his reputation for virtue. This brahmin, who was maintained by the king of Kosala, had sought the Three Refuges; he kept the Five Precepts, and was versed in the Three Vedas. “This is a virtuous man,” thought the king, and showed him great honour. But that brahmin thought to himself, “The king shows honour to me beyond other brahmans, and has manifested his great regard by making me his spiritual director. But is his favour due to my virtue or only to my birth, lineage, family, country and accomplishments? I must clear this up without delay.”

Accordingly, one day when he was leaving the palace, he took without permission a coin from a treasurer’s counter, and went his way. Such was the treasurer’s veneration for the brahmin that he sat perfectly still and said not a word. Next day the brahmin took two coins; but still the official made no remonstrance. The third day the brahmin took a whole handful of coins. “This is the third day,” cried the treasurer, “that you have robbed his majesty,” and he shouted out three times, “I have caught the thief who robs the treasury.” In rushed a crowd of people from every side, crying, “Ah, you’ve long been posing as a model of virtue.” And dealing him two or three blows, they led him before the king. In great sorrow the king said to him, “What led you, brahmin, to do so wicked a thing?” And he gave orders, saying: “Off with him to punishment.” “I am no thief, sire,” said the brahmin. “Then why did you take money from the treasury?” “Because you showed me such great honour, sire, and because I made up my mind to find out whether that honour was paid to my birth and the like or only to my virtue. That was my motive, and now I know for certain (inasmuch as you order me off to punishment) that it was my virtue and not my birth and other advantages, that won me your majesty’s favour.
Virtue I know to be the chief and supreme good; I know too that to virtue I can never attain in this life, while I remain a layman, living in the midst of sensual pleasures. Wherefore, this very day I would willingly go to the Teacher at Jetavana and renounce the world for the Saṅgha. Grant me your leave, sire.” The king consenting, the brahmin set out for Jetavana. His friends and relations in a body tried to turn him from his purpose, but, finding their efforts of no avail, left him alone.

He came to the Teacher and asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha. After admission to the lower and higher ordination, he won by application insight and became an Arahat, whereon he drew near to the Teacher, saying: “Sir, my joining the Saṅgha has borne the Supreme Fruit,” thereby signifying that he had became an Arahat.

Hearing of this, the monks, assembling in the Dhamma Hall, spoke with one another of the virtues of the king’s family priest who tested his own reputation for virtue and who, leaving the king, had now risen to be an Arahat. Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked what the monks were discussing, and they told him. “Not without a precedent, monks,” said he, “is the action of this brahmin in putting to the test his reputation for virtue and in working out his safety after renouncing the world. The like was done by the wise and good of bygone days as well.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, his family priest resolved to test his own reputation for virtue, and on two days abstracted a coin from the treasurer’s counter. On the third day they dragged him to the king, and accused him of theft. On the way he noticed some snake-charmers making a snake dance. The king asked him what he had done such a thing for. The brahmin replied, “To try my reputation for virtue,” and went on

1. “Virtue is lovely – so the people deem – Virtue in all the world is held supreme.
Behold! This deadly snake they do not slay,
‘For he is virtuous,’ they say. (2.430)

2. Here I proclaim how virtue is all-blessed
And lovely in the world: whereof possessed
He that is virtuous evermore is said
Along perfection’s path to tread.
3. To kinsfolk dear, he shines among his friends;
And when his union with the body ends,
He that to practise virtue has been fain
In heaven will be born again."

Having thus in three verses declared the beauty of virtue and discoursed to them, the Bodhisatta went on, “Great king, a great deal has been given to you by my family, my father’s property, my mother’s, and what I have gained myself: there is no end to it. But I took these coins from the treasury to try my own virtue. Now I see how worthless in this world is birth and lineage, blood and family, and how much the best is virtue. I will embrace the ascetic life; allow me to do so!” After many entreaties, the king at last consented. He left the world, and retired to the Himālayas, where he took to the ascetic life, and cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments until he came to the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the brahmin family priest who tried his reputation for virtue was I myself.”

Ja 291 Bhadraghaṭajātaka

The Story about the Lucky Cup (3s)

Alternative Title: Surāghaṭajātaka (Cst)

In the present a nephew of Anāthapiṇḍika’s loses all the money ever given to him, and dies in a sorry state. The Buddha tells a story of a past life in which the same person had been given a lucky cup by Sakka, but had been careless and broken it, and died in poverty.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, (Anāthapiṇḍika’s) nephew = the scoundrel who broke the liquor cup (surāghaṭabhedakadhutto).

Keywords: Never-do-well, Fortune.

“A ne'er-do-well did once.” {2.431} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a nephew of Anāthapiṇḍika. This person had squandered an inheritance of forty crores of gold. Then he visited his uncle, who gave him a thousand, and bade him trade with it. The man squandered this, and then came again; and [2.294] once more he was given five hundred. Having squandered this like the rest, next time his uncle gave him two coarse garments; and when he had worn these out, and once more applied, his uncle had him taken by the neck and turned out of doors.
The fellow was helpless, and fell down by a side-wall and died. They dragged him outside and threw him down there. Anāthapiṇḍika went and told the Tathāgata what had happened to his nephew. Said the Teacher, “How could you expect to satisfy the man whom I long ago failed to satisfy, even when I gave him the Wishing Cup?” At his request, he proceeded to tell him a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a rich merchant’s son; and after his father’s death, took his place. In his house was buried a treasure of four hundred million. He had an only son. The Bodhisatta gave alms and did good until he died, and then he came to life again as Sakka, King of the Devas. His son proceeded to make a pavilion across the road, and sat down with many friends round him, to drink. He paid a thousand pieces to runners and tumblers, singers and dancers, and passed his time in drinking, gluttony, and debauchery; he wandered about, asking only for song, music, and dancing, devoted to his boon-companions, sunk in sloth. So in a short time he squandered all his treasure of four hundred millions, all his property, goods, and furniture, and got so poor and miserable that he had to go about clad in rags.

Sakka, as he meditated, became aware how poor he was. Overcome with love for his son, he gave him a Wishing Cup, with these words, “Son, take care not to break this cup. So long as you keep it, your wealth will never come to an end. So take good care of it!” and then he returned to heaven.

After that the man did nothing but drink out of it. One day, he was drunk, and threw the cup into the air, catching it as it fell. But once he missed it. Down it fell upon the earth, and smashed! Then he got poor again, and went about in rags, begging, bowl in hand, till at last he lay down by a wall, and died.

When the Teacher had finished this tale, he went on:

1. “A ne’er-do-well did once a bowl acquire,
A bowl that gave hire all his heart’s desire.
And of this bowl so long as he took care,
His fortunes were all fair.
2. When, proud and drunken, in a careless hour,
   He broke the bowl that gave him all this power, Naked, poor fool! In rags and tatters, he Fell in great misery. [2.295]

3. Not otherwise whoso great fortune owes,
   But in the enjoying it no measure knows,
   Is scorched anon, even as the cheat – poor soul!
   That broke his Wishing Bowl.”

He repeated these verses after Fully Awakening

Then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Anāthapiṇḍika’s nephew was the rascal who broke the Lucky Cup, but I myself was Sakka.”

Ja 292 Supattajātaka

The Story about (the Crow) Supatta (3s)

In the present Rāhula’s mother, after ordaining falls ill. Ven. Rāhula asks what is to be done, and she asks for mango juice, which Ven. Sāriputta then brings for her and which cures her. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who was willing to lay down his life to get his queen some fish from the king of Benares’ table. And how the king praised and rewarded him for his valour.

The Bodhisatta = (the crow) Supatta,
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Rāhulamātā = (his wife) Suphassā,
Sāriputta = the good looking general (sumukho senāpati).

Present Source: Ja 281 Abbhantara,
Quoted at: Ja 292 Supatta,
Past Compare: Mvu iii p 153 Kāka.

Keywords: Heroism, Sacrifice, Animals, Birds.

“Here, in Benares city.” [2.433] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a meal of rice mixed with new ghee, with red fish to flavour it, which was given by elder Sāriputta to Bimbādevī. The circumstances are like those given above in the Abbhantarajātaka [Ja 281].
When the Supreme Buddha inaugurated the universal reign of the dispensation, while living in a room at Vesāli, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, along with five hundred of the Sākiya clan, asked for initiation, and received initiation and full orders. Afterwards the five hundred nuns became Arahats on hearing the preaching of Nandaka. But when the Teacher was living near Sāvatthi, the mother of Rāhula thought to herself, “My husband on embracing the ascetic life has become omniscient; my son too has become an ascetic, and lives with him. What am I to do in the midst of the house? I will enter on this life, and go to Sāvatthi, and I will live looking upon the Supreme Buddha and my son continually.” So she betook herself to a nunnery, and entered the order, and went and lived in a cell at Sāvatthi, in company of her teachers and preceptors, beholding the Teacher and her beloved son. The novice Rāhula came and saw his mother.

Here too the holy nun had a pain in the stomach. The excellent Rāhula told the elder. He seated Rāhula in his waiting-room, and went to the king to get the rice, red fish and new ghee. The lad gave it to the holy nun, his mother. No sooner had she eaten than the pain subsided. The king sent messengers to make enquiries, and after that always sent her that kind of food.

One day they began to talk about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, the Captain of the Dhamma satisfied the nun with such and such food.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about: they told him. Said he, “This is not the first time, monk, that Sāriputta has given Rāhula’s mother what she wanted; he did the same before.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadattha was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a crow. He grew up, and became chief of eighty thousand crows, a crow king, by name, Supatta [Fairwing]; and his chief mate went by the name of Suphassā [Softie], his chief captain was called Sumukho [Prettybeak]. With his eighty thousand subjects, he dwelt nearby Benares.

One day he and his mate in search of food passed over the king’s kitchen. The king’s cook had been preparing a host of dishes, of all sorts of fish, and he had uncovered the dishes for a moment, to cool them. Queen crow smelt the odour of the food, and longed for a bit. But that day she said nothing. [2.296]

However the next day, when king crow proposed that they should go feeding, she said: “Go by yourself: there’s something I want very much!”
“What is it?” asked he.

“I want some of the king’s food to eat: \{2.434\} and as I can’t get it, I am going to die.”

The crow sat down to think. Sumukho approached him and asked if anything had displeased him. King crow told him what it was. “Oh, that’ll be all right,” said the captain; and added, to console them both, “you stay where you are today, and I’ll fetch the meat.”

So he gathered the crows together, and told them the matter. “Now come, and let’s get it!” said he; and off they all flew together to Benares. He posted them in companies here and there, near the kitchen to watch; and he, with eight champions, sat on the kitchen roof. While waiting for the king’s food to be served, he gave his directions to these, “When the food is taken up, I’ll make the man drop the dishes. Once that is done there’s an end of me. So four of you must fill your mouths with the rice, and four with the fish, and feed our royal pair with them; and if they ask where I am, say I’m coming.”

Well, the cook got his various dishes all ready, hung them on a balance-pole, and went off towards the king’s rooms. As he passed through the court, the crow captain with a signal to his followers flew and settled upon the carrier’s chest, struck him with extended claws, with his beak, sharp as a spear-point, pecked the end of the man’s nose, and with his two feet stopped up his jaws.

The king was walking up and down upon an upper floor, when looking out of a large window he saw what the crow was doing. He hailed the carrier, “Hello you, down with the dishes and catch the crow!” so the man dropped the dishes and caught the crow tight.

“Come here!” cried the king. Then the crows ate all they wanted, \{2.435\} and picked up the rest as they had been told, and carried it off. Next all the others flocked up, and ate what remained. The eight champions gave it to their king and queen to eat. The craving of Suphassā was appeased.

The servant who was carrying the dinner brought his crow to the king.
“O crow!” said he, “you have shown no respect for me! You have broken my servitor’s nose! You have smashed my dishes! You have recklessly thrown away your life! What made you do such things?”

Answered the crow, “O great king! Our king lives near Benares, and I am captain of his forces. His wife, whose name is Suphassā, conceived a great longing, and wanted a taste of your food. Our king told me what she craved. At once I devoted my life. Now I have sent her the food; [2.297] my desire is accomplished. This is the reason why I acted as I did.” And to explain the matter, he said:

1. “Here in Benares city, O great king,
   There dwells a king of Crows called Supatta;
   Who was attended by a following
   Of eighty thousand crows.

2. Suphassā, his mate, had one o’ermastering wish:
   She craved a supper of the king’s own fish,
   Fresh caught, cooked in his kitchen – such a dish
   As to kings’ tables goes.

3. You now behold me as their messenger;
   It was my royal master sent me here;
   And for that I my monarch do revere
   I wounded that man’s nose.” (2.436)

When the king heard this, he said: “We do great honour to men, and yet cannot make friends of them. Even though we make presents of such things as a whole village, we can find no one willing to give his life for us. But this creature, crow as he is, sacrifices his life for his king. He is very noble, sweet-speaking, and good.” He was so pleased with the crow’s good qualities that he did him the honour of giving him a white umbrella. But the crow saluted the king with this, his own gift, and spoke about the virtues of Supatta. The king sent for him, and heard his teaching, and sent them both food of the same sort as he ate himself; and for the rest of the crows he had cooked each day a large measure of rice. He himself walked according to the admonition of the Bodhisatta, and protecting all creatures, practised virtue. The admonitions of Supatta the crow were remembered for seven hundred years.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was Ānanda, the captain was Sāriputta, but Supatta was I myself.”

Ja 293 Kāyavicchindajātaka
The Story about cutting off the Body (3s)

Alternative Title: Kāyanibbindajātaka (Cst)

In the present one man falls ill and vows if he ever recovers he will become a monk, which he did, and he soon attained Arahatship. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past in which a man recovering from illness had become an ascetic.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa).

Keywords: Dedication, Truth seeking.

“Down smitten with a direful illness.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about a certain man. We learn that there lived at Sāvatthi a man tormented by jaundice, given up by the doctors as a hopeless case. His wife and son wondered who could be found to cure him. The man thought: “If I can only get rid of this disease, I will take to the ascetic life.” Now it happened that some days after he took something that did him good, and got well. Then he went to Jetavana, and asked admission into the Saṅgha. He received the lower and higher ordination from the Teacher, and before long became an Arahat. One day after this the monks were talking together in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, So and so had jaundice, and vowed that if he got well he would embrace the ascetic life; he did so, and now he has became an Arahat.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about, sitting there together. They told him. Then he said: “Monks, this is not the only man who has done so. Long ago wise men, recovering from sickness, embraced an ascetic life, and secured their own advantage.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. He grew up, and began to amass wealth: but he fell sick of the jaundice. Even the physicians could do nothing for him, and his wife and family were in despair. He resolved that if he ever got well, he would embrace the ascetic life; and having taken something that did him good, he did get well, whereupon he went away to the Himālayas and became an ascetic. He cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and dwelt in happiness of Absorption. “All this time,” he thought: “I have been without this great happiness!” and he uttered this exalted utterance:

1. “Down smitten with a direful illness, I
In utter torment and affliction lie,
My body quickly withers, like a flower
Laid in the sun upon the dust to dry.

2. The noble seems ignoble, and pure the impure seems,
He that is blind, all beautiful a sink of foulness deems.

3. Shame on that sickly body, shame, I say,
Loathsome, impure, and full of foul decay!
When fools are indolent, they fail to win
New birth in heaven, and wander from the way.” {2.438}

Thus did the Great Being describe in various ways the nature of impurity and constant disease, and being disgusted with the body and all its parts, cultivated all his life the four Divine Abidings, till he went to the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he proclaimed the Truths, and identified the Jātaka – many were they who attained the fruition of the First Path, and so forth. “At that time I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 294 Jambukhādakajātaka

The Story about eating Jambu Plums (3s)

In the present Devadatta goes round praising his disciple and the disciple praises Devadatta in return, all to seek gains from the layfolk. The Buddha tells a story of a jackal who, wanting a fruit, praised a crow, and how they were scared away.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
Kokālika = the crow (kāka),
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 294 Jambukhādaka,
Quoted at: Ja 295 Anta.

---

601 Compare Æsop’s fable of the Fox and the Crow.
Keywords: Deceit, Self-praise, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Who is it sits.” [2.299] This story the Teacher told at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta and Kokālika. At the time when Devadatta began to lose his gains and his repute, Kokālika went from house to house, saying: “Elder Devadatta is born of the line of the first great king, of the royal stock of Okkāka, by an uninterrupted noble descent, versed in all the scriptures, having attained Absorption, sweet of speech, a preacher of the Dhamma. Give to the elder, help him!” In these words he praised Devadatta.

On the other hand, Devadatta praised Kokālika, in such words as these, “Kokālika comes from a northern brahmin family; he follows the ascetic life; he is learned in Dhamma, a preacher of the Dhamma. Give to Kokālika, help him!” So they went about, praising each other, and getting fed in different houses.

One day the monks began to talk about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, Devadatta and Kokālika go about praising each other for virtues which they haven’t got, and so getting food.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about as they sat there. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time that these men have got food by praising each other. Long ago they did the same,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Tree Devatā in a certain Jambu plum grove. [2.439] A crow perched upon a branch of his tree, and began to eat the fruit. Then came a jackal, and looked up and spied the crow. He thought: “If I flatter this creature, perhaps I shall get some of the fruit to eat!” So in flattery he repeated the first verse:

1. “Who is it sits in a Jambu plum tree –
Sweet singer! Whose voice trickles gently to me?
Like a young peacock she coos with soft grace,
And ever sits still in her place.”

The crow, in his praise, responded with the second:

---

602 A fabulous king, the same as Ikshvāku. See refs. in Journal of the Pali Text Society 1888, p. 17.
2. “He that is noble in breeding and birth
Can praise others’ breeding, knows what they are worth.
Like a young tiger you seemest to be:
Come, eat, sir, what I give to thee!”

With these words she shook the branch and made some fruit drop. [2.300]

Then the Devatā of the tree, beholding these two eating, after flattering each other, repeated the third verse:

3. “Liars foregather, I very well know.
Here, for example, a carrion crow,
And corpse-eating jackal, with puerile chatter
Proceed one another to flatter!”

After repeating this verse, the Tree Devatā, assuming a fearful shape, scared them both away.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he summed up the Jātaka, “At that time the jackal was Devadatta, the crow was Kokālika, but the spirit of the Tree was I myself.”

Ja 295 Antajātaka
The Story about those that are Inferior (3s)

In the present Devadatta goes round praising his disciple and the disciple praises Devadatta in return, all to seek gains from the layfolk. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who, wanting some meat, praised a jackal, who praised her in return.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
Kokālika = the crow (kāka),
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 294 Jambukhādaka,
Quoted at: Ja 295 Anta.

Keywords: Deceit, Self-praise, Devas, Animals, Birds.
“Like to a bull.” [2.440] This is another story told by the Teacher in the same place and about the same people. The circumstances are the same as before.\(^{603}\)

This story the Teacher told at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta and Kokālika. At the time when Devadatta began to lose his gains and his repute, Kokālika went from house to house, saying: “Elder Devadatta is born of the line of the first great king, of the royal stock of Okkāka, by an uninterrupted noble descent, versed in all the scriptures, having attained Absorption, sweet of speech, a preacher of the Dhamma. Give to the elder, help him!” In these words he praised Devadatta.

On the other hand, Devadatta praised Kokālika, in such words as these, “Kokālika comes from a northern brahmin family; he follows the ascetic life; he is learned in Dhamma, a preacher of the Dhamma. Give to Kokālika, help him!” So they went about, praising each other, and getting fed in different houses.

One day the monks began to talk about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, Devadatta and Kokālika go about praising each other for virtues which they haven’t got, and so getting food.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about as they sat there. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time that these men have got food by praising each other. Long ago they did the same,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became the spirit of a castor-oil tree which stood in the approach to a certain village. An old ox died in a certain village; and they dragged the carcase out and threw it down in the grove of these trees by the village gate. A jackal came and began to eat its flesh. Then came a crow, and perched upon the tree. When she saw the jackal, she cast about whether by flattery she could not get some of this carcase to eat. And so she repeated the first verse:

---

\(^{603}\) [See Ja 294 Jambukhādakajātaka. I include the story here.]
1. “Like to a bull your body seems to be,
Like to a lion your activity.
O king of beasts! All glory be to you!
Please don’t forget to leave a bit for me.” [2.301]

On hearing this the jackal repeated the second:

2. “They that of gentle birth and breeding be
Know how to praise the gentle worthily,
O crow, whose neck is like the peacock’s neck,
Come down from off the tree and take a peck!”

The Tree Devatā, on seeing this, repeated the third:

3. “The lowest of all beasts the jackal is,
The crow truly lowest of all birds is,
The Castor-oil of trees the lowest tree:
And now these lowest things are here all three!” [2.441]

When the Teacher had ended this discourse he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the jackal, Kokālika was the crow, but the Tree Devatā was I myself.

Ja 296 Samuddajātaka

The Story about the Sea (3s)

In the present one monk is very greedy, and even talks other monks out of their property so he can increase his. The Buddha tells a story of a cormorant who flew over the sea warning everyone not to use it up, until driven away by a Sea Devatā.

The Bodhisatta = the Devatā (Devatā),
Upananda = the cormorant (samuddakāka).

Keywords: Greed, Ignorance, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Over the salt sea wave.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about elder Upananda. This man was a great eater and drinker; there was no satisfying him even with cartloads of provisions. During the rainy season he would pass his time at two or three different settlements, leaving his shoes in one, his walking-stick in another, and his water jar in a third, and one he lived in himself. When he visited a country monastery, and saw the monks with their requisites all ready, he began to talk about the four classes of contented ascetics; laid hold of their garments, and made them pick up rags from the dust-heap; made them take earthen bowls, and give him any bowls that he fancied and their metal bowls; then he filled a cart with them, and carried them off to Jetavana.

One day people began to talk in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, Upananda of the Sakka clan, a great eater, a greedy fellow, has been preaching the dispensation to other people, and here he comes with a cartful of monastics’ property!” The Teacher came in, and wanted to know what they were talking of as they sat there. They told him. “Monks,” said he, “Upananda has gone wrong before by talking about this contentment. But a man ought first of all to become modest in his desires, before praising the good behaviour of other people.

Yourself first establish in propriety,

Then teach; the wise should not self-seeking be. [2.302]

Pointing out this verse from the Dhammapada [Dhp 158], and blaming Upananda, he went on, “This is not the first time, monks, that Upananda has been greedy. Long ago, he thought even the water in the ocean ought to be saved.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Sea Devatā. Now it so happened that a cormorant was passing over the sea. He went flying about, and trying to check the shoals of fish and flocks of birds, crying, “Don’t drink too much of the sea-water! Be careful of it!” [2.442]

On seeing him, the Sea Devatā repeated the first verse:

1. “Over the salt sea wave who flies?
   Who checks the shoals of fish, and tries
   The monsters of the deep to stay
   Lest all the sea be drunk away?”

The water-crow heard this, and answered with the second verse:

---

604 See Childers, p. 56 b. The recluse who is contented with the robes presented to him, with the food, with the bedding, and he who delights in meditation.
2. “A drinker never satisfied
   So people call me the world wide,
   To drink the sea I fain would try,
   And drain the lord of rivers dry.”

On hearing which the sea-spirit repeated the third:

3. “The ocean ever ebbs away,
   And fills again the self-same day.
   Who ever knew the sea to fail?
   To drink it up can none avail!”

With these words the Devatā assumed a terrible shape and frightened the cormorant away.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Upananda was the cormorant, but the Devatā was I myself.”

Ja 297 Kāmavilāpajātaka
The Story about Idle Talk concerning Sensuality (3s)

In the present one monk is overcome by passion and wishes to return to the lay life. The Buddha tells a story of one man who was impaled and the message he sent back to his wife expressing his longing and passing his wealth to her.

The Bodhisatta = the Deva who witnessed the deed (Devaputtena taṁ kāraṇāṁ diṭṭhaṁ), the wife = the same in the past (bhariyā).

Present and Past Source: Ja 147 Puppharatta, Quoted at: Ja 297 Kāmavilāpa.

Keywords: Desire, Devas, Attachment.

“O bird, that fliest.” [2.443] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a man who pined for his former wife. The circumstances which called it forth are.⁶⁰⁵ explained in the Puppharattajātaka [Ja 147], and a story of the past in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423].

⁶⁰⁵ Reading kathitaṁ.

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who was overcome by passion. Being questioned by the Teacher, he admitted his frailty, explaining that he longed for the wife of his mundane life, “For, oh sir!” said he, “she is so sweet a woman that I cannot live without her.”

“Monk,” said the Teacher, “she is harmful to you. She it was that in former days was the means whereby you were impaled on a stake; and it was for bewailing her at your death that you were reborn in hell. Why then do you now long after her?” And so saying, he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born an Air Devatā. Now in Benares there was held the night-festival of Kattikā; the city was decorated like a city of the gods, and the whole people kept holiday. And a poor man had only a couple of coarse cloths which he had washed and pressed till they were in a hundred, nay, a thousand creases. But his wife said: “My husband, I want a safflower-coloured cloth to wear outside and one to wear underneath, as I go about at the festival hanging round your neck.”

“How are poor people like us to get safflowers?” said he. “Put on your nice clean attire and come along.”

“If I can’t have them dyed with safflower, I don’t want to go at all,” said his wife. “Get some other woman to go to the festival with you.”

“Now why torment me like this? How are we to get safflowers?”

“Where there’s a will, there’s a way,” retorted the woman. “Are there no safflowers in the king’s conservatories?”

“Wife,” said he, “the king’s conservatories are like a pool haunted by a Rakkhasa. There’s no getting in there, with such a strong guard on the watch. Give over this fancy, and be content with what you’ve got.”

---

[The only story that fits is not from Ja 423, but from Ja 147, which is also used for the Introduction. I include it here.]
“But when it’s night-time and dark,” said she, “what’s to stop a man’s going where he pleases?”

As she persisted in her entreaties, his love for her at last made him give way and promise she should have her wish. At the hazard of his own life, he sallied out of the city by night and got into the conservatories by breaking down the fence. The noise he made in breaking the fence roused the guard, who turned out to catch the thief. They soon caught him and with blows and curses put him in fetters. In the morning he was brought before the king, who promptly ordered him to be impaled alive. Off he was hauled, with his hands tied behind his back, and led out of the city to execution to the sound of the execution-drum, and was impaled alive.

The man was impaled alive. As he hung there, he looked up and saw a crow flying through the air; and, thinking nothing of the bitter pain, he hailed the crow, to send a message to his dear wife, repeating these verses following:

1. “O bird, that fliest in the sky!
   O winged bird, that fliest high!
   Tell my wife, with thighs so fair:
   Long will seem the time to her.

2. She knows not sword and spear are set:
   Full wroth and angry she will fret.
   That is my torment and my fear,
   And not that I am hanging here.

3. My lotus-mail I have put by,
   And jewels in my pillow lie,
   And soft Benares cloth beside.
   With wealth let her be satisfied.” {2.444}

With these lamentations, he died.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths, the lovesick monk attained the fruition of the First Path. “The wife then was the wife now; but the Devaputta who saw this, was I myself.”
The Section with Three Verses – 1082

Ja 298 Udumbarajātaka

The Story about the Figs (3s)

In the present one monk finds a nice hermitage and succeeds in forcing the resident monk out of it and taking it over. The Buddha tells a story of a monkey who tempted another to leave his cave, and then took it over for himself.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the visitor = the big black monkey (kāḷamahāmakkaṭa),
the resident = the small monkey (khuddakamakkaṭa).

Keywords: Greed, Trickery, Devas, Animals.

“Ripe are the figs.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain monk, who had made a hermitage to live in at a certain village on the frontier. This delightful dwelling stood upon a flat rock; a little well-swept spot, with enough water to make it pleasant, a village close at hand to go your rounds in, and friendly people to give food. A monk on his rounds arrived at this place. The elder who lived in it did the duties of host to the new arrival, and next day took him along with him for his rounds. The people gave him food, and invited him to visit them again next day.

After the newcomer had thus fared a few days, he meditated by what means he could oust the other and get hold of the hermitage. Once when he had come to wait upon the elder, he asked, “Have you ever visited the Buddha, friend?” “Why no, sir; there’s no one here to look after my hut, or I should have gone before.” “Oh, I'll look after it while you are gone to visit the Buddha,” said the newcomer; and so the owner went, after laying injunctions upon the villagers to take care of the holy monk until his return. The newcomer proceeded to backbite his host, and hinted to the villagers all sorts of faults in him. The other visited his Teacher, and returned; but the newcomer refused him harbourage. He found a place to abide in, and next day went on his rounds in the village. But the villagers would not do their duty by him. He was much discouraged, and went back to Jetavana, where he told the monks all about it.

---

607 Reading āgantvā (which is surely right).
They began to discuss the matter in their Dhamma Hall, “Friend, monk So-and-so has turned monk So-and-so out of his hermitage, and taken it for himself!” The Teacher came in, and wanted to know what they were discussing as they sat there. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time that this man turned the other out of his dwelling,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Tree Devatā in the woods. At that time during the rainy season rain used to pour down seven days on a stretch. A certain small red-faced monkey lived in a rock-cave sheltered from the rain. One day he was sitting at the mouth of it, in the dry, quite happy. As he sat there, a big black-faced monkey, wet through, perishing with cold, spied him. “How can I get that fellow out, and live in his hole?” he wondered. Puffing out his belly, and making as though he had eaten a good meal, he stopped in front of the other, and repeated the first verse:

1. “Ripe are the figs, the banyans good,
   And ready for the monkey’s food.
   Come along with me and eat!
   Why should you for hunger fret?” {2.446}

Redface believed all this, and longed to have all this fruit to eat. So he went off, and hunted here, and hunted there, but no fruit could he find. Then he came back again; and there was Blackface sitting inside his cave! He determined to outwit him; so stopping in front he repeated the second verse:

2. “Happy he who honour pays
   To his elders full of days;
   Just as happy I feel now
   After all that fruit, I vow!”

The big monkey listened, and repeated the third:

3. “When woodsmen meet, then comes the tug of war;
   A monkey scents a monkey’s tricks afar.
   Even a young one were too sharp by half;
   But old birds never can be caught with chaff.”

The other made off. [2.305]
When the Teacher ended this discourse, he summed up the birth-tale, “At that time the owner of the hut was the little monkey, the interloper was the big black monkey, but the Tree Devatā was I myself.”

Ja 299 Komāyaputtajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin’s Son) Komāyaputta (3s)

Alternative Title: Komāraputtajātaka (Cst)

In the present some monks are quarrelsome and rude, until Ven. Moggallāna frightens them. The Buddha tells a story of frivolous ascetics who used to keep a pet monkey to make them laugh. When away one time a brahmin arrived and taught the monkey to meditate, much to the chagrin of the ascetics.

The Bodhisatta = (the brahmin’s son) Komāyaputta, the monks = the frivolous ascetics (keṭisīlā tāpasā).

Keywords: Frivolity, Meditation, Animals.

“Previously you were used.” (2.447) This story the Teacher told in Pubbārāma, about some monks who were rude and rough in their manners. These monks, who lived on the floor below that where the Teacher was, talked of what they had seen and heard, and were quarrelsome and abusive. The Teacher called Mahāmoggallāna to him, and bade him go startle them. The elder rose in the air, and just touched the foundation of the house with his great toe. It shook to the furthest edge of ocean! The monks were frightened to death, and came and stood outside. Their rough behaviour became known among the monks. One day they got to talking about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, there are some monks who have retired to this dispensation which leads to safety, who are rough and rude; they do not see the impermanence, sorrow and unreality of the world, nor do their duty.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were discussing as they sat there. They told him. “This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that they have been rough and rude. They were the same before.” And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a brahmin’s son in a village. They named him Komāyaputta. By and by he went out and embraced the ascetic life in the region of the Himālayas. There were some frivolous ascetics who had made a hermitage in that region, and there they lived. But they did not take the means to focus on the Meditation Object. They fetched the fruits from the woods, to eat; then they spent the time laughing and joking together. They had a monkey, rude-mannered like themselves, which gave them endless amusement by his grimaces and antics.

Long they lived in this place, till they had to go amongst men again to get salt and condiments. After they went away, the Bodhisatta lived in their dwelling-place. The monkey played his pranks for him as he had done for the others. The Bodhisatta snapped his fingers at him, and gave him a lecture, saying: “One who lives with well-trained ascetics {2.448} [2.306] ought to behave properly, ought to be well-advised in his actions, and devoted to meditation.” After that, the monkey was always virtuous and well-behaved.

After this, the Bodhisatta moved away. The other ascetics returned with their salt and condiments. But the monkey no longer played his pranks for them. “What’s this, my friend?” they asked. “Why don’t you make sport, as you used to do?” One of them repeated the first verse:

1. “Previously you were used to play
   Where in this hut we ascetics stay.
   O monkey! As a monkey do;
   When you are good we love not you.”

On hearing this, the monkey repeated the second verse:

2. “All perfect wisdom by the word
   Of wise Komāya I have heard.
   Think me not now as I was late
   Now ’tis my love to meditate.”

Hereupon the ascetic repeated the third:

3. “If seed upon the rock you sow,
   Though rain should fall, it will not grow.
   You may hear perfect wisdom still;
   But meditate you never will.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, “At that time these monks were the frivolous ascetics, but Komāyaputta was I myself.”
The Section with Three Verses – 1086

Ja 300 Vakajātaka

The Story about the Wolf (3s)

In the present while the Buddha is on retreat he gives leave for those who practice the austerities to visit him. Monks would dress up in old robes to get the privilege, and then throw the robes away. The Buddha told a story about a wolf who decided to keep the Uposatha precepts, including non-killing, until he saw a goat and relented of his austerity.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Present Compare: Vin Nis Pāc 15 (3.230).

Keywords: Falsehood, Impersonation, Animals.

"The wolf who takes." [2.449] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about old friendship. The circumstances were the same in detail as in the Vinaya; this is an abstract of them. The venerable Upasena, a two-years’ monk, visited [2.307] the Teacher along with a first year’s monk who lived in the same monastery; the Teacher rebuked him, and he retired. 609 He acquired spiritual insight, and became an Arahat, having got contentment and kindred virtues, having undertaken the Thirteen Ascetic Practices, 610 and taught them to his fellows, while the Fortunate One was secluded for three months, he with his monks, having accepted the blame first given for wrong speech and nonconformity, received in the second instance approval, in the words, “Henceforth, let any monks visit me when they will, provided they follow the Thirteen Ascetic Practices.” Thus encouraged, he returned and told it to the monks. After that, the monks followed these practices before coming to visit the Teacher; then, when he had come out from his seclusion, they would throw away their old rags and put on clean garments. As the Teacher with all the body of the monks went round to inspect the rooms, (2.450) he noticed these rags lying about, and asked what they were. When they told him, he said: “Monks, the practice undertaken by these monks is short-lived, like the wolf’s Uposatha day service,” and he told them a story.

608 Mahāvagga, i. 31. 3 foll. (translation in Sacred Books of the East, i. p. 175); Folk-Lore Journal, 3. 359; Morris, Contemporary Review xxiv. 739.

609 [The circumstances are hardly explained here. The Buddha wanted to go into solitude and a rule was made that no monk should approach him except the one who brought his almsfood. Ven Upasena, not knowing this rule did approach him, and was initially rebuked.]

610 [Dhutanga, see Vism 59 ff. 1. the refuse-rag-wearer's practice, 2. the triple-robe-wearer's practice, 3. the alms-food-eater's practice, 4. the house-to-house-seeker's practice, 5. the one-sessioner's practice, 6. the bowl-food-eater's practice, 7. the later-food-refuser's practice, 8. the forest-dweller's practice, 9. the tree-root-dweller's practice, 10. the open-air-dweller's practice, 11. the charnel-ground-dweller's practice, 12. the any-bed-user's practice, 13. the sitter's practice.]

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned king in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as Sakka, King of the Devas. At that time a wolf lived on a rock by the Ganges bank. The winter floods came up and surrounded the rock. There he lay upon the rock, with no food and no way of getting it. The water rose and rose, and the wolf pondered, “No food here, and no way to get it. Here I lie, with nothing to do. I may as well keep the Uposatha precepts.” Thus resolved to keep the Uposatha precepts, as he lay he solemnly resolved to keep the precepts. Sakka in his meditations perceived the wolf’s weak resolve. He thought: “I’ll plague that wolf,” and taking the shape of a wild goat, he stood near, and let the wolf see him.

“I’ll keep Uposatha precepts another day!” thought the wolf, as he spied him; up he got, and leaped at the creature. But the goat jumped about so that the wolf could not catch him. When our wolf saw that he could not catch him, he came to a standstill, and went back, thinking to himself as he lay down again, “Well, my Uposatha precepts are not broken after all.”

Then Sakka, by his divine power, hovered above in the air; said he, “What have such as you, all unstable, to do with keeping the Uposatha precepts? You didn’t know that I was Sakka, and wanted a meal of goat’s-flesh!” and thus plaguing and rebuking him, he returned to the world of the gods.

1. “The wolf, who takes live creatures for his food,
   And makes a meal upon their flesh and blood,
   Once undertook a holy vow to pay –
   Made his mind to keep the Uposatha day.
2. When Sakka learned what he resolved to do,
   He made himself a goat to outward view.
   Then the blood-bibber leaped to seize his prey,
   His vow forgot, his virtue cast away. [2.308] [2.451]

3. Even so some persons in this world of ours,
   That make resolves which are beyond their powers,
   Swerve from their purpose, as the wolf did here
   As soon as they behold the goat appear.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka as follows,
“At that time I myself was Sakka.”

   End of the Third Book
The Jātaka, Volume III

or, stories of the Buddha’s former births.

translated from the Pāli by various hands

under the editorship of

Professor E. B. Cowell.

Vol. III. translated by

H.T. Francis, M.A.,

Late Fellow of Gonville and Caidu College.

and

R.A. Neil, M.A.,

Fellow of Pembroke College.

[1897]

revised by

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

November 2021
To

The Hon. V. Fausboll

who for more than twenty years has shown unwearied energy in publishing the Editio Princeps of the Pāli Jātaka

this third volume is gratefully dedicated by the translators.

Preface

This volume [3.viii] of translation corresponds to the third volume of the text, and the translators, Mr. H. T. Francis, and Mr. R. A. Neil, have endeavoured to keep up an uniformity with the plan adopted in the two former volumes. Mr. Francis is responsible for pp. 1-150 and p. 287 to the end, Mr. Neil for pp. 151-286. The Secretary of State for Jambudīpa has kindly given permission to illustrate one of the stories in this volume also from the Bhārhut Stūpa.

The two translators of this volume cannot allow the book to appear without expressing their gratitude to Professor Cowell for his constant help and supervision and for his kindness in compiling the index.
Book IV. Catukkanipāta
The Section with Four Verses

Ja 301 Cullakāliṅgajātaka
The Short Story about (the King of) Kālinta (4s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷakāliṅgajātaka (Cst)

In the present four Jaina female ascetics win victories everywhere until they are defeated by Ven. Sāriputta, and they convert and ask to ordain. The Buddha tells a story in which four daughters are an enticement to war. They are taken into a harem of an opposing king, and their father offers to do battle, and hears from Sakka that he will win. Through heroism though his opponent beats him, and he offers up a dowry for his daughters.⁶¹¹

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Sāriputta = (the minister) Nandisena,
the young nuns = the king of Kālinta’s daughters (Kālingarañño dhītaro).

Keywords: Argumentation, Bravery.

“Open the gate.” [3.1] {3.1} This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, about the admission of four female ascetics to the ascetic life.

Tradition says that Licchavis of the ruling family to the number of seven thousand seven hundred and seven had their abode at Vesālī. And all of them were given to argument and debate.

Now a certain Jain, skilled in maintaining five hundred different theses, arrived at Vesālī and met with a kind reception there. A female Jain too of a similar character also came to Vesālī and the Licchavi chiefs got up a debate between them. And when they proved well matched as disputants, the Licchavis were struck with the notion that such a pair would be sure to have clever children. So they arranged a marriage between them, and as the issue of this union in due course four daughters and a son were born. The daughters were named Saccā, Lolā, Avavādakā, and Paṭācārā, and the boy was called Saccaka. These five children when they reached years of discretion learned a thousand different theses, five hundred from the mother and five hundred from the father. And the parents schooled their daughters in this manner, “If any layman refutes your thesis, you are to become his wives, but if a monk refutes you, you must take orders at his hands.”

⁶¹¹ [There seems to be a mismatch between the stories here.]

After a time their parents died, and when they were dead, the Jain Saccaka lived on in the same place at Vesālī, studying the lore of the Licchavis.  But his sisters took in their hands a branch of the Jambu plum tree, and in the course of their wanderings from city to city for purposes of debate, at last reached Sāvatthi. There they planted the Jambu plum branch at the city gate and said to some boys who were there, “If any man, be he layman or monk, is equal to maintaining a thesis against us, let him scatter with his foot this heap of dust and trample under foot this branch.” And with these words they went into the city to collect alms.

Now the venerable Sāriputta, after sweeping up wherever it was necessary, and putting water into the empty pots and tending the sick, later on in the day went into Sāvatthi for alms. And when he had seen and heard about the branch, he ordered the boys to throw it down and trample upon it. “Let those,” said he, “by whom this branch has been planted, as soon as they have finished their meal, come and see me in the gable-chamber over the gate of Jetavana.”

So he went into the city, and when he had ended his meal, he took his stand in the chamber over the monastery gate. The female ascetics too, after going their rounds for alms, returned and found the branch had been trampled on. And when they asked who had done this, the boys told them it was Sāriputta, and if they were anxious for a debate, they were to go to the chamber over the gate of the monastery.

So they returned to the city, and followed by a great crowd went to the gate-tower of the monastery, and presented to the monk a thousand different theses. The monk solved all their difficulties and then asked them if they knew any more.

They replied, “No, my Lord.” “Then I,” said he, “will ask you something.” “Ask on, my Lord,” they said, “and if we know it, we will answer you.”
So the monk presented just one question to them, and when they had to give it up, the monk told them the answer. Then they said: “We are beaten, the victory rests with you.”

“What will you do now?” he asked. “Our parents,” they replied, “admonished us thus: ‘If you are refuted in debate by a layman, you are to become his wives, but if by a monk, you are to receive orders at his hands’. Therefore, admit us to the ascetic life,” they said.

The monk readily agreed and ordained them near the nun called Uppalavaṇṇā and all of them shortly became Arahats.

Then one day they started this topic in the Dhamma Hall, how that Sāriputta proved a refuge to the four female ascetics, and that through him they all became Arahats. When the Teacher came and heard the nature of their discourse, he said: “Not only now, but in former times too, Sāriputta proved a refuge to these women.

{3.3} On this occasion he dedicated them to the ascetic life, but formerly he raised them to the dignity of queen consort.” Then he told them a story about the past.

In the past when Kāliṅga was reigning in the city of Dantapura in the Kāliṅga kingdom, Assaka was king of Potali in the Assaka country. Now Kāliṅga had a fine army and was himself as strong as an elephant, but could find no one to fight with him. So being eager for a fray he said to his ministers, “I am longing to fight but can find no one to war with me.”

His ministers said: “Sire, there is one way open to you. You have four daughters of surpassing beauty. Bid them adorn themselves with jewels, and then seated in a covered carriage let them be driven to every village, town and royal city with an armed escort. And if any king shall be desirous of taking them into his harem, we will get up a fight with him.”

The king followed their advice. But the kings of the various countries, wherever they came, were afraid to let them enter their cities, but sent them presents and assigned them quarters outside the city walls. Thus they passed through the length and breadth of Jambudīpa till they reached Potali in the Assaka country. But 612 On the Coromandel coast.

---

Assaka too closed his gates against [3.3] them and merely sent them a present. Now this king had a wise and able minister named Nandisena, who had skill in means. He thought to himself, “These princesses, men say, have traversed the length of Jambudīpa without finding any to fight for their possession. If this is the case, Jambudīpa is but an empty name. I myself will do battle with Kāliṅga.”

Then he went and bade the guards open the city gate to them, and spake the first verse:

1. “Open the gate to these maidens: through Nandisena’s might, King Aruna’s[613] sage lion, our city is guarded aright.” [3.4]

With these words he threw open the gate, and brought the maidens into the presence of king Assaka, and said to him, “Fear not. If there is to be a fight, I will see to it. Make these fair princesses your chief queens.” Then he installed them as queens by sprinkling them with holy water, and dismissed their attendants, bidding them go and tell Kāliṅga that his daughters had been raised to the dignity of queen-consorts. So they went and told him, and Kāliṅga said: “I presume he does not know how powerful I am,” and at once he set out with a great army. Nandisena heard of his approach and sent a message to this effect, “Let Kāliṅga abide within his own marches, and not encroach upon ours, and the battle shall be fought on the frontiers of the two countries.” On receiving this message, Kāliṅga halted within the limits of his own territory and Assaka also kept to his.

At this time the Bodhisatta was following the ascetic life and was living in a hermitage on a spot lying between the two kingdoms. Said Kāliṅga, “These monks are knowing fellows. Who can tell which of us will gain the victory, and which will be defeated. I will ask this ascetic.” So he came to the Bodhisatta disguised, and sitting respectfully on one side, after the usual kindly greetings he said: “Your reverence, Kāliṅga and Assaka have their forces drawn up each within his own territory, eager for a fight. Which of them will be victorious, and which will be defeated?”

---

613 The commentator says Aruna was the real name of the Assaka king.
“Venerable sir,” he replied, “the one will conquer, the other will be beaten. I can tell you no more. But Sakka, the king of Heaven, is coming here. I will ask him and let you know, if you come back again tomorrow.” {3.5}

So when Sakka came to pay his respects to the Bodhisatta, he put this question to him, and Sakka replied, “Respected sir, Kāliṅga will conquer, Assaka will be defeated, and such and such omens will be seen beforehand.” Next day Kāliṅga came and repeated his question, and the Bodhisatta gave Sakka’s answer. And Kāliṅga, without inquiring what [3.4] the omens would be, thought to himself, “They tell me I shall conquer,” and went away quite satisfied. This report spread abroad. And when Assaka heard it, he summoned Nandisena and said: “Kāliṅga, they say, will be victorious and we shall be defeated. What is to be done?”

“Sire,” he replied, “who knows this? Do not trouble yourself as to who shall gain the victory and who shall suffer defeat.”

With these words he comforted the king. Then he went and saluted the Bodhisatta, and sitting respectfully on one side he asked, “Who, venerable sir, will conquer, and who will be defeated?”

“Kāliṅga,” he replied, “will win the day and Assaka will be beaten.” “And what, venerable sir,” he asked, “will be the omen for the one that conquers, and what for the one that is defeated.”

“Venerable sir,” he answered, “the tutelary deity of the conqueror will be a spotless white bull, and that of the other king a perfectly black bull, and the tutelary gods of the two kings will themselves fight and be severally victorious or defeated.”

On hearing this Nandisena rose up and went and took the king’s allies – they were about one thousand in number and all of them great warriors – and led them up a mountain close at hand and asked them saying: “Would you sacrifice your lives for our king?”

“Yes, sir, we would,” they answered.

“Then throw yourselves from this precipice,” he said.

They attempted to do so, when he stopped them, saying: “No more of this. Show yourselves staunch friends of our king and make a gallant fight for him.”
They all vowed to do so. And when the battle was now imminent, Kāliṅga came to the conclusion in his own mind that he would be victorious, and his army too thought: “The victory will be ours.” [3.6] And so they put on their armour, and forming themselves into separate detachments, they advanced just as they thought proper, and when the moment came for making a great effort, they failed to do so.

But both the kings, mounted on horseback, drew near to one another with the intention of fighting. And their two tutelary gods moved before them, that of Kāliṅga in the shape of a white bull, and that of the other king as a black bull. And as these drew near to one another, they too made every demonstration of fighting. But these two bulls were visible to the two kings only, and to no one else. And Nandisena asked Assaka, saying: “Your Highness, are the tutelary gods visible to you?”

“Yes,” he answered, “they are.” “In what guise?” he asked. “The guardian god of Kāliṅga appears in the shape of a white bull, while ours is in the form of a black bull and looks distressed.”

“Fear not sire, we shall conquer and Kāliṅga will be defeated. Only [3.5] dismount from your well-trained Sindh horse, and grasping this spear, with your left hand give him a blow on the flank, and then with this body of a thousand men advance quickly and with a stroke of your weapon fell to the ground this god of Kāliṅga, while we with a thousand spears will smite him and so shall Kāliṅga’s tutelary deity perish, and then shall Kāliṅga be defeated and we shall be victorious.”

“Good,” said the king, and at a given signal from Nandisena he smote with his spear and his courtiers too smote with their thousand spears, and the tutelary god of Kāliṅga died then and there.

Meanwhile Kāliṅga was defeated and fled. And at the sight all those thousand councillors raised a loud cry, saying: “Kāliṅga is fled.” Then Kāliṅga with the fear of death upon him, as he fled, reproached that ascetic and uttered the second verse:
2. “Kāliṅgas bold shall victory claim,
Defeat crowns Assakas with shame. {3.7}
Thus did your reverence prophesy,
And honest folk should never lie.”

Thus did Kāliṅga, as he fled, revile that ascetic. And in his flight to his own city he did not so much as once look back. And a few days afterwards Sakka came to visit the ascetic. And the ascetic conversing with him uttered the third verse:

3. “The gods from lying words are free,
Truth should their chief treasure be.
In this, great Sakka, you did lie;
Tell me, I pray, the reason why.”

On hearing this, Sakka spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Have you, O brahmin, ne’er been told
Gods envy not the hero bold?
The fixed resolve that may not yield,
Intrepid prowess in the field,
High courage and adventurous might
For Assaka have won the fight.” {3.8}

And on the flight of Kāliṅga, king Assaka returned with his spoils to his own city. And Nandisena sent a message to Kāliṅga, that he was to forward a portion for the dowry of these four royal maidens. “Otherwise,” he added, “I shall know how to deal with him.” And Kāliṅga, on hearing this message, was so alarmed that he sent a fitting portion for them. And from that day forward the two kings lived amicably together.

His discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days these young female ascetics were the daughters of king Kāliṅga, Sāriputta was Nandisena and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 302 Mahā-assārohajātaka
The Story about the Great Horseman (4s)

In the present the king of Kosala gives 1,000 robes to Ven. Ānanda. 500 he passes on to monks in need, and 500 to his attendant monk, who passes them to other novices. The king asks the Buddha if this is right, and the Buddha tells a story of a king who found refuge with a householder when he was in distress, and how he recompensed the householder with half his kingdom.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā), Ānanda = the country man (paccantagāmavāsī).

Present Source: Ja 92 Mahāsāra, Quoted at: a 157 Guṇa, Ja 259 Tirīṭavaccha, Ja 302 Mahā-assāroha.

Keywords: Gratitude, Obligation.

“Your gifts bestowed.” [3.6] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about the elder Ānanda. The circumstances that suggested the story have already been given.614

This was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana how elder Ānanda received a present of a thousand robes. The elder had been preaching to the ladies of the king of Kosala’s palace as described above in the Mahāsāraťātaka [Ja 92].

As he preached there in the manner described, a thousand robes, worth each a thousand pieces of money, were brought to the king. Of these the king gave five hundred to as many of his queens. The ladies put these aside and made them a present to our elder, and then the next day in their old ones went to the palace where the king took breakfast. The king remarked, “I gave you dresses worth a thousand pieces each. Why are you not wearing them?” “My lord,” they said, “we have given them to the elder.” “Has elder Ānanda got them all?” he asked. They said: “Yes, he has.” “The Supreme Buddha,” said he, “allows only three robes. Ānanda is doing a little trade in cloth, I suppose!”

He was angry with the elder; and after breakfast, visited him in his cell, and after greeting, sat down, with these words: “Pray, sir, do my ladies learn or listen to your preaching?”

“Yes, sire; they learn what they ought, and what they ought to hear, they hear.”

614 [In Ja 157 Guṇajātaka. I include the story here.]
“Oh, indeed. Do they only listen, or do they make you presents of upper garments or under-garments?”

“Today, sire, they have given me five hundred robes worth a thousand pieces each.”

“And you accepted them, sir?”

“Yes, sire, I did.”

“Why, sir, didn’t the Teacher make some rule about three robes?”

“True, sire, for every monk three robes is the rule, speaking of what he uses for himself. But no one is forbidden to accept what is offered; and that is why I took them – to give them to monks whose robes are worn out.”

“But when these monks get them from you, what do they do with their old ones?”

“Make them into a cloak.”

“And what about the old cloak?”

“That they turn into a shirt.”

“And the old shirt?”

“That serves for a coverlet.”

“Sire, it is not permitted to waste the gifts of the faithful; so they chop up the old towel into bits, and mix the bits with clay, which they use for mortar in building their houses.”

“A gift, sir, ought not to be destroyed, not even a towel.”

“Well, sir king, we destroy no gifts, but all are used somehow.”

This conversation pleased the king so much, that he sent for the other five hundred robes which remained, and gave them to the elder. Then, after receiving his thanks, he greeted the elder in solemn state, and went his way.
The elder gave the first five hundred robes to monks whose robes were worn out. But the number of his fellow monastics was just five hundred. One of these, a young monk, was very useful to the elder; sweeping out his cell, serving him with food and drink, giving him toothbrush and water for cleansing his mouth, looking after the privies, living rooms, and sleeping rooms, and doing all that was needed for hand, foot, or back. To him, as his by right for all his great service, the elder gave all the five hundred robes which he had received afterwards. The young monk in his turn distributed them among his fellow-students. These all cut them up, dyed them yellow as a kaṇikāra flower; then dressed therein they waited upon the Teacher, greeted him, and sat down on one side.

“Sir,” they asked, “is it possible for a holy disciple who has entered on the First Path to be a respecter of persons in his gifts?” “No, monks, it is not possible for holy disciples to be respecters of persons in their gifts.” “Sir, our spiritual teacher, the Treasurer of the Dhamma, gave five hundred robes, each worth a thousand pieces, to a young monk; and he has divided them amongst us.” “Monks, in giving these Ānanda was no respecter of persons. That young fellow was a very useful servant; so he made the present to his own attendant for the sake of his service, for goodness’ sake, and by right, thinking that one good turn deserves another, and with a wish to do what gratitude demands.

“In former days too,” the Teacher said, “wise men acted on the principle that one good turn deserves another.” And hereupon he told them a story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta was king of Benares, and exercising his rule with justice and equity he gave alms and kept the moral law.

And being minded to quell some disturbance on his frontier he set out with a large force, but being defeated he mounted his horse and fled till he reached a certain border village. Now there dwelt here thirty loyal subjects and they were gathered together very early, in the middle of the village, to transact the business of the place. And at this moment the king mounted on his mail-clad horse and splendidly equipped [3.9] rode into the place by the village gate. The people were terrified and saying: “What can this be?” fled every man to his own home. But there was one man who without going to his own house, came to welcome the king. And telling the stranger that the king, he heard, had come to the frontier, he inquired who he was and whether he was a royalist or a rebel. “I am for the king, sir,” he said. “Then come with me,” he answered, and led the king to his home and made him sit down on his own seat. Then the man said to his wife, “My dear, bathe our friend’s feet,” and when she had done so, he offered him the best food he could, and had a bed made ready for him, bidding him rest awhile. So the king lay down. Then his host took off the armour from the horse, turned him loose, gave him water to drink and grass to eat and rubbed him down with oil. Thus did he tend the king for three or four days, and the king said: “Friend, I am now off,” and again he did all due service both to the king and his horse. The king after he had taken food, on leaving said: “I am called the Great Horseman. Our home is in the centre of the city. Should you come there on any business, stand at the door on the right hand side and ask the porter where the Great Horseman dwells, and take him with you and come to our house.” With these words he departed.

Now the army, not seeing the king, remained encamped outside the town, but when they saw him, they came out to meet him and escorted him home. The king on entering the city stood at the entrance of the [3.7] gate and calling the porter ordered the crowd to retire and said: “Friend, a certain man who lives in a frontier village will come here, anxious to see us, and will ask where the house of the Great Horseman is. Take him by the hand and bring him into our presence, and then you shall receive a thousand pieces of money.”

But when the man failed to come, the king increased the tax on the village where he dwelt. But though the tax was raised, still he did not come. So the king increased the tax for the second and third time, and still he did not come. Then the inhabitants of the village gathered together and said to the man, “Sir, from the time the Horseman came to you, we have been so weighed down by the tax that we cannot lift up our heads. Go and see the Great Horseman and persuade him to lighten our burden.”

“Well, I will go,” he answered, “but I cannot go empty-handed. My friend has two sons: so get you ready ornaments and suits of clothes for them and for his wife and for my friend himself.”

“Very well,” they said, and got everything ready for a present.

So he took both this gift and a cake fried in his own house. And when he came to the door on the right hand side he asked the porter where the house of the Great Horseman might be. The porter answered, “Come with me and I will show you,” and took him by the hand, and on arriving at the king’s gate sent in word, “The porter has come and has brought with him the man who dwells in the border village.” The king on hearing it, rose from his seat and said: “Let my friend and all that have come with him enter.” Then he went forward to welcome him and embraced him, and after inquiring if his friend’s wife and children were well, he took him by the hand, stepped on the dais and seated him on the royal throne beneath the white umbrella. And he summoned his chief consort and said: “Wash my friend’s feet.” So she washed his feet. The king sprinkled water from a golden bowl, while the queen washed his feet and anointed them with scented oil. Then the king asked, “Have you anything for us to eat?” And he said: “Yes, my lord,” and brought out cakes in a bag. The king received them in a golden dish, and showing great favour towards him he said: “Eat what my friend has brought,” and gave some to his queen and his ministers, and himself too ate of it. Then the stranger brought out his other gift. And the king to show that he accepted it put off his silken garments and put on the suit of clothes that he had brought him. \{3.11\} The queen also laid aside her silk dress and ornaments and put on the dress and ornaments he had brought her. Then the king served him with food fit for a king and bade one of his councillors, saying: “Go and see that his beard is trimmed after the fashion of my own, and let him bathe in scented water. Then dress him in a silken robe worth a hundred thousand pieces of money, and adorn him in royal style and bring him \[3.8\] here.” This was done. And the king by beat of drum through the city gathered together his councillors, and throwing a thread of pure vermillion across the white umbrella, gave him half of his kingdom. From that day they ate, drank and dwelt together and they became firm and inseparable friends.

Then the king sent for the man’s wife and family and had a house built for them in the city, and they ruled the kingdom in perfect harmony. So the courtiers waxed angry and said to the king’s son, “O prince, the king has given half of his kingdom to a certain householder. He eats and drinks and dwells with him, and orders us to salute his children. What service he has done the king we know not. What does the king mean? We feel ashamed. Do speak to the king.”
He readily agreed to do so, and told every word to the king and said: “O great king, do not act thus.” “My son,” he answered, “do you know where I dwelt after I was defeated in battle?” “I know not, my lord,” he said.

“I was living,” said the king, “in this man’s house, and when I had recovered my health I came back and reigned again. How then should I not bestow honour on my benefactor?”

And then the Bodhisatta went on to say, “My son, whosoever gives to one unworthy of his gift, and to the deserving gives nought, that man when he falls into misfortune finds no one to help him.” And to point to the moral he uttered these verses: {3.12}

1. “Your gifts bestowed upon or fool or cheat,
   In sorest need would bring no friend to save:

2. But grace or kindness to the good displayed
   In sorest need would bring you timely aid.

3. Boons to unworthy souls are spent in vain,
   Your smallest service to the good is gain.

4. A noble action though it stands alone,
   Renders the doer worthy of a throne:
   As fruit abundant from the tiny seed,
   Eternal fame springs from a virtuous deed.” {3.13}

On hearing this neither the councillors nor the young prince had anything to say in answer.

The Teacher, his discourse ended, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time it was Ānanda who dwelt in the frontier village, while I myself was king of Benares.”

---

615 Compare No. 157, vol. ii.
The Section with Four Verses – 1105

Ja 303 Ekarājajātaka
The Story about (the King) Ekarājā (4s)

In the present an innocent courtier is thrown into prison, but later released and honoured by the king. The Buddha tells a story of how a man intrigued in the palace in Benares, was exiled and enticed a foreign king to attack his former country. The king of Benares, rather than cause the deaths of others, allowed himself to be captured, and the conqueror, seeing his virtue, relented and set him free.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā), Ānanda = (the king of Kosala) Dubbhisena.

Present Source: Ja 282 Seyya,
Quoted at: Ja 303 Ekarāja, Ja 351 Maṇikuṇḍala,
Present Compare: Ja 355 Ghata,
Past Compare: Cp. 34, Ekarājacariya.

Keywords: Loving-Kindness, Patience, Righteousness.

“O monarch that once.” [3.9] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a courtier of the king of Kosala. The circumstances that suggested the story have already been related in the Seyyaṁsa jātaka [Ja 282].616

This tale the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a courtier of the king of Kosala. This man was very useful to the king, we are told, and did everything that had to be done. Because he was very useful, the king did him great honour. The others were jealous, and concocted a slander, and calumniated him. The king believed their saying, and without enquiring into his guilt, bound him in chains, though virtuous and innocent, and cast him into prison. There he dwelt all alone; but, by reason of his virtue, he had peace of mind, and with mind at peace he understood the conditions of existence, and attained the fruition of the First Path. By and by the king found that he was guiltless, and broke his chains and gave him honour more than before.

616 [The first verse opens: Seyyaṁso seyyaso hoti. I include the relevant part of the story here.]
The man wished to pay his respects to the Teacher; and taking flowers and perfumes, he went to the monastery, and did reverence to the Tathāgata, and sat respectfully aside. The Teacher talked graciously with him. “We have heard that ill fortune befell you,” said he. “Yes, sir, but I made my ill fortune into good; and as I sat in prison, I produced the fruition of the First Path.”

On this occasion the Teacher said: “You are not the only one who got good out of evil: wise men of old also got good out of evil.” And he told a story about the past.

In the past a minister in attendance on the king of Benares misconducted himself in the royal harem. The king after witnessing his offence with his own eyes banished him from the kingdom. How he took service with the king of Kosala, named Dabbasena, is all told in the Mahāsīlavajātaka [Ja 51].

Now one of the king’s ministers had dealt treacherously in the king’s harem, and this became matter of common talk. The ministers reported it to the king. Examining into the matter himself, the king found the minister’s guilt to be clear. So he sent for the culprit, and said: “O blinded by folly! You have sinned, and are not worthy to dwell in my kingdom; take your substance and your wife and family, and go hence.” Driven thus from the realm, that minister left the Kāsi country, and, entering the service of the king of Kosala, gradually rose to be that monarch’s confidential adviser. One day he said to the king of Kosala, “Sire, the kingdom of Benares is like a goodly honeycomb untainted by flies; its king is feebleness itself; and a trifling force would suffice to conquer the whole country.”

Hereon, the king of Kosala reflected that the kingdom of Benares was large, and, considering this in connection with the advice that a trifling force could conquer it, he grew suspicious that his adviser was a hireling instigated to lead him into a trap. “Traitor,” he cried, “you are paid to say this!”

“Indeed I am not,” answered the other, “I do but speak the truth. If you doubt me, send men to massacre a village over his border, and see whether, when they are caught and brought before him, the king does not let them off scot-free and even load them with gifts.”

“He shows a very bold front in making his assertion,” thought the king, “I will test his counsel without delay.” And accordingly he sent some of his creatures to harry a village across the Benares border. The ruffians were captured and brought before the king of Benares, who asked them, saying: “My children, why have you killed my villagers?”

“But we could not make a living,” said they.

“Then why did you not come to me?” said the king. “See that you do not do the like again.”

And he gave them presents and sent them away. Back they went and told this to the king of Kosala. But this evidence was not enough to nerve him to the expedition; and a second band was sent to massacre another village, this time in the heart of the kingdom. These too were likewise sent away with presents by the king of Benares. But even this evidence was not deemed strong enough; and a third party was sent to plunder the very streets of Benares! And these, like their forerunners, were sent away with presents! Satisfied at last that the king of Benares was an entirely good king, the king of Kosala resolved to seize on his kingdom, and set out against him with troops and elephants.

Now in these days the king of Benares had a thousand gallant warriors, who would face the charge even of a rut elephant – whom the launched thunderbolt of Sakka could not terrify – a matchless band of invincible heroes ready at the king's command to reduce all Jambudīpa to his sway! These, hearing the king of Kosala was coming to take Benares, came to their sovereign with the news, and prayed that they might be dispatched against the invader. “We will defeat and capture him, sire,” they said, “before he can set foot over the border.”

“But not so, my children,” said the king. “None shall suffer because of me. Let those who covet kingdoms seize mine, if they will.” And he refused to allow them to march against the invader.

Then the king of Kosala crossed the border and came to the middle-country; and again the ministers went to the king with renewed entreaty. But still the king refused. And now the king of Kosala appeared outside the city, and sent a message to the king bidding him either yield up the kingdom or give battle. “I fight not,” was the message of the king of Benares in reply, “let him seize my kingdom.”

Yet a third time the king's ministers came to him and besought him not to allow the king of Kosala to enter, but to permit them to overthrow and capture him before the city. Still refusing, the king bade the city-gates be opened, and seated himself in state aloft upon his royal throne with his thousand ministers round him.

But in the present story Dabbasena had the king of Benares seized while sitting on the dais in the midst of his councillors, and fastening him by a cord on the lintel of the door suspended him head downwards. The king cultivated feelings of generosity towards the rebel prince, and by a process of focusing on the Meditation Object entered upon a state of Absorption, and bursting his bonds sat cross-legged in the air. The rebel prince was attacked with a burning pain in the body, and with a cry of, “I burn, I burn,” he rolled over and over on the ground. When he asked the reason of it, his courtiers replied, “It is because the king whom you suspend head downwards from the lintel of the door is such an innocent and holy man.” Then said he, “Go quickly and release him.” His servants went and found the king sitting cross-legged in the air, and came back and told Dabbasena. {3.14} So he went with all speed, and bowing before him asked his pardon and repeated the first verse:

1. “O monarch that once in your kingdom did dwell,
   Enjoying such bliss as few mortals have seen,
   How is it that lying midst tortures of hell
   You still are so calm and so gracious of mien?”

On hearing this the Bodhisatta repeated the rest of the verses:

2. “Of yore ’twas my one earnest prayer unto heaven
   From the ranks of ascetics no more to be barred,
   But now that such glory to me has been given,
   O why should the form of my visage be marred? [3.10]

3. The end is accomplished, my task is now done,
   The prince once my foe is no longer estranged,
   But now that the fame I so envied is won,
   O why should the form of my visage be changed?
4. When joy turns to sorrow, and weal becomes woe,
    Patient souls even pleasure may wring from their pain,
    But no such distinction of feeling they know,
    When the calm of Nibbāna poor mortals attain.” [3.15]

On hearing this Dabbasena asked forgiveness of the Bodhisatta and said: “Rule over your own people and I will drive out the rebels from amongst you.” And after punishing that wicked councillor he went his way. But the Bodhisatta handed over the kingdom to his ministers, and adopting the ascetic life of a seer he became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was Dabbasena, and I myself was the king of Benares.”

Ja 304 Daddarajātaka

The Story about (the Nāga) Daddara (4s)

In the present one monk is very irritable and unable to control his anger. The Buddha tells a story of two Nāgas who were exiled from their kingdom because one of them was irritable, and how they lived on a dunghill and were insulted by children, but had to put up with it.

The Bodhisatta = (the prince) Mahādaddara, the angry monk = (his brother) Culladaddara.

Keywords: Anger, Annoyance, Devas.

“O Daddara, who.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a certain choleric fellow. The circumstance has already been related before.

---

617 Compare Lord Houghton’s poem, “Pleasure and Pain.” See the Fakeer as he swings on his iron, See the thin Hermit that starves in the wild; Think ye no pleasures the penance environ, And hope the sole bliss by which pain is beguiled? No! In the kingdoms those spirits are reaching, Vain are our words the emotions to tell; Vain the distinctions our senses are teaching, For Pain has its Heaven and Pleasure its Hell!

618 [Unfortunately where the story is is not stated, and many stories might fit, so it is not easy to reconstruct it here.]
On this occasion when a discussion had arisen in the Dhamma Hall about the passionate nature of the man, the Teacher came up, and when in answer to his inquiry he was told by the monks the subject of their discourse, he sent for the man and asked, “Is it true, monk, what they say, that you are passionate?” “Yes, my lord, it is so,” he replied. Then the Teacher said: “Not only now, monks, but of old too this fellow was very choleric, and owing to his passionate temper wise men of former days though continuing to lead perfectly innocent lives as Nāga princes, had to dwell three years on a filthy dunghill.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning at Benares, the Daddara Nāgas dwelt at the foot of Mount Daddara in the Himalayas region and the Bodhisatta came to life as Mahādaddara [Great Daddara], the son of Sūradaddara [Hero Daddara], the king of that country, with a younger brother named Culladaddara [Little Daddara]. The latter was passionate and cruel, and went about abusing and striking the Nāga maidens. The Nāga king, on hearing of his cruelty, gave orders for his expulsion from the Nāga world. But Mahādaddara got his father to forgive him and saved his brother from expulsion. A second time the king was angry with him, and again he was induced to forgive him. But on the third occasion the king said: “You have prevented me from expelling this good-for-nothing fellow; now both of you get you gone from this Nāga world, and live for three years at Benares on a dunghill.”

So he drove them forth from the Nāga country and they went and lived at Benares. And when the village boys saw them looking for their food in a ditch bounding the dunghill, they struck them and threw clods and sticks and other missiles at them, and crying out, “What have we here – water lizards with big heads and tails like needles?” uttered other words of abuse. But Culladaddara, by reason of his fierce and passionate nature, being unable to put up with such disrespect said: “Brother, these boys are mocking us. They don’t know that we are venomous serpents. I can’t stand their contempt for us. I will destroy them by the breath of my nostril.” And then addressing his brother, he repeated the first verse:
1. “O Daddara, who such an insult could bear?
   ‘Ho! Frog-eating stick-i’the-mud,’ they cry:
   To think that these poor harmless creatures should dare
   A serpent with poisonous fang to defy!” (3.17)

On hearing his words Mahādaddara uttered the rest of the verses:

2. “An exile driven to a foreign shore
   Must of abuse lay up a goodly store.

3. For where his rank and virtues none can know,
   Only the fool his pride would care to show.

4. He who at home a shining light may be,
   Abroad must suffer men of low degree.

So they dwelt there three years. Then their father recalled them home. And from that day their pride was abated. [3.12]

When the Teacher had brought his discourse to an end, he proclaimed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the choleric monk attained Fruition of the Third Path. “At that time the choleric monk was Culladaddara, and I myself was Mahādaddara.”

Ja 305 Sīlavīmaṁsanajātaka

The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue (4s)

In the present some newly ordained monks are having lustful thoughts in the nighttime. The Buddha has the monks gathered together and tells them a story of a teacher who promised to give his daughter in marriage to those who stole finery for her in secret. One of his students couldn’t bring himself to steal anything, as he knew no wrong doing is ever really done in secret – and he won the daughter.

The Bodhisatta = the wise brahmin student (paññitamāṇavo),
Sāriputta = his teacher (ācariya).

Present Compare: Ja 305 Sīlavīmaṁsana, Ja 459 Pāṇīya, Past Compare: Jm 12 Brāhmaṇa.

Keywords: Theft, Wrong-doing, Secrecy.
“In truth there is.” [3.18] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about the rebuking of wrong. The circumstances will be set forth in the Pāṇīyajātaka [Ja 459] in the Eleventh Book. The following is a brief summary of it. 619

Five hundred monks living in Jetavana, at the close of the middle watch of the night, entered into an argument on the pleasures of sense. Now the Teacher through all the six divisions of night and day keeps a continual watch over the monks, even as a one-eyed man carefully guards his eye, a father his only son, or a yak its tail. In the night time, with his supernatural vision regarding Jetavana, he beheld these monks, as it were, like robbers that had found their way into some great king’s palace. And opening his perfumed chamber he summoned Ānanda and bade him assemble the monks in the part that Anāthapiṇḍika paved with gold pieces laid side by side, 620 and prepare a seat for him at the door of the perfumed chamber. Ānanda did as he was commanded and told the Teacher. Then the Teacher, sitting down on the seat prepared for him, addressed the monks collectively and said: “Monks, wise men of old thought there was no such thing as secrecy in wrong-doing and so refrained from it,” and he told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in a brahmin family, and when he was of age, he was taught science by a world-renowned teacher of that city, being at the head of a class of five hundred students. Now his teacher had a grown-up daughter. And he thought: “I will test the virtue of these youths and will give her in marriage to him that most excels in virtue.”

So one day he thus addressed his pupils, “My friends, I have a grown-up daughter, and I intend to give her in marriage, but I must have proper dresses and ornaments

619 [There is in fact not much to add to the summary given here, so I cannot include any further details.]

620 [DPPN: koṭisanthāra was probably the name given to that part of the Jetavana grounds just outside the Buddha’s own apartments. it may have been so called in reference to the fact that Anāthapiṇḍika bought the land by spreading on it ten million gold coins “kahāpana-koṭi-santhārena,” see Ja 148, Introduction.]
for her. Do steal some without your friends discovering it, and bring them to me. Whatever no one has seen you take I will accept, but if you allow anything you bring to be seen, I shall refuse it.” They agreed, saying: “Very well,” and from that day they stole dresses and ornaments without their friends’ knowledge [3.13] and brought them to him. And the teacher arranged whatever each pupil brought in a separate place. But the Bodhisatta stole nothing.

Then the teacher said, {3.19} “But you, my friend, bring me nothing.” “True, Teacher,” he replied. “Why is this, my friend?” he asked. “You accept nothing,” he answered, “unless it is taken secretly. But I find there is no such thing as secrecy in wrong-doing.”

And to illustrate this truth he repeated these two verses:

1. “In truth there is no act of wrong, that in this world may hidden lie,
   That which the fool a secret deems, the spirits of the wood espy.

2. Concealment nowhere may be found, nor can a void exist for me, E’en where no being is in sight, while I am there, no void can be.”

The Teacher, being pleased with his words, said: “Friend, there is no lack of wealth in my house, but I was anxious to marry my daughter to a virtuous man, and I acted thus to prove these youths. But you alone are worthy of my daughter.” Then he adorned his daughter and gave her in marriage to the Bodhisatta, but to his other pupils he said: “Take back all that you brought me to your several homes again.”

Then the Teacher said: “It was thus, monks, that the wicked pupils by their dishonesty failed to win this woman, while this one wise youth by his virtuous conduct obtained her as his wife.” And after Fully Awakening he gave utterance to yet two other verses:

3. “Dujjacca, Sujacca, Nando and Sukhavaḍḍhita, Vajja and Addhuvasīla, for a wife, went astray;”

621 The Commentator explains that these were the names of six leading disciples amongst those that yielded to temptation.
4. The brahmin abandoning wrong, perfected in all things, Won a bride by his courage while holding on to the Truth.” \(3.20\)

The Teacher, having brought this solemn lesson to an end, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths these five hundred monks became an Arahat, “At that time Sāriputta was the Teacher, and I myself was the wise youth.”

Ja 306 Sujātajātaka

The Story about (Queen) Sujātā (4s)

In the present when the king of Kosala and his queen have a falling out the Buddha reconciles them. He then tells a story of how in the past a fruit seller was raised to position of queen, and became so haughty her king wanted to send her away, until reconciled by the Bodhisatta.

The Bodhisatta = the minister (amacca),
(queen) Mallikā = (queen) Sujātā,
Kosalarājā = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Keywords: Reconciliation, Harmony.

“What is this egg-shaped fruit.” This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling at Jetavana, about queen Mallikā. One day, they say, there was a dispute at court between her and the king.\[3.14\] The king was so enraged he ignored her existence. Mallikā thought: “The Teacher, I fancy, knows not how angry the king is with me.” But the Teacher knew all about it and resolved to make peace between them. So early in the morning he put on his inner garment and taking his bowl and robes he entered Sāvatthi with a following of five hundred monks and came to the palace gate. The king took his bowl from the Tathāgata, brought him into the house, and placing him on the seat prepared for him, poured the Water of Donation on the hands of the Saṅgha with Buddha at their head, and brought them rice and cakes to eat. But the Teacher covered up his bowl with his hand and said: “Sire, where is the queen?”

\[622\] Pasenadi, king of Kosala.
“What have you to do with her, venerable sir?” he answered. “Her head is turned, she is intoxicated with the honour she enjoys.”

“Sire,” he said, “after you yourself bestowed this honour on the woman, it is wrong of you now to get rid of her, and not to put up with the offence she has committed against you.”

The king hearkened to the words of the Teacher and sent for the queen. [3.21]

And she ministered to the Teacher. “You ought,” he said, “to live together in peace,” and singing the praises of the sweets of concord he went his way. And from that day they lived happily together.

The monks raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, how that the Teacher had reconciled the king and queen by a single word. The Teacher, when he came, inquired what the monks were discussing, and on being told said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly too I reconciled them by a single word of admonition.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king at Benares, the Bodhisatta was his minister and his temporal and spiritual adviser.

Now one day the king stood at an open window looking into the palace court. And at this very moment the daughter of a fruit seller, a beautiful girl in the flower of her youth, stood with a basket of jujubes on her head crying, “Jujubes, ripe jujubes, who’ll buy my jujubes?” But she did not venture into the royal court.623

And the king no sooner heard her voice than he fell in love with her, and when he learned that she was unmarried he sent for her and raised her to the dignity of chief queen, and bestowed great honour upon her. Now she was dear and pleasing in the king’s eyes. And one day the king sat eating jujubes in a golden dish. And the queen Sujatā, when she saw the king eating jujubes, asked him, saying: “My lord, what in the world are you eating? “And she uttered the first verse:

623 Reading rājaṅgane na gacchatī. With Fausböll’s text rājaṅgaṇena, it must be “She passed by way of the court.”
1. “What is this egg-shaped fruit, my lord, so pretty and red of hue,
   In a gold dish set before you? Pray tell me, where they grew.”

And the king was angry and said: “O daughter of a greengrocer, dealer in ripe jujubes, do you not recognise the jujubes, the special fruit of your own family?” And he repeated two verses: [3.22]

2. “Bare-headed and meanly clad, my queen, you once did feel no shame,
   To fill your lap with the jujube fruit, and now you do ask its name;

3. You are eaten up with pride, my queen, you findest no pleasure in life, Begone and gather your jujubes again. You shall be no longer my wife.” [3.15]

Then the Bodhisatta thought: “No one, except myself, will be able to reconcile this pair. I will appease the king’s anger and prevent him from turning her out of doors.” Then he repeated the fourth verse:

4. “These are the wrongs of a woman, my lord, promoted to high estate:
   Forgive her and cease from thine anger, O king, for ’twas you did make her great.”

So the king at his word put up with the offence of the queen and restored her to her former position. And thenceforth they lived amicably together.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king of Kosala was king of Benares, Mallikā was Sujātā and I myself was the minister.”

Ja 307 Palāsajātaka
The Story about the Flame of the Forest (4s)

In the present when Ven. Ānanda realises the Buddha is passing away he grieves as he still had not accomplished his purpose. The Buddha said he would soon succeed, and told a story of the past where a brahmin had worshipped a tree devoutly, and the Devatā of the tree had dug up a treasure for his devotee.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), Ānanda = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa).

Keywords: Devotion, Attainment, Devas.

“Why, brahmin, though.” [3.23] The Teacher, when he lay down to enter Parinibbāna, told this story of the elder Ānanda.
The venerable monk, knowing that the Teacher on this very night at eventide would pass away, said to himself, “I am still under discipline and have duties to perform, and my Teacher is certainly going to pass away, and then the service I have rendered to him for five-and-twenty years will be fruitless.” And so being overwhelmed with sorrow he leaned upon the monkey-head which formed the bolt of the garden store-room and burst into tears.

And the Teacher, missing Ānanda, asked the monks where he was, and on hearing what was the matter he sent for him and addressed him as follows, “Ānanda, you have laid up a store of merit. Continue to strive earnestly and you will soon be free from human passion. Grieve not thyself. Wherefore should the service you have rendered me prove fruitless now, seeing that your former services in the days of your sinfulness were not without their reward?” Then he told a legend of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in the form of a Flame of the Forest Devatā. Now at this time all the inhabitants of Benares were devoted to the worship of such deities, and constantly engaged in offerings and the like. [3.16]

And a certain poor brahmin thought: “I too will watch over some divinity.” So he found a big Flame of the Forest growing on high ground, and by sprinkling gravel and sweeping all round it, he kept its root smooth and free from grass. Then he presented it with a scented wreath of five sprays and lighting a lamp made an offering of flowers and perfume and incense. And after a reverential salutation he said: “Peace be with you,” and then went his way. On the next day he came quite early and asked after its welfare. Now one day it occurred to the Tree Devatā, “This brahmin is very attentive to me. I will test him and find out why he thus worships me, and grant him his desire.” So when the brahmin came and was sweeping about the root of the tree, the spirit stood near him disguised as an aged brahmin and repeated the first verse: [3.24]

1. “Why, brahmin, though thyself with reason blessed,
   Have you this dull insensate tree addressed?
   Vain is your prayer, your kindly greeting vain,
   From this dull wood no answer will you gain.”

On hearing this the brahmin replied in a second verse:
2. “Long on this spot a famous tree has stood,
Meet dwelling-place for spirits of the wood;
With deepest awe such beings I revere,
They guard, I think, some sacred treasure here.”

The Tree Devatā on hearing these words was so pleased with the brahmin that he said: “O brahmin, I was born as the divinity of this tree. Fear not. I will grant you this treasure.” And to reassure him, by a great manifestation of divine power, he stood suspended in the air at the entrance of his celestial mansion, while he recited two more verses:

3. “O brahmin, I have marked your act of love;
A pious deed can never fruitless prove.

4. Lo! Where that fig tree casts its ample shade,
Due sacrifice and gifts of old were paid.
Beneath this fig a buried treasure lies,
The gold unearth, and claim it as your prize.” [3.25]

The spirit moreover added these words, “O brahmin, you would be weary, if you had to dig up the treasure and carry it away with you. Do you therefore go your way, and I will bring it to your house and deposit it in such and such a place. Then do you enjoy it all your life long, and give alms and keep the precepts.” And after thus admonishing the brahmin, the Tree Devatā, by an exercise of divine power, conveyed the treasure into the brahmin’s house.

The Teacher here brought his lesson to an end and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the brahmin, and I myself was the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 308 Javasakuṇājātaka

The Story about the Quick Bird (and a Lion) (4s)

Alternative Title: Sakuṇājātaka (Cst)

---

In the present Devadatta is well known for his ingratitude. The Buddha tells a story of a lion who got a bone stuck in his throat, and a woodpecker who removed it for him. And how the lion later would not so much as share his food with the bird.

The Bodhisatta = the bird (sakūṇa),
Devadatta = the lion (sīha).

Past Compare: Jm 34 Śatapatra.

Keywords: Ingratitude, Animals, Birds.

“Kindness as much.” [3.17] This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling at Jetavana, about the ingratitude of Devadatta.

He ended by saying: “Not only now, but in former days did Devadatta show ingratitude,” and with these words he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a woodpecker in the Himālayas. {3.26}

Now a certain lion, while devouring his prey, had a bone stick in his throat. His throat swelled up so that he could not take any food and severe pains set in. Then this woodpecker, while intent on seeking its own food, as it was perched on a bough, saw the lion and asked him, saying: “Friend, what ails you?” He told him what was the matter, and the bird said: “I would take the bone out of your throat, friend, but I dare not put my head into your mouth, for fear you should eat me up.”

“Do not be afraid, friend; I will not eat you up. Only save my life.”

“All right,” said the bird, and ordered the lion to lie down upon his side. Then it thought: “Who knows what this fellow will be about?” And to prevent his closing his mouth, it fixed a stick between his upper and lower jaw, and then putting its head into the lion’s mouth, it struck the end of the bone with its beak. The bone fell out and disappeared. And then the woodpecker drew out its head from the lion’s mouth, and with a blow from its beak knocked out the stick, and hopping off sat on the top of a bough.

The lion recovered from his sickness, and one day was devouring a wild buffalo which he had killed. Thought the woodpecker, “I will now put him to the test,” and perching on a bough above the lion's head, it fell to conversing with him and uttered the first verse:

1. “Kindness as much as in us lay,
   To you, my lord, we once did show:
   On us in turn, we humbly pray,
   Do you a trifling boon bestow.” [3.18]

On hearing this the lion repeated the second verse:

2. “To trust your head to a lion’s jaw.
   A creature red in tooth and claw,
   To dare such a deed and be living still,
   Is token enough of my good will.”

The woodpecker on hearing this uttered two more verses

3. “From the base ingrate hope not to obtain
   The due requital of good service done; {3.27}

4. From bitter thought and angry word refrain,
   But haste the presence of the wretch to shun.”

With these words the woodpecker flew away.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the lion, and I myself was the woodpecker.”

_Ja 309 Chavakajātaka_
The Story about Inferiority (4s)

Alternative Title: Chavajātaka (Cst)

In the present the group of six monks do not pay proper respect to the Dhamma when it is being taught. The Buddha tells a story of an outcaste who, to please his wife, broke into the king’s garden to steal a mango. When he saw the king sitting on a high seat while being taught he rebuked him for his disrespect, and the king made him joint king.

The Bodhisatta = the outcaste’s son (caṇḍālaputta),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Respect, Wisdom.

“Holy Teacher.” The Teacher while residing at Jetavana told this story, about the fraternity of six monks. It is related in detail in the Vinaya. Here is a brief summary of it.

The Teacher sent for the six monks and asked if it were true that they taught the Dhamma from a low seat, while their pupils sat on a higher seat. They confessed that it was so, and the Teacher in reproving these monks for their want of respect for his Dhamma, said that wise men of old had to rebuke men for teaching even heretical doctrines while sitting on a low seat. Then he told them a story.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of a pariah woman, and when he was grown up, he established himself as a householder. And his wife being with child had a great longing for the mango fruit, and said to her husband, “My lord, I have a desire to eat mangoes.”

“My dear,” he said, “there are no mangoes at this season, I will bring you some other acid fruit.”

“My lord,” said she, “if I can have a mango, I shall live. Otherwise I shall die.”

He being infatuated about his wife thought: “Where in the world am I to get a mango?” Now at this time there was a mango tree in the garden of the king of Benares, which had fruit on it all the year round. So he thought: “I will get a ripe mango there to appease her longings.” And going to the garden by night he climbed up the tree, and stepped from one branch to another, looking for the fruit, and while he was thus engaged, the day began to break. He thought: “If I shall come down now to go away, I shall be seen and seized as a thief. I will wait till it is dark.” So he climbed up into a fork of the tree and remained there, perched upon it.

Now at this time the king of Benares was being taught sacred texts by his family priest. And coming into the garden he sat down on a high seat at the foot of the

---

625 See Oldenberg’s Vinaya, iv. 203. (Suttavibhaṅga, Sekhiya, 68, 69.)
626 See Manu ii. 198 for the rule that the disciple must sit on a seat lower than his guru.
mango tree, and placing his teacher on a lower seat, he had a lesson from him. The Bodhisatta sitting above them thought: “How wicked this king is. He is learning the sacred texts, sitting on a high seat. The brahmin too is equally wicked, to sit and teach him from a lower seat. I also am wicked, for I have fallen into the power of a woman, and counting my life as nought, I am stealing a mango fruit.” Then taking hold of a hanging bough, he let himself down from the tree, and stood before these two men and said: “O Great king, I am a lost man, and you a gross fool, and this priest is as one dead.” And being asked by the king what he meant by these words, he uttered the first verse:

1. “Holy Teacher, Royal Scholar, lo! the sinful deed I saw,
Both alike from grace are fallen, both alike transgressed Dhamma.”

The brahmin, on hearing this, repeated the second verse:

2. “My food is pure rice from the hill,
   With a delicate flavour of meat,
   For why should a sinner fulfil
   A rule meant for saints, when they eat?”

On hearing this the Bodhisatta recited two more verses:

3. “Brahmin, go range the length and breadth of earth;
   Lo! Suffering is found the common lot.
   Here marred by wrong your ruined life is worth
   Less than the fragments of a shattered pot.

4. Beware ambition and o'ermastering greed:
   Vices like these to worlds of suffering lead.”

Then the king being pleased with his exposition of the Dhamma, asked him of what caste he was. “I am an outcaste, my lord,” he said. “Friend,” he replied, “had you been of a high caste family, I would have made you sole king. But henceforth I will be king by day, and you shall be king by night.” And with these words he placed upon his neck the wreath of flowers with which he himself was adorned, and made him lord protector over the city. And hence is derived the custom for 627 The Commentator in his explanation adds this verse: True faith of yore prevailed on earth, false Dhamma was a later birth.

---

the lords of the city to wear a wreath of red flowers on their neck. And from that day forward the king abiding in his admonition paid respect to his teacher, and learned sacred texts from him, sitting on a lower seat.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the outcaste.”

Ja 310 Sayhajātaka

The Story about (the Minister) Sayha (4s)

Alternative Title: Seyyajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is discontent with his life. When the Buddha hears about it he tells him a story about two friends. After their education one was raised to be king, but the other went into the forests to become an ascetic. When the king sent for him to be his family priest, he refused despite the honour, as he would then be a party to the oppression of others.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest’s son (purohitaputta), Sāriputta = (the minister) Sayha,
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Renunciation, Fear of wrongdoing.

“No throne on earth.” The Teacher told this story while in residence at Jetavana, about a discontented monk, who in going his rounds for alms at Sāvatthi caught sight of a beautiful woman, and thenceforth had grown discontented and lost all pleasure in the dispensation. So the monks brought him before the Fortunate One. Said the Fortunate One, “Is it true, monk, what I hear, that you are discontented?” He confessed it was so. The Teacher on learning the cause of his discontent said: “Why, monk, are you longing for the world, after taking ordination in a dispensation that leads to safety? Wise men of old when offered the dignity of being a family priest rejected it, and adopted the ascetic life.” And he told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived in the womb of the brahmin wife of the king’s family priest, [3.31] and was born on the same day as the king’s son. And when the king asked his ministers if any child had been born on the same day as his son, they said: “Yes, sire, a son of your family priest.” So the king had him brought and given into the charge of nurses to be carefully tended together with the young prince. And they both had the same ornaments to wear and had exactly the same things to eat and drink. [3.21]

And when they were grown up, they went together to Taxila and as soon as they had attained proficiency in all the sciences they returned home.

The king made his son viceroy and bestowed great honour upon him. From that time the Bodhisatta ate, drank, and lived with the prince, and there was a firm friendship between them. By and by at the death of his father, the young prince ascended the throne and enjoyed great prosperity. Thought the Bodhisatta, “My friend now rules the kingdom; when he sees a fitting opportunity, he will certainly give me the office of his family priest. What have I to do with a householder’s life? I will become an ascetic and devote myself to solitude.”

So he saluted his parents and having asked their permission to take ordination, he gave up his worldly fortune and setting forth quite alone he entered the Himalayas. There on a charming spot he built himself a hermitage, and adopting the ascetic life he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and lived in the enjoyment of the pleasure of the Absorptions.

At this time the king remembered him and said: “What has become of my friend? He is nowhere to be seen.” His ministers told him he had taken ordination, and was living, they heard, in some delightful grove. The king asked the place of his abode, and said to a councillor named Sayha, “Go and bring my friend back with you. I will make him my family priest.” Sayha readily assented, and going forth from Benares in course of time reached a frontier village and taking up his abode there, he went with some foresters to the place where the Bodhisatta dwelt and found him sitting like a golden statue at the door of his hut. After saluting him with the usual compliments he sat at a respectful distance and thus addressed him, “Venerable sir, the king desires your return, being anxious to raise you to the dignity of his family priest.” [3.32] The Bodhisatta replied, “If I were to receive not merely the post of family priest but all of Kāsi and Kosala, and the realm of Jambudīpa and the glory of a Universal Empire, I would refuse to go. The wise do not again take up the defilements they have once abandoned any more than they would swallow the phlegm they have once spat out.” So saying he repeated these verses:628

1. “No throne on earth should tempt me to my shame,
   No sea-girt realm, safe-guarded in the deep.

2. Accurséd be the lust of wealth and fame
   That dooms poor man in suffering worlds to weep.

3. Better through earth a homeless waif to stray,
   And bowl in hand to beg from door to door.

4. Than as a king, to sinful sensual desires a prey,
   To bear a tyrant rule and vex the poor.” [3.22]

Thus did the Bodhisatta though again and again importuned by him reject his offer. And Sayha, being unable to prevail on him, saluted him, and returned and told the king of his refusal to come. {3.33}

When the Teacher had brought his lesson to an end, he revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk attained to fruition of the First Path. Many others too experienced like fruits of various Attainments, “At that time Ānanda was the king, Sāriputta was Sayha, and I myself was the family priest.”

Ja 311 Pucimandajātaka

The Story about the Margosa Tree (4s)

In the present when a thief lies down on Ven. Moggallāna’s porch he chases him off as his pursuers arrive. The Buddha tells a story of how a neem Tree Devatā chased off a thief fearing his branch would be cut down to impale the thief on, and the dialogue that ensues.

The Bodhisatta = the margosa Tree Devatā (Nimbadevatā), Ānanda = the Bodhi Tree Devatā (Assatthadevatā).

Keywords: Caution, Fear, Devas.

628 These verses occur again in Ja 433 Lomasakassapajātaka.
“Robber, arise.” The Teacher, while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, told this story about the venerable Moggallāna.

When that elder was living near Rājagaha in a forest hut, a certain robber, after breaking into a house in a suburban village, fled with his hands full of plunder till he came within the precincts of the elder's cell, and thinking that he should be safe there he lay down at the entrance of his hut of leaves. The elder noticed him lying there and suspecting his character said to himself, “It would be wrong for me to have any dealings with a robber.” So coming out of his hut he told him not to lie there, and drove him away.

The robber starting off fled with the greatest haste. And men with torches in their hands, following close upon the robber's track, came and saw the various spots marked by the presence of the robber and said: “It was this way the robber came. Here is where he stood. There he sat down. And that is the way he fled. He is not to be seen here.” So they rushed about here and there, but at last had to return without finding him. On the next day early in the morning the elder went his round for alms in Rājagaha, and on coming back from his rounds he went to the Bamboo Grove and told the Teacher what had happened. The Teacher said: “You are not the only one, Moggallāna, to suspect in a case in which suspicion is justified. Wise men of old suspected in like manner.” And at the request of the elder he told a story of bygone times. {3.34}

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a Nimb tree spirit in a cemetery grove of that city. Now one day a robber having been guilty of an act of theft in an outlying hamlet of the city entered the cemetery grove. And at this time two old trees stood there, a Nimb tree and a Bodhi tree. The robber placed his stolen goods at the foot of this Nimb tree and lay down there. [3.23]

Now in these days robbers that were caught were put to torture by being impaled on a stake of the Nimb tree. So the spirit of the Nimb tree thought: “If people should come and capture this robber, they will cut off a branch and make a stake from this Nimb tree and impale him on it. And in that case the tree will be destroyed. So I will drive the fellow away.” Then addressing him, he repeated the first verse:
1. “Robber, arise! Why sleepest you? For slumber ’tis no time,
The king’s men are upon you, the avengers of your crime.”

Moreover he added these words, “Get you gone, before the king’s men take you.”
Thus did he frighten the robber away. And no sooner had he fled than the deity of the Bodhi tree repeated the second verse:

2. “And even if this robber bold red-handed they should take,
   To you, O Nimb tree, woodland Devatā, what difference would it make?”

The deity of the Nimb tree on hearing this uttered the third verse:

3. “O Bodhi tree, sure you knowest not the secret of my fear;
   I would not have the king’s men find that wicked robber here.
   They from my sacred tree, I know, straightway a branch would take,
   And to requite the guilty wretch, impale him on a stake.” {3.35}

And while the two sylvan deities were thus conversing together, the owners of the property, following on the trail of the robber, with torches in their hand, when they saw the place where he had been lying down said: “Lo! The robber has just risen up and fled from this place. We have not got him yet, but if we do, we will come back and either impale him at the foot of this Nimb tree, or hang him from one of its branches.”

And with these words rushing about here and there, and not finding the robber, they made off. And on hearing what they said the spirit of the Bodhi tree uttered the fourth verse:

4. “Beware a danger yet unseen: suspect before too late,
   The wise e’en in this present world look to a future state.”

The Teacher, when he had brought this lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Sāriputta was the Devatā of the Bodhi tree. I myself was the Nimb Tree Devatā.”

Ja 312 Kassapamandiyyajātaka

The Story about Foolish Kassapa (4s)

In the present a young nobleman ordains, and later he also ordains his father and brother.
When traveling through the countryside the first monk goes on ahead to prepare the hut for when they arrive. The father and brother fall to arguing and made little progress.
When the Buddha found out he told a story of similar events that had happened in the past.

The Bodhisatta = the (son) who advised his father (pitu ovādadāyako), the novice = the little ascetic (khuddakatāpasa),
the old (monk) = the father ascetic (pitā tāpaso).

Keywords: Stubbornness, Respect.

“Should foolish youth.” [3.24] [3.36] This story the Teacher told while residing at Jetavana, about an aged monk. A young nobleman at Sāvatthi, tradition says, from a sense of the evil consequences of wicked desires received ordination at the hands of the Teacher, and by devotion to the practice by which Absorption may be induced, in no long time became an Arahat. By and by on the death of his mother, he admitted his father and younger brother to orders, and they took up their abode at Jetavana.

At the opening of the rainy season, hearing of a village retreat where the necessary robes were to be easily obtained, they all three entered upon the rains residence there, and when it was ended they returned straight to Jetavana. The youthful monk, when they came to a spot not far from Jetavana, told the novice lad to bring on the old man quietly, while he himself pushed on ahead to Jetavana to get ready their cell. The old monk walked slowly on. The novice repeatedly butted him, as it were, with his head, and dragged him along by force, crying, “Come on, Teacher.” The elder said: “You are pulling me along against my will,” and turning back he made a fresh start from the beginning. As they were thus quarrelling, the sun went down and darkness set in.

The young monk meanwhile swept out his hut, set water in the pots, and not seeing them coming, he took a torch and went to meet them. When he saw them coming, he asked what made them so late. The old man gave the reason. So he made them rest and brought them slowly on their way. That day he found no time to pay his respects to the Buddha. So on the next day, when he had come to pay his respects to Buddha, after he had saluted him and taken his seat, the Teacher asked, “When did you arrive?” “Yesterday, sir.” “You came yesterday and pay your respects to me only today?” “Yes, sir,” he answered, and told him the reason. The Teacher rebuked the elder, “Not only now does he act like this. Of old too he did just the same. Now it is you that are annoyed by him. Formerly he annoyed wise men.” And at the monk’s request he told a story of the past.

---

629 Compare Mahāvagga, iii. 14.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in a brahmin family in a town of the Kāsi country. (3.37) When he was grown up, his mother died. And after due performance of her funeral rites, at the end of six weeks he gave away in alms all the money that was in the house, and taking his father and younger brother with him he put on the bark garment of somebody or other, and adopted the ascetic life in the Himālayas. And there he dwelt in a pleasant grove, supporting himself by gleaning in the fields and living on roots and wild fruits. [3.25]

Now in the Himālayas, during the rainy season, when the rains are incessant, as it is impossible to dig up any bulb or root, or to get any wild fruits, and the leaves begin to fall, the ascetics for the most part come down, and take up their abode amidst the haunts of men. And at this time the Bodhisatta, after living here with his father and younger brother, as soon as the Himālayas began to blossom again and bear fruit, took his two companions and returned to his hermitage in the Himālayas. And at sunset when they were not far from his hut he left them, saying: “You can come on slowly, while I go forward and set the hermitage in order.”

Now the young ascetic coming on slowly with his father kept butting him in the waist with his head. The old man said: “I do not like the way in which you are taking me home.” So he turned back and started afresh from the same point. And while they were thus quarrelling, darkness set in. But the Bodhisatta as soon as he had swept out his hut of leaves, and got ready some water, took a torch and returned on the way back, and when he found them he asked why they had taken such a long time. And the boy ascetic told him what his father had done. But the Bodhisatta brought them quietly home, and having stowed safely away all the requisites, he gave his father a bath, and washed and anointed his feet and shampooed his back. Then he set out a pan of charcoal and when his father had recovered from his fatigue, he sat near him and said: “Father, young boys are just like earthen vessels: they are broken in a moment, {3.38} and when they are once broken, it is impossible to mend them again. Old men should bear with them patiently, when they are abusive.” And for the admonition of his father Kassapa, he repeated these verses:

1. “Should foolish youth in word or deed offend,
'Tis wisdom’s part long-suffering to display;

2. Quarrels of good men find a speedy end,
Fools part asunder, like untempered clay.

3. Men wise to learn, of defilements aware,
Friendship can prove, that suffers no decay;

4. Such are a brother’s burden strong to bear,
And strife of neighbours skilful to allay.” [3.39]

Thus did the Bodhisatta admonish his father. And he from that time forward exercised self-restraint.

The Teacher, having brought his lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the old monk was the father ascetic, the novice was the boy ascetic, and I myself was the son who admonished his father.”

Ja 313 Khantivādijātaka

The Story about the One who Spoke of Forbearance (4s)

Alternative Title: Khantīvādijātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is very irritable and quick to anger. The Buddha tells a story of a king who took his harem into the forest, and when he had fallen asleep, they gathered round an ascetic who taught patience and forbearance. The king on waking was angered and ordered the ascetic whipped, and had his limbs cut off. Still the ascetic did not get angry. But the king fell into hell.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa) Khantivādi,
Sāriputta = the general (senāpati),
Devadatta = the king (of Benares) Kalābu.

Present Compare: JA 313 Khantivādi, Ja 497 Mātaṅga, Past Compare: Ja 313 Khantivādi, Ja 450 Bilārikosiya, Cp 17 Mātaṅgacariyā, Mvu iii p 455 Kśāntivāda, Jm 28 Kśānti.

Keywords: Patience, Forebearance, Anger.
“Whoso cut off.” [3.26] This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told about a wrathful monk. The incident that gave rise to the story has already been described. The Teacher asked that monk, saying: “Why after taking ordination in the dispensation of the Buddha who knows not what wrath is, do you show anger? Wise men in bygone days, though they suffered a thousand stripes, and had their hands and feet and ears and nose cut off, showed no anger against another.” And he then told a story of the past.

In the past a king of Kāsi named Kalābu reigned at Benares. At that time the Bodhisatta came to life in a brahmin family endowed with eighty crores of treasure, in the form of a youth named Kuṇḍakumāra. And when he was of age, he acquired a knowledge of all the sciences at Taxila and afterwards settled down as a householder.

On the death of his parents, looking at his pile of treasure he thought: “My kinsmen who amassed this treasure are all gone without taking it with them: now it is for me to own it and in my turn to depart.” Then he carefully selected persons, who by virtue of their generosity deserved it, and gave all his wealth to them, and entering the Himālayas he adopted the ascetic life. There he dwelt a long time, living on wild fruits. And descending to the inhabited parts for the sake of procuring salt and vinegar he gradually made his way to Benares, where he lived in the royal park. Next day he went his rounds in the city for alms, till he came to the door of the commander-in-chief. And he, being pleased with the ascetic for the propriety of his behaviour, brought him into the house and fed him with the food prepared for himself. And having gained his consent he got him to take up his abode in the royal park.

Now one day king Kalābu being inflamed with strong drink came into the park in great pomp, surrounded by a company of dancers. Then he had a couch spread on the royal seat of stone, and lay with his head on the lap of a favourite of the harem, while the dancing girls who were skilful in vocal and instrumental music and in dancing provided a musical entertainment. So great was his magnificence, like to that of Sakka, Lord of heaven. And the king fell asleep. Then the women said: “He for whose sake we are providing music, is gone to sleep. What need is “there for us to sing?” Then they cast aside their lutes and other musical instruments [3.27] here and there, and set out for the garden, where tempted on by the flowers and fruit-bearing shrubs they were soon disporting themselves.

630 [But unfortunately the text does not say where.]

At this moment the Bodhisatta was seated in this garden, like a royal elephant in the pride of his vigour, at the foot of a flowering Sāl tree, enjoying the bliss of retirement from the world. So these women in wandering about came upon him and said: “Come here, ladies, and let us sit down and hear somewhat from the ascetic who is resting at the foot of this tree, until the king awakes.” Then they went and saluted him and sitting in a circle round about him, they said: “Tell us something worth hearing.” So the Bodhisatta preached the Dhamma to them.

Meanwhile the royal favourite with a movement of her body woke up the king. And the king on waking up, and not seeing the women asked, “Where are those wretches gone?” “Your Highness,” she said, “they are gone away and are sitting in attendance on a certain ascetic.” The king in a rage seized his sword and went off in haste, saying: “I will give this false ascetic a lesson.” Then those of the women that were most in favour, when they saw the king coming in a rage, went and took the sword from the king’s hand and pacified him. Then he came and stood by the Bodhisatta and asked, “What Dhamma are you preaching, monk?” “The Dhamma of patience, your majesty,” he replied. “What is this patience?” said the king. “The not being angry, when men abuse you and strike you and revile you.”

Said the king, “I will see now the reality of your patience,” {3.41} and he summoned his executioner. And he in the way of his office took an axe and a scourge of thorns, and clad in a yellow robe and wearing a red garland, came and saluted the king and said: “What is your pleasure, sire?” “Take and drag off this vile rogue of an ascetic,” said the king, “and throwing him on the ground, with your lash of thorns scourge him before and behind and on both sides, and give him two thousand stripes.” This was done. And the Bodhisatta’s outer and inner skins were cut through to the flesh, and the blood flowed. The king again asked, “What Dhamma do you preach, monk?” “The Dhamma of patience, your majesty,” he replied. “You fancy that my patience is only skin deep. It is not skin deep, but is fixed deep within my heart, where it cannot be seen by you, sire.”

Again the executioner asked, “What is your pleasure, sire?” The king said: “Cut off both the hands of this false ascetic.” So he took his axe, and placing the victim within the fatal circle, he cut off both his hands. Then the king said: “Off with his feet,” and his feet were chopped off. And the blood flowed from the extremities of his hands and feet like lac juice from a leaking jar. Again the king asked what Dhamma he preached. “The Dhamma of patience, your majesty,” he replied. “You imagine, sire, that my patience dwells in the extremities of my hands and feet. It is not there, but it is deep seated somewhere else.” The king said: “Cut off his nose and ears.” The executioner did so. His whole body was now covered with blood. Again the king asked of his Dhamma. And the asetic said: “Think not that my patience is seated in the tips of my nose and ears: my patience is deep seated within my heart.” The king said: “Lie down, false monk, and thence exalt your patience.” And so saying, he struck the Bodhisatta above the heart with his foot, and betook himself off.

When he was gone, the commander-in-chief wiped off the blood from the body of the Bodhisatta, putting bandages on the extremities of his hands, feet, ears and nose, and then having gently placed him on a seat, he saluted him and sitting on one side he said: “If, venerable sir, you would be angry with one who has wronged you, be angry with the king, but with no one else.” And making this request, he repeated the first verse:

1. “Whoso cut off your nose and ear, and lopped off foot and hand, With him be wroth, heroic soul, but spare, we pray, this land.”

The Bodhisatta on hearing this uttered the second verse:

2. “Long live the king, whose cruel hand my body thus has marred, Pure souls like mine such deeds as these with anger ne’er regard.”

And just as the king was leaving the garden and at the very moment when he passed out of the range of the Bodhisatta’s vision, the mighty earth that is two hundred and forty thousand leagues in thickness split in two, like unto a strong stout cloth garment, and a flame issuing forth from Avīci seized upon the king, wrapping him up as it were with a royal robe of scarlet wool. Thus did the king sink into the earth just by the garden gate and was firmly fixed in the great Avīci hell. And the Bodhisatta died on that same day. And the king’s servants and the 631 Mahāvagga, vi. 14. 5.

---

citizens came with perfumes and wreaths and incense in their hands and performed the Bodhisatta’s obsequies. And some said that the Bodhisatta had gone straight back to the Himālayas. But in this they said the thing that was not. [3.43]

3. “A saint of old, as men have told,
   Great courage did display:
   That saint so strong to suffer wrong
   The Kāsi king did slay.

4. Alas, the debt of vain regret
   That king will have to pay;
   When doomed to dwell in lowest hell,
   Long will he rue the day.”

These two verses were spoken after Fully Awakening. [3.29]

The Teacher, his lesson ended, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the choleric monk attained fruition of the Second Path, while many others attained fruition of the First Path. “At that time Devadatta was Kalābu king of Kāsi, Sāriputta was the commander-in-chief, and I myself was the ascetic, who spoke of forbearance.”

Ja 314 Lohakumbhijātaka

The Story about the Iron Pot (4s)

In the present the king of Kosala hears cries during the night and is worried what they mean. His brahmins tell him that he needs to give a large animal sacrifice to ward off danger. The Buddha tells of a similar event in a past life, and how the cries had been interpreted as the cries of those in hell, and how he had averted a useless sacrifice.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Sāriputta = the elder brahmin student who stayed with the family priest (purohitassa jeṭṭhantevāsikamāṇavo).

---

632 Compare Buddhaghosha’s Parables, No. 15: “Story of the Four Thuthe’s Sons.” King Pasenadī Kosala in this story was meditating the wrong David did against Uriah the Hittite, and was deterred from his purpose by the awful vision related in this Jātaka. See also Turnour’s Mahāwanso, i. iv. 18. A king in a dream sees his soul cast into the Lohakumbhī Hell.
Keywords: Hell beings, Retribution.

“Due share of wealth.” This story the Teacher, while living at Jetavana, told concerning a king of Kosala. The king of Kosala of those days, they say, one night heard a cry uttered by four inhabitants of hell – the syllables du, sa, na, so, one from each of the four. In a previous existence, tradition says, they had been princes in Sāvatthi, and had been guilty of adultery. After misconducting themselves with their neighbours’ wives, however carefully guarded they might be, and indulging their amorous propensities, their evil life had been cut short by the Wheel of Death, near Sāvatthi. They came to life again in four iron cauldrons. After being tortured for sixty thousand years they had come up to the top, and on seeing the edge of the cauldron’s mouth they thought to themselves, “When shall we escape from this misery?” And then all four uttered a loud cry, one after another. The king was terrified to death at the noise, and sat waiting for break of day, unable to stir.

At dawn the brahmins came and inquired after his health. The king replied, “How, my masters, can I be well, \([3.44]\) who today have heard four such terrible cries.” The brahmins waved their hands.\(^{633}\) “What is it, my masters?” said the king. The brahmins assure him that the sounds are ominous of great violence. “Do they admit of remedy, or not?” said the king. “You might say not,” said the brahmins, “but we are well-trained in these matters, sire.” “By what means,” said the king, “will you avert these evils?” “Sire,” they replied, “there is one great remedy in our power, and by offering the fourfold sacrifice\(^{634}\) of every living creature we will avert all evil.” “Then be quick,” said the king, “and take all living creatures by fours – men, bulls, horses, elephants, down to quails and other birds – and by this fourfold sacrifice restore my peace of mind.” The brahmins consented, and taking whatever they required, they dug a sacrificial pit and fastened their numerous victims to their stakes, and were highly excited at the thought of the dainties they were to eat, and the wealth they would gain, and went about backwards and forwards, saying: “Sir, I must have so and so.”

---

\(^{633}\) Possibly to avert the evil omen.

\(^{634}\) See Colebrooke’s Essays, i. 348.
The queen Mallikā came and asked the king, why the brahmins went about so delighted and smiling. The king said: “My queen, what have you to do with this? You are intoxicated with your own glory, and you do not know how wretched I am.” “How so, sire?” she replied. “I have heard such awful noises, my queen, and when I asked the brahmins what would be the result of [3.30] my hearing these cries, they told me I was threatened with danger to my kingdom or my property or my life, but by offering the fourfold sacrifice they would restore my peace of mind, and now in obedience to my command, they have dug a sacrificial pit and are gone to fetch whatever victims they require.” The queen said: “Have you, my lord, consulted the chief brahmin in the Deva world as to the origin of these cries?” “Who, lady,” said the king, “is the chief brahmin in the Deva world?” “The Great Gotama,” she replied, “the Supreme Buddha.” “Lady,” he said: “I have not consulted the Supreme Buddha.” “Then go,” she answered, “and consult him.”

The king hearkened to the words of the queen and after his morning meal he mounted his state chariot and drove to Jetavana. Here after saluting the Teacher he thus addressed him, “Venerable sir, in the night season I heard four cries and consulted the brahmins about it. [3.45] They undertook to restore my peace of mind, by the fourfold sacrifice of every kind of victim, and are now busy preparing a sacrificial pit. What does the hearing of these cries betoken to me?”

“Nothing whatever,” said the Teacher. “Certain beings in hell, owing to the agony they suffer, cried aloud. These cries,” he added, “have not been heard by you alone. Kings of old heard the same. And when they too, after consulting their brahmins, were anxious to offer sacrifices of slain victims, on hearing what wise men had to say, they refused to do so. The wise men explained to them the nature of these cries, and bade them let loose the crowd of victims and thus restored their peace of mind.” And at the request of the king he told a story of bygone days.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family, in a certain village of Kāsi. And when he was of mature years, renouncing the pleasures of sense and embracing the ascetic life he developed the Spiritual Knoweldges and Absorption, and enjoying the delights of Absorption took up his abode in a pleasant grove in the Himālayas.

The king of Benares at this time was fearfully alarmed by hearing those four sounds uttered by four beings who dwelt in hell. And when told by brahmins in exactly the same way that one of three dangers must befall him, he agreed to their proposal to put a stop to it by the fourfold sacrifice. The family priest with the help of the brahmins provided a sacrificial pit, and a great crowd of victims was brought up and fastened to the stakes. Then the Bodhisatta, guided by a feeling of loving-kindness, regarding the world with his divine eye, when he saw what was going on, said: “I must go at once and see to the well-being of all these creatures.” And then by his Supernormal Powers flying up into the air, he alighted in the garden of the king of Benares, and sat down on the royal slab of stone, looking like an image of gold.

The chief disciple of the family priest approached his teacher and asked, “Is it not written, Teacher, in our Vedas that there is no happiness for those who take the life of any creature?” The priest replied, “You are to bring here the king’s property, and we shall have abundant dainties to eat. Only hold your peace.” And with these words he drove his pupil away. {3.46}

But the youth thought, [3.31] “I will have no part in this matter,” and he went and found the Bodhisatta in the king’s garden. After saluting him in a friendly manner he took a seat at a respectful distance. The Bodhisatta asked him saying: “Young man, does the king rule his kingdom righteously?” “Yes, venerable sir, he does,” answered the youth, “but he has heard four cries in the night, and on inquiring of the brahmins, he has been assured by them that they would restore his peace of mind, by offering up the fourfold sacrifice. So the king, being anxious to recover his happiness, is preparing a sacrifice of animals, and a vast number of victims has been brought up and fastened to the sacrificial stakes. Now is it not right for holy men like yourself to explain the cause of these noises, and to rescue these numerous victims from the jaws of death?” “Young man,” he replied, “the king does not know us, nor do we know the king, but we do know the origin of these cries, and if the king were to come and ask us the cause, we would resolve his doubts for him.” “Then,” said the youth, “just stay here a moment, venerable sir, and I will conduct the king to you.”

The Bodhisatta agreed, and the youth went and told the king all about it, and brought him back with him. The king saluted the Bodhisatta and sitting on one side asked him if it were true that he knew the origin of these noises. “Yes, your majesty,” he said. “Then tell me, venerable sir.” “Sire,” he answered, “these men in a former existence were guilty of gross misconduct with the carefully guarded wives of their neighbours near Benares, and therefore were reborn in Four Iron Cauldrons. Where after being tortured for thirty thousand years in a thick corrosive liquid heated to boiling point, they would at one time sink till they struck the bottom of the cauldron, and at another time rise to the top like a foam bubble, but after those years they found the mouth of the cauldron, and looking over the edge they all four desired to give utterance to four complete verses, but failed to do so. And after getting out just one syllable each, they sank again in the iron cauldrons. [3.47] Now the one of them that sank after uttering the syllable “du” was anxious to speak as follows:

1. “Due share of wealth we gave not; an evil life we led:
   We found no sure safe island in joys that now are fled.”

And when he failed to utter it, the Bodhisatta of his own knowledge repeated the complete verse. And similarly with the rest. The one that uttered merely the syllable “sa” wanted to repeat the following verse:

2. “Sad fate of those that suffer! Ah! When shall come release?
   Still after countless aeons, hell’s tortures never cease.” [3.32]

And again in the case of the one that uttered the syllable “na,” this was the verse he wished to repeat:

3. “Nay endless are the sufferings to which we’re doomed by fate;
   The ills we wrought upon the earth ’tis ours to expiate.”

And the one that uttered the syllable “so” was anxious to repeat the following:

4. “Soon shall I passing forth from hence, attain to human birth,
   And richly dowered with virtue rise to many a deed of worth.” [3.48]

The Bodhisatta, after reciting these verses one by one, said: “The dweller in hell, sire, when he wanted to utter a complete verse, through the greatness of his wrong doing, was unable to do it. And when he thus experienced the result of his wrong doing he cried aloud. But fear not; no danger shall come nigh to you, in consequence of hearing this cry.” Thus did he reassure the king. And the king proclaimed by beat of his golden drum that the vast host of victims was to be released, and the sacrificial pit destroyed. And the Bodhisatta, after thus providing for the safety of the numerous victims, stayed there a few days, and then returning to the same place, without any break in his Absorption, was reborn in the Brahmā Realm.
The Section with Four Verses – 1139

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “Sāriputta at that time was the young priest, I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 315 Maṁsjātaka
The Story about (the Merchant’s Son) (who received all) the Meat (4s)

Alternative Title: Sabbamaṁsalābhajātaka (Cst)

In the present when some monks are ill Ven. Sāriputta manages to get some good food for them and they recover. The Buddha tells a story of how four youths had spoken successively in dearer terms to a hunter and had received due rewards accordingly.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man’s son who received all the meat (sabbamaṁsalābhī seṭṭhiputto), Sāriputta = the hunter (luddaka).

Keywords: Merit, Sweet speech.

“For one who is asking.” This was a story told by the Teacher, while living at Jetavana, as to how the elder Sāriputta procured dainty fare for some sick monks under medical treatment. The story goes that certain of the monks at that time at Jetavana, after taking oil as a purgative, wished for some dainty food. Those who ministered to them in their sickness went into Sāvatthi to fetch some dainties, but after going their round for alms in a street in the cooks’ quarters, had to come back without getting what they wanted. Later on in the day the elder was going into the town for alms and meeting these monks asked them why they had returned so soon. They told him [3.33] what had happened. “Come then with me,” said the elder, [3.49] and took them to the very same street. And the people there gave him a full measure of dainty fare. The attendants brought the food to the sick monks, and they partook of it.

So one day a discussion was started in the Dhamma Hall how that when some servants were leaving a town, without being able to get dainty fare for their sick masters, the elder took them with him on his round for alms in a street in the cooks’ quarters, and sent them home with abundant dainties. The Teacher came up and inquired the nature of their discussion, and on being told what it was he said: “Not only now, monks, did Sāriputta alone obtain food. Formerly also wise men who had a soft voice and knew how to speak pleasantly obtained the same.” And then he told a tale of the olden time.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of a wealthy merchant.

Now one day a certain deer-stalker had taken venison, and filling his cart with the meat, returned to the city with the intention of selling it. At this time four sons of rich merchants who were living in Benares sallied out of the city, and meeting at some cross roads they sat down and conversed with one another about whatever they had seen or heard. One of these youths on seeing the cart full of meat proposed to go and get a piece of venison from the hunter. The others bade him go and try. So he went up to the hunter, and said: “Hi, sir, give me a piece of meat.” The hunter replied, “A man who begs somewhat from another ought to speak with a gentle voice: you shall receive a piece of meat appropriate to your manner of speech.” Then he uttered the first verse:

1. “For one who is asking a favour, my friend, your language is coarse in its tone, Such language deserves coarse fare in return, so I offer you mere skin and bone.”

Then one of his companions asked him what language he had used in begging for a piece of meat. “I said, Hi, sir!” he replied. “I too,” said the other, “will beg of him.” {3.50} Then he went to the hunter and said: “O elder brother, give me a piece of venison.” The hunter answered, “You shall receive such a piece as the words you have spoken deserve,” and he repeated the second verse:

2. “The name of a brother a strong link is found, to join those akin to each other, As your kind words suggest the gift I should make, so a joint I present to my brother.”

And with these words he took up and threw him a joint of venison. Then a third youth inquired with what words the last had begged for the meat. “I addressed him as brother,” he replied. “Then I too will beg of him,” he said. So he went to the hunter and cried, “Dear father, give me a piece of venison.” The hunter replied, “You shall receive a [3.34] piece suitable to the words you have spoken,” and he repeated the third verse:
3. “As a parent’s fond heart to pity is moved, the cry of “Dear father” to hear,
So I too respond to your loving appeal, and give you the heart of the deer.”

And with these words he picked up and gave him a savoury piece of meat, heart and all. Then the fourth of the youths asked the third youth, with what words he had asked for the venison. “Oh I called him ‘Dear father,’ ” he answered. “Then I too will beg a piece,” said the other, and he went to the hunter and said: “My friend, give me a piece of meat.” Said the hunter, “According to the words you have spoken, shall you receive.” And he repeated the fourth verse:

4. “A world without friends, I venture to think, a wilderness surely must be,
In that title of friend all that’s dear is implied, so I give all the deer unto you.”

Moreover he said: “Come, friend, I will convey all this cartful of meat to your house.”  {3.51} So this merchant’s son had the cart driven to his house, and he went and unloaded the meat. And he treated the hunter with great hospitality and respect, and sending for his wife and son he took him away from his cruel occupation, and settled him on his own estate. And they became inseparable friends, and all their life long lived amicably together.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Sāriputta was the Hunter, and I myself was the merchant’s son who had all the venison given to him.”

Ja 316 Sasajātaka\textsuperscript{636}
The Story about the (Wise) Hare (4s)

Alternative Title: Sasapaṇḍitajātaka (Cst)

In the present one landowner generously provides requisites for the Saṅgha. The Buddha commends him and tells a story of how four animal friends treated a guest on the feast day, with the fourth, a hare, offering up his own body to satisfy his guest, and had his image imprinted on the moon.

The Bodhisatta = the wise hare (sasapaṇḍita),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,

Sāriputta = the monkey (makkaṭa),
Moggallāna = the jackal (sigāla),
Ānanda = the otter (udda).

Past Compare: Cp 10 Sasapaṇḍitacariyā, Jm 6 Śaśa.,

Keywords: Generosity, Self-sacrifice, Animals.

“Seven red fish.” This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, about a gift of all the Buddhist requisites. A certain landowner at Sāvatthi, they say, provided all the requisites for the Saṅgha with Buddha at its head, and setting up a pavilion at his house door, he invited all the company of monastics with Buddha as their chief, seated them on elegant seats prepared for them, and offered them a variety of choice and dainty food. And saying: “Come again tomorrow,” he entertained them for a whole week, and on the seventh day he presented Buddha and the five hundred monastics under him with all the requisites. At the end of the feast the Teacher, in returning thanks, said: “Lay brother, you are right in giving pleasure and satisfaction by this generosity. For this is a tradition of wise men of old, who sacrificed their lives for any beggars they met with, and gave them even their own flesh to eat.” And at the request of his host he related this old world legend.

In the past when Brahmādatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young hare and lived in a wood. On one side of this wood was the foot of a mountain, on another side a river, and on the third side a border-village. The hare had three friends – a monkey, a jackal and an otter. These four wise creatures lived together and each of them got his food on his own hunting-ground, and in the evening they again came together. The hare in his wisdom by way of admonition preached the Dhamma to his three companions, teaching that alms are to be given, the moral law to be observed, and the fast days to be kept. They accepted his admonition and went each to his own part of the jungle and dwelt there.

And so in the course of time the Bodhisatta one day observing the sky, and looking at the moon knew that the next day would be the Uposatha, and addressing his three companions he said: “Tomorrow is the Uposatha. Let all three of you take upon you the moral precepts, and observe the holy day. To one that stands fast in moral practice, generosity brings a great reward. Therefore feed any beggars that come to you by giving them food from your own table.” They readily agreed, and each returned to his own place of dwelling.

On the morrow quite early in the morning, the otter sallied forth to seek his prey and went down to the bank of the Ganges. Now it came to pass that a fisherman had landed seven red fish, and stringing them together on a line, he had taken and buried them in the sand on the river’s bank. And then he dropped down the stream, catching more fish. The otter scenting the buried fish, dug up the sand till he came upon them, and pulling them out cried aloud thrice, “Does any one own these fish?” And not seeing any owner he took hold of the line with his teeth and laid the fish in the jungle where he dwelt, intending to eat them at a fitting time. And then he lay down, thinking how virtuous he was! The jackal too sallied forth in quest of food and found in the hut of a field-watcher two spits, a lizard and a pot of milk-curd. And after thrice crying aloud, “To whom do these belong?” and not finding an owner, he put on his neck the rope for lifting the pot, and grasping the spits and the lizard with his teeth, he brought and laid them in his own lair, thinking: “In due season I will devour them,” and so lay down, reflecting how virtuous he had been.

The monkey also entered the clump of trees, and gathering a bunch of mangoes laid them up in his part of the jungle, meaning to eat them in due season, and then lay down, thinking how virtuous he was.

But the Bodhisatta in due time came out, intending to graze on the kusa grass, and as he lay in the jungle, the thought occurred to him, “It is impossible for me to offer grass to any beggars that may chance to appear, and I have no oil or rice and such like. If any beggar shall appeal to me, I shall have to give him my own flesh to eat.” At this splendid display of virtue, Sakka’s white marble throne manifested signs of heat. Sakka on reflection discovered the cause and resolved to put this royal hare to the test. First of all he went and stood by the otter’s dwelling-place, disguised as a brahmin, and being asked why he stood there, he replied, “Wise sir, if I could get something to eat, after keeping the fast, I would perform all my monastic duties.” The otter replied, “Very well, I will give you some food,” and as he conversed with him he repeated the first verse:
1. “Seven red fish I safely brought to land from Ganges flood,
O brahmin, eat your fill, I pray, and stay within this wood.”

The brahmin said: “Let be till tomorrow. I will see to it by and by.” Next he went to the jackal, and when asked by him why he stood there, he made the same answer. The jackal, too, readily promised him some food, and in talking with him repeated the second verse: {3.54}

2. “A lizard and a jar of curds, the keeper’s evening meal,
Two spits to roast the flesh withal I wrongfully did steal:
Such as I have I give to you: O brahmin, eat, I pray,
If you should deign within this wood a while with us to stay.”

Said the brahmin, “Let be till tomorrow. I will see to it by and by.” Then he went to the monkey, and when asked what he meant by standing there, he answered just as before. The monkey readily offered him some food, and in conversing with him gave utterance to the third verse:

3. “An icy stream, a mango ripe, and pleasant greenwood shade,
’Tis thine to enjoy, if you can dwell content in forest glade.”

Said the brahmin, “Let be till tomorrow. I will see to it by and by.” And he went to the wise hare, and on being asked by him why he stood there, he made the same reply. The Bodhisatta on hearing what he wanted was highly delighted, and said: “Brahmin, you have done well in coming to me for food. This day will I grant you a boon that I have never granted before, but you shall not break the moral law by taking [3.37] animal life. Go, friend, and when you have piled together logs of wood, and kindled a fire, come and let me know, {3.55} and I will sacrifice myself by falling into the midst of the flames, and when my body is roasted, you shall eat my flesh and fulfil all your monastic duties.” And in thus addressing him the hare uttered the fourth verse:

4. “Nor sesame, nor beans, nor rice have I as food to give,
But roast with fire my flesh I yield, if you with us would live.”

Sakka, on hearing what he said, by his miraculous power caused a heap of burning coals to appear, and came and told the Bodhisatta. Rising from his bed of kusa grass and coming to the place, he thrice shook himself that if there were any insects within his coat, they might escape death. Then offering his whole body as a free gift he sprang up, and like a royal swan, alighting on a cluster of lotuses, joyfully he fell on the heap of live coals. But the flame failed even to heat the pores of the hair on the body of the Bodhisatta, and it was as if he had entered a region of frost.

Then he addressed Sakka in these words, “Brahmin, the fire you have kindled is icy-cold: it fails to heat even the pores of the hair on my body. What is the meaning of this?” “Wise sir,” he replied, “I am no brahmin. I am Sakka, and I have come to put your virtue to the test.” The Bodhisatta said: “If not only you, Sakka, but all the inhabitants of the world were to try me in this matter of generosity, they would not find in me any unwillingness to give,” and with this the Bodhisatta uttered a cry of exultation like a lion roaring. Then said Sakka to the Bodhisatta, “O wise hare, be your virtue known throughout a whole aeon.” And squeezing the mountain, with the essence thus extracted, he daubed the sign of a hare on the orb of the moon. And after depositing the hare on a bed of young kusa grass, in the same wooded part of the jungle, Sakka returned to his own place in heaven. {3.56} And these four wise creatures dwelt happily and harmoniously together, fulfilling the moral law and observing the fast days, till they departed to fare according to their deeds.

The Teacher, when he had ended his lesson, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the householder, who gave as a free-gift all the Buddhist requisites, attained fruition of the First Path. “At that time Ānanda was the otter, Moggallāna was the jackal, Sāriputta the monkey, and I myself was the wise hare.”

Ja 317 Matarodanajātaka

The Story about Weeping for the Dead (4s)

In the present one man grieves on the death of his brother and becomes distraught. The Buddha advises him this is the way of nature, and tells a story of a wise man of old who taught the truth to people on the death of a loved one, and quietened their distress.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man who delivered the people from grief (nissokabhāvakarapaṇḍita).

Keywords: Grief, Wisdom, Impermanence.

“Weep for the living.” [3.38] The Teacher while in residence at Jetavana told this story of a certain landowner who dwelt at Sāvatthi.
On the death of his brother, it is said, he was so overwhelmed with grief that he neither ate nor washed nor anointed himself, but in deep affliction he used to go to the cemetery at daybreak to weep. The Teacher, early in the morning casting his eye upon the world and observing in that man a capacity for attaining to the fruition of the First Path, thought: “There is no one but myself that can, by telling him what happened long ago, assuage his grief and bring him to the fruition of the First Path. I must be his refuge.” So next day on returning in the afternoon from his alms round, he took a junior monk and went to his house. On hearing of the Teacher’s arrival, the landowner ordered a seat to be prepared and bade him enter, and saluting him he sat on one side. In answer to the Teacher, who asked him why he was grieving, he said he had been sorrowing ever since his brother’s death. Said the Teacher, “All compound existences are impermanent, and what is to be broken will be broken. One ought not to make a trouble of this. Wise men of old, from knowing this, did not grieve, when their brother died.” And at his request the Teacher related this legend of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was reborn in the family of a rich merchant, worth eighty crores. When he was come of age, his parents died. And on their death a brother of the Bodhisatta managed the family estate. And the Bodhisatta lived in dependence on him. By and by the brother also died of a fatal disease. His relations, friends and companions came together, and throwing up their arms wept and lamented, and no one was able to control his feelings. But the Bodhisatta neither lamented nor wept. Men said: “See now, though his brother is dead, he does not so much as pull a wry face: he is a very hard-hearted fellow. I think he desired his brother’s death, hoping to enjoy a double portion.” Thus did they blame the Bodhisatta. His kinsfolk too reproved him, saying: “Though your brother is dead, you do not shed a tear.” On hearing their words he said: “In your blind folly, not knowing the Eight Worldly Conditions, you weep and cry, “Alas, my brother is dead,” but I too, and you also, will have to die. Why then do you not weep at the thought of your own death? All existing things are transient, and consequently no single compound is able to remain in its natural condition. Though you, blind fools, in your state of ignorance, from not knowing the Eight Worldly Conditions, weep and lament, why should I weep?” And so saying, he repeated these verses:
1. “Weep for the living rather than the dead!
   All creatures that a mortal form do take,

2. Four-footed beast and bird and hooded snake,
   Yea men and angels all the same path tread.

3. Powerless to cope with fate, rejoiced to die,
   'Midst sad vicissitude of bliss and pain,
   Why shedding idle tears should man complain,
   And plunged in sorrow for a brother sigh?

4. Men versed in fraud and in excess grown old,
   The untutored fool, e'en valiant men of might,
   If worldly-wise and ignorant of right,
   Wisdom itself as foolishness may hold.” {3.58}

Thus did the Bodhisatta teach these men the Dhamma, and delivered them all from their sorrow.

The Teacher, after he had ended his Dhamma exposition, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the landowner attained to fruition of the First Path. “At that time the wise man who by his Dhamma exposition delivered people from their sorrow was I myself.”

Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka

The Story about the Oleandar (4s)

In the present one man leaves his wife and becomes a monk, but later is given food by her and is captured by the taste, and wants to return to the lay life. The Buddha tells a story of a courtesan who had betrayed her lover in order to gain another man, and how the latter had run away, fearing her treachery might fall on him too.

The Bodhisatta = the thief (cora),
the monk = the wealthy man’s son (seṭṭhiputta), his former wife = Sāmā (the courtesan).

Present Source: Ja 423 Indriyajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka, Past Compare: Mvu ii p 209 Śyāmā.
Keywords: Treachery, Taste.

"'Twas the joyous time." This was a story told by the Teacher at Jetavana, about a monk who was tempted by thoughts of the wife he had left. The circumstances that led up to the story will be set forth in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423].

The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher’s preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery. So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left: she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him: taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food: when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now: we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country: be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life; send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

Against his will they took him to the Teacher and told him that he was discontent and wished to go back to worldly life. The Teacher said: “Is this tale true?” “It is, Lord.” “Who causes you to fall back?” “My wife.”

The Teacher, addressing this monk, said: “Once before, through her, you had your head cut off.” And then he related a legend of the past. \[3.59\]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a village of Kāsi in the home of a certain householder, under the star of a robber. When he grew up to be a man, he gained his living by robbery, and his fame was blazed abroad in the world, as a bold fellow and as strong as an elephant. And no man could catch him. One day he broke into a rich merchant’s house and carried off much treasure. The townsfolk came to the king and said: “Sire, a mighty robber is plundering the city: have him arrested.” The king ordered the governor of the city to seize him. So in the night the governor posted men here and there in detachments, and having effected his capture with the money upon him, he reported it to the king. The king bade the governor cut off his head. Then the governor had his arms tightly bound behind him, and having tied a wreath of red oleander flowers about his neck and sprinkled brickdust on his head, had him scourged with whips in every square, and then led to the place of execution to the music of the harsh-sounding drum. Men said: “This rapacious robber who loots our city is taken,” and the whole city was greatly moved.

At this time there lived in Benares a courtesan named Sāmā, whose price was a thousand pieces of money. She was a favourite of the king’s, and had a suite of five hundred female slaves. And as she stood at an open window on the upper floor of the palace, she saw this robber being led along. Now he was comely and gracious to look upon, and stood forth above all men, exceedingly glorious and god-like in appearance. And when she saw him being thus led past, she fell in love with him and thought within herself, “By what device can I secure this man for my husband?” “This is the way,” she said, and sent by the hand of one of her female attendants a thousand pieces of money to the governor and, “Tell him,” she said,
“this robber is Sāmā’s brother, and he has no other refuge except in Sāmā. And ask him to accept the money and let his prisoner escape.” [3.60] The handmaid did as she was told. But the governor said: “This is a notorious robber, I cannot let him go free after this sort. But if I could find another man as a substitute, I could put the robber in a covered carriage and send him to you.” The slave came and reported this to her mistress.

Now at this time a certain rich young merchant, who was enamoured of Sāmā, presented her every day with a thousand pieces of money. And that very day at sunset her lover came as usual to her house with the money. And Sāmā took the money and placed it in her lap and sat weeping. And when she was asked what was the cause of her sorrow, she said: “My lord, this robber is my brother, though he never came to see me, because people say I follow a vile trade: when I sent a message to the governor he sent word that if he were to receive a thousand pieces of money, he would let his prisoner go free. And now I cannot find any one to go and take this money to the governor.” The youth for the love he bare her said: “I will go.” “Go, then,” said she, “and take with you the money you brought me.” So he took it and went to the house of the governor. [3.41]

The governor hid the young merchant in a secret place, and had the robber conveyed in a closed carriage to Sāmā. Then he thought: “This robber is well known in the country. It must be quite dark first. And then, when all men are retired to rest, I will have the man executed.” And so making some excuse for delaying it a while, when people had retired to rest, he sent the young merchant with a large escort to the place of execution, and cutting off his head with a sword impaled his body, and returned into the city.

Thenceforth Sāmā accepted nought at any other man’s hand, but passed all her time, taking her pleasure with this robber only. The thought occurred to the robber, “If this woman should fall in love with any one else, she will have me put to death too, and take her pleasure with him. She is very treacherous to her friends. I must no longer dwell here, but make haste to escape.” When he was going away, [3.61] he thought: “I will not go empty-handed, but will take some of the ornaments belonging to her.” So one day he said to her, “My dear, we always stay indoors like tame cockatoos in a cage. Some day we will disport ourselves in the garden.” She readily assented and prepared every kind of food, hard and soft, and decked herself out with all her ornaments, and drove to the garden with him.
seated in a closed carriage. While he was disporting himself with her, he thought: “Now must be the time for me to escape.” So under a show of violent affection for her, he entered into a thicket of oleander bushes, and pretending to embrace her, he squeezed her till she became insensible. Then throwing her down he robbed her of all her ornaments, and fastening them in her outer garment he placed the bundle on his shoulder, and leaping over the garden wall made off.

And when she had recovered consciousness, rising up she went and asked her attendants, what had become of her young lord. “We do not know, lady.” “He thinks,” she said: “I am dead, and must in his alarm have run away.” And being distressed at the thought, she returned thence to her house, and said: “Not till I have set eyes on my dear lord, will I rest upon a sumptuous couch,” and she lay down upon the ground. And from that day she neither put on comely garments, nor ate more than one meal, nor affected scents and wreaths and the like. And being resolved to seek and recover her lover by every possible means, she sent for some actors and gave them a thousand pieces of money. On their asking, “What are we to do for this, lady?” She said: “There is no place that you do not visit. Go then to every village, town and city, and gathering a crowd around you, first of all sing this song in the midst of the people,” teaching the actors the first verse. “And if,” said she, “when you have sung this song, my husband shall be one of the crowd, he will speak to you. Then you may tell him I am quite well, and bring him back with you. And should he refuse to come, send me a message.”

And giving them their expenses for the journey, she sent them off. They started from Benares, and calling the people together here and there, at last arrived at a border-village. Now the robber, since his flight, was living here. And the actors gathered a crowd about them, and sang the first verse:

1. “'Twas the joyous time of spring,
   Bright with flowers each shrub and tree,
   From her swoon awakening
   Sāmā lives, and lives for thee.”

The robber on hearing this drew near to the actor, and said: “You say that Sāmā is alive, but I do not believe it.” And addressing him he repeated the second verse:
2. “Can fierce winds a mountain shake?
   Can they make firm earth to quake?
   But alive the dead to see
   Marvel stranger far would be!” {3.63}

The actor on hearing these words uttered the third verse:

   3. “Sāmā surely is not dead,
      Nor another lord would wed.
      Fasting from all meals but one,
      She loves you and you alone.”

The robber on hearing this said: “Whether she be alive or dead, I don’t want her,” and with these words he repeated the fourth verse:

   4. “Sāmā’s fancy ever roves
      From tried faith to lighter loves:
      Me too Sāmā would betray,
      Were I not to flee away.”

The actors came and told Sāmā how he had dealt with them. And she, full of regrets, took once more to her old course of life.

The Teacher, when his lesson was ended, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the worldly-minded monk attained to fruition of the First Path. “At that time this monk was the rich merchant’s son, the wife he had left was Sāmā, and I myself was the robber.”

Ja 319 Tittirajātaka

The Story about the (Decoy) Partridge (4s)

In the present the Buddha’s son Rāhula is so keen to keep the rules he even sleeps in the outhouse at night. The Buddha commends his good qualities and tells a story of a partridge that had scruples when used by a hunter as a decoy to attract his prey, and the wise man who consoled him.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Rāhula = the partridge (tittira).

Present Source: Ja 16 Tipallatthamigajātaka, Quoted at: Ja 319 Tittirajātaka.
Keywords: Sruples, Animals, Birds.

“Happy life.” [3.43] [3.64] This was a story told by the Teacher while living in the Badarika monastery near Kosambī, regarding the elder Rāhula. The introductory story has already been related in full in the Tipallathajātaka [Ja 16].

Once when the Teacher was dwelling in the Aggāḷava Temple nearby the town of Āḷavi, many female lay-disciples and nuns used to flock there to hear the Dhamma preached. The preaching was in the daytime, but as time wore on, the women did not attend, and there were only monks and men disciples present. Then the preaching took place in the evening; and at the close the elder monks retired each to his own chamber. But the younger ones with the lay-disciples lay down to rest in the Attendance Hall. When they fell asleep, loud was the snoring and snorting and gnashing of teeth as they lay. After a short slumber some got up, and reported to the Fortunate One the impropriety which they had witnessed. Said he, “If a monk sleeps in the company of novices, it is a Pācittiya offence (requiring confession).” And after delivering this precept he went away to Kosambī.

Thereon the monks said to the venerable Rāhula, “Sir, the Fortunate One has laid down this precept, and now you will please find quarters of your own.” Now, before this, the monks, out of respect for the father and because of the anxious desire of the son to observe the rules of the Saṅgha, had welcomed the youth as if the place were his; they had fitted up a little bed for him, and had given him a cloth to make a pillow with. But on the day of our story they would not even give him house-room, so fearful were they of transgressing.

The excellent Rāhula went neither to the One with Ten Powers as being his father, nor to Sāriputta, Captain of the Dhamma, as being his preceptor, nor to the Great Moggallāna as being his teacher, nor to the elder Ānanda as being his uncle; but betook himself to the One with Ten Powers’ outhouse and took up his abode there as though in a heavenly mansion. Now in the One with Ten Powers’ outhouse the door is always closely shut: the levelled floor is of perfumed earth; flowers and garlands are festooned round the walls; and all night long a lamp burns there. But it was not this splendour which prompted Rāhula to take up his residence here. Nay, it was simply because the monks had told him to find quarters for himself, and because he reverenced instruction and yearned to observe the rules of the Saṅgha. Indeed, from time to time the monks, to test him, when they saw him coming from quite a distance, used to throw down a hand-broom or a little dust-sweepings, and then ask who had thrown it down, after Rāhula had come in. “Well, Rāhula came that way,” would be the remark, but never did the future elder say he knew nothing about it. On the contrary, he used to remove the litter and humbly ask pardon of the monk, nor go away till he was assured that he was pardoned; so anxious was he to observe the rules. And it was solely this anxiety which made him take up his dwelling in the outhouse.

Now, though day had not yet dawned, the Teacher halted at the door of the outhouse and coughed “Ahem.” “Ahem,” responded the venerable Rāhula. “Who is there?” said the Buddha. “It is I, Rāhula,” was the reply; and out came the young man and bowed low. “Why have you been sleeping here, Rāhula?” “Because I had nowhere to go to. Up till now, sir, the monks have been very kind to me; but such is their present fear of erring that they won’t give me shelter any more. Consequently, I took up my abode here, because I thought it a spot where I should not come into contact with anybody else.”

Then thought the Teacher to himself, “If they treat even Rāhula like this, what will they not do to other youths whom they admit to the Saṅgha?” And his heart was moved within him for the Dhamma. So, at an early hour he had the monks assembled, and questioned the Captain of the Dhamma thus, “I suppose you at all events, Sāriputta, know where Rāhula is now quartered?”

“No, sir, I do not.”

“Sāriputta, Rāhula was living this day in the outhouse. Sāriputta, if you treat Rāhula like this, what will be your treatment of other youths who go forth in this dispensation? Such treatment will not retain those who join us. In future, keep your novices in your own quarters for a day or two, and only on the third day let them lodge out, taking care to acquaint yourself with their lodging.” With this rider, the Teacher laid down the precept.

Now when the monks in the Dhamma Hall were setting forth the praises of the venerable Rāhula, and speaking of him as fond of instruction, scrupulous and patient of rebuke, the Teacher came up and on hearing from them the subject of their discourse said: “Not only now, but formerly also Rāhula possessed all these virtues.” And then he told them a legend of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. And when he grew up, he studied all the arts at Taxila, and giving up the world devoted himself to the ascetic life in the Himālayas, and developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments. There enjoying the pleasures of Absorption he dwelt in a pleasant grove, whence he journeyed to a frontier village to procure salt and vinegar. The people, on seeing him, became believers, and built him a hut of leaves in a wood, and providing him with all that he required, made a home for him there.

At this time a fowler in this village had caught a decoy partridge, and putting it in a cage carefully trained and looked after it. Then he took it to the wood, and by its cry decoyed all the other partridges that came near. The partridge thought: “Through me many of my kinsfolk come by their death. This is a wicked act on my part.” So it kept quiet. When its master found it was quiet, he struck it on the head with a piece of bamboo. The partridge from the pain it suffered uttered a cry. And the fowler gained a living by decoying other partridges through it. Then the partridge thought: “Well, suppose they die. There is no evil intention on my part. Do the evil consequences of my action affect me? When I am quiet, they do not come, but when I utter a cry, they do. And all that come this fellow catches and puts to death. Is there any sinful act here on my part, or is there not?” Thenceforth the only thought of the partridge is, “Who verily may resolve my doubt?” and it went about seeking for such a wise man. Now one day the fowler snared a lot of partridges, and filling his basket with them he came to the Bodhisatta’s hermitage to beg a draught of water. And putting down the cage near the Bodhisatta, he drank some water and lay down on the sand and fell asleep. The partridge observing that he was asleep thought: “I will ask this ascetic as to my doubt, and if he knows he will solve my difficulty.” And as it lay in its cage, it repeated the first verse in the form of a question:

1. “Happy life I lead all day,
   Food abundant falls to me:
   Yet I’m in a parlous way,
   What’s my future state to be?”

The Bodhisatta solving this question uttered the second verse:
2. “If no evil in your heart
Prompts to deed of villainy,
Should you play a passive part,
Guilt attaches not to you.”

The partridge on hearing this uttered the third verse:

3. “Lo! Our kinsman: thus they cry,
And in crowds they flock to see.
Am I guilty, should they die?
Please resolve this doubt for me.” [3.66]

On hearing this, the Bodhisatta repeated the fourth verse:

4. “If no wrong lurks in the heart,
Innocent the deed will be.
He who plays a passive part
From all guilt is counted free.”

Thus did the Great Being console the partridge. And through him the bird was freed from remorse. Then the fowler waking up saluted the Bodhisatta and took up his cage and made off.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Rāhula was the partridge, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 320 Succajajātaka

The Story about Little Cost (4s)

In the present when a landowner is returning to town with his wife she asks him if he would give her anything from a mountain of gold, and he replies he would not. The Buddha tells a story of a prince in exile who said the same thing to his wife, but when he was able to, he gave her dominion over all.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
the householder = the king of Benares (Bārāṇāsirājā), the lay woman = the queen (devī).

Keywords: Deserts, Recompense.

“He might give.” This story was told by the Teacher, while residing at Jetavana, with regard to a certain landowner. According to the story he went to a village with his wife to retrieve a debt, and seizing a cart in satisfaction for what was due to him he deposited it with a certain family, intending to fetch it [3.45] later on. While on the road to Sāvatthi, they came in sight of a mountain. The wife asked him, “Suppose this mountain were to become all gold, would you give me some of it?” “Who are you?” he replied, “I would not give you a jot.” “Alas,” she cried, “he is a hard-hearted man. Though the mountain should become pure gold, he would not give me an atom.” And she was highly displeased.

When they drew near to Jetavana, feeling thirsty, they went into the monastery, and had some water to drink. {3.67} At daybreak the Teacher seeing in them a capacity for emancipation, sat in a cell of his Perfumed Chamber, looking out for their arrival, and emitted the six-coloured Buddha rays. And after they had quenched their thirst, they came to the Teacher and respectfully saluting him sat down. The Teacher, after the usual kindly greetings, asked them where they had been. “We have been, venerable sir, to call in a debt.” “Lay sister,” he said: “I hope your husband is anxious for your good and ready to do you a kindness.” “Venerable sir,” she replied, “I am very affectionate to him, but he has no love for me. Today when I asked him, on catching sight of a mountain, ‘Supposing it were all pure gold, would you give me some?’ he answered, ‘Who are you? I would not give you a jot.’ So hard-hearted is he.” “Lay sister,” said the Teacher, “he talks like this. But whenever he calls to mind your virtues he is ready to give you lordship over all.” “Tell us about it, your reverence,” they cried, and at their request he related this legend of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his minister, rendering him all due service. One day the king saw his son, who acted as his viceroy, coming to pay his respects to him. He thought to himself, “This fellow may do me wrong, if he gets an opportunity.” So he sent for him and said: “As long as I live, you cannot dwell in this city. Live somewhere else, and at my death rule the kingdom.” He agreed to these conditions, and bidding his father farewell he started from Benares with his chief wife. On coming to a frontier village, he built himself a hut of leaves in a wood, and stayed there, supporting life on wild roots and fruit.

By and by the king died. The young viceroy, from his observation of the stars, knew of his father’s death, and as he journeyed to Benares, a mountain came into sight. His wife said to him, “Supposing, sir, yonder mountain were turned into pure gold, would you give me some of it?” “Who are you?” he cried, “I would not give you an atom.” She thought: “Through my love for him I entered this forest, not having the heart to desert him, and he speaks to me thus. [3.68] He is very hard-hearted, and if he becomes king, what good will he do me?” And she was sore at heart.

On reaching Benares he was established on the throne and raised her to the dignity of chief queen. He merely gave her titular rank, but beyond this he paid her no respect or honour, and did not even recognize her existence. Thought the Bodhisatta, “This queen was helpmate to the king, not counting the pain, and dwelt with him in the wilderness. But he, taking no count of this, goes about, taking his pleasure with other women. But I will bring it about that she shall receive lordship over [3.46] all.”

With this thought he went one day and saluting her said: “Lady, we do not receive from you so much as a lump of rice. Why are you so hard-hearted, and why do you thus neglect us?” “Friend,” she replied, “if I myself were to receive anything, I would give it you, but if I get nothing, what am I to give? What, pray, is the king likely to give me? On the road here, when asked, ‘If yonder mountain were all pure gold, would you give me anything?’ he answered, ‘Who are you? I would give you nothing.’ ” “Well, could you repeat all this before the king?” he said. “Why should I not, friend?” she answered. “Then when I stand in the king’s presence,” he said: “I will ask and you shall repeat it.” “Agreed, friend,” she said.

So the Bodhisatta, when he stood and paid his respects to the king, asked the queen, saying: “Are we not, lady, to receive anything at your hands?” “Sir,” she answered, “when I get anything, I will give you something. But, pray, what is the king likely to give me now? When we were coming from the forest, and a mountain came into sight, I asked him, ‘If yonder mountain were all pure gold, would you give me some of it?’ ‘Who are you?’ he said, ‘I will give you nothing.’ And in these words he refused what it was easy to give.” [3.69] To illustrate this, she repeated the first verse:
The Section with Four Verses – 1159

1. “He might give at little cost
What he would not miss, if lost.
Golden mountains I bestow;
He to all I ask says ‘No.’”

The king on hearing this uttered the second verse:

2. “When you can, say, ‘Yes, I will,’
When you cannot, promise nil.
Broken promises are lies;
Liars all wise men despise.”

The queen, when she heard this, raising her joined hands in respectful salutation, repeated the third verse:

3. “Standing fast in righteousness,
You, O prince, we humbly bless.
Fortune may all else destroy;
Truth is still your only joy.” [3.70]

The Bodhisatta, after hearing the queen sing the praises of the king, set forth her virtues and repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Known to fame as peerless wife,
Sharing weal and woe of life,
Equal she to either fate,
Fit with even kings to mate.”

The Bodhisatta in these words sang the praises of the queen, saying: “This lady, your majesty, in the time of your adversity, lived with you [3.47] and shared your sorrows in the forest. You ought to do her honour.” The king, at his words, called to mind the queen’s virtues and said: “Wise sir, at your words I am reminded of the queen’s virtues,” and so saying he gave all power into her hand. Moreover he bestowed great power upon the Bodhisatta. “For it was by you,” he said: “I was reminded of the queen’s virtues.”

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths, the husband and wife attained to fruition of the First Path. “At that time this landowner was the king of Benares, this lay sister was the queen, and I myself was the wise councillor.”
Ja 321 Kuṭidūsakajātaka
The Story about Spoiling the Hut (4s)

In the present one of Ven. Mahākassapa’s novices grows angry with his teacher, behaves badly, and eventually burns down his hut, before falling into hell. The Buddha tells a story of a monkey, who, when reproved for his inabilities, destroyed a bird’s home.

The Bodhisatta = the horned bird (siṅgilasakunā), the young monk who burned down (Mahākassapa’s) hut = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Present Compare: Dhp-a V.2 Mahākassapatherassa saddhivihārika.

Keywords: Anger, Revenge, Animals, Birds.

“Monkey, in feet.” [3.71] This was a story told by the Teacher while dwelling at Jetavana, about a young disciple who burnt down the hut of leaves of the elder Mahākassapa. The incident that led to the story originated in Rājagaha. At that time, they say, the elder was living in a cell in the forest near Rājagaha. Two young novices ministered to his wants. The one of them was serviceable to the elder, the other was ill-behaved. Whatever was done by his comrade, he made as if it were done by himself. For instance, when the other lad had placed water to rinse the mouth, he goes to the elder and saluting him, says, “Sir, the water is ready. Please rinse your mouth.” And when his companion had risen early and swept out the elder’s cell, as soon as the elder appears, he knocks things about here and there, and makes as if the whole cell had been swept out by himself.

The dutiful disciple thought: “This ill-behaved fellow claims whatever I do just as if he had done it himself. I will expose his cunning behaviour.” So when the young rogue had returned from the village and was sleeping after his meal, he heated water for the bath, and hid it in a back room, and then put merely a small quantity of water in the boiler. The other lad on waking went and saw the steam rising up and thought: “No doubt our friend has heated the water and put it in the bathroom.” So going to the elder he said: “Sir, the water is in the bathroom. Please, take your bath.” The elder went with him to take a bath, and finding no water in the bathroom asked where the water was. The lad went hastily to the heating chamber and let down a ladle into the empty boiler. The ladle struck against the bottom of the empty vessel, and gave forth a rattling sound. (Thenceforth the boy was known by the name of Uḷuṅkasaddaka [Rattle-Ladle].)
At this moment the other lad fetched the water from the back room, and said: “Sir, please take your bath.” The elder had his bath, \(3.72\) and being now aware of Uḷuṅka’s misconduct, when the boy came in the evening to wait upon him, he reproached him and said: “When one that is under monastic vows \(3.48\) has done a thing himself, then only has he the right to say, ‘I did that.’ Otherwise it is a deliberate lie. Henceforth be not guilty of conduct like this.”

The boy was angry with the elder, and next day refused to go into the town with him to beg for alms. But the other youth accompanied the elder. And Uḷuṅka went to see a family of the elder’s retainers. When they inquired where the elder was, he answered that he remained at home ill. They asked what he ought to have. He said: “Give me so and so,” and took it and went to a place that he fancied, and ate it and returned to the hermitage. Next day the elder visited that family and sat down with them. The people said: “You are not well, are you? Yesterday, they say, you stopped at home in your cell. We sent you some food by the hand of such and such a lad. Did your reverence partake of it?” The elder held his peace, and when he had finished his meal, returned to the monastery.

In the evening when the boy came to wait upon him, the elder addressed him thus, “You went begging, sir, in such and such a family, and in such and such a village. And you begged, saying, ‘The elder must have so and so to eat.’ And then, they say, you ate it yourself. Such begging is highly improper. See that you are not guilty of such misconduct again.”

So the boy for ever so long nursed a grudge against the elder, thinking: “Yesterday merely on account of a little water he picked a quarrel with me. And now being indignant because of my having eaten a handful of rice in the house of his retainers, he quarrels with me again. I will find out the right way to deal with him.” And next day, when the elder had gone into the city for alms, he took a hammer and broke all the vessels used for food, and setting fire to the hut of leaves, took to his heels. While still alive he became a Peta in the world of men, and withered away till he died and was born again in the Great Hell of Avīci. And the fame of his evil deed spread abroad amongst the people.

So one day some monks came from Rājagaha to Sāvatthi, and after putting away their bowls and robes in a convenient place they went and saluting the Teacher sat down. The Teacher conversed pleasantly with them and asked whence they had come. “From Rājagaha, sir.” “Who is the teacher that preaches there?” he said. “The Great Kassapa, sir.” “Is Kassapa quite well, monks?” he asked. “Yes, venerable sir, the elder is well. But a youthful member of the fraternity was so angry on account of a reproof he gave him, that he set fire to the elder’s hut of leaves, and made off.” {3.73} The Teacher, on hearing this, said: “Monks, solitude is better for Kassapa than keeping company with a fool like this.” And so saying he repeated a verse in the Dhammapada [Dhp. 61]:

“\textit{To travel with the vulgar herd refuse,} \textit{And fellowship with foolish folk eschew;}
\textit{Your peer or better for a comrade choose}
\textit{Or else in solitude your way pursue.}”

Moreover he again addressed the monks and said: “Not only now, monks, did this youth destroy the hut and feel angry with one that reproved him. In former times too he was angry.” And he then told them a legend of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young horned bird. And when he grew to be a big bird, he settled in the Himālayas and built him a nest to his fancy, that was proof against the rain. Then a certain monkey in the rainy season, when the rain fell without intermission, sat near the Bodhisatta, his teeth chattering by reason of the severe cold. The Bodhisatta, seeing him thus distressed, fell to talking with him, and uttered the first verse: [3.49]

1. “\textit{Monkey, in feet and hands and face} \textit{So like the human form,} \textit{Why buildest you no dwelling-place,} \textit{To hide you from the storm?”}

The monkey, on hearing this, replied with a second verse:

2. “\textit{In feet and hands and face, O bird,} \textit{Though close to man allied,} \textit{Wisdom, chief boon on him conferred,} \textit{To me has been denied.”}

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, repeated yet two more couplets:
3. “He that inconstancy betrays, a light and fickle mind,
Unstable proved in all his ways, no happiness may find. {3.74}

4. Monkey, in virtue to excel, do you your utmost strive,
And safe from wintry blast to dwell, go, hut of leaves contrive.”

Thought the monkey, “This creature, through dwelling in a place that is sheltered from the rain, despises me. I will not suffer him to rest quietly in this nest.” Accordingly, in his eagerness to catch the Bodhisatta, he made a spring upon him. But the Bodhisatta flew up into the air, and winged his way elsewhere. And the monkey, after smashing up and destroying his nest, betook himself off.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka. “At that time the youth that fired the hut was the monkey, and I myself was the horns bird.”

Ja 322 Daddabhājātaka

The Story about the Pounding Sound (4s)

Alternative Title: Duddubhājātaka (Cst)

In the present the Buddha is asked about the ascetic practices of the outsiders and declares them of no use for the goal. He then tells a story in which a hare heard a loud noise when a hard fruit fell to earth and thought the world was coming to an end. He ran away scaring all the animals to begin a stampede, until a lion showed him the cause of his fright.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha).

Past Source: Ja 322 Daddabha,
Quoted: Ja 536 Kuṇāla (Present).

Keywords: Asceticism, Fright, Animals.

“From the spot where.” This story was told by the Teacher, when he dwelt at Jetavana, about some heretics. These heretics, they say, in various places near Jetavana, made their beds on thorns, suffered the five-fold forms of fire penance, and practised false asceticism of many different kinds. Now a number of the monks, after going their rounds for alms in Sāvatthī, on their way back to Jetavana saw these heretics undergoing their pretended austerities, and came and asked the Teacher, {3.75} “Is there, sir, any virtue in these heterodox monasteries in taking upon them these practices?” The Teacher said: “There is no [3.50] virtue, monks, nor any special merit in it. When it is examined and tested, it is like a path over a dunghill, or like the noise the hare heard.” “We do not know, sir, what that noise was. Tell us, venerable sir.” So at their request he told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young lion. And when fully grown he lived in a wood. At this time there was near the western ocean a grove of palms mixed with wood apple trees. A certain hare lived here beneath a palm sapling, at the foot of a wood apple tree. One day this hare after feeding came and lay down beneath the young palm tree. And the thought struck him, “If this earth should be destroyed, what would become of me?” And at this very moment a ripe wood apple fruit fell on a palm leaf. At the sound of it, the hare thought: “This solid earth is collapsing,” and starting up he fled, without so much as looking behind him. Another hare saw him scampering off, as if frightened to death, and asked the cause of his panic flight. “Pray, don’t ask me,” he said. The other hare cried, “Pray, sir, what is it?” and kept running after him. Then the hare stopped a moment and without looking back said: “The earth here is breaking up.” And at this the second hare ran after the other. And so first one and then another hare caught sight of him running, and joined in the chase till one hundred thousand hares all took to flight together. They were seen by a deer, a boar, an elk, a buffalo, a wild ox, a rhinoceros, a tiger, a lion and an elephant. And when they asked what it meant and were told that the earth was breaking up, they too took to flight. {3.76} So by degrees this host of animals extended to the length of a full league.

When the Bodhisatta saw this headlong flight of the animals, and heard the cause of it was that the earth was coming to an end, he thought: “The earth is nowhere coming to an end. Surely it must be some sound which was misunderstood by them. And if I don’t make a great effort, they will all perish. I will save their lives.” So with the speed of a lion he got before them to the foot of a mountain, and lion-like roared three times. They were terribly frightened at the lion, and stopping in their flight stood all huddled together. The lion went in amongst them and asked why they were running away.

He asked the elephants. “We don’t know,” they said, “the lions know.” But the lions said: “We don’t know, the tigers know.” The tigers said: “The rhinoceroses know.” The rhinoceroses said: “The wild oxen know.” The wild oxen, “The buffaloes.” The buffaloes, “The elks.” The elks, “The boars.” The boars, “The deer.” The deer said: “We don’t know, the hares know.” When the hares were questioned, they pointed to one particular hare and said: “This one told us.”

So the Bodhisatta asked, “Is it true, sir, that the earth is breaking up?” “Yes, sir, I saw it,” said the hare. “Where,” he asked, “were you living, when you saw it?” “Near the ocean, sir, in a grove of palms mixed with wood apple trees. For as I was lying beneath the shade of a palm sapling at the foot of a wood apple tree, I thought, ‘If this earth should break up, where shall I go?’ And at that very moment I heard the sound of the breaking up of the earth and I fled.”

Thought the lion, “A ripe wood apple fruit evidently must have fallen on a palm leaf and made a thudding sound, and this hare jumped to the conclusion that the earth was coming to an end, and ran away. {3.77} I will find out the exact truth about it.” So he reassured the herd of animals, and said: “I will take the hare and go and find out exactly whether the earth is coming to an end or not, in the place pointed out by him. Until I return, do you stay here.”

Then placing the hare on his back, he sprang forward with the speed of a lion, and putting the hare down in the palm grove, he said: “Come, show us the place you meant.” “I dare not, my lord,” said the hare. “Come, don’t be afraid,” said the lion.

The hare, not venturing to go near the wood apple tree, stood afar off and cried, “Yonder, sir, is the place of dreadful sound,” and so saying, he repeated the first verse:

1. “From the spot where I did dwell
   Issued forth a fearful thud;
   What it was I could not tell,
   Nor what caused it understood.”

After hearing what the hare said, the lion went to the foot of the wood apple tree, and saw the spot where the hare had been lying beneath the shade of the palm tree, and the ripe wood apple fruit that fell on the palm leaf, and having carefully ascertained that the earth had not broken up, he placed the hare on his back and with the speed of a lion soon came again to the herd of beasts.

Then he told them the whole story, and said: “Don’t be afraid.” And having thus reassured the herd of beasts, he let them go. Verily, if it had not been for the Bodhisatta at that time, all the beasts would have rushed into the sea and perished. It was all owing to the Bodhisatta that they escaped death.

2. “Alarmed at sound of fallen fruit
A hare once ran away,
The other beasts all followed suit
Moved by that hare’s dismay. [3.52]

3. They hastened not to view the scene,
But lent a willing ear
To idle gossip, and were clean
Distraught with foolish fear. {3.78}

4. They who to wisdom’s calm delight
And virtue’s heights attain,
Though ill example should invite,
Such panic fear disdain.”

These three verses were spoken after Fully Awakening.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time I myself was the lion.”

Ja 323 Brahmadattajātaka

The Story about (King) Brahmadatta

In the present the monks go round asking people to give them workers and goods for the huts they are building. The Buddha reproves them and tells a story of how an ascetic in

---

638 [The king is nowhere named in the story, and Brahmadatta is normally named as the king of Benares, not Pañcāla, as here.]
bygone days had been too ashamed to ask a king for a pair of shoes and an umbrella and had dallied for twelve years before giving his request.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of North Pañcāla) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 253 Maṇikaṇṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 323 Brahmadatta, Ja 403 Aṭṭhisena,
Present Compare: Vin Sd 6 (3.144).

Keywords: Reticence, Modesty.

“Such is the quality.” This story was told by the Teacher, while dwelling in the Aggāḷava shrine near Āḷavī, concerning the regulations to be observed in the building of cells.639 The introductory story has already been set forth in the Maṇikaṇṭhajātaka [Ja 253].

Some monks who lived in Āḷavī were begging from all quarters the materials for houses which they were getting made for themselves. They were for ever asking, “Give us a man, give us somebody to do servant’s work,” and so forth. Everybody was annoyed at this begging and solicitation. So much annoyed were they, that at sight of these monks they were startled and scared away.

It happened that the venerable monk Mahākassapa entered Āḷavī, and traversed the place in quest of alms. The people, as soon as they saw the elder, ran away as before. After mealtime, having returned from his rounds, he summoned the monks, and thus addressed them, “Once Āḷavī was a good place for alms; why is it so poor now?” They told him the reason.

Now the Fortunate One was at the time dwelling at the Aggāḷava shrine. The elder came to the Fortunate One, and told him all about it.

But on this occasion the Teacher said: “Is it true, monks, that you live here by your importunity in asking and begging for alms?” And when they answered, “Yes,” he reproved them and said: “Wise men of old, when offered their choice by the king, though they were longing to ask for a pair of single-soled shoes, through fear of doing violence to their sensitive and scrupulous nature, did not venture to say a word in the presence of the people, but spoke in private.” And so saying he told them a story of the past. [3.79]

639 See Suttavibhaṅga vi. 1.

In the past in the Kampillaka kingdom, when a Pañcāla king was reigning in a north Pañcāla city, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family, in a certain market town. And when he was grown up, he acquired a knowledge of the arts at Taxila. Afterwards taking ordination as an ascetic and dwelling in the Himālayas, he lived for a long time by what he could glean – feeding on wild fruits and roots. [3.53]

And wandering into the haunts of men for the purpose of procuring salt and vinegar, he came to a city of north Pañcāla and took up his abode in the king’s garden. Next day he went into the city to beg alms, and came to the king’s gate. The king was so pleased with his deportment and behaviour that he seated him on the dais and fed him with food worthy of a king. And he bound him by a solemn promise and assigned him a lodging in the garden.

He lived constantly in the king’s house, and at the end of the rainy season, being anxious to return to the Himālayas, he thought: “If I go upon this journey, I must get a pair of single-soled shoes and a parasol of leaves. I will beg them of the king.” One day he came to the garden, and finding the king sitting there, he saluted him and resolved he would ask him for the shoes and parasol. But his second thought was, “A man who begs of another, saying, ‘Give me so and so,’ is apt to weep. And the other man also when he refuses, saying, ‘I have it not,’ in his turn weeps.” And that the people might not see either him or the king weeping, he thought: “We will both weep quietly in some secret place.” So he said: “Great king, I am anxious to speak with you in private.” The royal attendants on hearing this departed. Thought the Bodhisatta, “If the king should refuse my prayer, our friendship will be at an end. So I will not ask a boon of him.” That day, not venturing to mention the subject, he said: “Go now, Great king, I will see about this matter by and by.” Another day on the king’s coming to the garden, saying, 640 See Mahāvagga, v. 1. 28. Shoes with more than a single lining were not to be worn by the monks, except when they had been cast off by others.

---

The Section with Four Verses – 1169

as before, first this and then that, he could not frame his request. And so twelve years elapsed.

Then the king thought, {3.80} “This priest said, ‘I wish to speak in private,’ and when the courtiers are departed, he has not the courage to speak. And while he is longing to do so, twelve years have elapsed. After living an ascetic life so long, I suspect, he is regretting the world. He is eager to enjoy pleasures and is longing for sovereignty. But being unable to frame the word ‘Kingdom,’ he keeps silent. Today now I will offer him whatever he desires, from my kingdom downwards.”

So he went to the garden and sitting down saluted him. The Bodhisatta asked to speak to him in private, and when the courtiers had departed, he could not utter a word. The king said: “For twelve years you have asked to speak to me in private, and when you have had the opportunity, you have not been able to say a word. I offer you everything, beginning with my kingdom. Do not be afraid, but ask for whatever you please.”

“Great king,” he said, “will you give me what I want?” [3.54] “Yes, venerable sir, I will.” “Great king, when I go on my journey, I must have a pair of single-soled shoes and a parasol of leaves.”

“Have you not been able, sir, for twelve years to ask for such a trifle as this?”

“That is so, Great king.”

“Why, sir, did you act thus?” “Great king, the man who says ‘Give me so and so,’ sheds tears, and the one who refuses and says ‘I have it not,’ in his turn weeps. If, when I begged, you should have refused me, I feared the people might see us mingling our tears. This is why I asked for a secret interview.” Then from the beginning he repeated three verses:

1. “Such is the quality of prayer, O king,
   ’Twill a rich gift or a refusal bring.

2. Who beg, Pañcāla lord, to weep are fain,
   They who refuse are apt to weep again.

3. Lest people see us shed the idle tear,
   My prayer I whisper in your secret ear.” {3.81}

The king, being charmed with this mark of respect on the part of the Bodhisatta, granted him the boon and spoke the fourth verse:
4. “Brahmin, I offer you a thousand kine,
Red kine, and eke the leader of the herd;
Hearing but now these generous words of thine,
I too in turn to generous deed am stirred.”

But the Bodhisatta said: “I do not, sire, desire material pleasures. Give me only that which I ask for.” And he took a pair of single-soled shoes and the parasol of leaves, and exhorted the king to be zealous in the dispensation and to keep the moral law and observe fast days. And though the king begged him to stay, he went off to the Himālayas, where he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and was destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 324 Cammasāṭakajātaka
The Story about (the Wanderer) Cammasāṭaka (4s)

In the present one wanderer on his rounds meets with a ram, who he thinks is paying respects to him, whereas he is just winding up to butt him, which he does, and in a deadly way. The Buddha tells a similar story of the past, and of a dialogue that occurred before the deadly blow.

The Bodhisatta = the wise merchant (pañditavāṇija),
(the wanderer who wore leather) Cammasāṭaka = the same in the past.

Keywords: Vanity, Animals.

“The kindly beast.” [3.55] [3.82] This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, about Cammasāṭaka, a mendicant monk who wore a leather jacket.
Both his upper and under garment, it is said, were of leather. One day sallying out of the monastery, he went his rounds in Sāvatthi for alms, till he came to the fighting-ground of the rams. A ram on seeing him drew back, desiring to butt him. The mendicant thought: “He is doing this, as an act of respect for me,” and himself did not draw back. The ram came on with a rush and striking him on the thigh 641 Mahāvagga, viii. 28. 2.

---

felled him to the ground. This case of imaginary salutation was blazed abroad in the Saṅgha.

The matter was discussed by them in the Dhamma Hall, as to how the leather-coated mendicant fancied he was being saluted and met with his death. The Teacher came and inquired into the subject of their discussion and on being told what it was said: “Not only now, monks, but of old too this ascetic imagined he was being saluted and so came by his death,” and he then related to them a story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta was born in a merchant family and plied his trade. At that time a certain mendicant, clad in a leather garment, in going his rounds for alms, came to the rams’ fighting ground, and on seeing a ram falling back before him, he fancied it did this as a mark of respect, and did not himself retire. “In the whole world,” he thought, “this ram alone recognises my merits,” and raising his joined hands in respectful salutation he stood and repeated the first verse:

1. “The kindly beast obeisance makes before
   The high-caste brahmin versed in holy lore.
   Good honest creature you,
   Famous above all other beasts, I vow!” [3.83]

At this moment a wise merchant sitting in his stores, to restrain the mendicant, uttered the second verse:

2. “Brahmin, be not so rash this beast to trust,
   Else will he haste to lay you in the dust,
   For this the ram falls back,
   To gain an impetus for his attack.”

While this wise merchant was still speaking, the ram came on at full speed, and striking the mendicant on the thigh, knocked him down. He [3.56] was maddened with the pain and as he lay groaning, the Teacher, to explain the incident, gave utterance to the third verse:
3. “With broken leg and bowl for alms upset,
   His damaged fortune he will sore regret.
   Let him not weep with outstretched arms in vain,
   Haste to the rescue, ere the monk is slain.”

Then the mendicant repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Thus all that honour to the unworthy pay,
   Share the same fate that I have met today;
   Prone in the dust by butting ram laid low
   To foolish confidence my death I owe.” \{3.84\}

Thus lamenting he there and then came by his death.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, thus identified the Jātaka, “The man in the leather coat of today was the same then as now. And I myself was the wise merchant.”

Ja 325 Godhajātaka

The Story about the (King of the) Iguanas (4s)

Alternative Title: Godharājajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk makes his living in deceptive ways. The Buddha tells a story of a lizard who used to visit an ascetic. The latter, getting a taste for lizard meat, tried to kill his visitor, but the latter was too smart for him and drove him away.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the iguanas (godharājā), the deceitful monk = the cheating matted-haired ascetic (kūṭajāṭila).

Keywords: Falsity, Cheating, Animals.

“One that plays.” This story was told by the Teacher, while living at Jetavana, with regard to a certain cheating monk. The introductory story has already been given in full. \[642\]

---

\[642\] [The locus classicus (Ja 487 Uddālajātaka) gives us very little further information: This man, even though dedicated to the faith that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threelfold cheating practice (which are explained in the commentaries as seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting).]
But on this occasion they brought the monk to the Teacher and exposed him, saying: “Venerable sir, this monk is a cheat.” The Teacher said: “Not only now, but formerly also he was a rogue.” And then he told a story about the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a young lizard, and when he grew up and was lusty and strong, he dwelt in a forest. And a certain wicked ascetic built a hut of leaves, and took up his abode near him. The Bodhisatta, in ranging about for food, saw this hut of leaves and thought to himself, [3.57] “This hut must certainly belong to some holy ascetic,” and he went there and after saluting the holy man returned to his own place of abode.

Now one day this false ascetic ate some savoury food prepared in the house of one of his retainers, and asked what meat it was. On hearing that it was lizard-flesh, he became such a slave to his love of dainties that he thought: “I will kill this lizard that so constantly keeps coming to my hermitage and will cook him to my taste and eat him.” So he took some ghee, curds, condiments and the like, and went with his club concealed under his yellow robe and sat perfectly still at the door of his hut, waiting for the Bodhisatta to come, as quiet as quiet could be. {3.85}

When the Bodhisatta saw this depraved fellow he thought: “This wretch must have been eating the flesh of my kinsfolk. I will put it to the test.” So he stood to leeward of him and getting a whiff from his person he knew that he had been eating the flesh of a lizard, and without going near him he turned back and made off. And when the ascetic saw he was not coming, he threw his club at him. The club missed his body, but just reached the tip of his tail. The ascetic said: “Be off with you, I have missed you.” Said the Bodhisatta, “Yes, you have missed me, but you will not miss the fourfold States of Suffering.” Than he ran off and disappeared in an ant-hill which stood at the end of the cloister walk, and putting out his head at some other hole, he addressed the ascetic in these two verses:

1. “One that plays the ascetic role
   Should exhibit self-control.
   You did hurl your stick at me,
   False ascetic you must be.
The Section with Four Verses – 1174

2. Matted locks and robe of skin
Serve to cloak some secret wrong.
Fool! To cleanse for outward show,
Leaving what is foul below.”

The ascetic, on hearing this, replied in a third verse:

3. “Pray you, lizard, hasten back,
Oil and salt I do not lack:
Pepper too I would suggest
May to boiled rice add a zest.” [3.86]

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, uttered the fourth verse:

4. “I will hide me snug and warm
Midst the anthill’s myriad swarm.
Cease of oil and salt to prate,
Pepper I abominate.”

Moreover he threatened him and said: “Fie! False ascetic, if you continue to dwell here, I will have you seized as a thief by the people who [3.58] live in my feeding ground, and given over to destruction. So make haste and be off.” Then the false ascetic fled from that place.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the rogue of a monk was the false ascetic, but I myself was the royal lizard.”

Ja 326 Kakkārujātaka
The Story about the Heavenly Flower (4s)

In the present Devadatta tries to deceive the Saṅgha into following himself, but it ends with him vomiting up blood. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic of old who tried to fool the gods into giving him heavenly flowers by lying about his own virtues. The flowers when placed on his head were a torture, and he had to get them removed by the gods.

The Bodhisatta = the elder Devaputta (Jeṭṭhakadevaputta), Devadatta = a brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Sāriputta = another (brahmin) (eka),
Moggallāna = another (brahmin) (eka),
Kassapa = another (brahmin) (eka).
Keywords: Deceit, Cheating, Lying, Devas.

“He that from thievish act.” This story was told by the Teacher while he was at Jetavana, about Devadatta, how after causing a schism in the Saṅgha, as he was going away with the Chief Disciples, when the assembly broke up, a hot stream of blood gushed from his mouth.

Then the monks discussed the matter in the Dhamma Hall, and said that Devadatta by speaking falsely had created a schism, and afterwards fell sick and suffered great pain. The Teacher came and inquired what subject the monks were discussing as they sat in a meeting, and on hearing what it was he said: “Not only now, monks, but of old too this fellow was a liar, and not only now, but of old also he suffered pain as the penalty of lying.” And so saying he repeated this old world legend. [3.87]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a certain Devaputta in the heaven of the Thirty-Three. Now at this time there was a great festival at Benares. A crowd of Nāgas and Garuḷas and Bhūmadeva came and watched the festival. And four Devaputtas from the heaven of the Thirty-Three, wearing a wreath made of heavenly kakkāru flowers, came to see the festival. And the city for the space of twelve leagues was filled with the fragrance of these flowers. Men moved about, wondering by whom these flowers were worn. The Devaputtas said: “They are watching us,” and flying up from the royal court, by an act of supernatural power they stood poised in the air. The multitude gathered together, and the king with his vassal princes came and asked from what world of the gods they had come.

“We come from the heaven of the Thirty-Three.” “For what purpose are you come?” “To see the festival.” [3.59] “What are these flowers?” “They are called the heavenly kakkāru flowers.” “Sirs,” they said, “in the world of the Devaputtas you may have other flowers to wear. Give these to us.”

The Devaputtas made answer, “These divine flowers are fit for those possessed of great powers: for the base, foolish, faithless and sinful beings in this world of men they are not fitted. But whosoever amongst men are endued with such and such virtues, for them they are suitable.” And with these words the chief amongst these Devaputtas repeated the first verse:
1. “He that from thievish act refrains,
   His tongue from lying word restrains,
   And reaching dizzy heights of fame
   Still keeps his head – this flower may claim.” [3.88]

On hearing this the family priest thought: “I own not one of these qualities, but by telling a lie I will get these flowers to wear, and thus the people will credit me with these virtues.” Then he said: “I am endued with these qualities,” and he had the flowers brought to him and he put them on, and then begged of the second Devaputta, who replied in a second verse:

2. “He that should honest wealth pursue
   And riches gained by fraud eschew,
   In pleasure gross excess would shun,
   This heavenly flower has duly won.”

Said the priest, “I am endued with these virtues,” and had the flowers brought to him and put them on, and then begged of the third Devaputta, who uttered the third verse:

3. “He that from purpose fixed ne’er swerves
   And his unchanging faith preserves,
   Choice food alone scorns to devour,
   May justly claim this heavenly flower.” [3.89]

Said the priest, “I am endued with these virtues,” and had the flowers brought to him and he put them on, and then begged of the fourth Devaputta, who spoke the fourth verse:

4. “He that good men will ne’er attack
   When present, nor behind their back,
   And all he says, fulfils in deed,
   This flower may claim as his due weed.”

The priest said: “I am endued with these virtues,” and he had the flowers brought to him and put them on. So these Devaputtas gave the four wreaths of flowers to the priest and returned to the world of gods. As soon as they were gone, the priest was seized with a violent pain in the head, as if it were being pounded by a sharp spike, or crushed by an instrument of iron. Maddened with the pain he rolled up and down, and cried out with a loud voice. When men asked, “What means this?” he said: “I claimed these virtues when I had them not, and spoke falsely and so begged these flowers of the Devaputtas: take them from off my head.” They would have removed them, but could not, for they were fastened as it were with an iron band. Then they raised him up and led him home. And as he lay there crying aloud, seven days passed. The king spake to his councillors and said: “This wicked brahmin will die. What are we to do?” “My lord,” they answered, “let us again celebrate a festival. The Devaputtas will come back.” [3.90]

And the king held a festival, and the Devaputtas returned and filled all the city with the perfume of the flowers, and took their stand in the same place in the royal court. The people gathered together, and bringing that wicked brahmin they laid him down before the Devaputtas on his belly. He prayed the Devaputtas, saying: “My lords, spare my life.” The Devaputtas said: “These flowers are not meet for a wicked and evil man. You thought in your heart to deceive us. You have received the reward of your false words.”

After thus rebuking him in the presence of the people, they removed the wreath of flowers from his head and having admonished the people, they returned to their own place of abode.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the brahmin, of the Devaputtas Kassapa was one, Moggallāna was another, Sāriputta a third, and I myself was the chief Devaputta of all.”

Ja 327 Kākāti jātaka

The Story about (Queen) Kākavatī (4s)

Alternative Title: Kākavatijātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the monastic life owing to lust. The Buddha tells a story of how a Garuḷa carried off a queen to his heavenly home, and when the king sent a messenger to find her she was unfaithful with him. The Garuḷa in disgust returned her to the king.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the dissatisfied monk = (the musician) Naṭakuvera.

Past Compare: Ja 327 Kākāti, Ja 360 Sussondi.

Keywords: Lust, Treachery, Devas, Women.
“Fragrant odours.” This story was told by the Teacher while residing at Jetavana, about a certain monk who regretted having taken orders.

On this occasion the Teacher asked the monk if it were true that he was discontented, and on his answering, “Yes, venerable sir,” he asked him the reason. The monk replied, “By reason of sinful passion.” The Teacher said: “Woman cannot be guarded. There is no keeping her safe. Sages of old placed a woman in mid ocean in a palace by the Simbalī lake, but failed to preserve her honour.” Then he told a story of the past. [3.61]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of the king by his queen-consort. And when he was grown up, at his father’s death he ruled. Kākātī was his chief queen and as lovely as a Devaccharā. [3.91] The old form of the legend will be found set forth in full in the Kunāḷajātaka [Ja 536]. Here follows a brief summary of it.

Now at this time a certain Garuḷa king came disguised as a man, and played at dice with the king of Benares. Falling in love with the chief queen Kākātī, he carried her off with him to the dwelling place of the Garuḷas and lived happily with her. The king missing her told his musician named Naṭakuvera to go in quest of her. He found the Garuḷa king lying on a bed of coarse grass in a certain lake, and just as the Garuḷa was on the point of leaving that spot, he seated himself in the midst of the royal bird’s plumage, and was in this way conveyed to the dwelling place of the Garuḷas. There he enjoyed the lady’s favours, and again seating himself on the bird’s wing returned home. And when the time came for the Garuḷa to play at dice with the king, the minstrel took his lute and going up to the gaming board he stood before the king, and in the form of a song gave utterance to the first verse:

---

643 On Mount Meru: the Garuḷas live round it.
644 [in which the Garuḷa is identified with Kuṇāla].
645 Compare Tibetan Tales, xii. p. 231, Suśroṇi.
The Section with Four Verses – 1179

1. “Fragrant odours round me playing Breath of fair Kākātī's love,
   From her distant home conveying Thoughts my inmost soul to move.”

On hearing this the Garuḷa responded in a second verse:

2. “Sea and Kebuk stream defying
   Did you reach my island home?
   Over seven oceans flying
   To the Simbal grove did come?”  [3.92]

Naṭakuvera, on hearing this, uttered the third verse:

3. “'Twas through you all space defying
   I was borne to Simbal grove,
   And o'er seas and rivers flying
   'Twas through you I found my love.”

Then the Garuḷa king replied in the fourth verse:

4. “Out upon the foolish blunder,
   What a senseless fool I have been!
   Lovers best were kept asunder,
   Lo! I've served as go-between.”

So the Garuḷa brought the queen and gave her back to the king of Benares, and came not there any more. [3.62]

The Teacher, his lesson ended, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk attained the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the discontented monk was Naṭakuvera, and I myself was the king.”

Ja 328 Ananusociyajātaka

The Story about Not Mourning (4s)

In the present when one layman’s wife dies he is inconsolable. The Buddha tells a story about a young couple who were brought together through a golden image and forced to marry. They lived in celibacy, and when their parents died, took up the ascetic life. When
The wife died her former husband grieved not, knowing impermanence is the way of compounded things.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Rāhulamātā = (his wife) Śammillahāsinī (Speaking with Smiles).

Keywords: Grief, Death, Wisdom, Devas.

“Why should I shed tears.” This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, of a certain landowner who had lost his wife. On her death, they say, he neither washed himself nor took food, and neglected his farm duties. Overcome with grief he would wander about the cemetery lamenting, while the basis to enter the First Path blazed forth like a halo about his head. The Teacher, early one morning, casting his eye upon the world and beholding him said: “Except for me there is no one that can remove this man’s sorrow and bestow upon him the power of entering the First Path. I will be his refuge.” So when he had returned from his rounds and had eaten his meal, he took an attendant monk and went to the door of the landowner’s house. [3.93] And he on hearing that the Teacher was coming went out to meet him, and with other marks of respect seated him in the prescribed seat and came and sitting on one side saluted him.

The Teacher asked, “Wherefore, lay brother, are you silent?” “Venerable sir,” he replied, “I am grieving for her.”

The Teacher said: “Lay brother, that which is breakable is broken, but when this happens, one ought not to grieve. Sages of old, when they lost a wife, knew this truth, and therefore sorrowed not.” And then at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

The old legend will be found set forth in the Cullabodhijātaka [Ja 443] in the Tenth Book. Here follows a short summary of it.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family. And when he grew up, he studied all the arts at Taxila and then returned to his parents. In this birth the Great Being became a holy young student.

Then his parents told him they would look out a wife for him. “I have no desire for a married life,” said the Bodhisatta. “When you are dead, I will adopt the ascetic life.”
But being greatly importuned by them, he had a golden image made, and said: “If you can find me a maiden like unto this, I will take her to wife.” His parents sent forth some emissaries with a large escort, and bade them place the golden image in a covered carriage and go and search through the plains of Jambudīpa, till they found just such a young brahmin girl, when they were to give this golden image in exchange, and bring the girl back with them. Now at this time a certain being passing from the Brahmā Realm was born again in the form of a young girl in a town in the kingdom of Kāsi, in the house of a brahmin worth eighty crores, and the name given her was Sammillabhaśinī. At the age of sixteen she was a fair and gracious maiden, like to a Devaccharā, endued with all the marks of female beauty. And since no thought of evil was ever suggested to her by the power of sinful passion, she was perfectly pure.

So the men took the golden image and wandered about till they reached this village. The inhabitants on seeing the image asked, “Why is Sammillabhaśinī, the daughter of such and such a brahmin, placed there?” The messengers on hearing this found the brahmin family, and chose Sammillabhaśinī for the prince’s bride. She sent a message to her parents, saying: “When you are dead, I shall adopt the ascetic life; I have no desire for the married state.” They said: “What are you thinking of, maiden?” And accepting the golden image they sent off their daughter with a great retinue. The marriage ceremony took place against the wishes of both the Bodhisatta and Sammillabhaśinī. Though sharing the same room and the same bed they did not regard one another with the eye of sinful passion, but dwelt together like two monks or two Brahmās.

By and by the father and mother of the Bodhisatta died. He performed their funeral rites and calling to him Sammillabhaśinī, said to her, “My dear, my family property amounts to eighty crores, and yours too is worth another eighty crores. Take all this and enter upon household life. I shall become an ascetic.”

“Sir,” she answered, “if you become an ascetic, I will become one too. I cannot forsake you.”

---

646 For the incident of the golden image and the story generally compare Tibetan Tales, IX. p. 186. Mahākāśyapa and Bhadrā.
“Come then,” he said. So spending all their wealth in generosity and throwing up their worldly fortune as it were a lump of phlegm, they journeyed into the Himālayas and both of them adopted the ascetic life. Thereafter living for a long time on wild fruits and roots, they at length came down from the Himālayas to procure salt and vinegar, and gradually found their way to Benares, and dwelt in the royal grounds. And while they were living there, this young and delicate female ascetic, from eating insipid rice of a mixed quality, was attacked by dysentery and not being able to get any healing remedies, she grew very weak.

The Bodhisatta at the time for going his rounds to beg for alms, took hold of her and carried her to the gate of the city and there laid her on a bench in a certain hall, and himself went into the city for alms. He had scarce [3.64] gone out when she expired. The people, beholding the great beauty of this female ascetic, [3.95] thronged about her, weeping and lamenting. The Bodhisatta after going his round of begging returned, and hearing of her death he said: “That which has the quality of dissolution is dissolved. All impermanent existences are of this kind.” With these words he sat down on the bench whereon she lay and eating the mixture of food he rinsed out his mouth. The people that stood by gathered round him and said: “Venerable sir, what was this female ascetic to you?”

“When I was a layman,” he replied, “she was my wife.”

“Venerable sir,” they said, “while we weep and lament and cannot control our feelings, why do you not weep?”

The Bodhisatta said: “While she was alive, she belonged to me in some sort. Nothing belongs to her that is gone to another world: she has passed into the power of others. Wherefore should I weep?” And teaching the people the Dhamma, he recited these verses:

1. “Why should I shed tears for you, Fair Sammillabhāsini? Passed to death’s majority647 You are henceforth lost to me.”

647 Compare the classical usage of οἱ πλέον, plures, for the dead.
The Section with Four Verses – 1183

2. Wherefore should frail man lament
   What to him is only lent?
   He too draws his mortal breath
   Forfeit every hour to death.

3. Be he standing, sitting still,
   Moving, resting, what he will,
   In the twinkling of an eye,
   In a moment death is nigh.

4. Life I count a thing unstable,
   Loss of friends inevitable.
   Cherish all that are alive,
   Sorrow not should you survive.” (3.97)

Thus did the Great Being teach the Dhamma, illustrating by these four verses the impermanence of things. The people performed funeral rites over the female ascetic. And the Bodhisatta returned to the Himālayas, and entering upon Absorption and the Super Knowledges he was destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths, the landowner attained to fruition of the First Path. “At that time the mother of Rāhula was Sammillabhāsinī, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 329 Kālabāhujātaka

The Story about (the Black Monkey) Kālabāhu (4s)

In the present Devadatta has tried to have the Buddha killed, but has been found out and is in disgrace. The Buddha tells a story of two parrots who were the king’s favourites till a black monkey became the favourite. The elder parrot cautioned patience, and soon the monkey fell into disgrace and was banished.

The Bodhisatta = (the parrot) Rādha,
Ānanda = (his younger brother) Poṭṭhapāda,
Devadatta = (the black monkey) Kālabāhu.

Keywords: Patience, Animals, Birds.
“Once we enjoyed.” [3.65] This was a story told by the Teacher while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, with regard to Devadatta’s loss of gains and honour. For when Devadatta had unreasonably conceived a grudge against the Tathāgata and instigated a band of archers to slay him, his offence became known by the letting loose of the elephant Nālāgiri. Then men took away his office and the rations provided for him, and the king ceased to regard him. And having lost his source of gains and honour, he went about living on what he begged in noble families.

The monks started a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, how that Devadatta thought to get gain and honour, but when he had got it he could not keep it. The Teacher came and inquired what was the subject the monks sat in a meeting to discuss, and on being told what it was he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly too, Devadatta was deprived of gains and honour.” And he then told them a story of the past.

In the past when Dhanañjaya was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a parrot named Rādha. He was a well-grown bird with perfectly-formed limbs. And his younger brother was called Poṭṭhapāda. A certain fowler trapped these two birds and brought them as a present to the king of Benares. The king put the pair in a golden cage and took care of them and gave them honey and parched corn to eat in a golden dish and sugar-water to drink. Great attention was paid them, and they attained to the highest degree of profit and honour. Then a certain forester brought a big black monkey, called Kālabāhu, as a present to the king, and from the fact of his coming later than the parrots, he received still greater gain and respect, while that paid to the parrots fell off. The Bodhisatta through his possession of Buddha qualities said not a word, but his younger brother, from the absence of these qualities being unable to put up with the honour paid to the monkey, said: “Brother, formerly in this royal house men gave us savoury food, but now we get nothing, and they offer it all to the monkey Kālabāhu. As we receive neither gain nor honour in this place from the king, what are we to do? Come, let us go and live in the forest.” And as he talked with him, he uttered the first verse:

---

1. “Once we enjoyed of food abundant store,
   This monkey now has what was ours before.
   Come, Rādha, let us to the forest hie;
   Such scurvy treatment what can justify?” [3.66]

Rādha, on hearing this, replied in the second verse:

   2. “Gain and loss and praise and blame,
       Pleasure, pain, dishonour, fame,
       All as transient states conceive –
       Why should Poṭṭhapāda grieve?” [3.99]

On hearing this, Poṭṭhapāda was unable to get rid of his grudge against the monkey and repeated the third verse:

   3. “Rādha, wisest bird alive,
       Sure you knowest things to come,
       This vile creature who shall drive
       From the court to his old home?”

Rādha, on hearing this, uttered the fourth verse:

   4. “Oft will his puckered face and moving ears
       The royal children fill with foolish fears:
       Soon Kālabāhu through some impish freak,
       Far far away his food will have to seek.”

In a very short time the monkey by shaking his ears and similar tricks terrified the young princes. In their alarm they made an outcry. The king asked what it meant, and hearing the cause, said: “Drive him away.” So he had the monkey driven away, and the parrots were restored to their former condition of gain and honour. [3.100]

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was Kālabāhu, Ānanda was Poṭṭhapāda, and I myself was Rādha.”

Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsajātaka

The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue (4s)

In the present a brahmin seeks to find out if the king favours him for his birth, or for his goodness, so he starts stealing a penny a day from the king. When the king finds out he decides to punish him, until the brahmin explains his actions. The Buddha tells a story of similar happenings in a past life, but here the brahmin learns deep lessons from his encounters with a hawk and a slave girl.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita).

Present Source: Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṇsa,
Quoted at: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṇsana, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṇsana, Past Compare: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṇsana, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṇsana, Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṇsana, Ja 362 Sīlavīmaṇsana.

Keywords: Renunciation, Virtue.

“Power on earth.” This was a story told by the Teacher when at Jetavana, about a brahmin who was ever proving his virtue. Two similar stories have been told before.649

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a brahmin who put to the test his reputation for virtue. This brahmin, who was maintained by the king of Kosala, had sought the Three Refuges; he kept the Five Precepts, and was versed in the Three Vedas. “This is a virtuous man,” thought the king, and showed him great honour. But that brahmin thought to himself, “The king shows honour to me beyond other brahmins, and has manifested his great regard by making me his spiritual director. But is his favour due to my virtue or only to my birth, lineage, family, country and accomplishments? I must clear this up without delay.”

Accordingly, one day when he was leaving the palace, he took without permission a coin from a treasurer’s counter, and went his way. Such was the treasurer’s veneration for the brahmin that he sat perfectly still and said not a word. Next day the brahmin took two coins; but still the official made no remonstrance. The third day the brahmin took a whole handful of coins. “This is the third day,” cried the treasurer, “that you have robbed his majesty,” and he shouted out three times, “I have caught the thief who robs the treasury.” In rushed a crowd of people from every side, crying, “Ah, you’ve long been posing as a model of virtue.” And dealing him two or three blows, they led him before the king. In great sorrow the king said to him, “What led you, brahmin, to do so wicked a thing?”

649 Ja 86 and Ja 290 [I include the story here.]
And he gave orders, saying: “Off with him to punishment.” “I am no thief, sire,” said the brahmin. “Then why did you take money from the treasury?” “Because you showed me such great honour, sire, and because I made up my mind to find out whether that honour was paid to my birth and the like or only to my virtue. That was my motive, and now I know for certain (inasmuch as you order me off to punishment) that it was my virtue and not my birth and other advantages, that won me your majesty’s favour.

Virtue I know to be the chief and supreme good; I know too that to virtue I can never attain in this life, while I remain a layman, living in the midst of sensual pleasures. Wherefore, this very day I would willingly go to the Teacher at Jetavana and renounce the world for the Saṅgha. Grant me your leave, sire.” The king consenting, the brahmin set out for Jetavana. His friends and relations in a body tried to turn him from his purpose, but, finding their efforts of no avail, left him alone.

He came to the Teacher and asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha. After admission to the lower and higher ordination, he won by application insight and became an Arahat, whereon he drew near to the Teacher, saying: “Sir, my joining the Saṅgha has borne the Supreme Fruit,” thereby signifying that he had became an Arahat.

Hearing of this, the monks, assembling in the Dhamma Hall, spoke with one another of the virtues of the king’s family priest who tested his own reputation for virtue and who, leaving the king, had now risen to be an Arahat. Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked what the monks were discussing, and they told him. “Not without a precedent, monks,” said he, “is the action of this brahmin in putting to the test his reputation for virtue and in working out his safety after renouncing the world. The like was done by the wise and good of bygone days as well.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his family priest – a man given to generosity and other good works, whose mind was set on righteousness, always keeping unbroken the Five Precepts. And the king honoured him beyond the other brahmins; and everything came to pass as above.

[3.67]
In testing his virtue he for three days took a coin from the royal treasurer’s board. They informed against him as a thief, and when brought before the king, he said:

1. “Power on earth beyond compare,
Virtue owns a wondrous charm:
Putting on a virtuous air
Deadly snakes avoid all harm.”

After thus praising virtue in the first verse, he gained the king’s consent and adopted the ascetic life.

Now a hawk seized a piece of meat in a butcher’s shop and darted up into the air. The other birds surrounded him and struck at him with feet, claws and beaks. Unable to bear the pain he dropped the piece of meat. Another bird seized it. It too in like manner being hard pressed let the meat fall. Then another bird pounced on it, and whosoever got the meat was pursued by the rest, and whosoever let it go was left in peace.

The Bodhisatta on seeing this thought: “These desires of ours are like pieces of meat. To those that grasp at them is sorrow, and to those that let them go is peace.” And he repeated the second verse:

2. “While the hawk had aught to eat,
Birds of prey pecked at him sore,
When perforce he dropped the meat,
Then they pecked at him no more.” {3.101}

The ascetic going forth from the city, in the course of his journey came to a village, and at evening lay down in a certain man’s house. Now a female slave there named Piṅgalā made an appointment with a man, saying: “You are to come at such and such an hour.” After she had bathed the feet of her master and his family, when they had lain down, she sat on the threshold, looking out for the coming of her lover, and passed the first and the middle watch, repeating to herself, “Now he will be coming,” but at daybreak, losing hope, she said: “He will not come now,” and lay down and fell asleep. The Bodhisatta seeing this happen said: “This woman sat ever so long in the hope that her lover would come, but now that she knows he will not come, in her despair, she slumbers peacefully.” And with the thought that while hope in a sinful world brings sorrow, despair brings peace, he uttered the third verse:
3. “The fruit of hope fulfilled is bliss;
   How differs loss of hope from this?
   Though dull despair her hope destroys,
   Lo! Piṅgalā calm sleep enjoys.”

Next day going forth from that village he entered into a forest, and beholding an ascetic seated on the ground and indulging in meditation he [3.68] thought: “Both in this world and in the next there is no happiness beyond the bliss of meditation.” And he repeated the fourth verse:

4. “In this world and in worlds to be
   Nought can surpass concentration:
   To holy calm a devotee,
   Himself unharmed, will none annoy.” [3.102]

Then he went into the forest and adopted the ascetic life of a sage and developed the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time I myself was the family priest.”

Ja 331 Kokālikajātaka

The Story about (the Monk) Kokālika (4s)

Alternative Title: Kokilajātaka (Cst)

In the present Kokālika blames the two chief disciples, and because of what he says, falls into hell. The Buddha tells a story of a cuckoo that was fostered on a crow, but started singing while still in the nest and was killed and thrown on the ground.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Kokālika = the young cuckoo (kokālikapotaka).

Present Source: Ja 481 Takkāriya,
Quoted at: Ja 117 Tittira, Ja 215 Kacchapa, Ja 272 Vyaggha, Ja 331 Kokālika.

650 Compare Sānkhya Aphorisms, iv. 11 [which reads: He who is without hope, is happy, just like Piṅgalā.] Mahābhārata, xii. 6447.
“They that with speech inopportune.” This story was told by the Teacher at Jetavana about Kokālika. The introductory story is told in full in the Takkārikajātaka [Ja 481].

During one rainy season the two chief disciples, desiring to leave the multitude and to dwell apart, took leave of the Teacher, and went into the kingdom where Kokālika was. They repaired to the residence of Kokālika, and said this to him, “Monk Kokālika, since for us it is delightful to dwell with you, and for you to dwell with us, we would abide here three months.” “How,” said the other, “will it be delightful for you to dwell with me?” They answered, “If you tell not a soul that the two chief disciples are dwelling here, we shall be happy, and that will be our delight in dwelling with you.” “And how is it delightful for me to dwell with you?” “We will teach the Dhamma to you for three months in your home, and we will discourse to you, and that will be your delight in dwelling with us.” “Dwell here, monks,” said he, “so long as you will,” and he allotted a pleasant residence to them. There they dwelt in the fruition of the Attainments, and no man knew of their dwelling in that place.

When they had thus past the rains they said to him, “Monk, now we have dwelt with you, and we will go to visit the Teacher,” and asked his leave to go. He agreed, and went with them on the rounds for alms in a village over against the place where they were. After their meal the elders departed from the village. Kokālika leaving them, turned back and said to the people, “Lay brethren, you are like brute animals. Here the two chief disciples have been dwelling for three months in the monastery opposite, and you knew nothing of it: now they are gone.” “Why did you not tell us, sir?” the people asked.

Then they took ghee and oil and medicines, raiment and clothes, and approached the elders, saluting them and saying: “Pardon us, sirs we knew not you were the chief disciples, we have learned it but today by the words of the venerable monk Kokālika. Pray have compassion on us, and receive these medicines and clothes.” Kokālika went after the elders with them, for he thought: “The elders are frugal, and content with little; they will not accept these things, and then they will be given to me.” But the elders, because the gift was offered at the instigation of a monk, neither accepted the things themselves nor had them given to Kokālika. The lay folk then said: “Sirs, if you will not accept these, come here once again to bless us.” The elders promised, and proceeded to the Teacher’s presence.

Now Kokālika was angry, because the elders neither accepted those things themselves, nor had them given to him. The elders, however, having remained a short while with the Teacher, each chose five hundred monks as their following, and with these thousand monks went on pilgrimage seeking alms, as far as Kokālika’s country. The lay folk came out to meet them, and led them to the same monastery, and showed them great honour day by day.

Great was the store given them of clothes and of medicines. Those monks who went out with the elders dividing the garments gave of them to all the monks which had come, but to Kokālika gave none, neither did the elders give him any. Getting no clothes Kokālika began to abuse and revile the elders, “Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire; they would not accept before what was offered them, but these things they do accept. There is no satisfying them, they have no regard for another.” But the elders, perceiving that the man was harbouring evil on their account, set out with their followers to depart; nor would they return, not though the people begged them to stay yet a few days longer.

Then a young monk said: “Where shall the elders stay, laymen? Your own particular elder does not wish them to stay here.” Then the people went to Kokālika, and said: “Sir, we are told you do not wish the elders to stay here. Go to! Either appease them and bring them back, or away with you and live elsewhere!” In fear of the people this man went and made his request to the elders. “Go back, monk,” answered the elders, “we will not return.” So he, being unable to prevail upon them, returned to the monastery. Then the lay brethren asked him whether the elders had returned. “I could not persuade them to return,” said he. “Why not, monk?” they asked. And then they began to think it must be no good monks would dwell there because the man did wrong, and they must get rid of him. “Sir,” they said, “do not stay here; we have nothing here for you.”

Thus dishonoured by them, he took bowl and robe and went to Jetavana. After saluting the Teacher, he said: “Sir, Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire, they are in the power of wicked desires!” The Teacher replied, “Say not so, Kokālika; let your heart, Kokālika, have confidence in Sāriputta and Moggallāna; learn that they are good monks.” Kokālika said: “You believe in your two chief disciples, sir; I have seen it with my own eyes; they have wicked desires, they have secrets within them, they are wicked men.” So he said thrice (though the Teacher would have stayed him), then rose from his seat, and departed. Even as he went on his way there arose over all his body boils of the size of a mustard seed, which grew and grew to the size of a ripe seed of the wood apple tree, burst, and blood ran all over him. Groaning he fell by the gate of Jetavana, maddened with pain.

A great cry arose, and reached even to the Brahmā Realm, “Kokālika has reviled the two chief disciples!” Then his spiritual teacher, the Brahmā Tudu by name, learning the fact, came with the intent of appeasing the elders, and said while poised in the air, “Kokālika, a cruel thing this you have done; make your peace with the chief disciples.” “Who are you, brother?” the man asked. “Tudu Brahmā, is my name,” said he. “Have you not been declared by the Fortunate One,” said the man, “one of those who return not? That word means that such come not back to this earth. You will become a Yakkha upon a dunghill!” Thus he upbraided the Mahābrahmā. And as he could not persuade the man to do as he advised, he replied to him, “May you be tormented according to your own word.” Then he returned to his abode of bliss. And Kokālika after dying was born again in the Lotus Hell. That he had been born there the great and mighty Brahmā told to the Tathāgata, and the Teacher told it to the monks.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks talked of the man’s wickedness, “Monks, they say Kokālika reviled Sāriputta and Moggallāna, and by the words of his own mouth came to the Lotus Hell.” The Teacher came in, and said he, “What speak you of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. Then he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Kokālika was destroyed by his own word, and out of his own mouth was condemned to misery; it was the same before.” And he told them a story.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his valued minister. Now the king was very talkative. Thought the Bodhisatta, “I will put an end to his talkativeness,” and went about looking for an apt illustration. So one day the king came to his garden and sat down on the royal slab of stone. Above his head was a mango tree and there in a crow’s nest a black cuckoo had laid her egg and gone off. The female crow watched over that cuckoo’s egg. and by a young cuckoo came forth from it. The crow thinking it was her own offspring took care of it, bringing food for it in her beak.

The young bird while still unfledged uttered a cuckoo cry prematurely. The crow thought: “This young bird even now utters a strange note. What will it do, when it is older?” And so she killed it by pecking it with her beak and threw it out of the nest, and it fell at the king’s feet. The king asked the Bodhisatta, “What is the meaning of this, my friend?” Thought the Bodhisatta, “I am seeking for an illustration to teach the king a lesson, and now I have got one.” So he said: “Garrulous folk, Great king, who talk too much out of season, meet with a fate like this. This young cuckoo, sire, being fostered by the crow, while yet unfledged, uttered a premature cry. So the crow knew it was not her offspring and killed it by pecking it with her beak and threw it out of the nest. All those that are too talkative out of season, be they men or beasts, suffer like trouble.” And with these words he recited these verses:

1. “They that with speech inopportune offend
   Like the young cuckoo meet untimely end.

2. Nor deadly poison, nor sharp-whetted sword
   Is half so fatal as ill-spoken word.

3. The sage his measured words discreetly guides,
   Nor rashly to his second self confides:

4. Before he speaks will prudent counsel take,
   His foes to trap, as Garuḷa the snake,”

The king, after hearing the Dhamma teaching of the Bodhisatta, thenceforth became more measured in his words, and increasing the glory of the Bodhisatta ever gave him more and more.

The Teacher, having brought his lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka, “Kokālika in those days was the young cuckoo, and I myself was the wise minister.”
The Section with Four Verses – 1194

Ja 332 Rathalaṭṭhijātaka

The Story about the Goad-Stick (4s)

In the present one family priest throws his stick at a chariot, and it rebounds and hits him instead. The Buddha tells a story in which a similar thing happened in the past and the king jumped to judgement, before being advised on hearing both sides of the case.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
the brahmin = the same in the past (brāhmaṇa).

Keywords: Justice, Caution.

“Wounding another.” This story was told by the Teacher when he was at Jetavana, about the family priest of the king of Kosala, who, it is said, as he was driving in his chariot to a village on his estate came upon a caravan in a narrow road, and crying out once and again, “Out of the way with you,” was so enraged at a cart not clearing out of his way that he threw his goad-stick at the driver of the first cart. The stick struck against the yoke of the chariot, and rebounding hit him on the forehead and raised a bump on his head. The priest turned back and went and told the king he had been wounded by some carters. The carters were summoned, and the judges examining into the case found the priest only was to blame.

One day the matter was discussed in the Dhamma Hall, how that the king’s family priest, who said he had been assaulted by some carters, on going to law lost the suit. When the Teacher came and inquired what the monks were sitting in council to discuss, on hearing what it was he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly also this fellow acted in precisely the same way.” And he then told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his lord justice. The king’s family priest drives to a village where he was headman, and acts in exactly the same way as in the introductory tale, but in this version, when the king heard the priest’s story, he summoned the carters and himself sat in judgment, and without examining into the matter he said: “You have beaten my priest and raised a bump on his forehead,” and ordered all their property to be taken from them. Then said the Bodhisatta to him, “Sire, without even investigating the matter you order them to be deprived of all their goods, but some men after inflicting wounds on themselves declare that they have been wounded by another. Therefore it is wrong for one who bears rule to act thus without trying the case. He ought not to act till he has heard everything.” And then he recited these verses:

1. “Wounding another, his own wound he shows,
   Himself the smiter, he complains of blows.

2. Wise men, O king, of partial views beware,
   Hear both sides first, then judgment true declare.

3. The idle sensual layman I detest,
   The false ascetic is a rogue confessed.
   A bad king will a case unheard decide,
   Wrath in the sage can ne’er be justified. [3.106]

4. The warrior prince a well-weighed verdict gives,
   Of righteous judge the fame for ever lives.”

The king on hearing the words of the Bodhisatta judged righteously, and when the case was duly tried, the blame was found to rest with the brahmin alone.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “The brahmin played the same part in both stories, and I myself was the wise minister in those days.”

Ja 333 Godhajātaka

The Story about the (Roasted) Iguana (4s)

Alternative Title: Pakkagodhajātaka (Cst)

In the present one wealthy man eats a gift of a roasted iguana they had received on a journey and claims it had run away. The Buddha tells a story of similar events in the past, and how he had brought the queen’s goodness to the attention of the king, who rewarded her well.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañḍītāmacca), the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

---

651 [These next two verses are repeated at Ja 351 below.]
Past Compare: Ja 223 Puṭabhatta, Ja 333 Godha, Mvu ii p 91 Godha.

Keywords: Ingratitude, Deceit, Animals.

“Then were you.” [3.71] This is a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, of a certain landowner. The introductory story has been told in full before.⁶⁵²

According to the story he went to a village with his wife to retrieve a debt, and seizing a cart in satisfaction for what was due to him he deposited it with a certain family, intending to fetch it later on.

But in this case, as the husband and wife were returning home, after calling in a debt, in the course of their journey some hunters gave them a roasted lizard, bidding them both to eat of it. The man sent his wife to fetch water and ate up the whole lizard, and when she came back, he said: “My dear, the lizard has run away.” “Well, my lord,” she said, “what can one do with a roasted lizard that runs away?” [3.107] She drank some water and afterwards at Jetavana when sitting in the presence of the Teacher, she was asked by him as follows, “Lay sister, is this man affectionate, loving and helpful to you?” She answered, “I am loving and affectionate to him, but he has no love for me.” The Teacher said: “Well, suppose he does behave thus to you. Do not be grieved. When he recalls to mind your virtues, he will give supreme power to you alone.” And at their request he related a story about the past.

This old story is just like the one given above, but in this case, as the husband and wife were on their way home, some hunters saw how distressed they were and gave them a roasted lizard and bade them share it between them. The royal lady tied it about with a creeper used as a string, and went on her way, carrying it in her hand. They came upon a lake, and leaving the high road sat down at the foot of a Bodhi tree. The prince said: “Go, my dear, and fetch water from the lake in a lotus leaf, then we will eat this meat.” She hung the lizard on a bough and went to fetch water. Her companion ate up all the lizard and then sat with averted face, holding the tip of the tail in his hand. When she returned with the water, he said: “My dear, the lizard came down from the bough and made for an ant-heap. I ran and seized it by the tip of its tail. The lizard broke in two and left in my hand the part I had seized and disappeared in the hole.”

⁶⁵² See Ja 320 [the introduction is so changed by what follows there is nothing to add.]

“Well, my lord,” she replied, “how can we deal with a roasted lizard that runs away? Come, let us be off.”

And so drinking the water, they journey to Benares. The prince when he came to the throne gave her the titular rank of queen consort, but no honour or respect was paid to her. The Bodhisatta, desiring to win honour for her, standing in the king’s presence asked her, “Lady, is it not the case that we receive nothing at your hands? Why do you neglect us?” [3.72]

“Dear sir,” she said: “I get nothing from the king. How then should I give a present to you? What is the king likely to give me now? When we were coming from the forest, he ate a roasted lizard all by himself.” [3.108]

“Lady,” he said, “the king would not act after this sort. Do not speak thus of him.”

Then the lady said to him, “Sir, this is not clear to you, but it is clear enough to the king and me,” and she repeated the first verse:

1. “Then were you first known to me,
   When in forest-depths, O king,
   Roasted lizard broke its string
   And from Bodhi tree branch got free.
   Though ’neath robe of bark, I think,
   Sword and coat of mail were seen.”

Thus spake the queen, making known the king’s offence in the midst of his courtiers. The Bodhisatta, on hearing her, said: “Lady, ever since the time when your husband ceased to love you, why do you go on living here, making unpleasantness for both?” and he repeated two verses:

2. “To one that honours you, due honour show
   With full requital of good service done:
   No kindness on illiberal folk bestow,
   Nor those affect that would your presence shun.”
3. Forsake the wretch who has forsaken you,
And love not one who has for you no love,
E’en as a bird forsakes a barren tree,
And seeks a home in some far distant grove.” {3.109}

The king, while the Bodhisatta was yet speaking, called to mind her virtues and said: “My dear, ever so long I observed not your virtues, but through the words of this wise man, I have observed them. Bear with my offence. This whole realm of mine I give to you alone.” And hereupon he spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Far as in his power may be,
Gratitude a king should show:
All my realm I grant to you,
Gifts, on whom you will, bestow.”

With these words the king conferred on the queen supreme power, and thinking: “It was by this man that I was reminded of her virtues,” he gave great power to the wise man also.

The Teacher, having brought his lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths, both husband and wife attained fruition of the First Path. “The husband and wife of the present story played the same part in the old tale. But I myself was the wise minister.”

Ja 334 Rājovādajātaka
The Story about Advice to a King (4s)

In the present the Buddha admonishes the king of Kosala that he should rule righteously, and all will be well with the kingdom. He also tells a story of how an ascetic in the past showed a king how, when he ruled justly, the fruits had flavour, but when he ruled unjustly they turned bitter.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 521 Tesakuṇa,
Quoted at: Ja 334 Rājovāda, Ja 396 Kukku, Ja 520 Gaṇḍatindu.

Keywords: Justice, Virtue.
“The bull through floods.” [3.73] [3.110] This story was told by the Teacher when at Jetavana concerning the admonition of a king. The introductory story will be found in full in the Tesakunajātaka [Ja 521].

This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told by way of admonition to the king of Kosala. Now this king came to hear the preaching of the Dhamma and the Teacher addressed him in the following terms, “A king, sire, ought to rule his kingdom righteously, for whenever kings are unrighteous, then also are his officers unrighteous.” And admonishing him in the right way... he pointed out the suffering and the blessing involved in following or abstaining from evil courses, and expounded in detail the misery resulting from sensual pleasures, comparing them to dreams and the like, saying: “In the case of these men,

No bribe can move relentless death, no kindness mollify,
No one in fight can vanquish death. For all are doomed to die.

But in this version of it the Teacher said: “Kings of old, sire, hearkening to the words of the wise, ruled justly and attained to the heavenly world.” And at the request of the king he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. And when he came of age, he was trained in all the arts, and adopting the ascetic life he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and took up his abode in a pleasant quarter of the Himālayas, living on wild fruits and roots.

At this time the king being anxious to find out his own defects, went about inquiring if there was any one who would tell him his faults. And not finding any one to speak to his dispraise, either within doors or without, either within the city or outside it, he wandered about the countryside in disguise, thinking: “How will it be in the country?” And not meeting with any one there to speak to his dispraise, and hearing men speak only of his merits, he thought: “How will it be in the Himālayas region?” And he went into the forest and wandered about till he reached the hermitage of the Bodhisatta, where after saluting him, and addressing him in a friendly manner he took a seat on one side. At that moment the Bodhisatta was eating some ripe figs which he had brought from the wood. They were luscious and sweet, like powdered sugar. He addressed the king and said: “Venerable sir, pray eat this ripe fig and drink some water.”
The king did so, and asked the Bodhisatta, “Why, venerable sir, is this ripe fig so exceedingly sweet?”

“Venerable sir,” he replied, “the king now exercises his rule with justice and equity. That is why it is so sweet.” [3.111]

“In the reign of an unjust king, does it lose its sweetness, sir?”

“Yes, venerable sir, in the time of unjust kings, oil, honey, molasses and the like, as well as wild roots and fruits, lose their sweetness and flavour, and not these only but the whole realm becomes bad and flavourless; but when the rulers are just, these things become sweet and full of flavour, and the whole realm recovers its tone and flavour.” [3.74]

The king said: “It must be so, venerable sir,” and without letting him know that he was the king, he saluted the Bodhisatta and returned to Benares. And thinking to prove the words of the ascetic, he ruled unjustly, saying to himself, “Now I shall know all about it,” and after the lapse of a short time he went back and saluting the Bodhisatta, sat respectfully on one side. The Bodhisatta using exactly the same words, offered him a ripe fig, which proved to be bitter to his taste. Finding it to be bitter he spat it out, saying: “It is bitter, sir.”

Said the Bodhisatta, “Venerable sir, the king must be unjust, for when rulers are unjust, everything beginning with the wild fruits in the wood, lose all their sweetness and flavour.” And hereupon he recited these verses:

1. “The bull through floods a devious course will take,
The herd of cows all straggling in his wake:

2. So if a leader tortuous paths pursue,
To base ends will he guide the vulgar crew,
And the whole realm an age of license rue.

3. But if the bull a course direct should steer,
The herd of cows straight follow in his rear.
4. So should their chief to righteous ways be true,
The common folk injustice will eschew,
And through the realm shall holy peace ensue.” [3.112]

The king after hearing the Bodhisatta’s exposition of the Dhamma, let him know he was the king and said: “Venerable sir, formerly it was due to me alone that the figs were first sweet and then bitter, but now I will make them sweet again.” Then he saluted the Bodhisatta and returned home, and ruling righteously restored everything to its original condition.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 335 Jambukajātaka
The Story about the Jackal (who played the Lion) (4s)

In the present Devadatta presumes to act the part of the Buddha, but gets hit in the chest, humiliating himself. The Buddha tells a story of a jackal who tried to pay the part of a lion and was crushed to death by an elephant.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha),
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Pride, Vanity, Animals.

“Jackal beware.” This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, about the attempt of Devadatta to imitate the Buddha. The incident that gave rise to the story has been told in full before.653 Here is a short summary of it. [3.75]

When the Teacher asked Sāriputta what Devadatta did when he saw him, the elder replied, “Sir, in imitating you he put a fan in my hand and lay down, and then Kokālika struck him on the breast with his knee: and so by imitating you he got into trouble.” The Teacher said: “This happened to Devadatta before,” and being pressed by the elder, he told a story of the past.

653 Ja 204 [Despite the following statement, the story at Ja 204 hardly elaborates on what is told here.]
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a young lion, and dwelt in a cave of the Himālayas, \(3.113\) and one day after killing a buffalo and eating of its flesh he took a draught of water and returned home. A jackal saw him, and being unable to escape lay down on his belly.

The lion said: “What is the meaning of this, Mr. Jackal?” “Sir,” he said: “I would be your servant.”

The lion said: “Well, come on then,” and conducting him to the place where he dwelt, day by day he brought him meat and fed him. When the jackal had grown fat on the lion’s broken meat, one day a feeling of pride sprang up in him, and he drew near to the lion, and said: “My lord, I am ever a hindrance to you. You constantly bring me meat and feed me. Today do you remain here. I will go and slay an elephant, and after eating my fill will bring some meat to you.” Said the lion, “Friend jackal, let not this seem good in your eyes. You are not sprung from a stock that feeds on the flesh of the elephants that it kills. I will kill an elephant and bring its flesh to you. The elephant surely is big of body. Do not undertake what is contrary to your nature, but hearken to my words.” And hereupon he spoke the first verse:

1. “Jackal, beware!
   His tusks are long.
   One of your puny race
   Would scarcely dare
   So huge and strong
   A beast as this to face.”

The jackal, though forbidden by the lion, issued forth from the cave and thrice uttered the cry of a jackal. And looking to the base of the mountain, he spied a black elephant moving below, and thinking to fall on his head he sprang up and turning over in the air fell at the elephant’s feet. The elephant lifting up his fore foot planted it on the jackal’s head and smashed his skull to pieces. \(3.114\) The jackal lay there groaning, and the elephant went off trumpeting. The Bodhisatta came and standing on the top of the precipice saw how the jackal had met his death, and said: “Through his pride was this jackal slain,” and uttered three verses:
2. “A jackal once assumed the lion’s pride,
And elephant as equal foe defied.
Prone on the earth, while groans his bosom rent,
He learned the rash encounter to repent. [3.76]

3. Who thus should challenge one of peerless fame,
Nor mark the vigour of his well-knit frame,
Shares the sad fate that on the jackal came.

4. But who the measure of his own power knows,
And nice discretion in his language shows,
True to his duty lives and triumphs o’er his foes.” [3.115]

Thus did the Bodhisatta in these verses declare the duties proper to be done in this world.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the jackal, and I myself was the lion.”

Ja 336 Brahāchattajātaka

The Story about the (Prince of Kosala) Brahāchatta (4s)

In the present one monk makes his living in a wrong way. The Buddha tells the story of a prince whose kingdom was overthrown, and how he got back the treasure that was his through deceit, nearly driving the conquering king mad.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paññitāmacca), the deceitful monk = Brahāchatta (prince of Kosala).

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla,
Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādīccupaṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Deceit, Trickery.
“Grass is still.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, of a certain rogue. The incident that suggested the story has already been related.654

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a dishonest monk. This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his minister and temporal and spiritual adviser. The king of Benares went against the king of Kosala with a large army, and coming to Sāvatthi, after a battle entered the city and took the king prisoner. Now the king of Kosala had a son, prince Chatta by name. He made his escape in disguise, and went to Taxila, where he acquired the three Vedas and the eighteen liberal arts. Then he left Taxila, and while still studying the practical uses of science he arrived at a certain border village. In a wood near this, five hundred ascetics dwelt in huts of leaves. The prince approached them, and with the idea of learning somewhat of them, he became an ascetic, and so acquired whatsoever knowledge they had to impart. By and by he became the leader of that band of disciples.

One day he addressed his company of holy men and asked them, saying: “Sirs, why do you not go to the central region?” [3.77]

“Sir,” they said, “in the central region are said to be living wise men. [3.116] They pose one with questions, call upon one to return thanks and to repeat a form of blessing, and reprove the incompetent. And therefore we are afraid to go there.”

“Fear not,” he said: “I will manage all this for you.”

654 [The locus classicus for the dishonest monk is the Ja 487 Uddālajātaka. I include the story here.]
“Then we will go,” they said. And all of them taking their various requisites in due course reached Benares. Now the king of Benares, having got all the kingdom of Kosala into his possession, set up loyal officials as governors, and himself, having collected all their available treasure, returned with his spoil to Benares. And filling iron pots with it, he buried them in the royal garden, and then continued to live there. So these holy men spent the night in the king’s garden, and on the morrow went into the city to beg alms, and came to the door of the palace. The king was so charmed with their behaviour that he called them up and made them sit on the dais and gave them rice and cakes, and till it was their meal-time asked them such and such questions. Chatta won the king’s heart by answering all his questions, and at the close of the meal he offered up various forms of thanksgiving. The king was still more pleased, and exacting a promise from them he made them all stay in his garden.

Now Chatta knew a spell for bringing to light buried treasure, and while dwelling there he thought: “Where can this fellow have put the money which belonged to my father?” So repeating the spell and looking about him he discovered that it was buried in the garden. And thinking that with this money he would recover his kingdom also, he addressed the ascetics and said: “Sirs, I am the son of the king of Kosala. When our kingdom was seized by the king of Benares, I escaped in disguise, and so far I have saved my life. But now I have got the property which belonged to my family. With this will I go and recover my kingdom. What will you do?”

“We too will go with you,” they replied.

“Agreed,” he said, and had some big leather sacks made, and at night digging a hole in the ground he pulled out the treasure-pots, and putting the money into the sacks he had the pots filled with grass. Then he ordered the five hundred holy men and others as well to take the money, and fled to Sāvatthi. There he had all the king’s officers seized, and recovering his kingdom he restored the walls, watch-towers and other works, and having thus made the city impregnable against the attack of any hostile king, he took up his abode there.

It was told to the king of Benares, “The ascetics have carried off the treasure from your garden and are fled.” He went to the garden and opening the pots found only grass in them. And by reason of his lost treasure great sorrow fell upon him. Going to the city he wandered about murmuring, “Grass, grass,” and no one could
The Bodhisatta, “The king is in great trouble. He wanders to and fro, idly chattering. Except myself, no one has the power to drive away his sorrow. I will free him from his trouble.” So one day while seated quietly with him, when the king began to chatter, he repeated the first verse:

1. “Grass is still your constant cry;
   Who did take your grass away?
   What your need of it, or why
   Do you this word only say?”

The king, on hearing what he said, replied in a second verse:

2. “Chatta, holy man of fame,
   As it happened this way came:
   Him alone to blame I hold,
   Substituting grass for gold.” (3.118)

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, uttered a third verse:

3. “Canny folk their rule should make,
   Little give and much will take.
   What he took was all his own,
   What he left was grass alone.”

On hearing this the king uttered the fourth verse:

4. “Virtue follows no such rules,
   These are morals fit for fools.
   Doubtful morals they must be,
   Learning too is vanity.”

While he thus blamed Chatta, the king by these words of the Bodhisatta was freed from his sorrow and ruled his kingdom righteously.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the cheating monk was the Brahāchatta, and I myself was the wise minister.”
In the present one monk comes in from the country and goes too early and too late on alms round, and then blames the families for not giving to him. The Buddha tells a story of old in which an ascetic failed to receive alms, but was not perturbed by it, and later taught Dhamma to the householder.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasīsēṭṭhi).

Keywords: Giving, Imperturbability.

“Alas, we offered you.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about a certain monk. He came, it was said, from the country to Jetavana, and, after putting away his bowl and robe, he saluted the Teacher and inquired of the young novices, saying: “Sirs, who look after the visiting monks that come to Sāvatthi?” [3.119] “The Treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika,” they said, “and the great and holy lay sister Visākhā look after the order of the monks, and stand in the place of father and mother to them.” “Very good,” [3.79] he said, and next day quite early, before a single monk had entered the house, he came to Anāthapiṇḍika’s door. From his having come at an unseasonable hour there was no one to attend to him. Without getting anything there he went off to the door of Visākhā’s house. There also from having come too early, he got nothing. After wandering here and there he came back, and finding the rice-gruel was all finished, he went off. Again he wandered about here and there, and on his return, finding the rice all finished, he went back to the monastery, and said: “The monks here speak of these two families as faithful believers, but both of them really are without faith and unbelievers.” Thus did he go about abusing these families.

So one day they started a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, how that a certain monk from the country came to the door of certain households too early, and failing to obtain alms went about reviling those families. When the Teacher came and inquired what was the topic the monks were sitting to discuss, on hearing what it was, he called the monk and asked him if it were true. When the monk said: “Yes, your reverence, it is true,” the Teacher asked, “Why are you angry, monk? Of old, before Buddha arose upon the world, even ascetics when they visited a household and received no alms, showed no anger.” And with this he told a story of the olden days.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family, and when he was of age he studied all the arts at Taxila, and subsequently adopted the ascetic life. After sojourning a long time in the Himālayas he went to Benares to procure salt and vinegar, and, taking up his abode in a garden, on the next day he entered the city for alms. There was at this time a merchant at Benares, who was a faithful believer. The Bodhisatta asked which was a believing household, and on hearing of the merchant’s family, he went to the door of his house. At that moment the merchant had gone to pay his respects to the king, and neither did any of his people happen to see him. So he turned back and came away.

Then the merchant who was returning from the palace saw him, and saluting him took his alms-bowl and led him to his house. There he offered him a seat and comforted him with the washing and anointing of his feet, and with rice, cakes and other food, and in the course of his meal he asked him one thing and another, and after he had finished eating, he saluted him and sitting respectfully on one side, he said: “Venerable sir, strangers who have come to our doors, whether beggars or holy monks or brahmans, have never before gone away without receiving marks of honour and respect, but today owing to your not being seen by our retainers, you have gone away without being offered a seat, or water to drink, and without having your feet washed, or rice and gruel given you to eat. This is our fault. You must forgive us in this.” And with these words he uttered the first verse:

1. “Alas, we offered you no seat,
   No water brought, nor anything to eat:
   We here confess our sinfulness,
   And pardon humbly, venerable sir, entreat.” [3.80]

The Bodhisatta on hearing this repeated the second verse:
2. “Nought have I to condone,
No anger do I feel,
The thought just once I own
Across my mind did steal,
Habits of people here
Are just a trifle queer.”

The merchant hearing this responded in two more verses:

3. “The custom of our family – ’twas so
Received by us from ages long ago –

4. Is to provide the stranger with a seat,
Supply his needs, bring water for his feet
And every guest as kinsman dear to treat.” (3.121)

And the Bodhisatta, after sojourning there a few days, and teaching the merchant of Benares his duty, went straight back to the Himālayas, where he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the monk attained fruition of the First Path. “At that time Ānanda was the merchant of Benares, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 338 Thusajātaka

The Story about the Husks of Rice (4s)

In the present the king of Kosala’s queen has a longing to drink the king’s blood while pregnant. Despite the queen trying to miscarry the child, the king preserved the life of the child who would eventually kill him. The Buddha tells the king a story about a previous life in which the son was prevented from harming his father, and only was released from captivity once the king had died a natural death.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher from Taxila (Takkasilāyaṁ disāpāmokkho ācariyo),

Present Source: Ja 338 Thusa,
Quoted at: Ja 373 Mūsika.

Keywords: Murder, Patricide.
“With sense so nice.” This story was told by the Teacher while living in the Bamboo Grove, of prince Ajātasattu. At the time of his conception there arose in his mother, the daughter of the king of Kosala, a chronic longing to drink blood from the right knee of (her husband) king Bimbisāra. Being questioned by her attendant ladies, she told them how it was with her. The king too hearing of it called his astrologers and said: “The queen is possessed of such and such a longing. What will be the issue of it?” The astrologers said: “The child conceived in the womb of the queen will kill you and seize your kingdom.” “If my son,” said the king, “should kill me and seize my kingdom, what is the harm of it?” And then he had his right knee opened with a sword and letting the blood fall into a golden dish gave it to the queen to drink. She thought: “If the son that is born of me should kill his father, what care I for him?” and endeavoured to bring about a miscarriage. The king hearing of it called her to him and said: “My dear, it is said, my son will slay me and seize my kingdom. But I am not exempt from old age and death: suffer me to behold the face of my child. Henceforth act not after this manner.” But she still went to the garden and acted as before. The king on hearing of it forbade her visits to the garden, and when she had gone her full time she gave birth to a son. On his naming-day, because he had been his father’s enemy, while still unborn, they called him prince Ajātasattu [Unborn Enemy].

As he grew up with his princely surroundings, one day the Teacher accompanied by five hundred monks came to the king’s palace and sat down. The assembly of the monks with Buddha at their head was entertained by the king with choice food, both hard and soft. And after saluting the Teacher the king sat down to listen to the Dhamma. At this moment they dressed up the young prince and brought him to the king. The king welcomed the child with a strong show of affection and placed him on his lap, and fondling the boy with the natural love of a father for his child, he did not listen to the Dhamma. The Teacher observing his inattention said: “Great king, formerly kings when suspicious of their sons had them kept in a secret place, and gave orders that at their death they were to be brought forth and set upon the throne.” And at the request of the king he told him a story of the past.

---

655 Compare Tibetan Tales vi. Prince Jīvaka.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a far-famed teacher at Taxila and trained many young princes and sons of brahmins in the arts. Now the son of the king of Benares, when he was sixteen years old, came to him and after he had acquired the three Vedas and all the liberal arts and was perfect in them, he took leave of his master. The teacher regarding him with his gift of seeing the future thought: “There is danger coming to this man through his son. By my magic power I will deliver him from it.” And composing four verses he gave them to the young prince and spoke as follows, “My son, after you are seated on the throne, when your son is sixteen years old, utter the first verse while eating your rice; repeat the second verse at the time of the great reception; the third, as you are ascending to the palace roof, standing at the head of the stairs, and the fourth, [3.123] when entering the royal chamber, as you stand on the threshold.”

The prince readily assented to this and saluting his teacher went away. And after acting as viceroy, on his father’s death he ascended the throne. His son, when he was sixteen years of age, on the king’s going forth to take his pleasure in the garden, observing his father’s majesty and power was filled with a desire to kill him and seize upon his kingdom, and spoke to his attendants about it. They said: “True, sir, what is the good of obtaining power, when one is old? You must by some means or other kill the king and possess yourself of his kingdom.” The prince said: “I will kill him by putting poison in his food.” So he took some poison and sat down to eat his evening meal with his father. The king, when the rice was just served in the bowl, spoke the first verse:

1. “With sense so nice, the husks from rice
   Rats keen are to discriminate:
   They cared not much the husks to touch,
   But grain by grain the rice they ate.” [3.82]

“I am discovered,” thought the prince, and not daring to administer the poison in the bowl of rice, he rose up and bowing to the king went away. He told the story to his attendants and said: “Today I am found out. How now shall I kill him?” From this day forth they lay concealed in the garden, and consulting together in whispers said: “There is still one expedient. When it is time to attend the great reception, gird on your sword, and taking your stand amongst the councillors, when you see the king off his guard, you must strike him a blow with your sword and kill him.” Thus they arranged it. The prince readily agreed, and at the time of the great reception, he girt on his sword and moving about from place to place looked out for an opportunity to strike the king. At this moment the king uttered the second verse:

2. “The secret counsel taken in the wood
By me is understood:
The village plot soft whispered in the ear
That too I hear.”

Thought the prince, “My father knows that I am his enemy,” and ran away and told his attendants. After the lapse of seven or eight days they said: “Prince, your father is ignorant of your feeling towards him. You only fancy this in your own mind. Put him to death.” So one day he took his sword and stood at the top of the stairs in the royal closet. The king standing at the head of the staircase spoke the third verse:

3. “A monkey once did cruel measures take His tender offspring impotent to make.”

Thought the prince, “My father wants to seize me,” and in his terror he fled away and told his attendants he had been threatened by his father. After the lapse of a fortnight they said: “Prince, if the king knew this, he would not have put up with it so long a time. Your imagination suggests this to you. Put him to death.” So one day he took his sword and entering the royal chamber on the upper floor of the palace he lay down beneath the couch, intending to slay the king, as soon as he came. At the close of the evening meal, the king sent his retinue away, wishing to lie down, and entering the royal chamber, as he stood on the threshold, he uttered the fourth verse:

4. “Your cautious creeping ways
Like one-eyed goat in mustard field that strays,
And who you are that lurkest here below,
This too I know.”

Thought the prince, “My father has found me out. Now he will put me to death.” And seized with fear he came out from beneath the couch, and throwing down his sword at the king’s feet and saying: “Pardon me, my lord,” he lay grovelling before him. The king said: “You thought, no [3.83] one knows what I am about.” And after rebuking him he ordered him to be bound in chains and put into the prison house, and set a guard over him. Then the king meditated on the virtues of the Bodhisatta. And by and by he died. When they had celebrated his funeral rites, they took the young prince out of prison and set him on the throne.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and said: “Thus, sire, kings of old suspected in cases in which suspicion was justified,” and related this incident, {3.126} but the king gave no heed to his words. The Teacher thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the far-famed teacher at Taxila was I myself.”

Ja 339 Bāverujātaka

The Story about (the Country) Bāveru (4s)

In the present the outside sects are losing their gains after the Buddha had arisen and started teaching. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who was greatly honoured when he was the only bird in the country, but once a peacock came he lost his gains and respect.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the peacocks (morarājā), Nigaṇṭha Nāṭhaputta = the crow (kāka).

Keywords: Gain, Fame, Animals, Birds.

“Before the crested peacock.” This story was told by the Teacher when at Jetavana, of certain heretics who lost their former gains and glory. For the heretics who before the birth of Buddha received gain and honour, lost the same at his birth, becoming like fireflies at sunrise. Their fate was discussed in the Dhamma Hall. When the Teacher came and inquired what was the topic the monks were discussing in their assembly, on being told what it was, he said: “Monks, not only now, but formerly too, before the appearance of those endowed with virtue, such as were without virtue attained to the highest gain and glory, but when those who were endowed with virtue appeared, such as were devoid of it lost their gain and glory.” And with this he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young peacock. And when he was fully grown, he was exceedingly beautiful and lived in a forest. At that time some merchants came to the kingdom of Bāveru, bringing on board ship with them a foreign crow. At this time, it is said, there were no birds in Bāveru. The natives who from time to time came and saw this bird perched on the top of the mast, said: “Mark the colour of this bird’s skin. Look at its beaked mouth at the end of its throat, and its eyes like jewels.” Thus singing the praises of this crow they said to these merchants, “Sirs, give us this bird. We have need of it, and you can get another in your own country.”

“Then take it,” they said, “at a price.” [3.84] “Give it us for a single piece of money,” they said. “We will not sell it for that,” said the merchants. [3.127]

Gradually increasing their offer the people said: “Give it us for a hundred pieces of money.” “It is very useful,” they replied, “to us, but let there be friendship between us and you.” And they sold it for one hundred pieces.

The natives took it and put it in a golden cage and fed it with various kinds of fish and meat and wild fruits. In a place where no other birds existed, a crow endowed with ten evil qualities attained the highest gain and glory. The next time these merchants came to the kingdom of Bāveru, they brought a royal peacock which they had trained to scream at the snapping of the fingers and to dance at the clapping of the hands. When a crowd had gathered together, the bird stood in the fore part of the vessel, and flapping its wings uttered a sweet sound and danced.

The people that saw it were highly delighted and said: “This king of birds is very beautiful and well-trained. Give it to us.”

The merchants said: “We first brought a crow. You took that. Now we have brought this royal peacock and you beg for this too. It will be impossible to come and even mention the name of any bird in your country.” “Be content, sirs,” they said, “give this bird to us and get another in your own land.”

And raising the price offered they at last bought it for a thousand pieces. Then they put it in a cage ornamented with the seven jewels and fed it on fish, flesh and wild fruits, as well as with honey, fried corn, sugar-water and the like. Thus did the royal peacock receive the highest gain and glory. From the day of his coming, the gain and honour paid to the crow fell off. And no one wanted even to look at it. The crow no longer getting food either hard or soft, with a cry of “Caw, caw,” went and settled on a dunghill.

The Teacher, making the connection between the two stories, after Fully Awakening repeated these verses: [3.128]
1. “Before the crested peacock had appeared,
Crows were with gifts of fruit and meat revered:

2. The sweet-voiced peacock to Bāveru came,
The crow at once was stripped of gifts and fame.

3. So man to divers monks due honour paid,
Till Buddha the full light of Truth displayed:

4. But when the sweet-voiced Buddha preached the law,
From heretics their gifts and praise all men withdraw.”

After uttering these four verses, he thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Jain Nāṭhaputta was the crow, and I myself was the royal peacock.”

Ja 340 Visayhajātaka

The Story about (the Wealthy Man) Visayha (4s)

In the present Anāthapiṇḍika gives so much in alms he threatens to impoverish himself and his family. A Devatā who lives in the household seeks to prevent him from giving any more. The Buddha tells a story of a wealthy man in the past who was very generous. To test him Sakka hid away all his possessions. Still he insisted on raising money for gifts with his hands and giving.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man Visayha (Visayho pana seṭṭhi), Rāhulamātā = the wealthy man’s wife (seṭṭhibhariyā).

Present Source: Ja 40 Khadiraṅgārajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 284 Siri, Ja 340 Visayha,
Past Compare: Jm 5 Aviṣahyaśreṣṭhi.

Keywords: Generosity, Determination, Devas.

“Of old, Visayha.” [3.85] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about Anāthapiṇḍika. The incident that gave rise to the story has already been told in full in the Khadiraṅgārajātaka [Ja 40].

For Anāthapiṇḍika, who had lavished fifty-four crores on the dispensation of the Buddha over the monastery alone, and who valued naught else save only the Three Jewels, used to go every day while the Teacher was at Jetavana to attend the Great Services – once at daybreak, once after breakfast, and once in the evening. There were intermediate services too; but he never went empty-handed, for fear the novices and lads should look to see what he had brought with him. When he went in the early morning, he used to have rice-gruel taken up; after breakfast, ghee, butter, honey, molasses, and the like; and in the evening, he brought perfumes, garlands and cloths. So much did he expend day after day, that his expense knew no bounds. Moreover, many traders borrowed money from him on their bonds – to the amount of eighteen crores; and the great merchant never called the money in. Furthermore, another eighteen crores of the family property, which were buried in the riverbank, were washed out to sea, when the bank was swept away by a storm; and down rolled the brazen pots, with fastenings and seals unbroken, to the bottom of the ocean. In his house, too, there was always rice standing ready for 500 monks – so that the merchant’s house was to the Saṅgha like a pool dug where four roads meet, yes, like mother and father was he to them. Therefore, even the Supreme Buddha used to go to his house, and the Eighty Chief Elders too; and the number of other monks passing in and out was beyond measure.

Now his house was seven stories high and had seven portals; and over the fourth gateway dwelt a Devatā who was a heretic. When the Supreme Buddha came into the house, she could not stay in her abode on high, but came down with her children to the ground-floor; and she had to do the same whenever the Eighty Chief Elders or the other elders came in and out. Thought she, “So long as the ascetic Gotama and his disciples keep coming into this house I can have no peace here; I can’t be eternally coming downstairs to the ground floor. I must contrive to stop them from coming any more to this house.” So one day, when the business manager had retired to rest, she appeared before him in visible shape.

“Who is that?” said he. “It is I,” was the reply, “the Devatā who lives over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “You don’t see what the merchant is doing. Heedless of his own future, he is drawing upon his resources, only to enrich the ascetic Gotama. He engages in no commerce; he undertakes no business. Advise the merchant to attend to his business, and arrange that the ascetic Gotama with his disciples shall come no more into the house.”

Then said he, “Foolish Devatā, if the merchant does spend his money, he spends it on the dispensation of the Buddha, which leads to safety. Even if he were to seize me by the hair and sell me for a slave, I will say nothing. Begone!”
Another day, she went to the merchant’s eldest son and gave him the same advice. And he flouted her in just the same manner. But to the merchant himself she did not so much as dare to speak on the matter.

Now by dint of unending munificence and of doing no business, the merchant’s incomings diminished and his estate grew less and less; so that he sank by degrees into poverty, and his table, his dress, and his bed and food were no longer what they had once been. Yet, in spite of his altered circumstances, he continued to entertain the Saṅgha, though he was no longer able to feast them. So one day when he had made his bow and taken his seat, the Teacher said to him, “Householder, are gifts being given at your house?” “Yes, sir,” said he, “but there’s only a little sour husk-porridge, left over from yesterday.” “Be not distressed, householder, at the thought that you can only offer what is unpalatable. If the heart be good, the food given to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and their disciples, cannot but be good too. And why? Because of the greatness of the fruit thereof. For he who can make his heart acceptable cannot give an unacceptable gift – as is to be testified by the following passage:

“For, if the heart have faith, no gift is small
To Buddhas or to their disciples true.
’Tis said no service can be reckoned small
That’s paid to Buddhas, lords of great renown.
Mark well what fruit rewarded that poor gift
Of pottage – dried-up, sour, and lacking salt.”

Also, he said this further thing, “Householder, in giving this unpalatable gift, you are giving it to those who have entered on the Noble Eightfold Path. Whereas I, when in Velāma’s time I stirred up all Jambudīpa by giving the seven things of price, and in my largesse poured them forth as though I had made into one mighty stream the five great rivers – I yet found none who had reached the Three Refuges or kept the Five Precepts; for rare are those who are worthy of offerings. Therefore, let not your heart be troubled by the thought that your gift is unpalatable.” And so saying, he repeated the Velāmakasutta [AN 9.20].

Now that Devatā who had not dared to speak to the merchant in the days of his magnificence, thought that now he was poor he would hearken to her, and so, entering his chamber at dead of night she appeared before him in visible shape, standing in mid-air. “Who’s that?” said the merchant, when he became aware of her presence. “I am the Devatā, great merchant, who dwells over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “To give you counsel.” “Proceed, then.” “Great merchant, you take no thought for your own future or for your own children. You have expended vast sums on the dispensation of the ascetic Gotama; in fact, by long-continued expenditure and by not undertaking new business you have been brought by the ascetic Gotama to poverty. But even in your poverty you do not shake off the ascetic Gotama! The ascetics are in and out of your house this very day just the same! What they have had of you cannot be recovered. That may be taken for certain. But henceforth don’t you go yourself to the ascetic Gotama and don’t let his disciples set foot inside your house. Do not even turn to look at the ascetic Gotama but attend to your trade and traffic in order to restore the family estate.”

Then he said to her, “Was this the counsel you wanted to give me?” “Yes, it was.”

Said the merchant, “The One with Ten Powers has made me proof against a hundred, a thousand, yes against a hundred thousand Devatās such as you are! My faith is strong and steadfast as Mount Sineru! My substance has been expended on the dispensation that leads to safety. Wicked are your words; it is a blow aimed at the dispensation of the Buddha by you, you wicked and impudent wretch. I cannot live under the same roof with you; be off at once from my house and seek shelter elsewhere!”

Hearing these words of that converted man and elect disciple, she could not stay, but repairing to her dwelling, took her children by the hand and went forth. But though she went, she was minded, if she could not find herself a lodging elsewhere, to appease the merchant and return to dwell in his house; and in this mind she went to the tutelary deity of the city and with due salutation stood before him. Being asked what had brought her there, she said: “My lord, I have been speaking imprudently to Anāthapiṇḍika, and he in his anger has turned me out of my home. Take me to him and make it up between us, so that he may let me live there again.” “But what was it you said to the merchant?” “I told him for the future not to support the Buddha and the Sāṅgha, and not to let the ascetic Gotama set foot again in his house. This is what I said, my lord.” “Wicked were your words; it was a blow aimed at the dispensation. I cannot take you with me to the merchant.” Meeting with no support from him, she went to the Four Great Kings of the world. And being repulsed by them in the same manner, she went on to Sakka, King of Devas, and told him her story, beseeching him still more earnestly, as follows, “Deva, finding no shelter, I wander about homeless, leading my children by the hand. Grant me of your majesty some place wherein to dwell.”

And he too said to her, “You have done wickedly; it was a blow aimed at the Conqueror’s dispensation. I cannot speak to the merchant on your behalf. But I can tell you one way whereby the merchant may be led to pardon you.” “Pray tell me, Deva.” “Men have had eighteen crores of the merchant on bonds. Take the semblance of his agent, and without telling anybody repair to their houses with the bonds, in the company of some young Yakkhas. Stand in the middle of their houses with the bond in one hand and a receipt in the other, and terrify them with your Yakkha power, saying, ‘Here’s your acknowledgment of the debt. Our merchant did not move in the matter while he was affluent; but now he is poor, and you must pay up the money you owe.’ By your Yakkha power obtain all those eighteen crores of gold and fill the merchant’s empty treasuries. He had another treasure buried in the banks of the river Aciravati, but when the bank was washed away, the treasure was swept into the sea. Get that back also by your supernatural power and store it in his treasuries. Further, there is another sum of eighteen crores lying unowned in such and such a place. Bring that too and pour the money into his empty treasuries. When you have atoned by the recovery of these fifty-four crores, ask the merchant to forgive you.” “Very good, Deva,” said she. And she set to work obediently, and did just as she had been bidden. When she had recovered all the money, she went into the merchant’s chamber at dead of night and appeared before him in visible shape standing in the air.

The merchant asking who was there, she replied, “It is I, great merchant, the blind and foolish Devatā who lived over your fourth gateway. In the greatness of my infatuate folly I knew not the virtues of a Buddha, and so came to say what I said to you some days ago. Pardon me my fault! At the instance of Sakka, King of Devas, I have made atonement by recovering the eighteen crores owing to you, the eighteen crores which had been washed down into the sea, and another eighteen crores which were lying unowned in such and such a place – making fifty-four crores in all, which I have poured into your empty treasure-chambers. The sum you expended on the monastery at Jetavana is now made up again. While
I have nowhere to dwell, I am in misery. Bear not in mind what I did in my ignorant folly, great merchant, but pardon me.”

Anāthapiṇḍika, hearing what she said, thought to himself, “She is a Devatā, and she says she has atoned, and confesses her fault. The Teacher shall consider this and make his virtues known to her. I will take her before the Supreme Buddha.” So he said: “My good Devatā, if you want me to pardon you, ask me in the presence of the master.” “Very good,” said she, “I will. Take me along with you to the Teacher.” “Certainly,” said he. And early in the morning, when night was just passing away, he took her with him to the Teacher, and told the Tathāgata all that she had done.

Hearing this, the Teacher said: “You see, householder, how the defiled man regards defilement as excellent before it ripens to its fruit. But when it has ripened, then he sees defilements to be defiled. Likewise the good man looks on his goodness as wrong before it ripens to its fruit; but when it ripens, he sees it to be goodness.” And so saying, he repeated these two verses from the Dhammapada [119-120]:

“The defiled man thinks his deed is good,
So long as wrong has ripened not to fruit.
But when his wrong at last to ripeness grows,
The defiled man sees ‘It was wrong I wrought.’”

“The good man thinks his goodness is but wrong,
So long as it has ripened not to fruit.
But when his goodness unto ripeness grows,
The good man sees that ‘It was good I wrought.’”

At the close of these verses that Devatā was established in the Fruit of the First Path. She fell at the wheel-marked feet of the Teacher, crying, “Stained as I was with passion, depraved by defilements, misled by delusion, and blinded by ignorance, I spoke wickedly because I knew not your virtues. Pardon me!” Then she received pardon from the Teacher and from the great merchant.

At this time Anāthapiṇḍika sang his own praises in the Teacher’s presence, saying: “Sir, though this Devatā did her best to stop me from giving support to the Buddha and his following, she could not succeed; and though she tried to stop me from giving gifts, yet I gave them still! Was not this goodness on my part?”
On this occasion the Teacher addressing Anāthapiṇḍika said: “Wise men of old, my lay brother, gave alms, rejecting the counsel of Sakka, king of heaven, when he stood in mid-air and tried to prevent them, saying, ‘Give not alms.’”\textsuperscript{656} And at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a great merchant, named Visayha, worth eighty crores. \textsuperscript{[3.129]} And being endowed with the five precepts, he was liberal and fond of generosity. He had alms halls built at the four city gates, in the heart of the city, and at the door of his own house. At these six points he started almsgiving, and every day six hundred thousand men went forth to beg, and the food of the Bodhisatta and that of the beggars was exactly the same.

And as he thus stirred up the people of all Jambudīpa by his gifts, the abode of Sakka was shaken by the extraordinary efficacy of his generosity, and the yellow marble throne of the king of heaven showed signs of heat. Sakka exclaimed, “Who, I wonder, would make me fall from my seat in heaven?” And looking about him he espied the great merchant and thought to himself, “This Visayha gives alms and by scattering his gifts everywhere is stirring up all Jambudīpa. By means of his generosity, I think, he will dethrone me and himself become Sakka. I will destroy his wealth and make him a poor man, and so bring it about that he shall no longer give alms.”

So Sakka caused his oil, honey, molasses, and the like, even all his treasure of grain to vanish, as well as his slaves and work people. Those who were deprived of his gifts came and said: “My lord, the alms-hall has disappeared. We do not find anything in the various places set up by you.” “Take money hence,” he said. “Do not cut off the giving of alms.” And calling his wife, he bade her keep up her generosity. She searched the whole house, and not finding a single piece of money, she said: “My lord, except the clothes we wear, I see nothing. The whole house is empty.” Opening the seven jewel treasuries they found nothing, and save the merchant and his wife no one else was seen, neither slaves \textsuperscript{[3.86]} nor hirelings.

\textsuperscript{656} [As can be seen from the story above in Ja 40 \textit{Khadiṅga-raja-jātaka}, it is a Devatā who advises against giving alms, and not Sakka. In the \textit{Jātakamālā} version of the story, however, it is Śakra who makes the request, as stated here.]
The Bodhisatta again addressing his wife said: “My dear, we cannot possibly cut off our charities. Search the whole house till you find something.”

At that moment a certain grasscutter threw down his sickle and pole and the rope for binding the grass in the doorway, and ran away. The merchant’s wife found them and said: “My lord, this is all I see,” {3.130} and brought and gave them to him. Said the Bodhisatta, “My dear, all these years I have never mown grass before, but today I will mow grass and take and sell it, and by this means dispense the fitting alms.” So through fear of having to cut off his charities, he took the sickle and the pole and the rope, and going forth from the city came to a place of much grass, and cutting it tied it up in two bundles, saying: “One shall belong to us, and with the other I will give alms.” And hanging the grass on the pole he took it and went and sold it at the city gate, and receiving two small coins he gave half the money to the beggars.

Now there were many beggars, and as they repeatedly cried out, “Give to us also,” he gave the other half of the money also, and passed the day with his wife fasting. In this way six days passed, and on the seventh day, while he was gathering the grass, as he was naturally delicate and had been fasting for seven days, no sooner did the heat of the sun strike upon his forehead, than his eyes began to swim in his head, and he became unconscious and fell down, scattering the grass. Sakka was moving about, observing what Visayha did. And at that instant the god came, and standing in the air uttered the first verse:

1. “Of old, Visayha, you did alms bestow
   And to almsgiving loss of wealth do owe.
   Henceforth show self-restraint, refuse to give,
   And you midst lasting joys for aye shall live.” {3.131}

The Bodhisatta on hearing his words asked, “Who are you?” “I am Sakka,” he said. The Bodhisatta replied, “Sakka himself by giving alms and taking upon him the moral duties, and keeping fast days and fulfilling the seven vows attained the office of Sakka. But now you forbid the generosity that brought about your own greatness. Truly you are guilty of an unworthy deed.” And so saying, he repeated three verses:
2. “It is not right, men say, that deed of shame
   Should stain the honour of a noble name.
   O you that do a thousand eyes possess
   Guard us from this, c’en in our sore distress.

3. Let not our wealth in faithless wise be spent
   On our own pleasure or aggrandisement,
   But as of old our stores with increase bless.

4. By that same road a former chariot went
   A second may well go. So will we give
   As long as we have wherewithal to live,
   Nor at the worst each generous thought repress.” [3.87] {3.132}

Sakka being unable to stop him from his purpose asked him why he gave alms.
“Desiring,” he said, “neither to become Sakka nor Brahmā, but seeking omniscience do I give.” Sakka in token of his delight on hearing these words patted him on the back with his hands. At the very instant the Bodhisatta enjoyed this favour, his whole frame was filled with joy. By the supernatural power of Sakka all manner of prosperity was restored to him. “Great merchant,” said Sakka, “henceforth do you every day give alms, distributing twelve hundred thousand portions.” And creating countless wealth in his house, Sakka took leave of him and returned straight to his own place of abode.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the mother of Rāhula was the merchant's wife, and I myself was Visayha.”

Ja 341 Kaṇḍarijātaka

The Story about (King) Kaṇḍari (4s)

Alternative Title: Kaṇḍarijātaka (Cst)

There is no story of the present or conclusion. Queen Kinnarā is married to Kaṇḍari, the king of Benares, but makes love with a handicapped man who lives in a tree. When she is caught the king wants to kill her, but his priest Pañcālacaṇḍa explains that this is just the way of women, and shows him this is how even young women are in the world behave.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest Pañcālacaṇḍa.

Present Source: Ja 523 Kuṇālajātaka,
The story of this Jātaka will be set forth in full in the Kuṇālajātaka [Ja 523].

In the past at Benares was a king named Kaṇḍari who was a very handsome man, and to him daily his counsellors would bring a thousand boxes of perfume, and with this perfume they would make the house trim and neat, and then splitting up the boxes they would make scented firewood and cook the food therewith. Now his wife was a lovely woman named Kinnarā, and his family priest Paṅcālaṅḍa was the same age as himself and full of wisdom. And in the wall near the king’s palace grew a Jambu plum tree and its branches hung down upon the wall, and in the shade of it dwelt a loathsome, misshapen handicapped man.

Now one day queen Kinnarā looking out of her window saw him and conceived a passion for him. And at night after winning the king’s favour by her charms, as soon as he had fallen asleep, she would get up softly and putting all manner of dainty food in a golden vessel and taking it on her hips, she would let herself down through the window by means of a rope of cloth, and climbing up the Jambu plum tree drop down by a branch of it and give her dainty food to the handicapped man and take her pleasure with him, and then ascend to the palace the same way that she had come down, and after shampooing herself all over with perfumes lie down by the king’s side. In this way she would constantly misconduct herself with this handicapped man and the king knew nothing of it.

One day the king after a solemn procession round the city was entering his palace when he saw this handicapped man, a pitiable object, lying in the shade of the Jambu plum, and he said to his family priest, “Just look at this ghost of a man.” “Yes, sire?” “Is it possible, my friend, that any woman moved by lust would come nigh such a loathsome creature?” Hearing what he said the handicapped man, swelling with pride, thought: “What is it this king said? I think he knows nothing of his queen’s coming to visit me.” And stretching out his folded hands towards the Jambu plum tree he cried, “O my lord, you guardian spirit of this tree, excepting you no one knows about this.” The family priest noticing his action thought: “Of a truth the king’s chief consort by the help of this tree comes and misconducts herself with him.” So he said to the king, “Sire, at night what is it like when you come into contact with the queen’s person?” “I notice nothing else,” he said, “but that at the middle watch her body is cold.” “Well, sire, whatever may be the case with other women, your queen Kinnarā misconducts herself with him.” “What is this you say, my friend? Would such a charming lady take her pleasure with this disgusting creature?” “Well then, sire, put it to the proof.” “Agreed,” said the king, and after supper he lay down with her, to put it to the test.

At the usual time for falling asleep, he pretended to drop off, and she acted as before. The king following in her steps took his stand in the shade of the Jambu plum tree. The handicapped man was in a rage with the queen and said: “You are very late in coming,” and struck with his hand the chain in her ear. So she said: “Be not angry, my lord; I was watching for the king to fall asleep,” and so saying she acted as it were a wife’s part in his house. But when he struck her, the ear-ornament, which was like a lion’s head, falling from her ear dropped at the king’s feet. The king thought: “Just this will be the best thing for me,” and he took it away with him. And after misconducting herself with her lover she returned just as before and proceeded to lie down by the side of the king.

The king rejected her advances and next day he gave an order, saying: “Let queen Kinnarā come, wearing every ornament I have given her.” She said: “My lion’s head jewel is with the goldsmith,” and refused to come. When a second message was sent, she came with only a single ear-ornament. The king asked, “Where is your earring?” “With the goldsmith.” He sent for the goldsmith and said: “Why do you not let the lady have her earring?” “I have it not, sire.” The king was enraged and said: “You wicked, vile woman, your goldsmith must be a man just like me,” and so saying he threw the earring down before her and said to the family priest, “Friend, you spoke the truth; go and have her head chopped off.” So he secured her in a certain quarter of the palace and came and said to the king, “Sire, be not angry with the queen Kinnarā: all women are just the same. If you are anxious to see how immoral women are, I will show you their wickedness and deceitfulness. Come, let us disguise ourselves and go into the country.”

The king readily agreed and, handing over his kingdom to his mother, he set out on his travels with his family priest. When they had gone a league’s journey and were seated by the high road, a certain gentleman of property, who was holding a marriage festival for his son, had seated the bride in a close carriage and was accompanying her with a large escort. On seeing this the family priest said: “If you like, you can make this girl misconduct herself with you.” “What say you, my friend? With this great escort the thing is impossible.” “Well then see this, my lord?” And going forward he set up a tent-shaped screen not far from the high road and, placing the king inside the screen, himself sat down by the side of the road, weeping.

Then the gentleman on seeing it asked, “Why, friend, are you weeping?” “My wife,” he said, “was heavy with child and I set out on a journey to take her to her own home, and while still on the way her pangs overtook her and she is in trouble within the screen, and she has no woman with her and I cannot go to her there. I do not know what will happen.” “She ought to have a woman with her: do not weep, there are numbers of women here; one of them shall go to her.” “Well then let this maiden come; it will be a happy omen for the girl.” He thought: “What he says is true: it will be an auspicious thing for my daughter-in-law. She will be blessed with numerous sons and daughters,” and he brought her there.

Passing inside the screen she fell in love at first sight with the king and committed adultery with him, and the king gave her his signet ring. So when the deed was done and she came out of the tent they asked her, “What has she given birth to?” “A boy the colour of gold?” So the gentleman took her and went off. The family priest came to the king and said: “You have seen, sire, even a young girl is thus wicked. How much more will other women be so? Pray, sir, did you give her anything?” “Yes, I gave her my signet ring.” “I will not allow her to keep it.” And he followed in haste and caught up the carriage, and when they said: “What is the meaning of this?” he said: “This girl has gone off with a ring my brahmin wife had laid on her pillow: give up the ring, lady.” In giving it she scratched the brahmin’s hand, saying: “Take it, you rogue.” Thus did the brahmin in a variety of ways show the king that many other women are guilty of misconduct, and said: “Let this suffice here; we will now go elsewhere, sire.” The king traversed all Jambudīpa, and they said: “All women will be just the same. What are they to us? Let us turn back.” So they went straight home to Benares. The family priest said: “It is thus, sire, with all women; so wicked is their nature. Forgive queen Kinnarā.” At the prayer of his family priest he pardoned her, but had her thrust out from the palace. And when he had ejected her from the place, he chose another queen-consort, and he had the handicapped man driven forth and ordered the Jambu plum branch to be lopped off. At that time Kuṇāla was Pañcālacaṇḍa. So in telling the story of what he had seen with his own eyes, in illustration he spoke this verse:

1-2. “This much from tale of Kaṇḍari and Kinnarā is shown; All women fail to find delight in homes that are their own.

3-4. Thus does a wife forsake her lord, though lusty he and strong, And will with any other man, e’en handicapped, go wrong.”

Ja 342 Vānarajātaka
The Story about the (Clever) Monkey (4s)

In the present Devadatta is going around trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story of how a crocodile had desired to eat the heart of a monkey, but the monkey tricked him into believing he had left his heart on a tree, and escaped.

The Bodhisatta = the monkey (vānara),
Devadatta = the crocodile (samsumāra).

Present Source: Ja 21 Kuruṅgajātaka, Quoted at: Ja 342 Vānarajātaka,
Past Compare: Ja 57 Vānarinda, Ja 208 Sūṁsūmāra, Ja 224 Kumbhīla, Ja 342 Vānara, Cp 27 Kapirājacariyā.

Keywords: Desire, Trickery, Animals.

“Have I from water.” [3.133] This story was told by the Teacher, when dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, concerning the going about of Devadatta to kill the Buddha. The incident that led to the story has already been given in detail.657 [3.88]

For once when the monks were gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, they sat talking reproachfully of Devadatta, saying: “Sirs, with a view to destroy the Tathāgata, Devadatta hired bowmen, hurled down a rock, and let loose the elephant Dhanapālaka; in every way he goes about to slay the One with Ten Powers.” Entering and seating himself on the seat prepared for him, the Teacher asked, saying: “Sirs, what is theme you are discussing here in a meeting?” “Sir,” was the reply, “we were discussing the wickedness of Devadatta, saying that he was always going about to slay you.” Said the Teacher, “It is not only in these present days, monks, that Devadatta goes about seeking to slay me; he went about with the like intent in bygone days also – but was unable to slay me.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

657 [There is no long story of these incidents in the Jātakas, the story being found in detail in the Vinaya Cullavagga, vii. iii. 6 foll. Ja 21 Kuruṅgajātaka gives the summary that follows.]

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young monkey in the Himālayas region. And when fully grown he lived on the banks of the Ganges. Now a certain female crocodile in the Ganges conceived a longing for the flesh of the Bodhisatta’s heart, and told it to her husband. He thought: “I will kill the Bodhisatta by plunging him in the water and will take his heart’s flesh and give it to my wife.” So he said to the Bodhisatta, “Come, my friend, we will go and eat wild fruits on a certain island.”

“How shall I get there?” he said. “I will put you on my back and bring you there,” answered the crocodile.

Innocent of the crocodile’s purpose he jumped on his back and sat there. The crocodile after swimming a little way began to dive. Then the monkey said: “Why, sir, do you plunge me into the water?” “I am going to kill you,” said the crocodile, “and give your heart’s flesh to my wife.”

“Foolish fellow,” said he, “do you suppose my heart is inside me?” “Then where have you put it?”

“Do you not see it hanging there on yonder fig tree?” “I see it,” said the crocodile.

“But will you give it me?” “Yes, I will,” said the monkey.

Then the crocodile – so foolish was he – took him and swam to the foot of the fig tree on the river bank. The Bodhisatta springing from the crocodile’s back perched on the fig tree and repeated these verses:

1. “Have I from water, fish, to dry land passed
   Only to fall into your power at last?

2. Of bread fruit and rose apples I am sick,
   And rather figs than yonder mangoes pick.
3. He that to great occasion fails to rise
'Neath foeman’s feet in sorrow prostrate lies: \{3.134\}

4. One prompt a crisis in his fate to know Needs never dread oppression from his foe.”

Thus did the Bodhisatta in these four verses tell how to succeed in worldly affairs, and forthwith disappeared in the thicket of trees.

The Teacher, having brought his lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the crocodile, and I myself was the monkey.”

Ja 343 Kuntanijātaka

The Story about the Heron (4s)

Alternative Title: Kuntanijātaka (Cst)

In the present while a heron is away on an errand for the king two boys kill her young, when she returns she has the boys killed in return. The Buddha tells of a similar happening in the past, and the dialogue that ensued.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
the heron = the same in the past (kuntinī).

Keywords: Killing, Revenge, Animals, Birds.

“Long I held.” [3.89] This story was told by the Teacher at Jetavana, concerning a heron that lived in the house of the king of Kosala. She carried messages, they say, for the king, and had two young ones. The king sent this bird with a letter to some other king. When she was gone away, the boys in the royal family squeezed the young birds to death with their hands. The mother bird came back and missing her young ones, asked who had killed her offspring. They said: “So and so.” And at this time there was a fierce and savage tiger kept in the palace, fastened by a strong chain. Now these boys came to see the tiger and the heron went with them, thinking: “Even as my young ones were killed by them, just so will I deal with these boys,” and she took hold of them and threw them down at the foot of the tiger. The tiger with a growl crunched them up. The bird said: “Now is the wish of my heart fulfilled,” and flying up into the air made straight for the Himālayas.
On hearing what had happened they started a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying, {3.135} “Sirs, a heron, it is said, in the king’s palace threw down before a tiger the boys who killed her young ones, and when she had thus brought about their death, she made off.” The Teacher came and inquired what it was the monks were discussing and said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly also did she bring about the death of those who killed her young ones.” And herewith he related a legend of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta at Benares ruled his kingdom with justice and equity. A certain heron in his house carried messages for him. And so on just as before. But the special point here is that in this case the bird, having let the tiger kill the boys, thought: “I can no longer remain here. I will take my departure, but though I am going away I will not leave without telling the king, but as soon as I have told him I will be off.” And so she drew nigh and saluted the king, and standing a little way off said: “My lord, it was through your carelessness that the boys killed my young ones, and under the influence of passion I in revenge caused their death. Now I can no longer live here.” And uttering the first verse she said:

1. “Long I held this house as mine,
   Honour great I did receive,
   It is due to act of thine
   I am now compelled to leave.”

The king on hearing this repeated the second verse:

2. “Should one to retaliate,
   Wrong with equal wrong repay,
   Then his anger should abate;
   So, good heron, pray you stay.” [3.90] {3.136}

Hearing this the bird spoke the third verse:

3. “Wronged can with wrong-doer ne’er
   As of old be made at one:
   Nought, O king, can keep me here,
   Lo! From henceforth I am gone.”

The king, on hearing this, spoke the fourth verse:
4. “Should they wise, not foolish be,
    With the wronged wrong-doer may
    Live in peace and harmony;
    So, good heron, pray you, stay.”

The bird said: “As things are, I cannot stay, my lord,” and saluting the king she flew up into the air and made straight for the Himālayas.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, thus identified the Jātaka, “The heron in the former tale was the heron in this, but the king of Benares was myself.”

Ja 344 Ambacorajātaka

The Story about the Mango Thief (4s)

Alternative Title: Ambajātaka (Cst)

In the present a false ascetic lives in a mango grove and steals mangoes for himself and his relatives, but when some thieves stole the mangoes he accused the four daughters of a rich man of theft until they took an oath. The Buddha tells of similar events in the past and the oaths the young women made.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, the four wealthy man’s daughters = the same in the past (catasso setṭhidhītaro), the monk who watched the mangoes = the cheating matted-haired ascetic (kūṭajaṭila).

Keywords: Theft, Honour, Curses.

“She that did your mangoes eat.” {3.137} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, concerning an elder who kept watch over mango fruit. When he was old, they say, he became an ascetic and built himself a hut of leaves in a mango orchard on the outskirts of Jetavana, and not only himself continually ate the ripe fruit that fell from the mango trees, but also gave some to his kinsfolk. When he had set out on his round of alms-begging, some thieves knocked down his mangoes, and ate some and went off with others. At this moment the four daughters of a rich merchant, after bathing in the river Aciravatī, in wandering about strayed into the mango orchard. When the old man returned and found them there, he charged them with having eaten his mangoes.

“Sir,” they said, “we have but just come; we have not eaten your mangoes.”

“Then take an oath,” he said.
“We will, sir,” they said, and took an oath. The old man having thus put them to shame, by making them take an oath, let them go.

The monks, hearing of his action, raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, how that an old man exacted an oath from the daughters of a merchant, who entered the mango orchard where he himself lived, and after putting them to shame by administering an oath to them, let them go. When the Teacher came and on inquiring what was the topic they sat in council to discuss, heard what it was, he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly also this old man, when he kept watch over mangoes, made certain daughters of a rich merchant take an oath, and after thus putting them to shame let them go.” And so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became Sakka. At that time a cheating ascetic built a hermitage of leaves in a mango orchard on a river bank near Benares, and keeping watch over the mangoes, ate the ripe fruit that fell from the mango trees and also gave some to his kinsfolk, and dwelt there gaining his livelihood by various false practices.

At this time Sakka, king of heaven, thought: “Who, I wonder, in this world of men support their parents, pay honour to the aged members of their family, give alms, keep the moral law and observe fast day? Which of them after adopting the ascetic life, continually devote themselves to the duties befitting ascetics, and which of them again are guilty of misconduct?” And exploring the world he spied this wicked ascetic keeping watch over his mangoes and said: “This false ascetic, abandoning his duties as an ascetic, such as focusing on the Meditation Object and the like, is continually watching a mango orchard. I will frighten him soundly.” So when he was gone into the village for alms, Sakka by his supernatural power knocked down the mangoes, and made as if they had been plundered by thieves. At this moment four daughters of a merchant of Benares entered the orchard, and the false ascetic on seeing them stopped them and said: “You have eaten my mangoes.”

They said: “Sir, we have but just come. We have not eaten them.”

“Then take an oath,” he said.

“But in that case may we go?” they asked. “Certainly, you may.”
“Very well, sir,” they said, and the eldest of them swore an oath uttering the first verse:

1. “She that did your mangoes eat,
   As her lord shall own some churl,
   That with dye grey hairs would cheat
   And his locks with tongs would curl.”

The ascetic said: “Stand you on one side,” and he made the second daughter of the merchant take an oath, and she repeated the second verse:

2. “Let the maid that robbed your tree
   Vainly for a husband sigh,
   Past her teens though she may be
   And on thirty verging nigh.”

And after she had taken an oath and stood on one side, the third maiden uttered the third verse: [3.139]

3. “She that your ripe mangoes ate
   Weary path shall tread alone,
   And at trysting place too late
   Grieve to find her lover gone.” [3.92]

When she had taken an oath and stood aside, the fourth maiden uttered the fourth verse:

4. “She that did your tree despoil
   Gaily dressed, with wreath on head,
   And bedewed with sandal oil
   Still shall seek a virgin bed.”

The ascetic said: “This is a solemn oath you have taken; others must have eaten the mangoes. Do you therefore now be gone.” And so saying, he sent them away. Sakka then presented himself in a terrible form, and drove away the false ascetic from the place.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time this false ascetic was the old man who watched mangoes. The four merchant’s daughters played the same part then as now. But Sakka was myself.”
Ja 345 Gajakumbhajātaka
The Story about the (Lazy) Turtle (4s)

In the present one monk is very lazy and lax regarding his duties. The Buddha tells a story of the time he advised a king how a turtle’s laziness could cause its demise, leading the king to become more diligent.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (panditāmacca), the lazy monk = the turtle (rājakumbha).

Keywords: Sloth, Laziness, Animals.

“Should a flame sweep.” This story was told by the Teacher at Jetavana, concerning a slothful monk. He was, it was said, of gentle birth and lived at Sāvatthi. And after giving his heart to the dispensation and taking ordination, he became slothful, and as regards questioning, enquiring, devotion and the round of monastic duties, he did not fully enter into them, being overcome by his hindrances, and was always to be found at public lounging-places.

The monks discussed his sloth in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Such a one, sirs, after taking ordination in so excellent a dispensation that leads to safety, is continually slothful and indolent, and overcome by his hindrances.” [3.140] When the Teacher came and inquired what the monks were assembled to discuss, on being told what it was, he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly too was he slothful.” And so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his valued minister. The king of Benares was of a slothful disposition, and the Bodhisatta went about considering some means to rouse the king. Now one day the king went to his garden, accompanied by his minister, and while wandering about there he espied a slothful turtle. Lazy creatures like these, they say, though they are in motion a whole day, move only just an inch or two. [3.93]

The king on seeing it asked, saying: “Friend, what is its name?”

The Bodhisatta answered, “The creature is called a turtle, great king; and is so lazy that though it is in motion all day, it only moves just an inch or two.” And addressing it he said: “Ho! Sir turtle, yours is a slow motion. Supposing a conflagration arose in the forest, what would you do?” And herewith he spoke the first verse:

1. “Should a flame sweep through the grove,
   Leaving blackened path behind,
   How, sir waddler, slow to move,
   Way of safety could you find?”

The turtle on hearing this repeated the second verse:

2. “Holes on every side abound,
   Chinks there be in every tree,
   Here a refuge will be found
   Or an end of us ’twill be.” \(3.141\)

On hearing this the Bodhisatta gave utterance to two verses:

3. “Whoso does hurry when he ought to rest,
   And tarries long when utmost speed is best,
   Destroys the slender fabric of his weal,
   As withered leaf is crushed beneath the heel.

4. But they who wait betimes nor haste too soon, Fulfil their purpose, as her orb the moon.”

The king, hearing the words of the Bodhisatta, thenceforth was no longer indolent.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the slothful monk was the turtle, and I myself was the wise councillor.”

Ja 346 Kesavajātaka

The Story about (the Ascetic) Kesava (4s)

In the present in imitation of Anāthapiṇḍika, the king begins a daily almsgiving to the monks. The monks, however, do not eat at the palace, but go to their supporters with the food and eat there. The Buddha tells a story of an old teacher and his favourite pupil, and how when even the best food and doctors couldn’t help the teacher in his sickness, the loving kindness of his pupil could.

The Bodhisatta = (the ascetic) Kappa,
Bakabrahmā= (the ascetic) Kesava,
Sāriputta = (the minister) Nārada,
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Loving-kindness, Affection.

“You that of late.” This story the Teacher while at Jetavana told concerning the meal of the faithful.

In the house of Anāthapiṇḍika, they say, five hundred monks were constantly fed. The house was continually like a place of refreshment for the assembly of the monks, bright with the sheen of their yellow robes and blown upon with saintly odours. So one day the king in making a solemn procession round the city caught sight of the assembly of the monks in the Treasurer’s house, and thinking: “I too will grant a perpetual alms to the assembly of saints,” he went to the monastery and after greeting the Teacher he instituted perpetual alms for five hundred monks. Thenceforth there was a perpetual giving of alms in the king’s house, even choice food of rice with the perfume of the rain upon it, but there are none to give it with their own hands, with marks of affection and faith, but the king’s ministers dispense the food, and the monks do not care to sit down and eat it, but taking the various dainty foods, they go each to the house of his own retainers, and giving them the food, themselves eat whatever is set before them, whether coarse or dainty.

Now one day much wild fruit was brought to the king. The king said: “Give it to the Saṅgha of monks.” They went to the refectory and came and told the king, “There is not a single monk there.”

“What, is it not time yet?” said the king. “Yes it is time,” they said, “but the monks take the food in your house, and then go to the abode of their trusty servitors, and give the food to them, and themselves eat whatsoever is served up to them, whether it be coarse or dainty.”

The king said: “Our food is dainty. Why in the world do they abstain from ours and eat some other food?” And thinking: “I will inquire of the Teacher,” he went to the monastery and asked him.

The Teacher said: “The best food is that which is given in faith. Owing to the absence of those who by giving in faith establish friendly feeling, the monks take the food and eat it in some friendly place of their own. There is no flavour, sire, equal to that of faith. That which is given without faith, though it be composed of the four sweet things, is not worth so much as wild rice given with faith. Wise men of old, when sickness arose amongst them, though the king with his five families of leeches provided remedies, if the sickness were not thus assuaged, repaired to their intimate friends and by eating broth of wild rice and millet, without salt, or even leaves without salt, sprinkled with water only, were healed of their sickness.” And with these words at their request he told them a story.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family in the kingdom of Kāsi, and they called him young Kappa [Kappakumāra]. When he came of age, he acquired all the arts at Taxila and afterwards adopted the ascetic life. At this time an ascetic named Kesava attended by five hundred other ascetics became the teacher of a band of disciples and lived in the Himālayas. The Bodhisatta came to him and becoming the senior of the five hundred pupils, dwelt there and showed a friendly feeling and affection for Kesava. And they became very close to one another.

By and by Kesava accompanied by these ascetics went to Benares to procure salt and vinegar and lodged in the king’s garden. Next day he went into the city and came to the palace door. When the king saw the band of holy men, he invited them in and fed them in his own house, and exacting the usual promise from them, he lodged them in his garden. So when the rainy season was over, Kesava took leave of the king. The king said: “Venerable sir, you are an old man. Do you now dwell near us, and send the young ascetics to the Himālayas.” He agreed and sent them with the head disciple to the Himālayas and himself was left quite alone.

Kappa went to the Himālayas and dwelt there with the ascetics. Kesava was unhappy at being deprived of the society of Kappa, and in his desire to see him got no sleep, and in consequence of losing his sleep, his food was not properly digested. A bloody flux set in, followed by severe pains. The king with his five families of leeches watched over the ascetic, but his sickness abated not.

The ascetic asked the king, “Do you, sire, wish for me to die or to recover?” “To recover, sir,” he answered. “Then send me to the Himālayas,” he said.

“Agreed,” said the king, and sent to a minister named Nārada, and bade him go with some foresters and take the holy man to the Himālayas. Nārada took him there and returned home. But by the mere sight of Kappa, Kesava’s mental disorder ceased and his unhappiness subsided. So Kappa gave him broth made of millet and wild rice together with leaves sprinkled with water, without salt and spices, and at that very instant the dysentery was assuaged.

The king again sent Nārada saying: “Go and learn tidings of the ascetic Kesava.” He came and finding him recovered said: “Venerable sir, the king of Benares treating you with his five families of leeches could not heal your sickness. How did Kappa treat you?” And herewith he uttered the first verse:

1. “You that of late with lord of men did dwell,
   A king prepared to grant your heart’s desire,
   What is the charm of Kappa’s ascetic cell
   That blessed Kesava should here retire?”

Kesava on hearing this repeated the second verse:

2. “All here is charming: e’en the very trees
   O Nārada, my fancy take,
   And Kappa’s words that never fail to please
   A grateful echo in my heart awake.”

After these words he said: “Kappa by way of pleasing me gave me to drink broth made of millet and wild rice mixed with leaves sprinkled with water, and without salt and spices, and therewith was my bodily sickness stayed and I was healed.”

Nārada, hearing this, repeated the third verse:

3. “You that but now the purest rice did eat
   Boiled with a dainty flavouring of meat,
   How can you relish such insipid fare
   And millet and wild rice with ascetics share?” [3.96] (3.145)

On hearing this Kesava uttered the fourth verse:

4. “The food may coarse or dainty prove,
   May scanty be or much abound,
   Yet if the meal is blessed with faith,
   Love the best sauce by far is found.”

Nārada on hearing his words returned to the king and told him, “Kesava says thus and thus.”
The Section with Four Verses – 1239

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was Ānanda, Nārada was Sāriputta, Kesava was Bakabrahmā, Kappa was myself.”

Ja 347 Ayakūṭajātaka

The Story about the Iron Bolt (4s)

In the present the monks talk about the effort the Buddha makes to help and save others. The Buddha tells a story of how he once forbade animal sacrifices, and when the Yakkhas became angered at being deprived, was saved by Sakka himself.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā), Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Present Source: Ja 469 Mahākaṇṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 50 Dummedha, Ja 347 Ayakūṭa, Ja 391 Dhajaviheṭha.

Keywords: Justice, Mercy, Animals, Devas.

“Why in mid air.” This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning the duty of doing good to men. The incident that led to the story will be set forth in the Mahākaṇṭhajātaka [Ja 469].

One day, they say, the monks as they sat in the Dhamma Hall, were talking together. “Sirs,” one would say, “the Teacher, ever practising friendship towards the multitudes of the people, has forsaken an agreeable abode, and lives just for the good of the world. He has attained supreme wisdom, yet of his own accord takes bowl and robe, and goes on a journey of eighteen leagues or more. For the five elders he set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma; on the fifth day of the half-month he recited the Anattalakkhaṇa discourse, and made them Arahats; he went to Uruveḷa, and to the ascetics with matted hair he showed three and a half thousand miracles, and persuaded them to join the Saṅgha; at Gayāsīsa he taught the Discourse upon Fire, and made a thousand of these ascetics Arahats; to Mahākassapa, when he had gone forward three miles to meet him, after three discourses he gave the higher ordination; all alone, after the noon-day meal, he went a journey of forty-five leagues, and then established in the Fruit of the Third Path Pukkusa (a youth of very good birth); to meet Mahākappīna he went forward a space of two thousand leagues, and made him an Arahat; alone, in the afternoon he went a journey of thirty leagues, and made that cruel and harsh man Āṅgulimāla an Arahat; thirty leagues also he traversed, and established Āḷavaka in the Fruit of the First Path, and saved the prince; in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three he dwelt three months, and taught Abhidhamma to eight hundred millions of deities; to the Brahmā Realm he went, and destroyed the false Dhamma of Baka Brahmā, and made ten thousand Brahmā Arahats; every year he goes on pilgrimage in three districts, and to such men as are capable of receiving, he gives the refuges, the precepts, and the Fruits of the different stages; he even acts for the good of Nāgas and Garuḷas and the like, in many ways.”

---

658 See Ja 405. [This is a little odd, as Bakabrahma plays no part in the introductory story.]

In such words they praised the goodness and worth of the One with Ten Powers’ life for the good of the world. The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about as they sat there? They told him. “And no wonder, monks,” said he. “I who now in my perfect wisdom would live for the world’s good, even I in the past, in the days of passion, lived for the good of the world.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of his chief queen. And when he was of age, he was instructed in all the arts and on the death of his father was established in his kingdom and governed it righteously.

At that time men were devoted to the worship of the gods and made offerings to them by the slaughter of many goats, rams and the like. The Bodhisatta proclaimed by beat of drum, “No living creature is to be put to death.” The Yakkhas were enraged against the Bodhisatta at losing their offerings, and calling together an assembly of their kind in the Himalayas, they sent forth a certain savage Yakkha to slay the Bodhisatta. He took a huge blazing mass of iron as big as the dome of a house, and thinking to strike a deadly blow, immediately after the mid watch, came and stood at the bed’s head of the Bodhisatta. At that instant the throne of Sakka manifested signs of heat. After considering the matter the god discovered the cause, and grasping his thunderbolt in his hand he came and stood over the Yakkha. The Bodhisatta on seeing the Yakkha thought: “Why in the world is he standing here? Is it to protect me, or from a desire to slay me?” And as he talked with him he repeated the first verse:

1. “Why in mid air, O Yakkha, do you stand
With that huge bolt of iron in your hand?
Are you to guard me from all harm intent,
Or here today for my destruction sent?”

Now the Bodhisatta saw only the Yakkha. He did not see Sakka. The Yakkha through fear of Sakka did not strike the Bodhisatta. On hearing the words of the Bodhisatta the Yakkha said: “Great king, I am not stationed here to guard you; I came minded to smite you with this blazing mass of iron, but through fear of Sakka I dare not strike you.” And to explain his meaning he uttered the second verse:

2. “As messenger of Rakkhasas, lo! here
To compass your destruction I appear,
But all in vain the fiery bolt I wield
Against the head that Sakka’s self would shield.”

On hearing this the Bodhisatta repeated two more verses:

3. “If Sakka, Sujā’s lord, in heaven that reigns,
Great king of gods, my cause to champion deigns, [3.147]
With hideous howl Pisācas rend the sky,
No Rakkhasas have power to terrify.

4. Let mud Pisācas gibber as they may,
They are not equal to so stern a fray.”

Thus did Sakka put the Yakkha to flight. And exhorting the Great Being, he said: “Great king, fear not. Henceforth we will protect you. Be not afraid.” And so saying he returned straight to his own place of abode.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Anuruddha was Sakka, and I myself was the king of Benares.”
Ja 348 Araññajātaka
The Story about the Wilderness (4s)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the monastic life through the temptations of a young woman. The Buddha tells a story of a woman who seduced a young ascetic who was then tempted to leave his way of life, until his father persuaded him otherwise.

The Bodhisatta = the father ascetic (pitā tāpaso),
the son and daughter = the same in the past (putto ca kumārikā ca).

Keywords: Lust, Sensuality, Women.

“This doubt, my father.” [3.98] This story the Teacher told when dwelling at Jetavana, concerning the seduction of a youth by a certain sensual girl. The incident that led up to the story will be set forth in the Cullanāradakassapa jātaka [Ja 477].

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about the allurements of a sensual girl.

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.”

At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.” “Is this true which they say,” asked he, “that you are discontented, monk?” “Yes, sir, true it is.” “Then what made you so?” “A sensual girl, sir.” “Monk,” said he, “long, long ago, when you were living in the forest, this same girl was a hindrance to your holiness, and did you great harm; then why are you again discontented on her account?” Then at the request of the monks he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin household. And when he grew up and was learned in all the arts at Taxila, his wife died and he adopted the ascetic life and went with his son to dwell in the Himālayas. There leaving his son in a hermitage, he went forth to gather all kinds of fruit. At that time as some brigands were harrying a border village, and were going off with their prisoners, a certain damsel fled for refuge to this hermitage \footnote{148} and by her seductions corrupted the virtue of the youth. She said to him, “Come, let us begone.”

“Let my father first return,” he said, “and after I have seen him, I will go with you.”

“Well, when you have seen him, come to me,” she said. And going out she sat herself down in the middle of the road. The young ascetic, when his father had come, spoke the first verse:

1. “This doubt, my father, solve for me, I pray;
   If to some village from this wood I stray,
   Men of what school of morals, or what sect
   Shall I most wisely for my friends affect?”

Then his father, by way of warning him, repeated three verses:

2. “One that can gain your confidence and love,
   Can trust your word, and with you patient prove,

3. In thought and word and deed will ne’er offend –
   Take to your heart and cling to him as friend.

4. To men capricious as the monkey-kind
   And found unstable, be not you inclined,
   Though to some desert you should be confined.” \footnote{149}

On hearing this the young ascetic said: “Dear father, how shall I find a man possessed of these virtues? I will not go. With you only will I live.” And so saying he turned back. Then his father taught him how to \footnote{3.99} focus on the Meditation Object. And both father and son, without falling away from Absorption, became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the youth and the maiden were the same as in the later story. The ascetic was myself.”
The Section with Four Verses – 1245

Ja 349 Sandhibhedajātaka

The Story about Broken Connections (4s)

In the present the group of six monks collect stories about other monks and use them to slander their foes. The Buddha tells a story of how in the past a cow and a lion lived together as best friends, until a jackal set them at odds and they killed each other and the jackal ate their flesh.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),

Past Compare: Ja 349 Sandhibheda, Ja 361 Vaṇṇāroha.

Keywords: Slander, Backbiting, Animals.

“Nought in common.” This story the Teacher, dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning the moral precept on slander.

In the past the Teacher hearing that the group of six monks collect slanderous tales, called them to him and asked, “Is it true, monks, that you collect slanderous tales of such of your monks as are inclined to quarrelling and strife and debate, and that quarrels therefore, that would not otherwise arise, spring up and when they so arise have a tendency to grow?” “It is true,” they said. Then he reproved those monks and said: “Monks, backbiting speech is like a blow with a sharp sword. A firm friendship is quickly broken up by slander and people that listen thereto become liable to be estranged from their friends, as was the case with the lion and the bull.” And so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as his son, and after acquiring all the arts at Taxila, on his father’s death, he ruled his kingdom righteously.

At that time a certain cowherd, who was tending cattle in their sheds in the forest, came home and inadvertently left behind him a cow that was in calf. Between this cow and a lioness sprang up a firm friendship. The two animals became

---

659 See Tibetan Tales, xxxiii. p. 325, “The Jackal as Calumniator,” and Benfey’s Introduction to the Panchatantra.

660 See Ja 28.
fast friends and went about together. So after a time the cow brought forth a calf and the lioness a cub. These two young creatures also by the force of family ties became fast friends and wandered about together. \{3.150\} Then a certain forester, after observing their affection, took such wares as are produced in the forest and went to Benares and presented them to the king. And when the king asked him, “Friend, have you seen any unusual marvel in the forest?” he made answer, “I saw nothing else that was wonderful, my lord, but I did see a lion and a bull wandering about together, very friendly one towards another.”

“Should a third animal appear,” said the king, “there will certainly be mischief.
Come and tell me, if you see the pair joined by a third animal.”

“Certainly, my lord,” he answered.

Now when the forester had left for Benares, a jackal ministered to the lion and the bull. When he returned to the forest and saw this he said: “I will tell the king that a third animal has appeared,” and departed for the city. Now the jackal thought: “There is no meat that I have not eaten except the flesh of lions and bulls.
By setting these two at odds, I will get their flesh to eat.” And he said: “This is the way he speaks of you,” and thus dividing them one from another, he soon brought about a quarrel and reduced them to a dying condition.

But the forester came and told the king, “My lord, a third animal has turned up,”
“What is it?” said the king. “A jackal, my lord.” Said the king, “He will cause them to quarrel, and will bring about their death. We shall find them dead when we arrive.” And so saying, he mounted upon his chariot and travelling on the road pointed out by the forester, he arrived just as the two animals had by their quarrel destroyed one another. The jackal highly delighted was eating, now the flesh of the lion, and now that of the bull. The king when he saw that they were both dead, stood just as he was upon his chariot, and addressing his charioteer gave utterance to these verses: \{3.151\}

1. “Nought in common had this pair,
Neither wives nor food did share;
2. Yet behold how slanderous word,
Keen as any two-edged sword,
Did devise with cunning art
Friends of old to keep apart.
Thus did bull and lion fall
Prey to mearest beast of all:

3. So will all bed-fellows be
With this pair in misery,
If they lend a willing ear
To the slanderer’s whispered sneer.

4. But they thrive exceeding well,
E’en as those in heaven that dwell,
Who to slander ne’er attend –
Slander parting friend from friend.” [3.101] [3.152]

The king spoke these verses, and bidding them gather together the mane, skin, claws, and teeth of the lion, returned straight to his own city.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time I myself was the king.”

Ja 350 Devatāpañhajātaka

The Story about the Deva’s (Four) Questions (4s)

The Devas who lived in the king’s parasol asked the king four questions, and he agreed to ask his brahmin seers, but they did not know the answers. Only the wise Mahosadha could answer correctly.

The Bodhisatta = (pañḍita) Mahosadha.

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 350 Devatāpañha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Clever answers, Devas.

This Question will be found in the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

...the king caused the Great Being to sit on the royal throne under the white parasol outspread, and himself sitting on a low seat he said: “Wise sir, the deity who dwells in the white parasol asked me four questions. I consulted the four wise men and they could not find them out: solve me the questions, my son!” “Sire, be it the deity of the parasol, or be they the Four Great Kings, or be they who they may; let who will ask a question and I will answer it.”

So the king put the question as the Devatā had done, and said:

1. “He strikes with hands and feet, he beats the face; and he, O king, is dearer than a husband.”

When the Great Being had heard the question, the meaning became as clear as though the moon had risen in the sky. “Listen, O king!” he said: “When a child on the mother’s lap happy and playful beats his mother with hands and feet, pulls her hair, beats her face with his fist, she says, ‘Little rogue, why do you beat me?’ And in love she presses him close to her breast unable to restrain her affection, and kisses him; and at such a time he is dearer to her than his father.” Thus did he make clear this question, as though he made the sun rise in the sky; and hearing this the Devatā showed half her body from the aperture in the royal parasol, and said in a sweet voice, “The question is well solved!” Then she presented the Great Being with a precious casket full of divine perfumes and flowers, and disappeared.

The king also presented him with flowers and so forth, and asked him the second question, reciting the second verse:

2. “She abuses him roundly, yet wishes him to be near: and he, O king, is dearer than a husband.”

The Great Being said: “Sire, the child of seven years, who can now do his mother’s bidding, when he is told to go to the field or to the bazaar, says, ‘If you will give me this or that sweetmeat I will go;’ she says, ‘Here my son,’ and gives them; then he eats them and says, ‘Yes, you sit in the cool shade of the house and I am to go out on your business!’ He makes a grimace, or mocks her with gestures, and won’t go. She is angry, picks up a stick and cries: ‘You eat what I give you and then won’t do anything for me in the field!’ She scares him, off he runs at full speed; she cannot follow and cries: ‘Get out, may the thieves chop you up into little bits!’ So she abuses him roundly as much as she will; but what her mouth speaks she does not wish at all, and so she wishes him to be near. He plays about the livelong day, and at evening not daring to come home he goes to the house of some kinsman. The mother watches the road for his coming, and sees him not, and thinking that he did not return has her heart full of pain; with tears streaming from her eyes she searches the houses of her kinsfolk, and when she sees her son she hugs and kisses him and squeezes him tight with both arms, and loves him more than ever, as she cries, ‘Did you take my words in earnest?’ Thus, sire, a mother ever loves her son more in the hour of anger.” Thus he explained the second question: the Devatā made him the same offering as before and so did the king.

Then the king asked him the third question in another verse:

3. “She reviles him without cause, and without reason reproaches; yet he, O king, is dearer than a husband.”

The Great Being said: “Sire, when a pair of lovers in secret enjoy their love’s delights, and one says to the other, ‘You don’t care for me, your heart is elsewhere I know!’ All false and without reason, chiding and reproaching each other, then they grow dearer to each other. That is the meaning of the question.” The Devatā made the same offering as before, and so did the king; who then asked him another question, reciting the fourth verse:

4. “One takes food and drink, clothes and lodging – verily the good men carry them off: yet they, O king, are dearer than a husband.”

He replied, “Sire, this question has reference to righteous mendicant brahmans. Pious families that believe in this world and the next give to them and delight in giving: when they see such brahmans receiving what is given and eating it, and think, ‘It is to us they came to beg, our own food which they eat’ - they increase affection towards them. Thus verily they take the things, and wearing on the shoulder what has been given, they become dear.” When this question had been answered the Devatā expressed her approval by the same offering as before, and laid before the Great Being’s feet a precious casket full of the seven precious things, praying him to accept it; the king also delighted made him commander in chief. Henceforward great was the glory of the Great Being.
Book V. Pañcanipāta
The Section with Five Verses

Ja 351 Mañikuṇḍalajātaka
The Story about Jewelled Earrings (4s)

In the present an innocent courtier is thrown into prison, but later released and honoured by the king. The Buddha tells a story of how a man intrigued in the palace in Benares, was exiled and enticed a foreign king to attack his former country. The king of Benares, rather than cause the deaths of others, allowed himself to be captured, and the conqueror, seeing his virtue, relented and set him free. In this telling we have additional dialogue they exchanged.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
Ānanda = the king of Kosala (Kosalarājā).

Present Source: Ja 282 Seyya,
Quoted at: Ja 303 Ekarāja, Ja 351 Mañikuṇḍala,
Present Compare: Ja 355 Ghata.

Keywords: Patience, Righteousness.

“Stripped of all the joys of life.” [3.102] {3.153} This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a councillor who was guilty of misconduct in the harem of the king of Kosala. The incident that gave rise to the story has been given in full before.661

This tale the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a courtier of the king of Kosala. This man was very useful to the king, we are told, and did everything that had to be done. Because he was very useful, the king did him great honour. The others were jealous, and concocted a slander, and calumniated him. The king believed their saying, and without enquiring into his guilt, bound him in chains, though virtuous and innocent, and cast him into prison. There he dwelt all alone; but, by reason of his virtue, he had peace of mind, and with mind at peace he understood the conditions of existence, and attained the fruition of the First Path. By and by the king found that he was guiltless, and broke his chains and gave him honour more than before.

661 [I include the story here.]

The man wished to pay his respects to the Teacher; and taking flowers and perfumes, he went to the monastery, and did reverence to the Tathāgata, and sat respectfully aside. The Teacher talked graciously with him. “We have heard that ill fortune befell you,” said he. “Yes, sir, but I made my ill fortune into good; and as I sat in prison, I produced the fruition of the First Path.”

Here too the Bodhisatta became king in Benares. The wicked councillor called in the king of Kosala and got him to seize upon the kingdom of Kāsi, and to throw the Bodhisatta into prison. The king of Benares developed Absorption and sat cross-legged in the air. A fierce heat sprang up in the body of the marauding king, and he drew near to the king of Benares and repeated the first verse:

1. “Stripped of all the joys of life,
   Jewelled earrings, horse and car,
   Robbed of child and loving wife,
   Nought your pleasure seems to mar.” {3.154}

On hearing him the Bodhisatta recited these verses:

2. “Pleasures soon make haste to leave us,
   Pleasures soon must all forego,
   Sorrow has no power to grieve us,
   Joy itself soon turns to woe.

---

662 [This is a short summary, for the full story see Ja 282.]
3. Moons with new-born orb appearing
Wax awhile, to wane and die,
Suns with warmth all nature cheering,
Haste to set in yonder sky.
Change is this world’s law I see,
Sorrow has no pangs for me.” [3.103]

Thus now did the Great Being expound the Dhamma to the usurper king, and bringing his conduct to the test, repeated these verses:

4. “The idle sensual layman I detest,
The false ascetic is a rogue confessed.
A bad king will a case unheard decide;
Wrath in the sage can ne’er be justified.

5. The warrior prince a well-weighed verdict gives,
Of righteous judge the fame for ever lives.” [3.155]

The king of Kosala having thus gained the forgiveness of the Bodhisatta and given him back his kingdom, departed to his own country.

The Teacher, having ended his discourse, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king of Kosala, and I myself was the king of Benares.”

Ja 352 Sujātajātaka
The Story about (the Householder’s Son) Sujāta (5s)

In the present when a landholder loses his father he is inconsolable. The Buddha tells him a story of similar happenings in the past, and how a landowner’s son had brought his father to see the truth by attempting to feed a dead ox.

The Bodhisatta = (the householder’s son) Sujāta.

Keywords: Wisdom, Impermanence.

“Why haste to bring.” This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a landowner who had lost his father. On the death of his father, they say, he went about lamenting, quite unable to shake off his grief. The Teacher perceived in the man a capacity to attain to the fruit of emancipation, and when he went his rounds in Sāvatthi for alms, accompanied by an attendant monk, he came to his house and sitting down on the seat prepared for him he bowed to his host, who was also seated, and said: “Lay brother, are you grieving?” and on his replying, “Yes, venerable sir, I am,” he said: “Friend, sages of old hearkened to the words of wisdom, and when they lost a father, they did not grieve.” And at the request of his host he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in the house of a landowner. And they called him young Sujāṭa. When he was grown up, his grandfather died. Then his father from the day of the old man’s death was filled with sorrow, and taking his bones from the place of cremation he erected an earth-mound in his pleasure-garden, and depositing the remains there, whenever he visited the place, adorned the Stūpa with flowers and studiously lamented, neither bathing nor anointing himself nor eating. Neither did he attend to his business. The Bodhisatta, on observing this, thought: “My father ever since the death of my grandfather goes about overwhelmed with grief. And no one, I am sure, except myself has power to console him. I will find a way to deliver him from his sorrow.”

So seeing a dead ox lying outside the city, he brought grass and water and placing them before it said: “Eat and drink, eat and drink.” All that passed by on seeing this said: “Friend Sujāṭa, are you mad? Do you offer grass and water to a dead ox?” But he answered not a word.

So they went to his father and said: “Your son has become mad. He is giving grass and water to a dead ox.” On hearing this the landowner ceased to grieve for his father, and began to grieve for his son. And he went in haste and cried, “My dear Sujāṭa, are you not in your sober senses? Why do you offer grass and water to the carcase of an ox?” And hereupon he spoke two verses:

1. “Why haste to bring your new-mown grass so sweet, And cry to lifeless beast, ‘Arise and eat’?”

2. No food may raise to life an ox that’s dead, Your words are idle and of folly bred.”

Then the Bodhisatta uttered two verses:

3. “I think this beast may come to life again, Both head and tail and its four feet remain.”
4. But of my grandfather head and limbs are gone:
No fool weeps o’er his grave, but you alone.” (3.157)

On hearing this the father of the Bodhisatta thought: “My son is wise. He knows the right thing to be done both for this world and for the next. He did this to console me.” And he said: “My dear and wise son Sujāta, it is known to me that all existing things are impermanent. Henceforth I will not grieve. Such a son as this must be every one that would remove a father’s grief.” And singing the praises of his son he said:

5. “As ghee-fed flame that blazes out amain
Is quenched with water, so he quenched my pain.
6. With sorrow’s shaft my heart was wounded sore,
He healed the wound and did my life restore.

7. The barb extracted, full of peace and joy,
I cease to grieve and hearken to my boy.

8. Thus kindly souls wean mortals from their grief,
As wise Sujāta brought his sire relief.”

The Teacher having ended his discourse revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the landowner attained fruition of the First Path. “At that time I myself was Sujāta.”

Ja 353 Dhonasākhajātaka

The Story about the Extended Bough (5s)

Alternative Title: Venasākhajātaka (Cst)

In the present one king has a palace built, and has the architect blinded afterwards. The Buddha tells a story of how a wise man had warned a prince about his violent behaviour, but in his ambition when raised to king he put out the eyes of many other kings, and then suffered blindness himself in retribution.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkhācariyo),
Devadatta = (the family priest) Piṅgiya,
Prince Bodhi = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Keywords: Cruelty, Retribution, Devas.
“Though you are now.” [3.105] This story the Teacher, while living in the Bhesakalā grove near Suññumāragiri (Mount Crocodile) in the country of the Bhaggas, told concerning young prince Bodhi. This prince was the son of Udena, and at this time dwelt in Suññumāragiri. Now he summoned a very skilful artisan, and got him to build him a palace called Kokanada, and to make it unlike that of any other king. [3.158] And afterwards he thought: “This artisan may build a similar palace for some other king.” And from a feeling of envy he plucked out his eyes.

This circumstance became known in the assembly of the monks. Then they raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, young prince Bodhi had the eyes of such and such an artisan put out. Surely he is a harsh, cruel, and violent man.” The Teacher came and asked what was the topic the monks were debating as they sat together, and hearing what it was he said: “Not only now, but formerly too such was his nature, and of old in like manner he put out the eyes of a thousand warriors and, after slaying them, he offered up their flesh as a sacrifice.” And so saying he told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a world-renowned teacher at Taxila, and youths of the warrior and brahmin castes came from all Jambudīpa, to be taught the arts by him. The son of the king of Benares too, prince Brahmadatta, was taught the three Vedas by him. Now he was by nature harsh, cruel, and violent. The Bodhisatta, by his power of divination knowing his character, said: “My friend, you are harsh, cruel, and violent, and verily power that is attained by a man of violence is shortlived: when his power is gone from him, he is like a ship that is wrecked at sea. He reaches no sure haven. Therefore be not of such a character.” And by way of admonition he repeated two verses:

1. “Though you are now with peace and plenty blessed,
   Such happy fate may short-lived prove to be:
   Should riches perish, be not sore distressed,
   Like storm-tossed sailor wrecked far out at sea.
2. Each one shall fare according to his deed,
And reap the harvest as he sows the seed,
Whether of goodly herb, or maybe noxious weed.”

Then he bade his teacher farewell and returned to Benares, and after exhibiting his proficiency in the arts to his father, he was established in the vice-royalty and on his father’s death he succeeded to the kingdom. His family priest, Pingiya by name, was a harsh and cruel man. Being greedy of fame, he thought: “What if I were to cause all the rulers of Jambudīpa to be seized by this king, and if he should thus become sole monarch and I become sole priest?” And he got the king to hearken to his words.

And the king marched forth with a great army and invested the city of a certain king and took him prisoner. And by similar means he gained the sovereignty of all Jambudīpa, and with a thousand kings in his train, he went to seize upon the kingdom of Taxila. The Bodhisatta repaired the walls of the city and made it impregnable to its enemies. And the king of Benares had a canopy set up over him and a curtain thrown round about him, at the foot of a big banyan tree on the banks of the Ganges. And having a couch spread for him, he took up his quarters there. Fighting in the plains of Jambudīpa he had taken captive a thousand kings, but failing in his attack on Taxila, he asked his priest, “Teacher, though we have come here with a host of captive kings, we cannot take Taxila. What now are we to do?”

“Great king,” he answered, “put out the eyes of the thousand kings and ripping open their bellies let us take their flesh and the five sweet substances and make an offering to the guardian deity of this banyan. And surrounding the tree with a rimmed circumference let us fill it with blood five inches deep. And so shall the victory soon be ours.”

The king readily assented and concealing mighty wrestlers behind the curtain, he summoned each king separately, and when the wrestlers had squeezed them in their arms till they had reduced them to a state of insensibility, he had their eyes put out, and after they were dead, he took the flesh and caused the carcases to be carried away by the Ganges. Then he made the offering, as described above, and had the drum beaten and went forth to battle. Then came a certain Yakkha from his watch-tower and tore out the right eye of the king. Severe pain set in, and maddened by the agony he suffered, he went and lay down at full length upon the couch prepared for him at the foot of the banyan tree. At this moment a vulture took a sharp-pointed bone, and perched on the top of the tree, in eating the flesh it let drop the bone, and the sharp point falling as with iron spikes on the king’s left eye, destroyed that eye too. At this moment he recalled the words of the Bodhisatta and said: “Our teacher when he said ‘These mortals experience results corresponding to their deeds, even as fruit corresponds with the seed,’ spoke, I suppose, with all this before his mind’s eye.” And in his lamentation he addressed Piṅgiya in two verses:

3. “Ah! Now at last I recognize the truth
   The teacher taught me in my heedless youth:
   Wrong not, he cried, or else the evil deed
   To thine own punishment may one day lead. [3.107]

4. Beneath this tree’s extended boughs and shade
   Libation due of sandal oil was made.
   ’Twas here I slew a thousand kings, and lo!
   The pangs they suffered then, I now must undergo.” [3.161]

Thus lamenting, he called to mind his queen-consort, and repeated this verse:

5. “O Ubbari, my queen of swarthy hue,
   Lithe as a shoot of fair moringa tree,
   That do your limbs with sandal oil bedew,
   How should I live, bereft of sight of you?
   Yea death itself than this less grievous far would be!”

While he was still murmuring these words, he died and was born again in hell. The priest so ambitious of power could not save him, nor could he save himself by his own power, and as soon as he died, his army broke up and fled.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time the young prince Bodhi was the marauding king, Devadatta was Piṅgiya, and I myself was the world-famed teacher.”
Ja 354 Uragajātaka
The Story about the (Angry) Snake (5s)

In the present when a landholder loses his son he is inconsolable. The Buddha tells a story of a family of old who lost a son, but understanding the nature of the world, did not grieve. Later they were questioned and rewarded by Sakka.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Khemā = (his wife) the mother (mātā),
Rāhula = the son (putta),
Uppalavaṇṇā = the daughter (dhītā),
Khujjuttarā = the servant (dāsi).

Keywords: Wisdom, Impermanence.

“Man quits his mortal frame.” {3.162} This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a landowner whose son had died. The introductory story is just the same as that of the man who lost both his wife and father. Here too the Teacher in the same way went to the man’s house, and after saluting him as he was seated, asked him saying: “Pray, sir, are you grieving?” And on his replying, “Yes, venerable sir, ever since my son’s death I grieve,” he said: “Sir, verily that which is subject to dissolution is dissolved, and that which is subject to destruction is destroyed, and this happens not to one man only, nor in one village merely, but in countless spheres, and in the Three Worlds, there is no creature that is not subject to death, nor is there any existing thing that is capable of abiding in the same condition. All beings are subject to death, and all compounds are subject to dissolution. But sages of old, when they lost a son, said, ‘That which is subject to destruction is destroyed,’ and grieved not.” And hereupon at the man’s request he related a story of the past.

663 Compare the story of Epictetus as given by Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 8. The philosopher one day saw a woman weeping for a broken pitcher, and next day saw another woman weeping over her dead son. Whereupon he said, “Yesterday I saw a fragile pitcher break, today I saw a mortal die.” [Given in Latin in the original: Heri vidi fragilem frangi, hodie vidi mortalem mori.]
The Section with Five Verses – 1259

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin household, in a village outside the gates of Benares, and rearing a family he supported them by field labour. He had two children, a son and a daughter. When the son was grown up, the father brought a wife home for him from a family of equal rank with his own. Thus with a female slave they composed a household of six: the Bodhisatta and his wife, the son and daughter, the daughter-in-law and the female slave. They lived happily and affectionately together. The Bodhisatta thus admonished the other five, “According as you have received, give alms, observe the fast days, keep the moral law, dwell on the thought of death, be mindful of your mortal state. For in the case of beings like ourselves, death is certain, life uncertain: all existing things are transitory and subject to decay. Therefore take heed to your ways day and night.” They readily accepted his teaching and dwelt earnestly on the thought of death.

Now one day the Bodhisatta went with his son to plough his field. The son gathered together the rubbish and set fire to it. Not far from where he was, lived a snake in an anthill. The smoke hurt the snake’s eyes. Coming out from his hole in a rage, it thought: “This is all due to that fellow,” and fastening upon him with its four teeth it bit him. The youth fell down dead. The Bodhisatta on seeing him fall, left his oxen and came to him, and finding that he was dead, he took him up and laid him at the foot of a certain tree, and covering him up with a cloak, he neither wept nor lamented. He said: “That which is subject to dissolution is dissolved, and that which is subject to death is dead. All compound existences are transitory and liable to death.” And recognizing the transitory nature of things he went on with his ploughing. Seeing a neighbour pass close by the field, he asked, “Friend, are you going home?” And on his answering, “Yes,” he said: “Please then to go to our house and say to the mistress, ‘You are not today as formerly to bring food for two, but to bring it for one only. And hitherto the female slave alone has brought the food, but today all four of you are to put on clean garments, and to come with perfumes and flowers in your hands.’ ”

“All right,” he said, and went and spoke these very words to the brahmin’s wife. She asked, “By whom, sir, was this message given?” “By the brahmin, lady,” he replied. [3.109]

Then she understood that her son was dead. But she did not so much as tremble. Thus showing perfect self-control, and wearing white garments and with perfumes and flowers in her hand, she bade them bring food, and accompanied the other members of the family to the field. But not one of them either shed a tear or made lamentation. The Bodhisatta, still sitting in the shade where the youth lay, ate his food. And when his meal was finished, they all took up firewood and lifting the body on to the funeral pile, they made offerings of perfumes and flowers, and then set fire to it. But not a single tear was shed by any one. All were dwelling on the thought of death. Such was the efficacy of their virtue that the throne of Sakka manifested signs of heat. [3.164] Sakka said: “Who, I wonder, is anxious to bring me down from my throne?” And on reflection he discovered that the heat was due to the force of virtue existing in these people, and being highly pleased he said: “I must go to them and utter a loud cry of exultation like the roaring of a lion, and immediately afterwards fill their dwelling place with the seven treasures.” And going there in haste he stood by the side of the funeral pyre and said: “What are you doing?” “We are burning the body of a man, my lord.”

“It is no man that you are burning,” he said. “I think you are roasting the flesh of some beast that you have slain.” “Not so, my lord,” they said. “It is merely the body of a man that we are burning.”

Then he said: “It must have been some enemy.” The Bodhisatta said: “It is our own true son, and no enemy,”

“Then he could not have been dear as a son to you.” “He was very dear, my lord.”

“Then why do you not weep?”

Then the Bodhisatta, to explain the reason why he did not weep, uttered the first verses:

1. “Man quits his mortal frame, when joy in life is past,
   E’en as a snake is wont its worn out slough to cast.

2. No friend’s lament can touch the ashes of the dead:
   Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread.” [3.165]

Sakka on hearing the words of the Bodhisatta, asked the brahmin’s wife, “How, lady, did the dead man stand to you?”
“I sheltered him ten months in my womb, and suckled him at my breast, and directed the movements of his hands and feet, and he was my grown up son, my lord.”

“Granted, lady, that a father from the nature of a man may not weep, a mother’s heart surely is tender. Why then do you not weep?”

And to explain why she did not weep, she uttered a couple of verses: [3.110]

3. “Uncalled he hither came, unbidden soon to go;
   E’en as he came, he went. What cause is here for woe?

4. No friend’s lament can touch the ashes of the dead:
   Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread.”

On hearing the words of the brahmin’s wife, Sakka asked the sister, “Lady, what was the dead man to you?” “He was my brother, my lord.”

“Lady, sisters surely are loving towards their brothers. Why do you not weep?”

But she to explain the reason why she did not weep, repeated a couple of verses:

5. “Though I should fast and weep, how would it profit me?
   My kith and kin, alas, would more unhappy be. [3.166]

6. No friend’s lament can touch the ashes of the dead:
   Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread.”

Sakka on hearing the words of the sister, asked his wife, “Lady, what was he to you?” “He was my husband, my lord.”

“Women surely, when a husband dies, as widows are helpless. Why do you not weep?”

But she to explain the reason why she did not weep, uttered two verses:

7. “As children cry in vain to grasp the moon above,
   So mortals idly mourn the loss of those they love.”
The Section with Five Verses – 1262

8. No friend’s lament can touch the ashes of the dead:
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread.” [3.167]

Sakka on hearing the words of the wife, asked the handmaid, saying: “Woman, what was he to you?” “He was my master, my lord.”

“No doubt you must have been abused and beaten and oppressed by him and therefore, thinking he is happily dead, you weep not.” “Speak not so, my lord. This does not suit his case. My young master was full of long-suffering and love and pity for me, and was as a foster child to me.”

“Then why do you not weep?”

And she to explain why she did not weep, uttered a couple of verses:

9. “A broken pot of earth, ah! who can piece again?
So too to mourn the dead is nought but labour vain.

10. No friend’s lament can touch the ashes of the dead:
Why should I grieve? He fares the way he had to tread.” [3.111]

Sakka after hearing what they all had to say, was greatly pleased and said: “You have carefully dwelt on the thought of death. Henceforth you are not to labour with your own hands. I am Sakka, king of heaven. I will create the seven treasures in countless abundance in your house. [3.168] You are to give alms, to keep the moral law, to observe the fast days, and to take heed to your ways.” And thus admonishing them, he filled their house with countless wealth, and so parted from them.

The Teacher having finished his exposition of the Dhamma, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the landowner attained the fruit of the First Path. “At that time Khujjuttarā was the female slave, Uppalavanṇā the daughter, Rāhula the son, Khemā the mother, and I myself was the brahmin.”

Ja 355 Ghatajātaka
The Story about (King) Ghata (5s)

Alternative Title: Ghaṭajātaka (Cst)
In the present an innocent courtier is thrown into prison, but later released and honoured by the king. The Buddha tells a story of how a man intrigued in the palace in Benares, was exiled and enticed a foreign king to attack his former country. The king of Benares, rather than cause the deaths of others, allowed himself to be captured, and the conqueror, seeing his virtue, relented and set him free. In this version his lack of grief is explained.

The Bodhisatta = king Ghata (Ghatarājā), Ānanda = king Dhaṅka (Dhaṅkarājā).

Present Compare: Ja 282 Seyya, Ja 303 Ekarāja, Ja 351 Maṇikuṇḍala, Ja 355 Ghata.

Keywords: Patience, Righteousness.

“While others weep.” This story the Teacher, dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a minister of the king of Kosala. The introductory story is identical with one already given.

But in this case the king after bestowing great honour on a minister who served him well, gave ear to certain mischief-makers and had him seized and thrown into prison. While he was lying there, he entered upon the First Path. The king, becoming aware of his great merit, released him. He took a scented garland and coming into the presence of the Teacher, saluted him and sat down. Then the Teacher asked if some evil had not befallen him. “Yes, venerable sir,” he answered, “but through evil good has come to me. I have entered on the First Path.” “Verily,” said the Teacher, “not you only, but sages of old got good out of evil.” And herewith at his request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born to him as the son of his queen-consort. And they called him prince Ghata. He afterwards acquired a knowledge of the arts at Taxila and ruled his kingdom righteously.

Now a certain minister misconducted himself in the royal harem. The king, after witnessing the offence with his own eyes, banished him from his kingdom. At that time a king named Vaṅka ruled in Sāvatthi. The minister went to him and entering his service, just as in the former story, gained the king’s ear and got him to seize on the kingdom of Benares. After gaining possession of the kingdom, he had the Bodhisatta bound in chains and threw him into prison. The Bodhisatta entered on an Absorption and sat cross-legged in the air. A burning heat sprang up in the body of Vaṅka. He came and beheld the countenance of the Bodhisatta radiant with the beauty of a full-blown lotus, like to a golden mirror, and in the form of a question repeated the first verse:

1. “While others weep and wail, their cheeks with tears bestained, Why still with smiling face, has Ghata ne’er complained?”

Then the Bodhisatta, to explain why he did not grieve, recited the remaining verses:

2. “To change the past all sorrow is but vain, It has no blessing for a future state: Why should I, Vaṅka, of my woes complain? Grief is no helpmate fit with us to mate.

3. One that is sick with sorrow pines away, His food insipid and distasteful grows, Pierced as with arrows, to his grief a prey, He sinks a laughing-stock to all his foes.

4. Whether my home be on dry land or sea, Be it in village, or some forest drear, No sorrow ever shall come nigh to me, A soul converted can have nought to fear.

5. But he that lacks completion in himself And is with lust of things of sense fire, Not the whole world, with all its sordid pelf, Can e’er suffice for such a man’s desire.” {3.170}

Vaṅka therefore, after hearing these four verses, asked forgiveness of the Bodhisatta, and restored him to his kingdom and went his way. But the Bodhisatta handed over the kingdom to his ministers, and retreating to the Himālayas became an ascetic, and without any break in his Absorption he became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having ended his lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was king Vaṅka, and I myself was king Ghata.”
The Section with Five Verses – 1265

Ja 356 Kāraṇḍiyajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin Student) Koraṇḍiya (5s)

Alternative Title: Koraṇḍiyajātaka (Cst)

In the present Ven. Sāriputta teaches the Dhamma to all he meets, including those who will not accept it. The Buddha tells a story of how in the past one teacher did the same, till his wise pupil persuaded him that it was as useless trying to persuade the sectarians, as it was to level the earth.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin student Koraṇḍiya (Koraṇḍiyamāṇava), Sāriputta = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa).

Keywords: Wisdom, Teaching.

“Why in forest.” [3.113] This was a story told by the Teacher while dwelling at Jetavana, concerning the Captain of the Dhamma (Sāriputta). That elder, they say, when wicked folk came to him, such as hunters, fishermen and the like, laid down the moral law to them, and any others that he might see from time to time, saying: “Receive you the precepts.” Through respect for the elder, they could not disobey his words and accepted the precepts, but failed to keep it, and still followed each after his own business. The elder took counsel with his fellow monastics and said: “Sirs, these men receive the precepts from me, but keep it not.” [3.171] They answered, “Venerable sir, you preach the precepts to them against their wishes, and as they dare not disobey what you tell them, they accept it. Henceforth lay not down the precepts to such as these.” The elder was offended.

On hearing of the incident they started a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, how that the elder Sāriputta preached the precepts to any that he happened to see. The Teacher came and inquired what was the topic that the monks were debating in their assembly, and on hearing what it was, he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly also he preached the precepts to any men he might chance to see, even though they did not ask for it.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born and grew up in a brahmin household, and became the chief pupil of a world-famed teacher at Taxila. At that time this teacher preached the moral precepts to any one that he might see, fishermen and the like, even if they did not want it, repeatedly bidding them to listen to the Dhamma. But though they heard it, they kept it not. The teacher spoke of it to his disciples. His disciples said: “Venerable sir, you preach to them against their wishes, and therefore they break the precepts. Henceforth preach only to those who wish to hear you, and not to those who do not wish.” The teacher was filled with regret, but even so he still laid down the precepts to all whom he happened to see.

Now one day some people came from a certain village and invited the teacher to partake of the cakes offered to brahmins. He summoned his disciple named Kāraṇḍiya and said: “My dear son, I am not going, but you are to go there with these five hundred disciples, and receive the cakes, and bring the portion that falls to my share.” So he sent him. The disciple went, and as he was returning, he spied on the road a cave, and the thought struck him, “Our master lays down the precepts, without being asked, to all that he sees. Henceforth I will cause him to preach only to those that wish to hear him.” (3.172) And while the other disciples were comfortably seated, [3.114] he arose and picking up a huge stone, flung it into the cave, and again and again repeated the action. Then the disciples stood up and said: “Sir, what are you doing?” Kāraṇḍiya said not a word. And they went in haste and told their master. The master came and in conversing with Kāraṇḍiya repeated the first verse:

1. “Why in forest all alone
   Seizing oft a mighty stone,
   Did you hurl it with a will,
   Mountain cave as ’twere to fill?”

On hearing his words, Kāraṇḍiya to rouse his master uttered the second verse:

2. “I would make this sea-girt land
   Smooth as palm of human hand:
   Thus I level knoll and hill
   And with stones each hollow fill.”

The brahmin, on hearing this, repeated the third verse:

3. “Ne’er a one of mortal birth
   Has the power to level earth.
   Scarce Kāraṇḍiya can hope
   With a single cave to cope.” (3.173)

The disciple, on hearing this, spoke the fourth verse:
4. “If a man of mortal birth
Has no power to level earth,
Heretics may well refuse,
Brahmin, to adopt your views.”

On hearing this the teacher made an appropriate reply. For he now recognized that other men might differ from him, and thinking: “I will no longer act thus,” he uttered the fifth verse:

5. “Friend Kāraṇḍiya, in short
For my good you do exhort:
Earth can never levelled be,
Neither can all men agree.”

Thus did the teacher sing the praises of his disciple. And he, after he had thus admonished his teacher, conducted him home. (3.174)

The Teacher, having ended this lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Sāriputta was the brahmin, and I myself was the disciple Kāraṇḍiya.”

Ja 357 Laṭukikajātaka

The Story about the Quail (who Killed an Elephant) (5s)

In the present Devadatta is seen as cruel and violent. The Buddha tells a story of an elephant who killed some hatchling quails, and the revenge their mother wrought upon him with the help of those friendly with her.

The Bodhisatta = the leader of the herd (of elephants) (yūthapati), Devadatta = the solitary elephant (ekacārikahatthī).

Past Source: Ja 357 Laṭukika,
Quoted: Ja 536 Kuṇāla (Present).

Keywords: Violence, Revenge, Animals, Birds.

“Elephant of sixty years.” [3.115] This was a story told by the Teacher while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, concerning Devadatta. One day they raised a 664 For this story see Benfey’s Introduction to the Panchatantra.

---

discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, Devadatta is harsh, cruel, and violent. He has not an atom of pity for mortals.” When the Teacher came, he inquired what was the topic the monks were assembled to discuss, and on hearing what it was, he said: “Monks, not only now, but formerly also he was pitiless.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young elephant, and growing up a fine handsome beast, he became the leader of the herd, with a following of eighty thousand elephants, and dwelt in the Himālayas. At that time a quail laid her eggs in the feeding-ground of the elephants. When the eggs were ready to be hatched, the young birds broke the shells and came out. Before their wings had grown, and when they were still unable to fly, the Great Being with his following of eighty thousand elephants, in ranging about for food, came to this spot. On seeing them the quail thought: “This royal elephant will trample on my young ones and kill them. Lo! I will implore his righteous protection for the defence of my brood.” Then she raised her two wings and standing before him repeated the first verse:

1. “Elephant of sixty years,
Forest lord amongst your peers,
I am but a puny bird,
You a leader of the herd;
With my wings I homage pay,
Spare my little ones, I pray.”  (3.175)

The Great Being said: “O quail, be not troubled. I will protect your offspring.” And standing over the young birds, while the eighty thousand elephants passed by, he thus addressed the quail, “Behind us comes a solitary rogue elephant. He will not do our bidding. When he comes, do you entreat him too, and so ensure the safety of your offspring.” And with these words he made off. And the quail went forth to meet the other elephant, and with both wings uplifted, making respectful salutation, she spoke the second verse:  [3.116]
2. “Roaming over hill and dale
Cherishing your lonely way,
You, O forest king, I hail,
And with wings my homage pay.
I am but a wretched quail,
Spare my tender brood to slay.”

On hearing her words, the elephant spoke the third verse:

3. “I will slay your young ones, quail;
What can your poor help avail?
My left foot can crush with ease
Many thousand birds like these.” [3.176]

And so saying, with his foot he crushed the young birds to atoms, and urinating over them washed them away in a flood of water, and went off loudly trumpeting. The quail sat down on the bough of a tree and said: “Then be off with you and trumpet away. You shall very soon see what I will do. You little know what a difference there is between strength of body and strength of mind. Well! I will teach you this lesson.” And thus threatening him she repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Power abused is not all gain,
Power is often folly’s bane.
Beast that did my young ones kill,
I will work you mischief still.”

And so saying, shortly afterwards she did a good turn to a crow, and when the crow, who was highly pleased, asked, “What can I do for you?” the quail said: “There is nothing else, sir, to be done, but I shall expect you to strike with your beak and to peck out the eyes of this rogue elephant.” The crow readily assented, and the quail then did a service to a blue fly, and when the fly asked, “What can I do for you?” she said: “When the eyes of this rogue elephant have been put out by the crow, then I want you to let fall an egg upon them.” The fly agreed, and then the quail did a kindness to a frog, and when the frog asked what it was to do, she said: “When this rogue elephant becomes blind, and shall be searching for water to drink, then take your stand and utter a croak on the top of a mountain, and when he has climbed to the top, come down and croak again at the bottom of the precipice. This much I shall look for at your hands.” After hearing what the quail said, the frog readily assented. [3.177]
So one day the crow with its beak pecked out both the eyes of the elephant, and the fly dropped its eggs upon them, and the elephant being eaten up with maggots was maddened by the pain, and overcome with thirst wandered about seeking for water to drink. At this moment the frog standing on the top of a mountain uttered a croak. Thought the elephant, “There must be water there,” and climbed up the mountain. Then the frog descended, and standing at the bottom croaked again. The elephant thought: “There will be water there,” and [3.117] moved forward towards the precipice, and rolling over fell to the bottom of the mountain and was killed. When the quail knew that the elephant was dead, she said: “I have seen the back of my enemy,” and in a high state of delight strutted over his body, and passed away to fare according to her deeds.

The Teacher said: “Monks, one ought not to incur the hostility of anyone. These four creatures, by combining together, brought about the destruction of this elephant, strong as he was.

5. “A quail with crow, blue fly and frog allied
   Once proved the issue of a deadly feud.
   Through them king elephant untimely died:
   Therefore all quarrelling should be eschewed.”

This verse was spoken after Fully Awakening.

He identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the rogue elephant, and I myself was the leader of the herd of elephants.”

Ja 358 Culladhammapālajātaka
The Short Story about (Prince) Dhammapāla (5s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷadhammapālajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta tries to have the Buddha killed. The latter tells a story of how in a previous birth a prince, dear to his mother’s heart, had been cruelly tortured and executed by a jealous king, who later fell into hell.

The Bodhisatta = prince Dhammapāla (Dhammapālakumāra), Mahāpajāpatigotamī = queen Candā (Candādevī),
Devadatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 358 Culladhammapāla,
“Mahāpatāpa’s wretched queen.” This story the Teacher, when dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, told concerning the going about of Devadatta to slay the Bodhisatta. In all other births Devadatta failed to excite so much as an atom of fear in the Bodhisatta, [3.178] but in the Culladhammapāḷajātaka [Ja 358], when the Bodhisatta was only seven months old, he had his hands and feet and head cut off and his body encircled with sword cuts, as it were with a garland. In the Daddarajātaka [Ja 438][665] he killed him by twisting his neck, and roasted his flesh in an oven and ate it. In the Khantivādijātaka [Ja 313] he had him scourged with two thousand strokes of a whip, and ordered his hands and feet and ears and nose to be cut off, and then had him seized by the hair of his head and dragged along, and when he was stretched at full length on his back, he kicked him in the belly and made off, and that very day the Bodhisatta died. But both in the Cullanandakajātaka [Ja 222] and the Vevaṭiyakapijātaka [Ja 516][666] he merely had him put to death. Thus did Devadatta for a long time go about trying to slay him, and continued to do so, even after he became a Buddha.

So one day they raised a discussion in the Hall of [3.118] Dhamma, saying: “Sirs, Devadatta is continually forming plots to slay the Buddhas. Being minded to kill the Supreme Buddha, he instigated archers to shoot him, he threw down a rock upon him, and let loose the elephant Nālāgiri on him.” When the Teacher came and inquired what subject the monks were assembled to discuss, on hearing what it was he said: “Monks, not only now, but formerly too he went about to kill me, but now he fails to excite a particle of fear in me, though formerly when I was prince Dhammapāla he brought about my death, though I was his own son, by encircling my body with sword cuts, as it were with a garland.” And so saying, he related a story of the past.

In the past when Mahāpatāpa was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of his queen-consort Candā and they named him Dhammapāla. When he was seven months old, his mother had him bathed in scented water and richly

---

[665] [This is an alternative name for Ja 438 Tittirajātaka.]
[666] [See Ja 222 Cullanandiyajātaka, and Ja 516 Mahākapijātaka.] dressed and sat playing with him. The king came to the place of her abode. And as she was playing with the boy, being filled with a mother’s love for her child, she omitted to rise up on seeing the king. He thought: “Even now this woman is filled with pride on account of her boy, and does not value me a straw, but as the boy grows up, she will think, ‘I have a man for my son,’ and will take no notice of me. I will have him put to death at once.” So he returned home, and sitting on his throne summoned the executioner into his presence, with all the instruments of his office. [3.179] The man put on his yellow robe and wearing a crimson wreath laid his axe upon his shoulder, and carrying a block and a bowl in his hands, came and stood before the king, and saluting him said: “What is your pleasure, sire?”

“Go to the royal closet of the queen, and bring here Dhammapāla,” said the king.

But the queen knew that the king had left her in a rage, and laid the Bodhisatta on her bosom and sat weeping. The executioner came and giving her a blow in the back snatched the boy out of her arms and took him to the king and said: “What is your pleasure, sire?” The king had a board brought and put down before him, and said: “Lay him down on it.” The man did so. But queen Candā came and stood just behind her son, weeping. Again the executioner said: “What is your pleasure, sire?” “Cut off Dhammapāla’s hands,” said the king. Queen Candā said: “Great king, my boy is only a child, seven months old. He knows nothing. The fault is not his. If there be any fault, it is mine. Therefore bid my hands to be cut off.” And to make her meaning clear, she uttered the first verse:

1. “Mahāpatāpa’s wretched queen,
'Tis I alone to blame have been.
Bid Dhammapāla, sire, go free,
And off with hands of luckless me.” [3.119]

The king looked at the executioner. “What is your pleasure, sire?” “Without further delay, off with his hands,” said the king. At this moment the executioner took a sharp axe, and lopped off the boy’s two hands, as if they had been young bamboo shoots. [3.180] The boy, when his hands were cut off, neither wept nor lamented, but moved by patience and generosity bore it with resignation. But the queen Candā put the tips of his fingers in her lap and stained with blood went about lamenting. Again the executioner asked, “What is your pleasure, sire?” “Off with his feet,” said the king. On hearing this, Candā uttered the second verse:
2. “Mahāpatāpa’s wretched queen,
'Tis I alone to blame have been.
Bid Dhammapāla, sire, go free,
And off with feet of luckless me.”

But the king gave a sign to the executioner, and he cut off both his feet. Queen Candā put his feet also in her lap, and stained with blood, lamented and said: “My lord Mahāpatāpa, his feet and hands are cut off. A mother is bound to support her children. I will work for wages and support my son. Give him to me.” The executioner said: “Sire, is the king’s pleasure fulfilled? Is my service finished?” “Not yet,” said the king. “What then is your pleasure, sire?” “Off with his head,” said the king. Then Candā repeated the third verse:

3. “Mahāpatāpa’s wretched queen,
'Tis I alone to blame have been.
Bid Dhammapāla, sire, go free,
And off with head of luckless me.”

And with these words she offered her own head. Again the executioner asked, “What is your pleasure, sire?” “Off with his head,” said the king. So he cut off his head and asked, “Is the king’s pleasure fulfilled?” “Not yet,” said the king. “What further am I to do, sire?” “Catching him with the edge of the sword,” said the king, “encircle him with sword cuts as it were with a garland.” Then he threw the body of the boy up into the air, and catching it with the edge of his sword, encircled him with sword cuts, as it were with a garland, and scattered the bits on the dais. Candā placed the flesh of the Bodhisatta in her lap, and as she sat on the dais lamenting, she repeated these verses: [3.181]

4. “No friendly councillors advise the king,
Slay not the heir that from your loins did spring:
5. No loving kinsmen urge the tender plea,
Slay not the boy that owes his life to thee.”

Moreover after speaking these two verses queen Candā, pressing both her hands upon her heart, repeated the third verse: [3.120]

6. “You, Dhammapāla, were by right of birth
The lord of earth:
Your arms, once bathed in oil of sandalwood,
Lie steeped in blood.
My fitful breath, alas, is choked with sighs
And broken cries.”

While she was thus lamenting, her heart broke, as a bamboo snaps, when the grove is on fire, and she fell dead on the spot. The king too being unable to remain on his throne fell down on the dais. An abyss was cleft asunder in the ground, and straightway he fell into it. Then the solid earth, though many myriads more than two hundred thousand leagues in thickness, being unable to bear with his wickedness, clave asunder and opened a chasm. A flame arose out of the Avīci hell, and seizing upon him, wrapped him about, as with a royal woollen garment, {3.182} and plunged him into Avīci. His ministers performed the funeral rites of Candā and the Bodhisatta.

The Teacher, having brought this discourse to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the king, Mahāpajāpatī was Candā, and I myself was prince Dhammapāla.”

Ja 359 Suvaṇṇamigajātaka

The Story about the Golden Deer (5s)

In the present one faithful young woman manages to convert her new family to the Buddha’s teaching, and later, together with her husband, goes forth. The Buddha tells a story of how a doe had saved her lord when he had been trapped by a hunter.

---

667 [This is odd to say the least. Both the English and Burmese editions have the same reading, and both editions mark this as being, not the third, but the sixth, verse.]

668 Compare Tibetan Tales, xli: The Gazelle and the Hunter.
The Bodhisatta = the king of the deer (migarājā),
the young nun = the doe (migī),
Channa = the hunter (luddaka).

Keywords: Faith, Self-sacrifice, Women, Animals.

“O golden foot.” This was a story told by the Teacher while in residence at Jetavana, about a maiden of gentle birth in Sāvatthi. She was, they say, the daughter in the household of a servitor of the two chief disciples at Sāvatthi, and was a faithful believer, fondly attached to Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, abounding in good works, wise, and devoted to generosity and such like deeds of piety. Another family in Sāvatthi of equal rank but of heretical views chose her in marriage. Then her parents said: “Our daughter is a faithful believer, devoted to the Three Jewels, given to alms and other good works, but you hold heretical views. And as you will not allow her to give alms, or to hear the Dhamma, or to visit the monastery, or to keep the moral law, or to observe the fast days, as she pleases, we will not give her to you in marriage. Choose you a maiden from a family of heretical views like yourselves.” When their offer was rejected, they said: “When she comes to our house let your daughter do everything of this kind, as she pleases. We will not prevent her. Only grant us this boon.” “Take her then,” they answered. So they celebrated the marriage [3.121] festivity at an auspicious season and led her home. She proved faithful in the discharge of her duties, and a devoted wife, and rendered due service to her father-in-law and mother-in-law.

One day she said to her husband, “I wish, my lord, to give alms to our family monastics.” “Very well, my dear, give them just what you please.” So one day she invited these monastics, and making a great entertainment, she fed them with choice food, and taking a seat apart from them she said: “Venerable sirs, this family is heretical and unbelieving. They are ignorant of the value of the Three Jewels. Well then, sirs, until this family understands the value of the Three Jewels, do you continue to receive your food here.” The monastics assented and continually ate their meals there. Again she addressed her husband, {3.183} “Sir, the monastics constantly come here. Why do you not see them?” On hearing this he said: “Very well, I will see them.”

On the morrow she told him when the monastics had finished their meal. He came and sat respectfully on one side, conversing affably with the monastics. Then the Captain of the Dhamma preached the Dhamma to him. He was so charmed with the exposition of the faith, and the behaviour of the monastics, that from that day forward he prepared mats for the elders to sit on, and strained water for them, and after the meal listened to the exposition of the faith. By and by his heretical views gave way.

So one day the elder in expounding the faith declared the Truths to the man and his wife, and when the sermon was ended, they were both established in the fruition of the First Path. Thenceforth all of them, from his parents down to the hired servants, gave up their heretical views, and became devoted to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha.

So one day this young girl said to her husband, “What, sir, have I to do with the household life? I wish to adopt the ascetic life.” “Very well, my dear,” he said: “I too will become an ascetic.” And he conducted her with great pomp to a nunnery, and had her admitted as a novice, and himself too went to the Teacher and begged to be ordained. The Teacher admitted him first as a novice and afterwards to full monastic orders. They both received clear spiritual vision, and shortly became an Arahant.

One day they raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, a certain woman by reason of her own faith and that of her husband became a novice. And both of them having adopted the ascetic life, and gained clear spiritual vision, became Arahats.” The Teacher, when he came, inquired what was the topic the monks were sitting in council to discuss, and on hearing what it was, he said: “Monks, not only now, did she set her husband free from the bonds of passion. Formerly too she freed even sages of old from the bonds of death.” And with these words he held his peace, but being pressed by them he related a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young stag, and grew up a beautiful and graceful creature, of the colour of gold. His fore and hind feet were covered, as it were, with a preparation of lac. His horns were like a silver wreath, his eyes resembled round jewels, and his mouth was like a ball of crimson wool. The doe that was his mate was also a handsome creature, and they lived happily and harmoniously together. Eight myriads of dappled deer followed in the train of the Bodhisatta. While they were thus living there, a certain hunter set a snare in the deer drives.
So one day the Bodhisatta, while leading his herd, entangled his foot in the snare, and thinking to break the noose he tugged at it and cut the skin of his foot. Again he tugged it, and hurt the flesh, and a third time and injured the tendon. And the noose penetrated to the very bone. Not being able to break the snare, the stag was so alarmed with the fear of death that he uttered the cry of capture. On hearing it the herd of deer fled in a panic. But the doe, as she fled, looking amongst the deer, missed the Bodhisatta, and thought: “This panic must certainly have something to do with my lord,” and flying in haste to him, with many tears and lamentations she said: “My lord, you are very strong. Why can you not get the better of the snare? Put forth your strength and break it.” And thus stirring him up to make an effort, she uttered the first verse:

1. “O golden foot, no effort spare
   To loose thyself from thongéd snare.
   How could I joy, bereft of you,
   To range amidst the woodland free?”

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, responded in a second verse:

2. “I spare no effort, but in vain,
   My liberty I cannot gain.
   The more I struggle to get loose,
   The sharper bites the thongéd noose.”

Then the doe said: “My lord, fear not. By my own power will I entreat the hunter, and by giving up my own life I will gain yours in exchange.” And thus comforting the Great Being, she continued to embrace the blood-stained Bodhisatta. But the hunter approached, with sword and spear in hand, like to the destroying flame at the beginning of a cycle. On seeing him, the doe said: “My lord, the hunter is coming. By my own power I will rescue you. Be not afraid.” And thus comforting the stag, she went to meet the hunter, and standing at a respectful distance, she saluted him and said: “My lord, my husband is of the colour of gold, and endued with all the virtues, the king of eight myriads of deer.” And thus singing the praises of the Bodhisatta, she begged for her own death, if only the king of the herd might remain intact, and she repeated the third verse:
3. “Let on the earth a leafy bed,
   Hunter, where we may fall, be spread:
   And drawing from its sheath your sword,
   Slay me and afterwards my lord.”

The hunter, on hearing this, was struck with amazement and said: “Even human beings give not up their lives for their king; much less the beasts. What can this mean? This creature speaks with a sweet voice in the language of men. This day will I grant life to her and to her mate.” And greatly charmed with her, the hunter uttered the fourth verse:

4. “A beast that speaks with voice of men,
   Ne'er came before within my ken.
   Rest you in peace, my gentle deer,
   And cease, O golden foot, to fear.” [3.123]

The doe seeing the Bodhisatta set at his ease, was highly delighted and returning thanks to the hunter, repeated the fifth verse:

5. “As I today rejoice to see
   This mighty beast at liberty,
   So, hunter, that did loose the trap,
   Rejoice with all your kith and kin.”

And the Bodhisatta thought: “This hunter has granted life to me and this doe, and to eight myriads of deer. He has been my refuge, and I ought to be a refuge to him.” [3.187] And in his character of one supremely virtuous he thought: “One ought to make a proper return to one's benefactor,” and he gave the hunter a magic jewel which he had found in their feeding ground and said: “Friend, henceforth take not the life of any creature, but with this jewel set up a household and maintain a wife and children, and give alms and do other good works.” And thus admonishing him, the stag disappeared in the forest.
The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Channa was the hunter, this female novice was the doe, and I myself was the royal stag.”

Ja 360 Sussondijātaka
The Story about (Queen) Sussondī (5s)

Alternative Title: Suyonandijātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the monastic life owing to lust. The Buddha tells a story of how a Garuḷa carried off a queen to his heavenly home, and when the king sent a messenger to find her she was unfaithful with him. The Garuḷa in disgust returned her to the king.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the Supaṇṇas (Supaṇṇarājā), Ānanda = king (of Benares) (rājā).

Past Compare: Ja 327 Kākāti, Ja 360 Sussondi.

Keywords: Lust, Treachery, Devas, Women.

“I scent the fragrance.” This story the Teacher, while living at Jetavana, told concerning a discontented monk. The Teacher asked if it were true that he longed for the world, and what had he seen to make him regret having taken orders. The monk answered, “It was all owing to the charms of a woman.” The Teacher said: “Verily, monk, there is no possibility of being on one’s guard against womenfolk. Sages of old, though they took the precaution to dwell in the abode of the Garuḷas, failed to be on their guard against them.” And being urged by him, the Teacher related a story of the past. [3.124]

In the past king Tamba reigned in Benares, and his queen-consort named Sussondī was a woman of surpassing beauty. At that time the Bodhisatta came to life as a

---

669 A monk who was suspended for siding with heretics. [I am not sure this gives an accurate picture of this complex personality: he was Prince Siddhattha’s charioteer, and later ordained. He seems to have been a little obstinate, and is recorded as blaming the Chief Disciples. Also the last disciplinary act of the Buddha was in regard to this monk. I do not find anywhere though where he sided with heretics.]
young Garuḷa. Now the Nāga island was then known as Seruma island, and the Bodhisatta lived on this island in the abode of the Garuḷas. And he went to Benares, disguised as a youth, and played at dice with king Tamba. Remarking his beauty they said to Sussondi, “Such and such a youth plays at dice with our king.” She longed to see him, and one day she adorned herself and repaired to the dice-chamber. There taking her stand amongst the attendants, she fixed her gaze on the youth. He too gazed on the queen, and the pair fell in love with one another. The Garuḷa king by an act of supernatural power stirred up a storm in the city. The people, through fear of the house falling, fled out of the palace. By his power he caused it to be dark, and carrying off the queen with him in the air, he made his way to his own who lived on Nāga island. But no one knew of the coming or going of Sussondi. The Garuḷa took his pleasure with her, and still came to play at dice with the king. Now the king had a minstrel named Sagga, and not knowing where the queen had gone, the king addressed the minstrel and said: “Go now and explore every land and sea, and discover what has become of the queen.” And so saying he bade him begone.

He took what was necessary for his journey, and beginning the search from the city gate, at last came to Bhārukaccha. At that time certain merchants of Bhārukaccha were setting sail for the Golden Land. He approached them and said: “I am a minstrel. If you remit my passage money, I will act as your minstrel. Take me with you.” They agreed to do so, and putting him on board weighed anchor. When the ship was fairly off, they called him and bade him make music for them. He said: “I would make music, but if I do, the fish will be so excited that your vessel will be wrecked.” “If a mere mortal,” they said, “make music, there will be no excitement on the part of the fish. Play to us.” “Then do not be angry with me,” he said, and tuning his lute and keeping perfect harmony between the words of his song and the accompaniment of the lute string, he made music for them. The fish were maddened at the sound and splashed about. And a certain sea monster leaping up fell upon the ship and broke it in two. Sagga lying on a plank was carried along by the wind till he reached a banyan tree in the Nāga island, where the Garuḷa king lived.

Now queen Sussondi, whenever the Garuḷa king went to play at dice, came down from her place of abode, and as she was wandering on the edge of the shore, she saw and recognized the minstrel Sagga, and asked him how he got there. He told her the whole story. And she comforted him and said: “Do not be afraid,” and embracing him in her arms, she carried him to her abode and laid him on a couch. And when he was greatly revived, she fed him with heavenly [3.125] food, bathed him in heavenly scented-water, arrayed him in heavenly raiment, and adorned him with flowers of heavenly perfume, and made him recline upon a heavenly couch. Thus did she watch over him, and whenever the Garuḷa king returned, she hid her lover, and so soon as the king was gone, under the influence of passion she took her pleasure with him. At the end of a month and a half from that time some merchants, who dwelt at Benares, landed at the foot of the banyan tree in this island, to get firewood and water. The minstrel went on board ship with them, and on reaching Benares, as soon as he saw the king, while he was playing at dice, Sagga took his lute, and making music recited the first verse:

1. “I scent the fragrance of the timira grove,
   I hear the moaning of the weary sea:
   Tamba, I am tormented with my love,
   For fair Sussonḍī dwells afar from me.”

On hearing this the Garuḷa king uttered the second verse:

2. “How did you cross the stormy main,
   And Seruma in safety gain?
   How did you Sagga, tell me, pray,
   To fair Sussonḍī win your way?” {3.190}

Then Sagga repeated three verses:

3. “With trading-folk from Bhārukaccha land
   My ship was wrecked by monsters of the sea;
   I on a plank did safely gain the strand,

4. When an anointed queen with gentle hand
   Upbore me tenderly upon her knee,
   As though to her a true son I might be.

5. She food and raiment brought, and as I lay
   With love-lorn eyes hung o’er my couch all day.
   Know, Tamba, well; this word is truth I say.”

The Garuḷa, while the minstrel thus spake, was filled with regrets and said: “Though I dwelt in the abode of the Garuḷas, I failed to guard her safely. What is this wicked woman to me?” So he brought her back and presented her to the king and departed. And thenceforth he did not come there any more.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the worldly-minded monk attained fruition of the First Path. “At that time Ānanda was the king of Benares, and I myself was the Garuḍa king.”

Ja 361 Vaṇṇārohajātaka

The Story about (the Lion) Possessed of Beauty (5s)

In the present a layman who waits on the two chief disciples tries to set them against each other, but to no avail. The Buddha tells a story of how a jackal tried to undo the friendship of a lion with a tiger, but was chased away when they found out his game.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā who dwelt in the grove (vane nivuttharuhkhadevatā), Moggallāna = the tiger (vyaggha),
Sāriputta = the lion (sīha),
the beggar = the jackal (sigāla).

Past Compare: Ja 349 Sandhibheda, Ja 361 Vaṇṇāroha.

Keywords: Quarrels, Friendship, Devas, Animals.

“So it thus, Sudātha.” [3.126] [3.191] This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning the two chief disciples. On a certain occasion the two chief elders resolved during the rainy season to devote themselves to solitude. So they bade the Teacher farewell and leaving the company of the monks they went forth from Jetavana, carrying their bowl and robes with their own hands, and lived in a forest near a border village. And a certain man, who waited on the elders and lived upon their leftovers, dwelt apart in the same place. On seeing how happily these elders lived together, he thought: “I wonder if it is possible to set them at variance.” So he drew near to Sāriputta and said: “Can it be, venerable sir, that there is some quarrel between you and the venerable chief elder Moggallāna?” “Why so, sir?” he asked. “He ever, venerable sir, speaks in your dispraise and says, “When I am gone, what is Sāriputta worth compared with me in caste, lineage, family and country, or in the power of Attainments in the sacred volumes?” The elder smiled and said: “Be off, sir!”

Another day he drew near to the chief elder Moggallāna, and said the same thing. He too smiled and said: “Be off, sir!” Moggallāna went to Sāriputta and asked, “Has this fellow, who lives on our leavings, said anything to you?” “Yes, friend, he has.” “And he said exactly the same thing to me. We must drive him away.” “Very well, friend, drive him away.” The elder said: “You are not to come here,” and snapping his fingers at him, he drove him away. The two elders lived happily together, and returning to the Teacher, made obeisance to him and sat down. The Teacher spoke kindly to them and asked if they had kept their retreat pleasantly. They said: “A certain beggar wished to set us at variance, but failing in the attempt he ran away.” The Teacher said: “Verily, Sāriputta, not only now, but formerly also, he thought to set you at variance, but failing in the attempt he ran away.” And hereupon at his request he related a story of bygone days.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā in a forest. {3.192} At that time a lion and a tiger lived in a mountain cave in that forest. A jackal was in attendance on them, and living on their leftovers began to grow fat in body. And one day he was struck with the thought: “I have never yet eaten the flesh of a lion or a tiger. I must set these two animals at variance, and when in consequence of their quarrel they have come by their death, I will eat their flesh.” So he drew near to the lion and said: “Is there any quarrel, sir, between you and the tiger?” “Why so, sir?” “Your reverence,” he said, “he ever speaks in your dispraise and says, “When I [3.127] am gone, this lion will never attain to the sixteenth part of my personal beauty, nor of my stature and girth, nor of my natural strength and power.” Then the lion said to him, “Off with you. He will never speak thus of me.” Then the jackal drew near to the tiger also, and spoke after the same manner. On hearing him, the tiger hastened to the lion, and asked, “Friend, is it true, that you said so and so of me?” And he spoke the first verse:
1. “Is it thus Sudāṭha speaks of me?
In grace of form and pedigree,
In might and prowess in the field,
Subāhu still to me must yield.”

On hearing this Sudāṭha repeated the four remaining verses:

2. “Is it thus Subāhu speaks of me?
In grace of form and pedigree,
In might and prowess in the field,
Sudāṭha still to me must yield.

3. If such injurious words are thine,
No more shall you be friend of mine.
The man that lends a ready ear
To any gossip he may hear,

4. Soon picks a quarrel with a friend,
And love in bitter hate will end.
No friend suspects without a cause,
Or carefully looks out for flaws;

5. But on his friend in trust will rest
As child upon its mother’s breast,
And ne’er will by a stranger’s word
Be parted from his bosom’s lord.”

When the qualities of a friend had been thus set forth in these four verses, the tiger said: “The fault is mine,” and begged pardon of the lion. And they continued to live happily together in the same place. But the jackal departed and fled elsewhere.

The Teacher, having brought his lesson to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the jackal was the beggar who lived on leftovers, the lion was Sāriputta, the tiger Moggallāna, and the deity that dwelt in that forest and saw the whole thing with his own eyes was I myself.”

---

671 Sudāṭha (strong-tooth) is the lion, Subāhu (strong-arm) the tiger.
The Section with Five Verses – 1285

Ja 362 Sīlavīmaṁsaajātaka

The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue (5s)

In the present a brahmin seeks to find out if the king favours him for his learning, or for his goodness, so he starts stealing a penny a day from the king. When the king finds out he decides to punish him, until the brahmin explains his actions. The Buddha tells a story of similar happenings in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = one who went forth in the seer’s ordination (isipabbajjaṁ pabbajito).

Past Compare: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 362 Sīlavīmaṁsa.

Keywords: Theft, Virtue.

“Virtue and learning.” [3.128] This story the Teacher, while residing at Jetavana, told concerning a brahmin who would test the power of virtue. The king, they say, owing to his reputation for virtue, regarded him with special honour, beyond what was paid to other brahmins. He thought: “Can it be that the king regards me with special honour, because I am endowed with virtue, or as one devoted to the acquisition of learning? I will just test the comparative importance of virtue and learning.”

So one day he abstracted a coin from the royal treasury board. The treasurer, such was his respect for him, did not say a word. It occurred a second time, and the treasurer said nothing. But on the third occasion he had him arrested as one who lived by robbery, and brought him before the king. And when the king asked what his offence was, he charged him with stealing the king’s property. [3.194]

“I am not in the habit of stealing your property, sire,” he said, “but I had my doubts as to the relative importance of virtue and learning, and in testing which was the greater of the two, I thrice took a coin without permission, and then I was given into custody and brought before you. Now that I know the greater efficacy of virtue compared with learning, I no longer wish to live a layman’s life. I will become an ascetic.”

---

On obtaining leave to do so, without so much as looking back on his house door, he went straight to Jetavana and begged the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher granted him both novice and full monastic orders. And he had been no long time in orders, before he attained to Insight and reached Arahatship.

The incident was discussed in the Dhamma Hall, how that a certain brahmin, after proving the power of virtue, took orders and obtaining Insight became an Arahat. When the Teacher came and inquired of the monks what was the nature of the topic they were sitting to discuss, on hearing what it was, he said: “Not this man only now, but sages of old also put virtue to the proof, and by becoming ascetics worked out their own safety.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. And when he came of age, he acquired every liberal art at Taxila, and on his return to Benares he went to see the king. The king offered him the post of family priest, and as he kept the Five Precepts, the king looked upon him with respect as a virtuous man. “Can it be,” he thought, “that the king regards me with respect as a virtuous man, or as one devoted to the acquisition of learning?” And the whole story corresponds exactly with the modern instance, but in this case the brahmin said: “Now I know the great importance of virtue compared with learning.” And hereupon he spoke these five verses:

1. “Virtue and learning I wanted to test;
   Henceforth I doubt not that virtue is best.

2. Virtue excels vain gifts of form and birth,
   Apart from virtue learning has no worth.

3. A prince or peasant, if to wrong enslaved,
   In neither world from misery is saved.

4. Men of high caste with those of base degree,
   If virtuous here, in heaven will equal be. [3.195]
The Section with Five Verses – 1287

5. Not birth, nor lore, nor friendship aught avails,
Pure virtue only future bliss entails.”

Thus did the Great Being sing the praises of virtue, and having gained the consent of the king, that very day he betook himself to the Himālayas region, and adopting the ascetic life he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher here ended this lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time it was I myself that put virtue to the test and adopted the ascetic life.”

Ja 363 Hirijātaka
The Story about Shame (5s)

In the present a wealthy man from the border lands sends merchandise to Sāvatthi, asking his correspondent Anāthapiṇḍika to help exchange it, which he did. When the good man sends his produce to the border lands, however, his entourage is despised. Later, when another caravan arrives from the border it is pillaged and destroyed in revenge. The Buddha explains similar events that happened in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man from Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi), the border dweller = the same in the past (paccantavāsī).

Present Source: Ja 90 Akataññu, Quoted at: Ja 363 Hiri.

Keywords: Reciprocity, Honour.

“Who spite of honour.” {3.196} This story the Teacher, when dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a rich merchant, a friend of Anāthapiṇḍika, who lived in a border province. Both the introductory story and the story of the past are related in full in the concluding Jātaka of the ninth division of the first book [Ja 90].673

On the borders, so the tale goes, there lived a merchant, who was a correspondent and a friend of Anāthapiṇḍika’s, but they had never met. There came a time when this merchant loaded five hundred carts with local produce and gave orders to the men in charge to go to the great merchant Anāthapiṇḍika, and barter the wares in his correspondent's shop for their value, and bring back the goods received in exchange. So they came to Sāvatthi, and found Anāthapiṇḍika. First making him a present, they told him their business. “You are welcome,” said the great man, and ordered them to be lodged there and provided with money for their needs. After kindly enquiries after their master's health, he bartered their merchandise and gave them the goods in exchange. Then they went back to their own district, and reported what had happened.

673 [Akataññujātaka. I include the stories here.]

Shortly afterwards, Anāthapiṇḍika similarly dispatched five hundred carts with merchandise to the very district in which they dwelt; and his people, when they had got there, went, present in hand, to call upon the border merchant. “Where do you come from?” said he. “From Sāvatthi,” replied they; “from your correspondent, Anāthapiṇḍika.” “Anyone can call himself Anāthapiṇḍika,” said he with a sneer; and taking their present, he bade them begone, giving them neither lodging nor a gift. So they bartered their goods for themselves and brought back the wares in exchange to Sāvatthi, with the story of the reception they had had.

Now it chanced that this border merchant dispatched another caravan of five hundred carts to Sāvatthi; and his people came with a present in their hands to wait upon Anāthapiṇḍika. But, as soon as Anāthapiṇḍika’s people caught sight of them, they said: “Oh, we’ll see, sir, that they are properly lodged, fed, and supplied with money for their needs.” And they took the strangers outside the city and bade them unyoke their carts at a suitable spot, adding that rice and a gift would come from Anāthapiṇḍika’s house. About the middle watch of the night, having collected a band of serving-men and slaves, they looted the whole caravan, carried off every garment the men had got, drove away their oxen, and took the wheels off the carts, leaving the latter but removing the wheels. Without so much as a shirt among the lot of them, the terrified strangers sped away and managed to reach their home on the border. Then Anāthapiṇḍika’s people told him the whole story. “This capital story,” said he, “shall be my gift to the Teacher today,” and away he went and told it to the Teacher.

“This is not the first time, sir,” said the Teacher, “that this border merchant has shown this disposition; he was just the same in days gone by.” Then, at Anāthapiṇḍika’s request, he told the following story of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a very wealthy merchant in that city. And he too had as a correspondent a border merchant whom he had never seen and all came to pass as above.

In this version when the merchant of Benares was told that the followers of the foreign merchant were robbed of all their property and, after losing everything they possessed, had to take to flight, he said: “Because they failed to do what they ought for the strangers who came to them, they find no one ready to do them a good turn.” And so saying he repeated these verses:

1. “Who spite of honour, while he plays the part
Of humble servant, loathes you in his heart,
Poor in good works and rich in words alone –
Ah! Such a friend you surely would not own. [3.130]

2. Be you in deed to every promise true,
Refuse to promise what you can not do;
Wise men on empty braggarts look askew.

3. No friend suspects a quarrel without cause,
For ever watching to discover flaws:
But he that trustful on a friend can rest,
As little child upon its mother’s breast,
Will ne’er by any stranger’s deed or word,
Be separated from his bosom’s lord.

4. Who draws the yoke of human friendship well,
Of bliss increased and honoured life can tell:

5. But one that tastes the joys of calm repose,
Drinking sweet draughts of Truth – he only knows Escape from defilements and all his woes.” [3.197]

Thus did the Great Being, disgusted by coming into contact with evil associates, through the power of solitude, bring his teaching to a climax and lead men to the deathless and great Nibbāna.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time I myself was the merchant of Benares.”
The Section with Five Verses – 1290

Ja 364 Khājjopanakajātaka
The Story about the Firefly (5s)

Alternative Title: Devatāpucchitapañhā (Comm)

The Devas who lived in the king’s parasol asked the king four questions, and he agreed to ask his brahmin seers, but they did not know the answers. Only the wise Mahosadha could answer correctly.

The Bodhisatta = (paññīta) Mahosadha.

Past Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 364 Khājjopanaka.

Keywords: Wisdom, Clever answers.

This question about a fire-fly will be set forth in full in the Mahā-ummagga [Ja 546].

Now the deity that dwelt in the royal parasol no longer hearing the voice of the Bodhisatta’s discourse wondered what might be the cause, and when she had found it out determined to bring the sage back. So at night she appeared through a hole in the circuit of the parasol, and asked the king four questions... The king could not answer, and said so, but offered to ask his wise men, asking a day’s delay.

Next day he sent a message summoning them, but they replied, “We are ashamed to show ourselves in the street, shaven as we are.” So he sent them four skullcaps to wear on their heads. (That is the origin of these caps, so they say.) Then they came, and sat where they were invited to go, and the king said: “Senaka, last night the deity that dwells in my parasol asked me four questions, which I could not solve but I said I would ask my wise men. Pray solve them for me.” And then he recited the first verse:

1. “He strikes with hands and feet, and beats on the face; yet, O king, he is dear, and grows dearer than a husband.”

Senaka stammered out whatever came first, “ Strikes how, strikes whom,” and could make neither head nor tail of it; the others were all dumb. The king was full of distress. When again at night the Devatā asked whether he had found out the riddle, he said: “I asked my four wise men, and not even they could say.” She replied, “What do they know? Save wise Mahosadha there is none can solve it. If you do not send for him and get him to solve these questions, I will cleave your head with this fiery blade.” After thus frightening him she went on, “O king, when you want fire don’t blow on a firefly, and when you want milk don’t milk a horn.” Then she repeated the Firefly Question of the Fifth Book:

2. “When light is extinguished, who that goes in search of fire ever thinks a firefly to be fire, if he sees it at night?

3. If he crumbles over it cow-dung and grass, it is a foolish idea; he cannot make it burn. So also a beast gets no benefit by wrong means, if it milks a cow by the horn where milk will not flow.

4. By many means men obtain benefit, by punishment of enemies and kindness shown to friends.

5. By winning over the chiefs of the army, and by the counsel of friends, the lords of the earth possess the earth and the fulness thereof.”

“They are not like you, blowing at a firefly in the belief that it is a fire: you are like one blowing at a firefly when fire is at hand, like one who throws down the balance and weighs with the hand, like one who wants milk and milks the horn, when you ask deep questions of Senaka and the like of him. What do they know? Like fireflies are they, like a great flaming fire is Mahosadha blazing with wisdom. If you do not find out this question, you are a dead man.” Having thus terrified the king, she disappeared.

Ja 365 Ahiguṇḍikajātaka
The Story about the Snake Catcher (5s)

Alternative Title: Ahituṇḍikajātaka (Cst)

In the present one elderly monk ordains a novice, but is unkind to him, and the novice disrobes. Having enticed him back into robes, he is again unkind. The Buddha tells a story of a snake trainer who had a monkey he used to beat until he escaped one day and refused to return.

The Bodhisatta = the grain merchant (dhaññavāṇīja), the novice = the monkey (makkaṭa),
the old monk = the snake catcher (ahituṇḍika),
Keywords: Bad treatment, Escape.

“Lo! Here we lie.” This story the Teacher, while living at Jetavana, told concerning an aged monk. The story has already been related in full in the Sālakajātaka [Ja 85].

In this version also the old man after ordaining a village lad abuses and strikes him. The lad escaped and returned to the world. [3.198] The old man once more admitted him to orders, and acted just as before. The youth, after he had for the third time returned to the world, on being again solicited to come back, would not so much as look the old man in the face.

The matter was talked over in the Dhamma Hall, how that a certain elder could live neither with his novice nor without him, while the boy after seeing the old man’s temper, being a sensitive youth, would not even look at him. The Teacher came [3.131] and asked what was the subject of discussion. When they told him, he said: “Not only now, monks, but formerly also this same youth was a sensitive novice, who after observing the elder’s faults would not so much as look at him.” And so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a corn merchant’s family. And when he was grown up, he got his living by selling corn.

Now a certain snake-charmer caught a monkey and trained him to play with a snake. And when a festival was proclaimed at Benares, he left the monkey with the corn merchant and roamed about for seven days, making sport with the snake. The merchant meanwhile fed the monkey with food both hard and soft. On the seventh day the snake-charmer got drunk at the festival merry-making, and came back and struck the monkey three times with a piece of bamboo, and then taking him with him to a garden, he tied him up and fell asleep. The monkey got loose from his chain, and climbing up a mango tree, sat there eating the fruit. The snake-charmer on waking up saw the monkey perched on the tree and thought: “I must catch him by flattering him.” And in talking with him he repeated the first verse:

674 [However, nothing occurs in the earlier story that isn’t told here.]

1. “Lo! Here we lie, my pretty one,
Like gambler by the dice undone.
Let fall some mangoes: well we know,
Our living to your tricks we owe.”

The monkey, on hearing this, uttered the remaining verses:

2. “Your praises, friend, unmeaning sound;
A pretty monkey ne’er was found. [3.199]

3. Who in the stores, when drunk, I pray,
Did starve and beat me sore today?

4. When I, snake-charmer, call to mind
The bed of pain where I reclined,
Though I should some day be a king,
No prayer from me this boon should wring,
Your cruelty remembering.

5. But if a man is known to live
Content at home, is apt to give,
And springs of gentle race, the wise
With such should form the closest ties.”

With these words the monkey was lost in a crowd of fellow-monkeys.

675 The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the old man was the snake-charmer, the novice was the monkey, and I myself was the corn merchant.”

---

675 Another reading gives, “was lost in a thicket of trees”.
In the present one monk is enchanted by a woman and has regrets over his ordination. The Buddha tells a story of how Yakkhas used to put out food along the path, which poisoned those who partook of it.

The Bodhisatta = the caravan leader (satthavāha).

Past Compare: Ja 54 Phala, Ja 85 Kimpakka, Ja 366 Gumbiya.

Keywords: Caution, Desire, Poison, Devas.

“Poison like honey.” [3.132] (3.200) This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling at Jetavana, about a monk who regretted taking ordination. The Teacher asked him if it were true that he regretted it. “It is true, venerable sir,” he said. “What have you seen to cause this feeling?” asked the Teacher. When the monk replied, “It was owing to the charms of a woman,” the Teacher said: “These five qualities of desire are like the honey sprinkled over with deadly poison, and left in the road by one Gumbiya.” And hereupon at the request of the monk he told a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in a merchant’s household. And when he was grown up, he set out from Benares with merchandise on five hundred carts for trading purposes. On reaching the high road, at the entrance of a forest, he called together all the members of his caravan and said: “Lo! On this road are leaves, flowers, fruit and the like, that are poisonous. In eating see that you take no strange food, without first asking me about it: for Amanussas set in the road baskets of fresh rice and various sweet wild fruits, and sprinkle poison over them. Be sure not to eat of them without my consent.” And after uttering this warning, he proceeded on his journey.

Then a certain Yakkha, named Gumbiya, strewed leaves on a spot in the middle of the forest, and dropping some pieces of honey, covered them with deadly poison, and himself wandered all about the road, pretending to tap the trees, as if he were looking for honey. In their ignorance men thought: “This honey must have been left here as a meritorious act,” and then through eating it, they met their death. And the Amanussas came and devoured their flesh.

The men also belonging to the Bodhisatta’s caravan, some of them being naturally greedy, at the sight of these dainties, could not restrain themselves, and partook of them. But those that were wise said: “We will consult the Bodhisatta before we eat,” and stood holding it in their hands. And when he saw what they had in their hands, he made them throw it away. And those that had already eaten the whole of it died. But to those who had eaten only half of it, he administered an emetic, and after they had vomited, {3.201} he gave them the four sweet things, and so by his supernatural power they recovered. The Bodhisatta [3.133] arrived in safety at the place he wished to reach, and after disposing of his wares, he returned to his own house.

1. “Poison like honey in look, taste, and smell,
   Was laid by Gumbiya with purpose fell:

2. All who as honey ate the noxious food,
   Through their own greed did perish in the wood.

3. But they who wisely from the bait abstained,
   Were free from torture and at peace remained.

4. So lust, like poison-bait, for man is laid;
   His heart’s desire has oft to death betrayed.

5. But who, though frail, his defilements forego,
   Escape from bonds of suffering and woe.”

The Teacher, after delivering these verses spoken after Fully Awakening, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka, {3.202} At the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk attained the fruit of the First Path. “At that time I myself was that merchant.”

Ja 367 Sāliyajātaka

The Story about the Mynah Bird (5s)

Alternative Title: Sāliyajātaka (Cst)
In the present Devadatta tries to have the Buddha killed. The latter tells a story of how a false doctor tried to get a child bitten by a snake so he could cure them and take the gain. The snake, however, bit him, not the child, and he died.

The Bodhisatta = the wise boy (paṇḍitadāraka),
Devadatta = the feeble (doctor) (dubbala).

Present Source: Ja 358 Culladhammapāla,
Quoted at: Ja 367 Śāliya,
Past Source: Ja 367 Śāliya,
Quoted at: Ja 368 Taicasāra,
Past Compare: Dhp-a IX.9 Kokasunakhaluddaka.

Keywords: Greed, Malice.

“Who got his friend.” This was a story told by the Teacher, while living in the Bamboo Grove, in reference to a saying that Devadatta could not even inspire alarm. 676

This story the Teacher, when dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, told concerning the going about of Devadatta to slay the Bodhisatta. In all other births Devadatta failed to excite so much as an atom of fear in the Bodhisatta, but in the Culladhammapālajātaka [Ja 358], when the Bodhisatta was only seven months old, he had his hands and feet and head cut off and his body encircled with sword cuts, as it were with a garland. In the Daddarajātaka [Ja 438] he killed him by twisting his neck, and roasted his flesh in an oven and ate it. In the Khantivādijātaka [Ja 313] he had him scourged with two thousand strokes of a whip, and ordered his hands and feet and ears and nose to be cut off, and then had him seized by the hair of his head and dragged along, and when he was stretched at full length on his back, he kicked him in the belly and made off, and that very day the Bodhisatta died. But both in the Cullanandakajātaka [Ja 222] and the Vevaṭiyakapijātaka [Ja 516] he merely had him put to death. Thus did Devadatta for a long time go about trying to slay him, and continued to do so, even after he became a Buddha.

676 [Ja 358 Culladhammapālajātaka tells this story at length, most of which I include here.]
So one day they raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, Devadatta is continually forming plots to slay the Buddhas. Being minded to kill the Supreme Buddha, he instigated archers to shoot him, he threw down a rock upon him, and let loose the elephant Nālāgiri on him.” When the Teacher came and inquired what subject the monks were assembled to discuss, on hearing what it was he said: “Monks, not only now, but formerly too he went about to kill me, but now he fails to excite a particle of fear in me...” And so saying, he related a story of the past.

When Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the family of a village householder, and when he was young he played with other boys at the foot of a banyan tree, at the entrance of the village. A poor old doctor at that time who had no practice strayed out of the village to this spot, and saw a snake asleep in the fork of a tree, with its head tucked in. He thought: “There is nothing to be got in the village. I will cajole these boys and make the snake bite them, and then I shall get something for curing them.” So he said to the Bodhisatta, “If you were to see a young hedgehog, would you seize it?” “Yes, I would,” said he. \[3.203\]

“See, here is one lying in the fork of this tree,” said the old man.

The Bodhisatta, not knowing it was a snake, climbed up the tree and seized it by the neck, but when he found it was a snake, he did not allow \[3.134\] it to turn upon him, but getting a good grip of it, he hastily flung it from him. It fell on the neck of the old doctor, and coiling round him, it bit him so severely that its teeth met in his flesh and the old man fell down dead on the spot, and the snake made its escape. People gathered together about him, and the Great Being, in expounding the Dhamma to the assembled multitude, repeated these verses:

1. “Who got his friend to seize
   A deadly snake, as hedgehog, if you please,
   By the snake’s bite was killed
   As one that evil to his neighbour willed.

---

\[677\] Reading karakarā nikḥāditvā, cf. the Sanskrit kaṭakaṭā.
2-3. He that to strike is fain
The man that never striketh back again,
Is struck and lieth low,
E’en as this cheat sore hurt by deadly blow.

4. So dust that should be thrown
Against the wind, back in one’s face is blown;

5. And ill designed to one
That holy is, and has no evil done,
On the fool’s pate at last
Recoils, like dust when thrown against the blast.”

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the poor old doctor was Devadatta, the wise youth was myself.”

Ja 368 Tacasārajātaka
The Story about the Bamboo Fetters (5s)

In the present Devadatta tries to have the Buddha killed. The latter tells a story of how a false doctor tried to get a child bitten by a snake so he could cure them and take the gain. The snake, however, bit him, not the child, and he died. In this version the children are taken before the king and tried.

The Bodhisatta = the wise boy (paññitadāraka), the monks = the boys (dārakā),
Ānanda = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Past Source: Ja 367 Sāliya,
Quoted at: Ja 368 Tacasāra,
Past Compare: Dhp-a IX.9 Kokasunakhaluddaka.

Keywords: Malice, Wisdom.

“Fallen into hand of foes.” (3.204) This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning the Perfection of Wisdom. It was then the Teacher said:

678 [The second and third verses are almost exact replicas with only one word change between them.]
“Not only is the Tathāgata wise this one time, but he was wise before, and had skill in means” And herewith he related a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the household of a village proprietor. The whole story runs on exactly like that of the previous birth.

A poor old doctor at that time who had no practice strayed out of the village to this spot, and saw a snake asleep in the fork of a tree, with its head tucked in. He thought: “There is nothing to be got in the village. I will cajole these boys and make the snake bite them, and then I shall get something for curing them.” So he said to the Bodhisatta, “If you were to see a young hedgehog, would you seize it?” “Yes, I would,” said he.

“See, here is one lying in the fork of this tree,” said the old man.

The Bodhisatta, not knowing it was a snake, climbed up the tree and seized it by the neck, but when he found it was a snake, he did not allow it to turn upon him, but getting a good grip of it, he hastily flung it from him. It fell on the neck of the old doctor, and coiling round him, it bit him so severely that its teeth met in his flesh and the old man fell down dead on the spot, and the snake made its escape.

But in this version when the doctor was dead, his village neighbours said: “These youths have [3.135] caused the man’s death. We will bring them before the king.” And they bound them in fetters and led them to Benares. The Bodhisatta in the course of his journey admonished the other lads and said to them, “Do not be afraid. Even when you are brought into the presence of the king, show yourselves fearless and happy in your mind. The king will first of all talk with us, and afterwards I shall know what to do.” They readily acquiesced in what he said, and acted accordingly. When the king found them calm and happy, he said: “These poor wretches have been bound in chains and brought here as murderers, and although they have come to such misery, they are without fear and even happy. I will ask them the reason why they are not troubled.”

And he repeated the first verse:
1. “Fallen into hand of foes
   And with bamboo fetters bound,
   How can you conceal your woes,
   And with smiling face be found?”

On hearing this the Bodhisatta uttered the remaining verses:

2. “There is no good however slight,
   That man from groans and mourning e’er will gain;
   His adversaries feel delight,
   When they behold a foe o’ercome with pain. {3.205}

3. But enemies with grief are filled
   When with bold front he goes to meet his fate,
   And blanches not, as one well-skilled
   All things with judgment to discriminate.

4. Be it by muttered spell or charm,
   By lavish gifts, or help of powerful kin,
   That he may best escape from harm,
   A man should strive some vantage ground to win.

5. But should he fail to reach success,
   With others’ aid or by himself alone,
   He should not grieve but acquiesce;
   Fate is too strong, his utmost he has done.” {3.206}

The king on hearing the Bodhisatta’s exposition of the Dhamma, investigated the matter, and discovering the innocence of the boys, he had their fetters removed, and bestowed much honour on the Great Being, and made him his temporal and spiritual adviser and his valued minister. He also conferred honour on the other youths and appointed them to various offices.

When the Teacher had brought this lesson to an end, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king of Benares, the lesser elders were the other youths, and I myself was the wise youth.”
The Section with Five Verses – 1301

Ja 369 Mittavindajātaka

The Story about (the Merchant) Mittavindaka (5s)

Alternative Title: Mittavindakajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk, though taught the way of a monastic, refuses to listen, and wants to live according to his own ideas. The Buddha tells how in a previous life the same person had been disobedient to his mother, and had suffered greatly as a result.

The Bodhisatta = the Devaputta (Devaputta), the disobedient monk = Mittavindaka.

Present Source: Ja 427 Gijjhajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 116 Dubbaca, Ja 161 Indasamānagotta, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra, Past Compare: Ja 41 Losaka, Ja 82 Mittavinda, Ja 104 Mittavinda, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Wilfulness, Greed, Retribution, Devas.

“What was the evil.” [3.136] This story the Teacher while living at Jetavana told concerning an unruly monk. The incident that led to the story will be found in the Mahāmittavindajātaka [Ja 439].

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana concerning a disobedient monk. He was, they say, of gentle birth, and though ordained in the dispensation that leads to safety, was admonished by his well-wishers, masters, teachers, and fellow-students to this effect, “Thus must you advance and thus retreat; thus look at or away from objects; thus must the arm be stretched out or drawn back; thus are the inner and outer garment to be worn; thus is the bowl to be held, and when you have received sufficient food to sustain life, after self-examination, thus are you to partake of it, keeping guard over the door of the senses; in eating you are to

---

679 See also Divyāvadāna, p. 603.
680 [The Mahāmittavindajātaka is otherwise known as the Ja 439 Catudvārajātaka; it refers the reader to Ja 427 Gijjhajātaka, for the Introductory story, which I include here. I also include the opening of the story of the past, which is omitted from this retelling.] be moderate and exercise watchfulness; you are to recognize such and such duties towards monks who come to or go from the monastery; these are the fourteen sets of monastic duties, and the eighty great duties to be duly performed; these are the thirteen ascetic practices; all these are to be scrupulously performed.” Yet was he disobedient and impatient, and did not receive instruction respectfully, but refused to listen to them, saying: “I do not find fault with you. Why do you speak thus to me? I shall know what is for my good, and what is not.”

Then the monks, hearing of his disobedience, sat in the Dhamma Hall, telling of his faults. The Teacher came and asked them what it was they were discussing, and sent for the monk and said: “Is it true, monk, that you are disobedient?” And when he confessed that it was so, the Teacher said: “Why, monk, after being ordained in so excellent a dispensation that leads to safety, do you not listen to the voice of your well-wishers? Formerly too you disobeyed the voice of the wise, and were blown into atoms by the Veramba wind.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, there dwelt in Benares a merchant, whose wealth was eighty crores of money, having a son named Mittavindaka. The mother and father of this lad had entered upon the First Path, but he was wicked, an unbeliever.

When by and by the father was dead and gone, the mother, who in his stead managed their property, thus said to her son, “My son, the state of man is one hard to attain; give alms, practise virtue, keep the holy day, give ear to the Dhamma.” Then said he, “Mother, no almsgiving or such like for me; never name them to me; as I live, so shall I fare hereafter.” On a certain full-moon holy day, as he spoke in this fashion, his mother answered, “Son, this day is set apart as a high holy day. Today take upon you the holy day vows; visit the cloister, and all night long listen to the Dhamma, and when you come back I will give you a thousand pieces of money.”

For desire of this money the son consented. As soon as he had broken his fast he went to the monastery, and there he spent the day; but at night, to ensure that not one word of the Dhamma should reach his ear, he lay down in a certain place, and fell asleep. On the next day, very early in the morning, he washed his face, and went to his own house and sat down.

Now the mother thought within herself, “Today my son after hearing the Dhamma will come back early in the morning, bringing with him the elder who has preached the Dhamma.” So she made ready gruel, and food hard and soft, and prepared a seat, and awaited his coming. When she saw her son coming all alone, “Son,” said she, “why have you not brought the preacher with you?” “No preacher for me, mother!” says he. “Here then,” said the woman, “you drink this gruel.” “You promised me a thousand pieces, mother,” he says, “first give this to me, and afterward I will drink.” “Drink first, my son, and then you shall have the money.” Said he, “No, I will not drink till I get the money.” Then his mother laid before him a purse of a thousand pieces. And he drank the gruel, took the purse with a thousand pieces, and went about his business; and so thereafter, until in no long time he had gained two million.

Then it came into his mind that he would equip a ship, and do business with it. So he equipped a ship, and said to his mother, “Mother, I mean to do business in this ship.” Said she, “You are my only son, and in this house there is plenty of wealth; the sea is full of dangers. Do not go!” But he said: “Go I will, and you cannot prevent me.” “Yes, I will prevent you,” she answered, and took hold of his hand; but he thrust her hand away, and struck her down, and in a moment he was gone, and under way.

On the seventh day, because of Mittavindaka, the ship stood immovable upon the deep. Lots were cast, and thrice was the lot found in the hand of Mittavindaka. Then they gave him a raft; and saying: “Let not many perish for the sole sake of this one,” they cast him adrift upon the deep. In an instant the ship sprang forth with speed over the deep.

And he upon his raft came to a certain island. There in a crystal palace he espied four female spirits of the dead. They used to be in woe seven days and seven in happiness. In their company he experienced bliss divine. Then, when the time came for them to undergo their penance, they said: “Master, we are going to leave you for seven days; while we are gone, bide here, and be not distressed.” So saying they departed.
But he, full of longing, again embarked upon his raft, and passing over the ocean came to another isle; there in a palace of silver he saw eight other spirits. In the same way, he saw upon another island, sixteen in a palace all of jewels, and on yet another, thirty-two that were in a golden hall. With these, as before, he dwelt in divine blessedness, and when they went away to their penance, sailed away once more over the ocean; till at last he beheld a city with four gates, surrounded by a wall. That, they say, is the Ussada hell, the place where many beings, condemned to hell, endure their own deeds: but to Mittavindaka it appeared as though a beautiful city.

Now this Mittavindaka, when cast into the sea, showed himself very covetous, and going on to still greater excess came to the place of torment inhabited by beings doomed to hell. And he made his way into the Ussada hell, taking it to be a city, and there he got a wheel as sharp as a razor fixed upon his head. Then the Bodhisatta in the shape of a Devaputta went on a mission to Ussada. On seeing him, Mittavindaka repeated the first verse in the form of a question:

1. “What was the evil wrought by me,
   Thus to provoke the curse of heaven,
   That my poor head should ever be
   With circling wheel of torture riven?”

The Bodhisatta, on hearing this, uttered the second verse:

2. “Forsaking homes of joy and bliss,
   That decked with pearls, with crystal this,
   And halls of gold and silver sheen,
   What brought you to this gloomy scene?”

Then Mittavindaka replied in a third verse:

3. “Far fuller joys I there shall gain
   Than any these poor worlds can show.
   This was the thought that proved my bane
   And brought me to this scene of woe.”

The Bodhisatta then repeated the remaining verses:
4. “From four to eight, to sixteen thence, and so
To thirty-two insatiate greed does grow.
Thus on and on you, greedy soul, were led
Till doomed to wear this wheel upon your head.

5. So all, pursuing covetous desire,
Insatiate still, yet more and more require:
The broadening path of appetite they tread,
And, like you, bear this wheel upon their head” [3.137]

But while Mittavindaka was still speaking, the wheel fell upon him and crushed him, so that he could say no more. But the Devaputta returned straight to his celestial abode. {3.208}

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the unruly monk was Mittavindaka, and I myself was the Devaputta.”

Ja 370 Palāsajātaka

The Story about the Flame of the Forest (5s)

In the present 500 monks have wrong thoughts in the middle of the night and are reproved by the Buddha, who tells a story of a goose who warned a Tree Devatā not to tolerate a banyan seedling in his host tree, but was ignored and his home was eventually destroyed.

The Bodhisatta = the golden goose (suvaññahaṁsa).

Present Source: Ja 408 Kumbhakāra,
Quoted at: Ja 370 Palāsa, Ja 412 Koṭisimbali, Ja 459 Pānīya,
Present Compare: Ja 305 Silavīmaṁsana.

Keywords: Caution, Parasites, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“The goose said to the Flame of the Forest.” This was a story told by the Teacher, while residing at Jetavana, concerning overcoming wrong. The incident that led to the story will be set forth in the Paññājātaka [Ja 4590].

---

681 [This is evidently another name for Ja 459 Pānīyajātaka. I include the story here.]
This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about the subduing of evil passions.

At one time, we learn, five hundred citizens of Sāvatthi, being householders and friends of the Tathāgata, had heard the Dhamma and had renounced the world, and been ordained as monastics. Living in the house of the Golden Pavement, at midnight they indulged in thoughts of wrong.

The Teacher regards his disciples three times a night and three times a day, six times every night and day, as a jay guards her egg, or a yak-cow her tail, or a mother her beloved son, or a one-eyed man his remaining eye; so in the very instant he overcame wrong which was beginning. He was observing Jetavana on that midnight and knowing the monks' conduct and their thoughts, he considered, “This wrong among these monks if it grows will destroy the foundation for becoming an Arahat. I will this moment repudiate this wrong and show them how to become Arahats,” so leaving the perfumed chamber he called Ānanda, and bidding him collect all the monks dwelling in the place, he got them together and sat down on the seat prepared for Buddha.

At the command of the Fortunate One, the Saṅgha was assembled by the venerable Ānanda.

But on this occasion the Teacher addressing the monks said: “Monks, wrong ought to be regarded with suspicion. Though it be as small as a banyan shoot, it may prove fatal. Sages of old too suspected whatever was open to suspicion.” And with this he related a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a golden gosling, and when he came to be a full-grown goose, he lived in a golden cave, in the Cittakūṭa mountain in the Himālayas region, and used to go constantly and eat the wild paddy that grew on a natural lake. On the way by which he went to and fro was a big Flame of the Forest. Both in going and returning, he would always stop and rest there. So a friendship sprang up between him and the Devatā that dwelt in that tree. By and by a certain fowl, after eating the ripe fruit of a banyan, came and perched on the Flame of the Forest, and dropped its excrement into the fork of it. Thence there sprang up a young banyan, which grew to the height of four inches and was bright with red shoots and greenery. The royal goose, on seeing this, addressed the guardian deity of the tree and said: “My good friend, every tree on which a banyan shoot springs up is destroyed by its growth. Do not suffer this to grow, or it will destroy your place of abode. Go back at once, and root it up and throw it away. One ought to suspect that which justifies suspicion.” And thus conversing with the Tree Devatā the goose uttered the first verse: [3.138] [3.209]

1. “The goose said to the Flaming tree, 682
   A banyan shoot is threatening you:
   What you do in your bosom rear
   Will rend you limb from limb, I fear.”

On hearing this the Tree Devatā, not heeding his words, repeated the second verse:

2. “Well! Let it grow, and should I be
   A refuge to the banyan tree,
   And tend it with a parent’s love,
   It will to me a blessing prove.”

Then the goose uttered the third verse:

3. “It is a cursed shoot, I fear,
   You do within your bosom rear.
   I say goodbye and off I flee,
   This growth, alas, misliketh me.”

With these words the royal goose spread out his wings and made straight for mount Cittakūṭa. Thenceforth he did not come back any more. By and by the banyan shoot grew up. This tree also had its guardian deity. And in its growth, it broke down the Flame of the Forest, and with a branch the abode of the Tree Devatā also fell. At this moment reflecting on the words of the royal goose, the Tree Devatā thought, {3.210} “The king of the geese foresaw this danger in the future and warned me of it, but I did not hearken unto his words.” And thus lamenting, he uttered the fourth verse:

682 [Butea Frondosa, Flame of the Forest.]
4. “A spectre grim like Meru’s height
Has brought me to a fearful plight;
Scorning the words friend gosling said,
I now am overwhelmed with dread.”

Thus did the banyan, as it grew up, break down all the Flame of the Forest and reduce it to a mere stump, and the dwelling place of the Tree Devatā wholly disappeared.

5. “Wise men abhor the parasitic thing
That chokes the form to which it loves to cling.
The wise, suspecting danger from the weed,
Destroy the root before it comes to seed.”

This was the fifth verse, spoken after Fully Awakening.

The Teacher here, his lesson ended, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths five hundred monks became Arahats, “At that time I myself was the golden goose.”

Ja 371 Dīghitikosalajātaka

The Story about (King) Dīghiti of Kosala (5s)

In the present two sets of monks fall into a dispute over a disciplinary matter, and although rebuked by the Buddha continue with it. The Buddha tells a story of a prince whose parents were killed by a foreign king. Later, when he had his enemy at his mercy, he remembered his father’s teaching, and forgave him.

The Bodhisatta = prince Dīghāvu (Dīghāvukumāro), members of the royal family = the mother and father (mātāpitaro).

Present Source: Ja 428 Kosambī,
Quoted at: Ja 371 Dīghitikosalajātaka,
Present Compare: Vin Mv 10 (1.342), Dhp-a I.5 Kosambaka.

Keywords: Quarrels, Forgiveness.

“You are within my power.” [3.139] {3.211} This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning some quarrelsome folk from Kosambī. When they came to Jetavana, the Teacher addressed them at the time of their reconciliation and said: “Monks, you are my lawful sons in the faith, begotten by the words of my mouth. Children ought not to trample under foot the counsel given them by their father, but you follow not my admonition. Sages of old, when the men who had slain their parents and seized upon their kingdom fell into their hands in the forest, did not put them to death, though they were confirmed rebels, but they said: “We will not trample on the counsel given us by our parents.” And hereupon he related a story of the past. In this Jātaka both the incident that led up to the story and the story itself will be fully set forth in the Saṅghabhededakajātaka [Ja 428].

This story the Teacher, while dwelling in the Ghosita park near Kosambī, told concerning certain quarrelsome folk at Kosambī. The incident that led to the story is to be found in The Section with the Vinaya relating to Kosambī. Here is a short summary of it. At that time, it is said, two monks lived in the same house, the one versed in the Vinaya, the other in the Suttas. The latter of these one day having occasion to visit the lavatory went out leaving the surplus water for rinsing the mouth in a vessel. Afterwards the one versed in the Vinaya went in and seeing the water came out and asked his companion if the water had been left there by him. He answered, “Yes, sir.” “What! Do you not know that this is wrong?” “No, I was not aware of it.” “Well, monk, it is wrong.” “Then I will atonement for it.” “But if you did it inadvertently and heedlessly, it is not wrong.” So he became as one who saw no wrong in what was wrongful.

The Vinaya scholar said to his pupils, “This Sutta scholar, though falling into wrong, is not aware of it.” They on seeing the other monk’s pupils said: “Your master though falling into wrong does not recognize its wrongfulness.” They went and told their master. He said: “This Vinaya scholar before said it was no wrong, and now he says it is wrong: he speaks falsely.” They went and told the others, “Your master speaks falsely.” Thus they stirred up a quarrel, one with another. Then the Vinaya scholar, finding an opportunity, went through the form of suspension of the monk for refusing to see his offence. Thenceforth even the laymen who provided necessaries for the monks were divided into two factions.

[This is evidently another name for Ja 428 Kosambijātaka. I include the Introductory story here, but the past life story there does not lead up to the following incident, so I include the story from Horner and Brahmāli’s translation of the Vinaya story as told in Mv 10. Note the Vinaya style is very different.]
The nuns too that accept their admonitions, and tutelary gods, with their friends and intimates and deities from those that rest in space to those of the Brahmā World, even all such as were unconverted, formed two parties, and the uproar reached to the abode of the Akaniṭṭha gods.

Then a certain monk drew near to the Tathāgata, and announced the view of the suspending side who said: “The man is legally suspended,” and the view of the followers of the suspended one, who said: “He is illegally suspended,” and the practice of those who though forbidden by the suspending side, still gathered round in support of him. The Fortunate One said: “There is a schism, yes, a schism in the Saṅgha,” and he went to them and pointed out the misery involved in suspension to those that suspended, and the misery following upon the concealment of the wrong to the opposite party, and so departed.

Again when they were holding the Uposatha and similar services in the same place, within the boundary, and were quarrelling in the refectory and elsewhere, he laid down the rule that they were to sit down together, one by one from each side alternately. And hearing that they were still quarrelling in the monastery he went there and said: “Enough, monks, let us have no quarrelling.” And one of the heretical side, not wishing to annoy the Fortunate One, said: “Let the Fortunate One, the master of the Dhamma, dwell quietly at ease, enjoying the bliss he has already obtained in this life. We shall make ourselves notorious by this quarrelling, altercation, disputing and contention.”

[The king of Benares, Brahmadatta, has killed prince Dīghāvu’s parents, king Dīghiti of Kosala and his queen.]

Then, monks, prince Dīghāvu, having gone to a jungle, having cried and wept, having dried his tears, having entered Benares, having gone to an elephant stable near the king’s palace, spoke thus to the elephant trainer, “I want to learn the craft, teacher.” He said: “Well then, my good youngster, learn it.” Then, monks, prince Dīghāvu, rising in the night towards dawn, sang in a sweet voice in the elephant stable and played the lute. And monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, rising in the night towards dawn heard the singing in the sweet voice and the lute-playing in the elephant stable; having heard, he asked the people, “Who, good sirs, rising in the night towards dawn, was singing in a sweet voice and playing a lute in the elephant stable?”
“Sire, a youngster, a pupil of such and such an elephant trainer, rising in the night towards dawn, was singing in a sweet voice and playing a lute in the elephant stable.” He said: “Well then, good sirs, bring that youngster along.”

And, monks, these people, having answered, “Yes, sire,” in assent to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, brought along prince Dīghāvu. The king said: “Did you, my good youngster, rising… sing in a sweet voice and play a lute in the elephant stable?” “Yes, sire,” he said. “Well, then, do you, my good youngster, sing and play the lute before me.” And, monks, prince Dīghāvu, having answered, “Yes, sire,” in assent to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, longing for success, sang in a sweet voice and played the lute. Then, monks, Brahmadatta the king of Kāsi, spoke thus to prince Dīghāvu, “Do you, my good youngster, attend on me.” Then, monks, prince Dīghāvu answered, “Yes, sire,” in assent to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi. Then, monks, prince Dīghāvu became an earlier riser than Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, he lay down later, he was a willing servant, eager to please, speaking affectionately. Then, monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, soon established prince Dīghāvu in a confidential position of trust.

Then, monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, spoke thus to prince Dīghāvu, “Well now, good youngster, harness a chariot, I will go out hunting.” And, monks, prince Dīghāvu having answered, “Yes, sire,” in assent to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, having harnessed a chariot, spoke thus to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, “A chariot is harnessed for you, sire; for this you may think it is now the right time.” Then, monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, mounted the chariot, prince Dīghāvu drove the chariot, and he drove the chariot in such a manner that the army went by one way and the chariot by another. Then, monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, having gone far, spoke thus to prince Dīghāvu, “Well now, good youngster, unharness the chariot; as I am tired I will lie down.” And, monks, prince Dīghāvu having answered, “Yes, sire,” in assent to Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, having unharnessed the chariot, sat down cross-legged on the ground. Then, monks, Brahmadatta, the king of Kāsi, lay down having laid his head on prince Dīghāvu’s lap, and because he was tired he fell asleep at once.

Now prince Dīghāvu, having found the king of Benares lying on his side in the forest, seized him by his top-knot and said: “Now will I cut into fourteen pieces the marauder who slew my father and mother.” And at the very moment when he was brandishing his sword, he recalled the advice given him by his parents and he thought: “Though I should sacrifice my own life, I will not trample under foot their counsel. I will content myself with frightening him.” And he uttered the first verse:

1. “You are within my power, O king,
   As prone you liest here:
   What stratagem have you to bring Deliverance from your fear?”

Then the king uttered the second verse:

2. “Within your power, my friend, I lie
   All helpless on the ground,
   Nor know I any means whereby
   Deliverance may be found.” [3.212]

Then the Bodhisatta repeated the remaining verses:

3. “Good deeds and words alone, not wealth, O king,
   In hour of death can any comfort bring.

4. This man abused me, that struck me a blow,
   A third o’ercame and robbed me long ago.
   All such as harbour feelings of this kind,
   To mitigate their wrath are ne’er inclined.

5. He did abuse and buffet me of yore,
   He overcame me and oppressed me sore. [3.140]
   They who such thoughts refuse to entertain,
   Appease their wrath and live at one again.

6. Not hate, but love alone makes hate to cease:
   This is the everlasting law of peace.”

After these words the Bodhisatta said: “I will not do you a wrong, sire. But do you slay me.” And he placed his sword in the king’s hand. The king too said: “Neither will I wrong you.” And he swore an oath, and went with him to the city, and presented him to his councillors and said: “This, sirs, is prince Dīghāvu, the son of the king of Kosala. He has spared my life. [3.213] I may not do him any harm.”

---

684 Dhp v. 3-5.
And so saying he gave him his daughter in marriage, and established him in the kingdom that had belonged to his father. Thenceforth the two kings reigned happily and harmoniously together.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “The father and mother of those days are now members of the royal household, and prince Dīghāvu was myself.”

Ja 372 Migapotakajātaka

The Story about the Young Deer (who Died) (5s)

In the present one old monk has a novice to help him. But when the novice dies he is inconsolable. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic who brought up a young deer, and the advice he received from Sakka when it died.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
the novice = the deer (miga),
the old monk = the ascetic (tāpasa).

Past Compare: Ja 372 Migapotaka, Ja 410 Somadatta.

Keywords: Grief, Wisdom, Animals.

“To sorrow for the dead.” This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told about a certain elder. It is said that he admitted a youth to orders, and that this novice, after ministering to him zealously, by and by fell sick and died. The old man overcome with grief at the youth’s death went about loudly lamenting. The monks, failing to console him, raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “A certain old man on the death of his novice goes about lamenting. By dwelling on the thought of death, he will surely become a castaway.” When the Teacher came, he inquired of the monks what was the subject they had met to discuss, and on hearing what it was he said: “Not only now, but formerly also, the old man went about lamenting, when this youth died.” And with this he related a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the form of Sakka. At that time a man, who lived in the kingdom of Kāsi, came into the Himālayas region, and [3.141] adopting the life of an ascetic lived on wild fruits. One day he found in the forest a young deer that had lost its mate. He took it home to his hermitage, and fed and cherished it. The young deer grew up a handsome and comely beast, and the ascetic took care of it and treated it as his own child. One day the young deer died of indigestion from a surfeit of grass. The ascetic went about lamenting and said: “My child is dead.” Then Sakka, king of heaven, exploring the world, saw that ascetic, and thinking to alarm him, he came and took his stand in the air and uttered the first verse:

1. “To sorrow for the dead does ill become
   The lone ascetic, free from ties of home.”

The ascetic no sooner heard this than he uttered the second verse:

2. “Should man with beast consort, O Sakka, grief
   For a lost playmate finds in tears relief.”

Then Sakka repeated two verses:

3. “Such as to weep are fain may still lament the dead,
   Weep not, O sage, ’tis vain to weep, the wise have said.

4. If by our tears we might prevail against the grave,
   Thus would we all unite our dearest ones to save.”

While Sakka was thus speaking, the ascetic recognising that it was useless to weep, and singing the praises of Sakka, repeated three verses:

5. “As ghee-fed flame that blazes out amain
   Is quenched with water, so he quenched my pain.

6. With sorrow’s shaft my heart was wounded sore:
   He healed my wound and did my life restore.

7. The barb extracted, full of joy and peace,
   At Sakka’s words I from my sorrow cease.”

After thus admonishing the ascetic, Sakka departed to his own place of abode.

---

685 These verses are to be found in No. 352 supra, and in No. 410 infra. [As can be seen the verses exceed the expected count of five.]
The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the old man was the ascetic, the novice was the deer, and I myself was Sakka.”

Ja 373 Mūsikajātaka

The Story about the (Biting) Mouse (5s)

In the present the king of Kosala’s queen has a longing to drink the king’s blood while pregnant. Despite the queen trying to miscarry the child, the king preserved the life of the child who would eventually kill him. The Buddha tells a story about a prince who wanted to kill his father, but was warded off by verses the king’s teacher had given him in foresight.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo).

Present Source: Ja 338 Thusa,
Quoted at: Ja 373 Mūsika.

Keywords: Murder, Patricide, Foresight.

“People cry, ‘Where is she gone.’” [3.142] This story the Teacher, while residing in the Bamboo Grove, told about Ajātasattu. The incident that led to the story has already been fully told in the Thusajātaka [Ja 338].

At the time of his conception there arose in his mother, the daughter of the king of Kosala, a chronic longing to drink blood from the right knee of (her husband) king Bimbisāra. Being questioned by her attendant ladies, she told them how it was with her. The king too hearing of it called his astrologers and said: “The queen is possessed of such and such a longing. What will be the issue of it?” The astrologers said: “The child conceived in the womb of the queen will kill you and seize your kingdom.” “If my son,” said the king, “should kill me and seize my kingdom, what is the harm of it?” And then he had his right knee opened with a sword and letting the blood fall into a golden dish gave it to the queen to drink. She thought: “If the son that is born of me should kill his father, what care I for him?” and endeavoured to bring about a miscarriage. The king hearing of it called her to him and said: “My dear, it is said, my son will slay me and seize my kingdom. But I am not exempt from old age and death: suffer me to behold the face of my child. Henceforth act not after this manner.” But she still went to the garden and acted as before. The king on hearing of it forbade her visits to the garden, and when she had gone her full time she gave birth to a son. On his naming-day, because he had been his father’s enemy, while still unborn, they called him prince Ajātassattu.

As he grew up with his princely surroundings, one day the Teacher accompanied by five hundred monks came to the king’s palace and sat down. The assembly of the monks with Buddha at their head was entertained by the king with choice food, both hard and soft. And after saluting the Teacher the king sat down to listen to the Dhamma. At this moment they dressed up the young prince and brought him to the king. The king welcomed the child with a strong show of affection and placed him on his lap, and fondling the boy with the natural love of a father for his child, he did not listen to the Dhamma.

Here too the Teacher observed the king at the same moment playing with his boy and also listening to the Dhamma. And knowing as he did that danger to the king will arise through his son, he said: “Sire, kings of old suspected what was open to suspicion, and kept their heirs in confinement, saying: “Let them bear rule, after our bodies have been burned on the funeral pyre.” And with this he told a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family, and became a world-famed teacher. The son of the king of Benares, prince Yava, by name, after applying himself diligently to acquire all the liberal arts from him, being now anxious to depart, bade him good-bye. The teacher, knowing by his power of divination that danger would befall the prince through his son, considered how he might remove this danger from him, and began to look about him for an apt illustration. {3.216}

Now he had at this time a horse, and a sore place appeared on its foot. And in order to give proper attention to the sore the horse was kept to the stable. Now close by was a well. And a mouse used to venture out of its hole and nibble the sore place on the horse’s foot. The horse could not stop it, and one day being unable to bear the pain, when the mouse came to bite him, he struck it dead with his hoof and kicked it into the well. The grooms not seeing the mouse said: “On other days the mouse came and bit the sore place, but now it is not to be seen. What has become of it?” The Bodhisatta witnessed the whole thing and said: “Others from not knowing ask, ‘Where is the mouse?’ But I alone know that the mouse has been killed by the horse, and dropped into the well.” And making this very fact an illustration, he composed the first verse and gave it to the young prince.

Looking about for another illustration, he saw that same horse, when the boil was healed, go out and make his way to a barley field to get some barley to eat, and thrust his head through a hole in the fence, and taking this as an illustration he composed a second verse and gave it to the prince. But the third verse he composed by his own mother-wit and gave this also to him. And he said: “My friend, when you are established in the kingdom, as you go in the evening to the bathing tank, walk as far as the front of the staircase, repeat the first verse, and as you enter the palace in which you dwell, walk to the foot of the stairs, repeat the second verse, and as you go thence to the top of the stairs, repeat the third verse.” And with these words he dismissed him.

The young prince returned home and acted as viceroy, and on his father’s death he became king. An only son was born to him, and when he was sixteen years old he was eager to be king. And being minded to kill his father, he said to his retainers, “My father is still young. When I come to look upon his funeral pyre I shall be a worn-out old man. What good will it be for me to come to the throne then?” “My lord,” they said, “it is out of the question for you to go to the frontier and play the rebel. You must find some way or other to slay your father, and to seize upon his kingdom.” He readily agreed, and went in the evening, and took his sword and stood in the king’s palace near the bathing tank, prepared to kill his father. The king in the evening sent a female slave called Mūsikā, saying: “Go and cleanse the surface of the tank. I shall take a bath.” She went there and while she was cleaning the bath she caught sight of the prince. Fearing that what he was about might be revealed, he cut her in two with his sword and threw the body into the tank. The king came to bathe. Everybody said: “Today the slave Mūsikā does not return. Where and whither is she gone?” The king went to the edge of the tank, repeating the first verse:

1. “People cry, ‘Where is she gone?
Mūsikā, where have you fled?
This is known to me alone:
In the well she lieth dead.’”

Thought the prince, “My father has found out what I have done.” And being panic-stricken he fled and told everything to his attendants. After the lapse of seven or eight days, they again addressed him and said: “My lord, if the king knew he would not be silent. What he said must have been a mere guess. Put him to death.” So one day he stood sword in hand at the foot of the stairs, and when the king came he was looking about for an opportunity to strike him. The king came repeating the second verse:

2. “Like a beast of burden still
   You do turn and turn about,
   You that Mūsikā\textsuperscript{686} did kill,
   Fain would Yava eat, I doubt.”[3.144] [3.218]

Thought the prince, “My father has seen me,” and fled in terror. But at the end of a fortnight he thought: “I will kill the king by a blow from a shovel.” So he took a spoon-shaped instrument with a long handle and stood poising it. The king climbed to the top of the stair, repeating the third verse:

3. “You are but a weakling fool,
   Like a baby with its toy,
   Grasping this long spoon-like tool,
   I will slay you, wretched boy.”

That day being unable to escape, he grovelled at the king’s feet and said: “Sire, spare my life.” The king after berating him had him bound in chains and cast into prison. And sitting on a magnificent royal seat shaded by a white parasol, he said: “Our teacher, a far-famed brahmin foresaw this danger to us, and gave us these three verses.” And being highly delighted, in the intensity of his joy he uttered this exalted utterance:

4. “I am not free by dwelling in the sky,
   Nor by some act of filial piety.
   Nay when my life was sought by this my son,
   Escape from death through power of verse was won.

\textsuperscript{686}\textit{Mūsikā} means mouse, \textit{Yava}, barley.
5. Knowledge of every kind he apt to learn,
And what it all may signify discern:
Though you should use it not, the time will be
When what you hearest may advantage you.”  [3.219]

By and by on the death of the king the young prince was established on the throne.

The Teacher here brought his lesson to a close, and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the far-famed teacher was myself.”

Ja 374 Culladhanuggahajātaka

The Story about the Little Archer (5s)

Alternative Title: Cūladhanuggahajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is discontent and thinks to leave the monastic life. The Buddha tells him a story of a young man who was betrayed by his wife, who had taken a fancy to another, and how her new lover, sensing her fickleness, deserted her. Sakka then takes the form of a jackal and teaches her a lesson.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
the dissatisfied monk = the archer (dhanuggaha),
his former wife = the woman (itthī).

Past Compare: Ja 374 Culladhanuggaha, Ja 425 Aṭṭhāna.

Keywords: Betrayal, Women, Animals.

“Since you have gained.” This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, about the temptation of a monk by the wife of his unregenerate days. When the monk confessed that it was owing to the wife [3.145] he had left, that he regretted having taken orders, the Teacher said: “Not only now, monk, did this woman do you a mischief. Formerly too it was owing to her that your head was cut off.” And at the request of the monks he related a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was reborn as Sakka. At that time a certain young brahmin of Benares acquired all the liberal arts at Taxila, and having attained to proficiency in archery, he was known as the wise Little Archer. Then his master thought: “This youth has acquired skill equal to my own,” and he gave him his daughter to wife. He took her and wishing to return to Benares he set out on the road.

---

687 See Tibetan Tales, xii., Susroṇi.

Half way on his journey, an elephant laid waste a certain place, and no man dared to ascend to that spot. The wise Little Archer, though the people tried to stop him, took his wife and climbed up to the entrance of the forest. Then when he was in the midst of the wood, the elephant rose up to attack him. The Archer wounded him in the forehead with an arrow, which piercing him through and through came out at the back of his head, and the elephant fell down dead on the spot.

The wise Archer after making this place secure, went on further to another wood. And there fifty robbers were infesting the road. Up to this spot too, though men tried to stop him, he climbed till he found the regular place, where the robbers killed the deer and roasted and ate the venison, close to the road. The robbers, seeing him approach with his gaily attired wife, made a great effort to capture him. The robber chief, being skilled in reading a man’s character, just gave one look at him, and recognizing him as a distinguished hero, did not suffer them to rise up against him, though he was single-handed. The wise Archer sent his wife to these robbers, saying: “Go and bid them give us a spit of meat, and bring it to me.” So she went and said: “Give me a spit of meat.” The robber chief said: “He is a noble fellow,” and bade them give it her. The robbers said: “What! Is he to eat our roast meat?” And they gave her a piece of raw meat. The Archer, having a good opinion of himself, was angry with the robbers for offering him raw meat. The robbers said: “What! Is he the only man, and are we merely women?” And thus threatening him, they rose up against him. The Archer wounded and struck to the ground fifty robbers save one with the same number of arrows. He had no arrow left to wound the robber chief. There had been full fifty arrows in his quiver. With one of them he had wounded the elephant, and with the rest the fifty robbers save one. So he knocked down the robber chief, and sitting on his chest bade his wife bring him his sword in her hand to cut off his head. At that very moment she conceived a passion for the robber chief and placed the hilt of the sword in his hand and the sheath in that of her husband. The robber grasping the hilt drew out the sword, and cut off the head of the Archer. After slaying her husband he took the woman with him, and as they journeyed together he inquired of her origin. “I am the daughter,” she said, “of a world-famed teacher at Taxila.”

“How did he get you for his wife?” he said. “My father,” she said, “was so pleased at his having acquired from him an art equal to his own, that he gave me to him to wife. And because I fell in love with you, I let you kill my lawful husband.”

Thought the robber chief, “This woman now has killed her lawful husband. As soon as she sees some other man, she will treat me too after the same sort. I must get rid of her.”

And as he went on his way, he saw their path cut off by what was usually a poor little shallow stream, but which was now flooded, and he said: “My dear, there is a savage crocodile in this river. What are we to do?”

“My lord,” she said, “take all the ornaments I wear, and make them into a bundle in your upper robe, and carry them to the further side of the river, and then come back and take me across.”

“Very well,” he said, and took all her ornaments, and going down to the stream, like one in great haste, he gained the other bank, and left her and fled.

On seeing this she cried, “My lord, you go as if you were leaving me. Why do you do this? Come back and take me with you.” And addressing him she uttered the first verse:

1. “Since you have gained the other side,
   With all my goods in bundle tied,
   Return as quickly as may be
   And carry me across with thee.”

The robber, on hearing her, as he stood on the further bank, repeated the second verse: 688

---

688 This verse occurs in No. 318 supra, with which this story may be compared.
2. “Your fancy, lady, ever roves
   From well-tried faith to lighter loves, {3.222}
   Me too you would before long betray,
   Should I not hence flee far away.”

But when the robber said: “I will go further hence: you stop where you are,” she screamed aloud, and he fled with all her ornaments. Such was the fate that overtook the poor fool through excess of passion. And being quite helpless she drew near to a clump of cassia plants and sat there weeping. At that moment Sakka, looking down upon the world, saw her smitten with desire and weeping for the loss of both husband and lover. [3.147]

And thinking he would go and rebuke her and put her to shame, he took with him Mātali and Pañcasikha, and went and stood on the bank of the river and said: “Mātali, do you become a fish, Pañcasikha, you change into a bird, and I will become a jackal. And taking a piece of meat in my mouth, I will go and place myself in front of this woman, and when you see me there, you, Mātali, are to leap up out of the water, and fall before me, and when I shall drop the piece of meat I have taken in my mouth, and shall spring up to seize the fish, at that moment, you, Pañcasikha, are to pounce upon the piece of meat, and to fly up into the air, and you, Mātali, are to fall into the water.”

Thus did Sakka instruct them. And they said: “Very good, my lord.” Mātali was changed into a fish, Pañcasikha into a bird, and Sakka became a jackal. And taking a piece of meat in his mouth, he went and placed himself in front of the woman. The fish leaping up out of the water fell before the jackal. The jackal dropping the piece of meat he held in his mouth, sprang up to catch the fish. The fish jumped up and fell into the water, and the bird seized the piece of meat and flew up into the air. The jackal thus lost both fish and meat and sat sulkily looking towards the clump of cassia. The woman seeing this said: “Through being too covetous, he got neither flesh nor fish,” {3.223} and, as if she saw the point of the trick, she laughed heartily.

The jackal, on hearing this, uttered the third verse:

689 His charioteer and a Gandhabba.
3. “Who makes the cassia thicket ring
   With laughter, though none dance or sing,
   Or clap their hands, good time to keep?
   Fair one, laugh not, when you should weep.”

On hearing this, she repeated the fourth verse:

4. “O silly jackal, you must wish
   You had not lost both flesh and fish.
   Poor fool! Well may you grieve to see
   What comes of your stupidity.”

Then the jackal repeated the fifth verse:

5. “Another’s faults are plainly seen,
   ’Tis hard to see one’s own, I ween.
   I think you too must count the cost,
   When spouse and lover both are lost.” [3.224]

On hearing his words she spoke this verse:

6. “King jackal, ’tis just as you say,
   So I will go me far away,
   And seek another wedded love
   And strive a faithful wife to prove.” [3.148]

Then Sakka, king of heaven, hearing the words of this vicious and unchaste woman, repeated the final verse:

7. “He that would steal a pot of clay
   Would steal a brass one any day:
   So she who was her husband’s bane
   Will be as bad or worse again.”

Thus did Sakka put her to shame and brought her to repent, and then returned to his own abode.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and revealed the Truths, and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk attained the fruit of the First Path: “At that time the discontented monk was the Archer, the wife he had left was that woman, and I myself was Sakka, king of heaven.”
The Section with Five Verses – 1324

Ja 375 Kapotajātaka
The Story about the Pigeon (5s)

In the present one monk is very greedy and goes from supporter to supporter collecting food. The Buddha tells how this monk was also greedy in a previous life when, as a crow, he deceived his friend the pigeon in order to get access to a kitchen, which he stole from. But there the cook caught and plucked him and left him to die.

The Bodhisatta = the pigeon (kapota), the covetous monk = the crow (kāka).

Past Compare: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 274 Lola, Ja 275 Rucira, Ja 375 Kapota.

Keywords: Greed, Deception, Animals, Birds.

“I feel quite well.” This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told concerning a greedy monk. This story of the greedy monk has already been fully told in diverse ways. In this case the Teacher asked him if he were greedy and on his confessing that it was so, said: “Not only now, but formerly also, monk, you were greedy, and through greed came by your death.” And herewith he told a story of the past. [3.225]

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young pigeon and lived in a wicker cage, in the kitchen of a rich merchant of Benares. Now a crow hankering after fish and flesh made friends with this pigeon, and lived in the same place. One day he caught sight of a lot of fish and meat and thought: “I'll have this to eat,” and lay loudly groaning in the cage. And when the pigeon said: “Come, my friend, let us sally out for our food,” he refused to go, saying: “I am laid up with a fit of indigestion. Do you go.” And when the pigeon was gone, he said: “My troublesome enemy is off. I will now eat fish and meat to my heart’s content.” And so thinking, he repeated the first verse:

1. “I feel quite well and at my ease,
Since Mister Pigeon off is gone.
My cravings I will now appease:
Potherbs and meat should strengthen one.”

So when the cook, who was roasting the fish and meat, came out of the kitchen, wiping away streams of sweat from his brow, the crow hopped out of his basket and hid himself in a basin of spices. The basin gave forth a ‘click’ sound, and the cook came in haste, and seizing the crow pulled out his feathers. And grinding some moist ginger and white mustard he pounded it with a rotten date, and smeared him all over with it, and rubbing it on with a potsherd he wounded the bird. Then he fastened the potsherd on his neck with a string, and threw him back into the basket, and went off.

When the pigeon came back and saw him he said: “Who is this crane lying in my friend’s basket? He is a hot-tempered fellow and will come and kill this stranger.” And thus jesting, he spoke the second verse:

2. “Child of the Clouds, with tufted crest,
   Why did you steal my poor friend’s nest?
   Come here, sir Crane. My friend the crow
   Has a hot temper, you must know.”

The crow, on hearing this, uttered the third verse:

3. “Well may you laugh at such a sight,
   For I am in a sorry plight.
   The cook has plucked and basted me
   With rotten dates and spicery.”

The pigeon, still making sport of him, repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Bathed and anointed well, I think,
   You have your fill of food and drink.
   Your neck so bright with jewel sheen,
   Have you, friend, to Benares been?”

Then the crow repeated the fifth verse:

---

690 Cranes are conceived at the sound of thunder-clouds. cf. Meghadūta 9.
5. “Let not my friend or bitterest foe
On visit to Benares go.
They plucked me bare and as a jest
Have tied a potsherd on my breast.” [3.227]

The pigeon hearing this repeated the final verse:

6. “These evil habits to outgrow
Is hard with such a nature, crow.
Birds should be careful to avoid
The food they see by man enjoyed.” [3.150]

After thus reproving him, the pigeon no longer dwelt there, but spread his wings and flew elsewhere. But the crow died then and there.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the greedy monk attained fruition of the Second Path. “At that time the crow was the greedy monk, the pigeon was myself.”
In the present one monk is going on a visit to the Buddha, and a ferryman who is angry with him ensures he gets a soaking. The Buddha tells a story of a ferryman who refused good advice and lost all he had.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the ferryman = the same in the past (nāvika).

Keywords: Anger, Self-control.

“Ne’er be angry.” [3.151] {3.228} The Teacher told this tale while dwelling at Jetavana, about a ferryman. This man, they say, was foolish and ignorant: he knew not the qualities of the Three Jewels and of all excellent beings: he was hasty, rough and violent. A certain country monk, wishing to wait on the Buddha, came one evening to the ferry on the Aciravatī and said to the ferryman, “Lay brother, I wish to cross, let me have your boat.” “Sir, it is too late, stay here.” “Lay brother, I cannot stay here, take me across.” The ferryman said angrily, “Come then, ascetic,” and took him into the boat: but he steered badly and made the boat ship water, so that the monk’s robe was wet, and it was dark before he put him on the farther bank. When the monk reached the monastery, he could not wait on the Buddha that day. Next day he went to the Teacher, saluted and sat on one side. The Teacher gave greeting and asked when he had come. “Yesterday.” “Then why do you not wait on me till today?” When he heard his reason, the Teacher said: “Not only now, but of old also that man was rough: and he annoyed wise men of old, as he did you.” And when asked he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. When he grew up, he was educated in all the arts at Taxila, {3.229} and became an ascetic. After living long on wild fruits in the Himālayas, he came to Benares for salt and vinegar: he stayed in the royal garden and next day went into the city to beg. The king saw him in the palace-yard and being pleased with his behaviour caused him to be brought in and fed: then he took a promise and made him dwell in the garden: and he came daily to pay respect. The Bodhisatta said to him, “O great king, a king should rule his kingdom with righteousness, eschewing the four evil courses, being zealous and full [3.152] of patience and kindness and compassion,” and with such daily exhortation he spoke two verses:

1. “Ne’er be angry, prince of warriors; ne’er be angry, lord of earth: Anger ne’er requite with anger: thus a king is worship-worth.

2. In the village, in the forest, on the sea or on the shore, Ne’er be angry, prince of warriors: ’tis my counsel evermore.”

So the Bodhisatta spoke these verses to the king every day. The king was pleased with him and offered him a village whose revenue was a hundred thousand pieces: but he refused. In this way the Bodhisatta lived for twelve years. Then he thought: “I have stayed too long, I will take a journey through the country and return here,” so without telling the king and only saying to the gardener, “Friend, I weary, I will journey in the country and return, pray do you tell the king,” (3.230) he went away and came to a ferry on the Ganges. There a foolish ferryman named Avāriyapitā lived: he understood neither the merits of good men nor his own gain and loss: when folk would cross the Ganges, he first took them across and then asked for his fare; when they gave him none, he quarrelled with them, getting much abuse and blows but little gain, so blind a fool was he.

Concerning him, the Teacher after Fully Awakening spoke the third verse:

3. “The father of Avāriya, His boat’s on Ganges wave: He ferries first the folk across, And then his fare he’ll crave: And that is why he earns but strife, A thriftless, luckless, cheat!”

The Bodhisatta came to this ferryman and said: “Friend, take me to the other bank.” He said: “Ascetic, what fare will you pay me?” “Friend, I will tell you how to increase your wealth, your welfare, and your virtue.” The ferryman thought: “He will certainly give me something,” so he took him across and then said: “Pay me the fare.” The Bodhisatta said: “Very well, friend,” and so telling him first how to increase his wealth, he spoke this verse:

---

691 [The first line of the second verse is also found at Dhp 98.]

4. “Ask your fare before the crossing, never on the further shore:
   Different minds have folk you ferry, different after and before.” [3.231]

The ferryman thought: “This will be only his admonition to me, now he will give me something else,” but the Bodhisatta said: “Friend, you have there the way to increase wealth, now hear the way to increase welfare and virtue,” so he spoke a verse of admonition:

5. “In the village, in the forest, on the sea, and on the shore,
   Ne'er be angry, my good boatman; 'tis my counsel evermore.” [3.153]

So having told him the way to increase welfare and virtue, he said: “There you have the way to increase welfare, and the way to increase virtue.” Then that stupid one, not reckoning his admonition as anything, said: “Ascetic, is that what you give me as my fare?” “Yes, friend.” “I have no use for it, give me something else.” “Friend, except that I have nothing else.” “Then why did you go on my boat?” he said, and threw the ascetic down on the bank, sitting on his chest and striking his mouth.

The Teacher said: “So you see that when the ascetic gave this admonition to the king he got the boon of a village, and when he gave the same admonition to a stupid ferryman he got a blow in the mouth: therefore when one gives this admonition it must be given to suitable people, not to unsuitable,” and so after Fully Awakening he then spoke a verse:

6. “For counsel good the king bestowed the revenue of a town:
   The boatman for the same advice has knocked the giver down.”

As the man was striking the ascetic, his wife came with his rice, and seeing the ascetic, she said: “Husband, this is an ascetic of the king’s court, do not strike him.” He was angry, and saying: “You forbid me to strike this false ascetic!” he sprang up and struck her down. The plate of rice fell and broke, and the fruit of her womb miscarried. The people gathered round him and [3.232] crying, “Murdering rascal!” they bound him and brought him to the king. The king tried him and caused him to be punished.

The Teacher after Fully Awakening explaining the matter spoke the last verse:

7. “The rice was spilt, his wife was struck, child killed before its birth, To him, like fine gold to a beast, counsel was nothing worth.”

When the Teacher had ended his lesson, he declared the Truths: after the Truths the brother was established in the fruit of the First Path: and he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the ferryman was the ferryman of today, the king was Ānanda, the ascetic was myself.”

Ja 377 Setaketujātaka (6s)
The Story about (the False Ascetic) Setaketu

In the present one monk gets his living in dishonest ways. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of a false ascetic who was angry with an outcaste, and how he was taught appearances do not equal deeds.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā), Sāriputta = the outcaste (outcaste), the deceitful monk = (the false ascetic) Setaketu.

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla, Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādippupaṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Anger, Fraud, False asceticism.

“Friend, be not angry.” The Teacher told this tale at Jetavana, of a deceitful monk. The occasion of the story will appear in the Uddālajātaka [Ja 487].

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a dishonest monk. This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past. [3.154]

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a far-famed teacher and taught the sacred texts to five hundred pupils. The senior of them, Setaketu by name, was born of a brahmin family from the north, and was very proud on account of his caste. One day he went out of the town with other pupils, and when coming in again he saw an outcaste. “Who are you?” he said. “I am an outcaste.” He feared the wind after striking the outcaste’s body might touch his own body, so he cried, “Curse you, you ill-omened outcaste, get to leeward,” and went quickly to windward, but the outcaste was too quick for him and stood to windward of him. Then he abused and reviled him the more, “Curse you, ill-omened one.” The outcaste asked, “Who are you?” “I am a brahmin student.” “Very well, if you are, you will be able to answer me a question.” “Yes.” “If you can’t, I will put you between my feet.” The brahmin, feeling confident, said: “Proceed.” The outcaste, making the company understand the case, asked the question, “Young brahmin, what are the quarters?” “The quarters are four, the east and the rest.” The outcaste said: “I am not asking about that kind of quarter: and you, ignorant even of this, loathe the wind that has struck my body,” so he took him by the shoulder and forcing him down put him between his feet. The other pupils told their teacher of the affair. He asked, “Young Setaketu, have you been put between an outcaste’s feet?” “Yes, teacher: the son of a slave put me between his feet, saying, ‘He doesn’t even know the quarters;’ but now I shall know what to do to him,” and so he reviled the outcaste angrily. The teacher admonished him, “Young Setaketu, be not angry with him, he is wise; he was asking about another kind of quarter, not this: what you have not seen, or heard, or understood is far more than what you have,” and he spoke two verses by way of admonition:

1. “Friend, be not angry, anger is not good:
Wisdom is more than you have seen or heard: {3.234}
By quarter parents may be understood,
And teacher is denoted by the word.
2. The householder who gives food, clothes and drink, Whose doors are open, he a quarter is:
   And quarter in the highest sense, we think,
   Is that last state where misery shall be bliss.”

So the Bodhisatta explained the quarters to the young brahmin: but he thinking:
“I was put between an outcaste’s feet,” left that place and going to Taxila learned all the arts from a far-famed teacher. With that teacher’s permission he left Taxila, and wandered learning all practical arts. Coming to a frontier village he found five hundred ascetics dwelling near it and was ordained by them. All their arts, texts and practices he learned, and they accompanied him to Benares.
Next day he went to the palace-yard begging. The king, pleased with the ascetics’ behaviour, gave them food in the palace and lodging in his garden. One day he said, sending them food, “I will salute your reverences this evening in the garden.”
Setaketu went to the garden and collecting the ascetics, said: “Sirs, the king is coming today; now by once conciliating kings a man may live happily all the years of his life, so now some of you do the swinging penance, some lie on thorn-beds, some endure the five fires, some practise the mortification by squatting, some the act of diving, some repeat texts,” and after these orders he set himself at the door of the hut on a chair with a head-rest, put a book with a brilliant-coloured wrapping on a painted stand, and explained texts as they were inquired about by four or five intelligent pupils. At that moment the king arrived and seeing them doing these false penances he was delighted, he came up to Setaketu, saluted him and sat on one side; then talking to his family priest he spoke the third verse:

3. “With uncleansed teeth, and goatskin garb and hair
   All matted, muttering holy words in peace:
   Surely no human means to good they spare,
   They know the Truth, and they have won Release.”

The priest heard this and spoke the fourth verse:

---

692 This rests on fanciful puns on the names of the four quarters.
4. “A learned sage may do ill deeds, O king:
   A learned sage may fail to follow right:
   A thousand Vedas will not safety bring,
   Failing just works, or save from evil plight.”

When the king heard this, he took away his favour from the ascetics. Setaketu thought: “This king took a liking to the ascetics, but this priest has destroyed it as if he had cut it with an axe: I must talk to him,” so talking to him he spoke the fifth verse: [3.237]

5. “A learned sage may do ill deeds, O king:
   A learned sage may fail to follow right
   You say: ‘Then Vedas are a useless thing:
   Just works with self-restraint are requisite.’”

The priest hearing this, spoke the sixth verse:

6. “Nay, Vedas are not useless utterly:
   Though works with self-restraint true Dhamma is:
   Study of Vedas lifts man’s name on high,
   But ’tis by conduct that he reaches bliss.”

So the priest refuted Setaketu’s Dhamma. He made them all laymen, gave them shields and weapons, and appointed them to be attendants on the king as Superior Officers: and hence they say comes the lineage of Superior Officers.

After the lesson the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time Setaketu was the cheating monk, the outcaste was Sāriputta, and the king’s priest was myself.”

Ja 378 Darīmukhajātaka

The Story about (the Paccekabuddha) Darīmukha (6s)

In the present the monks talk about the Bodhisatta’s Great Renunciation. The Buddha tells a story in which he had previously renounced a kingdom owing to the instruction of his conatal, who had become a Paccekabuddha.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

---

693 cf. [Xuanzang’s] Life, p. 257.
The Section with Six Verses – 1334

Keywords: Renunciation, Friendship.

“Pleasures of sense.” {3.238} This tale was told by the Teacher while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the Great Renunciation. The incident that led to the story has been told before.594

...the future Buddha, making light of the kingdom of the world, thus within his reach – casting it away as one would saliva – left the city with great honour on the full-moon day of Āsāḷhi, when the moon was in the Uttarāsāḷha lunar mansion (i.e. on the [last day of the lunar month in] July).

For then, they say, Devas in front of him carried sixty thousand torches, and behind him too, and on his right hand, and on his left..

Advancing in this pomp and glory, the Bodhisatta, in that one night, passed beyond three kingdoms, and arrived, at the end of thirty leagues, at the bank of the river called Anomā.

Now the Bodhisatta, stopping at the river side, asked Channa, “What is this river called?”

“Its name, my lord, is Anomā.”

“And so also our renunciation of the world shall be called Anomā (Illustrious),” said he; and signalling to his horse, by pressing it with his heel, the horse sprang over the river, five or six hundred yards in breadth, and stood on the opposite bank.

The Bodhisatta, getting down from the horse’s back, stood on the sandy beach, extending there like a sheet of silver, and said to Channa, “Good Channa, do you now go back, taking my ornaments and Kanthaka. I am going to become an ascetic.”

“But I also, my lord, will become an ascetic.”

694 [Nidānakathā p. 61-65. I give an abbreviated version of it here.]
“You cannot be allowed to renounce the world, you must go back,” he said. Three times he refused this request of Channa's; and he delivered over to him both the ornaments and Kanthaka.

Then he thought: “These locks of mine are not suited for a mendicant. Now it is not right for any one else to cut the hair of a future Buddha, so I will cut them off myself with my sword.” Then, taking his sword in his right hand, and holding the plaited tresses, together with the diadem on them, with his left, he cut them off. So his hair was thus reduced to two inches in length, and curling from the right, it lay close to his head. It remained that length as long as he lived, and the beard the same. There was no need at all to shave either hair or beard any more.

The Bodhisatta, saying to himself, “If I am to become a Buddha, let it stand in the air; if not, let it fall to the ground;” threw the hair and diadem together as he held them towards the sky.

Again the Bodhisatta thought: “This my raiment of Benares muslin is not suitable for a mendicant.” Now the Deva Ghaṭikāra, who had formerly been his friend in the time of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, was led by his friendship, which had not grown old in that long interval, to think, “Today my friend is accomplishing the Great Renunciation, I will go and provide him with the requisites of a mendicant.”

273. “The three robes, and the alms bowl,
Razor, needle, and girdle,
And a water strainer – these eight
Are the wealth of the monk devout.”

Taking these eight requisites of a mendicant, he gave them to him. The Bodhisatta dressed himself in the outward signs of an Arahant, and adopted the sacred garb of Renunciation; and he enjoined upon Channa to go and, in his name, assure his parents of his safety. And Channa did homage to the Bodhisatta reverently, and departed.

In the past the Magadha king reigned in Rājagaha. The Bodhisatta was born of his chief queen, and they called him prince Brahmadatta. On the day of his birth, the family priest also had a son: his face was very beautiful, so they called him Darīmukha. Both grew up in the king’s court dear friends together, and in the sixteenth year they went to Taxila and learned all the arts.

Then, meaning to acquire all practical usages and understand country observances, they wandered through towns, villages and all the land. So they reached Benares, and staying in a temple they went into the city next day for alms. In one of the houses in the city the people of the house had cooked rice-porridge and prepared seats to feed brahmins and give them portions. These people seeing the two youths begging, thought: “The brahmins have come,” and making them come in laid a white cloth on the Bodhisatta’s seat and a red rug on Darīmukha’s. Darīmukha observed the omen and understood that his friend should be king in Benares and himself commander of the army. They ate and took their portions, and then with a blessing left and went to the king’s garden.

The Bodhisatta lay on the royal stone-seat. Darīmukha sat stroking his feet. The king of Benares had been dead seven days. The family priest had performed funeral rites and sent out the [3.157] festal carriage for seven days as there was no heir to the throne. This ceremony of the carriage will be explained in the Mahājanakajātaka [Ja 539].

This carriage left the city and reached the gate of the garden, [3.239] accompanied by an army of the four divisions and by the music of hundreds of instruments. Darīmukha, hearing the music, thought: “This carriage is coming for my friend, he will be king today and give me the commander’s place, but why should I be a layman? I will go away and become an ascetic,” so without a word to the Bodhisatta he went on one side and stood concealed. The ascetic stayed the carriage at the gate of the garden, and entering saw the Bodhisatta lying on the 695 “Cave-mouth”: perhaps “very beautiful” should be “very wide”.

696 [There it is described like this: ...having decorated the city and yoked four lotus-coloured horses to the festive chariot and spread a coverlet over them and fixed the five ensigns of royalty, they surrounded them with an army of four hosts. Now musical instruments are sounded in front of a chariot which contains a rider, but behind one which contains none; so the family priest, having bid them sound the musical instruments behind, and having sprinkled the strap of the carriage and the goad with a golden ewer, bade the chariot proceed to him who has merit sufficient to rule the kingdom.]
royal seat: observing the auspicious marks on his feet, he thought: “He has merit and is worthy to be king even of the four continents with two thousand islands around them, but what is his courage?” So he made all the instruments sound their loudest. The Bodhisatta woke and taking the cloth from his face he saw the multitude: then covering his face again he lay down for a little, and rising when the carriage stopped sat cross-legged on the seat. The ascetic resting on his knee said: “Lord, the kingdom falls to you.” “Why, is there no heir?” “No, lord.” “Then it is well,” and so he accepted, and they anointed him there in the garden. In his great glory he forgot Darīmukha.

He mounted the carriage and drove amid the multitude in solemn form round the city: then stopping at the palace-gate he arranged the places of the courtiers and went up to the terrace. At that instant Darīmukha seeing the garden now empty came and sat on the royal seat in the garden. A withered leaf fell before him. In it he came to see the principles of decay and death, grasped the three marks of existence, and making the earth re-echo with joy he entered on Paccekabodhi. At that instant the characteristics of a householder vanished from him, a bowl and robes created by Supernormal Powers fell from the sky and clave to his body, at once he had the eight requisites and the perfect behaviour of a centenarian monk, \cite{3.240} and by his Supernormal Powers he flew into the air and went to the cave Nandamūla\textsuperscript{697} in the Himālayas.

The Bodhisatta ruled his kingdom with righteousness, but the greatness of his glory infatuated him and for forty years he forgot Darīmukha. In the fortieth year he remembered him, and saying: “I have a friend named Darīmukha; where is he now?” he longed to see him. Thenceforth even in the harem and in the assembly he would say, “Where is my friend Darīmukha? I will give great honour to the man who tells me of his abode.” Another ten years passed while he remembered Darīmukha from time to time.

Darīmukha, though now a Paccekabuddha, after fifty years reflected and knew that his friend remembered him: and thinking: “He is now old and increased with sons and daughters, I will go and preach the Dhamma to him and ordain him,” he went by his Supernormal Powers through \cite[3.158]{3.158} the air, and lighting in the garden

\textsuperscript{697} This is specially the abode of paccekabuddhas.
he sat like a golden image on the stone seat. The gardener seeing him came up and asked, “Sir, whence come you?” “From the cave Nandamūlaka.” “Who are you?” “Friend, I am Darīmukha the Pacceka.” “Sir, do you know our king?” “Yes, he was my friend in my layman days.” “Sir, the king longs to see you, I will tell him of your coming.” “Go and do so.”

He went and told the king that Darīmukha was come and sitting on the stone-seat. The king said: “So my friend is come, I shall see him,” so he mounted his carriage and with a great retinue went to the garden and saluting the Paccekabuddha with kindly greeting he sat on one side. The Paccekabuddha said: “Brahmadatta, do you rule your kingdom with righteousness, never follow evil courses or oppress the people for money, and do good deeds with generosity?” (3.241) and after kindly greeting him, he said: “Brahmadatta, you are old, it is time for you to renounce pleasures, and be ordained,” so he preached the Dhamma and spoke the first verse:

1. “Pleasures of sense are but morass and mire:
The triply-rooted terror them I call.
Vapour and dust I have proclaimed them, sire:
Having gone forth you should forsake them all.” (3.242)

Hearing this, the king explaining that he was bound by desires spoke the second verse:

2. “Infatuate, bound and deeply stained am I,
Brahmin, with pleasures: fearful they may be,
But I love life, and cannot them deny:
Good works I undertake continually.” (3.243)

Then Darīmukha, though the Bodhisatta said: “I cannot be ordained,” did not reject him and exhorted him yet again:

3. “He who rejects the counsel of his friend,
Who pities him, and would avert his doom,
Thinking this world is better, finds no end,
Foolish, of long rebirths within the womb.
4. That fearful place of punishment is his,
Full of all filth, held evil by the good:
The greedy their desires can ne’er dismiss,
The flesh imprisons all the carnal brood.” \(\{3.244\}\)

So Darīmukha the Paccekabuddha showing the misery rising from conception and sustenance, to show next the misery of birth spoke a verse and a half:

5. “Covered with blood and with gross foulness stained,
All mortal beings issue from the birth:
Whate’er they touch thereafter is ordained
To bring them pain and sorrow on the earth.

6a. I speak what I have seen, not what I hear
From others: I remember times of old.” \([3.159] \{3.245\}\)

Now the Teacher after Fully Awakening said: “So the Paccekabuddha helped the king with good words,” and at the end spoke the remaining half-verse:

6b. “Darīmukha did to Sumedha’s\(^{698}\) ear Wisdom in many a verse sweet unfold.”

The Paccekabuddha, showing the misery of desires, making his words understood, said: “O king, be ordained or not, but anyhow I have told the wretchedness of desires and the blessings of ordination, be you zealous,” and so like a golden royal goose he rose in the air, and treading on clouds he reached the Nandamūlaka cave. The Great Being made on his head the salutations resplendent with the ten fingernails put together and bowing down stood till \([3.246]\) Darīmukha passed out of sight: then he sent for his eldest son and gave him the kingdom: and leaving desires, while a great multitude was weeping and lamenting, he went to the Himālayas and building a hut of leaves he was ordained as an ascetic: then in no long time he gained the Super Knowledges and Attainments and at his life’s end he went to Brahmā’s Realm.

\(^{698}\) If Sumedha is a proper name, this must be taken from another story: but it may mean merely “wise.”
The lesson ended, the Teacher declared the Truths: then many attained the First Path and the rest: and he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was myself.”

Ja 379 Nerujātaka
The Story about (Mount) Neru (6s)

In the present one virtuous monk goes to stay in a village, but the villagers abandon him for the sectarians. The Buddha tells a story of how two golden birds would not stay on Mount Neru which made all birds appear golden, as it made no discrimination in casting its lustre.

The Bodhisatta = the elder goose (jeṭṭhakahaṁsa), Ānanda = the younger goose (kaniṭṭhahaṁsa).

Keywords: Discrimination, Animals, Birds.

“Ravens and crows.” The Teacher told this tale in Jetavana concerning a certain monk. The story is that he got instruction in meditation from the Teacher and then went to a frontier village. There the people, pleased with his behaviour, fed him, built him a hut in the wood, and exacting a promise, made him live there, and gave him great honour. But they forsook him for the teachers of the permanence of matter, afterwards forsaking those for the sect who deny immortality, and those again for the sect of naked ascetics: for teachers of all these sects came among them in turn. So he was unhappy [3.160] among those people who knew not good and evil, and after the rains and the Invitation he went back to the Teacher, and at his request told him where he had stayed during the Rains Retreat and that he had been unhappy among people who knew not good and evil. The Teacher said: “Sages of old, even when born as beasts, stayed not a day among those who knew not good and evil, why have you done so?” and so he told the tale.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a golden goose. Along with his younger brother he lived on the hill Cittakūṭa and fed on wild paddy in the Himālayas. One day in their flight back to Cittakūṭa they saw the golden mountain Neru and settled on its summit. Around the 699 The festival at the end of the rains.

mountain dwell birds and beasts of various kinds for feeding ground: from the time of their coming to the mountain onwards they became golden of hue from its lustre. The Bodhisatta’s brother saw this, but being ignorant of the cause said:
“Now what is the cause here?” and so talking to his brother he spoke two verses:

1. “Ravens and crows, and we the best of birds,
   When on this mountain, all appear the same.

2. Mean jackals rival tigers and their lords,
   The lions: what can be the mountain's name?”

The Bodhisatta hearing this spoke the third verse:

3. “Noblest of Mountains, Neru is it hight,
   All animals are here made fair to sight.”

The younger one hearing this spoke the remaining three verses:

4. “Where’er the good find honour small or none,
   Or less than others, live not, but begone.

5. Dull and clever, brave and coward, all are honoured equally:
   Undiscriminating mountain, good men will not stay on you! [3.248]

6. Best, indifferent and meanest Neru does not separate, Undiscriminating Neru, we, alas, must leave you straight.”

With this they both flew up and went to Cittakūta.

After the lesson, the Teacher proclaimed the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the close of the Truths, that monk was established in the fruition of the First Path.
“At that time the younger goose was Ānanda, the elder was myself.”

Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka

The Story about (the Lotus-Born Maiden) Āsaṅkā (6s)

In the present one monk who ordains after his marriage gradually comes once again under his wife’s power. The Buddha tells how a king spent three years trying to find the name of an ascetic’s divine daughter, and eventually was united with her.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the dissatisfied monk = the king (of Benares) (rājā), his former wife = (the lotus-born maiden) Āsaṅkā.

Present Source: Ja 423 Indriyajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkājātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka.

Keywords: Temptation, Perseverance, Devas.

“The In heavenly garden.” [3.161] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling at Jetavana, concerning the temptation of a monk by his former wife. The occasion will appear in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423].

The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher’s preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery. So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left: she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him: taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food: when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now: we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country: be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life; send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

The Teacher found that the monk was discontent owing to thoughts of his wife, so he said: “Sir, this woman does you harm: formerly also for her sake you sacrificed an army of the four divisions and dwelt in the Himālayas three years in much misery,” so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family at a village of that country. When he grew up, he learned the arts \{3.249\} at Taxila, became an ascetic and reaching the Super Knowledges and Attainments lived on roots and fruits in the Himālayas.

At that time a being of perfect merit fell from the Heaven of the Thirty-Three and was conceived as a girl inside a lotus in a pool: and when the other lotuses grew old and fell, that one grew great and stood. The ascetic coming to bathe saw it and thought: “The other lotuses fall, but this one is grown great and stands; why is this?” So he put on his bathing-dress and crossed to it, then opening the lotus he saw the girl.

Feeling towards her as to a daughter he took her to his hut and tended her. When she came to sixteen years, she was beautiful, and in her beauty excelled the hue of man, but attained not the hue of gods. Sakka came to wait on the Bodhisatta. He saw the maiden, asked and was told the way in which she was found, and then asked, “What ought she to receive?” “A dwelling-place and supply of raiment, ornament and food, O sir.” He answered, “Very well, lord,” and created a crystal palace for her dwelling, made for her a bed, raiment and ornament, food and drink divine. The palace descended and rested on the ground when she was going up; when she had gone up it ascended and stayed in the air. She did various services to the Bodhisatta as she lived in the palace. A forester saw this and asked, “What is this person to you, lord?” “My daughter.” So he went to Benares and told the king, “O king, I have seen in the Himālayas a certain ascetic’s daughter of such beauty.” The king was caught by hearing this, and making the forester his guide he went with an army of the four divisions to that place, and pitching a camp he took the forester and his retinue of ministers and entered the hermitage. \[3.250\] He saluted the Bodhisatta and said: “Lord, women are a stain to the ascetic life; I will tend your daughter.” \[3.162\]

Now the Bodhisatta had given the maiden the name Āsaṅkā because she was brought to him by his crossing the water owing to his doubt (āsaṅkā), “What is in this lotus?” He did not say to the king directly, “Take her and go,” but said: “If you know this maiden’s name, O great king, take her and go.” “Lord, if you tell it, I shall know.” “I shall not tell it, but when you know it take her and depart.” The king agreed, and thenceforth considered along with his ministers, “What may be her name?” He put forward all names hard to guess and talked with the Bodhisatta, saying: “Such and such will be her name,” but the Bodhisatta said nay and refused him.

So a year passed while the king was considering. Lions and other beasts seized his elephants and horses and men, there was danger from snakes, danger from flies, and many died worn out with cold. The king said to the Bodhisatta, “What need have I of her?” and took his way. The maiden Āsaṅkā stood at an open crystal window. The king seeing her said: “We cannot find your name, live here in the Himālayas, we will depart.” “Great king, if you go you will never find a wife like me. In the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, in the Cittalatā garden, there is a creeper named Āsāvatī: in its fruit a divine drink is born, and they who drink of it once are intoxicated for four months and lie on a divine couch: it bears fruit once in a thousand years and the Devaputtas, though given to strong drink, \[3.251\] bear with their thirst for that divine drink saying: “We shall reap fruit from this,” and come constantly throughout the thousand years to watch the plant saying: “Is it well?” But you grow discontented in one year: he who wins the fruit of his hope is happy, be not discontented yet,” and so she spoke three verses:

1. “In heavenly garden grows Āsāvatī;
   Once in a thousand years, no more, the tree
   Bears fruit: for it the gods wait patiently.
2. Hope on, O king, the fruit of hope is sweet:
   A bird hoped on and never own’d defeat.

3. His wish, though far away, he won complete:
   Hope on, O king: the fruit of hope is sweet.”

The king was caught by her words: he gathered his ministers again and guessed at the name, making ten guesses each time till another year was past. But her name was not among the ten, and so the Bodhisatta refused him. Again the king said: “What need have I of her?” and took his way.

She showed herself at the window, and the king said: “You stay, we will depart.” [3.252] “Why depart, great king?” “I cannot find your name.” “Great king, why can you not find it? Hope is not without success; a crane staying on a hill-top won his wish: why can you not win it? Endure, great king. A crane had its feeding-ground in a lotus-pool, but flying up lit on a hill-top: he stayed there that day and next day thought: “I am happily settled on this hill-top: if without going down I stay here finding food and drinking water and so dwell this day, Oh, it [3.163] would be delightful.” That very day Sakka, king of heaven, had crushed the Asuras and being now lord in the heaven of the Thirty-Three was thinking: “My wishes have come to the pitch of fulfilment, is there any one in the forest whose wishes are unfulfilled?” So considering, he saw that crane and thought: “I will bring this bird’s wishes to the pitch of fulfilment,” not far from the crane’s place of perch there is a stream, and Sakka sent the stream in full flood to the hill-top: so the crane without moving ate fish and drank water and dwelt there that day; then the water fell and went away; so, great king, the crane won fruition of that hope of his, and why will you not win it? Hope on,” she said, with the rest of the verse.

The king, hearing her tale, was caught by her beauty and attracted by her words: he could not go away, but gathering his ministers, and getting a hundred names [3.253] spent another year in guessing with these hundred names. At the end of three years he came to the Bodhisatta and asked, “Will that name be among the hundred, lord?” “You do not know it, great king.” He saluted the Bodhisatta, and saying: “We will go now,” he took his way. The maiden Āsaṅkā again stood by a crystal window. The king saw her and said: “You stay, we will depart.” “Why, great king?” “You satisfy me with words, but not with love: caught by your sweet words I have spent here three years, now I will depart,” and he uttered these verses:
The Section with Six Verses – 1346

4. “You please me but with words and not in deed:
The scentless flower, though fair, is but a weed.

5. Promise fair without performance on his friends one throws away,
Never giving, ever hoarding: such is friendship's sure decay.

6. Men should speak when they will act, not promise what they cannot do:
If they talk without performing, wise men see them through and through.

7. My troops are wasted, all my stores are spent,
I doubt my life is spoilt: 'tis time I went.” [3.254]

The maiden Āsaṅkā hearing the king's words said: “Great king, you know my name, you have just said it; tell my father my name, take me and go,” so talking with the king, she said:

8. “Prince, you have said the word that is my name:
Come, king: my father will allow the claim.”

The king went to the Bodhisatta, saluted and said: “Lord, your daughter is named Āsaṅkā.” “From the time you know her name, take her and go, great king.” He saluted the Bodhisatta, and coming to the crystal palace he said: “Lady, your father has given you to me, come now.” “Come, great king, I will get my father’s leave,” she said, and coming down from the palace she saluted the Bodhisatta, got his consent and came to the king. The king took her to Benares and lived happily with her, increased with sons and daughters. The Bodhisatta continued in unbroken meditation and was reborn in the Brahmā Realm. [3.164]

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths, the monk was established in the Fruition of the First Path, “Āsaṅkā was the former wife, the king was the discontented monk, the ascetic was myself.”

Ja 381 Migālopajātaka
The Story about (the Vulture) Migālopa (6s)

In the present one newly ordained monk doesn’t like to carry out his duties and wants to go his own way. The Buddha tells how he was once a vulture who didn’t listen to his elders and was destroyed by his disobedience.
The Bodhisatta = (the vulture) Aparaṇṇa, the disobedient monk = (his son) Migālopa.

Past Compare: Ja 381 Migālopa, Ja 427 Gijjha.

Keywords: Disobedience, Willfulness, Animals, Birds.

“Your ways, my son.”
{3.255} The Teacher told this tale in Jetavana, of an unruly monk. The Teacher asked the monk, “Are you really unruly?” He said: “Yes, lord,” and the Teacher saying: “You are not unruly for the first time; formerly too through unruliness you did not the bidding of the wise and met your death by the Verambha winds,” told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a vulture by name Aparaṇṇa, and dwelt among a retinue of vultures in Gijjhapabbata (Vulture Mountain). His son, Migālopa by name, was exceedingly strong and mighty; he flew high above the reach of the other vultures. They told their king that his son flew very far. He called Migālopa, and saying: “Son, they say you fly too high: if you do, you will bring death on yourself,” spoke three verses:

1. “Your ways, my son, to me unsafe appear,
You soar too high, above our proper sphere.

2. When earth is but a square field to your sight,
Turn back, my son, and dare no higher flight.

3. Other birds on soaring pinions lofty flight e’er now have tried,
Struck by furious wind and tempest they have perished in their pride.”
{3.256}

Migālopa through disobedience did not do his father’s bidding, but rising and rising he passed the limit his father told him, clove even the Black Winds when he met them, and flew upwards till he met the Verambha winds in the face. They struck him, and at their mere stroke he fell into pieces and disappeared in the air.

[3.165]

700 A wind so called from a sea of the same name, see Divyāvadāna, p. 105.
4. “His aged father’s wise commands disdained,
Beyond the Black, Verambha winds he gained.

5. His wife, his children, all his household herd,
All came to ruin through that froward bird.

6. So they who heed not what their elders say,
Like this proud vulture beyond bounds astray,
Meet ruin, when right rules they disobey.”

After the lesson the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time Migālopa was the unruly monk, Aparaṇṇa was myself.”

Ja 382 Sirikālakaṇṇijātaka
The Story about Good and Bad Luck (6s)

Alternative Title: Sirikāḷakaṇṇijātaka (Cst)

In the present Anāthapiṇḍika and his whole household maintain the precepts. The Buddha tells a story of how a virtuous merchant in the past distinguished between the Devīs of ill- and good-fortune, and honoured the latter.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man Suciparivāra (Suciparivārasetṭhi), Uppalavaṇṇā = (the Devī) Siridevī.

Keywords: Virtue, Fortune, Devas.

“Who is this.” {3.257} The Teacher told this tale in Jetavana concerning Anāthapiṇḍika. From the time when he was established in the fruition of the First Path he kept the Five Precepts unbroken; so also did his wife, his sons and daughters, his hired servants and his workers.

One day in the Dhamma Hall they began to discuss whether Anāthapiṇḍika was pure himself and his household also. The Teacher came and was told their subject: so he said: “Monks, the wise men of old had pure households,” and told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a merchant, giving gifts, keeping the commands, and performing the fast day duties: and so his wife kept the Five Precepts, and so also did his sons, his daughters and his servants and workers. So he was called the merchant Suciparivāra (Pure Household). He thought: “If one of purer morals than I should come, it would not be proper to give him my couch to sit on or my bed to lie on, but to give him one pure and unused,” so he had an unused couch and bed prepared on one side in his presence-chamber.

At that time in the Heaven of the Four Kings, Kālakaṇṇī [Unlucky], daughter of Virūpakkha, and Sirī [Lucky], daughter of Dhataraṭṭha, both together took many perfumes and garlands and went on the Lake Anotatta to play there. Now on that lake there are many bathing places: the Buddhas bathe at their own place, the Paccekabuddhas at theirs, the monks at theirs, the ascetics at theirs, the Devaputtas of the six Kāma-heavens at theirs, and the Devadhītā at theirs.

These two came there and began to quarrel as to which of them should bathe first. Kālakaṇṇī said: “I rule the world: it is proper that I bathe first.” Sirī said: “I preside over the course of conduct that gives lordship to mankind: it is proper that I bathe first.” Then both said: “The Four Kings will know which of us ought to bathe first,” so they went to them and asked which of the two was worthy to bathe first in Anotatta. Dhataraṭṭha and Virūpakkha said: “We cannot decide,” and laid the duty on Virūḷha and Vessavaṇa. They too said: “We cannot decide, we will send it to our Lord’s feet,” so they sent it to Sakka. He heard their tale and thought: “Those two are the daughters of my vassals; I cannot decide this case,” so he said to them, “There is in Benares a merchant called Suciparivāra; in his house are prepared an unused couch and bed: she who can first sit or lie there is the proper one to bathe first.” Kālakaṇṇī hearing this on the instant put on blue raiment and used blue ointment and decked herself with blue jewels: she descended from the heaven as on a stone from a catapult, and just after the mid-watch of night she stood in the air, diffusing a blue light, not far from the merchant who was lying on a couch in the presence-chamber of his mansion. The merchant looked 701 These are Dhataraṭṭha, king of the North, Virūḷha of the South, Virūpakka of the West, and Vessavaṇa of the East.

---

702 Of which the Heaven of the Four Kings is the first.
703 Blue is the unlucky colour.
and saw her: but to his eyes she was ungracious and unlovely. Talking to her he spoke the first verse:

1. “Who is this so dark of hue,
   So unlovely to the view?
   Who are you, whose daughter, say,
   How are we to know you, pray?”

Hearing him, Kālakaṇṭī spoke the second verse:

2. “The great king Virūpakkha is my sire:
   I am Unlucky, Kālakaṇṭī dire:
   Give me the house-room near you I desire.”

Then the Bodhisatta spoke the third verse:

3. “What the conduct, what the ways,
   Of the men with whom you dwell
   This is what my question prays:
   We will mark the answer well.”

Then she, explaining her own qualities, spoke the fourth verse:

4. “The hypocrite, the wanton, the morose,
   The man of envy, greed and treachery:
   Such are the friends I love: and I dispose
   Their gains that they may perish utterly.” [3.167] {3.260}

She spoke also the fifth, sixth, and seventh verses:

5. “And dearer still are ire and hate to me,
   Slander and strife, libel and cruelty.

6. The shiftless wight who knows not his own good,
   Resenting counsel, to his betters rude:

7. The man whom folly drives, whom friends despise,
   He is my friend, in him my pleasure lies.” [3.261]

Then the Great Being, blaming her, spoke the eighth verse:
8. “Kāli, depart: there’s naught to please you here:
   To other lands and cities disappear.”

Kālakaṇṇī, hearing him, was sorrowful and spoke another verse:

   9. “I know you well: there’s naught to please me here.
      Others are luckless, who amass much gear;
      My brother-god and I will make it disappear.”

When she had gone, Sirī the Devadhītā, coming with raiment and ointment of golden hue and ornament of golden brightness to the door of the presence-chamber, diffusing yellow light, rested with even feet on level ground and stood respectful. The Bodhisatta seeing her repeated the first verse:

   10. “Who is this, divine of hue,
       On the ground so firm and true?
       Who are you, whose daughter, say,
       How are we to know you, pray?” {3.262}

Sirī, hearing him, spoke the second verse:

   11. “The great king Dhatarāṭṭha is my sire:
       Fortune and Luck am I, and Wisdom men admire:
       Grant me the house-room with you I desire.”

Then:

   12. “What the conduct, what the ways
      Of the men with whom you dwell?
      This is what my question prays;
      We will mark your answer well.”

   13. “He who in cold and heat, in wind and sun,
       Mid thirst and hunger, snake and poison-fly,
       His present duty night and day hath done;
       With him I dwell and love him faithfully.
14. Gentle and friendly, righteous, liberal,
Guileless and honest, upright, winning, bland,
Meek in high place: I tinge his fortunes all,
Like waves their hue through ocean that expand.

15. To friend or unfriend, better, like or worse,
Helper or foe, by dark or open day,
Whoso is kind, without harsh word or curse,
I am his friend, living or dead, alway.

16. But if a fool have won some love from me,
And waxes proud and vain,
His froward path of wantonness I flee,
Like filthy stain.

17. Each man’s fortune and misfortune are his own work, not another’s:
Neither fortune nor misfortune can a man make for his brothers.”

Such was Sirī’s answer when questioned by the merchant.

The Bodhisatata rejoiced at Sirī’s words, and said: “Here is the pure seat and bed, proper for you; sit and lie down there.” She stayed there and in the morning departed to the Heaven of the Four Great Kings and bathed first in Lake Anotatta.
The bed used by Sirī was called Sirisaya: hence is the origin of Sirisayana, and for this reason it is so called to this day.

After the lesson the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Devī Sirī was Uppalavaṇṇā, the merchant Suciparivāra was myself.”

Ja 383 Kukkuṭajātaka
The Story about the (Undeceived) Chicken (6s)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away through the sight of a woman. The Buddha tells a story of a cat who ate up many chickens, and tried to lure the last chicken from a tree by promise of marriage, only to be rebuffed.

The Bodhisatata = the king of the chickens (kukkuṭarājā).

---

704 Perhaps vaṇṇaṁ is really for the Sanskrit vṛṁhan meaning, increasing.
Keywords: Lust, Treachery, Animals, Birds.

“Bird with wings.” [3.265] The Teacher told this tale in Jetavana, concerning a monk who longed for the world. The Teacher asked him, “Why do you long for the world?” “Lord, through passion, for I saw a woman adorned.” “Monk, women are like cats, deceiving and cajoling to bring to ruin one who has come into their power,” so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a chicken and lived in the forest with a retinue of many hundred chickens. Not far away lived a female cat; and she deceived [3.169] by devices the other chickens except the Bodhisatta and ate them; but the Bodhisatta did not fall into her power. She thought: “This chicken is very crafty, but he knows not that I am crafty and have skill in means: it is good that I cajole him, saying, ‘I will be your wife,’ and so eat him when he comes into my power.” She went to the root of the tree where he perched, and praying him in a speech preceded by praise of his beauty, she spoke the first verse:

1. “Bird with wings that flash so gaily, crest that droops so gracefully, I will be your wife for nothing, leave the bough and come to me.”

The Bodhisatta hearing her thought: “She has eaten all my relatives; now she wishes to cajole and eat me: I will get rid of her.” So he spoke the second verse:

2. “Lady fair and winning, you have four feet, I have only two: Beasts and birds should never marry: for some other husband sue.” [3.266]

Then she thought: “He is exceedingly crafty; by some device or other I will deceive him and eat him,” so she spoke the third verse:

3. “I will bring you youth and beauty, pleasant speech and courtesy: Honoured wife or simple slave girl, at your pleasure deal with me.”

Then the Bodhisatta thought: “It is best to revile her and drive her away,” so he spoke the fourth verse:

4. “You have drunk my kindred’s blood, and robbed and slain them cruelly: Honoured wife! There is no honour in your heart when wooing me.”

She was driven away and did not endure to look at him again.
5. “So when they see a hero, women sly,
(Compare the cat and chicken,) to tempt him try.

6. He that to great occasion fails to rise
’neth foeman’s feet in sorrow prostrate lies. {3.267}

7. One prompt a crisis in his fate to see,
As chicken from cat, escapes his enemy.”

These are verses spoken after Fully Awakening.

His lesson ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, after the Truths, the discontented monk was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the chicken was myself.”

Ja 384 Dhammaddhajakātakaṁ

The Story about the One Posing as Righteous (6s)

Alternative Title: Dhammadhajajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is known for cheating. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who pretended to be an ascetic in order to have the opportunity of killing and eating other birds, until he was found out and put to death.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the birds (sakuṇarājā), the deceitful monk = the deceitful crow (kuhakāka).

Keywords: Deceit, Cheating, Animals, Birds.

“Practise virtue.” [3.170] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, of a deceitful monk. He said: “Monks, this man is not deceitful now for the first time,” so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a bird: when he grew up he lived amidst a retinue of birds on an island in the middle of the sea. Certain merchants of Kāsi got a travelled crow and started on a voyage by sea. In the midst of the sea the ship was wrecked. The crow reached that island and thought: “Here is a great flock of birds, it is good that I use deceit on them and eat their eggs and young,” so he descended in their midst and opening his mouth stood with one foot on the ground. “Who are you, master?” they asked. “I am a holy person.” “Why do you stand on one foot?” “If I put down the other one,
{3.268} the earth could not bear me.” “Then why do you stand with your mouth open?” “We eat no other food, we only drink the wind,” and with this he called these birds and saying: “I will give you a sermon, you listen,” he spoke the first verse by way of a sermon:

1. “Practise virtue, brethren, bless you! Practise virtue, I repeat:
   Here and after virtuous people have their happiness complete.”

The birds, not knowing that he said this with deceit to eat their eggs, praised him and spoke the second verse:

2. “Surely a righteous fowl, a blessed bird,
   He preaches on one leg the holy word.”

The birds, believing that wicked one, said: “Sir, you take no other food but feed on wind only: so pray watch our eggs and young,” so they went to their feeding-ground. That sinner when they went away ate his bellyful of their eggs and young, and when they came again he stood calmly on one foot with his mouth open. The birds not seeing their children when they came made a great outcry, “Who can be eating them?” but saying: “This crow is a holy person,” they did not even suspect him.

Then one day the Bodhisatta thought: “There was nothing formerly, it only began since this one came, it is good to try him,” so making as if he were going to feed with the other birds he turned back and stood in a secret place. (3.269) The crow, confident because the birds were gone, rose and went and ate the eggs and young, then coming back stood on one foot with his mouth open. When the birds came, their king assembled them all and said: “I examined today the danger to our children, and I saw this wicked crow eating them, we will seize him,” so getting the birds together and surrounding the crow he said: “If he flees, let us seize him,” and spoke the remaining verses:

3. “You know not his ways, when this bird you praise:
   You spoke with foolish tongue:
   Virtue, he'll say, and Virtue aye,
   But he eats our eggs and young.
4. The things he preaches with his voice
   His members never do:
   His Virtue is an empty noise,
   His righteousness untrue.

5. At heart a hypocrite, his language charms,
   A black snake slinking to his hole is he:
   He deceives by his outward coat of arms
   The country-folk in their simplicity.

6. Strike him down with beak and pinion,
   Tear him with your claws:
   Death to such a dastard minion,
   Traitor to our cause.” (3.270)

With these words the leader of the birds himself sprang up and struck the crow in the head with his beak, and the rest struck him with beaks and feet and wings: so he died.

At the end of the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the crow was the deceitful monk, the king of the birds was myself.”

Ja 385 Nandiyamigajātaka

The Story about Deer Nandiya (6s)

Alternative Title: Nandiyamigarājajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk supports his parents for which the Buddha commends him. The Buddha tells a story of a deer who used himself as a decoy in order to save his parents, and later got the king to offer safe passage to all the animals in his kingdom.

The Bodhisatta = the deer-king (migarājā),
Ānanda = the king (of Kosala) (rājā),
Sāriputta = the brahmin,
members of the royal family = the mother and father (mātāpitaro).

Keywords: Filial piety, Gratitude, Humility, Animals.

“Will you go to the king’s park.” The Teacher told this in Jetavana, about a monk who supported his mother. He asked the monk, “Is it true that you support lay folk?” “Yes, lord.” “Who are they?” “My father and mother, [3.172] lord.” “Well done, well done, monk: you keep up the rule of the wise men of old, for they too even when born as beasts gave their life for their parents,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when the Kosala king was reigning over the Kosalas in Sāketa, the Bodhisisatta was born as a deer; when he grew up he was named Nandiyamiga, and being excellent in character and conduct he supported his father and mother. The Kosala king was intent on the chase, and went every day to hunt with a great retinue, so that his people could not follow farming and their trades. The people gathered together and consulted, saying: “Sirs, this king of ours is destroying our trades, our home-life is perishing; what if we were to enclose the Añjanavana park, providing a gate, digging a tank and sowing grass there, then go into the forest with sticks and clubs in our hands, beat the thickets, and so expelling the deer and driving them along force them into the park like cows into a pen? Then we would close the gate, send word to the king and go about our trades.” “That is the way,” they said, and so with one will they made the park ready, and then entering the wood enclosed a space \(3.271\) of a league each way.

At the time Nandiya had taken his father and mother into a little thicket and was lying on the ground. The people with various shields and weapons in their hands encircled the thicket arm to arm; and some entered it looking for deer. Nandiya saw them and thought: “It is good that I should abandon life today and give it for my parents,” so rising and saluting his parents he said: “Father and mother, these men will see us three if they enter this thicket; you can survive only in one way, and your life is best: I will give you the gift of your life, standing by the skirts of the thicket and going out as soon as they beat it; then they will think there can be only one deer in this little thicket and so will not enter: be heedful,” so he got their permission and stood ready to run. As soon as the thicket was beaten by the people standing at its skirts and shouting he came out, and they thinking there would be only one deer there did not enter.

Nandiya went among the other deer, and the people drove them along into the park; then closing the gate they told the king and went to their own homes. From that time the king always went himself and shot a deer; then he either took it and went away, or sent for it and had it fetched. The deer arranged their turns, and he to whom the turn came stood on one side: and they take him when shot. Nandiya drank water from the tank, and ate the grass, but his turn did not come yet. Then after many days his parents longing to see him thought: “Our son Nandiya, king of deer, was strong as an elephant and of perfect health: if he is alive he will certainly leap the fence and come to see us; we will send him [{3.272}] word,” so they stood near the road and [{3.173}] seeing a brahmin they asked in human voice, “Sir, where are you going?” “To Sāketa,” he said; so sending a message to their son they spoke the first verse:

1. “Will you go to the king’s park, brahmin, when you are travelling through?
   Find out our dear son Nandiya and tell him our message true,
   Your father and mother are stricken in years and their hearts are fain for you.”

The brahmin, saying: “It is well,” accepted, and going to Sāketa next day entered the park, and asked, “Which is Nandiya?” The deer came near him and said: “I.” The brahmin told his message. Nandiya, hearing it, said: “I might go, brahmin; I might certainly leap the fence and go: but I have enjoyed regular food and drink from the king, and this stands to me as a debt; besides I have lived long among these deer, and it is improper for me to go away without doing good to this king and to them, or without showing my strength; but when my turn comes I will do good to them and come gladly,” and so explaining this, he spoke two verses:

2. “I owe the king my daily drink and food: I cannot go till I have made it good.

3. To the king’s arrows I’ll expose my side: Then see my mother and be justified.” [{3.273}]

The brahmin hearing this went away. Afterwards on the day when his turn came, the king with a great retinue came into the park. The Bodhisatta stood on one side: and the king saying: “I will shoot the deer,” fitted a sharp arrow to the string. The Bodhisatta did not run away as other animals do when scared by the fear of death, but fearless and making his generosity his guide he stood firm, exposing his side with mighty ribs. The king owing to the efficacy of his love could not discharge the arrow. The Bodhisatta said: “Great king, why do you not shoot the arrow? Shoot!” “King of deer, I cannot.” “Then see the merit of the virtuous,” O great king.” Then the king, pleased with the Bodhisatta, dropped his bow and said:

705 There is a pun here on guṇaṁ which means merit or string.
This senseless length of wood knows your merit; shall I who have sense and am a man not know it? Forgive me; I give you security.” “Great king, you give me security, but what will this herd of deer in the park do?” “I give it to them too.” So the Bodhisattva, having gained security for all deer in the park, for birds in the air and fishes in the water, in the way described in the Nigrodhajātaka [Ja 12], established the king in the Five Precepts and said: “Great king, it is good for a king to rule a kingdom by forsaking the ways of wrongdoing, not offending against the ten kingly virtues and acting with just righteousness. [3.174] {3.274}

4. “Alms, morals, generosity, justice and penitence,
   Peace, mildness, mercy, meekness, patience:

5. These virtues planted in my soul I feel,
   Thence springs up joy and perfect inward weal.”

With these words he showed forth the kingly virtues in the form of a verse, and after staying some days with the king he sent a golden drum round the town, proclaiming the gift of security to all beings: and then saying: “O king, be watchful,” he went to see his parents.

6. “Of old in Oudh a king of deer I hight,
   By name and nature, Nandiya, Delight.

7. To kill me in his deer-park came the king,
   His bow was bent, his arrow on the string.

8. To the king’s arrow I exposed my side;
   Then saw my mother and was justified.”

These were the verses spoken after Fully Awakening.

At the end, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka. At the end of the Truths, the monk who supported his mother was established in the First Path. “At that time the father and mother were members of the royal family, the brahmin was Sāriputta, the king Ānanda, the deer myself.”
Ja 386 Kharaputtajātaka\textsuperscript{706}
The Story about the (Stupid) Donkeys (6s)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away through thinking of his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of a king who gained a charm through which he could understand the speech of animals, and how his wife sought to get it from him, even at the cost of his life.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, Sāriputta = the horse (assa),
the dissatisfied monk = the king (of Benares) (råjā), his former wife = the queen (devī).

Keywords: Lust, Charms, Devas, Women, Animals.

\textbf{\textit{Goats are stupid.}}\textsuperscript{\{3.275\}} The Teacher told this tale in Jetavana, concerning the temptation of a monk by his former wife. When the monk confessed that he was longing for the world, the Teacher said: “Monk, this woman does you harm: formerly also you came into the fire through her and were saved from death by sages,” so he told a story of the past.

In the past when a king named Senaka was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was Sakka. The king Senaka was friendly with a certain Nāga king. This Nāga king, they say, left the Nāga world and ranged the \[3.175\] earth seeking food. The village boys seeing him said: “This is a snake,” and struck him with clods and other things. The king, going to amuse himself in his garden, saw them, and being told they were beating a snake, said: “Don’t let them beat him, drive them away,” and this was done. So the Nāga king got his life, and when he went back to the Nāga world, he took many jewels, and coming at midnight to the king’s bedchamber he gave them to him, saying: “I got my life through you,” so he made friendship with the king and came again and again to see him. He appointed one of his Nāgīs, insatiate in pleasures, to be near the king and protect him: and he gave the king a charm, saying: “If ever you do not see her, repeat this charm.”

\textsuperscript{706} For variants on this story see Benfey in \textit{Orient and Occident}, vol. ii. pp. 133 ff., and the second story in the Arabian Nights.
One day the king went to the garden with the Nāgī and was amusing himself in the lotus-tank. The Nāgī seeing a water-snake quit her human shape and made love with him. The king not seeing the Nāgī said, “Where is she gone?” and repeated the spell: then he saw her in her misconduct and struck her with a piece of bamboo. She went in anger to the Nāga world, and when she was asked, “Why are you come?” she said: “Your friend struck me on the back because I did not do his bidding,” showing the mark of the blow. The Nāga king, not knowing the truth, called four Nāga youths and sent them with orders to enter Senaka’s bed chamber and destroy him like chaff by the breath of their nostrils. They entered the chamber at the royal bed-time. As they came in, the king was saying to the queen, “Lady, do you know where the Nāgī has gone?” “King, I do not.” “Today when we were bathing in the tank, she quit her shape and committed adultery with a water-snake: I said, ‘Don’t do that,’ and struck her with a piece of bamboo to give her a lesson: and now I fear she may have gone to the Nāga world and told some lie to my friend, destroying his good-will to me.” The young Nāgas hearing this turned back at once to the Nāga world and told their king. He being moved went instantly to the king’s chamber, told him all and was forgiven: then he said: “In this way I make amends,” and gave the king a charm giving knowledge of all sounds, “This, O king, is a priceless spell: if you give anyone this spell you will at once enter the fire and die.” The king said: “It is well,” and accepted it.

From that time he understood the voices even of ants. One day he was sitting on the dais eating solid food with honey and molasses: and a drop of honey, a drop of molasses, and a morsel of cake fell on the ground. An ant seeing this came crying, “The king’s honey jar is broken on the dais, his molasses-cart and cake-cart are upset; come and eat honey and molasses and cake.” The king hearing the cry laughed. The queen being near him thought: “What has the king seen that he laughs?” When the king had eaten his solid food and bathed and sat down cross-legged, a fly said to his wife, “Come, lady, let us enjoy love.” She said: “Excuse me for a little, husband: they will soon be bringing perfumes to the king; as he perfumes himself some powder will fall at his feet: I will stay there and become fragrant, then we will enjoy ourselves lying on the king’s back.” The king hearing the voice laughed again. The queen thought again, “What has he seen that he laughs?” Again when the king was eating his supper, a lump of rice fell on the ground. The ants cried, “A wagon of rice has broken in the king’s palace, and there is none to eat it.” The king hearing this laughed again. The queen took a golden spoon and helping him reflected: “Is it at the sight of me that the king laughs?” She went to the bed-chamber with the king and at bed-time she asked, “Why did you laugh, O king?” He said: “What have you to do with why I laugh?” but being asked again and again he told her. Then she said: “Give me your spell of knowledge.” He said: “It cannot be given,” but though repulsed she pressed him again.

The king said: “If I give you this spell, I shall die.” “Even though you die, give it me.” The king, being in the power of womankind, saying: “It is well,” consented and went to the park in a chariot, saying: “I shall enter the fire after giving away this spell.” At that moment, Sakka, king of gods, looked down on the earth and seeing this case said: “This foolish king, knowing that he will enter the fire through womankind, is on his way; I will give him his life,” so he took Sujā, daughter of the Asuras, and went to Benares. {3.278} He became a he-goat and made her a female goat, and resolving that the people should not see them, he stood before the king’s chariot. The king and the Sindh asses yoked in the chariot saw him, but none else saw him. For the sake of starting talk he was as if making love with the female goat. One of the Sindh asses yoked in the chariot seeing him said: “Friend goat, we have heard before, but not seen, that goats are stupid and shameless: but you are doing, with all of us looking on, this thing that should be done in secret and in a private place, and are not ashamed: what we have heard before agrees with this that we see,” and so he spoke the first verse:

1. “Goats are stupid, says the wise man, and the words are surely true: This one knows not he’s parading what in secret he should do.”

The goat hearing him spoke two verses:

2. “O, sir donkey, think and realise your own stupidity, You’re tied with ropes, your jaw is wrenched, and very downcast is your eye.

3. When you’re loosed, you don’t escape, sir, that’s a stupid habit too: And that Senaka you carry, he’s more stupid still than you.” {3.279}

The king understood the talk of both animals, and hearing it he quickly sent away the chariot. The ass hearing the goat’s talk spoke the fourth verse: [3.177]
4. “Well, sir king of goats, you fully know my great stupidity: But how Senaka is stupid, pray you do explain to me.”

The goat explaining this spoke the fifth verse:

5. “He who his own special treasure on his wife will throw away, Cannot keep her faithful ever and his life he must betray.”

The king hearing his words said: “King of goats, you will surely act for my advantage: tell me now what is right for me to do.” Then the goat said: “King, to all animals no one is dearer than self: it is not good to destroy oneself and abandon the honour one has gained for the sake of anything that is dear,” so he spoke the sixth verse:

6. “A king, like you, may have conceived desire And yet renounced it if his life’s the cost; Life is the chief thing: what can man seek higher? If life’s secured, desires need ne’er be crossed.”

So the Bodhisatta exhorted the king. The king, delighted, asked, “King of goats, whence come you?” “I am Sakka, O king, come to save you from death out of pity for you.” “King of gods, I promised to give her the charm: what am I to do now?” “There is no need for the ruin of both of you: you say, ‘It is the way of the craft,’ and have her beaten with some blows: by this means she will not get it.” The king said: “It is well,” and agreed. The Bodhisatta after exhortation to the king went to Sakka’s heaven. The king went to the garden, had the queen summoned and then said: “Lady, will you have the charm?” “Yes, lord.” “Then go through the usual custom.” “What custom?” “A hundred stripes on the back, but you must not make a sound.” She consented through greed for the charm. The king made his slaves take whips and beat her on both sides. She endured two or three stripes and then cried, “I don’t want the charm.” The king said: “You would have killed me to get the charm,” and so flogging the skin off her back he sent her away. After that she could not bear to talk of it again.

At the end of the lesson the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the end of the Truths, the monk was established in the First Path. “At that time the king was the discontented monk, the queen his former wife, the steed Sāriputta, and Sakka was myself.”
The Section with Six Verses – 1364

Ja 387 Sūcijātaka
The Story about the Needle (6s)

In the present the monks are talking about the skilfulness of the Buddha in bringing people to liberation. The Buddha tells a story of a skilful smith who made a needle so fine he won the hand of the elder smith’s daughter.

The Bodhisatta = the wise smith (pañditakammāraputta), Rāhulamātā = the elder smith’s daughter (kammārajeṭṭhakassa dhītā).

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 177 Tinḍuka, Ja 387 Sūci, Ja 402 Sattubhasta, Ja 515 Sambhava, Ja 528 Mahābodhi, Past Compare: Mvu ii p 115 Amarā.

Keywords: Skilfulness, Resourcefulness, Crafts, Devas, Women.

“One quickly threaded.” [3.178] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the Perfection of Wisdom. The occasion of the tale will be given in the Mahā-ummagga [Ja 546].

One day the monks sat in the Dhamma Hall and described the Tathāgata’s Perfection of Wisdom, “Monks, the Tathāgata is greatly wise, his wisdom is vast, ready, swift, sharp, crushing heretical doctrines, after having converted, by the power of his own knowledge, the brahmins Kūṭadanta and the rest, the ascetics Sabhiya and the rest, the thieves Aṅgulimāla and the rest, the Yakkhas Āḷavaka and the rest, the Devas Sakka and the rest, and the Brahmās Baka and the rest, made them humble, and ordained a vast multitude as ascetics and established them in the fruition of the paths of sanctification.” The Teacher came up and asked what they were discoursing about, and they told him.

The Teacher addressed the monks, “Not only is the Tathāgata wise this one time, but he was wise before, and had skill in means,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the kingdom of Kāsi in a smith’s family, and when he grew up he became excellent in the craft. His parents were poor. Not far from their village was another smith’s village of a thousand houses. The principal smith of the thousand was a favourite of the king, rich and of great substance. His daughter was exceedingly beautiful, like to a Devaccharā, with all the auspicious marks of a lady of the land. People came from the villages round to have razors, axes, ploughshares and goads made, and generally saw that maiden. When they went back to their own villages, they praised her beauty \[3.282\] in the places where men sit and elsewhere. The Bodhisatta, being attracted by merely hearing of her, thought: “I will make her my wife,” so he took iron of the best kind, and made one delicate strong needle which pierced dice and floated on water: then he made a sheath for it of the same kind and pierced dice with it: and in the same way he made seven sheaths: how he made them is not to be told, for such work prospers through the greatness of the Bodhisattas’ knowledge. Then he put the needle in a tube and placing it in a case he went to that village and asked for the street where the head smith’s house was: then standing at the door he said: “Who will buy for money from my hand a needle of this kind?” describing the needle, and so standing by the head smith’s house he spoke the first verse:

1. “Quickly threaded, smooth and straight,
   Polished with emery,
   Sharp of point and delicate,
   Needles! Who will buy?”

After this he praised it again and spoke the second verse:

2. “Quickly threaded, strong and straight,
   Rounded properly,
   Iron they will penetrate,
   Needles! Who will buy?” \[3.179\] \[3.283\]

At that moment the maiden was fanning her father with a palm-leaf as he lay on a little bed to allay discomfort after his early meal, and hearing the Bodhisatta’s sweet voice, as if she had been sickened by a fresh lump of meat, and had the discomfort extinguished by a thousand pots of water, she said: “Who is this hawking needles with a sweet voice in a village of smiths? For what business has he come? I will find out,” so laying down the palm-fan she went out and spoke with him outside, standing in the verandah. The purpose of Bodhisattas prospers: it was for her sake he had come to that village. She speaking with him said: “Young man, dwellers in all the kingdom come to this village for needles and the like: it is in folly you wish to sell needles in a village of smiths; though you declare the praise of your needle all day no one will take it from your hand; if you wish to get a price, go to another village,” so she spoke two verses:

3. “Our hooks are sold, both up and down,
   Men know our needles well:
   We all are smiths in this good town:
   Needles! Who can sell?

4. In iron-work we have renown,
   In weapons we excel:
   We all are smiths in this good town:
   Needles! Who can sell?”

The Bodhisatta hearing her words said: “Lady, you say this not knowing and in ignorance,” and so he spoke two verses: [3.284]

5. “Though all are smiths in this good town,
   Yet skill can needles sell;
   For masters in the craft will own
   A first-rate article.

6. Lady, if once your father know
   This needle made by me;
   On me your hand he would bestow
   And all his property.”

The head smith hearing all their talk called his daughter and asked, “Who is that you are talking to?” “Father, a man selling needles.” “Then call him here.” She went and called him. The Bodhisatta saluted the head smith and stood by. The head smith asked, “Of what village are you?” “I am of such a village and son of such a smith.” “Why are you come here?” “To sell needles.” “Come, let us see your needle.” [3.285]

The Bodhisatta, wishing to declare his qualities among them all, said: “Is not a thing seen in the midst of all better than one seen by each singly?” “Quite right, friend.” So he gathered all the smiths together and in their midst said: “Sir, take the needle.” “Teacher, have an anvil brought and a bronze dish full of water.”
This was done. The Bodhisatta took the needle-tube from the wrapper and gave it to [3.180] them. The head smith taking it asked, “Is this the needle?” “No, it is not the needle, it is the sheath.” He, after examining it, could not see end nor tip. The Bodhisatta, taking it from them, drew off the sheath with his nail and showing it to the people with, “This is the needle, this is the sheath,” he put the needle in the master’s hand and the sheath at his feet. Again when the master said: “This is the needle, I suppose,” he answered, “This too is a sheath,” then he struck it off with his nail, and so he laid six sheaths in succession at the head smith’s feet and saying: “Here is the needle,” laid it on his hand.

The thousand smiths snapped their fingers in delight, and the waving of cloths began; then the head smith asked, “Friend, what is the strength of this needle?” “Teacher, have this anvil raised up by a strong man and a water-vessel set under the anvil: then strike the needle straight into the anvil.” He had this done and struck the needle by the point into the anvil. The needle\textsuperscript{707} piercing the anvil lay across on the surface of the water not moving a hair’s breadth up or down. All the smiths said: “We have never heard all this time even by rumour that there are such smiths as this,” so they snapped their fingers and waved a thousand cloths.\textsuperscript{[3.286]} The head smith called his daughter and in the midst of the assembly saying: “This maiden is a suitable match for you,” he poured water on\textsuperscript{708} them and gave her away. And afterwards when the head smith died the Bodhisatta became head smith in the village.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “The smith’s daughter was Rāhula’s mother, the clever young smith was myself.”

\textbf{Ja 388 Tuṇḍilajātaka}

\textbf{The Story about (the Brothers) Tuṇḍila (6s)}

In the present one monk is very much afraid of death, and even little sounds make him jumpy. The Buddha tells a story of two pigs whose flesh was wanted for a feast. The elder taught about the nature of impermanence. The multitude were astonished at his wisdom and the king raised both of them to a high state.

The Bodhisatta = (the pig) Mahātuṇḍila (Big Snout), the monk afraid of death = (the pig) Cullatuṇḍila (Little Snout),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),

\textsuperscript{707} Reading \textit{adhikaraṇīm}: but we are not certain of the meaning.

the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisa).

Keywords: Impermanence, Death, Animals.

“Something strange today.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a monk who feared death. He was born in Sāvatthi of good family and was ordained in the dispensation: but he feared death and when he heard even a little moving of a bough, or falling of a stick or voice of bird or [3.181] beast or any such thing, he was frightened by the fear of death, and went away shaking like a hare wounded in the belly. The monks in the Dhamma Hall began to discuss, saying: “Sirs, they say a certain monk, fearing death, runs away shaking when he hears even a little sound: now to beings in this world death is certain, life uncertain, and should not this be wisely borne in mind?” The Teacher found that this was their subject and that the monk admitted he was afraid of death, so he said: “Monks, he is not afraid of death for the first time,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived by a wild sow: in due time she brought forth two male young. One day she took them and lay down in a pit. An old woman of a village at the gate of Benares was coming home with a basket-full of cotton from the cotton field [3.287] and tapping the ground with her stick. The sow heard the sound, and in fear of death left her young and ran away. The old woman saw the young pigs, and feeling towards them as to children of her own she put them in the basket and took them home: then she called the elder Mahātuṇḍila (Big Snout), the younger Cullatuṇḍila (Little Snout), and reared them like children.

In time they grew up and became fat. When the old woman was asked to sell them for money, she answered, “They are my children,” and would not sell them. On a certain feast-day some lewd fellows were drinking strong drink, and when their meat was done they considered where they could get meat: finding out that there were pigs in the old woman’s house, they took money and going there, said: “Mother, take this money and give us one of those pigs.” She said: “Enough, young men: are there people who would give their children to buyers to eat their flesh?” and so refused them. The fellows said: “Mother, pigs cannot be children of men, give them to us,” but they could not get this though they asked again and again. Then they made the old woman drink strong drink, and when she was drunk, saying: “Mother, what will you do with the pigs? Take the money and spend it,” they put pieces of money in her hand. She took the pieces saying: “I cannot give you Mahātuṇḍila, take Cullatuṇḍila.” “Where is he?” “There he is in that bush.” “Call him.” “I don’t see any food for him.” The fellows sent for a vessel of rice at a price. The old woman took it, and filling the pig’s trough which stood at the door she waited by it. Thirty fellows stood by with nooses in their hands. The old woman called him, “Come, little Cullatuṇḍila, come.” Mahātuṇḍila, hearing this, thought: “All this time mother has never given the call to Cullatuṇḍila, she always calls me first; certainly some danger must have arisen for us today.” He told his younger brother, saying: “Brother, mother is calling you, go and find out.” He went out, and seeing them standing by the food-trough he thought: “Death is come upon me today,” and so in fear of death he turned back shaking to his brother; and when he came back he could not contain himself but reeled about shaking. Mahātuṇḍila seeing him said: “Brother, you are shaking today and reeling and watching the entrance: why are you doing so?” He, explaining the thing that he had seen, spoke the first verse:

1. “Something strange today I fear:
   The trough is full, and mistress by;
   Men, noose in hand, are standing near:
   To eat appears a jeopardy.”

Then the Bodhisatta hearing him said: “Brother Cullatuṇḍila, the purpose for which my mother rears pigs all this time has today come to its fulfilment: do not grieve,” and so with sweet voice and the ease of a Buddha he expounded the Dhamma and spoke two verses:

2. “You fear, and look for aid, and quake,
   But, helpless, whither can you flee?
   We’re fattened for our flesh’s sake:
   Eat, Tuṇḍila, and cheerfully.

3. Plunge bold into the crystal pool,
   Wash all the stains of sweat away:
   You’ll find our ointment wonderful,
   Whose fragrance never can decay.”

As he considered the Ten Perfections, setting the Perfection of Loving-Kindness before him as his guide, and uttered the first line, his voice reached and extended to Benares over the whole twelve leagues. At the instant of hearing it, the people of Benares from kings and viceroy's downwards came, and those who did not come stood listening in their houses. The king’s men breaking down the bush levelled the ground and scattered sand. The drunkenness left the lewd fellows, and throwing away the nooses they stood listening to the Dhamma: and the old woman's drunkenness left her also. The Bodhisatta began to preach the Dhamma to Cullatuṇḍila among the multitude. [3.290]

Cullatuṇḍila hearing him, thought: “My brother says so to me; but it is never our custom to plunge into the pool, and by bathing to wash away sweat from our bodies and after taking away old stain to get new ointment: why does my brother say so to me?” So he spoke the fourth verse:

4. “But what is that fair crystal pool,
   And what the stains of sweat, I pray?
   And what the ointment wonderful,
   Whose fragrance never can decay?”

The Bodhisatta hearing this said: “Then listen with attentive ear,” and so expounding the Dhamma with the ease of a Buddha he spoke these verses: [3.183]

5. “Dhamma is the fair crystal pool,
   Wrong is the stain of sweat, they say;
   Virtue's the ointment wonderful,
   Whose fragrance never will decay.

6. Men that lose their life are glad,
   Men that keep it feel annoy;
   Men should die and not be sad,
   As at mid-month’s festal joy.” [3.292]

So the Great Being expounded the Dhamma in a sweet voice with a Buddha’s charm. The multitude by thousands snapped their fingers and waved their cloths, and the air was full of the cry, “Good, good.” The king of Benares honoured the Bodhisatta with royal place, and giving glory to the old woman he caused both pigs to be bathed in perfumed water, and clothed with robes, and ornamented with jewels on the neck, and put them in the position of his sons in the city: so he guarded them with a great retinue. The Bodhisatta gave the Five Precepts to the king, and all the inhabitants of Benares and Kāsi kept the Precepts.
The Bodhisatta preached the Dhamma to them on the fast days (new and full moon), and sitting in judgment decided cases: while he lived there were no bringers of unjust suits. Afterwards the king died. The Bodhisatta did the last honours to his body; then he caused a book of judgments to be written and said: “By observing this book you should settle suits,” so having expounded the Dhamma to the people and preached to them with zeal, he went to the forest with Cullatuṇḍila while they all wept and lamented. Then the Bodhisatta’s preaching went on for sixty thousand years. [3.293]

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the end of the Truths the monk who feared death was established in the fruition of the First Path, “In those days the king was Ānanda, Cullatuṇḍila was the monk who fears death, the multitude was the Saṅgha, Mahātuṇḍila myself.”

Ja 389 Suvaṇṇakakkaṭajātaka

The Story about the Golden Crab (6s)

In the present Ven. Ānanda tries to protect the Buddha when Devadatta sends an elephant to kill him. The Buddha tells a story of how a farmer befriended a crab, and when a crow and a snake conspired to kill the farmer the crab had saved him and killed his enemies.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Ānanda = the crab (kakkaṭaka),
Māra = the cobra (kaṅhasappa),
Devadatta = the male crow (kāka),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = the female crow (kāki).

Present Source: Ja 533 Cullahaṁsa,
Quoted at: Ja 389 Suvaṇṇakakkaṭa, Ja 501 Rohantamiga, Ja 502 Haṁsa, Ja 534 Mahāhaṁsa.

Keywords: Friendship, Self-sacrifice, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Gold-clawed creature.” The Teacher told this tale when dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, of Ānanda’s dying for his sake. The occasion is told in the Khanḍahālajātaka [Ja 542] about the hiring of bowmen, and in the Cullahāṁsjātaka [Ja 533] about the roar of the elephant Dhanapāla.

This was a story told by the Teacher, while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, as to how the venerable Ānanda renounced his life. For when archers were instigated to slay the Tathāgata, and the first one that was sent by Devadatta on this errand returned and said: “Venerable sir, I cannot deprive the Fortunate One of life: he is possessed of great supernatural powers,” Devadatta replied, “Well, sir, you need not slay the ascetic Gotama. I myself will deprive him of life.” And as the Tathāgata was walking in the shadow cast westward by the Vulture’s Peak, Devadatta climbed to the top of the mountain and hurled a mighty stone as if shot from a catapult, thinking: “With this stone will I slay the ascetic Gotama,” but two mountain peaks meeting together intercepted the stone, and a splinter from it flew up and struck the Fortunate One on the foot and drew blood, and severe pains set in. Jivaka, cutting open the Tathāgata’s foot with a knife, let out the bad blood and removed the proud flesh, and anointing the wound with medicine, healed it.

The Teacher moved about just as he did before, surrounded by his attendants, with all the great charm of a Buddha. So on seeing him Devadatta thought: “Verily no mortal beholding the excellent beauty of Gotama’s person dare approach him, but the king’s elephant Naḷāgiri is a fierce and savage animal and knows nothing of the virtues of the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha. He will bring about the destruction of the ascetic.” So he went and told the matter to the king. The king readily fell in with the suggestion, and, summoning his elephant-keeper, thus addressed him, “Sir, tomorrow you are to make Naḷāgiri mad with drink, and at break of day to let him loose in the street where the ascetic Gotama walks.” And Devadatta asked the keeper how much arrack the elephant was wont to drink on ordinary days, and when he answered, “Eight pots,” he said: “Tomorrow give him sixteen pots to drink, and send him in the direction of the street frequented by the ascetic Gotama.” “Very good,” said the keeper. The king had a drum beaten throughout the city and proclaimed, “Tomorrow Naḷāgiri will

---

709 [In fact both stories are told at Ja 533. I include them here.]
710 See Milindapañho, p. 207.
be maddened with strong drink and let loose in the city. The men of the city are to do all that they have to do in the early morning and after that no one is to venture out into the street.”

And Devadatta came down from the palace and went to the elephant stall and, addressing the keepers, said: “We are able, I tell you, from a high position to degrade a man to a lowly one and to raise a man from a low position to a high one. If you are eager for honour, early tomorrow morning give Nāḷāgiri sixteen pots of fiery liquor, and at the time when the ascetic Gotama comes that way, wound the elephant with spiked goads, and when in his fury he has broken down his stall, drive him in the direction of the street where Gotama is wont to walk, and so bring about the destruction of the ascetic.” They readily agreed to do so.

This rumour was noised abroad throughout the whole city. The lay disciples attached to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, on hearing it, drew near to the Teacher and said: “Venerable sir, Devadatta has conspired with the king and tomorrow he will have Nāḷāgiri let loose in the street where you walk. Do not go into the city tomorrow for alms but remain here. We will provide food in the monastery for the monastics, with Buddha at their head.” The Teacher without directly saying: “I will not enter the city tomorrow for alms,” answered and said: “Tomorrow I will work a miracle and tame Nāḷāgiri and crush the heretics. And without going around for alms in Rājagaha I will leave the city, attended by a company of the monks, and go straight to the Bamboo Grove, and the people of Rājagaha shall repair there with many a bowl of food and tomorrow there shall be a meal provided in the refectory of the monastery.” In this way did the Teacher grant their request.

And on learning that the Tathāgata had acceded to their wishes, they set out from the city, carrying bowls of food, and saying: “We will distribute our gifts in the monastery itself.” And the Teacher in the first watch taught the Dhamma, in the middle watch he solved hard questions, in the first part of the last watch he lay down lion-like on his right side, and the second part he spent in the Attainment of Fruition, in the third part, entering into a trance of deep pity for the sufferings of humanity, he contemplated all his kinsfolk that were ripe for conversion and seeing that as the result of his conquest of Nāḷāgiri eighty-four thousand beings would be brought to a clear understanding of the Dhamma, at daybreak, after attending to his bodily necessities, he addressed Ānanda and said: “Ānanda, today bid all the monks that are in the eighteen monasteries that are round about Rājagaha to accompany me into the city.” The elder did so, and all the monks assembled at the Bamboo Grove.

The Teacher attended by a great company of monks entered Rājagaha and the elephant-keepers proceeded according to their instructions and there was a great gathering of people. The believers thought: “Today there will be a mighty battle between the Buddha Nāga and this elephant Nāga of the brute world. We shall witness the defeat of Nāḷāgiri by the incomparable skill of the Buddha,” and they climbed up and stood upon the upper storeys and roofs and house-tops. But the unbelieving heretics thought: “Nāḷāgiri is a fierce, savage creature, and knows nothing of the merits of Buddhas and the like. Today he will crush the glorious form of the ascetic Gotama and bring about his death. Today we shall look upon the back of our enemy.” And they took their stand on upper storeys and other high places.

And the elephant, on seeing the Fortunate One approach him, terrified the people by demolishing the houses and raising his trunk he crushed the wagons into powder, and, with his ears and tail erect with excitement, he ran like some towering mountain in the direction of the Fortunate One. On seeing him the monks thus addressed the Fortunate One, “This Nāḷāgiri, venerable sir, a fierce and savage creature, and a slayer of men, is coming along this road. Of a truth he knows nothing of the merit of Buddhas and the like. Let the Fortunate One, the Auspicious One, withdraw.” “Fear not, monks,” he said: “I am able to overcome Nāḷāgiri.” Then the venerable Sāriputta prayed the Teacher, saying: “Venerable sir, when any service has to be rendered to a father, it is a burden laid on his eldest son. I will vanquish this creature.” Then the Teacher said: “Sāriputta, the power of a Buddha is one thing, that of his disciples is another,” and he rejected his offer, saying: “You are to remain here.” This too was the prayer of the eighty chief elders for the most part, but he refused them all.

Then the venerable Ānanda by reason of his strong affection for the Teacher was unable to acquiesce in this and cried, “Let this elephant kill me first,” and he stood before the Teacher, ready to sacrifice his life for the Tathāgata. So the Teacher said to him, “Go away, Ānanda, do not stand in front of me.” The elder said: “Venerable sir, this elephant is fierce and savage, a slayer of men, like the flame at the beginning of a cycle. Let him first slay me and afterwards let him approach you.” And though he was spoken to for the third time, the elder remained in the same spot and did not retire. Then the Fortunate One by the exercise of his Supernormal Powers made him fall back and placed him in the midst of the monks.

At this moment a certain woman, catching sight of Nāḷāgiri, was terrified with the fear of death, and as she fled she dropped her child, which she was carrying on her hip, between the Tathāgata and the elephant and made her escape. The elephant, pursuing the woman, came up to the child, who uttered a loud cry. The Teacher, having spread his special loving-kindness, and uttering the honeyed accents of a voice like that of Brahmā, called to Nāḷāgiri, saying: “Ho! Nāḷāgiri, those that maddened you with sixteen pots of arrack did not do this that you might attack someone else, but acted thus thinking you would attack me. Do not tire out your strength by rushing about aimlessly but come here.”

On hearing the voice of the Teacher he opened his eyes and beheld the glorious form of the Fortunate One, and he became greatly agitated and by the power of Buddha the intoxicating effects of the strong drink passed off. Dropping his trunk and shaking his ears he came and fell down at the feet of the Tathāgata. Then the Teacher addressing him said: “Nāḷāgiri, you are a brute elephant, I am the Buddha elephant. Henceforth be not fierce and savage, nor a slayer of men, but cultivate thoughts of generosity.” So saying he stretched forth his right hand and coaxed the elephant’s forehead and taught the Dhamma to him in these words:

“This elephant should you presume to assail,
An awful doom you would erelong bewail.

To strike this elephant would destine you
To state of suffering in worlds to be.

From mad and foolish recklessness abstain,
The reckless fool to heaven will ne’er attain.

If in the next world you would win heaven’s bliss,
See that you do what is right in this.”

The whole body of the elephant constantly thrilled with joy, and had he not been a mere animal, he would have entered on the fruition of the First Path. The people, on beholding this miracle, shouted and snapped their fingers. In their joy they cast upon him all manner of ornaments and covered therewith all the body of the elephant. Thenceforth Nāḷāgiri was known as Dhanapālaka (keeper of treasure).

Now on the occasion of this encounter with Dhanapālaka eighty-four thousand beings drank the nectar of immortality. And the Teacher established Dhanapālaka in the Five Precepts. With his trunk taking up dust from the feet of the Fortunate One the elephant sprinkled it on his head, and retiring with bent body he stood bowing to the One with Ten Powers as long as he was in sight, and then he turned and entered the elephant stall. Thenceforth he was quite tame and harmed no man.

The Teacher, now that his desire was fulfilled, decided that the treasure should remain the property of those by whom it had been thrown upon the elephant and thinking: “Today I have wrought a great miracle. It is not seemly that I should go my rounds for alms in this city,” and after crushing the heretics, surrounded by a band of the monks, he sallied forth from the city like a victorious warrior chief and made straight for the Bamboo Grove. The citizens, taking with them a quantity of boiled rice, drink, and some solid food, went to the monastery and gave an almsgiving on a grand scale.

Then they began a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, “Sirs, has the elder Ānanda, Treasurer of the Dhamma, who attained to the analytic knowledges of one still in training, given up his life for the Perfect Buddha when Dhanapāla came?” The Teacher came and was told the subject of their discussion: he said: “Monk, in former times also Ānanda gave up his life for me,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past there was a brahmin village called Sālindiya on the east side of Rājagaha. The Bodhisatta was born there in that village in a brahmin farmer’s family. When he grew up he settled down and worked a farm of a thousand karīsas\(^\text{711}\) in a district of Magadha to the north-east of the village.

\(^\text{711}\) According to Childers, Pali Dictionary s.v. ammaṇam, this would be about eight thousand acres.
One day he had gone to the field with his men, and giving them orders to plough he went to a great pool at the end of the field to wash his face. In that pool there lived a crab of golden hue, beautiful and charming. The Bodhisatta having chewed his toothpick went down into the pool. When he was washing his mouth, the crab came near. Then he lifted up the crab and taking it laid it in his outer garment: and after doing his work in the field he put the crab again in the pool and went home. From that time when going to the field he always went first to that pool, laid the crab in his outer garment and then went about his work. So a strong feeling of confidence arose between them.

The Bodhisatta came to the field constantly. Now in his eyes were seen the five graces and the three circles very pure. A female crow in a nest on a palm in that corner of the field saw his eyes, and wishing to eat them said to her male crow, “Husband, I have a longing.” “A longing for what?” “I wish to eat the eyes of a certain brahmin.” “Your longing is a bad one: who will be able to get them for you!” “I know that you can’t: but in the ant-hill near our tree there lives a black snake, wait on him, he will bite the brahmin and kill him, then you will tear out his eyes and bring them to me.” He agreed and afterwards waited on the black snake. The crab was grown great at the time when the seed sown by the Bodhisatta was sprouting.

One day the snake said to the crow, “Friend, you are always waiting on me: what can I do for you?” “Sir, your female slave has taken a longing for the eyes of the master of this field, I wait on you in hopes of getting his eyes through your favour.” The snake said: “Well, that is not difficult, you shall get them,” and so encouraged him.

Next day the snake lay waiting for the brahmin’s coming, hidden in the grass, by the boundary of the field where he came. The Bodhisatta entering the pool and washing his mouth felt a return of affection for the crab, and embracing it laid it in his outer garment and went to the field. The snake saw him come, and rushing swiftly forward bit him in the flesh of the calf and having made him fall on the spot fled to his ant-hill. The fall of the Bodhisatta, the spring of the golden crab from the garment, and the perching of the crow on the Bodhisatta’s breast followed close on each other. The crow perching put his beak into the Bodhisatta’s eyes. The crab thought: “It was through this crow that the danger came on my friend: if I seize him the snake will come,” so seizing the crow by the neck with its claw firmly as if in a vice, he got weary and then loosed him a little. The crow called on the snake, “Friend, why do you forsake me and run away? This crab troubles me, come ere I die,” and so spoke the first verse:

1. “Gold-clawed creature with projecting eyes,
   Lake-bred, hairless, clad in bony shell,
   He has caught me: hear my woeful cries!
   Why do you leave a mate that loves you well?”

The snake hearing him, made its hood large and came consoling the crow.

The Teacher explaining the case after Fully Awakening spoke the second verse:

2. “The snake fell on the crab amain, his friend he'd not forsake:
   Puffing his mighty hood he came: but the crab turned on the snake.”

The crab being weary then loosed him a little. The snake thinking: “Crabs do not eat the flesh of crows nor of snakes, then for what reason does this one seize us?” in enquiry spoke the third verse:

3. “'Tis not for the sake of food
   Crabs would seize a snake or crow:
   Tell me, you whose eyes protrude,
   Why you take and grip us so?”

Hearing him, the crab explaining the reason spoke two verses:

4. “This man took me from the pool,
   Great the kindness he has done;
   If he dies, my grief is full:
   Serpent, he and I are one.

5. Seeing I am grown so great
   All would kill me willingly:
   Fat and sweet and delicate,
   Crows at sight would injure me!”

Hearing him, the snake thought: “By some means I must deceive him and free myself and the crow.” So to deceive him he spoke the sixth verse:
6. “If you have seized us only for his sake,
I'll take the poison from him: let him rise.
Quick! From the crow and me your pincers take;
Till then the poison’s sinking deep, he dies.”

Hearing him the crab thought: “This one wishes to make me let these two go by some means and then run away, he knows not my skill in device; now I will loosen my claw so that the snake can move, but I will not free the crow,” so he spoke the seventh verse: [3.298]

7. “I'll free the snake, but not the crow;
The crow shall be a hostage bound:
Never shall I let him go
Till my friend be safe and sound.”

So saying he loosened his claw to let the snake go at his ease. The snake took away the poison and left the Bodhisatta’s body free from it. He rose up well and stood in his natural hue. The crab thinking: “If these two be well there will be no prosperity for my friend, I will kill them,” crushed both their heads like lotus-buds with his claws and took the life from them. The female crow fled away from the place. The Bodhisatta spiked the snake’s body with a stick and threw it on a bush, let the golden crab go free in the pool, bathed and then went to Sālindiya. From that time there was still greater friendship between him and the crab.

The lesson ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identifying the Jātaka spoke the last verse:

8. “Māra, was the dusky serpent, Devadatta was the crow,
Good Ānanda was the crab, and I the brahmin long ago.”

At the end of the Truths many reached the First Path and the other Paths. The female crow was Ciñcamañavikā, though this is not mentioned in the last verse.

Ja 390 Mayhakajātaka
The Story about the Mayhaka (Bird) (6s)

In the present one miserly merchant dies and the king inherits his wealth, and asks the Buddha why he was so rich on the one hand, and so miserly on the other. The Buddha first tells a story of how in a previous life he had given to a Paccekabuddha, but had later regretted it. Then the Buddha tells another story in which a brother killed his adopted son in order to gain his inheritance, and he was reproved by the boy’s father, and mended his ways.

The Bodhisattha = the elder brother (jeṭṭhaka), the visiting wealthy man = the younger brother (kaniṭṭha).

Keywords: Miserliness, Greed, Animals, Birds, Devas.

“Did we joy.” {3.299} The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, of a stranger merchant. There was in Sāvatthi a stranger merchant, rich and of great substance: he did not enjoy his wealth himself nor give it to others: if choice food of fine flavours was served he would not eat it, eating only broth of rice-dust with sour gruel; if silken clothes perfumed with incense were brought him he had them removed, and wore clothes of coarse hair-cloth; if a chariot adorned with jewels and gold and drawn by high-bred horses were brought him, he had it taken away and went in a broken-down old chariot with a parasol of leaves overhead.

All his life he did nothing with gifts or the other merits, and when he died he was born in the hell Roruva. His substance was heirless, and the king’s men carried it into the palace in seven days and nights. After it was carried in, the king went after breakfast to Jetavana, and saluted the Teacher. When he was asked why he did not wait regularly on Buddha, he answered, “Lord, a stranger merchant has died at Sāvatthi, seven days have been spent in carrying his wealth, to which he left no heir, into my house, but though he had all that wealth he neither enjoyed it himself nor gave it to others, his wealth was like lotus-tanks guarded by Yakkhas. One day he fell into the jaws of death after refusing to enjoy the flavour of choice meats and the like. Now why did that selfish and undeserving man gain all that wealth, and for what reason did he not incline his thoughts to the enjoyment of it?” This was the question he put to the Teacher. “Great king, the reason why he gained his wealth and yet did not enjoy it, was this,” and so at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, there was an unbelieving selfish merchant in Benares, he gave nothing to any one, he provided for no one. One day going to wait on the king he saw a Paccekabuddha, named Tagarasikhi, begging, and saluting him he asked, “Sir, have you got alms?” The Paccekabuddha said: “Am I not begging, merchant?” {3.300} The merchant gave orders to his man, “Go, take him to my house, set him on my seat and give him his bowl-full of the food prepared for me.” The man took him to the house, set him down, and told the merchant’s wife: she gave him his bowl full of food of excellent flavours. He taking the food and leaving the house went along the street. The merchant, returning from court, saw him and saluting asked him if he had got food. “I have, merchant.” The merchant, looking at his bowl, could not reconcile his will to it, but thinking: “Had my slaves or work-people eaten this food of mine they would have done me hard service, alas, it is a loss for me!” and he could not make the after-thought perfect.

Now giving is rich in fruit only to one who can make the three thoughts perfect:

Did we joy to feel the wish to give,
Give the gift, and give it cheerfully,
Ne'er regret the giving while we live,
Children born of us would never die. [Ja 447]

Joy before the bounty’s given, giving cheerfully,
Pleasure at the thought thereafter, that is perfect generosity. [AN 6.37, Pv 305]

So the stranger merchant gained much wealth, by reason of his giving alms to Tagarasikhi, but he could not enjoy his wealth because he could not make his after-thought pure. “Lord, why did he have no son?” The Teacher said: “O king, this was the cause of his having no son,” and so at his request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a merchant’s family worth eighty crores. When he grew up, at his parents’ death he provided for his younger brother and carried on the house; he made an alms-chamber at the house-door and lived as a householder giving much in alms. One son was born to him; and when the son could walk on his feet, he saw the misery of desires and the blessing of renunciation, so handing over all his substance together with his wife and child to his younger brother, he exhorted him to continue almsgiving with diligence; then he became an ascetic, and gaining the Super Knowledges and Attainments he dwelt in the Himālayas.

The younger brother took that one son: but seeing him grow up he thought: “If my brother’s son lives, the estate will be divided into two parts, I will kill my brother’s son.” So one day, sinking him in a river, he killed him. After he had bathed and come home, his brother’s wife asked him, “Where is my boy?” “He was disporting himself in the river; I looked for him but could not see him.” She wept and said nothing. The Bodhisatta, knowing of this matter, thought: “I will make this business public,” and so going through the air and lighting at Benares in fair raiment under and upper, he stood at the door; not seeing the alms-chamber, he thought: “That wicked man has destroyed the chamber.” The younger brother, hearing of his coming, came and saluted the Bodhisatta and taking him up to the roof gave him good food to eat. And when the meal was over, seated for friendly talk he said: “My son does not appear: where is he?” “Dead, my lord.” “In what way?” “At a bathing place: but I do not know the exact way.” “Not know, you wicked man! Your deed was known to me, did you not kill him in that way? Will you be able to keep that wealth when destroyed by kings and others? What difference is there, between you and the Mayhaka bird?” So the Bodhisatta expounding the Dhamma with the ease of a Buddha spoke these verses:

1. “There is a bird called Mayhaka, in mountain cave it lives:
   On pipal trees with ripening fruit, ‘Mine, mine,’ the cry it gives. \[3.302\]

2. The other birds, while thus he plains, in flocks about him fly:
   They eat the fruit, but still goes on the Mayha’s plaintive cry.

3. And even so a single man enormous wealth may win,
   And yet may not divide it fair between himself and kin.

4. Not once enjoyment does he reap, of raiment or of food,
   Of perfumes or flower garlands; nor does his kinsfolk good.

5. ‘Mine, mine,’ he whimpers as he guards his treasures greedily:
   But kings, or robbers, or his heirs that wish to see him die
   Pillage his wealth: yet still goes on the miser’s plaintive cry.

6. A wise man, gaining riches great, is helpful to his kin:
   ’Tis thus he’ll win repute on earth and heaven hereafter win.” \[3.303\]

So the Great Being expounding to him the Dhamma made him renew the almsgiving, and going to the Himālayas pursued meditation without interruption and so went to the Brahmā Realm.

After the lesson, the Teacher said: “So, great king, the stranger merchant had neither son nor daughter for all that time because he killed his brother’s son,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “The younger brother was the stranger merchant, the elder was myself.”

Ja 391 Dhajaviheṭhajātaka
The Story about the Sign of Oppression (6s)

Alternative Title: Vijjādharajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks talk about the effort the Buddha makes to help and save others. The Buddha tells a story of how the behaviour of a bad ascetic had gotten all ascetics banned from a kingdom, and what Sakka did to expose the culprit and get the others reinstated.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 469 Mahākaṇha,
Quoted at: Ja 50 Dummedha, Ja 347 Ayakūṭa, Ja 391 Dhajaviheṭha.

Keywords: Cheating, Deceit, Appearances, Devas.

“Noble of face.” [3.189] The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning his going about for the whole world’s good. The occasion will appear in the Mahākaṇhajātaka [Ja 469].

One day, they say, the monks as they sat in the Dhamma Hall, were talking together. “Sirs,” one would say, “the Teacher, ever practising friendship towards the multitudes of the people, has forsaken an agreeable abode, and lives just for the good of the world. He has attained supreme wisdom, yet of his own accord takes bowl and robe, and goes on a journey of eighteen leagues or more. For the five elders he set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma; on the fifth day of the half-month he recited the Anattalakkhaṇa discourse, and made them Arahats; he went to Uruvela, and to the ascetics with matted hair he showed three and a half thousand miracles, and persuaded them to join the Saṅgha; at Gayāsiṣa he taught the Discourse upon Fire, and made a thousand of these ascetics Arahats; to Mahākassapa, when he had gone forward three miles to meet him, after three discourses he gave the higher ordination; all alone, after the noon-day meal, he went a journey of forty-five leagues, and then established in the Fruit of the Third Path Pukkusa (a youth of very good birth); to meet Mahākappina he went forward... a space of two thousand leagues, and made him an Arahat; alone, in the afternoon he went a journey of thirty leagues, and made that cruel and harsh man Āṅgulimāla an Arahat; thirty leagues also he traversed, and established Āḷavaka in the Fruit of the First Path, and saved the prince; in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three he dwelt three months, and taught Abhidhamma to eight hundred millions of deities; to the Brahmā Realm he went, and destroyed the false Dhamma of Baka Brahmā, and made ten thousand Brahmās Arahats; every year he goes on pilgrimage in three districts, and to such men as are capable of receiving, he gives the Refuges, the Precepts, and the Fruits of the different stages; he even acts for the good of Nāgas and Garuḍas and the like, in many ways.”

In such words they praised the goodness and worth of the One with Ten Powers’ life for the good of the world. The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about as they sat there? They told him.

Then the Teacher said: “Monks, this is not the first time the Tathāgata has gone about for the world’s good,” and so told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was Sakka. At that time a wizard, using his magic, came at midnight and corrupted the chief queen of Benares. Her handmaids knew of this. She herself went to the king and said: “Your majesty, some man enters the royal chamber at midnight and corrupts me.” “Could you make any mark on him?” “I can.” So she got a bowl of real vermilion, and when the man came at night and was going away after enjoyment, she set the mark of her five fingers on his back and in the morning told the king. The king gave orders to his men to go and looking everywhere bring a man with a vermilion mark on his back.

Now the wizard after his misconduct at night stands by day in a cemetery on one foot worshipping the sun. The king’s men saw him and surrounded him, but he, thinking that his action had become known to them, {3.304} used his magic and flew away in the air. The king asked his men when they came back from seeing this, “Did you see him?” “Yes, we saw him.” “Who is he?” “An ascetic, your majesty.” For after his misconduct at night he lived by day in the guise of an ascetic. The king thought: “These men go about by day in ascetic’s garb and misconduct themselves at night,” so being angry with the monks, he adopted heretical views, and sent round a proclamation by drum that all the monks must depart from his kingdom and that his men would punish them wherever found.

All the ascetics fled from the kingdom of Kāsi, which was three hundred leagues in extent, to other royal cities, and there was no one, righteous ascetic or brahmin, to preach to the men of all Kāsi; so that the men without preaching became savage, and being averse to Generosity and the Precepts were born in a state of punishment for the most part as they died, and never got birth in heaven.

Sakka, not [3.190] seeing any new Devaputtas, reflected on what the reason might be, and saw that it was the expulsion of the monks from the kingdom by the king of Benares owing to his adopting heretical views in anger about the wizard, then he thought: “Except myself there is no one who can destroy this king’s heresy; I will be the helper of the king and his subjects,” so he went to the Paccekabuddhas in the Nandamūla cave and said: “Sirs, give me an old Paccekabuddha, I wish to convert the kingdom of Kāsi.” He got the senior among them. When he took his bowl and robes Sakka set him before and came himself after, making respectful salutation and venerating the Paccekabuddha: himself becoming a beautiful young monk he went thrice round the whole city from end to end, and then coming to the king’s gate he stood in the air. They told the king, “Your majesty, there is a beautiful young monk with an ascetic standing in the air at the king’s gate.” The king rose from his seat and standing at the lattice said: “Young monk, why do you, who are beautiful, stand venerating that ugly monk and holding his bowl and robes?” and so talking with him he spoke the first verse:

1. “Noble of face, you make obeisance low;
   Behind one mean and poor to sight you go:
   Is he your better or your equal, say,
   Declare to us your name and his, we pray.”

The Sakka answered, “Great king, ascetics are in the place of teachers; therefore it is not right that I should utter his name, but I will tell you my own name,” so he spoke the second verse:

---

712 It is wrong to tell the name of a saintly teacher. cf. Mahāvagga i. 74. 1.
2. “Gods do not tell the lineage and the name
   Of saints devout and perfect in the way;
   As for myself, my title I proclaim,
   Sakka, the lord whom thirty gods obey.”

The king hearing this asked in the third verse what was the blessing of venerating the monk:

3. “He who beholds the saint of perfect merits,
   And walks behind him with obeisance low;
   I ask, O king of gods, what he inherits,
   What blessings will another life bestow?”

Sakka replied in the fourth verse:

4. “He who beholds the saint of perfect merits,
   Who walks behind him with obeisance low:
   Great praise from men in this world he inherits,
   And death to him the path of heaven will show.”

The king hearing Sakka’s words gave up his own heretical views, and in delight spoke the fifth verse: [3.191]

5. “Oh, fortune’s sun on me today does rise,
   Our eyes have seen your majesty divine:
   Your saint appears, O Sakka, to our eyes,
   And many a virtuous deed will now be mine.”

Sakka, hearing him praising his master, spoke the sixth verse:

6. “Surely ’tis good to venerate the wise,
   To knowledge who their learned thoughts incline:
   Now that the saint and I have met thine eyes,
   O king, let many a virtuous deed be thine.” [3.307]

Hearing this the king spoke the last verse:
7. “From anger free, with grace in every thought,
   I'll lend an ear whenever strangers sue:
   I take your counsel good, I bring to nought
   My pride and serve you, Lord, with homage due.”

Having said so he came down from the terrace, saluted the Paccekabuddha and stood on one side. The Paccekabuddha sat cross-legged in the air and said: “Great king, that wizard was no monk, henceforward recognise that the world is not vanity, that there are good ascetics and brahmins, and so give gifts, practise morality, keep the holy-days,” preaching to the king. Sakka also by his power stood in the air, and preaching to the townsfolk, “Henceforward be zealous,” he sent round proclamation by drum that the ascetics and brahmins who had fled should return. Then both went back to their own place. The king stood firm in the admonition and did good works.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Paccekabuddha reached Nibbāna, the king was Ānanda, Sakka was myself.”

Ja 392 Bhisapupphajātaka

The Story about the Lotus Flower (6s)

Alternative Title: Singhapupphajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is blamed by a Devatā for smelling a flower. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past, in which a Devadhītā explains she does not reprehend ordinary thieves, but, because of his profession as an ascetic, his behaviour needs to be beyond reproach.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Uppalavaṇṇā = Devadhītā.

Keywords: Theft, Probity, Devas.

“You were never.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a certain monk. The story is that the monk had left Jetavana and dwelt in the Kosala kingdom near a certain wood: one day he went down into a lotus-pool, {3.308} and seeing a lotus in flower he stood to leeward and smelt [3.192] it. Then the Devatā who dwelt in that part of the forest frightened him saying: “Sir, you are a thief of odours, this is a kind of theft.” He went back in a fright to Jetavana, and saluted the Teacher and sat down. “Where have you been staying, monk?” “In such and such a wood, and the Devatā frightened me in such and such a way.” The Teacher said: “You are not the first who have been frightened by a Devatā when smelling a flower; sages of old have been frightened in like manner,” and at the monk’s request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family of a village in Kāsi: when he grew up he learned the arts at Taxila, and afterwards became an ascetic and lived near a lotus-pool. One day he went down into the pool and stood smelling a lotus in full flower. A Devadhītā who was in a hollow in a trunk of a tree alarming him spoke the first verse:

1. “You were never given that flower you smell, though it’s only a single bloom; ‘Tis a species of larceny, venerable sir, you are stealing its perfume.”

Then the Bodhisatta spoke the second verse:

2. “I neither take nor break the flower: from afar I smell the bloom. I cannot tell on what pretence you say I steal perfume.”

At the same moment a man was digging in the pool for lotus-fibres and breaking the lotus-plants. The Bodhisatta seeing him said: “You call a man thief if he smells the flower from afar: why do you not speak to that other man?” So in talk with her he spoke the third verse:

3. “A man who digs the lotus-roots and breaks the stalks I see: Why don’t you call the conduct of that man disorderly?”

The Devatā, explaining why she did not speak to him, spoke the fourth and fifth verses:

4. “Disgusting like a nurse’s dress are men disorderly: I have no speech with men like him, but I deign to speak to you.

5. When a man is free from evil stains and seeks for purity, A wrong like a hair-tip shows on him like a dark cloud in the sky.”

So alarmed by her the Bodhisatta in emotion spoke the sixth verse:
5. “For sure, Yakkha, you know me well, to pity me you deign:
If you see me do the like offence, pray speak to me again.”

Then the Devadhītā spoke to him the seventh verse:

7. “I am not here to serve you, no hireling folk are we:
Find, monk, for yourself the path to reach felicity.” [3.193] [3.310]

So exhorting him she entered her own abode. The Bodhisatta entered on the Absorptions and was reborn in the Brahmā Realm.

The lesson ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the end of the Truths, the monk was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time the Devadhītā was Uppalavaṇṇā, the ascetic myself.”

Ja 393 Vighāsajātaka

The Story about the (One who Eats) Remnants (6s)

Alternative Title: Vighāsādajātaka (Cst)

In the present some monks are not serious about their ascetic life. The Buddha tells a story of seven brothers who became ascetics, but enjoyed amusements and took great care of their bodies. Sakka, in the form of a parrot, reproved their behaviour.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
the monks who played around = the seven brothers (satta bhātaro).

Keywords: Asceticism, Gifts, Animals, Birds.

“Happy life is theirs.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in the East Garden, concerning some monks who were given to amusement. The great Moggallāna had shaken their dwelling and alarmed them. The monks sat discussing their fault in the Dhamma Hall. The Teacher being told this said to them, “They are not given to amusement for the first time,” and so told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was Sakka. Seven brothers in a certain village of Kāsi seeing the evil of desires had renounced them and become ascetics: they dwelt in Mejjhāraṇṇa but enjoyed various kinds of amusement, not practising devotion diligently and strengthening their bodies. Sakka, king of gods, said: “I will alarm them,” and so he became a parrot, came to their dwelling-place and perching on a tree spoke the first verse to alarm them:
{3.311}

1. “Happy life is theirs who live on remnants left from generosity:
Praise in this world is their lot, and in the next felicity.”

Then one of them hearing the parrot’s words called to the rest, and spoke the second verse:

2. “Should not wise men listen when a parrot speaks in human tongue:
Hearken, monks: ’tis our praises clearly that this bird has sung.”

Then the parrot denying this spoke the third verse:

3. “Not your praises I am singing, carrion-eaters: list to me, Refuse is the food you eat, not remnants left from generosity.” [3.194]

When they heard him, they all together spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Seven years ordained, with duly tonsured hair,
In Mejjhārañña here we spend our days,
Living on remnants: if you blame our fare,
Who is it then you praise?”

The Great Being spoke the fifth verse, putting them to shame:

5. “Leavings of the lion, tiger, ravening beast, are your supply:
Refuse truly, though you call it remnants left from generosity.” {3.312}

Hearing him the ascetics said: “If we are not eaters of remnants, then who pray are?” Then he telling them the true meaning spoke the sixth verse:

6. “They who giving alms to monks and brahmans, wants to satisfy Eat the rest, ’tis they who live on remnants left from generosity.”

So the Bodhisatta put them to shame and went to his own place.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the seven brothers were the sportive monks, Sakka was myself.”
Ja 394 Vaṭṭakajātaka

The Story about the (Fat) Quail (6s)

In the present one monk is very greedy in all he does. The Buddha tells a story of how a crow goes to the jungle and sees a fat quail, and asks him how come he is so well off on such scanty food. The quail reveals the reason.

The Bodhisatta = the quail (vaṭṭaka),
the greedy monk = the crow (kāka).

Keywords: Greed, Contentment, Animals, Birds.

“Oil and butter.” The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a greedy monk. Finding that he was greedy the Teacher said to him, “This is not the first time you are greedy: once before through greed in Benares you were not satisfied with carcases of elephants, oxen, horses and men; and in hopes of getting better food you went to the forest,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a quail and lived in the forest on rude grass and seeds. At the time there was in Benares a greedy crow who, not content with carcases of elephants and other animals, went to the forest in hopes of better food: eating wild fruits there he saw the Bodhisatta and thinking: “This quail is very fat: I fancy he eats sweet food, I will ask [3.195] him of his food and eating it become fat myself,” he perched on a bough above the Bodhisatta. The Bodhisatta, {3.313} without being asked, gave him greeting and spoke the first verse:

1. “Oil and butter are your victuals, nuncle; rich your food, I know:
Tell me then what is the reason of your leanness, master crow.”

Hearing his words the crow spoke three verses:

2. “I dwell in midst of many foes, my heart goes pit-a-pat
In terror as I seek my food: how can a crow be fat?

3. Crows spend their lives in fear, their wits for mischief ever keen;
The bits they pick are not enough; good quail, that’s why I’m lean.
4. Rude grass and seeds are all your food, there’s little richness there;
Then tell me why you’re fat, good quail, on such a scanty fare.”

The Bodhisatta hearing him spoke these verses, explaining the reason of his fatness:

5. “I have content and easy mind, short distances to go,
I live on anything I get, and so I’m fat, good crow.

6. Content of mind, and happiness with little care of heart,
A standard easily attained: that life’s the better part.” {3.314}

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka. At the end of the Truths the monk was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the crow was the greedy monk, the quail was myself.”

Ja 395 Kākajātaka
The Story about the Crow (6s)

Alternative Title: Pārāvatajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is very greedy and goes from supporter to supporter collecting food. The Buddha tells how this monk was also greedy in a previous life when, as a crow, he deceived his friend the pigeon in order to get access to a kitchen, which he stole from. But there the cook caught and plucked him and when he was seen by the pigeon he pretended it was his new style.

The Bodhisatta = the pigeon (pārāvata),
the greedy monk = the crow (kāka).

Present Source: Ja 434 Cakkavāka,
Quoted at: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 260 Dūta, Ja 395 Kāka.

Keywords: Greed, Deception, Animals, Birds.

“Our old friend.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a greedy monk. The occasion is as above.713

713 [I include the following from the parallel story at Ja 42 Kapotajātaka.]
This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a greedy monk. He was, it was said, greedy after the Buddhist requisites and casting off all duties of master and pastor, entered Sāvatthi quite early, and after drinking excellent rice-gruel served with many a kind of solid food in the house of Visākhā, and after eating in the daytime various dainties, paddy, meat and boiled rice, not satisfied with this he went about thence to the house of Culla Anāthapiṇḍika, and the king of Kosala, and various others.

But on this occasion the monks told the Teacher, saying: “Sir, this monk is greedy.” Said the Teacher, “Is it true as they say, monk, that you are greedy?” “Yes, sir,” was the reply. “So too in bygone days, monk, you were greedy, and by reason of your greediness lost your life; also you caused the wise and good to lose their home.” And so saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a pigeon and lived in a nest-basket in the kitchen of a Benares merchant. A crow became intimate with him and lived there also. Here the story is to be expanded.

Now one day the Lord High Treasurer had in a store of fish which the cook hung up about the kitchen. Filled with greedy longing at the sight, the crow made up his mind to stay at home next day and treat himself to this excellent fare.

So all the night long he lay groaning away; and next day, when the Bodhisatta was starting in search of food, and cried, “Come along, friend crow,” the crow replied, “Go without me, my lord; for I have a pain in my stomach.” “Friend,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I never heard of crows having pains in their stomachs before. True, crows feel faint in each of the three night-watches; but if they eat a lamp-wick, their hunger is appeased for the moment. You must be hankering after the fish in the kitchen here. Come now, man’s food will not agree with you. Do not give way like this, but come and seek your food with me.” “Indeed, I am not able, my lord,” said the crow. “Well, your own conduct will show,” said the

---

714 [I have expanded the story also from Ja 42 Kapotajātaka.]
Bodhisatta. “Only fall not a prey to greed, but stand steadfast.” And with this exhortation, away he flew to find his daily food.

The cook took several kinds of fish, and dressed some one way, some another. Then lifting the lids off his saucepans a little to let the steam out, he put a colander on the top of one and went outside the door, where he stood wiping the sweat from his brow. Just at that moment out popped the crow’s head from the basket. A glance told him that the cook was away, and, “Now or never,” he thought, “is my time. The only question is shall I choose minced meat or a big lump?” Arguing that it takes a long time to make a full meal of minced meat, he resolved to take a large piece of fish and sit and eat it in his basket. So out he flew and alighted on the colander. “Click” went the colander.

“What can that be?” said the cook, running in on hearing the noise. Seeing the crow, he cried, “Oh, there’s that rascally crow wanting to eat my master’s dinner. I have to work for my master, not for that rascal! What’s he to me, I should like to know?”

The cook pulled out the crow’s feathers and sprinkled him with flour, then piercing a cowrie he hung it on the crow’s neck and threw him into a basket. The Bodhisatta came from the wood, and seeing him made a jest and spoke the first verse:

1. “Our old friend! Look at him!
   A jewel bright he wears;
   His beard in gallant trim,
   How good our friend appears!” [3,315]

The crow hearing him spoke the second verse:

2. “My nails and hair had grown so fast,
   They hampered me in all I did:
   A barber came along at last,
   And of superfluous hair I’m rid.”

Then the Bodhisatta spoke the third verse:
3. “ Granted you got a barber then,
Who has cropped your hair so well:
Round your neck, will you explain,
What’s that tinkling like a bell?”

Then the crow uttered two verses:

4. “Men of fashion wear a gem
Round the neck, it’s often done;
I am imitating them,
Don’t suppose it’s just for fun.

5. If you’re really envious
Of my beard that’s trimmed so true:
I can get you barbered thus;
You may have the jewel too.”

The Bodhisatta hearing him spoke the sixth verse:

6. “Nay, ’tis you they best become,
Gem and beard that’s trimmed so true.
I find your presence troublesome;
I go with a good-day to you.” (3.316)

With these words he flew up and went elsewhere; and the crow died then and there.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths, the greedy monk was established in the fruition of the Third Path. “At that time the crow was the greedy monk, the pigeon was myself.”
Book VII. Sattanipāta
The Section with Seven Verses
Ja 396 Kukkujātaka
The Story about (One and a Half) Cubit (Peak) (7s)

In the present the Buddha admonishes the king of Kosala that he should rule righteously, and all will be well with the kingdom. He then tells a story of how a wise minister once used skilful parables to guide a king who had gone astray.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paññītināccha), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 521 Tesakūṇa, Quoted at: Ja 334 Rājovāda, Ja 396 Kukku, Ja 520 Gaṇḍatindu.

Keywords: Justice, Virtue.

“The peak’s a cubit.” [3.197] {3.317} – The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the admonition of a king. The occasion will appear in the Tesakūṇajātaka [Ja 521].

This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told by way of admonition to the king of Kosala. Now this king came to hear the preaching of the Dhamma and the Teacher addressed him in the following terms, “A king, sire, ought to rule his kingdom righteously, for whenever kings are unrighteous, then also are his officers unrighteous.” And admonishing him in the right way as related in the Catukkanipāta [Ja 334] he pointed out the suffering and the blessing involved in following or abstaining from evil courses, and expounded in detail the misery resulting from sensual pleasures, comparing them to dreams and the like, saying: “In the case of these men,

No bribe can move relentless death, no kindness mollify,
No one in fight can vanquish death. For all are doomed to die.

And when they depart to another world, except their own virtuous action they have no other sure refuge, so that they must inevitably forsake low associations, and for their reputation’s sake they must not be careless, but be earnest and exercise rule in righteousness, even as kings of old, before Buddha arose, abiding in the admonition of the wise, ruled righteously and departing attained to the heavenly city,” and at the request of the king he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his councillor in things temporal and spiritual. The king was set on the way of the evil courses, ruled his kingdom unrighteously and collected wealth by oppressing the people. The Bodhisatta wishing to admonish him went about looking for a parable. Now the king’s bedchamber was unfinished and the roof was not complete upon it; the rafters supported a peak but were only just set in position. The king had gone and taken his pleasure in the park; when he came to his house he looked up and saw the round peak, fearing it would fall upon him he went and stood outside, then looking up again he thought: “How is that peak resting so? And how are the rafters?” and asking the Bodhisatta he spoke the first verse; {3.318}

1. “The peak’s a cubit and a half in height,
   Eight spans will compass it in circuit round,
   Of siṁsapa and sāra built aright;
   Why does it stand so sound?”

Hearing him the Bodhisatta thought: “I have now got a parable to admonish the king,” and spoke these verses;

2. “The thirty rafters bent, of sāra wood,
   Set equally, encompass it around,
   They press it tightly, for their hold is good;
   ’Tis set aright and sound. [3.198]

3. So is the wise man, girt by faithful friends,
   By steadfast counsellors and pure;
   Never from height of fortune he descends,
   As rafters hold the peak secure.” (3.319)

While the Bodhisatta was speaking, the king considered his own conduct, “If there is no peak, the rafters do not stand fast; the peak does not stand if not held by the rafters; if the rafters break, the peak falls; and even so a bad king, not holding together his friends and ministers, his armies, his brahmins and householders, if these break up, is not held by them but falls from his power; a king must be righteous.”

At that instant they brought him a citron as a present. The king said to the Bodhisatta, “Friend, eat this citron.” The Bodhisatta took it and said: “O king, people who know not how to eat this make it bitter or acid; but wise men who know take away the bitter, and without removing the acid or spoiling the citron-flavour they eat it,” and by this parable he showed the king the means of collecting wealth, and spoke two verses;

4. “The rough-skinned citron bitter is to eat,
   If it remain untouched by carver’s steel;
   Take but the pulp, O king, and it is sweet;
   You spoil the sweetness if you add the peel.

5. Even so the wise man without violence,
   Gathers king’s dues in village and in town,
   Increases wealth, and yet gives no offence;
   He walks the way of right and of renown.” [3.320]

The king taking counsel with the Bodhisatta went to a lotus-tank, and seeing a lotus in flower, with a hue like the new-risen sun, not defiled by the water, he said: “Friend, that lotus grown in the water stands undefiled by the water.” Then the Bodhisatta said: “O king, so should a king be,” and spoke these verses in admonition;

6. “Like the lotus in the pool,
   White roots, waters pure, sustain it;
   In the sun’s face flowering full,
   Dust nor mud nor wet can stain it.

7. So the man whom virtues rule,
   Meek and pure and good we style him;
   Like the lotus in the pool
   Stain of wrong cannot defile him.” [3.321]

The king hearing the Bodhisatta’s admonition afterwards ruled his kingdom righteously, and doing good actions, generosity and the rest, became destined for heaven.
After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was Ānanda, the wise minister myself.”

Ja 397 Manojajātaka

The Story about (the Lion) Manoja (7s)

In the present a monk ordained under the Buddha is easily persuaded to partake of Devadatta’s good food, rather than go on almsround. He is brought to the Buddha who tells a story of a lion who befriended a jackal and through following his bad advice was killed by the king’s men.

The Bodhisatta = the father, the king of the lions (pitā sīharājā), Rāhulamātā = the mother (mātā),
Khemā = the wife (bhariyā),
Uppalavaṇṇā = the sister (bhaginī),
the monk who sided with the enemy = (the son) Manoja,
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 141 Godhajātaka, Ja 184 Giridantajātaka, Ja 186 Dadhivāhanajātaka, Ja 397 Manojajātaka.

Keywords: Bad company, Bad advice, Animals.

“The bow is bent.” [3.199] The Teacher told this while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, concerning a monk who kept bad company. The occasion was given at length in the Mahilāmukhajātaka [Ja 26].

This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta, who, having secured the adherence of prince Ajātasattu, had attained both gain and honour. Prince Ajātasattu had a monastery built for Devadatta at Gayāsīsa, and every day brought to him five hundred pots of perfumed three-year-old rice flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. All this gain and honour brought Devadatta a great following, with whom Devadatta lived on, without ever stirring out of his monastery.

At that time there were living in Rājagaha two friends, of whom one had taken the vows under the Teacher, while the other had taken them under Devadatta. And these continued to see one another, either casually or by visiting the monasteries. Now one day the disciple of Devadatta said to the other, “Sir, why do you daily go round for alms with the sweat streaming off you? Devadatta sits quietly at Gayāsīsa and feeds on the best of fare, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. There’s no way like his. Why create misery for yourself? Why should it not be a good thing for you to come the first thing in the morning to the monastery at Gayāsīsa and there drink our rice-gruel with a relish after it, try our eighteen kinds of solid victuals, and enjoy our excellent soft food, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings?”
The Section with Seven Verses – 1400

Being pressed time after time to accept the invitation, the other began to want to go, and thenceforth used to go to Gayāsīsa and there eat and eat, not forgetting however to return to the Bamboo Grove at the proper hour. Nevertheless he could not keep it secret always; and in a little while it came out that he used to go to Gayāsīsa and there regale himself with the food provided for Devadatta. Accordingly, his friends asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you regale yourself on the food provided for Devadatta?” “Who said that?” said he. “So-and-so said it.” “It is true, sirs, that I go to Gayāsīsa and eat there. But it is not Devadatta who gives me food; others do that.” “Sir, Devadatta is the foe of the Buddhas; in his wickedness, he has secured the adherence of Ajātasattu and by unrighteousness got gain and honour for himself. Yet you who have taken the vows according to this dispensation which leads to safety, eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness. Come; let us bring you before the Teacher.” And, taking with them the monk, they went to the Dhamma Hall.

When the Teacher became aware of their presence, he said: “Monks, are you bringing this monk here against his will?” “Yes, sir; this monk, after taking the vows under you, eats the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness.”

The Teacher said: “Monks, he is not keeping bad company for the first time,” and told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a lion and living with a lioness had two children, a son and a daughter. The son’s name was Manoja. When he grew up he took a young lioness to wife; and so they became five. Manoja killed wild buffaloes and other animals, and so got flesh to feed his parents, sister and wife. {3.322} One day in his hunting ground he saw a jackal called Giriya, unable to run away and lying on his belly. “How now, friend?” he said. “I wish to wait on you, my lord.” “Well, do so.” So he took the jackal to his den.

The Bodhisatta seeing him said: “Dear Manoja, jackals are wicked and sinners, and give wrong advice; don’t bring this one near you,” but could not hinder him. Then one day the jackal wished to eat horseflesh, and said to Manoja, “Sir, except horseflesh there is nothing we have not eaten; let us take a horse.” “But where are there horses, friend?” “At Benares by the river bank.” He took this advice and went with him there when the horses bathe in the river; he took one horse, and throwing it on his back he came with speed to the mouth of his den. His father eating the horseflesh said: “Dear, horses are kings’ property, kings have many stratagems, they have skilful archers to shoot; lions who eat horseflesh don’t live long, henceforward don’t take horses.”

The lion not following his father’s advice went on taking them. The king, hearing that a lion was taking the horses, had a bathing-tank for horses made inside the town; but the lion still came and took them. The king had a stable made, and had fodder and water given them inside it. The lion came over the wall and took the horses even from the stable. The king had an archer called who shot like lightning, and asked if he could shoot a lion. He said he could, and making a tower near the wall where the lion came he waited there. The lion came and, posting the jackal in a cemetery outside, sprang into the town to take the horses. The archer thinking: “His speed is very great when he comes,” did not shoot him, but when he was going away after taking a horse, hampered by the heavy weight, he hit him with a sharp arrow in the hind quarters. The arrow came out at his front quarters and flew in the air. The lion yelled, “I am shot.” The archer after shooting him twanged his bow like thunder. The jackal hearing the noise of lion and bow said to himself, “My comrade is shot and must be killed, there is no friendship with the dead, I will now go to my old home in the wood,” and so he spoke two verses;

1. “The bow is bent, the bowstring sounds amain;
   Manoja, king of beasts, my friend, is slain.
2. Alas, I seek the woods as best I may;
Such friendship’s naught; others must be my stay.”

The lion with a rush came and threw the horse at the den’s mouth, falling dead himself. His kinsfolk came out and saw him blood-stained, blood flowing from his wounds, dead from following the wicked; and his father, mother, sister and wife seeing him spoke four verses in order;

3. “His fortune is not prosperous whom wicked folk entice;
Look at Manoja lying there, through Giriya’s advice.

4. No joy have mothers in a son whose comrades are not good;
Look at Manoja lying there all covered with his blood.

5. And even so fares still the man, in low estate he lies,
Who follows not the counsel of the true friend and the wise.

6. This, or worse than this, his fate
Who is high, but trusts the low; [3.324]
See, ’tis thus from kingly state
He has fallen to the bow.”

Lastly, the verse spoken after Fully Awakening;

7. “Who follows outcasts is himself out cast,
Who courts his equals ne’er will be betrayed,
Who bows before the noblest rises fast;
Look therefore to your betters for thine aid.”

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths the monk who kept bad company was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the jackal was Devadatta, Manoja was the keeper of bad company, his sister was Uppalavaṅnā, his wife the nun Khemā, his mother the mother of Rāhula, his father myself.”

Ja 398 Sutanojātaka
The Story about (the Poor Man) Sutana (7s)

Alternative Title: Sutanujātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk supports his parents who have fallen into poverty and have no one left at home to support them. The Buddha tells a story of a king who, to secure his own release, sent a man to be eaten by a Yakkha every day. Eventually the Bodhisatta went and persuaded the Yakkha to give up his man-eating habit.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin student (māṇava), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā), Aṅgulimāla = the Yakkha.

Present Source: Ja 540 Sāma, Quoted at: Ja 164 Gijjha, Ja 398 Sutano, Ja 399 Gijjha, Ja 455 Mātiposaka, Ja 484 Sālikedāra, Ja 513 Jayaddisa, Ja 532 Sonananda.

Keywords: Filial piety, Cannibalism, Virtue, Devas.

“The king has sent.” [3.201] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a monk who supported his mother. The occasion will appear in the Sāmajātaka [Ja 540].

*They say that there was a wealthy merchant at Sāvatthi, who was worth eighteen crores; and he had a son who was very dear and winning to his father and mother. One day the youth went upon the terrace of the house, and opened a window and looked down on the street; and when he saw the great crowd going to Jetavana with perfumes and garlands in their hands to hear the Dhamma preached, he exclaimed that he would go too."

*So having ordered perfumes and garlands to be brought, he went to the monastery, and having distributed robes, medicines, drinks, etc. to the assembly and honoured the Fortunate One with perfumes and garlands, he sat down on one side. After hearing the Dhamma, and perceiving the evil consequences of desire and the blessings arising from adopting the ascetic life, when the assembly broke up he asked the Fortunate One for ordination, but he was told that the Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone who has not obtained the permission of his parents; so he went away, and lived a week without food, and having at last obtained his parents' consent, he returned and begged for ordination. The Teacher sent a monk who ordained him; and after he was ordained he obtained great honour and gain; he won the favour of his teachers and preceptors, and having received full orders he mastered the Dhamma in five years."

Then he thought to himself, “I live here distracted – it is not suitable for me,” and he became anxious to reach the goal of spiritual insight; so having obtained instruction in meditation from his teacher, he departed to a frontier village and dwelt in the forest, and there having entered a course of insight, however much he laboured and strove for twelve years, he failed to attain any special insight.

His parents also, as time went on, became poor, for those who hired their land or carried on merchandise for them, finding out that there was no son or brother in the family to enforce the payment, seized what they could lay their hands upon and ran away as they pleased, and the servants and labourers in the house seized the gold and coin and made off therewith, so that at the end the two were reduced to an evil plight and had not even a jug for pouring water; and at last they sold their dwelling, and finding themselves homeless, and in extreme misery, they wandered begging for alms, clothed in rags and carrying potsherds in their hands.

Now at that time a monk came from Jetavana to the son’s place of abode; he performed the duties of hospitality and, as he sat quietly, he first asked whence he was come; and learning that he was come from Jetavana he asked after the health of the Teacher and the principal disciples and then asked for news of his parents, “Tell me, sir, about the welfare of such and such a merchant’s family in Sāvatthi.” “O friend, don’t ask for news of that family.” “Why not, sir?” “They say that there was one son in that family, but he has become an ascetic in this dispensation, and since he left the world that family has gone to ruin; and at the present time the two old people are reduced to a most lamentable state and beg for alms.”

When he heard the other’s words he could not remain unmoved, but began to weep with his eyes full of tears, and when the other asked him why he wept, “O sir,” he replied, “they are my own father and mother, I am their son.” “O friend, your father and mother have come to ruin through you – do you go and take care of them.” “For twelve years,” he thought to himself, “I have laboured and striven but never been able to attain the Path or the Fruit; I must be incompetent; what have I to do with the ascetic life? I will become a householder and will support my parents and give away my wealth, and will thus eventually become destined for heaven.”

So having determined he gave up his abode in the forest to the elder, and the next day departed and by successive stages reached the monastery at the back of Jetavana which is not far from Sāvatthi. There he found two roads, one leading to Jetavana, the other to Sāvatthi. As he stood there, he thought: “Shall I see my parents first or the One with Ten Powers?” Then he said to himself, “In old days I saw my parents for a long time, from henceforth I shall rarely have the chance of seeing the Buddha; I will see the Fully Awakened One today and hear the Dhamma, and then tomorrow morning I will see my parents.” So he left the road to Sāvatthi and in the evening arrived at Jetavana.

Now that very day at daybreak, the Teacher, as he looked upon the world, had seen the potentialities of this young man, and when he came to visit him he praised the virtues of parents in the Mātiposakasutta [SN 7.19]. As he stood at the end of the assembly of elders and listened, he thought: “If I become a household I can support my parents; but the Teacher also says, ‘A son who has become an ascetic can be helpful,’ I went away before without seeing the Teacher, and I failed in such an imperfect ordination; I will now support my parents while still remaining an ascetic without becoming a householder.” So he took his ticket and his ticket-food and gruel, and felt as if he had committed a wrong deserving expulsion after a solitary abode of twelve years in the forest. In the morning he went to Sāvatthi and he thought to himself, “Shall I first get the gruel or see my parents?” He reflected that it would not be right to visit them in their poverty empty-handed; so he first got the gruel and then went to the door of their old house.

When he saw them sitting by the opposite wall after having gone their round for the alms given in broth, he stood not far from them in a sudden burst of sorrow with his eyes full of tears. They saw him but knew him not; then his mother, thinking that it was someone standing for alms, said to him, “We have nothing fit to be given to you, be pleased to pass on.” When he heard her, he repressed the grief which filled his heart and remained still standing with his eyes full of tears, and when he was addressed a second and a third time he still continued standing.

At last the father said to the mother, “Go to him; can this be your son?” She rose and went to him and, recognising him, fell at his feet and lamented, and the father also joined his lamentations, and there was a loud outburst of sorrow. To see his parents he could not control himself, but burst into tears; then, after yielding to his feelings, he said: “Do not grieve, I will support you,” so having comforted them and made them drink some gruel, and sit down on one side, he went again and begged for some food and gave it to them, and then went and asked for alms for himself, and having finished his meal, took up his abode at a short distance off.

From that day forward he watched over his parents in this manner; he gave them all the alms he received for himself, even those at the fortnightly distributions, and he went on separate expeditions for his own alms, and ate them; and whatever food he received as provision for the rainy season he gave to them, while he took their worn-out garments and dyed them with the doors fast closed and used them himself; but the days were few when he gained alms and there were many when he failed to win anything, and his inner and outer clothing became very rough.

As he watched over his parents he gradually grew very pale and thin and his friends and intimates said to him, “Your complexion used to be bright, but now you have become very pale – has some illness come upon you?” He replied, “No illness has come upon me, but a hindrance has befallen me,” and he told them the history. “Sir,” they replied, “the Teacher does not allow us to waste the offerings of the faithful, you do an unlawful act in giving to laymen the offerings of the faithful.” When he heard this he shrank away ashamed.

But not satisfied with this they went and told it to the Teacher, saying: “So and so, sir, has wasted the offerings of the faithful and used them to feed laymen.” The Teacher sent for the young man of family and said to him, “Is it true that you, an ascetic, take the offerings of the faithful and support laymen with them?” He confessed that it was true. Then the Teacher, wishing to praise what he had done and to declare an old action of his own, said: “When you support laymen whom do you support?” “My parents,” he answered. Then the Teacher, wishing to encourage him still more said: “Well done, well done,” three times, “You are in a path which I have traversed before you; I in old time, while going the round for alms, supported my parents.” The ascetic was encouraged thereby. At the request of the monks the Teacher, to make known his former actions, told them a story of the past. \[3.325\]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the family of a poor householder; they called his name Sutana. When he grew up he earned wages and supported his parents; when his father died, he supported his mother. The king of that day was fond of hunting. One day he went with a great retinue to a forest a league or two in extent, and made proclamation to all, “If a deer escape by any man’s post, the man is fined the value of the deer.” The ministers having made a concealed hut by the regular road gave it to the king. The deer were roused by the crying of men who had surrounded their lairs, and one antelope came to the king’s post. The king thought: “I will hit him,” and sent an arrow. The animal, who knew a trick, saw that the arrow was coming to his broadside, and wheeling round fell as if wounded by the arrow. The king thought: “I have hit him,” and rushed to seize him. The deer rose and fled like the wind. The ministers and the rest mocked the king. He pursued the deer and when it was tired he cut it in two with his sword; hanging the pieces on one stick he came as if carrying a pole and saying: “I will rest a little,” he drew near to a banyan tree by the road and lying down fell asleep.

A Yakkha called Makhādeva was reborn in that banyan, and got from Vessavaṇa all living things who came to it as his food. When the king rose he said: “Stay, you are my food,” and took him by the hand. “Who are you?” said the king. “I am a Yakkha born here, I get all men who come to this place as my food.” The king, taking good heart, asked, “Will you eat today only or continually?” “I will eat continually what I get.” “Then eat this deer today and let me go; from tomorrow I will send you a man with a plate of rice every day.” “Be careful then; on the day when no one is sent I will eat you.” “I am king of Benares; there is nothing I cannot do.” The Yakkha took his promise and let him go. When the king came to the town, he told the case to a minister in attendance and asked what was to be done. [3.202]

“Was a limit of time fixed, O king?” “No.” “That was wrong when you were about it; but never mind, there are many men in the jail.” “Then do you manage this affair, and give me life.” The minister agreed, and taking a man from the jail every day sent him to the Yakkha with a plate of rice without telling him anything. The Yakkha ate both rice and man. After a time the jails became empty. The king finding no one to carry the rice shook with fear of death. The minister comforting him said: “O king, desire of wealth is stronger than desire of life; let us put a packet of a thousand pieces on an elephant’s back and make proclamation

---

716 King of the Yakkhas.
by drum, “Who will take rice and go to the Yakkha and get this wealth?” and he did so.

The Bodhisatta thought: “I get pence and halfpence for my wages and can hardly support my mother; I will get this wealth and give it her, and then go to the Yakkha; if I can get the better of him, well, and if I cannot she will live comfortably,” so he told his mother, but she said: “I have enough, dear, I don’t need wealth,” and so forbade him twice; but the third time without asking her, he said: “Sirs, bring the thousand pieces, I will take the rice.” So he gave his mother the thousand pieces and said: “Don’t fret, dear; I will overcome the Yakkha and give happiness to the people; I will come making your tearful face to laugh,” and so saluting her he went to the king with the king’s men, and saluting him stood there.

The king said: “My good man, will you take the rice?” “Yes, O king.” “What should you take with you?” “Your golden slippers, O king.” “Why?” “O king, that Yakkha gets to eat all people standing on the ground at the foot of the tree; I will stand on slippers, not on his ground.” “Anything else?” “Your umbrella, O king.” “Why so?” “O king, the Yakkha gets to eat all people standing in the shade of his own tree; I will stand in the shade of the umbrella, not of his tree.” “Anything else?” “Your sword, O king.” “For what purpose?” “O king, even Amanussas fear those with weapons in their hands.” “Anything else?” “Your golden bowl, O king, filled with your own rice.” “Why, good man?” “It is not meet for a wise man like me to take coarse food in an earthen dish.” The king consented and sent officers to give him all he asked. The Bodhisatta said: “Fear not, O great king, I will come back today having overcome the Yakkha and caused you happiness,” and so taking the things needful and going to the place, he set men not far from the tree, put on the golden slippers, girt the sword, put the white umbrella over his head, and taking rice in a gold dish went to the Yakkha. The Yakkha watching the road saw him and thought: “This man comes not as they came on the other days, what is the reason?” The Bodhisatta drawing near the tree pushed the plate of rice in the shadow with the sword-point, and standing near the shadow spoke the first verse;
1. “The king has sent you rice prepared and seasoned well with meat; If Makhādeva is at home, let him come forth and eat!” [3.203] [3.328]

Hearing him the Yakkha thought: “I will deceive him, and eat him when he comes into the shadow,” and so he spoke the second verse;

2. “Come inside, young man, with your seasoned food, Both it and you, young man, to eat are good.”

Then the Bodhisatta spoke two verses;

3. “Yakkha, you’ll lose a great thing for a small, Men fearing death will bring no food at all.

4. You’ll have good supply of cheer, Pure and sweet and flavoured to your mind; But a man to bring it here, If you eat me, will be hard to find.” [3.329]

The Yakkha thought: “The young man speaks sense,” and being well disposed spoke two verses;

5. “Young Sutana, my interests are clearly as you show; Visit your mother then in peace, you have my leave to go.

6. Take sword, and parasol, and dish, young man, and go your ways, Visit your mother happily and bring her happy days.”

Hearing the Yakkha’s words the Bodhisatta was pleased, thinking: “My task is accomplished, the Yakkha overcome, much wealth won and the king’s word made good,” and so returning thanks to the Yakkha he spoke a final verse;

7. “With all your kith and kin, Yakkha, right happy may you be; The king’s command has been performed, and wealth has come to me.”

So he admonished the Yakkha, saying: “Friend, you did evil deeds of old, you were cruel and harsh, you ate the flesh and blood of others and so were born as a Yakkha; from henceforth do no murder or the like,” so telling the blessings of virtue and the misery of vice, he established the Yakkha in the five precepts; then he said: “Why dwell in the forest? Come, I will settle you by the city gate and make you get the best rice.” So he went away with the Yakkha, making him take the sword and the other things, and came to Benares. They told the king that Sutana was come with the Yakkha. The king with his ministers went out to meet the Bodhisatta, settled the Yakkha at the city gate and made him get the best rice; then he entered the town, made proclamation by drum, and calling a meeting of the townsfolk spoke the praises of the Bodhisatta and gave him the command of the army; himself was established in the Bodhisatta’s teaching, did the good works of generosity and the other virtues, and became destined for heaven.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths, the monk who supported his mother was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the Yakkha was Aṅgulimāla, the king Ānanda, the youth myself.”

Ja 399 Gijjhajātaka

The Story about the Vulture (who Supported his Mother)

(7s)

Alternative Title: Mātuposakagijjhajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk supports his parents. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of a vulture who supported his parents, and when caught by a hunter lamented their loss, not his own. The hunter, astonished at his virtue, set him free.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the vultures (gijjharājā), Channa = the hunter’s son (nesādaputta),
members of the royal family = the mother and father (mātāpitaro).

Present Source: Ja 540 Sāma,
Quoted at: Ja 164 Gijjhā, Ja 398 Sutano, Ja 399 Gijjhā, Ja 455 Mātiposaka, Ja 484 Sālikedāra, Ja 513 Jayaddisa, Ja 532 Sonananda.

Keywords: Filial piety, Virtue, Animals, Birds.

“How will the old folks.” [3.204] The Teacher told this when dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a monk who supported his mother.

They say that there was a wealthy merchant at Sāvatthi, who was worth eighteen crores; and he had a son who was very dear and winning to his father and mother. One day the youth went upon the terrace of the house, and opened a window and looked down on the street; and when he saw the great crowd going to Jetavana with perfumes and garlands in their hands to hear the Dhamma preached, he exclaimed that he would go too.

So having ordered perfumes and garlands to be brought, he went to the monastery, and having distributed robes, medicines, drinks, etc. to the assembly and honoured the Fortunate One with perfumes and garlands, he sat down on one side. After hearing the Dhamma, and perceiving the evil consequences of desire and the blessings arising from adopting the ascetic life, when the assembly broke up he asked the Fortunate One for ordination, but he was told that the Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone who has not obtained the permission of his parents; so he went away, and lived a week without food, and having at last obtained his parents’ consent, he returned and begged for ordination. The Teacher sent a monk who ordained him; and after he was ordained he obtained great honour and gain; he won the favour of his teachers and preceptors, and having received full orders he mastered the Dhamma in five years.

Then he thought to himself, “I live here distracted – it is not suitable for me,” and he became anxious to reach the goal of spiritual insight; so having obtained instruction in meditation from his teacher, he departed to a frontier village and dwelt in the forest, and there having entered a course of insight, however much he laboured and strove for twelve years, he failed to attain any special insight.

His parents also, as time went on, became poor, for those who hired their land or carried on merchandise for them, finding out that there was no son or brother in the family to enforce the payment, seized what they could lay their hands upon and ran away as they pleased, and the servants and labourers in the house seized the gold and coin and made off therewith, so that at the end the two were reduced to an evil plight and had not even a jug for pouring water; and at last they sold their dwelling, and finding themselves homeless, and in extreme misery, they wandered begging for alms, clothed in rags and carrying potsherds in their hands.

Now at that time a monk came from Jetavana to the son’s place of abode; he performed the duties of hospitality and, as he sat quietly, he first asked whence he was come; and learning that he was come from Jetavana he asked after the health of the Teacher and the principal disciples and then asked for news of his parents, “Tell me, sir, about the welfare of such and such a merchant’s family in Sāvatthi.” “O friend, don’t ask for news of that family.” “Why not, sir?” “They say that there was one son in that family, but he has become an ascetic in this dispensation, and since he left the world that family has gone to ruin; and at the present time the two old people are reduced to a most lamentable state and beg for alms.”

When he heard the other’s words he could not remain unmoved, but began to weep with his eyes full of tears, and when the other asked him why he wept, “O sir,” he replied, “they are my own father and mother, I am their son.” “O friend, your father and mother have come to ruin through you – do you go and take care of them.” “For twelve years,” he thought to himself, “I have laboured and striven but never been able to attain the Path or the Fruit; I must be incompetent; what have I to do with the ascetic life? I will become a householder and will support my parents and give away my wealth, and will thus eventually become destined for heaven.”

So having determined he gave up his abode in the forest to the elder, and the next day departed and by successive stages reached the monastery at the back of Jetavana which is not far from Sāvatthi. There he found two roads, one leading to Jetavana, the other to Sāvatthi. As he stood there, he thought: “Shall I see my parents first or the One with Ten Powers?” Then he said to himself, “In old days I saw my parents for a long time, from henceforth I shall rarely have the chance of seeing the Buddha; I will see the Fully Awakened One today and hear the Dhamma, and then tomorrow morning I will see my parents.” So he left the road to Sāvatthi and in the evening arrived at Jetavana.

Now that very day at daybreak, the Teacher, as he looked upon the world, had seen the potentialities of this young man, and when he came to visit him he praised the virtues of parents in the Mātiposasakasutta [SN 7.19]. As he stood at the end of the assembly of elders and listened, he thought: “If I become a householder I can support my parents; but the Teacher also says, ‘A son who has become an ascetic can be helpful,’ I went away before without seeing the Teacher, and I failed in such an imperfect ordination; I will now support my parents while still remaining an ascetic without becoming a householder.” So he took his ticket and his ticket-food and gruel, and felt as if he had committed a wrong deserving expulsion after a solitary abode of twelve years in the forest. In the morning he went to Sāvatthi and he thought to himself, “Shall I first get the gruel or see my parents?” He reflected that it would not be right to visit them in their poverty empty-handed; so he first got the gruel and then went to the door of their old house.

When he saw them sitting by the opposite wall after having gone their round for the alms given in broth, he stood not far from them in a sudden burst of sorrow with his eyes full of tears. They saw him but knew him not; then his mother, thinking that it was someone standing for alms, said to him, “We have nothing fit to be given to you, be pleased to pass on.” When he heard her, he repressed the grief which filled his heart and remained still standing as before with his eyes full of tears, and when he was addressed a second and a third time he still continued standing.

At last the father said to the mother, “Go to him; can this be your son?” She rose and went to him and, recognising him, fell at his feet and lamented, and the father also joined his lamentations, and there was a loud outburst of sorrow. To see his parents he could not control himself, but burst into tears; then, after yielding to his feelings, he said: “Do not grieve, I will support you,” so having comforted them and made them drink some gruel, and sit down on one side, he went again and begged for some food and gave it to them, and then went and asked for alms for himself, and having finished his meal, took up his abode at a short distance off.

From that day forward he watched over his parents in this manner; he gave them all the alms he received for himself, even those at the fortnightly distributions, and he went on separate expeditions for his own alms, and ate them; and whatever food he received as provision for the rainy season he gave to them, while he took their worn-out garments and dyed them with the doors fast closed and used them himself; but the days were few when he gained alms and there were many when he failed to win anything, and his inner and outer clothing became very rough.

As he watched over his parents he gradually grew very pale and thin and his friends and intimates said to him, “Your complexion used to be bright, but now you have become very pale – has some illness come upon you?” He replied, “No illness has come upon me, but a hindrance has befallen me,” and he told them the history. “Sir,” they replied, “the Teacher does not allow us to waste the offerings of the faithful, you do an unlawful act in giving to laymen the offerings of the faithful.” When he heard this he shrank away ashamed.
But not satisfied with this they went and told it to the Teacher, saying: “So and so, sir, has wasted the offerings of the faithful and used them to feed laymen.” The Teacher sent for the young man of family and said to him, “Is it true that you, an ascetic, take the offerings of the faithful and support laymen with them?” He confessed that it was true. Then the Teacher, wishing to praise what he had done and to declare an old action of his own, said: “When you support laymen whom do you support?” “My parents,” he answered. Then the Teacher, wishing to encourage him still more said: “Well done, well done,” three times, “You are in a path which I have traversed before you; I in old time, while going the round for alms, supported my parents.” The ascetic was encouraged thereby. At the request of the monks the Teacher, to make known his former actions, told them a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born of a vulture. When he grew up he put his parents, now old and dim of eye, in a vulture’s cave and fed them by bringing them flesh of cows and the like. At the time a certain hunter laid snares for vultures all about a Benares cemetery. One day the Bodhisatta seeking for flesh came to the cemetery and caught his foot in the snares. He did not think of himself, but remembered his old parents. “How will my parents live now? I think they will die, ignorant that I am caught, helpless and destitute, wasting away in that hill-cave,” so lamenting he spoke the first verse;

1. “How will the old folks manage now within the mountain cave? For I am fastened in a snare, cruel Nilīya’s slave.” [3.331]

The son of a hunter, hearing him lament, spoke the second verse, the vulture spoke the third, and so on alternately;

2. “Vulture, what strange laments of yours are these my ears that reach? I never heard or saw a bird that uttered human speech.”

3. “I tend my aged parents within a mountain cave, How will the old folks manage now that I’ve become your slave?”

4. “Carrion a vulture sights across a hundred leagues of land; Why do you fail to see a snare and net so close at hand?”
The Section with Seven Verses – 1415

5. “When ruin comes upon a man, and fates his death demand,
He fails to see a snare or net although so close at hand.”

6. “Go, tend your aged parents within their mountain cave, Go, visit them in peace, you have from me the leave you crave.”

7. “O hunter, happiness be thine, with all your kith and kin;
I'll tend my aged parents their mountain cave within.”

Then the Bodhisatta, freed from the fear of death, joyfully gave thanks and speaking a final verse took his mouthful of meat, and went away and gave it to his parents.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. After the Truths, the monk was established in the fruition of the First Path. [3.332] “At that time, the hunter was Channa, the parents were king’s kin, the vulture-king myself.”

Ja 400 Dabbhapupphajātaka

The Story about (the Jackal) Dabbhapuppha (7s)

In the present one monk is very greedy and cheats other monks out of even poor gains. The Buddha tells a story of two otters who couldn’t agree on the division of a fish, and asked a jackal to help. The latter gave the head to one, the tail to another, and took off with the meat in the middle.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the two old monks = the otters (uddā),
Upananda = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Greed, Trickery, Devas, Animals.

“The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning Upananda, of the Sakya tribe. He was ordained in the dispensation, but forsook the virtues of contentment and the rest and became very greedy. At the beginning of the Rains Retreat he tried two or three monasteries, leaving at one an umbrella or a shoe, at one a walking-stick or a waterpot, and dwelling in one himself. He began the Rains Retreat in a country monastery, and saying: “The monks must live contentedly,” explained to the monks, as if he were making the moon rise in the sky, the way to the noble state of content, praising contentment with the necessaries. Hearing him the monks threw away their pleasant robes and vessels, and took pots of clay and robes of dust-rags. He put the others in his own lodging, and when the Rains Retreat and the Invitation festival were over he filled a cart and went to Jetavana.

On the way, behind a monastery in the forest, wrapping his feet with creepers and saying: “Surely something can be got here,” he entered the monastery. Two old monks had spent the Rains Retreat there; they had got two coarse cloaks and one fine blanket, and, as they could not divide them, they were pleased to see him, thinking: “This elder will divide these between us,” and said: “Sir, we cannot divide this which is raiment for the Rains Retreat; we have a dispute about it, do you divide it between us.” He consented and giving the two coarse cloaks to them he took the blanket, saying: “This falls to me who know the rules of discipline,” and went away.

These elders, who loved the blanket, went with him to Jetavana, and told the matter to the monks who knew the rules, saying: “Is it right for those who know the rules to devour plunder thus?” The monks seeing the pile of robes and bowls brought by the elder Upananda, said: “Sir, you have great merit, you have gained much food and raiment.” He said: “Sirs, where is my merit? I gained this in such and such a manner,” telling them all.

In the Dhamma Hall they raised a talk, saying: “Sirs, Upananda, of the Sakya tribe, is very covetous and greedy.” The Teacher, finding their subject, said: “Monks, Upananda’s deeds are not suited for progress; when a monk explains progress to another he should first act suitably himself and then preach to others.”

Yourself first establish in propriety,

Then teach; the wise should not self-seeking be. [Dhp. 158]

By this verse of the Dhammapada he showed the Dhamma and said: “Monks, Upananda is not covetous for the first time; he was so before and he plundered men’s property before,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā by a riverbank. A jackal, named Māyāvī, had taken a wife and lived in a place by that riverbank. One day his mate said to him, “Husband, a longing has come upon me; I desire to eat a fresh rohita fish.” He said: “Be easy, I will bring it you,” and going by the river he wrapped his feet in creepers, and went along the bank. At the moment, two otters, Gambhīracārī and Anuṭīracārī, were standing on the bank looking for fish. Gambhīracārī saw a great rohita fish, and entering the water with a bound he took it by the tail. The fish was strong and dragging him went away. He called to the other, “This great fish will be enough for both of us, come and aid me,” speaking the first verse:

1. “Friend Anuṭīracārī, rush to my aid, I pray;
   I’ve caught a great fish; but by force he’s carrying me away.” [3.334]

Hearing him, the other spoke the second verse;

2. “Gambhīracārī, luck to you! Your grip be firm and stout,
   As Supaṇṇa would lift a snake, I’ll lift the fellow out.”

Then the two together took out the rohita fish, laid him on the ground and killed him; but saying each to the other, “You divide him,” they quarrelled and could not divide him; and so sat down, leaving him. At the moment the jackal came to the spot. Seeing him, they both saluted him and said: “Lord of the grey grass-colour, this fish was taken by both of us together; a dispute arose because we could not divide him; do you make an equal division and part it,” speaking the third verse;

3. “A strife arose between us, mark! O you of grassy hue, Let our contention, honoured sir, be settled fair by you.”

The jackal hearing them, said, declaring his own strength;

4. “I’ve arbitrated many a case and done it peacefully;
   Let your contention, honoured sirs, be settled fair by me.”

Having spoken that verse, and making the division, he spoke this verse:

5. “Tail, Anuṭīracārī; Gambhīracārī, head;
   The middle to the arbiter will properly be paid.” [3.335]

So having divided the fish, he said: “You eat head and tail without quarrelling,” and seizing the middle portion in his mouth he ran away before their eyes. They sat downcast, as if they had lost a thousand pieces, and spoke the sixth verse:
6. “But for our strife, it would have long sufficed us without fail; But now the jackal takes the fish, and leaves us head and tail.”

The jackal was pleased and thinking: “Now I will give my wife rohita fish to eat,” he went to her. She saw him coming and saluting him spoke a verse;

7. “Even as a king is glad to join a kingdom to his rule, So I am glad to see my lord today with his mouth full.” [3.207]

Then she asked him about the means of attainment, speaking a verse;

8. “How, being of the land, have you from water caught a fish? How did you do the feat, my lord? Pray answer to my wish.”

The jackal, explaining the means to her, spoke the next verse;

9. “By strife it is their weakness comes, by strife their means decay; By strife the otters lost their prize; Māyāvi, eat the prey.” [3.336]

There is another verse spoken after Fully Awakening:

10. “Even so when strife arises among men, They seek an arbiter; he’s leader then; Their wealth decays, and the king’s coffers gain.”

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the jackal was Upananda, the otters the two old men, the Tree Devatā who witnessed the cause was myself.”

Ja 401 Dasaṇṇakajātaka

The Story about (the Sword of) Dasaṇṇaka (7s)

Alternative Title: Paṇṇakajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the life owing to thoughts of his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of a king who gave his wife to another, who then eloped with her. He then despaired, until the hard deed he had done was illustrated by a man swallowing a sword, and his longing for his wife left him.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Senaka (Senakapaṇḍita), Sāriputta = the wise (minister) Pukkusa, Moggallāna = the wise (minister) Āyura, the dissatisfied monk = king (Maddava) (rājā), his former wife = the queen (rājamahēśī).

Keywords: Attachment, Giving, Women.

“Dasanṇa’s good sword.” The Teacher told this, when living in Jetavana, concerning the temptation of a monk by his wife when a layman. The monk confessed that he was discontent for this reason. The Teacher said: “That woman does you harm; formerly too you were dying of mental sickness owing to her, and got life owing to wise men,” and so he told a story of the past. {3.337}

In the past when the great king Maddava was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin household. They called his name young Senaka. When he grew up he learned all the sciences at Taxila, and coming back to Benares he became king Maddava’s counsellor in things temporal and spiritual, and being called wise Senaka he was looked upon in all the city as the sun or the moon.

The son of the king’s household priest came to wait on the king and seeing the chief queen adorned with all ornaments and exceedingly beautiful, he became enamoured, and [3.208] when he went home lay without taking food. His comrades enquired of him and he told them the matter. The king said: “The household priest’s son does not appear, how is this?” When he heard the cause, he sent for him and said: “I give her to you for seven days, spend those days at your house and on the eighth send her back.” He said: “Very well,” and taking her to his house took delight with her. They became enamoured of each other, and keeping it secret they fled by the house door and came to the country of another king. No man knew the place they went to, and their path was like the way of a ship. The king made proclamation by drum round the city, and though he sought in many ways he did not find the place whither she had gone. Then great sorrow for her fell upon him; his heart became hot and poured out blood; after that blood flowed from his entrails, and his sickness became great. The great royal physicians could not cure him.

The Bodhisatta thought: “The disease is not in the king, he is touched by mental sickness because he sees not his wife; I will cure him by a certain means,” so he instructed the king’s wise counsellors, Āyura and Pukkusa by name, saying: “The king has no sickness, except mental sickness because he sees not the queen; now he is a great helper to us and we will cure him by a certain means; {3.338} we will have a gathering in the palace-yard and make a man who knows how to do it swallow a sword; we will put the king at a window and make him look down on the gathering; the king seeing the man swallow a sword will ask, “Is there anything harder than that?” Then, my lord Āyura, you should make answer, “It is harder to say, ‘I give up so and so,’ then he will ask you, my lord Pukkusa, and you should make answer, ‘O king, if a man says, “I give up so and so” and does not give it, his word is fruitless, no men live or eat or drink by such words; but they who do according to that word and give the thing according to their promise, they do a thing harder than the other;’ then I will find what to do next.” So he made a gathering.

Then these three wise men went and told the king, saying: “O great king, there is a gathering in the palace-yard; if men look down on it their sorrow becomes joy, let us go there,” so they took the king, and opening a window made him look down on the gathering. Many people were showing off each his own are which he knew; and a man was swallowing a good sword of thirty-three inches and sharp of edge.
The king seeing him thought: “This man is swallowing the sword, I will ask these wise men if there is anything harder than that,” so he asked Āyura, speaking the first verse:

1. “Dasāṇṇa’s\textsuperscript{717} good sword thirsts for blood, its edge is sharpened perfectly;
Yet ’midst the crowd he swallows it; a harder feat there cannot be;
I ask if anything is hard compared to this; pray answer me.” [3.209] {3.339}

Then he spoke the second verse in answer:

2. “Greed may lure a man to swallow swords though sharpened perfectly;
But to say, I give this freely, that a harder feat would be;
All things else are easy; royal Māgadha, I’ve answered you.”

When the king heard wise Āyura’s words, he thought: “So then it is harder to say, “I give this thing,” than to swallow a sword; I said: “I give my queen to the priest’s son,” I have done a very hard thing,” and so his sorrow at heart became a little lighter. Then thinking: “Is there anything harder than to say, ‘I give this thing to another?’” he talked with wise Pukkusa and spoke the third verse:

\textsuperscript{717} A kingdom in Central India, apparently a seat of the sword-making art.
3. “Āyura has solved my question, wise in all philosophy;
Pukkusa I ask the question now, if harder feat there be;
Is there aught that’s hard compared to this? Pray answer me.”

The wise Pukkusa in answer to him spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Not by words men live, and not by language uttered fruitlessly;
But to give and not regret it, that a greater feat would be;
All things else are easy; royal Māgadha, I’ve answered you.” (3.340)

The king, hearing this, considered, “I first said, ‘I will give the queen to the priest’s son,’ and then I did according to my word and gave her; surely I have done a hard thing,” so his sorrow became lighter. Then it came into his mind, “There is no one wiser than wise Senaka, I will ask this question of him,” and asking him he spoke the fifth verse:

5. “Pukkusa has solved my question, wise in all philosophy;
Senaka I ask the question now, if harder feat there be;
Is there aught that’s hard compared to this? Pray answer me.”

So Senaka spoke the sixth verse in answer to him;

6. “If a man should give a gift, or small or great, in generosity,
Nor regret the giving after; that a harder feat would be;
All things else are easy; royal Māgadha, I’ve answered you.”

The king, hearing the Bodhisatta’s words, reflected: “I gave the queen to the priest’s son of my own thought; (3.341) now I cannot control my thought, I sorrow and pine; this is not worthy of me. If she loved me she would not forsake her kingdom and flee away; what have I to do with her when she has not loved me but fled away?” As he thought thus, all his sorrow rolled away and departed like a drop of water on a lotus leaf. That instant his entrails were at rest. He became well and happy, and praised the Bodhisatta, speaking the final verse:

7. “Āyura answered question, good Pukkusa as well;
The words of Senaka the wise all answers do excel.”

And after this praise he gave him much wealth in his delight. (3.210)

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, after the Truths, the discontented monk was established in the fruition of the First Path.
“At that time the queen was the wife of his layman days, the king the discontented monk, Āyura was Moggallāna, Pukkusa was Sāriputta, and the wise Senaka was myself.”

Ja 402 Sattubhastajātaka

The Story about the Sack of Flour (7s)

In the present the monks are discussing the Buddha’s great wisdom. The Buddha tells a story of how a brahmin had been sent to get alms by his wife, who was carrying on an affair, and a snake had entered the bag he was carrying. The Bodhisatta revealed both the snake and his wife’s bad behaviour.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Senaka (Senakapaṇḍita), Sāriputta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), Ānanda = the brahmin (brāhmanā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisa).

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 177 Tiṇḍuka, Ja 387 Śuci, Ja 402 Sattubhasta, Ja 515 Sambhava, Ja 528 Mahābodhi.

Keywords: Wisdom, Attachment, Devas, Women, Animals.

“You are confused.” The Teacher told this when staying in Jetavana, concerning the Perfection of Wisdom. The occasion of the story will appear in the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

One day the monks sat in the Dhamma Hall and described the Tathāgata’s Perfection of Wisdom, “Monks, the Tathāgata is greatly wise, his wisdom is vast, ready, swift, sharp, crushing heretical doctrines, after having converted, by the power of his own knowledge, the brahmins Kūṭadanta and the rest, the ascetics Sabhiya and the rest, the thieves Anjusthata and the rest, the Yakhas Áḷavaka and the rest, the Devas Sakka and the rest, and the Brahmās Baka and the rest, made them humble, and ordained a vast multitude as ascetics and established them in the fruition of the paths of sanctification.” The Teacher came up and asked what they were discoursing about, and when they told him, he replied, “Not only now is the Tathāgata full of wisdom. In former days, even when his knowledge was immature, he was wise, as he went about for the sake of wisdom and knowledge,” and then he told a story of the past.
In the past a king called Janaka was reigning in Benares. At that time the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family, and they called his name young Senaka. When he grew up he learned all the arts at Taxila, and returning to Benares saw the king. The king set him in the place of minister and gave him great glory.

He taught the king things temporal and spiritual. Being a pleasant preacher of the Dhamma he established the king in the five precepts, in alms-giving, in keeping the fasts, in the ten ways of right action, and so established him in the path of virtue. Throughout the kingdom it was as it were the time of the appearing of the Buddhas. On the fortnightly fast the king, the viceroy and others would all assemble and decorate the place of meeting. The Bodhisatta taught the Dhamma in a decorated room in the middle of a deer-skin-couch with the power of a Buddha, and his word was like the preaching of Buddhas.

Then a certain old brahmin begging for money-alms got a thousand pieces, left them in a brahmin family and went to seek alms again. When he had gone, that family spent all his pieces. He came back and would have his pieces brought him. The brahmin, being unable to give them to him, gave him his daughter to wife. The other brahmin took her and made his dwelling in a brahmin village not far from Benares. Because of her youth his wife was unsatisfied in desires and did wrong with another young brahmin.

There are sixteen things that cannot be satisfied; and what are these sixteen? The sea is not satisfied with all rivers, nor the fire with fuel, nor a king with his kingdom, nor a fool with defilements, nor a woman with three things, intercourse, adornment and child-bearing, nor a brahmin with sacred texts, nor a sage with Absorption, nor one still in training with honour, nor one free from desire with penance, nor the energetic man with energy, nor the talker with talk, nor the politic man with the council, nor the believer with serving the Saṅgha, nor the liberal man with giving away, nor the learned with hearing the Dhamma, nor the four assemblies with seeing the Buddha.

So this brahmin woman, being unsatisfied with intercourse, wished to put her husband away and do her wrong with boldness. So one day in her evil purpose 718 A holy man who has not became an Arahant.

---

719 Monks, nuns, laymen and laywomen.
she lay down. When he said: “How is it, wife?” she answered, “Brahmin, I cannot do the work of your house, get me a maid.” “Wife, I have no money, what shall I give to get her?” “Seek for money by begging for alms and so get her.” “Then, wife, get ready something for my journey.” She filled a skin-bag with baked meal and unbaked meal, and gave them to him. The brahmin, going through villages, towns and cities, got seven hundred pieces, and thinking: “This money is enough to buy slaves, male and female,” he was returning to his own village; at a certain place convenient for water he opened his sack, and eating some meal he went down to drink water without tying the mouth. Then a black snake in a hollow tree, smelling the meal, entered the bag and lay down in a coil eating the meal. The brahmin came, and without looking inside fastened the sack and putting it on his shoulder went his way.

Then a Devatā living in a tree, sitting in a hollow of the trunk, said to him on the way, “Brahmin, if you stop on the way you will die, if you go home today your wife will die,” and vanished. He looked, but not seeing the Devatā was afraid and troubled with the fear of death, and so came to the gate of Benares weeping and lamenting. It was the fast on the fifteenth day, the day of the Bodhisatta’s preaching, seated on the decorated Dhamma seat, and a multitude with perfumes and flowers and the like in their hands came in troops to hear the preaching. The brahmin said: “Where are you going?” and was told, “O brahmin, today wise Senaka preaches the Dhamma with sweet voice and the power of a Buddha; do you not know?” He thought: “They say he is a wise preacher, and I am troubled with the fear of death; wise men are able to take away even great sorrow; it is right for me too to go there and hear the Dhamma.” So he went with them, and when the assembly and the king among them had sat down round about the Bodhisatta, he stood at the outside, not far from the Dhamma seat, with his mealsack on his shoulder, afraid with the fear of death. The Bodhisatta preached as if he were bringing down the river of heaven or showering ambrosia. The multitude became well pleased, and making applause listened to the preaching.

Wise men have far sight. At that moment the Bodhisatta, opening his eyes gracious with the five graces, surveyed the assembly on every side and, seeing that brahmin, thought: “This great assembly has become well pleased and listens to the Dhamma, making applause, but that one brahmin is ill pleased and weeps; there must be some sorrow within him to cause his tears; as if touching rust with acid, or making a drop of water roll from a lotus leaf, I will teach him the Dhamma, making him free from sorrow and well pleased in mind.” So he called him, “Brahmin, I am wise Senaka, now will I make you free from sorrow, speak boldly,” and so talking with him he spoke the first verse:

1. “You are confused in thought, disturbed in sense,
   Tears streaming from thine eyes are evidence;
   What have you lost, or what do wish to gain
   By coming hither? Give me answer plain.” (3.345)

Then the brahmin, declaring his cause of sorrow, spoke the second verse:

2. “If I go home my wife it is must die,
   If I go not, the Yakkha said, ’tis I;
   That is the thought that pierces cruelly;
   Explain the matter, Senaka, to me.”

The Bodhisatta, hearing the brahmin’s words, spread the net of knowledge as if throwing a net in the sea, thinking: “There are many causes of death to beings in this world; some die sunk in the sea, or seized therein by ravenous fish, some falling in the Ganges, or seized by crocodiles, some falling from a tree or pierced by a thorn, some struck by weapons of divers kinds, some by eating poison or hanging or falling from a precipice or by extreme cold or attacked by diseases of diverse kinds, so they die; now among so many causes of death from which cause shall this brahmin die if he stays on the road today, or his wife if he goes home?”

As he considered, he saw the sack on the brahmin’s shoulder and thought: “There must be a snake who has gone into that sack, and entering he must have gone in from the smell of the meal when the brahmin at his breakfast had eaten some meal and gone to drink water without fastening the sack’s mouth; the brahmin coming back after drinking water must have gone on after fastening and taking up the sack without seeing that the snake had entered; (3.346) if he stays on the road, he will say at evening when he rests, “I will eat some meal,” and opening the sack will put in his hand; then the snake will bite him in the hand and destroy his life; this will be the cause of his death if he stays on the road; but if he goes home the sack will come into his wife’s hand; she will say, ‘I will look at the ware within,’ and opening the sack put in her hand, then the snake will bite her and destroy her life, and this will be the cause of her death if he goes home today.”
This he knew by his skill in means. Then this [3.213] came into his mind, “The snake must be a black snake, brave and fearless; when the sack strikes against the brahmin’s broadside, he shows no motion or quivering; he shows no sign of his being there amidst such an assembly; therefore he must be a black snake, brave and fearless,” from his skill in means he knew this as if he was seeing with a divine eye. So as if he had been a man who had stood by and seen the snake enter the sack, deciding by his skill in means, the Bodhisatta answering the brahmin’s question in the royal assembly spoke the third verse:

3. “First with many a doubt I deal,
Now my tongue the truth declares;
Brahmin, in your bag of meal
A snake has entered unawares.”

So saying, he asked, “O brahmin, is there any meal in that sack of yours?” “There is, O sage.” “Did you eat some meal today at your breakfast time?” “Yes, O sage.” “Where were you sitting?” “In a wood, at the root of a tree.” “When you ate the meal, and went to drink water, did you fasten the sack’s mouth or not?” “I did not, O sage.” “When you drank water and came back, did you fasten the sack after looking in?” “I fastened it without looking in, O sage.” “O brahmin, when you went to drink water, I think the snake entered the sack owing to the smell of the meal without your knowledge, such is the case, therefore put down your sack, set it in the midst of the assembly and opening the mouth, stand back and taking a stick beat the sack with it; then when you see a black snake coming out with its hood spread and hissing, you will have no doubt,” so he spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Take a stick and beat the sack,
Dumb and double-tongued is he;
Cease your mind with doubts to rack;
Open sack, the snake you’ll see.”

The brahmin, hearing the Great Being’s words, did so, though alarmed and frightened. The snake came out of the sack when his hood was struck with the stick, and stood looking at the crowd. (3.348)

The Teacher, explaining the matter, spoke the fifth verse:
5. “Frightened, 'midst the assembled rout,
String of meal-sack he untied;
Angry crept a serpent out,
Hood erect, in all his pride.’”

When the snake came out with hood erect, there was a forecast of the Bodhisatta as the omniscient Buddha. The multitude began waving cloths and snapping fingers in thousands, the showers of the seven precious stones were as showers from a thick cloud, cries of ‘good’ were raised in hundreds of thousands, [3.214] and the noise was like the splitting of the earth. This answering of such a question with the power of a Buddha is not the power of birth, nor the power of men rich in gifts and high family; of what is it the power then? Of knowledge; the man of knowledge makes spiritual insight to increase, opens the door of the noble Paths, enters the great and endless Nibbāna and masters the perfection of disciplehood, Paccekabuddhahood, and perfect Buddhahood; knowledge is the best among the qualities that bring the great and endless Nibbāna, the rest are the attendants of knowledge; and so it is said;

“Wisdom is best, the good confess,
Like the moon in starry skies;
Virtue, fortune, righteousness,
Are the handmaids of the wise.”

When the question had been so answered by the Bodhisatta, a certain snake-charmer made a mouth-band for the snake, caught him and let him loose in the forest. The brahmin, coming up to the king, saluted him and made obeisance, and praising him spoke half a verse:

6a. “Great, king Janaka, your gain,
Seeing Senaka the wise.” [3.349]

After praising the king, he took seven hundred pieces from the bag and praising the Bodhisatta, he spoke a verse and a half wishing to give a gift in delight;

6b. “Dread your wisdom; veils are vain,
Brahmin, to your piercing eyes.”
7. These seven hundred pieces, see,
Take them all, I give them you;
'Tis to you I owe my life,
And the welfare of my wife.”

Hearing this, the Bodhisatta spoke the eighth verse:

8. “For reciting poetry
Wise men can't accept a wage;
Rather let us give to you,
Ere you take the homeward stage.”

So saying, the Bodhisatta made a full thousand pieces to be given to the brahmin, and asked him, “By whom were you sent to beg for money?” “By my wife, O sage.”

“Is your wife old or young?” “Young, O sage.” “Then she is doing wrong with another, and sent you away thinking to do so in security; if you take these pieces home, she will give to her lover the pieces won by your labour; therefore you should not go home straight, but only after leaving the pieces outside the town at the root of a tree or somewhere,” so he sent him away.

He, coming near the village, left his pieces at the root of a tree, and came home in the evening. His wife at that moment was seated with her lover. The brahmin stood at the door and said: “Wife.” She recognised his voice, and putting out the light opened the door; when the brahmin came in, she took the other and put him at the door; then coming back and not seeing anything in the sack she asked, “Brahmin, what alms have you got on your journey?” “A thousand pieces.” “Where is it?” “It is left at such and such a place; never mind, we will get it tomorrow.” She went and told her lover. He went and took it as if it were his own treasure.

Next day the brahmin went, and not seeing the pieces came to the Bodhisatta, who said: “What is the matter, brahmin?” “I don’t see the pieces, O sage.” “Did you tell your wife?” “Yes, O sage.” Knowing that the wife had told her lover, the Bodhisatta asked, “Brahmin, is there a brahmin who is a friend of your wife’s?” “There is, O sage.” “Is there one who is a friend of yours?” “Yes, O sage.” Then the Great Being caused seven days’ expenses to be given him and said: “Go, do you two invite and entertain the first day fourteen brahmins, seven for yourself and seven for your wife; from next day onwards take one less each day, till on the seventh day you invite one brahmin and your wife one; then if you notice that the brahmin your wife asks on the seventh day has come every time, tell me.” (3.351)

The brahmin did so, and told the Bodhisatta, “O sage, I have observed the brahmin who is always our guest.” The Bodhisatta sent men with him to bring that other brahmin, and asked him, “Did you take a thousand pieces belonging to this brahmin from the root of such and such a tree?” “I did not, O sage.” “You do not know that I am the wise Senaka; I will make you fetch those pieces.” He was afraid and confessed, saying: “I took them.” “What did you do?” “I put them in such and such a place, O sage.” The Bodhisatta asked the first brahmin, “Brahmin, will you keep your wife or take another?” “Let me keep her, O sage.” The Bodhisatta sent men to fetch the pieces and the wife, and gave the brahmin the pieces from the thief’s hand; he punished the other, removing him from the city, punished also the wife, and gave great honour to the brahmin, making him dwell near himself.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka. At the end of the Truths, many attained the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the brahmin was Ānanda, the Tree Devatā Sāriputta, the assembly was the Buddha’s assembly, and wise Senaka was myself.”

Ja 403 Aṭṭhisenajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin) Aṭṭhisena (7s)

Alternative Title: Aṭṭhisenajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks go round importuning people to give them workers and goods for the huts they are building. The Buddha reproves them and tells a story of an ascetic of old who, even when offered a kingdom refused it, as he did an offer of kine, as ascetics have no need of these things.

The Bodhisatta = (the brahmin) Aṭṭhisena, Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 253 Maṇikaṇṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 323 Brahmadatta, Ja 403 Aṭṭhisena,
Present Compare: Vin Sd 6 (3.144),
Past Compare: Mvu iii p 541 Asthisena.

Keywords: Asceticism, Modesty. Contentment.
“Aṭṭhisena, many beggars.” [3.216] The Teacher told this when dwelling in the shrine called Aggāḷava near Āḷavi, concerning the regulations for the building of cells. The occasion was told in the Maṇikaṇṭhajātaka [Ja 253] above.

Some monks who lived in Āḷavī were begging from all quarters the materials for houses which they were getting made for themselves. They were for ever asking, “Give us a man, give us somebody to do servant’s work,” and so forth. Everybody was annoyed at this begging and solicitation. So much annoyed were they, that at sight of these monks they were startled and scared away.

It happened that the venerable monk Mahākassapa entered Āḷavī, and traversed the place in quest of alms. The people, as soon as they saw the elder, ran away as before. After mealtime, having returned from his rounds, he summoned the monks, and thus addressed them, “Once Āḷavī was a good place for alms; why is it so poor now?” They told him the reason.

Now the Fortunate One was at the time dwelling at the Aggāḷava shrine. The elder came to the Fortunate One, and told him all about it. The Teacher convened the monks touching this matter. “I hear,” said he, “that you are building houses and worrying everybody for help. Is this true?” They said it was.

The Teacher addressed the monks, saying: “Monks, formerly [3.352] before Buddha was born in the world, monastics of other dispensations, even though offered their choice by kings, never asked for alms, holding that begging from others was not agreeable or pleasant,” and so he told a story of the past time.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin household in a certain village, and they called his name young Aṭṭhisena. When he grew up, he learned all the arts at Taxila, and afterwards seeing the misery of desires he took the ascetic life, and reaching the Absorptions, Super Knowledges and Attainments, he dwelt long in the Himālayas; then coming down among men to get salt and vinegar, he reached Benares, and after staying in a garden he came for alms the next day to the king’s court. The king, being pleased with his bearing and manner, sent for him, and sat him on a seat on the terrace, giving him good food; then receiving his thanks he was pleased, and [720] See above, p. 52.

---

exact a promise, made the Bodhisatta dwell in the royal garden, and went to wait on him two or three times each day.

One day, being pleased with his preaching of the Dhamma, he gave him a choice, saying: “Tell me whatever you desire, beginning from my kingdom.” The Bodhisatta did not say, “Give me so and so.” Others ask for whatever they desire, saying: “Give me this,” and the king gives it, if not attached to it. One day the king thought: “Other suitors and mendicants ask me to give them so and so; but the noble Aṭṭhisena, ever since I offered him a choice, asks for nothing; he is wise and has skill in means; I will ask him.” So one day after the early meal he sat on one side, and asking him as to the cause of other men’s making suits and his own making none, he spoke the first verse:

1. “Aṭṭhisena, many beggars, though they’re strangers utterly,
   Throng to me with their petitions; why have you no suit for me?” [3.217] {3.353}

Hearing him the Bodhisatta spoke the second verse:

2. “Neither suitor, nor rejector of a suit, can pleasant be;
   That’s the reason, be not angry, why I have no suit to thee.”

Hearing his words the king spoke three verses;

3. “He who lives by sueing, and has not at proper season sued,
   Makes another fall from merit, fails to gain a livelihood.

4. He who lives by sueing, and has aye at proper season sued,
   Makes another man win merit, gains himself a livelihood.

5. Men of wisdom are not angry when they see the suitors throng;
   Speak, my holy friend; the boon you ask for can never be wrong.” {3.354}

So the Bodhisatta, even though given the choice of the kingdom, made no suit.
When the king’s wish had been so expressed, the Bodhisatta to show him the ascetics’ way said: “O great king, these suits are preferred by men of worldly desires and householders, not by ascetics; from their ordination ascetics must have a pure life unlike a householder.” and so showing the ascetics’ way, he spoke the sixth verse:
6. “Sages never make petitions, worthy laymen ought to know;
   Silent stands the noble suitor; sages make petition so.” [3.355]

The king hearing the Bodhisatta’s words said: “Sir, if a wise attendant of his own knowledge gives what ought to be given to his friend, so I give to you such and such a thing,” and so he spoke the seventh verse:

7. “Brahmin, I offer you a thousand kine,
   Red kine, and eke the leader of the herd;
   Hearing but now those generous deeds of thine,
   I too in turn to generous deeds am stirred.”

When he said this, the Bodhisatta refused, saying: “Great king, I took the ascetic life free from defilement; I have no need of cows.” The king abode by his admonition; doing alms and other good works he became destined for heaven, and not falling away from his meditation, was reborn in the Brahmā Realm.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths many were established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the king was Ānanda, Aṭṭhisena was myself.”

Ja 404 Kapijātaka

The Story about (the Disobedient) Monkey (7s)

In the present the monks are talking about how Devadatta had led his followers to destruction. The Buddha tells a story of how a monkey had offended against a minister, and how the leader of 500 monkeys had refused to listen to good advice to keep clear of men, and was destroyed along with his following.

The Bodhisatta = the wise king of the monkeys (pañḍitakapirājā), Devadatta = the disobedient monkey (dubbacakapi),
Devadatta’s followers = his followers (parisa).

Past Compare: Ja 140 Kāka, Ja 404 Kapi.

Keywords: Enemies, Good advice, Animals.

“Let not the wise man.” [3.218] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning Devadatta being swallowed up by the earth. Finding that the monks were talking about this in the Dhamma Hall, he said: “Devadatta has not been destroyed with his company now for the first time; he was destroyed before,” and he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the womb of a monkey, and lived in the king’s garden with a retinue of five hundred monkeys. Devadatta was also born in the womb of a monkey, and lived there also with a retinue of five hundred monkeys. Then one day when the king’s family priest had gone to the garden, bathed and adorned himself, one tricky monkey going ahead of him sat above the gateway arch of the garden, and let excrement fall on the priest’s head as he went out. When the priest looked up, he let it fall again in his mouth. The priest turned back, saying in threat to the monkeys, “Very well, I shall know how to deal with you,” and went away after washing.

They told the Bodhisatta that he had been angry and threatened the monkeys. He made announcement to the thousand monkeys, “It is not well to dwell near the habitation of the angry; let the whole troop of monkeys flee and go elsewhere.” A disobedient monkey took his own retinue and did not flee, saying: “I will see about it afterwards.” The Bodhisatta took his own retinue and went to the forest.

One day a female slave pounding rice had put some rice out in the sun and a goat was eating it; getting a blow with a torch and running away on fire, he was rubbing himself on the wall of a grass-hut near an elephant-stable. The fire caught the grass-hut and from it the elephant-stable; in it the elephants’ backs were burnt, and the elephant doctors were attending the elephants.

The family priest was always going about watching for an opportunity of catching the monkeys. He was sitting in attendance on the king, and the king said: “Sir, many of our elephants have been injured, and the elephant doctors do not know how to cure them; do you know any remedy?” “I do, great king.” “What is it?” “Monkey’s fat, great king.” “How shall we get it?” “There are many monkeys in the garden.” The king said: “Kill monkeys in the garden and get their fat.” The archers went and killed five hundred monkeys with arrows.

One old monkey fled although wounded by an arrow, and though he did not fall on the spot, he fell when he came to the Bodhisatta’s place of abode. The monkeys said: “He has died when he reached our place of abode,” and told the Bodhisatta that he was dead from a wound he had got. He came and sat down among the assembly of monkeys, and spoke these verses by way of exhorting the monkeys with the exhortation of the wise, which is, “Men dwelling near their enemies perish in this way.”

1. “Let not the wise man dwell where dwells his foe; One night, two nights, so near will bring him woe.

2. A fool’s a foe to all who trust his word; One monkey brought distress on all the herd.

3. A foolish chief, wise in his own conceit, Comes ever, like this monkey, to defeat.

4. A strong fool is not good to guard the herd, Curse to his kindred, like the decoy-bird.

5. One strong and wise is good the herd to guard, Like Sakka to the Gods, his kin’s reward.

6. Who virtue, wisdom, learning, does possess, His deeds himself and other men will bless.

7. Therefore virtue, knowledge, learning, and himself let him regard, Either be a lonely saint or o’er the flock keep watch and ward.” [3.358]

So the Great Being, having become king of monkeys, explained the way of learning the discipline.

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the disobedient monkey was Devadatta, his troop was Devadatta’s company and the wise king was myself.”

Ja 405 Bakabrahmajātaka
The Story about (Brahmā) Baka (7s)

Alternative Title: Bakajātaka (Cst)

In the present Baka Brahmā holds that his present existence is permanent. The Buddha tells how this view arose in the Brahmā, and then tells a story of how he attained his present glory by good deeds in the past.

The Bodhisatta = the young brahmin Kappa (Kappamāṇava), Bakabrahmā = the ascetic Kesava (Kesavatāpasa).
Past Compare: MN 49 Brahmanimantaniyasutta (1.328) & SN 6.8 Bakabrahmasutta (1.142).

Keywords: Impermanence, Virtue, Devas.

“Seventy and two.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the Brahmā Baka. In him a false Dhamma arose, namely, “This present existence is perpetual, permanent, eternal, unchanging; apart from it there is no escape or release at all.”

In a former birth this Brahmā had once practised meditation, so he was born in the Vehapphala heaven. Having spent there an existence of five hundred kalpas, he was born in the Subhakiniṇa heaven; after sixty-four kalpas there he passed and was born in the Ābhassara heaven, where existence is for eight kalpas. It was there that this false Dhamma arose in him. He forgot that he had passed from higher Brahmaloka heavens and had been born in that heaven, and perceiving neither of these things had taken up the false Dhamma.

The Lord, understanding his reflections, as easily as a strong man can extend his bent arm or bend his extended arm, disappearing from Jetavana, appeared in that Brahmaloka. The Brahmā, seeing the Lord, said: “Come here, my lord; welcome, my lord; it is a long time, my lord, since you have taken this opportunity, even for coming here; this world, my lord, is perpetual, it is permanent, it is eternal, it is absolute, it is unchanging; this world is not born, it decays not, it dies not, it passes not away, it is not born again; apart from this world there is no other escape beyond.”

When this was said, the Lord said to Baka the Brahmā, “Baka the Brahmā has come to ignorance, he has come to ignorance, when he will say that a thing which is not permanent is permanent, and so on, and that there is no other escape apart from this when there is another escape.” Hearing this the Brahmā thought: “This one presses me hard, finding out exactly what I say,” and as a timid thief, after receiving a few blows, says, “Am I the only thief? So and so and so and so are 721 A Brahmā means a being in one of the Brahma-loka heavens, three of which are mentioned below.

“Seventy and two, O Gotama, are we Righteous and great, from birth and age we're free;
Our heaven is wisdom’s home, there’s nought above;
And many others will this view approve.”

Hearing his words, the Teacher spoke the second verse: [3.360]

2. “Short your existence in this world; ’tis wrong,
Baka, to think existence here is long;
A hundred thousand aeons past and gone
All your existence well to me is known.”

Hearing this, Baka spoke the third verse:

3. “Of wisdom infinite, O Lord, am I;
Birth, age, and sorrow, all beneath me lie;
What should I do with good works, long ago?
Yet tell me something, Lord, that I should know.”

Then the Lord, relating and showing him things of past time, spoke four verses:

4. “To many a man of old you gave a drink
For thirst and parching drought ready to sink;
That virtuous deed of thine so long ago
Remembering, as if waked from sleep, I know. [3.361]

5. By Eṇi’s bank you set the people free
When chained and held in close captivity;
That virtuous deed of thine so long ago
Remembering, as if waked from sleep, I know.

6. By Ganges’ stream the man you did set free,
Whose boat was seized by Nāga, cruelly
Lusting for flesh, and save him mightily;
That virtuous deed of thine, so long ago
Remembering, as if waked from sleep, I know. [3.221]
7. And I was Kappa, your disciple true,
Your wisdom and your virtues all I knew;
And now those deeds of thine so long ago
Remembering, as if waked from sleep, I know.” [3.363]

Hearing his own deeds from the Teacher’s discourse, Baka gave thanks and spoke this last verse:

8. “You know every life that has been mine;
Buddha you are, all wisdom sure is thine;
And sure your glorious majesty and state
Even this Brahmā Realm illuminate.”

So the Teacher, making known his quality as Buddha and expounding the Dhamma, showed forth the Truths. At the end the thoughts of ten thousand Brahmās were freed from attachments and defilements. So the Lord became the refuge of many Brahmās, and going back from Brahma-loka to Jetavana preached the Dhamma in the way described and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Baka the Brahmā was the ascetic Kesava, Kappa the disciple was myself.”

Ja 406 Gandhārajātaka
The Story about (the King of) Gandhāra (7s)

In the present the monks store up medicines and are reproved for it by the lay folk. The Buddha tells a story of two kings who gave up their kingdoms to become ascetics, and how, when one had a slight fault, and the other reproved him for it, he took him for teacher.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Gandhāra (Gandhārarājā), Ānanda = (the king of) Vedeha.

Keywords: Renunciation, Asceticism.

“Villages full sixteen thousand.” The Teacher told this when dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the precept on the storing up of medicines. [722] The occasion however arose in Rājagaha. When the venerable Pilindiyavaccha went to the king’s dwelling to set free the park-keeper’s family, he made the palace all of gold by his Supernormal Powers; and the people in their delight brought to that elder the five kinds of medicine. He gave them away to the Saṅgha. So the Saṅgha abounded in medicines, and as they received the medicines, they filled pots and jars and bags in this way and laid them aside. People seeing this murmured, saying: “Those greedy monastics are hoarding in their houses.” The Teacher, hearing this thing, declared the precept, “Whatever medicines for sick monks (are received, must be used within seven days),” and said: “Monks, wise men of old, before the Buddha appeared, ordained in an outside sect and keeping only the five precepts, used to chide those who laid aside even grains of salt for the next day; but you, though ordained in such a dispensation which leads to safety, make a hoard for the second and the third day,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta was the king’s son of the Gandhāra kingdom; at his father’s death he became king and ruled with righteousness. [3.222]

In the Central Region, in the kingdom of Videha a king named Videha was ruling at the time. These two kings had never seen each other, but they were friends and had great trust the one in the other. At that time men were long-lived; their life was for thirty thousand years.

Then once, on the fast day of the full moon, the king of Gandhāra had taken the precepts, and on the dais in the middle of a royal throne prepared for him, looking through an open window on the eastern quarter, he sat giving to his ministers a discourse on the substance of the Dhamma. At that moment Rāhu was covering the moon’s orb which was full and spreading over the sky. The moon’s light vanished. The ministers, not seeing the moon’s brightness, told the king that the moon was seized by Rāhu. The king, observing the moon, thought: “That moon has lost its light, being marred by some trouble from outside; now my royal retinue is a trouble, and it is not meet that I should lose my light like the moon seized by Rāhu; I will leave my kingdom like the moon’s orb shining in a clear sky and become an ascetic; why should I admonish another? I will go about, 723 Mahāvagga vi. 15. 1.

---

724 [The Uposatha, or eight precepts.]
detached from kin and people, admonishing myself alone; that is meet for me.” So he said: “As you please (3.365) so do,” and gave over the kingdom to his ministers. When he gave up his kingdom in the two kingdoms of Kashmir and Gandhāra, he took the ascetic life, and attaining the Absorptions and Super Knowledges he passed the rains in the Himālayas region devoted to the delight of Absorption.

The king of Videha, having asked of merchants, “Is it well with my friend?” heard that he had taken the ascetic life, and thought: “When my friend has taken the ascetic life, what should I do with a kingdom?” So he gave up the rule in his city of Mithila, seven leagues in extent, and his kingdom of Videha, three hundred leagues in extent, with sixteen thousand villages, storehouses filled, and sixteen thousand dancing girls, and without thinking of his sons and daughters he went to the Himālayas region and took the ascetic life. There he lived on fruits only, dwelling in a state of quietude.

Both of them following this quiet life afterwards met, but did not recognise each other; yet they lived together in this quiet life in friendliness. The ascetic of Videha waited upon the ascetic of Gandhāra. On a day of full moon as they were sitting at the root of a tree and talking on things relating to the Dhamma, Rāhu covered the moon’s orb as it was shining in the sky. The ascetic of Videha looked up, saying: “Why is the moon’s light destroyed?” And seeing that it was seized by Rāhu, he asked, “Teacher, why has he covered the moon and made it dark?” “Scholar, that is the moon’s one trouble, Rāhu by name; he hinders it from shining; I, seeing the moon’s orb struck by Rāhu, thought, ‘There is the moon’s pure orb become dark by trouble from outside; now this kingdom is a trouble to [3.223] me; I will take the ascetic life so that the kingdom does not make me dark as Rāhu does the moon’s orb;’ and so taking the moon’s orb seized by Rāhu as my theme, I forsook my great kingdom and took the ascetic life.” “Teacher, were you king of Gandhāra?” (3.366) “Yes, I was.” “Teacher, I was the king Videha in the kingdom of Videha and city of Mithila; were we not friends though we never saw each other?” “What was your theme?” “I heard that you had taken the ascetic life and thinking, ‘Surely he has seen the good of that life,’ I took you as my theme, and leaving my kingdom took the ascetic life.” From that time they were exceedingly intimate and friendly, and lived on fruits only.
After a long time’s dwelling there they came down from the Himālayas for salt and vinegar, and came to a frontier village. The people, being pleased with their behaviour, gave them alms and taking a promise made for them houses for the night and the like in the forest, and made them dwell there, and built by the road a room for taking their meals in a pleasant watered spot. They, after going their rounds for alms in the frontier village, sat and ate the alms in that hut of leaves and then went to their dwelling-house.

The people who gave them food one day put salt on a leaf and gave it them, another day gave them saltless food. One day they gave them a great deal of salt in a leaf basket. The ascetic of Videha took the salt, and coming gave enough to the Bodhisatta at the meal time and took to himself the proper measure; then putting up the rest in a leaf basket he put it in a roll of grass, saying: “This will do for a saltless day.” Then one day when saltless food was received, the man of Videha, giving the alms-food to the man of Gandhāra, took the salt from the roll of grass and said: “Teacher, take salt.” “The people gave no salt today, where have you got it?” “Teacher, the people gave much salt one day before, then I kept what was over, saying, ‘This will do for a saltless day.’ ” Then the Bodhisatta chided him, saying: “O foolish man, you forsook the kingdom of Videha, three hundred leagues in extent, took the ascetic life and attained freedom from attachments, and now you get a desire for grains of salt.” And so admonishing him he spoke the first verse: [3.367]

1. “Villages full sixteen thousand with their wealth you threw away, Treasuries with wealth in plenty; and you’re hoarding here today!”

Videha, being thus chidden, did not endure the chiding but became estranged, saying: “Teacher, you see not your own fault, though you see mine; did you not leave your kingdom and become an ascetic, saying, ‘Why should I admonish another? I will admonish myself alone;’ why then are you now admonishing me?” So he spoke the second verse:

2. “Kandahar and all its province, all its wealth, you threw away, Giving no more royal orders; and you’re ordering me today!” [3.224]

Hearing him the Bodhisatta spoke the third verse:
3. “It is righteousness I’m speaking, for I hate unrighteousness; Righteousness when I am speaking, wrong on me leaves no impress.”

The ascetic of Videha, hearing the Bodhisatta’s words, said: “Teacher, it is not proper for one to speak after annoying and angering another, even though he speaks to the point; you are speaking very harshly to me, as if shaving me with blunt steel,” and so he spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Whatsoever words, if spoken, would to others cause offence, Wise men leave those words unspoken, though of mighty consequence.”

Then the Bodhisatta spoke the fifth verse:

5. “Let my hearer scatter chaff, or let him take offence or not, Righteousness when I am speaking, wrong on me can leave no spot.”

Having so said, he went on, “I will not work with you, O Ānanda, as a potter with raw clay only; I will speak chiding again and again; what is truth, that will abide.” And so being steadfast in conduct suitable to that Sugata’s discourse, as a potter among his vessels, after beating them often, takes not the raw clay, but takes the baked vessel only, so preaching and chiding again and again he takes a man like a good vessel, and preaching to show him this, he spoke this pair of verses:

6. “Were not wisdom and good conduct trained in some men’s lives to grow, Many would go wandering idly like the blinded buffalo.

7. But since some are wisely trained in moral conduct fair to grow, Thus it is that disciplined in paths of virtue others go.”

Hearing this, the Videhan ascetic said: “Teacher, from this time admonish me; I spoke to you with peevish temper, pardon me,” and so paying respect he gained the Great Being’s pardon. So they dwelt together in peace and went again to the Himālayas. Then the Bodhisatta told the Videhan ascetic how to focus on the Meditation Object. He did so and reached the Absorptions and Super Knowledges. So both, never leaving off meditation, became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

725 The ascetic is addressed by this name, as if his future rebirth as Ānanda was foreseen.
After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Videhan ascetic was Ananda, the Gandhāra king was myself.”

Ja 407 Mahākapijātaka

The Story about the Great Monkey (7s)

In the present the Sākiyans deceive the king of Kosala and send him the daughter of a slave girl as his new queen. When the son of this arrangement finds out he determines to destroy the clan. The Buddha tries to save them, but in the end he cannot. The Buddha then tells a story of how a great monkey-king laid down his life to save his troop.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the monkeys (kapirājā), the Buddha’s disciples = his followers (parisa),
Devadatta = the corrupt monkey (duṭṭhakapi).

Present Source: Ja 465 Bhaddasālajātaka,
Compare: Ja 7 Kaṭṭhahārijātaka, Dhp-a IV.3 Viḍūḍabha,
Quoted at: Ja 22 Kukkurajātaka, Ja 407 Mahākapijātaka, Past Compare: Jm 27 Mahākapi.

Keywords: Self-sacrifice, Leadership.

“You made yourself.” [3.225] The Teacher told this while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning good works towards one’s relatives. The occasion will appear in the Bhaddasālajātaka [Ja 444].

At Sāvatthi in the house of Anāthapiṇḍika there was always unfailing food for five hundred monks, and the same with Visākhā and the king of Kosala. But in the king’s palace, various and fine as was the fare given, no one was friendly to the monks. The result was that the monks never ate in the palace, but they took their food and went off to eat it at the house of Anāthapiṇḍika or Visākhā or some other of their trusted friends.

---

726 This story is figured in Cunningham’s Stūpa of Bharhut, plate xxxiii, fig. 4 (explained by Mr. Tawney in Proceedings of the Asiatic Society of Bengal for August, 1891). cf. Jātakamālā, no. 27 (The Great Monkey).

727 [The reference is wrong, it is actually Ja 465. I include the story here.]
One day the king said: “A present has been brought; take this to the monks,” and sent it to the refectory. An answer was brought that no monks were there in the refectory. “Where are they gone?” he asked. They were sitting in their friends’ houses to eat, was the reply. So the king after his morning meal came into the Teacher’s presence, and asked him, “Good sir, what is the best kind of food?” “The food of friendship is the best, great king,” said he, “even sour rice-gruel given by a friend becomes sweet.” “Well, sir, and with whom do the monks find friendship?” “With their kindred, great king, or with the Sakya families.” Then the king thought, what if he were to make a Sakya girl his queen-consort; then the monks would be his friends, as it were with their own kindred.

So rising from his seat, he returned to the palace, and sent a message to Kapilavatthu to this effect, “Please give me one of your daughters in marriage, for I wish to become connected with your family.” On receipt of this message the Sakyas gathered together and deliberated. “We live in a place subject to the authority of the king of Kosala; if we refuse a daughter, he will be very angry, and if we give her, the custom of our clan will be broken. What are we to do?” Then Mahānāma said to them, “Do not trouble about it. I have a daughter, named Vāsabhakhattiyyā. Her mother is a slave woman, Nāgamuṇḍā by name; she is some sixteen years of age, of great beauty and auspicious prospects, and by her father’s side noble. We will send her, as a girl nobly born.” The Sakyas agreed, and sent for the messengers, and said they were willing to give a daughter of the clan, and that they might take her with them at once. But the messengers reflected: “These Sakyas are desperately proud, in matters of birth. Suppose they should send a girl who was not of them, and say that she was so? We will take none but one who eats along with you.” So they replied, “Well, we will take her, but we will take one who eats along with you.”

The Sakyas assigned a lodging for the messengers, and then wondered what to do. Mahānāma said: “Now do not trouble about it; I will find a way. At my mealtime bring in Vāsabhakhattiyyā dressed up in her finery; then just as I have taken one mouthful, produce a letter, and say, ‘My lord, such a king has sent you a letter; be pleased to hear his message at once.’ ”

They agreed; and as he was taking his meal they dressed and adorned the maid. “Bring my daughter,” said Mahānāma, “and let her take food with me.” “In a moment,” they said, “as soon as she is properly adorned,” and after a short delay they brought her in. Expecting to take food with her father, she dipped her hand into the same dish. Mahānāma had taken one mouthful with her, and put it in his mouth; but just as he stretched out his hand for another, they brought him a letter, saying: “My lord, such a king has sent a letter to you; be pleased to hear his message at once.” Said Mahānāma, “Go on with your meal, my dear,” and holding his right hand in the dish, with his left took the letter and looked at it. As he examined the message the maiden went on eating. When she had eaten, he washed his hand and rinsed out his mouth. The messengers were firmly convinced that she was his daughter, for they did not divine the secret.

So Mahānāma sent away his daughter in great pomp. The messengers brought her to Sāvatthi, and said that this maiden was the true-born daughter of Mahānāma. The king was pleased, and caused the whole city to be decorated, and placed her upon a pile of treasure, and by a ceremonial sprinkling made her his chief queen. She was dear to the king, and beloved.

In a short time the queen conceived, and the king caused the proper treatment to be used; and at the end of ten months, she brought forth a son whose colour was a golden brown. On the day of his naming, the king sent a message to his grandmother, saying: “A son has been born to Vāsabhakhattiya, daughter of the Sakya king; what shall his name be?” Now the courtier who was charged with this message was slightly deaf; but he went and told the king’s grandmother. When she heard it, she said: “Even when Vāsabhakhattiya had never borne a son, she was more than all the world; and now she will be the king’s darling.” The deaf man did not hear the word, “darling” aright, but thought she said: “Viḍūḍabha,” so back he went to the king, and told him that he was to name the prince Viḍūḍabha. This, the king thought, must be some ancient family name, and so named him Viḍūḍabha. After this the prince grew up and was treated as a prince should be.

When he was at the age of seven years, having observed how the other princes received presents of toy elephants and horses and other toys from the family of their mothers’ fathers, the lad said to his mother, “Mother, the rest of them get presents from their mothers’ family, but no one sends me anything. Are you an orphan?” Then she replied, “My boy, your grandfathers are the Sakya kings, but they live a long way off, and that is why they send you nothing.” Again when he was sixteen, he said: “Mother, I want to see your father’s family.” “Don’t speak of it, child,” she said. “What will you do when you get there?” But though she put him off, he asked her again and again. At last his mother said: “Well, go then.” So the lad got his father’s consent, and set out with a number of followers. Vāsabhakhattiyā sent on a letter before him to this effect, “I am living here happily; let not my masters tell him anything of the secret.” But the Sakyas, on hearing of the coming of Viḍūḍabha, sent off all their young children into the country. “It is impossible,” they said, “to receive him with respect.”

When the prince arrived at Kapilavatthu, the Sakyas had assembled in the royal rest-house. The prince approached the rest house, and waited. Then they said to him, “This is your mother’s father, this is her brother,” pointing them out. He walked from one to the other, saluting them. But although he bowed to them till his back ached, not one of them vouchsafed a greeting; so he asked, “Why is it that none of you greet me?” The Sakyas replied, “My dear, the youngest princes are all in the country,” then they entertained him grandly.

After a few days stay, he set out for home with all his retinue. Just then a slave woman washed the seat which he had used in the rest house with milk-water, saying insultingly, “Here’s the seat where sat the son of Vāsabhakhattiyā, the slave girl!” A man who had left his spear behind was just fetching it, when he overheard the abuse of prince Viḍūḍabha. He asked what it meant. He was told that Vāsabhakhattiyā was born of a slave to Mahānāma the Sakya. This he told to the soldiers; a great uproar arose, all shouting, “Vāsabhakhattiyā is a slave woman’s daughter, so they say!” The prince heard it. “Yes,” he thought, “let them pour milk-water over the seat I sat in, to wash it! When I am king, I will wash the place with the blood of the hearts!”

When he returned to Sāvatthi, the courtiers told the whole matter to the king. The king was enraged against the Sakyas for giving him a slave’s daughter to marry. He cut off all allowances made to Vāsabhakhattiyā and her son, and gave them only what is proper to be given to slave men and women.

Some few days later the Teacher came to the palace, and took a seat. The king approached him, and with a greeting said: “Sir, I am told that your clansmen gave me a slave’s daughter to marry. I have cut off their allowances, mother and son, and grant them only what slaves would get.” Said the Teacher, “The Sakyas have done wrong, O great king! If they gave any one, they ought to have given a girl of their own blood. But, O king, this I say; Vāsabhakhattiya is a king’s daughter, and in the house of a noble king she has received the ceremonial sprinkling; Viḍūḍabha too was begotten by a noble king. Wise men of old have said, what matters the mother’s birth? The birth of the father is the measure; and to a poor wife, a picker of sticks, they gave the position of queen consort; and the son born of her obtained the sovereignty of Benares, twelve leagues in extent, and became king Kaṭṭhavāhana, the wood-carrier,” whereupon he told him the story of the Kaṭṭhahārijātaka [Ja 7].

When the king heard this speech he was pleased; and saying to himself, “The father’s birth is the measure of the man,” he again gave mother and son the treatment suited to them.

Now the king’s commander-in-chief was a man named Bandhula. His wife, Mallikā, was barren, and he sent her away to Kusināra, telling her to return to her own family. “I will go,” said she, “when I have saluted the Teacher.” She went to Jetavana, and greeting the Tathāgata stood waiting on one side. “Where are you going?” he asked. She replied, “My husband has sent me home, sir.” “Why?” asked the Teacher. “I am barren, sir, I have no son.” “If that is all,” said he, “there is no reason why you should go. Return.” She was much pleased, and saluting the Teacher went home again. Her husband asked her why she had come back. She answered, “The One with Ten Powers sent me back, my lord.” “Then,” said the commander-in-chief, “the Tathāgata must have seen good reason.” The woman soon after conceived, and when her cravings began, told him of it. “What is it you want?” he asked. “My lord,” said she, “I desire to go and bathe and drink the water of the tank in Vesālī City where the families of the kings get water for the ceremonial sprinkling.” The commander-in-chief promised to try. Seizing his bow, strong as a thousand bows, he put his wife in a chariot, and left Sāvatthī, and drove his chariot to Vesālī.

Now at this time there lived close to the gate a Licchavi named Mahāli, who had been educated by the same teacher as the king of Kosala’s general, Bandhula. This man was blind, and used to advise the Licchavis on all matters temporal and spiritual. Hearing the clatter of the chariot as it went over the threshold, he said: “The noise of the chariot of Bandhula the Mallian! This day there will be fear for the Licchavis!” By the tank there was set a strong guard, within and without; above it was spread an iron net; not even a bird could find room to get through.
But the general, dismounting from his carriage, put the guards to flight with the blows of his sword, and burst through the iron network, and in the tank bathed his wife and gave her to drink of the water; then after bathing himself, he set Mallikā in the chariot, and left the town, and went back by the way he came.

The guards went and told all to the Licchavis. Then were the kings of the Licchavis angry; and five hundred of them, mounted in five hundred chariots, departed to capture Bandhula the Mallian. They informed Mahāli of it, and he said: “Go not! For he will slay you all.” But they said: “Nay, but we will go.” “Then if you come to a place where a wheel has sunk up to the nave, you must return. If you return not then, return back from that place when you hear the noise of a thunderbolt. If then you turn not, turn back from that place where you shall see a hole in front of your chariots. Go no further!” But they did not turn back according to his word, but pursued on and on.

Mallikā espied them and said: “There are chariots in sight, my lord.” “Then tell me,” said he, “when they all look like one chariot.” When they all in a line looked like one, she said: “My lord, I see as it were the head of one chariot.” “Take the reins, then,” said he, and gave the reins into her hand; he stood upright in the chariot, and strung his bow. The chariot-wheel sank into the earth nave-deep. The Licchavis came to the place, and saw it, but turned not back. The other went on a little further, and twanged the bow string; then came a noise as the noise of a thunderbolt, yet even then they turned not, but pursued on and on. Bandhula stood up in the chariot and sped a shaft, and it cleft the heads of all the five hundred chariots, and passed right through the five hundred kings in the place where the girdle is fastened, and then buried itself in the earth. As they did not perceive that they were wounded they pursued still, shouting, “Stop, holloa, stop!” Bandhula stopped his chariot, and said: “You are dead men, and I cannot fight with the dead.” “What!” they said, “dead, such as we now are?” “Loose the girdle of the first man,” said Bandhula.

They loosed his girdle, and at the instant the girdle was loosed, he fell dead. Then he said to them, “You are all of you in the same condition; go to your homes, and set in order what should be ordered, and give your directions to your wives and families, and then doff your armour.” They did so, and then all of them gave up the ghost.
And Bandhula conveyed Mallikā to Sāvatthi. She bore twin sons sixteen times in succession, and they were all mighty men and heroes, and became perfected in all manner of accomplishments. Each one of them had a thousand men to attend him, and when they went with their father to wait on the king, they alone filled the courtyard of the palace to overflowing.

One day some men who had been defeated in court on a false charge, seeing Bandhula approach, raised a great outcry, and informed him that the judges of the court had supported a false charge. So Bandhula went into the court, and judged the case, and gave each man his own. The crowd uttered loud shouts of applause. The king asked what it meant, and on hearing was much pleased; all those officers he sent away, and gave Bandhula charge of the judgement court, and thenceforward he judged aright. Then the former judges became poor, because they no longer received bribes, and they slandered Bandhula in the king's ear, accusing him of aiming at the kingdom himself. The king listened to their words, and could not control his suspicions. “But,” he reflected, “if he be slain here, I shall be blamed.” He instigated certain men to harry the frontier districts; then sending for Bandhula, he said: “The borders are in a blaze; go with your sons and capture the brigands.” With him he also sent other men sufficient, mighty men of war, with instructions to kill him and his two-and-thirty sons, and cut off their heads, and bring them back.

While he was yet on the way, the hired brigands got wind of the general's coming, and took to flight. He settled the people of that district in their homes, and quieted the province, and set out for home. Then when he was not far from the city, those warriors cut off his head and the heads of his sons.

On that day Mallikā had sent an invitation to the two chief disciples along with five hundred of the monks. Early in the forenoon a letter was brought to her, with news that her husband and sons had lost their heads. When she heard this, without a word to a soul, she tucked the letter in her dress, and waited upon the company of the monks. Her attendants had given rice to the monks, when bringing in a bowl of ghee they happened to break the bowl just in front of the elders. Then the Captain of the Dhamma said: “Pots are made to be broken; do not trouble about it.” The lady produced her letter from the fold of her dress, saying: “Here I have a letter informing me that my husband and his two-and-thirty sons have been beheaded. If I do not trouble about that, am I likely to trouble when a bowl is broken?” The Captain of the Dhamma now began, “Unseen, unknown,” and so forth, then rising from his seat uttered a discourse [Sallasutta, Snp 3.8], and went home.

She summoned her two-and-thirty daughters-in-law, and to them said: “Your husbands, though innocent, have reaped the fruit of their former deeds. Do not you grieve, nor commit a wrong worse even than the king’s.” This was her advice. The king’s spies hearing this speech brought word to him that they were not angry. Then the king was distressed, and went to her dwelling, and craving pardon of Mallikā and her sons’ wives, offered a boon. She replied, “Be it accepted.” She set out the funeral feast, and bathed, and then went before the king. “My lord,” said she, “you granted me a boon. I want nothing but this, that you permit my two-and-thirty daughters-in-law and me to go back to our own homes.” The king consented. Each of her two-and-thirty sons’ wives she sent away to her home, and herself returned to the home of her family in the city of Kusināra. And the king gave the post of commander-in-chief to one Dīghakārāyana, sister’s son to the general Bandhula. But he went about picking faults in the king and saying: “He murdered my uncle.”

Ever after the murder of the innocent Bandhula the king was devoured by remorse, and had no peace of mind, felt no joy in being king.

At that time the Teacher dwelt near a country town of the Sakyas, named Uḷumpa. There went the king, pitched a camp not far from the park, and with a few attendants went to the monastery to salute the Teacher. The five symbols of royalty he handed to Kārāyana, and alone entered the Perfumed Chamber. All that followed must be described as in the Dhammacetiyasutta [MN 89]. When he entered the Perfumed Chamber, Kārāyana took those symbols of royalty, and made Viḍūḍabha king; and leaving behind for the king one horse and a serving woman, he went to Sāvatthi.

After a pleasant conversation with the Teacher, the king on his return saw no army. He enquired of the woman, and learned what had been done. Then set out for the city of Rājagaha, resolved to take his nephew with him, and capture Viḍūḍabha. It was late when he came to the city, and the gates were shut; and lying down in a shed, exhausted by exposure to wind and sun, he died there.
When the night began to grow brighter, the woman began to wail, “My lord, the king of Kosala is past help!” The sound was heard, and news came to the king. He performed the obsequies of his uncle with great magnificence.

Viḍūḍabha once firmly established on the throne remembered that grudge of his, and determined to destroy the Sakyas one and all; to which end he set out with a large army. That day at dawn the Teacher, looking forth over the world, saw destruction threatening his kin. “I must help my kindred,” thought he. In the forenoon he went in search of alms, then after returning from his meal lay down lion-like in his Perfumed Chamber, and in the evening-time, having past through the air to a spot near Kapilavatthu, sat beneath a tree that gave scanty shade. Hard by that place, a huge and shady banyan tree stood on the boundary of Viḍūḍabha’s realms. Viḍūḍabha seeing the Teacher approached and saluting him, said: “Why, sir, are you sitting under so thin a tree in all this heat? Sit beneath this shady banyan, sir.” He replied, “Let be, O king! The shade of my kindred keeps me cool.” “The Teacher,” thought the other, “must have come here to protect his clansmen.” So he saluted the Teacher, and returned again to Sāvatthi. And the Teacher rising went to Jetavana.

A second and a third time the king called to mind his grudge against the Sakyas, a second and a third time he set forth, and again saw the Teacher seated in the same place, then again returned.

A fourth time he set out; and the Teacher, scanning the former deeds of the Sakyas, perceived that nothing could do away with the effect of their evildoing, in casting poison into the river; so he did not go there the fourth time. Then king Viḍūḍabha slew all the Sakyas, beginning with babes at the breast, and with the blood of the hearts washed the bench, and returned.

The monks began talking in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “The supreme Buddha does good works towards his relatives.” When the Teacher had asked and been told their theme, he said: “Monks, this is not the first time a Tathāgata has done good works towards his relatives,” and so he told a story of the past time.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a monkey’s womb. When he grew up and attained stature and stoutness, he was strong and vigorous, and lived in the Himālayas with a retinue of eighty thousand monkeys. Near the Ganges bank there was a mango tree (others say it was a banyan), with branches and forks, having a deep shade and thick leaves, like a mountaintop. Its sweet fruits, of divine fragrance and flavour, were as large as waterpots; from one branch the fruits fell on the ground, from one into the Ganges water, from two into the main trunk of the tree. The Bodhisatta, while eating the fruit with a troop of monkeys, thought: “Someday danger will come upon us owing to the fruit of this tree falling on the water,” and so, not to leave one fruit on the branch which grew over the water, he made them eat or throw down the flowers at their season from the time they were of the size of a chick-pea. But notwithstanding, one ripe fruit, unseen by the eighty thousand monkeys, hidden by an ant’s nest, fell into the river, and stuck in the net above the king of Benares, who was bathing for amusement with a net above him and another below.

When the king had amused himself all day and was going away in the evening, the fishermen, who were drawing the net, saw the fruit and not knowing what it was, showed it to the king. The king asked, “What is this fruit?” “We do not know, sire.” “Who will know?” “The foresters, sire.” He had the foresters called, and learning from them that it was a mango, he cut it with a knife, and first making the foresters eat of it, he ate of it himself and had some of it given to his harem and his ministers. The flavour of the ripe mango remained pervading the king’s whole body.

Possessed by desire of the flavour, he asked the foresters where that tree stood, and hearing that it was on a river bank in the Himālayas, he had many rafts joined together and sailed upstream by the route shown by the foresters. The exact account of days is not given. In due course they came to the place, and the foresters said to the king, “Sire, there is the tree.” The king stopped the rafts and went on foot with a great retinue, and having a bed prepared at the foot of the tree, he lay down after eating the mango fruit and enjoying the various excellent flavours. At each side they set a guard and made a fire.

When the men had fallen asleep, the Bodhisatta came at midnight with his retinue. Eighty thousand monkeys moving from branch to branch ate the mangoes. The king, waking and seeing the herd of monkeys, roused his men and calling his archers said: “Surround these monkeys that eat the mangoes so that they may not escape, and shoot them; tomorrow we will eat mangoes with monkey’s flesh.” The archers obeyed, saying: “Very well,” and surrounding the tree stood with arrows ready. The monkeys seeing them and fearing death, as they could not escape, came to the Bodhisatta and said: “Sire, the archers stand round the tree, saying: “We will shoot those vagrant monkeys,” what are we to do?” and so stood shivering. The Bodhisatta said: “Do not fear, I will give you life,” and so comforting the herd of monkeys, he ascended a branch that rose up straight, went along another branch that stretched towards the Ganges, and springing from the end of it, he passed a hundred bow-lengths and lighted on a bush on the bank. Coming down, he marked the distance, saying: “That will be the distance I have come,” and cutting a bamboo shoot at the root and stripping it, he said: “So much will be fastened to the tree, and so much will stay in the air,” and so reckoned the two lengths, forgetting the part fastened on his own waist. Taking the shoot he fastened one end of it to the tree on the Ganges bank and the other to his own waist, and then cleared the space of a hundred bow-lengths with the speed of a cloud torn by the wind.

From not reckoning the part fastened to his waist, he failed to reach the tree; so seizing a branch firmly with both hands he gave signal to the troop of monkeys, “Go quickly with good luck, treading on my back along the bamboo shoot.” The eighty thousand monkeys escaped thus, after saluting the Bodhisatta and getting his leave. Devadatta was then a monkey and among that herd; he said: “This is a chance for me to see the last of my enemy,” so climbing up a branch he made a spring and fell on the Bodhisatta’s back. The Bodhisatta’s heart broke and great pain came on him. Devadatta having caused that maddening pain went away; and the Bodhisatta was alone.

The king being awake saw all that was done by the monkeys and the Bodhisatta; and he lay down thinking: “This animal, not reckoning his own life, has seen to the safety of his troop.” When day broke, being pleased with the Bodhisatta, he thought: “It is not right to destroy this king of the monkeys; I will bring him down by some means and take care of him,” so turning the raft down the Ganges and building a platform there, he made the Bodhisatta come down gently, and had him clothed with a yellow robe on his back and washed in Ganges water, made him drink sugared water, and had his body cleansed and anointed with oil.

728 From the figure on the Bharhut Stūpa, it appears that he jumped across the Ganges.
refined a thousand times; then he put an oiled skin on a bed and making him lie there, he set himself on a low seat, and spoke the first verse: \{3.373\}

1. “You made yourself a bridge for them to pass in safety through;
What are you then to them, monkey, and what are they to you?”

Hearing him, the Bodhisatta instructing the king spoke the other verses:

2. “Victorious king, I guard the herd, I am their lord and chief,
When they were filled with fear of you and stricken sore with grief.

3. I leapt a hundred times the length of bow outstretched that lies,
When I had bound a bamboo-shoot firmly around my thighs;

4. I reached the tree like thunder-cloud sped by the tempest’s blast;
I lost my strength, but reached a bough; with hands I held it fast.

5. And as I hung extended there held fast by shoot and bough,
My monkeys passed across my back and are in safety now.

6. Therefore I fear no pain of death, bonds do not give me pain,
The happiness of those was won o’er whom I used to reign.

7. A parable for you, O king, if you the truth would read;
The happiness of kingdom and of army and of steed
And city must be dear to you, if you would rule indeed.” \{3.374\}

The Bodhisatta, thus instructing and teaching the king, died. The king, calling his ministers, gave orders that the monkey-king should have obsequies like a king, and he sent to the harem, saying: “Come to the cemetery, as retinue for the monkey-king, with red garments, and dishevelled hair, and torches in your hands.” \{3.375\} The ministers made a funeral pile with a hundred wagon loads of timber. Having prepared the Bodhisatta’s obsequies in a royal manner, they took his skull, and came to the king. The king caused a shrine to be built at the Bodhisatta’s burial-place, torches to be burnt there and offerings of incense and flowers to be made; he had the skull inlaid with gold, and put in front raised on a spear-point; honouring it with incense and flowers, he put it at the king’s gate when he came to Benares, and having the whole city decked out he paid honour to it for seven days. Then taking it as a relic and raising a shrine, he honoured it with incense and garlands all his life; and established in the Bodhisatta’s teaching he gave alms and did other good deeds, and ruling his kingdom righteously became destined for heaven.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was Ānanda, the monkey’s retinue the assembly, and the monkey-king myself.”

Ja 408 Kumbhakārajātaka

The Story about the Potter (7s)

In the present some monks harbor wrong thoughts. The Buddha tells a story of four kings who from reading the signs gave up their kingdoms and became Pacceka-buddhas, of a potter who entertained them, and how his wife ordained, and after raising his children he did so too.

The Bodhisatta = the wanderer (paribbājaka),
Rāhulamātā = the female wanderer (paribbājikā),
Rāhula = their son (putta),
Uppalavaṇṇā = their daughter (dhītā).

Present Source: Ja 408 Kumbhakāra,
Quoted at: Ja 370 Palāsa, Ja 412 Koṭisimbali, Ja 459 Pānīya,
Present Compare: Ja 305 Silavīmaṁsana.

Keywords: Wrong thoughts, Renunciation, Pacceka-buddhas.

“A mango in a forest.” [3.228] The Teacher told this when dwelling in Jetavana, concerning overcoming wrong. The occasion will appear in the Pānīyajātaka [Ja 459].729 At that time in Sāvatthi five hundred friends, who had become ascetics, dwelling in the House of the Golden Pavement, had lustful thoughts at midnight. The Teacher regards his disciples three times a night and three times a day, six times every night and day, as a jay guards her egg, or a yak-cow her tail, or a mother her beloved son, or a one-eyed man his remaining eye; so in the very instant he overcame wrong which was beginning. He was observing Jetavana on that midnight and knowing the monks’ conduct and their thoughts, he considered, “This wrong among these monks if it grows will destroy the foundation for becoming an Arahat. I will this moment repudiate this wrong and show them how to become an Arahat,” so leaving the perfumed chamber he called Ānanda, and bidding him collect all the monks dwelling in the place, he got them together and sat down on the seat prepared for Buddha. He said: “Monks, it is not right to live in the power of defiled thoughts; a wrong if it grows brings great ruin like an enemy; a monk ought to rebuke even a little wrong; wise men of old seeing even a very slight cause, rebuked a defiled thought that had begun and so became Paccekabuddhas,” and so he told a story of the past.

729 [But that Jātaka refers us to this one for the details!]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a potter’s family in a suburb of Benares; when he grew up he became a householder, had a son and daughter, and supported his wife and children by his potter’s handicraft. At that time in the Kaliṅga kingdom, in the city of Dantapura, the king named Karanḍu, going to his garden with a great retinue, saw at the garden-gate a mango tree laden with sweet fruit; he stretched out his hand from his seat on the elephant and seized a bunch of mangoes; then entering the garden he sat on the royal seat and ate a mango, giving some to those worthy of favours. From the time when the king took one, ministers, brahmins, and householders, thinking that others should also do so, took down and ate mangoes from that tree. Coming again and again they climbed the tree, and beating it with clubs and breaking the branches down and off, they ate the fruit, not leaving even the unripe.

The king amused himself in the garden for the day, and at evening as he came by on the royal elephant he dismounted on seeing the tree, and going to its root he looked up and thought: “In the morning this tree stood beautiful with its burden of fruit and those who gazed upon it could not be satisfied; now it stands not beautiful with its fruit broken down and off.” Again looking from another place he saw another mango tree barren, and thought: “This mango tree stands beautiful in its barrenness like a bare mountain of jewels; the other from its fruitfulness fell into misfortune; the householder’s life is like a fruitful tree, the ascetic life like a barren tree; the wealthy have fear, the poor have no fear; I too would be like the barren tree.” So taking the fruit tree as his subject, he stood at the root; and considering the three signs\textsuperscript{730} and perfecting spiritual insight, he became a Pacceka-buddha, and reflecting, “The envelope of the womb is now fallen from me, rebirth in the three existences is ended, the filth of transmigration is cleansed, the ocean of tears dried up, the wall of bones broken down, there is no more rebirth for me,” he stood as if adorned with every ornament.

Then his ministers said: “You stand too long, O great king.” “I am not a king, I am a Pacceka-buddha.” “Pacceka-buddhas are not like you, O king.” “Then what are they like?” “Their hair and beards are shaved, they are dressed in yellow robes, they are not attached to family or tribe, they are like clouds torn by wind or the moon’s orb freed from Rāhu, and they dwell in the Himālayas in the Nandamūla cave; such, O king, are the Pacceka-buddhas.” At that moment the king threw up his hand and touched his head, and instantly the marks of a householder disappeared, and the marks of a monastic came into view,

\begin{quote}
Three robes, bowl, razor, needles, strainer, belt,
A pious monk those eight marks should own,
\end{quote}

the requisites, as they are called, of a monastic became attached to his body. Standing in the air he preached to the multitude, and then went through the sky to the mountain cave Nandamūla in the Upper Himālayas.

In the kingdom of Kandahar in the city Taxila, the king named Naggaji on a terrace, in the middle of a royal couch, saw a woman who had put a jewelled bracelet on each hand and was grinding perfume as she sat near; he thought: “These jewelled bracelets do not rub or jingle when separate,” and so sat watching. Then she, putting the bracelet from the right hand \{3.378\} on the left hand and collecting perfume with the right, began to grind it. The bracelet on the left hand rubbing against the other made a noise. The king observed that these two bracelets made a sound when rubbing against each other, and he thought: “That bracelet when separate touched nothing, it now touches the second and makes a noise; just so living beings when separate do not touch or make a noise, when they become two or three they rub against each other and make a din; now I rule the inhabitants in the two kingdoms of Kashmir and Kandahar, and I too ought to dwell like the single bracelet ruling myself and not ruling another,” so making the rubbing of the bracelets his topic, seated as he [3.230] was, he realised the three characteristics, attained spiritual insight, and became a Paccekabuddha. Standing in the air he preached to the multitude, and then went through the sky to the mountain cave Nandamūla in the Upper Himālayas.

\textsuperscript{730} Impermanence, suffering, unreality.
The Section with Seven Verses – 1457

In the kingdom of Videha, in the city of Mithila, the king, named Nimi, after breakfast, surrounded by his ministers, stood looking down at the street through an open window of the palace. A hawk, having taken some meat from the meat-market, was flying up into the air. Some vultures or other birds, surrounding the hawk on each side, went on pecking it with their beaks, striking it with their wings and beating it with their feet, for the sake of the meat. Not enduring to be killed, the hawk dropped the flesh, another bird took it; the rest leaving the hawk fell on the other; when he relinquished it, a third took it; and they pecked him also in the same way. The king seeing those birds thought: “Whoever took the flesh, sorrow befell him; whoever relinquished it, happiness befell him; whoever takes the five pleasures of sense, sorrow falls him, happiness the other man; these are common to many; now I have sixteen thousand women; I ought to live in happiness leaving the five pleasures of sense, as the hawk relinquishing the morsel of flesh.” Considering this wisely, [3.379] standing as he was, he realised the three characteristics, attained spiritual insight and became a wise Paccekabuddha. Standing in the air he preached to the multitude, and then went through the sky to the mountain cave Nandamūla in the Upper Himālayas.

In the kingdom of Uttarapañcāla, in the city of Kampilla, the king, named Dummukha, after breakfast, surrounded by his ministers, stood looking down on the palace-yard from an open window. At the instant they opened the door of a cow-pen; the bulls coming from the pen set upon one cow in lust; and one great bull with sharp horns seeing another bull coming, possessed by the jealousy of lust, struck him in the thigh with his sharp horns. By the force of the blow his entrails came out, and so he died. The king seeing this thought: “Living beings from the state of beasts upwards become sorrowful from the power of lust; this bull through lust has reached death; other beings also are disturbed by lust; I ought to abandon the sensual desires that disturb those beings,” and so standing as he was he realised the three characteristics, attained spiritual insight and became a wise Paccekabuddha. Standing in the air he preached to the multitude, and then went through the sky to the mountain cave Nandamūla in the Upper Himālayas

Then one day those four Pacceka-Buddhas, considering that it was time for their rounds, left the Nandamūla cave, having cleansed their teeth by chewing betel in the Lake Anotatta, and having attended to their needs in Manosilā, they took the bowl and robe, and by Supernormal Powers flying in the air, and treading on clouds of the five colours, they alighted not far from a suburb of Benares. In a convenient spot they put on the robes, took the bowl, and entering the suburb they went the rounds for alms till they came to the Bodhisatta’s house-door. The Bodhisatta seeing them was delighted and making them enter his house he made them sit on a seat prepared, he respectfully [3.231] gave them water and served them with excellent food, hard and soft. Then sitting on one side he saluted the eldest of them, saying: “Sir, your ascetic life appears very beautiful; your senses are very calm, your complexion is very clear; what topic of thought [3.380] made you take to the ascetic life and ordination?” and as he asked the eldest of them, so also he came up to the others and he asked them also. Then those four saying: “I was so and so, king of such and such a city, in such and such a kingdom,” and so on, in that way each told the causes of his retiring from the world and spoke one verse each in order;

1. “A mango in a forest did I see Full-grown, and dark, fruitful exceedingly;
   And for its fruit those men did the tree break,
   ’Twas this inclined my heart the bowl to take.”

2. “A bracelet, polished by a hand renowned,
   A woman wore on each wrist without sound;
   One touched the other and a noise did wake;
   ’Twas this inclined my heart the bowl to take.”

3. “Birds in a flock a bird unfriended tore,
   Who all alone a lump of carrion bore;
   The bird was smitten for the carrion’s sake
   ’Twas this inclined my heart the bowl to take.”
4. “A bull in pride among his fellows paced;
   High rose his back, with strength and beauty graced;
   From lust he died; a horn his wound did make;
   ’Twas this inclined my heart the bowl to take.”  (3.381)

The Bodhisatta, hearing each verse, said: “Good, sir; your topic is suitable,” and so commended each Paccekabuddha; and having listened to the discourse delivered by those four, he became disinclined to a householder’s life. When the Paccekabuddhas went away, after breakfast seated at his ease, he called his wife and said: “Wife, those four Paccekabuddhas left kingdoms to be monks and now live without wrong, without hindrance, in the bliss of the ascetic life; while I make a livelihood by earnings; what have I to do with a householder’s life? Do you take the children and stay in the house,” and he spoke two verses;

5. “Kalīṅga’s king Karaṇḍu, Gandhāra’s Naggaji,
   Paṅcāla’s ruler Dummukha, Videha’s great Nimi,
   Have left their thrones and live the monastic life sinlessly.

6. Here their godlike forms they show
   Each one like a blazing fire;
   Bhaggavi, I too will go,
   Leaving all that men desire.”  (3.382)

Hearing his words she said: “Husband, ever since I heard the discourse of the Paccekabuddhas I too have no happiness in the house,” and she spoke a verse: [3.232]

7. “’Tis the appointed time, I know;
   Better teachers may not be;
   Bhaggava, I too will go,
   Like a bird from hand set free.”

The Bodhisatta hearing her words was silent. She was deceiving the Bodhisatta, as she was anxious to take the ascetic life before him; so she said: “Husband, I am going to the water-tank, do you look after the children,” and taking a pot as if she had been going there, she went away and coming to the ascetics outside the town she was ordained by them.

The Bodhisatta finding that she did not return attended to the children himself. Afterwards when they grew up a little and could understand for themselves, in order to teach them, {3.383} when cooking rice he would cook one day a little hard and raw, one day a little underdone, one day well-cooked, one day sodden, one day without salt, another with too much. The children said: “Father, the rice today is not-boiled, today it is sodden, today well cooked; today it is without salt, today it has too much salt.” The Bodhisatta said: “Yes, dears,” and thought: “These children now know what is raw and what is cooked, what has salt and what has none; they will be able to live in their own way; I ought to become ordained.” Then showing them to their kinsfolk he was ordained to the ascetic life, and dwelt outside the city. Then one day the female ascetic begging in Benares saw him and saluted him, saying: “Sir, I believe you killed the children.” The Bodhisatta said: “I don’t kill children; when they could understand for themselves I became ordained; you were careless of them and pleased yourself by being ordained,” and so he spoke the last verse:

8. “Having seen they could distinguish salt from saltless, boiled from raw, I became a monk; leave me, we can each follow the law.”

So exhorting the female ascetic he took leave of her. She taking the exhortation saluted the Bodhisatta and went to a place that pleased her. After that day they never saw each other. The Bodhīsatta reaching supernatural knowledge became destined to the Brahmā Realm.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths five hundred monks became Arahats. “At that time the daughter was Uppalavaṇṇā, the son was Rāhula, the female ascetic Rāhula’s mother, and the ascetic was myself.”

Ja 409 Daḷhadhammājātaka
The Story about (King) Daḷhadhamma (7s)

In the present one elephant has grown old and the king now neglects her past service, until the Buddha reminds him of it. The Buddha then tells a similar story from the past, and how a war elephant was later used to pull a dung cart. The Bodhisatta admonished the king to remember service done and treat her with respect.

The Bodhisatta = the minister (amaṭṭa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
(the female elephant) Bhaddavatikā = the elephant (oṭṭhibyāḍhi).
The Section with Seven Verses – 1461

Keywords: Gratitude, Service, Animals.

“I carried for the king.” [3.233] (3.384) The Teacher told this when dwelling in the Ghosita forest near Kosambī, concerning Bhaddavatikā, king Udena’s female elephant. Now the way in which this elephant was adorned and the royal lineage of Udena will be set forth in the Mātaṅga jātaka [Ja 497].731 One day this elephant going out of the city in the morning saw the Buddha surrounded by a multitude of saints, in the incomparable majesty of a Buddha, entering the city for alms, and falling at the Tathāgata’s feet, with lamentation she prayed to him, saying: “Lord who knowest all, saviour of the whole world, when I was young and able to do work, Udena, the rightful king, loved me, saying, ‘My life and kingdom and queen are all due to her,’ and gave me great honour, adorning me with all ornaments; he had my stall smeared with perfumed earth, and coloured hangings put round it, and a lamp lit with perfumed oil, and a dish of incense set there, he had a golden pot set on my dunghill, and made me stand on a coloured carpet, and gave me royal food of many choice flavours; but now when I am old and cannot do work, he has cut off all that honour; unprotected and destitute I live by eating ketaka fruit in the forest; I have no other refuge; make Udena think on my merits and restore me again my old honour, O Lord.”

The Teacher said: “Go you, I will speak to the king and get your old honour restored,” and he went to the door of the king’s dwelling. The king made Buddha enter, and gave great entertainment in the palace to the assembly of monks following Buddha. When the meal was over, the Teacher gave thanks to the king and asked, “O king, where is Bhaddavatikā?” “Lord, I know not.” “O king, after giving honour to servants, it is not right to take it away in their old age, it is right to be grateful and thankful; Bhaddavatikā is now old, she is worn with age and unprotected, and she lives by eating ketaka fruit in the wood; it is not meet for you to leave her unprotected in her old age,” so telling Bhaddavatikā’s merits and saying: “Restore all her former honours,” (3.385) he departed. The king did so. It was spread over the whole city that the former honour was restored because the Buddha had spoken of her merits.

731 [Unfortunately, the said Jātaka provides no details about these matters.]
This became known in the assembly of the monks, and the monks discussed it in their meeting. The Teacher, coming and hearing that this was their subject, said: “Monks, this is not the first time that the Buddha has by telling her merits got her former honours restored,” and he told a story of the past.

In the past there was a king named Dalhadhamma reigning in Benares. At that time the Bodhisatta was born in a minister’s family, and when he grew up he served the king. He received much honour from the king, and stood in the place of the most valued minister. The king had a certain female elephant,\(^{732}\) endowed with might and very strong. She went a hundred leagues in one day, she did the duties of messenger [3.234] for the king, and in battle she fought and crushed the enemy. The king said: “She is very serviceable to me,” gave her all ornaments and caused all honour to be given her such as Udena gave to Bhaddavatikā.

Then when she was weak from age the king took away all her honour. From that time she was unprotected and lived by eating grass and leaves in the forest. Then one day when the vessels in the king’s court were not sufficient, the king sent for a potter, and said: “The vessels are not sufficient.” “O king, I have no oxen to yoke in carts to bring cow-dung (for baking clay).” The king hearing this tale said: “Where is our female elephant?” “O king, she is wandering at her own will.” The king gave her to the potter, saying: “Henceforth do you yoke her and bring cow-dung.” The potter said: “Good, O king,” and did so.

Then one day she, coming out of the city, saw the Bodhisatta coming in, and falling at his feet, she said, lamenting, “Lord, the king in my youth considered me very serviceable and gave me great honour; \(^{[3.386]}\) now that I am old, he has cut it all away and takes no thought of me; I am unprotected and live by eating grass and leaves in the forest; in this misery he has now given me to a potter to yoke in a cart; except you I have no refuge; you know my services to the king; restore me now the honour I have lost,” and she spoke three verses;

1. “I carried for the king of old; was he not satisfied?
   With weapons at my breast I faced the fight with mighty stride.

\(^{732}\) Morris, Journal of the Pali Text Society for 1887, p. 150; but possibly the word means female camel.
2. My feats in battle done of old does not the king forget,
And such good services I did for couriers as were set?

3. Helpless and kinless now am I; surely my death is near,
To serve a potter when I'm come as his dung-carrier.” [3.387]

The Bodhisatta, hearing her tale, comforted her, saying: “Grieve not, I will tell the king and restore your honour,” so entering the city, he went to the king after his morning meal and took up the talk, saying: “Great king, did not a female elephant, named so and so, enter battle at such and such places with weapons bound on her breast, and on such a day with a writing on her neck did she not go a hundred leagues on a message? You gave her great honour; where is she now?” “I gave her to a potter for carrying dung.” Then the Bodhisatta said: “Is it right, great king, for you to give her to a potter to be yoked in a cart?” And for admonition he spoke four verses;

4. “By selfish hopes men regulate the honours that they pay;
As you the elephant, they throw the outworn slave away.

5. Good deeds and services received whenever men forget,
Ruin pursues the business still on which their hearts are set.

6. Good deeds and services received if men do not forget,
Success attends the business still on which their hearts are set. [3.235]

7. To all the multitude around this blessed truth I tell;
Be grateful all, and for reward you long in heaven shall dwell.” [3.388]

With this beginning the Bodhisatta gave instruction to all gathered there. Hearing this the king gave the old elephant her former honour, and established in the Bodhisatta’s instruction gave alms and did works of merit and became destined for heaven.

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the female elephant was Bhaddavatikā, the king Ānanda, the minister was I myself.”
Ja 410 Somadattajātaka

The Story about (the Young Elephant) Somadatta (7s)

In the present one old monk has a novice to help him. But when the novice dies he is inconsolable. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic who adopted an elephant, and the advice he received from Sakka when it died.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
the old monk = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the novice = the young elephant (hathipotako).

Past Compare: Ja 372 Migapotaka, Ja 410 Somadatta.

Keywords: Grief, Wisdom, Animals.

“Deep in the wood.” The Teacher told this while dwelling at Jetavana, about a certain old monk. The story was that this monk ordained a novice, who waited on him but soon died of a fatal disease. The old man went about weeping and wailing for his death.

Seeing him, the monks began to talk in the Dhamma Hall, “Sirs, this old monk goes about weeping and wailing for the novice’s death; he must surely have neglected the meditation on death.” The Teacher came, and hearing the subject of their talk, he said: “Monks, this is not the first time this man is weeping for the other’s death,” and so he told the old tale.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was Sakka. A certain wealthy brahmin, living in Benares, left the world, and became an ascetic in the Himālayas, [3.389] living by picking up roots and fruits in the forest. One day, searching for wild fruits, he saw an elephant-calf, and took it to his hermitage; he made as if it were his own son, calling it Somadatta, and tended it with food of grass and leaves. The elephant grew up to be great; but one day he took much food and fell sick of a surfeit. The ascetic took him inside the hermitage, and went to get wild fruits; but before he came back the young elephant died. Coming back with his fruits, the ascetic thought: “On other days my child comes to meet me, but not today; what is the matter with him?” So he lamented and spoke the first verse:
1. “Deep in the wood he’d meet me; but today
No elephant I see; where does he stray?” [3.236]

With this lament, he saw the elephant lying at the end of the covered walk and taking him round the neck he spoke the second verse in lamentation;

2. “’Tis he that lies in death cut down as a tender shoot is shred;
Low on the ground he lies; alas, my elephant is dead.”

At the instant, Sakka, surveying the world, thought: “This ascetic left wife and child for the dispensation, now he is lamenting the young elephant whom he called his son, I will rouse him and make him think,” and so coming to the hermitage he stood in the air and spoke the third verse: [3.390]

3. “To sorrow for the dead does ill become
The lone ascetic, freed from ties of home.”

Hearing this, the ascetic spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Should man with beast consort, O Sakka, grief
For a lost playmate finds in tears relief.”

Sakka uttered two verses, admonishing him:

5. “Such as to weep are fain may still lament the dead,
Weep not, O sage, ’tis vain to weep, the wise have said.

6. If by our tears we might prevail against the grave,
Thus would we all unite our dearest ones to save.”

Hearing Sakka’s words, the ascetic took thought and comfort, dried his tears, and uttered the remaining verses in praise of Sakka:

7. “As ghee-fed flame that blazes out amain
Is quenched with water, so he quenched my pain.

8. With sorrow’s shaft my heart was wounded sore;
He healed my wound and did my life restore. [3.391]
9. The barb extracted, full of joy and peace,
At Sakka’s words I from my sorrow cease.”

These verses were given above.\textsuperscript{733}

After admonishing the ascetic, Sakka went to his own place.

The Teacher, after the lesson, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the young elephant was the novice, the ascetic the old monk, Sakka was I myself.”

Ja 411 Susīmajātaka

The Story about (King) Susīma (7s)

In the present the monks are discussing the Bodhisatta’s Great Renunciation. The Buddha tells a story of a family priest who was asked to rule a country. He did so until shown a grey hair by his queen, upon which he renounced the kingdom and became an ascetic.

The Bodhisatta = king Susīma (Susīmarājā),
Rāhulamātā = his queen (aggamahesī),
Ānanda = his friend, the king (of Benares) (sahāyarājā).

Keywords: Renunciation, Asceticism.

“Heretofore the hairs.” [3.237] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, about the Great Renunciation. The monks were sitting in the Dhamma Hall, praising the One with Ten Powers’ renunciation. The Teacher, finding that this was their topic, said: “Monks, it is not strange that I should now make the Great Renunciation and retirement from the world, I who have for many hundred thousand ages exercised perfection; of old also I gave up the reign over the kingdom of Kāsi, three hundred leagues in extent, and made the renunciation,” and so he told the old tale.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived in the womb of his family priest’s chief wife. On the day of his birth, the king also had a son born. On the naming day they called the Great Being Susīmakumāra, and the king’s son Brahmadattakumāra. The king, seeing the two were born on the same day, had the Bodhisatta given to the nurse and brought up together with his own son. They both grew up fair, like sons of gods; they both learned all sciences at Taxila and came home again.

\textsuperscript{733} See supra, p. 214. [cf. Ja 372 Migapotakajātaka, vv. 1-7.]

The prince became viceroy, eating, drinking, and living along with the Bodhisatta; at his father’s death he became king, giving great honour to the Bodhisatta and making him his priest; one day he adorned the city, and decked like Sakka, king of gods, he went round the city in procession, seated on the shoulder of a royal elephant in his pride, equal to Erāvaṇa, with the Bodhisatta behind on the elephant's back.

The queen-mother, looking out from the royal window to see her son, saw the priest behind him as he came back from the procession; she fell in love with him and entering her chamber thought: “If I cannot win him, I shall die here,” so she left her food and lay there. The king, not seeing her, asked after her; when he heard she was ill, he went to her, and asked with respect what ailed her. She would not tell for shame. He sat on the royal throne, and sent his own chief queen to find what ailed his mother. She went and asked, stroking the queen-mother's back.

Women do not hide secrets from women; and the secret was told. The queen went and told the king. He said: “Well, go and comfort her; I will make the priest king, and make her his chief queen.” She went and comforted her. The king sent for the priest and told him the matter, “Friend, save my mother’s life; you shall be king, she your chief queen, I viceroy.” The priest said: “It cannot be,” but being asked again he consented; and the king made the priest king, the queen-mother chief queen, and himself viceroy. They lived all in harmony together, but the Bodhisatta pined amid a householder’s life; he left desires and inclined to an ascetic life; careless of the pleasures of sense he stood and sat and lay alone, like a man bound in jail or a chicken in a cage.

The chief queen thought: “The king avoids me, he stands and sits and lies alone; he is young and fresh, I am old and have grey hairs; what if I were to tell him a story that he has one grey hair, make him believe it and seek my company? “One day, as if cleaning the king's head, she said: “Your majesty is getting old, there is a grey hair on your head.” “Pull it out and put it in my hand.” She pulled a hair

---

734 Sakka’s elephant.
out, but threw it away and put into his hand one of her own grey hairs. When he saw it, fear of death made the sweat start from his forehead, though it was like a plate of gold. He admonished himself, saying: “Susīma, you have become old in your youth; all this time sunk in the mud of desire, like a village pig wallowing in filth and mire, you cannot leave it; quit desires, and become an ascetic in the Himālayas; it is high time for the ascetic life,” and with this thought, he uttered the first verse:

1. “Heretofore the hairs were dark
   Clustering about my brow;
   White today; Susīma, mark!
   Time for dispensation now!”

So the Bodhisatta praised the ascetic life; but the queen saw she had caused him to leave her instead of loving her, and in fear, wishing to keep him from the ascetic life by praising his body, she uttered two verses; {3.394}

2. “Mine, not thine, the silvered hair;
   Mine the head from which it came;
   For your good the lie I dare;
   One such fault forbear to blame!

3. You are young, and fair to see,
   Like a tender plant in spring!
   Keep your kingdom, smile on me!
   Seek not now what age will bring!”

But the Bodhisatta said: “Lady, you tell of what must come; as age ripens, these dark hairs must turn and become pale like betel; I see the change and breaking up of body that comes in years, in the ripening of age, to royal maids and all the rest, though they are tender as a wreath of blue lotus-flowers, fair as gold, and drunken with the pride of their glorious youth; such, lady, is the dreary end of living beings,” and, moreover, showing the truth with the charm of a Buddha, he uttered two verses; [3.239] [3.395]

4. “I have marked the youthful maid,
   Swaying like the tender stalk,
   In her pride of form arrayed;
   Men are witched where'er she walk.
5. "Tis the same one I have scanned
(Eighty, ninety, years have passed),
Quivering, palsied, staff in hand,
Bent like rafter tree at last."

In this verse the Great Being showed the misery of beauty, and now declared his discontent with the householder’s life; {3.396}

6. “Such the thoughts I ponder o’er;
Lonely nights the thoughts allow;
Layman’s life I love no more;
Time for dispensation now!

7. Delight in layman’s life is a weak stay;
The wise man cuts it off and goes his way,
Renouncing joys of sense and all their sway.”

Thus declaring both the delight and misery of desires, he showed the truth with all a Buddha’s charm, he sent for his friend and made him take the kingdom again; he left his majesty and power amid the loud lamentations of kinsmen and friends; he became an ascetic sage in the Himālayas, and entering on Absorption, became destined for the Brahmā Realm. {3.397}

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, and giving the drink of ambrosia to many, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the chief queen was the mother of Rāhula, the king was Ānanda, and king Susīma was I myself.”

Ja 412 Koṭisimbalijātaka

The Story about the Cotton Tree (7s)

Alternative Title: Koṭasimbalijātaka (Cst)

In the present some monks harbor defiled thoughts. The Buddha tells a story of how a Supaṇṇa had captured a Nāga who grabbed hold of a banyan tree which was then uprooted. The Supaṇṇa landed on another tree with the snake and the banyan. The Devatā there was frightened, not by the aggression of the Supaṇṇa, but by the fear of a banyan seed being lodged in his home and eventually destroying it.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
Sāriputta = the king of the Supaṇṇas (Supaṇṇarājā).
“I bore with me.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning overcoming wrong. The incident leading to the tale will appear in the Paññājātaka [Ja 459].

The Teacher regards his disciples three times a night and three times a day, six times every night and day, as a jay guards her egg, or a yak-cow her tail, or a mother her beloved son, or a one-eyed man his remaining eye; so in the very instant he overcame wrong which was beginning. He was observing Jetavana on that midnight and knowing the monks' conduct and their thoughts, he considered, “This wrong among these monks if it grows will destroy the foundation for becoming an Arahat. I will this moment repudiate this wrong and show them how to become Arahats,” so leaving the perfumed chamber he called Ānanda, and bidding him collect all the monks dwelling in the place, he got them together and sat down on the seat prepared for Buddha.

On this occasion the Teacher, perceiving that five hundred monks were overcome by thoughts of desire in the House of the Golden Pavement, [3.240] gathered the assembly and said: “Monks, it is right to distrust where distrust is proper; defilements surround a man as banyans and such plants grow up around a tree; in this way of old a spirit dwelling in the top of a cotton tree saw a bird voiding the banyan seeds it had eaten among the branches of the cotton tree, and became terrified lest her abode should thereby come to destruction,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā dwelling in the top of a cotton tree. A king of the Supaṇṇas assumed a shape a hundred and fifty leagues in extent, and dividing the water in the great ocean by the blast of his wings, he seized by the tail a king of Nāgas a thousand fathoms long, and making the Nāga disgorge what he had seized in his mouth, he flew along the tree tops towards the cotton tree. The Nāga king thought: “I will make him drop me and let me go,” so he stuck his hood into a banyan tree and wound himself round it firmly. Owing to the Supaṇṇa king’s strength and the great size of the Nāga king the banyan was uprooted. But the snake king would not let go the banyan. The Supaṇṇa king took the Nāga king, banyan tree and all, to the cotton tree, laid him on the trunk, opened his belly \(3.398\) and ate the fat. Then he threw the rest of the carcase into the sea.

[Otherwise known as Ja 459 Pāṇīyajātaka. I include the relevant section here.]

Now in that banyan there was a certain bird, who flew up when the banyan was thrown away, and perched in one of the boughs high on the cotton tree. The Tree Devatā seeing the bird shook and trembled with fear, thinking: “This bird will let its droppings fall on my trunk; a growth of banyan or of fig will arise and go spreading all over my tree; so my home will be destroyed.” The tree shook to the roots with the trembling of the spirit. The Supaṇṇa king perceived the trembling, and spoke two verses in enquiry as to the reason;

1. “I bore with me the thousand fathoms length of that king snake;
   His size and my huge bulk you bore and yet you did not quake.

2. But now this tiny bird you bear, so small compared to me;
   You shake with fear and tremble; but wherefore, cotton tree?”

Then the Devaputta spoke four verses in explanation of the reason;

3. “Flesh is your food, O king; the bird’s is fruit;
   Seeds of the banyan and the fig he’ll shoot
   And Bodhi tree too, and all my trunk pollute;

4. They will grow trees in shelter of my stem,
   And I shall be no tree, thus hid by them. \(3.399\)

5. Other trees, once strong of root and rich in branches, plainly show
   How the seeds that birds do carry in destruction lay them low.

6. Parasitic growths will bury e’en the mighty forest tree;
   This is why, O king, I quiver when the fear to come I see.” \(3.241\)

Hearing the Tree Devatā’s words, the Supaṇṇa king spoke the final verse:
7. “Fear is right if things are fearful; ’gainst the coming danger guard;
Wise men look on both worlds calmly if they present fears discard.”

So speaking, the Supāṇṇa king by his power drove the bird away from that tree.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths, beginning with the words, “It is right to distrust where distrust is proper,” and identified the Jātaka, after the Truths {3.400} five hundred monks became Arahats. “At that time Sāriputta was the Supāṇṇa king and I myself the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 413 Dhūmakārijātaka

The Story about (the Goatherder) Dhūmakāri (7s)

In the present the king neglects his old and trusted warriors, and invests in newcomers, but because of distrust they did not prevail. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past, and how a goatherder had favoured deer over his goats, and eventually lost both.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Vidhura (Vidhurapanḍita), (king) Pasenadi of Kosala = (the brahmin goatherder) Dhūmakāri, Ānanda = king of the Kurus (Korabyarājā).

Past Compare: JA 495 Dasabrāhmaṇa, JA 545 Vidhura.

Keywords: Trust, Favour.

“The righteous king.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the Kosala king’s favour to a stranger. At one time, the story goes, that king showed no favour to his old warriors who came to him in the usual way, but gave honour and hospitality to strangers coming for the first time. He went to fight in a disturbed frontier province; but his old warriors would not fight, thinking that the newcomers who were in favour would do so; and the newcomers would not, thinking that the old warriors would. The rebels prevailed. The king, knowing that his defeat was owing to the mistake he had made in showing favour to newcomers, returned to Sāvatthi. He resolved to ask the One with Ten Powers whether he was the only king who had ever been defeated for that reason; so after the morning meal he went to Jetavana and put the question to the Teacher. The Teacher answered, “Great king, yours is not the only case; former kings also were defeated by reason of the favour they showed to newcomers,” and so, at the king’s request, he told a story of the past.
In the past in the city of Indapattana, in the kingdom of the Kurus, a king was reigning named Dhanañjaya, of the race of Yudhiṣṭhila. The Bodhisatta was born in the house of his family priest. When he grew up, he learned all the arts at Taxila. He returned to Indapattana, and at his father’s death he became family priest to the king and his counsellor in things temporal and spiritual. His name was Vidhurapaṇḍita. [3.242]

King Dhanañjaya disregarded his old soldiers and showed favour to newcomers. He went to fight in a disturbed frontier province; but neither his old warriors nor the newcomers would fight, each thinking the other party would see to the matter. The king was defeated. On his return to Indapattana he reflected that his defeat was due to the favour he had shown to newcomers. [3.401] One day he thought: “Am I the only king who has ever been defeated through favour shown to newcomers, or have others had the same fate before? I will ask Vidhurapaṇḍita.” So he put the question to Vidhurapaṇḍita when he came to the king’s levee.

The Teacher, declaring the reason of his question, spoke half a verse:

1. “The righteous king Yudhiṣṭhila once asked Vidhura wise:
   ‘Brahmin, do know in whose lone heart much bitter sorrow lies?’”

Hearing him, the Bodhisatta said: “Great king, your sorrow is but a trifling sorrow. Of old, a brahmin goatherd, named Dhūmakāri [Smoke-Maker], took a great flock of goats, and making a pen in the forest kept them there; he had a smoking fire and lived on milk and the like, tending his goats. Seeing some deer of golden hue who had come, he felt a love for them, and disregarding his goats he paid the honour due to them to the deer. In the autumn the deer moved away to the Himālayas; his goats were dead and the deer gone from his sight; so for sorrow he took jaundice and died. He paid honour to newcomers and perished, having sorrow and misery a hundred, a thousand times more than you.” Bringing forward this instance, he said:

2. “A brahmin with a flock of goats, of high Vasiṣṭha’s race,
   Kept smoking fire by night and day in forest dwelling-place.

3. Smelling the smoke, a herd of deer, by gnats sore pestered, come
   To find a dwelling for the rains near Dhūmakāri’s home.
4. The deer have all attention now; his goats receive no care,
   They come and go untended all, and so they perish there. \{3.402\}

5. But now the gnats have left the wood, the autumn’s clear of rain;
   The deer must seek the mountain-heights and river-springs again.

6. The brahmin sees the deer are gone and all his goats are dead;
   Jaundice attacks him worn with grief, and all his colour’s fled.

7. So he who disregards his own, and calls a stranger dear,
   Like Dhūmakāri, mourns alone with many a bitter tear.”

Such was the tale told by the Great Being to console the king. The king was comforted and pleased, and gave him much wealth. From that time onward he showed favour to his own people, and doing deeds of generosity and virtue, he became destined for heaven. \[3.243\]

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Kuru king was Ānanda, Dhūmakāri was Pasenadi, king of Kosala, and Vidhurapaṇḍita was myself.”

Ja 414 Jāgarajātaka

The Story about being Wakeful (7s)

In the present a virtuous layman spends the night in walking meditation and saves the caravan he is with from thieves. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic and his conversation about wakefulness, and its true meaning.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Uppalavaṇṇā = Devatā.

Keywords: Wakefulness, Vigilance, Devas.

“Who is it that wakes.” \{3.403\} The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a certain lay brother. He was a disciple who had entered on the First Path. He set out by a forest road from Sāvatthi with a caravan of carts. At a certain pleasant watered spot the leader of the caravan unyoked five hundred carts, and arranging for food, both hard and soft, he took up his lodging there. The men lay down here and there to sleep.
The lay brother practised walking meditation at the root of a tree near the leader of the caravan. Five hundred robbers planned to plunder the caravan; with various weapons in their hands they surrounded it and waited. Seeing the lay brother at his walk they stood waiting to begin plundering when he should go to sleep. He went on walking all night.

At dawn the robbers threw away the sticks and stones and other weapons they had picked up; they went away, saying: “Master caravan-leader, you are owner of your property because you have got your life owing to that man who keeps awake so diligently; you should pay honour to him.” The caravan men rising betimes saw the stones and other things thrown away by the robbers and gave honour to the lay brother, recognising that they owed their lives to him. The lay brother went to his destination and did his business; then he returned to Sāvatthi and went on to Jetavana; there he saluted and did homage to the Tathāgata and sat at his feet, and on his invitation to declare himself, he told the tale. The Teacher said: “Lay brother, it is not you alone who have gained special merit by waking and watching, wise men of old did the same.” And so at the lay brother’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. When he grew up he learned all the arts at Taxila, and after returning lived as a householder. After a time he left his house and became an ascetic; soon he reached the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and living in the Himālayas quarter in the standing and walking attitudes only, he walked all night without sleeping. A Devatā who lived in a tree at the end of his walk was pleased with him and spoke the first verse, putting a question to him from a hole in the trunk:

1. “Who is it that wakes when others sleep and sleeps while others wake?
   Who is it can read my riddle, who to this will answer make?” [3.244]

The Bodhisatta, hearing the Devatā’s voice, spoke this verse:

2. “I am he who wakes while others sleep, and sleeps while others wake.
   I am he who can read your riddle, I to you can answer make.”

The Devatā put a question again in this verse:
3. “How is it you wake while others sleep, and sleep while others wake? How is it you read my riddle, how this answer do you make?”

He explained the point:

4. “Some men forget that virtue lies in stern sobriety, When such are sleeping I’m awake, O spirit of the tree.

5. Passion and vice and ignorance in some have ceased to be; When such are waking then I sleep, Devatā of the tree.

6. So it is I wake while others sleep, and sleep while others wake; So it is I read your riddle, so to you I answer make.” [3.405]

When the Great Being gave this answer, the spirit was pleased and spoke the last verse in his praise;

7. “Good it is you wake while others sleep, and sleep while others wake; Good your reading of my riddle, good the answer that you make.”

And so making the Bodhisatta’s praises, the spirit entered its abode in the tree.

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time, the Devatā was Uppalavaṇṇā, the ascetic was myself.”

Ja 415 Kummāsapīṇḍajātaka

The Story about the Portion of Gruel (7s)

Alternative Title: Kummāsapīṇḍijātaka (Cst)

In the present one maid gives three portions of gruel to the Buddha and is that very day raised to be chief queen. The Buddha tells a similar story of the past, and how both the king and the queen could remember their good deeds from past lives and declare their efficacy.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā), Rāhulamātā = the queen (devī).

Present Source: Ja 415 Kummāsapīṇḍa,

Compare Kathāsaritsāgara No. xxvii. 79.
The Section with Seven Verses – 1477

Quoted at: Ja 519 Sambula,
Past Compare: Jm 3 Kulmāśapiṇḍi.

Keywords: Virue, Giving, Devas.

“Service done.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning queen Mallikā. She was the daughter of the chief of the garland-makers of Sāvatthi, extremely beautiful and very good. When she was sixteen years of age, as she was going to a flower-garden with some other girls, she had three portions of sour gruel in a flower-basket. As she was leaving the town, she saw the Fortunate One entering it, diffusing radiance and surrounded by the assembly of the monks; and she brought him the three portions of gruel. [3.245]

The Teacher accepted, holding out his royal bowl. She saluted the Tathāgata’s feet with her head, and taking her joy as subject of meditation, stood on one side. Observing her the Teacher smiled. The venerable Ānanda wondered why the Tathāgata smiled and asked him the question. The Teacher told him the reason, “Ānanda, this girl will be today the chief queen of the Kosala king through the fruit of these portions of gruel.” The girl went on to the flower-garden. {3.406}

That very day the Kosala king fought with Ajātasattu and fled away in defeat. As he came on his horse he heard the sound of her singing, and being attracted by it he rode towards the garden. The girl’s merit was ripe; so when she saw the king she came without running away, and seized at the bridle by the horse’s nose. The king from horseback asked if she was married or no. Hearing that she was not, he dismounted, and being wearied with wind and sun rested for a little time in her lap; then he made her mount, and with a great army entered the town and brought her to her own house. At evening he sent a chariot and with great honour and pomp brought her from her house, set her on a heap of jewels, anointed her and made her chief queen. From that time onward she was the dear, beloved and devoted wife of the king, possessed of faithful servants and the five feminine charms; and she was a favourite of the Buddhas. It became noised abroad through the whole city that she had attained such prosperity because she had given the three portions of gruel to the Teacher.

One day they began a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, “Sirs, queen Mallikā gave three portions of gruel to the Buddhas, and as the fruit of that, on the very same day she was anointed queen; great indeed is the virtue of Buddhas.” The Teacher came, asked and was told the subject of the monk’s talk; he said: “It is not strange, monks, that Mallikā has become chief queen of the Kosala king by giving three portions of gruel to the omniscient Buddha alone; for why? It is because of the great virtue of Buddhas; wise men of old gave gruel without salt or oil to Paccekabuddhas, and owing to that attained in their next birth the glory of being kings in Kāsi, three hundred leagues in extent,” and so he told a story of the past.
The Section with Seven Verses – 1478

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a poor family; when he grew up he made a living by working for wages with a certain rich man. One day he got four portions of sour gruel from a shop, thinking: “This will do for my breakfast,” and so went on to his farming-work. Seeing four Paccekabuddhas coming towards Benares to collect alms, he thought: “I have these four portions of gruel, {3.407} what if I were to give them to these men who are coming to Benares for alms?” So he came up and saluting them said: “Sirs, I have these four portions of gruel in hand; I offer them to you; pray accept them, good sirs, and so I shall gain merit to my lasting good and welfare.” Seeing that they accepted, he spread sand and arranged four seats and strewed broken branches on them; then he set the Paccekabuddhas in order; bringing water in a leaf-basket, he poured the water of donation, and then set the four portions of gruel in four bowls with salutation and the words, “Sirs, in consequence of these may I not be born in a poor family; may this be the cause of my attaining omniscience.” The Paccekabuddhas ate and then gave thanks and departed to the Nandamūla cave.

The Bodhisatta, as he saluted, felt the joy of association with Paccekabuddhas, and after they had departed [3.246] from his sight and he had gone to his work, he remembered them always till his death; as the fruit of this, he was born in the womb of the chief queen of Benares. His name was prince Brahmadatta. From the time of his being able to walk alone, he saw clearly by the power of recollecting all that he had done in former births, like the reflection of his own face in a clear mirror, that he was now born in that state because he had given four portions of gruel to the Paccekabuddhas when he was a servant and going to work in that same city.

When he grew up he learned all the arts at Taxila; on his return his father was pleased with the accomplishments he displayed, and appointed him viceroy; afterwards, on his father’s death, he was established in the kingdom. Then he married the exceedingly beautiful daughter of the Kosala king, and made her his chief queen. On the day of his parasol-festival they decorated the whole city as if it were a city of the gods. He went round the city in procession; then he ascended the palace, which was decorated, and on the dais mounted a throne with the white parasol erected on it; sitting there he looked down on all those that stood in attendance, on one side the ministers, on another the brahmins and householders resplendent in the beauty of varied apparel, on another the townspeople with various gifts in their hands, on another troops of dancing girls to the number of sixteen thousand like a gathering of the Devaccharās in full apparel.

Looking on all this entrancing splendour he remembered his former estate and thought: “This white parasol with golden garland and plinth of massive gold, these many thousand elephants and chariots, my great territory full of jewels and pearls, teeming with wealth and grain of all kinds, these women like the Devaccharās, and all this splendour, which is mine alone, is due only to an alms-gift of four portions of gruel given to four Paccekabuddhas; I have gained all this through them,” and so remembering the excellence of the Paccekabuddhas he plainly declared his own former action of merit. As he thought of it his whole body was filled with delight. Delight melted his heart and amid the multitude he sang two exalted utterances:

1. “Service done to Buddhas high
   Ne'er, they say, is reckoned cheap;
   Alms of gruel, saltless, dry,
   Bring me this reward to reap.

2. Elephant and horse and kine,
   Gold and corn and all the land,
   Troops of girls with form divine;
   Alms have brought them to my hand.”

So the Bodhisatta in his joy and delight on the day of his parasol-ceremony sang this exalted utterance in two verses. From that time onward they were called the king’s favourite song, and all sung them – the Bodhisatta’s dancing girls, his other dancers and musicians, his people in the palace, the townsfolk and those in ministerial circles.
After a long time had passed, the chief queen became anxious to know the meaning of the song, but she did not ask the Great Being. One day the king was pleased with some quality of hers and said: “Lady, I will give you a boon; accept a boon.” “It is well, O king, I accept.” “What shall I give you, elephants, horses or the like?” “O king, through your grace I lack nothing. I have no need of such things; but if you wish to give me a boon, give it by telling me the meaning of your song.” “Lady, what need have you of that boon? Accept something else.” “O king, I have no need of anything else; it is that I will accept.” “Well, lady, I will tell it, but not as a secret to you alone; I will send a drum round the whole twelve leagues of Benares, I will make a jewelled pavilion at my palace-door and arrange there a jewelled throne; on it I will sit amidst ministers, brahmins and other people of the city, and the sixteen thousand women, and there tell the tale.” She agreed.

The king had all done as he said, and then sat on the throne amidst a great multitude, like Sakka amidst the company of the gods. The queen too with all her ornaments set a golden chair of ceremony and sat in an appropriate place on one side, and looking with a side glance she said: “O king, tell and explain to me, as if causing the moon to arise in the sky, the meaning of the exalted utterance you sang in your delight,” and so she spoke the third verse:

3. “Glorious and righteous king,
   Many a time the song you sing,
   In exceeding joy of heart;
   Pray to me the cause impart.” [3.411]

The Great Being declaring the meaning of the song spoke four verses:

4. “This the city, but the station different, in my previous birth;
   Servant was I to another, hireling, but of honest worth.

5. Going from the town to labour four ascetics once I saw,
   Passionless and calm in bearing, perfect in the moral law.

6. All my thoughts went to those Buddhas; as they sat beneath the tree,
   With my hands I brought them gruel, offering of piety.
7. Such the virtuous deed of merit; lo! the fruit I reap today
All the kingly state and riches, all the land beneath my sway.” [3.412]

When she heard the Great Being thus fully explaining the fruit of his action, the queen said joyfully, “Great king, if you discern so visibly the fruits of charitable giving, from this day forward take a portion of rice and do not eat yourself until you have given it to righteous monks and brahmins,” and she spoke a verse in praise of the Bodhisatta:

8. “Eat, due alms remembering,
Set the wheel of right to roll;
Flee injustice, mighty king,
Righteously your realm control.” [3.248]

The Great Being, accepting what she said, spoke a verse:

9. “Still I make that road my own
Walking in the path of right,
Where the good, fair queen, have gone;
Saints are pleasant to my sight.” [3.413]

After saying this, he looked at the queen’s beauty and said: “Fair lady, I have told fully my good deeds done in former time, but amongst all these ladies there is none like you in beauty or charming grace; by what deed did you attain this beauty?” And he spoke a verse:

10. “Lady, like a Devaccharā,
You the crowd of maids outshine;
For what gracious deed was given
Meeed of beauty so divine?”

Then she told the virtuous deed done in her former birth, and spoke the last two verses:

11. “I was once a handmaid’s slave
At Ambaṭṭha’s royal court,
To modesty my heart I gave,
To virtue and to good report.
12. In a begging monk’s bowl
Once an alms of rice I put;
Generosity had filled my soul;
Such the deed, and lo! the fruit.”

She too, it is said, spoke with accurate knowledge and remembrance of past births.

So both fully declared their past deeds, and from that day they had six halls of generosity built, at the four gates, in the centre of the city and at the palace-door, and stirring up all Jambudīpa they gave great gifts, kept the moral duties and the fast days, and at the end of their lives became destined for heaven.

At the end of the lesson, the Teacher identified the birth, “At that time the queen was the mother of Rāhula, and the king was myself.”

Ja 416 Parantapajātaka

The Story about (the Attendant) Parantapa (7s)

In the present the monks are discussing how Devadatta goes about trying to kill the Buddha. The Buddha tells a story of a prince who could understand the speech of animals and thwarted their plans. It also tells of how a prince found out his father’s murderer, who lived in fear of discovery, and took his revenge.

The Bodhisatta = the son of the king (puttarājā),
Ānanda = the family priest (purohita),
Devadatta = the father king (piturājā).

Keywords: Fear, Revenge, Animals.

“Terror and fear.” [3.249] The Teacher told this while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, concerning Devadatta’s going about to kill him.

They were discussing it in the Dhamma Hall, “Sirs, Devadatta {3.415} is going about to kill the Tathāgata, he has hired bowmen, thrown down a rock, let loose Nālāgiri, and uses special means for the destruction of the Tathāgata.” The Teacher came and asked the subject of their discussion as they sat together; when they told him, he said: “Monks, this is not the first time he has gone about to kill me; but he could not even make me afraid, and gained only sorrow for himself,” and so he told a story of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his chief queen. When he grew up, he learned all the arts at Taxila, and acquired a spell for the understanding of all animals’ cries. After listening duly to his teacher, he returned to Benares. His father appointed him viceroy; but though he did so, he became anxious to kill him and would not even see him.

A female jackal with two cubs entered the city at night by a sewer, when men were retired to rest. In the Bodhisatta’s palace, near his bedroom, there was a chamber, where a single traveller, who had taken his shoes off and put them by his feet on the floor, was lying down, not yet asleep, on a plank. The jackal-cubs were hungry and gave a cry. Their mother said in the speech of jackals, “Do not make a noise, dears; there is a man in that chamber who has taken his shoes off and laid them on the floor; he is lying on a plank, but is not asleep yet; when he falls asleep, I will take his shoes and give you food.” By the power of the spell the Bodhisatta understood her call, and leaving his bedroom he opened a window and said: “Who is there?” “I, your majesty, a traveller.” “Where are your shoes?” “On the floor.” “Lift them and hang them up.” Hearing this the jackal was angry with the Bodhisatta.

One day she entered the city again by the same way. That day a drunken man {3.416} went down to drink in a lotus-tank; falling in, he sank and was drowned. He possessed the two garments he was wearing, a thousand pieces in his undergarment, and a ring on his finger. The jackal-cubs cried out for hunger, and the mother said: “Be quiet, dears; there is a dead man in this lotus-tank, he had such and such property; he is lying dead on the tank-stair, I will give you his flesh to eat.” The Bodhisatta, hearing her, opened the window and said: “Who is in the chamber?” One rose and {3.250} said: “I.” “Go and take the clothes, the thousand pieces and the ring from the man who is lying dead in yonder lotus-tank, and make the body sink so that it cannot rise out of the water.” The man did so. The jackal was angry again, “The other day you prevented my children eating the shoes; today you prevent them eating the dead man. Very well; on the third day from this a hostile king will come and encompass the city, your father will send you to battle, they will cut off your head; I will drink your throat’s blood and satisfy my enmity; you make yourself an enemy of mine and I will see to it,” so she cried abusing the Bodhisatta. Then she took her cubs and went away.
On the third day the hostile king came and encompassed the city. The king said to the Bodhisatta, “Go, dear son, and fight him.” “O king, I have seen a vision; I cannot go, for I fear I shall lose my life.” “What is your life or death to me? Go.” The Great Being obeyed; taking his men he avoided the gate where the hostile king was posted, and went out by another which he had opened. As he went the whole city became as it were deserted, for all men went out with him. He encamped in a certain open space and waited. The king thought: “My viceroy has emptied the city and fled with all my forces; the enemy is lying all round the city; I am but a dead man.” To save his life he took his chief queen, his family priest, and a single attendant named Parantapa; with them he fled in disguise by night and entered a wood. Hearing of his flight, the Bodhisatta entered the city, defeated the hostile king in battle and took the kingdom.

His father made a hut of leaves on a river bank and lived there on wild fruits. He and the family priest used to go looking for wild fruits; the servant Parantapa stayed with the queen in the hut. She was with child by the king; but owing to being constantly with Parantapa, she did wrong with him. One day she said to him, “If the king knows, neither you nor I would live; kill him.” “In what way?” “He makes you carry his sword and bathing-dress when he goes to bathe; take him off his guard at the bathing-place, cut off his head and chop his body to pieces with the sword and then bury him in the ground.” He agreed.

One day the priest had gone out for wild fruits; he had climbed a tree near the king’s bathing-place and was gathering the fruit. The king wished to bathe, and came to the water-side with Parantapa carrying his sword and bathing-dress. As he was going to bathe, Parantapa, meaning to kill him when off his guard, seized him by the neck and raised the sword. The king cried out in fear of death. The priest heard the cry and saw from above that Parantapa was murdering him; but he was in great terror and slipping down from his branch in the tree, he hid in a thicket. Parantapa heard the noise he made as he slipped down, and after killing and burying the king he thought: “There was a noise of slipping from a branch thereabouts; who is there?” But seeing no man he bathed and went away. [3.251]

Then the priest came out of his hiding-place; knowing that the king had been cut in pieces and buried in a pit, he bathed and in fear of his life he pretended to be blind when he came back to the hut. Parantapa saw him and asked what had happened to him. He feigned not to know him and said: “O king, I am come back with my eyes lost; I was standing by an ant-hill in a wood full of serpents, and the breath of some venomous serpent must have fallen on me.” Parantapa thought the priest was addressing him as king in ignorance, and to put his mind at rest he said: “Brahmin, never mind, I will take care of you,” and so comforted him and gave him plenty of wild fruits. From that time it was Parantapa who gathered the fruits.

The queen bore a son. As he was growing up, she said to Parantapa one day at early morning when seated comfortably, “Some one saw you when you were killing the king?” “No one saw me; but I heard the noise of something slipping from a bough; whether it was man or beast I cannot tell; but whenever fear comes on me it must be from the cause of the boughs creaking,” and so in conversation with her he spoke the first verse:

1. “Terror and fear fall on me even now,
For then a man or beast did shake a bough.”

They thought the priest was asleep, but he was awake and heard their talk. One day, when Parantapa had gone for wild fruits, the priest remembered his brahmin-wife and spoke the second verse in lamentation; {3.419}

2. “My true wife’s home is near at hand; my love will make me be Pale like Parantapa and thin, at quivering of a tree.”

The queen asked what he was saying. He said: “I was only thinking,” but one day again he spoke the third verse:

3. “My dear wife’s in Benares; her absence wears me now
To pallor like Parantapa’s at shaking of a bough.”

Again one day he spoke a fourth verse:

4. “Her black eye’s glow, her speech and smiles in thought do bring me now
To pallor like Parantapa’s at shaking of a bough.”

In time the young prince grew up and reached the age of sixteen. Then the brahmin made him take a stick, and going with him to the bathing-place opened his eyes and looked. {3.420} “Are you not blind, brahmin?” said the prince. “I am not, but by this means I have saved my life; do you know who is your father?” “Yes.” “That man is not your father; your father was king of Benares; that man is a servant of your house, he did wrong with your mother and in this spot killed and buried your father,” and so saying he pulled up the bones and showed them to him. The prince grew very angry, and asked, “What am I to do?” “Do to that man what he did to your father here,” and showing him the [3.252] whole matter he taught him in a few days how to handle a sword. Then one day the prince took sword and bathing-dress and said: “Father, let us go and bathe.” Parantapa consented and went with him. When he went down into the water, the prince took his top-knot in the left hand and the sword in the right, and said: “At this spot you took my father by the top-knot and killed him as he cried out; even so will I do to you.” Parantapa wailed in fear of death and spoke two verses:

5. “Surely that sound has come to you and told you what befell;
Surely the man who bent the bough has come the tale to tell.

6. The foolish thought that once I had has reached your knowledge now;
That day a witness, man or beast, was there and shook the bough.”

Then the prince spoke the last verse:

7. "’Twas thus you slew my father with trait’rous word, untrue;
You hid his body in the boughs; now fear has come to you.” [3.421]

So saying, he slew him on the spot, buried him and covered the place with branches; then washing the sword and bathing, he went back to the hut of leaves. He told the priest how he had killed Parantapa; he censured his mother, and saying: “What shall we do now?” the three went back to Benares. The Bodhisatta made the young prince viceroy and doing generosity and other good works passed fully through the path to heaven.

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the old king, I myself was the young one.”
Book VIII. Aṭṭhanipāta
The Section with Eight Verses

Ja 417 Kaccānijātaka
The Story about (Mother) Kaccānī (8s)

In the present one man supports his mother, and when his wife wants to expel her, he refuses to. The Buddha tells an opposite story in which the son does expel the mother, and the latter holds funeral prayers for Dhamma, which had died. Sakka, stirred by her prayer, ensures her son returns, apologizes and takes up his duties again.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, the one who supported his mother = the same in the past (mātuposaka), his wife = the same in the past (bhariyā).

Keywords: Filial piety, Duty.

“Robed in white.” [3.253] [3.422] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling at Jetavana, concerning a man who supported his mother. The story is that the man was of good family and conduct in Sāvatthi, on his father’s death he became devoted to his mother and tended her with the services of mouth-washing, teeth-cleansing, bathing, feet-washing and the like, and also by giving her gruel, rice and other food. She said to him, “Dear son, there are other duties in a householder’s life, you must marry a maid of a suitable family, who will attend to me, and then you can do your proper work.” “Mother, it is for my own good and pleasure that I wait on you, who else would wait on you so well?” “Son, you ought to do something to advance the fortune of our house.” “I have no care for a householder’s life; I will wait on you, and after you are dead and burned I will become an ascetic.”

She pressed him again and again, and at last, without winning him over or gaining his consent, she brought him a maid of a suitable family. He married and lived with her, because he would not oppose his mother. She observed the great attention with which her husband waited on his mother, and desirous of imitating it she too waited on her with care. Noticing his wife’s devotion, he gave her thenceforth all the pleasant food he could get. As time went on she foolishly thought in her pride, “He gives me all the pleasant food he gets, he must be anxious to get rid \(3.423\) of his mother and I will find some means for doing so.”

So one day she said: “Husband, your mother scolds me when you leave the house.” He said nothing. She thought: “I will irritate the old woman and make her disagreeable to her son,” and thenceforth she gave her rice-gruel either very hot or very cold or very salt or saltless. When the old woman complained that it was too hot or too salt, she threw in cold water enough to fill the dish, and then on complaints of its being cold and saltless, she would make a great outcry, “Just now you said it was too hot and too salt, who can satisfy you?”

So at the bath she would throw very hot water on the old woman’s back, when she said: “Daughter, my back is burning,” the other would throw some very cold water on her, and on complaints of this, she would make a story to the neighbours, “This woman said just now it was too hot, now she screams ‘it is too cold,’ who can endure her impudence?” If the old woman complained that her bed was full of fleas, she would take the bed out and shake her own bed over it and then bring it back declaring, “I’ve given it a shake,” the good old lady, having twice as many fleas biting her \(3.254\) now, would spend the night sitting up and complain of being bitten all night; the other would retort, “Your bed was shaken yesterday and the day before too, who can satisfy all such a woman’s needs?”

To set the old woman’s son against her, she would scatter phlegm and mucus and grey hairs here and there, and when he asked who was making the whole house so dirty, she would say, “Your mother does it; but if she is told not to do so, she makes an outcry, I can’t stay in the same house with such an old wretch; you must decide whether she stays or I.” He hearkened to her and said: “Wife, you are yet young and can get a living wherever you go, but my mother is weak and I am her stay, go and depart to your own kin.” When she heard this, she was afraid and thought: “He cannot break with his mother who is so very dear to him, but if I go to my old home, I shall have a miserable life of separation, I will conciliate my mother-in-law and tend her as of old,” \(3.424\) and thenceforth she did so.

One day that lay brother went to Jetavana to hear the Dhamma, saluting the Teacher he stood on one side. The Teacher asked him if he were not careless of his old duties, if he were dutiful in tending his mother. He answered, “Yes, Lord, my mother brought me a maid to wife against my will, she did such and such unseemly things,” telling him all, “but the woman could not make me break with my mother, and now she tends her with all respect.” The Teacher heard the story and said: “This time you would not do her bidding, but formerly you cast out your mother at her bidding and owing to me took her back again to your house and tended her,” and at the man’s request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, a young man of a certain family on his father’s death devoted himself to his mother and tended her as in the introductory story, the details are to be given in full as above. But in this case, when his wife said she could not live with the old wretch and he must decide which of them should go, he took her word that his mother was in fault and said: “Mother, you are always raising strife in the house, henceforth go and live in some other place, wherever you choose.” She obeyed, weeping, and going to a certain friend’s house, she worked for wages and with difficulty made a living. After she left, her daughter-in-law conceived a child, and went about saying to her husband and the neighbours that such a thing could never have happened as long as the old wretch was in the house. After the child was born, she said to her husband, “I never had a son while your mother stayed in the house, but now I have, so you can see what a wretch she was.”

The old woman heard that the son’s birth was thought to be due to her leaving the house, and she thought: “Surely Dhamma must be dead in the world, {3.425} if it were not so, these people would not have got a son and a comfortable life after beating and casting out their mother, I will make an offering for the dead Dhamma.” So one day she took ground sesame and rice and a little pot and a spoon, she went to a cemetery of corpses and kindled a fire under an oven made with three human skulls, then she went down into the water, bathed herself head and all, washed her garment and coming back to her fireplace, she loosened her hair and began to wash the rice. [3.255]

The Bodhisatta was at that time Sakka, king of heaven; and the Bodhisattas are vigilant. At the instant he saw, in his survey of the world, that the poor old woman was making a death-offering to Dhamma as if Dhamma were dead. Wishing to show his power in helping her, he came down disguised as a brahmin travelling on the high road, at sight of her he left the road and standing near her, began a conversation by saying: “Mother, people do not cook food in cemeteries, what are you going to do with this sesame and rice when cooked?” So he spoke the first verse:
1. “Robed in white, with dripping hair, Why, Kaccāni,\(^737\) boil the pot? Washing rice and sesame there, Will you use them when they’re hot?”

She spoke the second verse to give him information,

2. “Brahmin, not for food will I Use the sesame and the rice, Dhamma’s dead; its memory I would crown with sacrifice.” [3.426]

Then Sakka spoke the third verse:

3. “Lady, think ere you decide, Who has told you such a lie? Strong in might and thousand-eyed Perfect Dhamma cannot die.”

Hearing him, the woman spoke two verses:

4. “Brahmin, I have witness strong, Dhamma’s dead I must believe, All men now who follow wrong Great prosperity receive.

5. Barren once, my good son’s spouse Beats me, and she bears a son, She is lady of our house, I an outcast and undone.”

Then Sakka spoke the sixth verse:

---

\(^737\) She is called Kātiyāni in the eighth verse [another way of spelling Kaccāni.]
6. “Nay, I live eternally;[738]
’Twas for your sake that I came,
She beat you; but her son and she Shall be ashes in my flame.” [3.427]

Hearing him, she cried, “Alas, what say you? I will try to save my grandson from death,” and so she spoke the seventh verse:

7. “King of gods, your will be done,
If for me you left the sky,
May my children and their son
Live with me in amity.” [3.256]

Then Sakka spoke the eighth verse:

8. “Kātiyāni’s will be done,
Beaten, you on Dhamma rely,
With your children and their son
Share one home in amity.”

After saying this, Sakka, now in all his divine apparel, stood in the air by his supernatural power and said: “Kaccāni, be not afraid, by my power your son and daughter-in-law will come, and after getting your forgiveness on the way will take you back with them, dwell with them in peace,” then he went to his own place. By Sakka’s power they bethought themselves of her goodness, and making enquiry through the village they found she had gone towards the cemetery. They went along the road calling for her, when they saw her they fell at her feet, and asked and obtained her pardon for their offence. She welcomed her grandson. So they all went home in delight and thenceforth dwelt together.

9. “Joyful with her good son’s wife
Kātiyāni then did dwell,
Sakka pacified their strife,
Son and grandson tend her well.”

This verse was spoken after Fully Awakening. [3.428]

[738] Sakka identifies himself with Right.
After the lesson the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, after the Truths that lay brother was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the man who supported his mother was the man who is supporting his mother today, the wife of that time was the wife of today, and Sakka was myself.”

Ja 418 Aṭṭhasaddajātaka
The Story about Eight Sounds (8s)

In the present the king of Kosala hears the cries during the night and is worried what they mean. His brahmins tell him that he needs to give a large animal sacrifice to ward of danger. The Buddha tells of a similar event in a past life, and how he had explained them to the king, and had all the animals released.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Sāriputta = the brahmin student (māṇava),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Fear, Sacrifice, Animals.

“A pool so deep.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning an indistinguishable terrific sound heard at midnight by the king of Kosala. The occasion is like that already described in the Lohakumbhijātaka [Ja 314].

The king of Kosala of those days, they say, one night heard a cry uttered by four inhabitants of hell – the syllables du, sa, na, so, one from each of the four. In a previous existence, tradition says, they had been princes in Sāvatthi, and had been guilty of adultery. After misconducting themselves with their neighbours’ wives, however carefully guarded they might be, and indulging their amorous propensities, their evil life had been cut short by the Wheel of Death, near Sāvatthi. They came to life again in Four Iron Cauldrons. After being tortured for sixty thousand years they had come up to the top, and on seeing the edge of the Cauldron’s mouth they thought to themselves, “When shall we escape from this misery?” And then all four uttered a loud cry, one after another. The king was terrified to death at the noise, and sat waiting for break of day, unable to stir.

At dawn the brahmins came and inquired after his health. The king replied, “How, my masters, can I be well, who today have heard four such terrible cries.” The
The Section with Eight Verses – 1493

The king said: “I have not consulted the Supreme Buddha.” “Then go,” she answered, “and consult him.”

The king hearkened to the words of the queen and after his morning meal he mounted his state chariot and drove to Jetavana. Here after saluting the Teacher he thus addressed him, “Venerable sir, in the night season I heard four cries and consulted the brahmins about it. They undertook to restore my peace of mind, by the fourfold sacrifice of every kind of victim, and are now busy preparing a sacrificial pit.”
At this time however, when the king said: “Lord, what does the hearing of these sounds import to me?” the Teacher answered, “Great king, be not afraid, no danger shall befall you owing to these sounds, such terrible indistinguishable [3.257] sounds have not been heard by you alone, kings of old also heard like sounds, and meant to follow the advice of brahmins to offer in sacrifice four animals of each species, but after hearing what wise men had to say, they set free the animals collected for sacrifice and caused proclamation by drum against all slaughter,” and at the king’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family worth eighty crores. When he grew up he learned the arts at Taxila. After his parents’ death he reviewed all their treasures, got rid of all his wealth by way of generosity, forsook desires, went to the Himālayas and became an ascetic and entered on the Absorptions and Super Knowledges. After a time he came to the haunts of men for salt and vinegar, and reaching Benares dwelt in a garden.

At that time the king of Benares when seated on his royal bed at midnight heard eight sounds, first, a crane made a noise in a garden near the palace; second, immediately after the crane, a female crow made a noise from the gateway of the elephant-house; [3.429] third, an insect settled on the peak of the palace made a noise; fourth, a tame cuckoo in the palace made a noise; fifth, a tame deer in the same place; sixth, a tame monkey there; seventh, a Kinnara living in the palace; eighth, immediately after the last, a Paccekabuddha, passing along the roof of the king’s habitation to the garden, uttered an exalted utterance.

The king was terrified at hearing these eight sounds, and next day consulted the brahmins. The brahmins said: “Great king, there is danger for you, let us offer sacrifice out of the palace,” and getting his leave to do their pleasure, they came in joy and delight and began the work of sacrifice. Now a young pupil of the oldest sacrificial brahmin was wise and learned, he said to his master, “Teacher, do not cause such a harsh and cruel slaughter of so many creatures.” “Pupil, what do you know about it? Even if nothing else happens, we shall get much fish and flesh to eat.” “Teacher, do not, for the belly’s sake, an action which will cause rebirth in hell.” Hearing this, the other brahmins were angry with the pupil for endangering their gains. The pupil in fear said: “Very well, devise a means then of getting fish and flesh to eat,” and left the city looking for some pious ascetic able to prevent the king from sacrificing.

He entered the royal garden and seeing the Bodhisatta, he saluted him and said: “Have you no compassion for creatures? The king has ordered a sacrifice which will bring death on many creatures, ought you not to bring about the release of such a multitude?” “Young brahmin, I do not know the king of this land, nor he me.” “Sir, do you know what will be the consequence of those sounds the king heard?” “I do.” “If you know, why do you not tell the king?” “Young brahmin, how can I go with a horn fastened on my forehead and say, ‘I know?’ If the king comes here to question me, I will tell him.”

The young brahmin went swiftly to the king’s court, and when he was asked his business, he said: “Great king, a certain ascetic knows the issue of those sounds you heard, he is sitting on the royal seat in your garden, and says he will tell you if you ask him, you should do so.” The king went swiftly, saluted the ascetic, and after friendly greeting he sat down and asked, “Is it true that you know the issue of the sounds I have heard?” “Yes, great king.” “Then pray tell me.” “Great king, there is no danger connected with those sounds, there is a certain crane in your old garden; it was without food, and half dead with hunger made the first sound,” and so by his knowledge giving precisely the crane's meaning he uttered the first verse:

1. “A pool so deep and full of fish they called this place of yore,
The crane-king’s residence it was, my ancestors’ before,
And though we live on frogs today, we never leave its shore.”

“That, great king, was the sound the crane made in the pangs of hunger, if you wish to set it free from hunger, have the garden cleaned and fill the tank with water.” The king told a minister to have this done.

“Great king, there is a female crow who lives in the doorway of your elephant house, she made the second sound, grieving for her son, you need have no fear from it,” and so he uttered the second verse:

739 As an emblem of pride, as in the Bible.
2. “Oh! Who of wicked Bandhura? The single eye will rend
    My nest, my nestlings and myself, oh! who will now befriend?”  [3.431]

Then he asked the king for the name of the chief groom in the elephant-house.
“His name, sir, is Bandhura.” “Has he only one eye, O king?” “Yes, sir.” “Great king, a certain crow has built her nest over the doorway of your elephant-house; there she laid her eggs, there her young in due time were hatched, every time the groom enters or leaves the stable on his elephant, he strikes with his hook at the crow and her nestlings, and destroys the nest, the crow in distress wishes to tear his eye and spoke as she did. If you are well-disposed to her, send for Bandhura and prevent him from destroying the nest.” The king sent for him, rebuked and removed him, and gave the elephant to another.

“On the peak of your palace-roof, great king, there is a wood-insect; it had eaten all the fig-wood there and could not eat the harder wood, lacking food and unable to get away, it made the third sound in lamentation, you need have no fear from it,” and so by his knowledge giving precisely the insect’s meaning he spoke the third verse:

3. “I’ve eaten all the fig-wood round as far as it would go, Hard wood a weevil likes it not, though other food runs low.”

The king sent a servant and by some means had the weevil set free.  [3.259]

“In your habitation, great king, is there a certain tame cuckoo?” “There is, sir.”
“Great king, that cuckoo was pining for the forest when it remembered its former life, “How can I leave this cage, and go to my dear forest?” and so made the fourth sound, you need have no fear from it,” and so he spoke the fourth verse:  [3.432]

4. “Oh to leave this royal dwelling! Oh to gain my liberty, Glad at heart to roam the wood, and build my nest upon the tree.”

So saying, he added, “The cuckoo is pining, great king, set her free.” The king did so.

“Great king, is there a tame deer in your habitation?” “There is, sir.” “He was chief of the herd, remembering his hind and pining for love of her he made the fifth sound, you need have no fear from it,” and he spoke the fifth verse:
5. “Oh to leave this royal dwelling! Oh to gain my liberty, Drink pure water of the fountain, lead the herd that followed me!”

The Great Being caused this deer too to be set free and went on, “Great king, is there a tame monkey in your habitation?” “There is, sir.” “He was chief of a herd in the Himālayas, and he was fond of the society of female monkeys, he was brought here by a hunter named Bharata, pining and longing for his old haunts he made the sixth sound, you need have no fear from it,” and he spoke the sixth verse:

6. “Filled and stained was I with passions, with desire infatuate, Bharata the hunter took me; may I bring you happy fate!”

The Great Being caused the monkey too to be set free, and went on, “Great king, is there a Kinnara living in your habitation?” “There is, sir.” “He is thinking of what he did with his wife {3.433} and in the pain of desire made the seventh sound. One day he had climbed the peak of a high mountain with her, they plucked and decked themselves with many flowers of choice hue and scent, and never noticed that the sun was setting; darkness fell as they were descending. The Kinnarī said: “Husband, it is dark, come down carefully without stumbling,” and taking him by the hand, she led him down. It was in memory of her words that he made the sound, you need have no fear from it.” By his knowledge he stated and made known the circumstance precisely, and spoke the seventh verse:

7. “When the darkness gathered thickly on the mountain summit lone,
Stumble not, she gently warned me, with your foot against a stone.”

So the Great Being explained why the Kinnara had made the sound, and caused him to be set free, and went on, “Great king, there was an eighth sound, an exalted utterance. A certain Paccekabuddha in the Nandamūla cave knowing that the conditions of life were now at an end for him came to [3.260] the abode of man, thinking: “I will enter into Nibbāna in the king of Benares’ park, his servants will bury me, and hold sacred festival and venerate my relics and so attain heaven,” he was coming by his Supernormal Powers and just as he reached your palace-roof, he threw off the burden of life and uttered an exalted utterance, a song that lights up the entrance into the city of Nibbāna,” and so he spoke the verse uttered by the Paccekabuddha, {3.434}
8. “Surely I see the end of birth,
I ne'er again the womb shall see,
My last existence on the earth
Is o'er, and all its misery.”

With this exalted utterance he reached your park and passed into Nibbāna at the foot of a Sāl tree in full flower, come, great king, and perform his funeral rites.” So the Great Being took the king to the place where the Paccekabuddha entered into Nibbāna and showed him the body. Seeing the body, the king with a great army paid honour with perfumes and flowers and the like. By the Bodhisatta’s advice he stopped the sacrifice, gave all the creatures their lives, made proclamation by drum through the city that there should be no slaughter, caused sacred festival to be held for seven days, had the Paccekabuddha’s body burnt with great honour on a pyre heaped with perfumes and made a stūpa where four high roads meet. The Bodhisatta preached Dhamma to the king and exhorted him to diligence, then he went to the Himālayas and there did meditate on the Divine Abidings,\(^740\) and without a break in his Absorption became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

After the lesson, the Teacher said: “Great king, there is no danger at all to you from that sound, stop the sacrifice and give all these creatures their lives,” and having caused proclamation to be made by drum that their lives were spared, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king was Ānanda, the pupil was Sāriputta, and the ascetic was myself.”

Ja 419 Sulasājātaka
The Story about (the Courtesan) Sulasā (8s)

In the present a maid is allowed to wear her mistress’ costly ornament. A thief seeing it tries to kill her and take it, but she kills him instead. The Buddha tells a story of a courtesan who saved a thief from execution, but later the thief planned to kill her for her ornaments, until she tricked and killed him first.

The Bodhisatta = Devatā,
the pair (the woman and the thief) = the same in the past (ubho).

\(^740\) [Brahmavihāra: mettā, karuṇā, muditā, upekkhā.]
Keywords: Theft, Trickery, Devas, Women.

“Here is a golden necklace.” {3.435} The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a female servant of Anāthapiṇḍika. The story is that one feast-day, when she was going with a number of fellow-servants to a pleasure-garden, she asked her mistress Paṇḍalakkaṇadevī for an ornament to wear.

Her mistress gave her an ornament of her own, worth a hundred thousand pieces. She put it on and went along with the other servants to the pleasure-garden.

A certain thief coveted the ornament, and with the design of killing her and taking it he began talking to her, and in the garden he gave her fish, flesh and strong drink. “He does it, I suppose, because he desires me,” she thought, and at evening when the others lay down to rest after their sports, she rose and went to him. He said: “Mistress, this place is not private; let us go a little farther.” She thought, “Anything private can be done in this place, no doubt he must be anxious to kill me and take what I am wearing, I'll teach him a lesson,” so she said: “Teacher, I am dry owing to the strong drink, get me some water,” and taking him to a well asked him to draw some water, showing him the rope and bucket. The thief let down the bucket. Then as he was stooping to draw up the water, the girl, who was very strong, pushed him hard with both hands and threw him into the well. “You won’t die that way,” she said, and threw a large brick upon his head. He died on the spot.

When she came back to the town and gave her mistress the ornament, she said: “I have very nearly been killed today for that ornament,” and told the whole story.

The mistress told Anāthapiṇḍika, and he told the Tathāgata. The Teacher said: “Householder, this is not the first time that servant girl has been endowed with wits rising to the occasion; she was so before also, it is not the first time she killed that man; she did it once before,” and at Anāthapiṇḍika’s request, he told a story of the past.

---

741 Omitting na, with other MSS.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there was a beautiful woman of the town, called Sulasā, who had a train of five-hundred courtesans, and whose price was a thousand pieces a night.

There was in the same city a robber named Sattuka, as strong as an elephant, who used to enter rich men's houses at night and plunder at will. The townsmen assembled and complained to the king. The king ordered the city-watch to post bands here and there, have the robber caught and cut off his head. They bound his hands behind his back and led him to the place of execution, scourging him in every square with whips. The news that he was taken excited the whole city.

Sulasā was standing at a window, and looking down on the street she saw the robber, loved him at sight and thought: “If I can free that stout fighting-man, I will give up this bad life of mine and live respectably with him.” In the way described in the Kaṇaverajātaka [Ja 318] she gained his freedom by sending a thousand pieces to the chief constable of the city and then lived with him in delight and harmony.

The robber after three or four months thought: “I shall never be able to stay in this one place, but one can’t go empty-handed, Sulasā's ornaments are worth a hundred thousand pieces, I will kill her and take them.” So he said to her one day, “Dear, when I was being hauled along by the king’s men, I promised an offering to a Tree Devatā on a mountaintop, who is now threatening me because I have not paid it, let us make an offering.” “Very well, husband, prepare and send it.” “Dear, it will not do to send it, let us both go and present it, wearing all our ornaments and with a great retinue.” “Very well, husband, we’ll do so.”

He made her prepare the offering and when they reached the mountain-foot, he said: “Dear, the deity, seeing this crowd of people, will not accept the offering; let us two go up and present it.” She consented, and he made her carry the vessel. He was himself armed to the teeth, and when they reached the top, he set the offering at the foot of a tree which grew beside a precipice a hundred times as high.

[742 His freedom was arranged by providing the governor with a substitute, who was executed in the place of the robber.]
as a man, and said: “Dear, I have not come to present the offering, I have come with the intention of killing you and going away with all your ornaments, take them all off and make a bundle of them in your outer garment.” “Husband, why would you kill me?” “For your money.” “Husband, remember the good I have done you, when you were being hauled along in chains, I gave up a rich man’s son for you and paid a large sum and saved your life, though I might get a thousand pieces a day, I never look at another man, such a benefactress I am to you, do not kill me, I will give you much money and be your slave.” With these entreaties she spoke the first verse:

1. “Here is a golden necklace, and emeralds and pearls,
   Take all and welcome, give me place among your servant girls.”

When Sattuka had spoken the second verse in accordance with his purpose, to wit,

2. “Fair lady, lay your jewels down and do not weep so sore,
   I’ll kill you, else I can’t be sure you’ll give me all your store,”

Sulasā’s wits rose to the occasion, and thinking: “This robber will not give me my life, but I’ll take his life first by throwing him down the precipice in some way,” she spoke the two verses:

3. “Within my years of sense, within my conscious memory,
   No man on earth, I do protest, have I loved more than you.

4. Come hither, for my last salute, receive my last embrace,
   For never more upon the earth shall we meet face to face.”

Sattuka could not see her purpose, so he said: “Very well, dear; come and embrace me.” Sulasā walked round him in respectful salutation three times, kissed him, and saying: “Now, husband, I am going \[3.438\] to make obeisance to you on all four sides,” she put her head on his foot, did obeisance at his sides, and went behind him as if to do obeisance there, then with the strength of an elephant she took him by the hinder parts and threw him head over heels down that place of destruction a hundred times as high as a man. He was crushed to pieces and died on the spot. Seeing this deed, the deity who lived on the mountain-top spoke these verses:
5. “Wisdom at times is not confined to men
A woman can show wisdom now and then.” [3.263]

6. Wisdom at times is not confined to men,
Women are quick in counsel now and then.

7. How quick and keen she was the way to know,
She slew him like a deer with full-stretched bow.

8. He that to great occasion fails to rise
Falls, like that dull thief from the precipice.

9. One prompt a crisis in his fate to see,
Like her, is saved from threatening enemy.”

So Sulasā killed the robber. When she descended from the mountain and came among her attendants, they asked where her husband was. “Don’t ask me,” she said, and mounting her chariot she went on to the city. [3.439]

After the lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the two then were the same two now, the deity was myself.”

Ja 420 Sumaṅgalajātaka

The Story about (the Park Keeper) Sumaṅgala (8s)

In the present at the king of Kosala’s request the Buddha told this story about how an attendant accidentally shot a Paccekabuddha, thinking he was a deer. And how the king refrained from passing judgement on him till his anger had passed.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Ānanda = (the park keeper) Sumaṅgala.

Keywords: Anger, Murder, Restraint.

“Conscious of an angry frown.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling at Jetavana, concerning the admonition of a king. On this occasion the Teacher, at the king’s request, told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his chief queen. When he grew up, he became king on his father’s death and gave abundant alms. He had a park-keeper named Sumaṅgala. A certain Paccekabuddha left the Nandamūla cave on a pilgrimage for alms, and coming to Benares stayed in the park. Next day he went into the town to beg. The king saw him with favour, made him come up into the palace and sit on the throne, waited on him with various delicate kinds of food, both hard and soft, and received his thanks, being pleased that the Paccekabuddha should stay in his park, he exacted a promise and sent him back there, after his morning meal he went there in person, arranged the places for his habitation by night \([3.264]\) and day, gave him the park-keeper Sumaṅgala as attendant, and went back to the town. After that the Paccekabuddha had meals constantly in the palace and lived there a long time, Sumaṅgala respectfully attended on him.

One day he went away, saying to Sumaṅgala, “I am going to such and such a village for a few days, but will come back, inform the king.” Sumaṅgala informed the king. After a few days stay in that village the Paccekabuddha came back to the park in the evening after sunset. \([3.440]\) Sumaṅgala, not knowing of his arrival, had gone to his own house. The Paccekabuddha put away his bowl and robe, and after a little walk sat down on a stone-slab. That day some strange guests had come to the park-keeper’s house. To get them soup and curry he had gone with a bow to kill a tame deer in the park, he was there looking for a deer when he saw the Paccekabuddha and thinking he was a great deer, he aimed an arrow and shot him. The Paccekabuddha uncovered his head and said: “Sumaṅgala.”

Greatly moved Sumaṅgala said: “Sir, I knew not of your coming and shot you, thinking you were a deer, forgive me.” “Very well, but what will you do now? Come, pull out the arrow.” He made obeisance and pulled it out. The Paccekabuddha felt great pain and passed into Nibbāna then and there.

The park-keeper thought the king would not pardon him if he knew, he took his wife and children and fled. By supernatural power the whole city heard that the Paccekabuddha had entered Nibbāna, and all were greatly excited. Next day some men entered the park, saw the body and told the king that the park-keeper had fled after killing the Paccekabuddha. The king went with a great retinue and for seven days paid honour to the body, then with all ceremony he took the relics, built a shrine, and doing honour to it went on ruling his kingdom righteously.

After a year, Sumaṅgala determined to find out what the king thought, he came and asked a minister whom he saw to find out what the king thought of him. The minister praised Sumaṅgala before the king, but he was as if he had not heard it. The minister said no more, but told Sumaṅgala that the king was not pleased with him. After another year he came, and again in the third year he brought his wife and children. The minister knew the king was appeased, and setting Sumaṅgala at the palace-door told the king of his coming. The king sent for him, and after greeting said: “Sumaṅgala, why did you kill that Paccekabuddha, through whom I was gaining merit?” “O king, I did not mean to kill him, but it was in this way that I did the deed,” and he told the story.

The king bade him have no fear, and reassuring him made him park-keeper again. Then the minister asked, “O king, why did you make no answer when you heard Sumaṅgala’s praises twice, and on the third hearing why did you send for him and forgive him?” The king said: “Dear sir, it is wrong for a king to do anything hastily in his anger, therefore I was silent at first and the third time when I knew I was appeased I sent for Sumaṅgala,” and so he spoke these verses to declare the duty of a king,

1. “Conscious of an angry frown,
Ne'er let king stretch out his rod,
Things unworthy of a crown
Then would follow from his nod.

2. Conscious of a milder mood,
Let him judgments harsh decree,
When the case is understood,
Fix the proper penalty,

3. Self nor others will he vex,
Clearly parting right from wrong,
Though his yoke is on men's necks,
Virtue holds him high and strong.

4. Princes reckless in their deed
Ply the rod remorselessly,
Ill repute is here their meed,
Hell awaits them when they die.

5. They who love the saintly law,
Pure in deed and word and thought,
Filled with kindness, calm and awe,
Pass through both worlds as they ought.
6. King am I, my people’s lord;
   Anger shall not check my bent,
   When to vice I take the sword,
   Pity prompts the punishment.” (3.443)

So the king declared his own good qualities in six verses: his whole court were pleased and declared his merits in the words, “Such excellence in moral practices and qualities is worthy of your majesty.” Sumaṅgala, after the court had finished speaking, saluted the king, and after obeisance spoke three verses in the king’s praise,

7. “Such your glory and your power;
   Ne’er resign them for an hour,
   Free from anger, free from fears,
   Reign in joy a hundred years.

8. Prince, whom all those virtues bless,
   Mild and bland, but firm in worth,
   Rule the world with righteousness,
   Pass to heaven when freed from earth.

9. True in word, in action good,
   Take the means your end to gain,
   Calm the troubled multitude,
   As a cloud with genial rain.” (3.444)

After the lesson connected with the admonition of the Kosala king, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Paccekabuddha passed into Nibbāna, Sumaṅgala was Ānanda, the king was myself.”

Ja 421 Gaṅgamālajātaka

The Story about (the Barber) Gaṅgamāla (8s)

In the present the Buddha admonishes lay people to keep the fast day. He then tells a story of a man who kept half a fast day, and was reborn as king; how he shared his kingdom with an honest man; and how the new king renounced the world and became a Paccekabuddha.

The Bodhisatta = king Udaya (Udayarājā),
Rāhulamātā = his queen (aggamahesī),
Mahāmāyā = his mother (rañño mātā),

The Section with Eight Verses – 1506

Ānanda = king Aḍḍhamāsaka (Aḍḍhamāsakarājā).

Past Compare: vu iii p 231 Upāligaṅgapāla.

Keywords: Virtue, Precepts, Renunciation.

“The earth’s like coals.” [3.266] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the keeping of the weekly fast days. One day the Teacher was addressing the laymen who were keeping the fast days and said: “Laymen, your conduct is good; when men keep the fast days they should give alms, keep the moral precepts, never show anger, feel kindness and do the duties of the day, wise men of old gained great glory from even a partial keeping of the fast days,” and at their request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there was a rich merchant in that city named Suciparivāra, whose wealth reached eighty crores and who took delight in generosity and other good works. His wife and children and all his household and servants down to the calf-herders kept six fast days every month.

At that time the Bodhisatta was born in a certain poor family and lived a hard life on workman’s wages. Hoping to get work he came to Suciparivāra’s house, saluting and sitting on one side, he was asked his errand and said: “It was to get work for wages in your house.” When other workmen came to him, the merchant used to say to them, “In this house the workmen keep the moral precepts, if you can keep them you may work for me,” but to the Bodhisatta he made no hint in the way of mentioning moral precepts but said, {3.445} “Very well, my good man, you can work for me and arrange about your wages.” Thenceforth the Bodhisatta did all the merchant’s work meekly and heartily, without a thought of his own weariness; he went early to work and came back at evening.

One day they proclaimed a festival in the city. The merchant said to a female servant, “This is a holy day, you must cook some rice for the workers in the morning, they will eat it early and fast the rest of the day.” The Bodhisatta rose early and went to his work, no one had told him to fast that day. The other workers ate in the morning and then fasted, the merchant with his wife, children and attendants kept the fast, all went, each to his own abode, and sat there meditating on the moral precepts.

743 The Pali text here is wrongly punctuated.

The Bodhisatta worked all day and came home at sunset. The cook-maid gave him water for his hands, and offered him in a dish of rice taken from the boiler. The Bodhisatta said: “At this hour there is a great noise on ordinary days, where have they all gone today?” “They are all keeping the fast, each in his own abode.” He thought: “I will not be the only person misconducting himself among so many people of moral conduct,” so he went and asked the merchant if the fast could be kept at all by undertaking the duties of the day at that hour. He told him that the whole duty could not be done, because it had not been undertaken in the morning; but half the duty could be done. “So far be it,” he answered, and undertaking the duty in his master’s presence he began to keep the fast, and going to his own abode he lay there meditating on the precepts.

He had taken no food all day, and in the last watch he felt pain like a spear-wound. The merchant brought him various remedies and told him to eat them, but he said: “I will not break the fast I have undertaken, though it cost my life.” The pain became intense and at sunrise he was losing consciousness. They told him he was dying, and taking him out they set him in a place of retirement.

At this moment the king of Benares in a noble chariot with a great retinue had reached that spot in a progress round the city. The Bodhisatta, seeing the royal splendour, felt a desire for royalty and prayed for it. Dying, he was conceived again, in consequence of keeping half the Uposatha, in the womb of the chief queen. She went through the ceremonies of pregnancy, and bore a son after ten months. He was named prince Udaya. When he grew up he became perfect in all sciences, by his memory of previous births he knew his former action of merit, and thinking it was a great reward for a little action he repeated an exalted utterance again and again. At his father’s death he gained the kingdom, and observing his own great glory he sang the same exalted utterance.

One day they made ready for a festival in the city. A great multitude were intent on amusement. A certain water-carrier who lived by the north gate of Benares had hid a half-penny in a brick in a boundary wall. He cohabited with a poor woman who also made her living by carrying water. She said to him, “My lord, there is a festival in the town, if you have any money, let us enjoy ourselves.” “I have, dear.” “How much?” “A half-penny.” “Where is it?” “In a brick by the north gate, twelve leagues from here I leave my treasure, but have you got anything in hand?” “I have.” “How much?” “A half-penny.” “So yours and mine together make a whole penny, we’ll buy a garland with one part of it, perfume with another, and strong drink with a third, go and fetch your half-penny from where you put it.” [3.447]

He was delighted to catch the idea suggested by his wife’s words, and saying: “Don’t trouble, dear, I will fetch it,” he set out. The man was as strong as an elephant, he went more than six leagues, and though it was midday and he was treading on sand as hot as if it were strewn with coals just off the flame, he was delighted with the desire of gain and in [3.268] old yellow clothes with a palm-leaf fastened in his ear he went by the palace court in pursuit of his purpose, singing a song. King Udaya stood at an open window, and seeing him coming wondered who it was, who disregarding such wind and heat went singing for joy, and sent a servant to call him up. “The king calls for you,” he was told, but he said: “What is the king to me? I don’t know the king.” He was taken by force and stood on one side. Then the king spoke two verses in enquiry:

1. “The earth’s like coals, the ground like embers hot,
   You sing your song, the great heat burns you not.

2. The sun on high, the sands below are hot,
   You sing your song, the great heat burns you not.”

Hearing the king’s words he spoke the third verse:

3. “’Tis these desires that burn, and not the sun,
   ’Tis all these pressing tasks that must be done.” [3.448]

The king asked what his business was. He answered, “O king, I was living by the south gate with a poor woman, she proposed that she and I should amuse ourselves at the festival and asked if I had anything in hand, I told her I had a treasure stored inside a wall by the north gate, she sent me for it to help us to amuse ourselves, those words of hers never leave my heart and as I think of them hot desire burns me, that is my business.” “Then what delights you so much that you disregard 744 nantaka as in p. 22. 1: the palm-leaf is used as an ear-ornament.

wind and sun, and sing as you go?” “O king, I sing to think that when I fetch my treasure I shall amuse myself along with her.” “Then, my good man, is your treasure, hidden by the north gate, a hundred thousand pieces?” “Oh no.” Then the king asked in succession if it were fifty thousand, forty, thirty, twenty, ten, five, four, three, two gold pieces, one piece, half a piece, a quarter piece, four pence, three, two, one penny. The man said: “No” to all these questions and then, “It is a half-penny, indeed, O king, that is all my treasure, but I am going in hopes of fetching it and then amusing myself with her, and in that desire and delight the wind and sun do not annoy me.”

The king said: “My good man, don’t go there in such a heat, I will give you a half-penny.” “O king, I will take you at your word and accept it, but I won’t lose the other, I won’t give up going there and fetching it too.” “My good man, stay here, I’ll give you a penny, two pence,” then offering more and more he went on to a crore, a hundred crores, boundless wealth, if the man would stay. But he always answered, “O king, I’ll take it, but I’ll fetch the other too.” Then he was tempted by offers of posts as treasurer and posts of various kinds and the position of viceroy, at last he was offered half the kingdom \{3.449\} if he would stay. Then he consented. The king said to his ministers, “Go, have my friend shaved and bathed and adorned, and bring him back.” They did so. The king divided his kingdom in two and gave him half, but they say that he took the northern half from \[3.269\] love of his half-penny. He was called king Aḍḍhamāsaka [Half-Penny].

They ruled the kingdom in friendship and harmony. One day they went to the park together. After amusing themselves, king Udaya lay down with his head in king Aḍḍhamāsaka’s lap. He fell asleep, while the attendants were going here and there enjoying their amusements. King Aḍḍhamāsaka thought: “Why should I always have only half the kingdom? I will kill him and be sole king,” so he drew his sword, but thinking to strike him remembered that the king had made him, when poor and mean, his partner and set him in great power, and that the thought which had risen in his mind to kill such a benefactor was a wicked one, so he sheathed the sword. A second and a third time the same thought rose. Feeling that this thought, rising again and again, would lead him on to the evil deed, he threw the sword on the ground and woke the king. “Pardon me, O king,” he said and fell at his feet. “Friend, you have done me no wrong.” “I have, O great king, I did such and such a thing.” “Then, friend, I pardon you, if you desire it, be sole king, and I will serve under you as viceroy.” He answered, “O king, I have no need of the kingdom, such a desire will cause me to be reborn in evil states, the kingdom is yours, take it, I will become an ascetic, I have seen the root of desire, it grows from a man's intentions, [3.450] from henceforth I will have no such intention,” and so uttered and exalted utterance, with this fourth verse:

4. “I have seen your roots, Desire, in a man's own will they lie. I will no more wish for you, and you, Desire, shall die.”

So saying, he spoke the fifth verse declaring the Dhamma unto a great multitude devoted to desires:

5. “Little desire is not enough, and much but brings us pain, Ah! Foolish men, be sober, friends, if you would wisdom gain.”

So declaring the Dhamma unto the multitude, he entrusted the realm to king Udaya, leaving the weeping multitude with tears on their faces, he went to the Himālayas, became an ascetic and attained the Absorptions and Super Knowledges. At the time of his becoming an ascetic, king Udaya spoke the sixth verse, an exalted utterance,

6. “Little desire has brought me all the fruit, Great is the glory Udaya acquires; Mighty the gain if one is resolute To be one gone forth and forsake desires.” [3.451]

No one knew the meaning of this verse. One day the chief queen asked him the meaning of it. The king would not tell. There was a certain court-barber, called Gaṅgamāla, who when attending to the king used to use the razor first, and then grasp the hairs with his tweezers. [3.270]

The king liked the first operation, but the second gave him pain, at the first he would have given the barber a boon, at the second he would have cut his head off. One day he told the queen about it, saying that their court-barber was a fool, when she asked what he ought to do, he answered, “Use the tweezers first and the razor afterwards.” She sent for the barber and said: “My good man, when you are trimming the king’s beard you ought to take his hairs with your tweezers first and use the razor afterwards, then if the king offers you a boon, you must say you don’t want anything else, but wish to know the meaning of his song, if you do, I will give you much money.” He agreed.

745 cf. Cullavagga, v. 27.

On the next day when he was trimming the king’s beard, he took the tweezers first. The king said: “Gaṅgamāla, is this a new fashion of yours?” “O king,” he answered, “barbers have got a new fashion,” and he grasped the king’s hair with the tweezer first, using the razor afterwards. The king offered him a boon. “O king, I do not want anything else; tell me the meaning of your exalted utterance in verse.” The king was ashamed to tell what his occupation had been in his days of poverty, and said: “My good man, what is the use of such a boon to you? Choose something else,” but the barber begged for it. The king feared to break his word and agreed. As described in the Kummāsapiṇḍajātaka [Ja 415] he made all arrangements and seated on a jewelled throne, told the whole story of his former act of merit in his last existence in that city. “That explains,” he said, “half the verse; for the rest, my comrade became an ascetic, I in my pride am sole king now, \(\text{[3.452]}\) and that explains the second half of my exalted utterance.”

Hearing him the barber thought: “So the king got this glory for keeping half a fast day, virtue is the right course, what if I were to become an ascetic and work out my own safety?” He left all his relatives and worldly goods, gained the king’s permission to become an ascetic and going to the Himālayas he became an ascetic, realised the three qualities of mundane things, gained perfect insight, and became a Paccekabuddha. He had a bowl and robes made by Supernormal Powers. After spending five or six years on the mountain Gaṅgamāla he wished to see the king of Benares, and passing through the air to the royal park there, he sat on the royal stone seat.

The park-keeper told the king that Gaṅgamāla, now a Paccekabuddha, had come through the air and was sitting in the park. The king went at once to salute the Paccekabuddha, and the queen-mother went out with her son. The king entered the park, saluted him and sat on one side with his retinue. The Paccekabuddha spoke to him in a friendly manner, “Brahmadatta (calling him by the name of the clan), are you diligent, ruling the kingdom righteously, doing charitable and other good works?” The queen-mother was angry. “This low-caste shampooing son of a [3.271] barber does not know his place, he calls my kingly high-descended son, Brahmadatta,” and she spoke the seventh verse:
7. “Penance forsooth makes men forsake their wrongs,
Their barber’s, potter’s, stations every one,
Through penance Gaṅgamāla glory wins,
And Brahmadatta now he calls my son.” {3.453}

The king checked his mother and declaring the qualities of the Paccekabuddha, he spoke the eighth verse:

8. “Lo! How e’er his death befall,
Meekness brings a man its fruit!
One who bowed before us all,
Kings and lords must now salute.”

Though the king checked his mother, the rest of the multitude rose up and said: “It is not decent that such a low-caste person should speak to you by name in that way.” The king rebuked the multitude, and spoke the last verse to declare the virtues of the Paccekabuddha,

9. “Scorn not Gaṅgamāla so,
Perfect in dispensation’s ways,
He has crossed the waves of woe,
Free from sorrow now he strays.”

So saying the king saluted the Paccekabuddha and asked him to forgive the queen-mother. The Paccekabuddha did so and the king’s retinue also gained his forgiveness. The king wished him to promise that he would stay in the neighbourhood, but he refused, and standing in the air before the eyes of the whole court he admonished the king and went away to Gandhamādana. {3.454}

After the lesson the Teacher said: “Laymen, you see how keeping the fast is proper to be done,” and he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Paccekabuddha entered into Nībbāna, king Aḍḍhamāsaka was Ānanda, the chief queen was the mother of Rāhula, king Udaya was myself.”

Ja 422 Cetiyajātaka

The Story about (the King of) Cetiya (8s)

In the present the monks are discussing how Devadatta told lies and sank into Avīci. The Buddha tells a story of the golden age, and the first king to tell a lie; how he refused to repent and gradually sank deeper into the earth till he was swallowed up and fell into hell.
The Bodhisatta = the brahmin (priest) Kapila (Kapilabrāhmaṇa), Devadatta = king of Cetiya (Cetiyarājā).

Keywords: Truth, Speech, Falsehood, Devas.

“Injured Dhamma can injure sorely.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling at Jetavana, concerning Devadatta’s being swallowed up by the earth.

On that day they were discussing in the Dhamma Hall how Devadatta had spoken [3.272] falsely, had sunk into the ground and become destined to the hell Avīci. The Teacher came and, hearing the subject of their talk, said: “This is not the first time he sank into the earth,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the first age, there was a king named Mahāsammata, whose life was an asaṅkheyya[746] long. His son was Roja, his son Vararoja, and then the succession was Kalyāṇa, Varakalyāṇa, Uposatha, Mandhātā, Varamandhātā, Cara, Upacara, who was also called Apacara. He reigned over the kingdom of Ceti, in the city of Sotthivati; he was endowed with four supernatural powers – he could walk aloft and pass through the air, he had four Devaputtas in each of the four quarters to defend him with drawn swords, he diffused the fragrance of sandalwood from his body, he diffused the fragrance of the lotus from his mouth.

His family priest was named Kapila. This brahmin’s younger brother, Korakalamba, had been taught along with the king by the same teacher and was the king’s playmate. When Apacara was prince, {3.455} he promised to make Korakalamba his family priest when he became king. At his father’s death he became king, but he could not depose Kapila from the position of family priest, and when Kapila came to wait on him, he showed him special forms of honour. The brahmin observed this and considered that a king manages best with ministers of his own age, and that he himself might get leave from the king to become an ascetic, so he said: “O king, I am getting old; I have a son at home, make him family priest and I will become an ascetic.” He got the king’s leave and had his son appointed family priest, then he went to the king’s park, became an ascetic, reached the Absorptions and Super Knowledges and lived there, near his son.

---

[746] In years, I followed by 140 ciphers.
Korakalambaka felt a grudge against his brother because he had not got him his post when he became an ascetic. One day the king said to him in friendly conversation, “Korakalambaka, you are not family priest?” “No, O king, my brother has managed it.” “Has not your brother become an ascetic?” “He has, but he got the post for his son.” “Then do you manage it.” “O king, it is impossible for me to set aside my brother and take a post which has come by descent.” “If so, I will make you senior and the other your junior.” “How, O king?” “By a lie.”747 “O king, do you not know that my brother is a magician, endowed with great supernatural power? He will deceive you with magical illusions, he will make your four Devaputtas disappear, and make as it were an evil odour come from your body and mouth, he will make you come down from the sky and stand on the ground, you will be as if swallowed up by the earth, and you will not be able to abide by your story.” “Do not trouble; I will manage it.” [3.273] “When will you do it, O king?” {3.456} “On the seventh day from this.” The story went round the city, “The king is going to make the senior the junior by a lie, and will give the post to the junior, what kind of a thing is a lie? Is it blue or yellow or some other colour?” The multitude thought greatly about it.

It was a time, they say, when the world told the truth, men did not know what the word ‘lie’ might mean. The priest’s son heard the tale and told his father, “Father, they say the king is going by a lie to make you junior and to give our post to my uncle.” “My dear, the king will not be able even by a lie to take our post from us, on what day is he going to do it?” “On the seventh day from this, they say.” “Let me know when the time comes.”

On the seventh day a great multitude gathered in the king’s courtyard sitting in rows above rows, hoping to see a lie. The young priest went and told his father. The king was ready in full dress, he appeared and stood in the air in the courtyard amid the multitude. The ascetic came through the air, spread his skin-seat before the king, sat on his throne in the air and said: “Is it true, O king, that you wish by a lie to make the junior senior and to give him the post?” “Teacher, I have done so.” Then he admonished the king, “O great king, a lie is a grievous destruction of good qualities, it causes rebirth in the four evil states; a king who makes a lie 747 A lie was a new thing in the first age.

destroys right, and by destroying right he is himself destroyed,” and he spoke the first verse:

1. “Injured Dhamma injures sorely, and requite with injury; Thus Dhamma should ne’er be injured, lest the harm recoil on you.” [3.457]

Admonishing him farther he said: “Great king, if you make a lie, your four Supernormal Powers will disappear,” and he spoke the second verse:

2. “The powers divine forsake and leave the man who tells a lie, Ill smells his mouth, he cannot keep his foothold in the sky, Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully.”

Hearing this, the king in fear looked to Korakalambaka. He said: “Be not afraid, O king; did I not tell you so from the first?” and so forth. The king, though he heard Kapila’s words, still put forward his statement, “Sir, you are the younger, Korakalambaka is the elder.” At the moment when he uttered this lie, the four Devaputtas said they would guard such a liar no longer, threw their swords at his feet and disappeared; his mouth was fetid like a broken rotten egg and his body like an open drain; and falling from the air he lighted on the earth, so all his four Supernormal Powers disappeared. His chief priest said: “Great king, be not afraid, if you will speak the truth, I will restore you everything,” and so he spoke the third verse:

3. “A word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain, A lie will fix you in the soil of Ceti to remain.” [3.274] [3.458]

He said: “Look, O great king, those four Supernormal Powers of yours disappeared first by your lie, consider, for it is possible now to restore them.” But the king answered, “You wish to deceive me in this,” and so telling a second lie he sank in the earth up to the ankles. Then the brahmin said once more, “Consider, O great king,” and spoke the fourth verse:

4. “Drought comes on him in time of rain, rain when it should be dry, Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully.”

Then once again he said: “Owing to your lying you are sunk in the earth up to the ankles, consider, O great king,” and spoke the fifth verse:
5. “One word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain,
A lie will sink you in the soil of Ceti to remain.”

But for the third time the king said: “You are junior and Korakalambaka is elder,” and at this lie he sank in the ground up to the knees. Once more the brahmin said:
“Consider, O great king,” and spoke two verses:

6. “O king, the man is forked of tongue, and like a serpent sly,
Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully.

7. One word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain,
A lie will sink you deeper still in Ceti to remain.”

adding, “Even now all may be restored.” The king, not heeding his words, repeated the lie for the fourth time, “You are junior, sir, and Korakalambaka is elder,” [3.459] and at these words he sank up to the hips. Again the brahmin said:
“Consider, O great king,” and spoke two verses:

8. “O king, that man is like a fish, and tongueless he shall be,
Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully.

9. One word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain,
A lie will sink you deeper still in Ceti to remain.”

For the fifth time the king repeated the lie, and as he did so he sank up to the navel. The brahmin once more appealed to him to consider, and spoke two verses:

10. “Girls only shall be born of him, no male child shall he see,
Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully.

11. One word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain,
A lie will sink you deeper still in Ceti to remain.”

The king paid no heed, and repeating the lie for the sixth time sank up to the breast. The brahmin made his appeal once more and spoke two verses:

12. “His children will not stay with him, on every side they flee,
Whoe’er to questioning replies with falsehood wilfully. [3.275]
13. One word of truth, and all your gifts, O king, you shall regain,
A lie will sink you deeper still in Ceti to remain.”

Owing to association with a wicked friend, he disregarded the words and repeated the same lie for the seventh time. Then the earth opened and the flames of Avīci leapt up and seized him. [3.460]

14. “Cursed by a sage, the king who once could walk the air, they say,
Was lost and swallowed by the earth on his appointed day.

15. Wherefore the wise do not approve at all
When that desire into the heart does fall,
He that is free from guile, whose heart is pure,
All that he says is ever firm and sure.”

These are two verses spoken after Fully Awakening.

The multitude said in fear, “The king of Ceti reviled the sage, and told a lie; so he has entered Avīci.” The king’s five sons came to the brahmin and said: “Be you our helper.” The brahmin answered, “Your father destroyed Dhamma, he lied and reviled a sage, therefore he has entered Avīci. If Dhamma is destroyed, it destroys. You must not dwell here.”

To the eldest he said: “Come, dear, leave the city by the eastern gate and go straight on, you will see a white royal elephant prostrate, touching the earth in seven places, 748 that will be a sign for you to lay out a city there and dwell in it, and the name of it will he Hatthipura.”

To the second prince he said: “You leave by the south gate and go straight on till you see a royal horse pure white, that will be a sign that you are to lay out a city there and dwell in it, and it shall be called Assapura.”

To the third prince he said: “You leave by the west gate and go straight on till you see a maned lion; that will be a sign that you are to lay out a city there and dwell in it, and it shall be called Sīhapura.”

---

748 With tusks, trunk, and four legs.
To the fourth prince he said: “You leave by the north gate and go straight on till you see a wheel-frame all made of jewels, that will be a sign that you are to lay out a city there and dwell in it, and it shall be called Uttarapañcāla.”

To the fifth he said: “You cannot dwell here, build a great shrine in this city, go out towards the north-west, and go straight on till you see two mountains striking against each other and making the sound of daddara, that will be a sign that you are to lay out a city there and dwell in it, and it shall be called Daddarapura.”

All the five princes went, and following the signs laid out cities there and dwelt in them. [3.276]

After the lesson, the Teacher said: “So, monks, this is not the first time that Devadatta has told a lie and sunk in the earth,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the king of Ceti was Devadatta, and the brahmin Kapila was myself.”

Ja 423 Indriyajātaka

The Story about the Senses (8s)

In the present one monk who ordains after his marriage gradually comes once again under his wife’s power. The Buddha tells how, in the past, he had been a great ascetic who had lost his powers till his master guided him back to the right path.

The Bodhisatta = (the ascetic) Sarabhaṅga (aka Jotipāla), Moggallāna = (the ascetic) Kisavaccha, Ānanda = (the ascetic) Anusissa, Kaccāna = (the ascetic) Kāḷadevala, Anuruddha = (the ascetic) Pabbata, Kassapa = (the ascetic) Meṇḍissara, Sāriputta = (the ascetic) Sālissara, the dissatisfied monk = (the ascetic) Nārada, his former wife = the beauty of the town (Nāgarasobhiṇī).

Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka,

---

749 Another reading is pañcacakkam, “five wheels.”
“Who through desire.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning temptation by the wife of one’s former days. The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher’s preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery. So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left, she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him, taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food, when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now, we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country, be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life, send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

Against his will they took him to the Teacher and told him that he was discontent and wished to go back to worldly life. The Teacher said: “Is this tale true?” “It is, Lord.” “Who causes you to fall back?” “My wife.” “Monk, that woman is the cause of evil to you, formerly also through her you fell from the four stages of Absorption [3.277] and became very miserable, then through me you were delivered from your misery and regained the power of meditation you had lost,” and then he told a story of the past. [3.463]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of the king’s family priest and his brahmin wife. On the day of his birth there was a blazing of weapons all over the city, and so they called his name young Jotipāla.

When he grew up, he learned all the arts at Taxila and showed his skill in them to the king, but he gave up his position, and without telling anyone he went out by the back door, and entering a forest became an ascetic in the Kaviṭṭhaka hermitage, called Sakkadattiya. He attained the Absorptions and Super Knowledges. As he dwelt there many hundreds of sages waited on him. He was attended by a great company and had seven chief disciples. Of them the sage Sālissara left the Kaviṭṭhaka hermitage for the Suraṭṭha country, and dwelt on the banks of the river Sātodikā with many thousand sages in his company, Meṇḍissara with many thousand sages dwelt near the town of Lambacullaka in the country of king Pajaka, Pabbata with many thousand sages dwelt in a certain forest-country, Kāḷadevala with many thousand sages dwelt in a certain wooded mountain in Avantī and the Deccan, Kisavaccha dwelt alone near the city of Kumbhavatī in the park of king Daṇḍaki, the ascetic Anusissa was attendant on the Bodhisatta and stayed with him, Nārada, the younger brother of Kāḷadevala, dwelt alone in a cave-cell amid the mountainous country of Arañjara in the Central Region.

Now not far from Arañjara there is a certain very populous town. In the town there is a great river, in which many men bathe, and along its banks sit many beautiful courtesans tempting the men. The ascetic Nārada saw one of them and being enamoured of her, forsook his meditations and [3.464] pining away without food lay in the bonds of love for seven days. His brother Kāḷadevala by reflection knew the cause of this, and came flying through the air into the cave. Nārada saw him and asked why he had come. “I knew you were ill and have come to tend you.” Nārada repelled him with a falsehood, “You are talking nonsense, falsehood, and vanity.” The other refused to leave him and brought Sālissara, Meṇḍissara, and Pabbatissara. He repelled them all in the same way. Kāḷadevala went flying to fetch their master Sarabhaṅga and did fetch him. When the Teacher came, he saw that Nārada had fallen into the power of the senses, and asked if it were so. Nārada rose at the words and saluted, and confessed. The Teacher said: “Nārada, those who fall into the power of the senses waste away in misery in this life, and in their next existence are born in hell,” and so he spoke the first verse:
The Section with Eight Verses – 1521

1. “Who through desire obeys the senses’ sway,
   Loses both worlds and pines his life away.” [3.278]

Hearing him, Nārada answered, “Teacher, the following of desires is happiness, why do you call such happiness misery?” Sarabhaṅga said: “Listen, then,” and spoke the second verse:

2. “Happiness and misery ever on each other’s footsteps press,
   You have seen their alternation, seek a truer happiness.” {3.465}

Nārada said: “Teacher, such misery is hard to bear, I cannot endure it.” The Great Being said: “Nārada, the misery that comes has to be endured,” and spoke the third verse:

3. “He who endures in troubled time with troubles to contend
   Is strong to reach that final bliss where all our troubles end.”

But Nārada answered, “Teacher, the happiness of love’s desire is the greatest happiness, I cannot abandon it.” The Great Being said: “Virtue is not to be abandoned for any cause,” and spoke the fourth verse: {3.466}

4. “For love of sensual desires, for hopes of gain, for miseries, great and small,
   Do not undo your saintly past, and so from virtue fall.”

Sarabhaṅga having thus showed forth the Dhamma in four verses. Kāḷadevala in admonition of his younger brother spoke the fifth verse:
5. “Know the worldly life is trouble, victual should be freely lent. No delight in gathering riches, no distress when they are spent.”

The sixth verse is one spoken by the Teacher after Fully Awakening concerning Devala’s admonition of Nārada:

6. “So far Black Devala most wisely spoke, None worse than he who bows to senses’ yoke.” [3.467]

Then Sarabhaṅga spoke in warning, “Nārada, listen to this, he who will not do at first what is proper to be done, must weep and lament like the young man who went to the forest,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past in a certain town of Kāsi there was a certain young brahmin, beautiful, strong, stout as an elephant. His thoughts were, “Why should I keep my parents by working on a farm, or have a wife and children, or do good works of generosity and so forth? I won’t keep anybody nor do any good work; but I will go into the forest and keep myself by killing deer.” So with [3.279] the five kinds of weapons he went to the Himālayas and killed and ate many deer.

In the Himālayas region he found a great defile, surrounded by mountains, on the banks of the river Vidhavā, and there he lived on the flesh of the slain deer, cooked on hot coals. He thought: “I shall not always be strong; when I grow weak I shall not be able to range the forest, now I will drive many kinds of wild animals into this defile, close it up by a gate, and then without roaming the forest I shall kill and eat them at my pleasure,” and so he did.

As time passed over him, that very thing came to pass, and the experience of all the world befell him, he lost control over his hands and feet, he could not move freely here and there, he could not find his food or drink, his body withered, he became the ghost of a man, he showed wrinkles furrowing his body like the earth in a hot season; ill-favoured and ill-knit, he became very miserable. In like 750 The Commentator takes sādhu with all the clauses, the meaning then would be: Good are the cares of household life, ’tis good to give away, Not to be proud when riches grow, nor grieved when they decay.

---

751 Both kālo and asito mean black: this person is the Asita, the Simeon of the Buddhist nativity; cf. vol. i. 54.
manner as time passed, the king of Sivi, named Sivi, had a desire to eat flesh roasted on coals in the forest, so he gave over his kingdom to his ministers, and with the five kinds of weapons he went to the forest and ate the flesh of the deer he slew, in time he came to that spot and saw that man. Although afraid, he summoned courage to ask who he was. “Lord, I am the ghost of a man, reaping the fruit of the deeds I have done, who are you?” “The king of Sivi.” “Why have you come here?” [3.468] “To eat the flesh of deer.” He said: “Great king, I have become the ghost of a man because I came here with that object,” and telling the whole story at length and explaining his misfortune to the king, he spoke the remaining verses:

7. “King, ’tis with me as if I’d been with foes in bitter strife,
   Labour, and skill in handicraft, a peaceful home, a wife,
   All have been lost to me, my works bear fruit in this my life.

8. Worsted a thousandfold I am, kinless and reft of stay,
   Strayed from the noble Dhamma, like ghost I’m fallen away.

9. This state is mine because I caused, instead of joy, distress,
   Girt as it were with flaming fire, I have no happiness.” [3.469]

With that he added, “O king, through desire of happiness I caused misery to others and have even in this life become the ghost of a man, do not you commit evil deeds, go to thine own city and do good deeds of generosity and the like.” The king did so and completed the path to heaven.

The ascetic was roused by the teacher Sarabhaṅga’s account of this case. He became agitated, and after saluting and gaining his teacher’s pardon, by focusing on the Meditation Object he regained the Absorptions he had lost. Sarabhaṅga refused him leave to stay there, and took him back with him to his own hermitage.

After the lesson, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths the discontented monk was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time Nārada was the discontented monk, Sāliṣsara was Ṣāriputta, Meṇḍissara was Kassapa, Pabbata was Anuruddha, Kāḷadevala was Kaccāna, Anusissa was Ānanda, Kisavaccha was Moggallāna, and Sarabhaṅga was myself.”
The Section with Eight Verses – 1524

Ja 424 Ādittajātaka
The Story about Burning (8s)

Alternative Title: Sucirajātaka, Sovīrajātaka (Comm)

In the present the king of Kosala gives an incomparable gift to the Buddha and the Saṅgha. The Buddha tells a story of a king and queen of old, how they invited some Paccekabuddhas, the gifts they gave them, and the teaching they received in return.

The Bodhisatta = the great king (Bhārata) of Roruva (Roruvamahārājā), Rāhulamātā = (queen) Samuddavijayā.

Present Source: DN-a 19 Mahāgovindasutta, Quoted at: Ja 424 Āditta, Ja 495 Dasabrāhmaṇa, Ja 499 Sivi.

Keywords: Giving, Wisdom.

“Whate’er a man can save.” [3.280] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning an incomparable gift. The incomparable gift must be described in full from the commentary on the Mahāgovindasutta [DN 19].

It seems at one time almsfood arose in due order for the Fortunate One in Rājagaha, Sāvatthi, Sāketa, Kosambi, Bārāṇasī, and therein, some said: “Having spent a hundred pieces, I will give a gift,” and having written it on a leaf, it was pinned to the door of the monastery. Others said: “I will give two hundred.” Others said: “I will give five hundred.” Others said: “I will give a thousand.” Others said: “I will give two thousand.” Others said: “I will give five, ten, twenty, fifty.” Others said: “I will give a hundred thousand.” Others said: “I will give two hundred thousand,” and having written it on a leaf, it was pinned to the door of the monastery. Receiving the opportunity while the Buddha was walking on a walk through the countryside, they said: “I will give a gift,” and after filling their carts, the countryfolk followed along.

They spoke like this, “At that time the people of the country after filling the carts with salt, oil, rice and sweetmeats, followed along close behind the Fortunate One, saying, ‘In due order wherever we can get an opportunity, there we will give them food,’ and everything is to be understood as in the story in the Khandhakas of the Vinaya. Just so was the unmatched gift achieved.

752 [I have translated and included the relevant passage here.]

Having walked on a walk through the countryside, at that time it seems the Fortunate One arrived at Jetavana, and the king invited him and gave a gift. On the second day the city folk gave a gift. But their gift was greater than the king’s, and then next day his was greater than the city folks,’ thus after a number of days had passed the king thought: “These city folk day by day give exceedingly, if the lord of the earth, the king, is defeated by the gifts of the city folk, he will be blamed.” Then queen Mallikā told a skilful means to him.

Having made a pavilion with beautiful boards in the royal courtyard, and covered it with blue lotuses, having arranged five hundred seats, and placed five hundred elephants in front of the seats, each elephant held a white parasol over each of the monks. And two by two on the side of the seats, adorned with all decorations, young noblewomen ground up the four kinds of incense. At the conclusion she placed a measure of incense in the middle, while the other noblewoman rolled it with the hand holding the blue lotuses. Thus each monk was surrounded by noblewomen, and other women, adorned with all decorations, who, having taken a fan, were fanning them, and others, who having taken a water strainer, strained the water, and others who took away the fallen water.

For the Fortunate One there were four invaluable things, a foot stand, a stool, a bolster, and a jewelled parasol, these were the four invaluable things.

The gifts for the last to come in the Saṅgha were valued at a hundred thousand. The elder Aṅgulimāla was last to come in that ceremony. No one was able to lead an elephant close to his seat, therefore they informed the king. The king said: “Isn’t there another elephant?” “There is a rogue elephant, but no one is able to lead him.” The Perfect Sambuddha said: “Who is the last to come, great king?” “The elder Aṅgulimāla, Fortunate One.” “Having led the rogue elephant, place him next to him, great king.” After decorating him, they led him to the elder Aṅgulimāla. Through the power of that elder the elephant was unable to move even the air in his trunk.

Thus the king gave gifts for seven days. On the seventh day, after worshipping the One of Ten Powers, the king said: “Please teach Dhamma to me, Fortunate One.” Among that assembly were two ministers, Kāla (Dark) and Junha (Bright).
Kāḷa thought: “The king’s property is diminished, why did these people accept so much, having eaten, and gone to the monastery, they are sleeping! But the king’s men, if they had received something, what would they not do for him? Alas, the king’s property is diminished!” Juṇha thought: “Kingship is known as a great thing, who else will do as he has? Why is the king known as such, he who abides in kingship, such a gift no one else is able to give.”

The Fortunate One inspecting the dispositions of that assembly and knew the dispositions of these two, “If today I teach Dhamma, Juṇha’s disposition will prosper, but Kāḷa’s head will split into seven. But through my compassion for beings the Perfections are already fulfilled. On another day, teaching Dhamma to Juṇha, he will penetrate the path and fruit, but I will consider Kāḷa in this,” and he spoke just one four line verse to the king,

“The miserly go not to the world of the gods, fools surely do not praise giving,
but the wise one rejoices in giving,
and through that he is happy hereafter.”

The king was disappointed, thinking: “A great gift was given by me, but the teacher only taught a very little Dhamma, I think I was not able to please the One of Ten Powers’ mind.” Having gone to the monastery after the morning meal, and worshipped the Fortunate One, he asked, “A great gift was given by me, Fortunate One, but you did not rejoice greatly with me, are you angry with me, venerable sir?” “There is no anger, great king, but the assembly was not pure, therefore I did not teach much Dhamma.” “But why, Fortunate One, was the assembly not pure?” The Teacher informed him of the thoughts of the two ministers.

The king asked Kāḷa, saying: “Is it so, Kāḷa?” “Yes, great king.” “My property was given by me, what of yours was ruined it is not possible for me to see, get out of my country!”

Then, having called Juṇha, he asked, “Dear, was your thought thus?” “Yes, great king.” “These are suitable thoughts for you! Therefore having established in this pavilion seats for five hundred monks, and having gathered the noblewomen together, and taken the wealth of all Rājagaha, give gifts for seven days similar to my gifts.” He gave gifts in just that way.
Having given for seven days, he said: “Fortunate One, please teach Dhamma.” The Teacher rejoiced over these double gifts, and after collaborating and making these two streams of merit flow like a great river, he taught a great Dhamma teaching. At the end of the teaching Juñha became a Stream-Enterer.

On the day after that on which it had been given, they were talking of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Sirs, the Kosala king {3.470} after examination found the proper field of merit, and gave the great gift to the assembly with Buddha at its head.” The Teacher came and was told what the subject of their talk was as they sat together, he said: “Monks, it is not strange that the king after examination has undertaken great gifts to the supreme field of merit, wise men of old also after examination gave such gifts,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past a king named Bharata reigned at Roruva in the kingdom of Sovīra. He practised the ten royal virtues, won the people by the four elements of popularity, stood to the multitude like father and mother and gave great gifts to the poor, the wayfarers, the beggars, the suitors and the like. His chief queen Samuddavijayā was wise and full of knowledge. One day he looked round his alms-hall and thought: “My alms are devoured by worthless greedy people, I don’t like this, I should like to give alms to the virtuous Paccekabuddhas who deserve the best of gifts, they live in the Himālayas region, who will bring them here on my invitation and whom shall I send on this errand?” He spoke to the queen, who said: “O king, be not concerned, sending flowers by the force of our giving suitable things, and of our virtue and truthfulness, we will invite the Paccekabuddhas, and when they come we will give them gifts with all things requisite.”

The king agreed. He made proclamation by drum that all the townspeople should undertake to keep the precepts; he himself with his household undertook all the duties for the fast days and gave great gifts in generosity. He had a gold box brought, full of jasmine flowers, came down from his palace and stood in the royal courtyard. There prostrating himself on the ground with the five contacts, he saluted towards the eastern quarter and threw seven handfuls of flowers, with the words, “I salute the saints in the eastern quarter, if there is any merit in us, show compassion on us and receive our alms.” As there are no Paccekabuddhas in the eastern quarter, they did not come next day. On the second day he paid respects to the south quarter, but none came from thence. On the third day he paid respects to the west quarter, {3.471} but none came. On the fourth day he paid respects to the north quarter, and after paying respects he threw seven handfuls of flowers with the [3.281] words, “May the Paccekabuddhas who live in the north district of the Himālayas receive our alms.” The flowers went and fell on five hundred Paccekabuddhas in the Nandamūla cave.

On reflection they understood that the king had invited them; so they called seven of their number and said: “Sirs, the king invites you; show him favour.” These Paccekabuddhas came through the air and lighted at the king’s gate. Seeing them the king saluted them with delight, made them come up into the palace, showered them great honour and gave them gifts. After the meal he invited them for the next day and so on until the fifth day, feeding them for six days, on the seventh day he made ready a gift with all the requisites, arranged beds and chairs inlaid with gold, and set before the seven Paccekabuddhas sets of three robes and all other things used by holy men. The king and queen formally offered these things to them after their meal, and stood in respectful salutation. To express their thanks the elder of the assembly spoke two verses:

1. “Whate’er a man can save from flames that burn his dwelling down,
Not what is left to be consumed, will still remain his own.

2. The world’s on fire, decay and death are there the flame to feed;
Save what you can by generosity, a gift is saved indeed.” [3.472]

Thus expressing thanks the elder admonished the king to be diligent in virtue, then he flew up in the air, straight through the peaked roof of the palace and lighted in the Nandamūla cave, along with him all the requisites that had been given him flew up and lighted in the cave, and the bodies of the king and queen became full of joy. After his departure, the other six also expressed thanks in a verse each,

3. “He who gives to righteous men,
Strong in holy energy,
Crosses Yama’s flood, and then Gains a dwelling in the sky.”

4. “Like to war is generosity,
Hosts may flee before a few,
Give a little piously,
Bliss hereafter is your due.”
5. “Prudent givers please the lord,
Worthily they spend their toil.
Rich the fruit their gifts afford,
Like a seed in fertile soil.”

6. “They who never rudely speak,
Wrong to living things abjure,
Men may call them timid, weak,
For ’tis fear that keeps them pure.”

7. “Lower duties win for man, reborn on earth, a princely fate, Middle duties win them heaven, highest win the Purest State.”

8. “Generosity is blessed indeed,
Yet Dhamma gains higher meed,
Ages old and late attest,
Thus the wise have reached their rest.”

So they also went with the requisites given them.

The seventh Pacceka-buddha in his thanks praised the deathless and great Nibbāna to the king, and admonishing him carefully went to his abode as has been said. The king and queen gave gifts all their lives and passed fully through the path to heaven.

After the lesson, the Teacher said: “So wise men of old gave gifts with discrimination,” and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Pacceka-buddha reached Nibbāna, Samuddavijayā was the mother of Rāhula, and the king Bharata was myself.”

Ja 425 Aṭṭhānajātaka
The Story about the Impossible (8s)

In the present one monk is discontent and thinks to return to the lay life. The Buddha tells a story of a courtesan who repulsed a suitor when he could not give her her pay, even 753 The higher heavens in the Buddhist Cosmogony.

---

though he had paid her many times previously. He became an ascetic, and later, when she asked him to return to lay life, he set out some impossible conditions for his return.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Past Compare: Ja 374 Culladhanuggaha, Ja 425 Aṭṭhāna,

Keywords: Greed, Ingratitude, Women.

“Make Ganges calm.” The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a discontented monk. The Teacher asked him, “Is the story true, monk, that you are discontent?” “Yes, lord.” “What is the cause?” “The power of desire.” “Monk, womankind are ungrateful, treacherous, and untrustworthy. In olden days wise men could not satisfy a woman, even by giving her a thousand pieces a day, and one day when she did not get the thousand pieces she had them taken by the neck and cast out, {3.475} so ungrateful are womankind, do not fall into the power of desire for such a cause,” and so he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, his son, young Brahmadatta, and young Mahādhana, son of a rich merchant of Benares, were comrades and playfellows, and were educated in the same teacher’s house. The prince became king at his father’s death, and the merchant’s son abode near him. There was in Benares a certain courtesan, beautiful and prosperous. The merchant’s son gave her a [3.283] thousand pieces daily, and took pleasure with her constantly, at his father’s death he succeeded to the rich merchant’s position, and did not forsake her, still giving her a thousand pieces daily.

Three times a day he went to wait upon the king. One day he went to wait upon him in the evening. As he was talking with the king, the sun set, and it became dark. As he left the palace, he thought: “There is no time to go home and come back again, I will go straight to the courtesan’s house,” so he dismissed his attendants, and entered her house alone. When she saw him, she asked if he had brought the thousand pieces. “Dear, I was very late today; so I sent away my attendants without going home, and have come alone; but tomorrow I will give you two thousand pieces.” She thought: “If I admit him today, he will come empty-handed on other days, and so my wealth will be lost, I won’t admit him this time.” So she said: “Sir, I am but a courtesan, I do not give my favours without a thousand pieces, you must bring the sum.” “Dear, I will bring twice the sum tomorrow,” and so he begged her (3.476) again and again. The courtesan gave orders to her maids, “Don’t let that man stand there and look at me, take him by the neck, and cast him out, and then shut the door.” They did so.

He thought: “I have spent on her eighty crores of money; yet on the one day when I come empty-handed, she has me seized by the neck and cast out, womankind are wicked, shameless, ungrateful, treacherous,” and so he pondered and pondered on the bad qualities of womankind, till he felt dislike and disgust, and became discontented with a layman’s life. “Why should I lead a layman’s life? I will go this day and become an ascetic,” he thought, so without going back to his house or seeing the king again, he left the city and entered the forest, he made a hermitage on the Ganges bank, and there made his abode as an ascetic, reaching the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and living on wild roots and fruits.

The king missed his friend and asked for him. The courtesan’s conduct had become known throughout the city, so they told the king of the matter, adding, “O king, they say that your friend through shame did not go home, but has become an ascetic in the forest.” The king summoned the courtesan, and asked if the story were true about her treatment of his friend. She confessed. “Wicked, vile woman, go quickly to where my friend is and fetch him, if you fail, your life is forfeit.” She was afraid at the king’s words; she mounted a chariot and drove out of the city with a great retinue; she sought for his abode and hearing of it by report, went there and saluted and prayed, “Sir, bear with the evil I did in my blindness and folly, I will never do so again.” “Very well, I forgive you; I am not angry with you.” “If you forgive me, mount the chariot with me, we will drive to the city, and as soon as we enter it (3.477) I will give you all the money in my house.” When he heard her, (3.284) he replied, “Lady, I cannot go with you now, but when something that cannot happen in this world will happen, then perhaps I may go,” and so he spoke the first verse:

1. “Make Ganges calm like lotus-tank, cuckoos pearl-white to see,
   Make apples bear the palm trees’ fruit, perchance it then might be.”

But she said again, “Come; I am going.” He answered, “I will go.” “When?” “At such and such a time,” he said and spoke the remaining verses:
2. “When woven out of turtle-hair a triple cloth you see,
   For winter wear against the cold, perchance it then may be.

3. When of mosquito’s teeth you build a tower so skilfully,
   That will not shake or totter soon, perchance it then may be.

4. When out of horns of hare you make a ladder skilfully, Stairs that will climb the height of heaven, perchance it then may be.

5. When mice to mount those ladder-stairs and eat the moon agree,
   And bring down Rāhu from the sky, the thing perchance may be.

6. When swarms of flies devour strong drink in pitchers full and free,
   And house themselves in burning coals, the thing perchance may be.

7. When asses get them ripe red lips and faces fair to see,
   And show their skill in song and dance, the thing perchance may be.

8. When crows and owls shall meet to talk in converse privily,
   And woo each other, lover-like, the thing perchance may be. {3.478}

9. When sunshades, made of tender leaves from off the forest tree,
   Are strong against the rushing rain, the thing perchance may be.

10. When sparrows take Himālaya in all its majesty,
    And bear it in their little beaks, the thing perchance may be.

11. And when a boy can carry light, with all its bravery,
    A ship full-rigged for distant seas, the thing perchance may be.”

So the Great Being spoke these eleven verses to fix impossible (atīhāna) conditions. The courtesan, hearing him, won his forgiveness and went back to Benares. She told the matter to the king, and begged for her life, which was granted.

After the lesson, the Teacher said: “So, monks, womankind are ungrateful and treacherous,” then he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, After the Truths, the discontented monk was established in the fruition of the First Path. “At that time the king was Ānanda, the ascetic was myself.”
The Section with Eight Verses – 1533

Ja 426 Dīpijātaka

The Story about the Panther (8s)

In the present goatherds settle their flock by Ven. Mahāmoggallāna’s meditation site. When a panther tries to catch one of them, she runs right at him and escapes. The Buddha tells a similar story of the past, but then the goat tried to speak nicely to the panther, and was caught and eaten.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the leopard = the same in the past (dīpaka),
the she goat = the same in the past (eḷikā).

Keywords: Courage, Flattery, Animals.

“How fares it with you.” [3.285] [3.479] The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning a certain female goat. At one time the elder Moggallāna lived in a dwelling with one door, in a mountain enclosure, surrounded by hills. His covered walk was close by the door. Some goatherds thought the enclosure would be a good place for their goats, so they drove them in and lived there at their pleasure. One day they came in the evening, took all the goats, and went away, but one female goat had wandered far, and not seeing the goats departing, she was left behind. Later, as she was departing, a certain panther saw her, and thinking to eat her stood by the door of the enclosure. She looked all round, and saw the panther. “He is there because he wishes to kill and eat me,” she thought, “if I turn and run, my life is lost; I must play the man,” and so she tossed her horns, and sprang straight at him with all her might. She escaped his grip, though he was quivering with the thought of catching her, then running at full speed she came up with the other goats. The elder observed how all the animals had behaved, next day he went and told the Tathāgata, “So, lord, this female goat performed a feat by her skill in means, and escaped from the panther.” The Teacher answered, “Moggallāna, the panther failed to catch her this time, but once before he killed her though she cried out, and ate her.” Then at Moggallāna’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta was born in a certain village of the Magadha kingdom, in a wealthy family. When he grew up, he renounced desires and adopted the ascetic life, reaching the Absorptions and Super Knowledges. After dwelling long in the Himālayas, he came to Rājagaha for salt and vinegar, and dwelt in a hut of leaves which he made in a mountain enclosure. Just as in the introductory story, the goatherds drove their goats there, and in the same way, one day as a single female goat was going out later than the rest, a panther waited by the door, thinking to eat her. When she saw him, she thought: “My life is forfeit, by some means I must get him into pleasant and kindly talk, and so soften his heart and save my life.” Beginning a friendly talk with him from some distance, she spoke the first verse:

1. “How fares it with you, uncle? Is it well with you? My mother sends her kind regards, I’m your friend so true.”

Hearing her, the panther thought: “This baggage would beguile me by calling me, ‘uncle,’ she does not know how hard I am,” and so he spoke the second verse:

2. “You’ve trod upon my tail, miss goat, and done me injury, And you think by saying ‘uncle’ that you can go scot-free.” [3.286]

When she heard him, she said: “O uncle, don’t talk in that way,” and spoke the third verse:

3. “I faced you as I came, good sir, you face me as you sit, Your tail is all behind you, how could I tread on it?”

He answered, “What do you say, female goat? Is there any place where my tail might not be?” and so he spoke the fourth verse: [3.481]

4. “As far as four great continents with seas and mountains spread, My tail extends, how could you fail on such a tail to tread?”

The female goat; when she heard this, thought: “This wicked one is not attracted by soft words, I will answer him as an enemy,” and so she spoke the fifth verse:

5. “Your villain’s tail is long, I know, for I had warning fair, Parents and brothers told me so, but I flew through the air.”

Then he said: “I know you came through the air, but as you came, you spoilt my food by your way of coming,” and so he spoke the sixth verse:
6. “The sight of you, miss goat, on high, the air flying through, Frightened a herd of deer, and so my food was spoilt by you.”

Hearing this, the goat in fear of death could bring no other excuse, but cried out, “Uncle, do not commit such cruelty; spare my life.” But though she cried out, the other seized her by the shoulder, killed her and ate her.

7. “’Twas thus the female goat cried for grace, but blood must satisfy
The beast that grips her throat; the bad will show no courtesy.

8. Conduct, nor right, nor courtesy, the bad man will display;
He hates the good, to face him then ’tis best in open fray.”

These are two verses spoken after Fully Awakening. [3.482]

A holy ascetic saw the whole matter of the two animals.

After this lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time the female goat and the panther were the female goat and the panther of today, the holy ascetic was myself.”
Book IX. Navanipāta
The Section with Nine Verses

Ja 427 Gijjhajātaka
The Story about (the Disobedient) Vulture (9s)

In the present one monk, though taught the way of a monastic, refuses to listen, and wants to live according to his own ideas. The Buddha tells how he was once a vulture who didn’t listen to his elders and was destroyed by his disobedience.

The Bodhisatta = the father vulture (gijjhapitā), the disobedient monk = the disobedient vulture (dubbacagijjha).

Present Source: Ja 427 Gijjha,
Quoted at: Ja 116 Dubbaca, Ja 161 Indasamānagotta, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439
Catudvāra,
Past Compare: Ja 381 Migālopa, Ja 427 Gijjha.

Keywords: Disobedience, Wilfulness, Animals, Birds.

“Formed of rough logs.” [3.287] [3.483] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana concerning a disobedient monk. He was, they say, of gentle birth, and though ordained in the dispensation that leads to safety, was admonished by his well-wishers, masters, teachers, and fellow-students to this effect, “Thus must you advance and thus retreat; thus look at or away from objects; thus must the arm be stretched out or drawn back; thus are the inner and outer garment to be worn; thus is the bowl to be held, and when you have received sufficient food to sustain life, after self-examination, thus are you to partake of it, keeping guard over the door of the senses; in eating you are to be moderate and exercise watchfulness; you are to recognize such and such duties towards monks who come to or go from the monastery; these are the fourteen sets of monastic duties, and the eighty great duties to be duly performed; these are the thirteen ascetic practices; all these are to be scrupulously performed.” Yet was he disobedient and impatient, and did not receive instruction respectfully, but refused to listen to them, saying: “I do not find fault with you. Why do you speak thus to me? I shall know what is for my good, and what is not.”

754 Called Khandakavattāni because contained in the Khandaka division of the Vinaya.

Then the monks, hearing of his disobedience, sat in the Dhamma Hall, telling of his faults. The Teacher came and asked them what it was they were discussing, and sent for the monk and said: “Is it true, monk, that you are disobedient?” And when he confessed that it was so, the Teacher said: “Why, monk, after being ordained in so excellent a dispensation that leads to safety, {3.484} do you not listen to the voice of your well-wishers? Formerly too you disobeyed the voice of the wise, and were blown into atoms by the Veramba wind.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta came to life as a young vulture on Vulture Mountain [Gijjhapabbata]. Now his offspring Supatta, the king of the vultures, [3.288] was strong and lusty and had a following of many thousands of vultures, and he fed the parent birds. And owing to his strength he used to fly to a very great distance. So his father admonished him and said: “My son, you must not go beyond such and such a point.” He said: “Very good,” but one day when it rained, he flew up with the other vultures, and leaving the rest behind, and going beyond the prescribed limit, he came within the range of the Veramba wind, and was blown into atoms.

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, to illustrate this incident, uttered these verses:

1. “Formed of rough logs, an ancient pathway led
   To dizzy heights, where a young vulture fed

2. The parent birds. Lusty and strong of wing
   He oft to them would fat of serpents bring;

3. And when his father saw him flying high
   And venturing far afield, he thus would cry,

4. ‘My son, when you can scan from your lookout
   Earth’s rounded sphere by ocean girt about,
   No farther go, but straight return, I pray.’
5. Then would this king of birds speed on his way,
And bending o'er the earth, with piercing sight
He viewed below forest and mountain height:

6. And earth would, as his sire described, appear
Amid the encircling sea a rounded sphere.
But when beyond these limits he had passed,

7. Strong bird though he might be, a raging blast
Swept him away to an untimely death,
Powerless to cope with storm-wind’s fiery breath. [3.485]

8. Thus did the bird by disobedience prove Fatal to those dependent on his love:

9. So perish all that, scornful of old age,
Deride the warnings uttered by the sage,
As the young vulture wisdom’s voice defied
And scorned the limits set to bound his pride.” [3.486]

“Therefore, monk, be not like unto this vulture, but do the bidding of your well-wishers.” And being thus admonished by the Teacher, he thenceforth became obedient.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “The disobedient vulture of those days is now the disobedient monk. The parent vulture was myself.”

Ja 428 Kosambījātaka

The Story at Kosambī (9s)

Alternative Title: Kosambyajātaka (Cst); Saṅghabhedakajātaka (Comm)

In the present two sets of monks fall into a dispute over a disciplinary matter, and although rebuked by the Buddha continue with it. The Buddha tells a story of a prince who forgave his father’s killer, and then admonishes the monks to behave at least as well as their royal predecessor. 755

755 [This Jātaka is very unusual, as the story of the past is summarised in one paragraph, whereas the story laying the basis forms most of the Jātaka, including the verses.]
The Bodhisatta = prince Dīghāvu (Dīghāvukumāro), Mahāmāyā = his mother (matā),
King Suddhodana = his father (pitā).

Present Source: Ja 428 Kosambī,
Quoted at: Ja 371 Dīghitikosala,
Present Compare: Vin Mv 10 (1.342), Dhp-a I.5 Kosambaka.

Keywords: Quarrels, Forgiveness.

“Whene’er the Saṅgha.” [3.289] This story the Teacher, while dwelling in the Ghosita park near Kosambī, told concerning certain quarrelsome folk at Kosambī. The incident that led to the story is to be found in The Section with the Vinaya relating to Kosambī. Here is a short summary of it. At that time, it is said, two monks lived in the same house, the one versed in the Vinaya, the other in the Suttas. The latter of these one day having occasion to visit the lavatory went out leaving the surplus water for rinsing the mouth in a vessel. Afterwards the one versed in the Vinaya went in and seeing the water came out and asked his companion if the water had been left there by him. He answered, “Yes, sir.” “What! Do you not know that this is wrong?” “No, I was not aware of it.” “Well, monk, it is wrong.” “Then I will atone for it.” “But if you did it inadvertently and heedlessly, it is not wrong.” So he became as one who saw no wrong in what was wrongful.

The Vinaya scholar said to his pupils, “This Sutta scholar, though falling into wrong, is not aware of it.” They on seeing the other monk’s pupils said: “Your master though falling into wrong does not recognize its wrongfulness.” They went and told their master. He said: “This Vinaya scholar before said it was no wrong, and now he says it is wrong: he speaks falsely.” They went and told the others, “Your master speaks falsely.” Thus they stirred up a quarrel, one with another. Then the Vinaya scholar, finding an opportunity, went through the form of suspension of the monk for refusing to see his offence. Thenceforth even the laymen who provided necessaries for the monks were divided into two factions. The nuns too that accept their admonitions, and tutelary gods, with their friends and intimates and deities from those that rest in space\textsuperscript{757} {3.487} to those of the Brahmiṣṇa World, even all such as were unconverted, formed two parties, and the uproar reached to the abode of the Akaniṭṭha gods.

---

756 Mahāvagga, x. 1-10.

Then a certain monk drew near to the Tathāgata, and announced the view of the suspending side who said: “The man is legally suspended,” and the view of the followers of the suspended one, who said: “He is illegally suspended,” and the practice of those who though forbidden by the suspending side, still gathered round in support of him. The Fortunate One said: “There is a schism, yes, a schism in the Saṅgha,” and he went to them and pointed out the misery involved in suspension to those that suspended, and the misery following upon the concealment of the wrong to the opposite party, and so departed.

Again when they were holding the Uposatha and similar services in the same place, within the boundary, and were quarrelling in the refectory and elsewhere, he laid down the rule that they were to sit down together, one by one from each side alternately. And hearing that they were still quarrelling in the monastery he went there and said: “Enough, monks, let us have no quarrelling.” And one of the heretical side,\textsuperscript{758} not wishing to annoy the Fortunate One, said: “Let the Fortunate One, the master of the Dhamma, dwell quietly at ease, enjoying the bliss he has already obtained in this life. We shall make ourselves notorious by this quarrelling, altercation, disputing and contention.” \textsuperscript{[3.290]}

But the Teacher said to them, “In the past, monks, Brahmadatta reigned as king of Kāsi in Benares, and he robbed Dīghati,\textsuperscript{759} king of Kosala, of his kingdom, and put him to death, when living in disguise, and when prince Dīghāvu spared the life of Brahmadatta, they became thenceforth close friends.\textsuperscript{760}

Since such must have been the long-suffering and tenderness of these sceptred and sword-bearing kings, verily, monks, you ought to make it clear that you too, having embraced the ascetic life according to so well-taught a Dhamma and \textsuperscript{757} These include all gods except those in the four highest heavens (arūpa-brahmalokas).

\textsuperscript{758} Reading adhammavādinā as in the parallel passage of the Mahāvagga, p. 341.

\textsuperscript{759} [Elsewhere the name is given as Dīghiti.]

\textsuperscript{760} [For a longer version of this story see: Ja 371 Dīghitikosalajātaka.]
Discipline, can be forgiving and tender-hearted.” And thus admonishing them for the third time he said: “Enough, monks, let there be no quarrelling.”

When he saw that they did not cease at his bidding, he went away, saying: “Verily, these foolish folk are like men possessed, they are not easy of persuasion.” Next day returning from the collection of alms he rested awhile in his perfumed chamber, and put his room in order, and then taking his bowl and robe he stood poised in the air and delivered these verses in the midst of the assembly: [3.488]

1. “Whenever the Saṅgha in twain is rent,\textsuperscript{761}
The common folk to loud-mouthed cries give vent:
Each one believes that he himself is wise,
And views his neighbour with disdainful eyes.

2. Bewildered souls, puffed up with self-esteem,
With open mouth they foolishly blaspheme;
And as through all the range of speech they stray,
They know not whom as leader to obey.

3. This\textsuperscript{762} man abused me, that struck me a blow,
A third o’ercame and robbed me long ago.
All such as harbour feelings of this kind,
To mitigate their wrath are ne’er inclined.

4. He did abuse and buffet me of yore
He overcame me and oppressed me sore.
They who such thoughts refuse to entertain,
Appease their wrath and live at one again.

5. Not hate, but love alone makes hate to cease:
This is the everlasting law of peace.

6. Some men the law of self-restraint despise,
But who make up their quarrels, they are wise.

7. If men all scarred with wounds in deadly strife,
Robbers of cattle, taking human life,

\textsuperscript{761} [All of these verse are quoted as a group in MN 128 Upakkilesasutta.]
\textsuperscript{762} Dhp v. 3-5. See also No. 371 supra.
Nay those that plunder a whole realm, may be Friends with their foes, should monks not agree?

8. Should you a wise and honest comrade find,
A kindred soul, to dwell with you inclined,
All dangers past, with him you still would stray,
In happy contemplation all the day.

9. But should you fail to meet with such a friend,
Your life 'twere best in solitude to spend,
Like to some prince that abdicates a throne,
Or elephant that ranges all alone.

10. For choice adopt the solitary life,
Companionship with fools but leads to strife;
In careless innocence pursue your way,
Like elephant in forest wild astray.” [3.489]

When the Teacher had thus spoken, as he failed to reconcile these monks, he went to Bālakaloṇḍakārāgāma (the village of Bālaka, the salt-maker), [3.291] and discoursed to the venerable Bhagu of the blessings of solitude. Thence he repaired to the abode of three youths of gentle birth and spoke to them of the bliss to be found in the sweets of concord. Thence he journeyed to the Pārileyyaka forest, {3.490} and after dwelling there three months, without returning to Kosambī, he went straight to Sāvatthi. And the lay folk of Kosambī consulted together and said: “Surely these venerable monks of Kosambī have done us much harm; worried by them the Fortunate One is gone away. We will neither offer salutation nor other marks of respect to them, nor give alms to them when they visit us. So they will depart, or return to the world, or will propitiate the Fortunate One.” And they did so. And these monks overwhelmed by this form of punishment went to Sāvatthi and begged forgiveness of the Fortunate One.

The Teacher thus identified the Jātaka, “The father was the great king Suddhodana, the mother was Mahāmāyā,764 prince Dīghāvu was myself.”

---

763 [The last three verse are also found at Dhp. 328-330.]
764 [Neither of which are actually mentioned in the Jātaka.]
Ja 429 Mahāsukajātaka
The Long Story about the Parrot (King) (9s)

Alternative Title: Mahāsuvajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk has difficulties obtaining alms and decides to leave the village. The Buddha tells a story of a parrot who refused to leave a dead fig tree he had lived in, and how Sakka commended him and restored the tree.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the parrots (suvarājā), Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Past Source: Ja 429 Mahāsuka,
Quoted at: Ja 430 Cullasuka,
Past Compare: Dhp-a II.9 Nigamavāsitissatthera.

Keywords: Contentment, Loyalty, Animals, Birds.

“Wherever fruitful trees.” This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a certain monk. The story goes that he lived in a forest near a border village in the Kosala country, and received instruction in forms of meditation from the Teacher. The people made him a dwelling-place on a site where men continually passed to and fro, providing him with day and night quarters, and attentively ministered to him. In the very first month after he had entered upon the rainy season the village was burned down and the people had not so much as a seed left and were unable to supply his alms-bowl with savoury food; and though he was in a pleasant place of abode, he was so distressed for alms that he could not enter upon the Path or its Fruition. So when at the end of three months he went to visit the Teacher, after words of kindly greeting the Teacher hoped that though distressed for alms he had a pleasant place to live in. The monk told him how matters stood. The Teacher on hearing that he had pleasant quarters said: “Monk, if this is so, an ascetic ought to lay aside covetous ways, and be content to eat whatever food he can get, and to fulfil all the duties of a monastic. Sages of old when born into the world as animals, {3.491} though they lived on the powdered dust of the decayed [3.292] tree in which they had their abode, laid aside greedy desires and were contented to stay where they were, and fulfilled the law of love. Why then do you abandon a pleasant dwelling-place, because the food you receive is scanty and coarse?” And at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past many myriads of parrots lived in the Himālayas on the banks of the Ganges in a grove of fig trees. A king of the parrots there, when the fruit of the tree in which he dwelt had come to an end, ate whatever was left, whether shoot or leaf or bark or rind, and drank of water from the Ganges, and being very happy and contented he kept where he was. Owing to his happy and contented state the abode of Sakka was shaken. Sakka reflecting on the cause saw the parrot, and to test his virtue, by his supernatural power he withered up the tree, which became a mere stump perforated with holes, and stood to be buffeted by every blast of wind, and from the holes dust came out. The parrot king ate this dust and drank the water of the Ganges, and going nowhere else sat perched on the top of the fig-stump, thinking nothing of wind and sun.

Sakka noticed how very contented the parrot was, and said: “After hearing him speak of the virtue of friendship, I will come and give him his choice of a boon, and cause the fig tree to bear ambrosial fruit.” So he took the form of a royal goose, and preceded by Sujā in the shape of an Asura maiden, he went to the grove of fig trees, and perching on the bough of a tree close by, he entered into conversation with the parrot and spoke the first verse:

1. “Wherever fruitful trees abound,
   A flock of hungry birds is found:
   But should the trees all withered be,
   Away at once the birds will flee.” (3.492)

And after these words, to drive the parrot thence, he spoke the second verse:

2. “Haste you, sir redbeak, to be gone;
   Why do you sit and dream alone?
   Come tell me, pray you, bird of spring,
   To this dead stump why do you cling?”

Then the parrot said: “O goose, from a feeling of gratitude, I forsake not this tree,” and he repeated two verses:
3. “They who have been close friends from youth,
   Mindful of goodness and of truth,
   In life and death, in weal and woe
   The claims of friendship ne’er forego.

4. I too would fain be kind and good
   To one that long my friend has stood;
   I wish to live, but have no heart
   From this old tree, though dead, to part.” [3.293]

Sakka on hearing what he said was delighted, and praising him wished to offer him a choice, and uttered two verses: [3.493]

5. “I know your friendship and your grateful love,
   Virtues that wise men surely must approve.

6. I offer you whate’er you will for choice;
   Parrot, what boon would most your heart rejoice?”

On hearing this, the king parrot making his choice spoke the seventh verse:

7. “If you, O goose, what most I crave would give,
   Grant that the tree I love, again may live.
   Let it once more with its old vigour shoot,
   Gather fresh sweetness and bear goodly fruit.”

Then Sakka, granting the boon, spoke the eighth verse:

8. “Lo! Friend, a fruitful and right noble tree,
   Well fitted for your dwelling-place to be.
   Let it once more with its old vigour shoot,
   Gather fresh sweetness and bear goodly fruit.” [3.494]

With these words Sakka quit his present form, and manifesting the supernatural power of himself and Sujā, he took up water from the Ganges in his hand and dashed it against the fig tree stump. Straightaway the tree rose up rich in branch, and stem, and with honey-sweet fruit, and stood a charming sight, like unto the bare Jewel-Mount. The parrot king on seeing it was highly pleased, and singing the praises of Sakka he spoke the ninth verse:
9. “May Sakka and all loved by Sakka blessed be,
As I today am blessed this goodly sight to see!”

Sakka, after granting the parrot his choice, and causing the fig tree to bear ambrosial fruit, returned with Sujātā to his own abode.

In illustration of this story these verses spoken after Fully Awakening were added at the close:

10. “Soon as king parrot wisely made his choice,
The tree once more put forth its fruit again;
Then Sakka with his queen did fly amain
To where in Nandana the gods rejoice.”

The Teacher, his lesson ended, said: “Thus, monk, sages of old though born in animal forms were free from covetousness. Why then do you, after being ordained under so excellent a dispensation, follow greedy ways? Go and dwell in the same place.” And he gave him a form of meditation, and the monk went back and by spiritual insight became an Arahant. He thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time Sakka was Anuruddha, and the parrot king was myself.”

Ja 430 Cullasukajātaka

The Short Story about the Parrot (King) (9s)

Alternative Title: Cūlasuvajātaka (Cst)

In the present because of a drought the Buddha has difficulties obtaining alms but continues on at the village until the end of the retreat. The Buddha tells a story of a parrot who refused to leave a dead fig tree he had lived in, and how Sakka commended him and restored the tree.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the parrots (suvarājā),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Past Source: Ja 429 Mahāsuka,
Quoted at: Ja 430 Culasuka,
Past Compare: Dhp-a II.9 Nigamavāsitissatthera.

Keywords: Contentment, Loyalty, Devas.
“Lo! Countless trees.” [3.294] This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning the Verañjā section.765

When the Teacher after passing the rainy season at Verañjā in due course arrived at Sāvatthi, the monks in the Dhamma Hall raised a discussion saying: “Sirs, a Tathāgata, a delicately nurtured noble and Buddha, though possessed of Supernormal Powers, at the invitation of a brahmin of Verañjā stayed three months with him, and when owing to the temptation of Māra he failed to receive an alms at the hands of the brahmin, even for a single day, he gave up all covetous ways, and keeping in the same place for three months lived on water and a modicum of the ground flour of roots. \( \text{3.495} \) Oh the contented nature of Tathāgatas!” When the Teacher came and on inquiry learned the nature of their discussion he said: “It is no marvel, monks, that a Tathāgata now has lost all covetousness, seeing that formerly when born in an animal form he forsook covetousness.” And hereupon he told a story of the past. The whole story is now to be related in detail in exactly the same way as in the preceding tale [Ja 429].

In the past many myriads of parrots lived in the Himālayas on the banks of the Ganges in a grove of fig trees. A king of the parrots there, when the fruit of the tree in which he dwelt had come to an end, ate whatever was left, whether shoot or leaf or bark or rind, and drank of water from the Ganges, and being very happy and contented he kept where he was. Owing to his happy and contented state the abode of Sakka was shaken. Sakka reflecting on the cause saw the parrot, and to test his virtue, by his supernatural power he withered up the tree, which became a mere stump perforated with holes, and stood to be buffeted by every blast of wind, and from the holes dust came out. The parrot king ate this dust and drank the water of the Ganges, and going nowhere else sat perched on the top of the fig-stump, thinking nothing of wind and sun.

Sakka noticed how very contented the parrot was, and said: “After hearing him speak of the virtue of friendship, I will come and give him his choice of a boon, and cause the fig tree to bear ambrosial fruit.” So he took the form of a royal goose, and preceded by Sujā in the shape of an Asura maiden, he went to the grove of fig trees, and perching on the bough of a tree close by, he entered into conversation with the parrot and spoke the first verse:

765 See Vinaya, Pār. i. 1-4.

1. “Lo! Countless trees are here, all green and fruitful see! Why, parrot, do you cling to this poor withered tree?”

2. “Long years we have enjoyed the luscious fruit it bare, And tho’ it now has none, it still should claim our care.”

3. “Nor leaves nor fruit it yields, alas, the tree is dead: Why blame your fellow-birds, that they should all have fled?”

4. “They loved it for its fruit, and now that it has none, Poor selfish fools! Their love and gratitude is gone.”

5. “Your gratitude I own, your true and constant love, Sure virtue such as this the wise will aye approve.”

6. “I offer you, O bird, whate’er you will for choice; Tell me, I pray, what boon would most your heart rejoice?”

7. “Would that this tree alight bear fresh leaves and fruit again; I would be glad as they that treasure trove obtain.”

8. Then was the tree by Sakka with ambrosia sprinkled o’er, And boughs sprang up with cooling shade, as lovely as before.

9. May Sakka and all loved by Sakka blesséd be, As I today am blessed this joyous sight to see.

10. Thus was the tree made fruitful by the parrot’s grateful choice, And Sakka and his queen in groves of Nandana rejoice. {3.496}

The Teacher, his lesson ended, identified the Jātaka, “In those days Sakka was Anuruddha, the parrot king was myself.”

---

{766} [Verses 5 and 6, and 9 and 10 correspond to verses in the previous Jātaka.]
Ja 431 Hāritajātaka
The Story about (the Ascetic) Hārita (9s)

Alternative Title: Haritacajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is ready to disrobe after seeing a beautiful woman. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic who was overcome by seeing the queen naked, how he could not lie about it to the king, and how he threw off passion.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic Haritaca (Haritacatāpaso), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Lust, Renunciation, Truth, Women.

“Friend Hārita.” [3.295] This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a discontented monk. Now this monk after seeing a smartly attired woman grew discontented and allowed his hair and nails to grow long, and wished to return to the world. And when he was brought against his will by his teachers and preceptors to the Teacher, and was asked by him, if it were true that he was discontent, and if so why, he said: “Yes, your reverence, it is owing to the power of sinful passion, after seeing a beautiful woman.” [3.497]

The Teacher said: “Doing wrong, monk, is destructive of virtue, and insipid withal, and causes a man to be reborn in hell; and why should not this wrong prove your destruction? For the hurricane that smites Mount Sineru is not ashamed to carry off a withered leaf. But owing to this wrong men who walk according to knowledge and wisdom, and have acquired the five Super Knowledges and the eight Attainments, though they were great and holy men, being unable to fix their thoughts, fell away from Absorption.” And then he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a certain village in a brahmin family worth eighty crores, and from his golden complexion they called him Hāritatacakumāra (Young Goldskin). When he was grown up, and had been educated at Taxila, he set up as a householder, and on the death of his father and mother he made inspection of his treasures and thought: “The treasure only continues to exist, but they who produced it cease to exist: I too must be reduced to atoms by means of death,” and alarmed by the fear of death he gave great gifts, and entering the Himālayas he adopted the ascetic life, and on the seventh day he entered upon the Super Knowledges and Attainments.
There for a long time he lived on wild fruit and roots, and going down from the mountain to procure salt and vinegar, he in due course reached Benares. There he lived in the royal park, and on the next day in going his round for alms he came to the door of the king’s palace. The king was so glad to see him that he sent for him and made him sit on the royal couch beneath the shade of the white umbrella, and fed him on all manner of dainties, and on his returning thanks the king being exceedingly pleased asked him, “Venerable sir, where are you going?” “Great king, we are looking out for a dwelling-place for the rainy season.” “Very well, venerable sir,” he said, and after the early meal he went with him to the park, and had quarters both for the day and night built for him, and, assigning the keeper of the park as his attendant, he saluted him and departed. The Great Being from that time fed continually in the palace, and lived there twelve years. [3.296]

Now one day the king went to quell a disturbance on the frontier, {3.498} and committed the Bodhisattva to the care of the queen, saying: “Do not neglect our ‘Field of Merit.’ ” Thenceforth she ministered to the Great Being with her own hands.

Now one day she had prepared his food, and as he delayed his coming, she bathed in scented water, and put on a soft tunic of fine cloth, and opening the lattice lay down on a small couch, and let the wind play upon her body. And the Bodhisattva later on in the day, dressed in a goodly inner and outer robe, took his alms-bowl and walking through the air came to the window. As the queen rose up in haste, at the rustling sound of his bark garments, her robe of fine cloth fell from off her. An object marking the opposite sex struck upon the eye of the Great Being. Then the sinful feeling, that had been dwelling for countless aeons in his heart, rose up like a snake lying in a box, and put to flight his Absorption. Being unable to fix his thoughts he went and seized the queen by the hand, and forthwith they drew a curtain round them. After misconducting himself with her, he partook of some food and returned to the park. And every day thenceforth he acted after the same manner.

His misconduct was blazed abroad throughout the whole city. The king’s ministers sent a letter to him, saying: “Hārita, the ascetic, is acting thus and thus.”

The king thought: “They say this, being eager to separate us,” and disbelieved it. When he had pacified the border country he returned to Benares, and after marching in solemn procession round the city, he went to the queen and asked her, “Is it true that the holy ascetic Hārita misconducted himself with you?” “It is true, my lord.” He disbelieved her also, and thought: “I will ask the man himself,” and going to the park he saluted him, and sitting respectfully on one side he spoke the first verse in the form of a question:

1. “Friend Hārita, I oft have heard it said
   A sinful life is by your reverence led;
   I trust there is no truth in this report,
   And you are innocent in deed and thought?” {3.499}

He thought: “If I were to say I am not indulging in wrong, this king would believe me, but in this world there is no sure ground like speaking the truth. They who forsake the truth, though they sit in the sacred enclosure of the Bo tree, cannot attain to Buddhahood. I must needs just speak the truth.” In certain cases a Bodhisatta may destroy life, take what is not given him, commit adultery, drink strong drink, but he may not tell a lie, attended by deception that violates the reality of things. Therefore speaking the truth only he uttered the second verse:

2. “In evil ways, great king, as you have heard,
   Caught by the world's delusive arts, I erred.” [3.297]

Hearing this the king spoke the third verse:

3. “Vain is man’s deepest wisdom to dispel
   The passions that within his bosom swell.”

Then Hārita pointed out to him the power of doing wrong and spoke the fourth verse:

4. “There are four passions in this world, great king,
   That in their power are over-mastering:
   Lust, hate, excess and ignorance their name;
   Wisdom can here no certain footing claim.” {3.500}

The king on hearing this spoke the fifth verse:

5. “Endowed with holiness and intellect
   The saintly Hārita wins our respect.”

Then Hārita spoke the sixth verse:
6. “Ill thoughts, with pleasant vices if combined, Corrupt the sage to saintliness inclined.”

Then the king, encouraging him to throw off sinful passion, spoke the seventh verse:

7. “The beauty that from purest hearts does shine
   Is marred by lust, born of this mortal frame;
   Away with it, and blessings shall be thine,
   And multitudes your wisdom shall proclaim.”

Then the Bodhisatta recovered the power to concentrate his thoughts, and observing the misery of wicked desire, he spoke the eighth verse:

8. “Since blinding passions yield a bitter fruit,
   All growth of lust I cut down to the root.” [3.501]

So saying he asked the king’s leave, and having gained his consent he entered his ascetic hut, and focusing on the Meditation Object he entered into an Absorption, and came forth from the hut, and sitting cross-legged in the air he taught the king the true Dhamma and said: “Great king, I have incurred censure in the midst of the people by reason of my dwelling in a place where I ought not. But be you vigilant. Now will I return to some forest free from all taint of womankind.” And amidst the tears and lamentations of the king he returned to the Himālayas, and without falling away from Absorption he entered the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher knowing the whole story said:

9. “Thus Hārita for truth right stoutly did contend,
   And lust forsaking did to Brahmā Realm ascend.”

And having after Fully Awakening spoken this verse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the worldly-minded monk became an Arahat, “At that time the king was Ānanda, Hārita was myself.”

Ja 432 Padakusalamāṇavajātaka
The Story about the Young Brahmin skilled in Steps (9s)

In the present one layman’s son is skilled in following footsteps. The Buddha tells a story of a young man who could follow footsteps, even left in the air, and how he tried to save a king from his folly by telling numerous stories, and was eventually raised to kingship himself.

The Bodhisatta = the young brahmin skilled in steps (padakusalamañava), Kassapa = the father (pitā).

Keywords: Skill, Theft, Warning, Devas.

“O Pāṭala, by Ganges.” [3.298] This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a certain boy. He was, they say, the son of a householder at Sāvatthi, just seven years old, and skilled in recognizing footsteps. Now his father being minded to prove him went without his knowing it to a friend’s house. The boy, without even asking where his father had gone, by tracing his footsteps, came and stood before him. So his father one day asked him saying: “When I went off without telling you, how did you know where I was gone?” {3.502} “My dear father, I recognized your footsteps. I am skilled in this way.” Then his father, to prove him, went out of his house after the early meal, and going into his next-door neighbour’s house, from it passed into another, and from this third house again returned to his own home, and thence made his way to the north gate, and passing out by it made a circuit of the city from right to left. And coming to Jetavana he saluted the Teacher and sat down to listen to the Dhamma. The boy asked where his father was, and when they said: “We do not know,” by following in his footsteps, and starting from the next-door neighbour’s house he went by the same road by which his father had travelled to Jetavana, and after saluting the Teacher stood in the presence of his father, and when asked by him, how he knew that he had come here, he said: “I recognized your footsteps and following in your track came here.” The Teacher asked, “Lay brother, what are you saying?” He answered, “Your reverence, this boy is skilled in knowing footsteps. To test him I came here in such a manner. Not finding me at home, by following in my footsteps, he arrived here.” “There is no marvel,” said the Teacher, “in recognizing steps upon the ground. Sages of old recognized steps in the air,” and on being asked, he told a story of the past.

In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, his queen-consort after doing wrong was questioned by the king, and taking an oath she said: “If I have wronged against you, I shall become a Yakkhini with a face like a horse.” After her death she became a horse-faced Yakkhini and dwelt in a rock-cave in a vast forest at the foot of a mountain, and used to catch and devour the men that frequented the road leading from the east to the western border.

After serving Vessavaṇa three years, it is said, she got leave to eat people in a certain space, thirty leagues long by five leagues broad. Now one day a rich, wealthy, handsome brahmin, accompanied by a large suite, ascended that road. The Yakkhini, on seeing him, with a loud laugh rushed upon him, and his attendants all fled. With the speed of the wind she seized the brahmin and threw him on her back, and in entering the cave, through coming into contact with the man, under the influence of passion she conceived an affection for him, and instead of devouring him she made him her husband, and they lived harmoniously together. And thenceforth the Yakkhini, whenever she captured men, also took their clothes and rice and oil and the like, and serving him with various dainty food she herself would eat the man’s flesh. And whenever she went away, for fear of his escaping, she closed the mouth of the cave with a huge stone before leaving.

And while they were thus living amicably together, the Bodhisatta passing from his former existence was conceived in the womb of the Yakkhini by the brahmin. After ten months she gave birth to a son, and filled with love for the brahmin and her child, she fed them both. By and by when the boy was grown up, she put him also inside the cave with his father, and closed the door. Now one day the Bodhisatta knowing she had gone away removed the stone and let his father out. And when she asked on her return who had removed the stone, he said: “I did, mother: we cannot sit in darkness.” And through love for her child she did not say another word.

Now one day the Bodhisatta asked his father, saying: “Dear father, your mouth is different from my mother’s; what is the reason?” “My son, your mother is a Yakkhini and lives on man’s flesh, but you and I are men.” “If so, why do we live here? Come, we will go to the haunts of men.” “My dear boy, if we shall try to escape, your mother will kill us both.” The Bodhisatta reassured his father and said: “Do not be afraid, dear father; that you shall return to the haunts of men.

767 The lord of Yakkhas.
shall be my charge.” And next day when his mother had gone away, he took his father and fled.

When the Yakkhini returned and missed them, she rushed forward with the swiftness of the wind and caught them and said: “O brahmin, why do you run away? Is there anything that you want here?” “My dear,” he said, “do not be angry with me. Your son carried me off with him.” And without another word, owing to her love for her child, she comforted them and making for her place of abode she brought them back after a flight of some days. The Bodhisatta thought: “My mother must have a limited sphere of action. Suppose I were to ask her the limits of space over which her authority extends. Then I will escape by going beyond this.” So one day sitting respectfully near his mother he said: “My dear, that which belongs to a mother comes to the children; tell me now what is the boundary of our ground.” She told him all the landmarks, mountains and such like in all directions, and pointed out to her son the space, thirty leagues long and five leagues broad, and said: “Consider it to be so much, my son.”

After the lapse of two or three days, when his mother had gone to the forest, he put his father on his shoulder and rushing on with the swiftness of the wind, by the hint given him by his mother, he reached the bank of the river that was the limit. The mother too, when on her return she missed them, pursued after them. The Bodhisatta carried his father into the middle of the river, and she came and stood on the river bank, and when she saw that they had passed beyond the limits of her sphere, she stopped where she was, and cried, “My dear child, come here with your father. What is my offence? In what respect do things not go well with you? Come back, my lord.” Thus did she beseech her child and husband. So the brahmin crossed the river. She prayed to her child also, and said: “Dear son, do not act after this sort: come back again.” “Mother, we are men: you are a Yakkhini. We cannot always abide with you.” “And will you not return?” “No, mother.” “Then if you refuse to return – as it is painful to live in the world of men, and they who know not any craft cannot live – I am skilled in the lore of the philosopher’s stone: by its power, one can follow after the lapse of twelve years in the steps of those that have gone away. This will prove a livelihood to you. Take, my child, this invaluable charm.” And though overcome by such great sorrow, through love of her child, she gave him the charm.
The Bodhisatta, still standing in the river, folded his hands turtle-wise and took the charm, and saluting his mother cried, “Good-bye, mother.” The Yakkhini said: “If you do not return, my son, I cannot live,” and she smote upon her breast, and straightaway in sorrow for her son her heart was broken and she fell down dead on the spot. The Bodhisatta, when he knew his mother was dead, called to his father and went and made a funeral pile and burned her body. After extinguishing the flames, he made offerings of various coloured flowers, and with weeping and lamentation returned with his father to Benares.

It was told the king, “A youth skilled in tracking footsteps is standing at the door.” And when the king bade him enter, he came in and saluted the king. “My friend,” he said, “do you know any craft?” “My lord, following on the track of one who has stolen any property even twelve years ago, I can catch him.” “Then enter my service,” said the king. “I will serve you for a thousand pieces of money daily.” “Very well, friend, you shall serve me.” And the king had him paid a thousand pieces of money daily.

Now one day the family priest said to the king, “My lord, because this youth does nothing by the power of his art, we do not know whether he has any skill or not: we will now test him.” The king readily agreed, and the pair gave notice to the keepers of the various treasures, and taking the most valuable jewels descended from the terrace, and after groping their way three times round the palace, they placed a ladder on the top of the wall and by means of it descended to the outside. Then they entered the Hall of Justice, and after sitting there they returned and again placing the ladder on the wall descended by it into the city. Coming to the edge of a tank they thrice marched solemnly round it, and then dropped their treasure in the tank, and climbed back to the terrace.

Next day there was a great outcry and men said: “Treasure has been stolen from the palace.” The king pretending ignorance summoned the Bodhisatta and said: “Friend, much valuable treasure has been stolen from the palace: we must trace it.” “My lord, for one who is able to follow the traces of robbers and recover treasure stolen twelve years ago, there is nothing marvellous in his recovering stolen property after a single day and night. I will recover it; do not be troubled.” “Then recover it, friend.” “Very well, my lord,” he said, and went and saluting his mother’s memory he repeated the spell, still standing on the terrace, and said: “My lord, the steps of two thieves are to be seen.” And following in the steps of the king and the priest he entered the royal closet, and issuing thence he descended from the terrace, and after thrice making a circuit of the palace he drew near the wall. Standing on it he said: “My lord, starting in this place from the wall I see footsteps in the air: bring me a ladder.” And having had a ladder placed for him against the wall, he descended by it, and still following in their track he came to the Hall of Justice. Then returning to the palace he had the ladder planted against the wall, and descending by it he came to the tank. After thrice marching round it he said: “My lord, the thieves went down into this tank,” and taking out the treasure, as if he had deposited it there himself, he gave it to the king and said: “My lord, these two thieves are men of distinction: by this way they climbed up into the palace.”

The people snapped their fingers in a high state of delight, and there was a great waving of cloths. The king thought: “This youth, I think, by following in their steps knows the place where the thieves put the treasure, but the thieves he cannot catch.” Then he said: “You at once brought us the property carried off by the thieves, but will you be able to catch the thieves and bring them to us?” “My lord, the thieves are here: they are not far off.” {3.507} “Who are they?” “Great king, let any one that likes be the thief. From the time you recovered your treasure, why should you want the thieves? Do not ask about that.” “Friend, I pay you daily a thousand pieces of money: bring the thieves to me.” “Sire, when the treasure is recovered, what need of the thieves?” “It is better, friend, for us to catch the thieves than to recover the treasure.” “Then, sire, I will not tell you, ‘So and so are the thieves,’ but I will tell you a thing that happened long ago. If you are wise, you will know what it means.” And herewith he told a story of the past.

In the past, sire, a certain dancer named Pāṭala lived not far from Benares, in a village on the river’s bank. One day he went into Benares with his wife and after gaining money by his singing and dancing, at the end of the fete he procured some rice and strong drink. On his way to his own village he came to the bank of the river, and sat down watching the freshly flowing stream, to drink his strong drink. When he was drunk and unconscious of his weakness, he said: “I will fasten my big lute about my neck and go down into the river.” And he took his [3.302] wife by the hand and went down into the river. The water entered into the holes of the lute, and then the weight of his lute made him begin to sink. But when his wife saw he was sinking, she let go of him and went up out of the river and stood upon the bank. The dancer Pāṭala now rises and now sinks, and his belly became swollen from swallowing the water. So his wife thought: “My husband will now die: I will beg of him one song, and by singing this in the midst of the people, I shall earn my living.” And saying: “My lord, you are sinking in the water: give me just one song, and I will earn my living by it,” she spoke this verse: {3.508}

1. “O Pāṭala, by Ganges swept away,
   Famous in dance and, skilled in roundelay,
   Pāṭala, all hail! As you are borne along,
   Sing me, I pray, some little snatch of song.”

Then the dancer Pāṭala said: “My dear, how shall I give you a little song? The water that has been the refuge of the people is killing me,” and he spoke a verse:

2. “Wherewith are sprinkled fainting souls in pain,
   I straight am killed. My refuge proved my bane.”

The Bodhisatta in explanation of this verse said: “Sire, even as water is the refuge of the people, so also is it with kings. If danger arises from them, who shall avert that danger? This, sire, is a secret matter. I have told a story intelligible to the wise: understand it, sire.” “Friend, I understand not a hidden story like this. Catch the thieves and bring them to me.” Then the Bodhisatta said: “Hear then this, sire, and understand.”

And he told yet another tale.

“My lord, formerly in a village outside the city gates of Benares, a potter used to fetch clay for his pottery, and constantly getting it in the same place he dug a deep pit inside a mountain cave. Now one day while he was getting the clay, an unseasonable storm-cloud sprang up, and let fall a heavy rain, and the flood overwhelmed and threw down the side of the pit, and the man’s head was broken by it. Loudly lamenting he spoke this verse:

3. “That by which seeds do grow, man to sustain,
   Has crushed my head. My refuge proved my bane.”

“For even as the mighty earth, sire, which is the refuge of the people, broke the potter’s head, even so when a king, who like the mighty earth is the refuge of the whole world, rises up and plays the thief, who shall avert the danger? Can you, sire, {3.509} recognize the thief hidden under the guise of this story?” “Friend, we do not want any hidden meaning. Say, ‘Here is the thief,’ and catch him and hand him over to me.”

Still shielding the king and without saying in words, “You are the thief,” he told yet another story. [3.303]

In this very city, sire, a certain man’s house was on fire. He ordered another man to go into the house and bring out his property. When this man had entered the house and was bringing out his goods, the door was shut. Blinded with smoke and unable to find his way out and tormented by the rising flame, he remained inside lamenting, and spoke this verse:

4. “That which destroys the cold, and parches grain, Consumes my limbs. My refuge proves my bane.”

“A man, O king, who like fire was the refuge of the people, stole the bundle of jewels. Do not ask me about the thief.” “Friend, just bring me the thief.”

Without telling the king that he was a thief, he told yet another story.

Once, sire, in this very city a man ate to excess and was unable to digest his food. Maddened with pain and lamenting he spoke this verse:

5. “Food on which countless brahmins life sustain Killed me outright. My refuge proved my bane.”

“One, who like rice, sire, was the refuge of the people, stole the property. When that is recovered, why ask about the thief?” “Friend, if you can, bring me the thief.”

To make the king comprehend, he told yet another story. (3.510)

Formerly, sire, in this very city a wind arose and broke a certain man’s limbs. Lamenting he spoke this verse:

6. “Wind that in June wise men by prayer would gain,
My limbs does break. My refuge proved my bane.”

“Thus, sire, did danger arise from my refuge. Understand this story.” “Friend, bring me the thief.”

To make the king understand, he told him yet another story.
In the past, sire, on the side of the Himālayas grew a tree with forked branches, the dwelling-place of countless birds. Two of its boughs rubbed against one another. Hence arose smoke, and sparks of fire were let fall. On seeing this the chief bird uttered this verse:

7. “Flame issues from the tree where we have lain: Scatter, you birds. Our refuge proves our bane.”

“For just as, sire, the tree is the refuge of birds, so is the king the refuge of his people. Should he play the thief, who shall avert the danger? Take note of this, sire.” “Friend, only bring me the thief.”

Then he told the king yet another story.

In a village of Benares, sire, on the western side of a gentleman’s house was a river full of savage crocodiles, and in this family was an only son, who on the death of his father watched over his mother. His mother against his will brought home a gentleman’s daughter as his wife. At first she showed affection for her mother-in-law, but afterwards when blessed with numerous sons and daughters of her own, she wished to get rid of her. Her own mother also lived in the same house. In her husband’s presence she found all manner of fault with her mother-in-law, to prejudice him against her, saying: “I cannot possibly support your mother: you must kill her.” And when he answered, “Murder is a serious matter: how am I to kill her?” she said: “When she has fallen asleep, we will take her, bed and all, and throw her into the crocodile river. Then the crocodiles will make an end of her.” “And where is your mother?” he said. “She sleeps in the same room as your mother.” “Then go and set a mark on the bed on which she lies, by fastening a rope on it.” She did so, and said: “I have put a mark on it.” The husband said: “Excuse me a moment; let the people go to bed first.” And he lay down pretending to go to sleep, and then went and fastened the rope on his mother-in-law’s bed. Then he woke his wife, and they went together and lifting her up, bed and all, threw her into the river. And the crocodiles there killed and ate her.

Next day she found out what had happened to her own mother and said: “My lord, my mother is dead, now let us kill yours.” “Very well then,” he said, “we will make a funeral pile in the cemetery, and cast her into the fire and kill her.” So the man and his wife took her while she was asleep to the cemetery, and deposited her there. Then the husband said to his wife, “Have you brought any fire?” “I have forgotten it, my lord.” “Then go and fetch it.” “I dare not go, my lord, and if you go, I dare not stay here: we will go together.” When they were gone, the old woman was awakened by the cold wind, and finding it was a cemetery, she thought: “They wish to kill me: they are gone to fetch fire. They do not know how strong I am.” And she stretched a corpse on the bed and covered it over with a cloth, and ran away and hid herself in a mountain cave in that same place.

The husband and wife brought the fire and taking the corpse to be the old woman they burned it and went away. A certain robber had left his bundle in this mountain cave and coming back to fetch it he saw the old woman and thought: “This must be a Yakkhini: my bundle is possessed by Amanussas,” and he fetched a witch-doctor. The doctor uttered a spell and entered the cave. Then she said to him, “I am no Yakkhini: come, we will enjoy this treasure together.” “How is this to be believed?” “Place your tongue on my tongue.” He did so, and she bit a piece off his tongue and let it drop to the ground. The witch-doctor thought: “This is certainly a Yakkhini,” and he cried aloud and fled away, with the blood dripping from his tongue. [3.512]

Next day the old woman put on a clean undergarment and took the bundle of all sorts of jewels and went home. The daughter-in-law on seeing her asked, “Where, mother, did you get this?” “My dear, all that are burned on a wooden pile in this cemetery receive [3.305] the same.” “My dear mother, can I too get this?” “If you become like me, you will.” So without saying a word to her husband, in her desire for a lot of ornaments to wear, she went there and burned herself. Her husband next day missed her and said: “My dear mother, at this time of day is not your daughter-in-law coming?” Then she reproached him saying: “Fie! You bad man, how do the dead come back?” And she uttered this verse:

8. “A maiden fair, with wreath upon her head,
Fragrant with sandal oil, by me was led
A happy bride within my home to reign:
She drove me forth. My refuge proved my bane.”

“As the daughter-in-law, sire, is to the mother-in-law, so is the king a refuge to his people. If danger arises thence, what can one do? Take note of this, sire.” “Friend, I do not understand the things you tell me: only bring me the thief.”
He thought: “I will shield the king,” and he told yet another story.

Of old, sire, in this very city a man in answer to his prayer had a son. At his birth the father was full of joy and gladness at the thought of having got a son, and cherished him. When the boy was grown up, he wedded him to a wife, and by and by he himself grew old and could not undertake any work. So his son said: “You cannot do any work: you must go from hence,” and he drove him out of the house. With great difficulty he kept himself alive on alms, and lamenting he uttered this verse:

9. “He for whose birth I longed, nor longed in vain,
Drives me from home. My refuge proved my bane.”

“He for whose birth I longed, nor longed in vain,
Drives me from home. My refuge proved my bane.”

“Just as an aged father, sire, ought to be cared for by an able-bodied son, so too ought all the people to be protected by the king, and this danger now present has arisen from the king, who is the guardian of all men. Know, sire, from this fact that the thief is so and so.”

“I do not understand this, be it fact or no fact: either bring me the thief, or you yourself must be the thief.”

Thus did the king again and again question the youth. So he said to him, “Would you, sire, really like the thief to be caught?” “Yes, friend.” “Then I will proclaim it in the midst of the assembly, So and So is the thief.” “Do so, friend.” On hearing his words he thought: “This king does not allow me to shield him: I will now catch the thief.” And when the people had gathered together, he addressed them and spoke these verses:

10. “Let town and country folk assembled all give ear,
Lo! Water is ablaze. From safety cometh fear.

11. The plundered realm may well of king and priest complain;
Henceforth protect yourselves. Your refuge proves your bane.”

When they heard what he said, people thought: “The king, though he ought to have protected others, threw the blame on another. After he had with his own hands placed his treasure in the tank, he went about looking for the thief. That he may not in future go on playing the part of a thief, we will kill this wicked king.” So they rose up with sticks and clubs in their hands, and then and there beat the king and the priest till they died. But they anointed the Bodhisatta and set him on the throne.

The Teacher, after relating this story to illustrate the Truths, said: “Lay brother, there is nothing marvellous in recognizing footsteps on the earth: sages of old recognized them in the air,” and he identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the lay brother and his son attained to fruition of the First Path, “In those days the father was Kassapa, the youth skilled in footsteps was myself.”

Ja 433 Lomasakassapajātaka

The Story about (the Ascetic) Lomasakassapa (9s)

In the present one monk longs to return to the lay life. The Buddha tells a story of an ascetic of old who was tempted to perform a sacrifice through desire for a princess, but realised his projected deed was wrong, and repented of it.

The Bodhisatta = (the ascetic) Lomasakassapa (Lomasakassapa), Sāriputta = the great minister (mahā-amacca).

Keywords: Sacrifice, Desire, Devas, Women.

“A king like Sakka.” This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a worldly-minded monk. The Teacher asked him if he were longing for the world, and when he admitted that it was so, the Teacher said: “Monk, even men of the highest fame sometimes incur infamy. Defilements like these defile even pure beings; much more one like you.” And then he told a story of the past.

In the past prince Brahmadatta, son of Brahmadatta king of Benares, and the son of his family priest named Kassapa, (3.515) were schoolmates and learned all the sciences in the house of the same teacher. By and by the young prince on his father’s death was established in the kingdom. Kassapa thought: “My friend has become king, he will bestow great power on me, what have I to do with power? I will take leave of the king and my parents, and become an ascetic.” So he went into the Himālayas and adopted the ascetic life, and on the seventh day he entered on the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and gained his living by what he gleaned in the fields. And men nicknamed the ascetic Lomasakassapa (Hairy Kassapa).
With his senses mortified he became an ascetic of [3.307] grim austerity. And by virtue of his austerity the abode of Sakka was shaken. Sakka, reflecting on the cause, observed him and thought: “This ascetic, by the exceedingly fierce fire of his virtue, would make me fall even from the abode of Sakka. After a secret interview with the king of Benares, I will break down his austerity.” By the power of a Sakka he entered the royal closet of the king of Benares at midnight and illuminated all the chamber with the radiance of his form, and standing in the air before the king he woke him up and said: “Sire, arise,” and when the king asked, “Who are you?” he answered, “I am Sakka.” “Wherefore are you come?” “Sire, do you desire sole rule in all Jambudīpa or not?” “Of course I do.” So Sakka said: “Then bring Lomasakassapa here and bid him offer a sacrifice of slain beasts, and you shall become, like Sakka, exempt from old age and death, and exercise rule throughout all Jambudīpa,” and he repeated the first verse:

1. “A king like Sakka you shall be,
   Ne’er doomed old age or death to see,
   Should Kassapa by your advice
   Offer a living sacrifice.”

On hearing his words the king readily assented. Sakka said: “Then make no delay,” and so departed. [3.516] Next day the king summoned a councillor named Sayha and said: “Good sir, go to my dear friend Lomasakassapa and in my name speak thus to him, “The king by persuading you to offer a sacrifice will become sole ruler in all Jambudīpa, and he will grant you as much land as you desire, come with me to offer sacrifice.”” He answered, “Very well, sire,” and made proclamation by beat of drum to learn the place where the ascetic dwelt, and when a certain forester said: “I know,” Sayha went there under his guidance with a large following, and saluting the sage sat respectfully on one side and delivered his message. Then he said to him, “Sayha, what is this you say?” and refusing him he spoke these four verses: 768

2. “No island realm, safe-guarded in the sea,
   Shall tempt me, Sayha, to this cruelty.

768 These verses occur in No. 310 supra, in a different context.
3. A curse upon the lust of fame and gain,
Whence spring the defilements that lead to pain.

4. Better, as homeless waif, to beg one’s bread
Than by a crime bring shame upon my head.

5. Yea better, bowl in hand, to flee from wrong
Than by such cruelty a kingdom win.”

The councillor, after hearing what he said, went and told the king. Thought the king, “Should he refuse to come, what can I do?” and kept silent. But Sakka at midnight came and stood in the air and said, “Why, sire, do you not send for Lomasakassapa and bid him offer sacrifice?” “When he is sent for, he refuses to come.” “Sire, adorn your daughter, princess Candavatī, and send her by the hand of Sayha and bid him say, ‘If you will come and offer sacrifice, the king will give you this maiden to wife.’ Clearly he will be struck with love of the maiden and will come.” The king readily agreed, and next day sent his daughter by the hand of Sayha.

Sayha took the king’s daughter and went there, and after the usual salutation and compliments to the sage, he presented to him the princess, as lovely as a Devaccharā, and stood at a respectful distance. The ascetic losing his moral sense looked at her, and with the mere look he fell away from meditation. The councillor seeing that he was smitten with love said: “Your reverence, if you will offer sacrifice, the king will give you this maiden to wife.” He trembled with the power of passion and said: “Will he surely give her to me?” “Yes, if you offer sacrifice, he will.” “Very well,” he said: “If I get her, I will sacrifice,” and taking her with him, just as he was, ascetic locks and all, he mounted a splendid chariot and went to Benares.

But the king, as soon as he heard he was certainly coming, prepared for the ceremony in the sacrificial pit. So when he saw that he was come, he said: “If you offer sacrifice, I shall become equal to Sakka, and when the sacrifice is completed, I will give you my daughter.” Kassapa readily assented. So the king next day went with Candavatī to the sacrificial pit. There all four-footed beasts, elephants, horses, bulls and the rest were placed in a line. Kassapa attempted to offer sacrifice by killing and slaying them all. Then the people that were gathered together there said, \{3.518\} “This is not proper or befitting you, Lomasakassapa, why do you act thus?” And lamenting they uttered two verses:

6. “Both sun and moon bear potent sway,
And tides no power on earth can stay,
Brahmins and priests almighty are,
But womankind is mightier far.

7. E’en so Candavatī did win
Grim Kassapa to deadly wrong,
And urged him by her sire’s device
To offer living sacrifice.”\textsuperscript{769}

At this moment Kassapa, to offer sacrifice, lifted up his precious sword to strike the royal elephant on the neck. The elephant at the sight of the sword, terrified with the fear of death, uttered a loud cry. On hearing his cry the other beasts too, elephants, horses, and bulls through fear of death uttered loud cries, and the people also cried aloud. Kassapa, on hearing these loud cries, grew excited and reflected on his matted hair. Then he became conscious of matted locks and beard, and the hair upon his body \[3.309\] and breast. Full of remorse he cried, “Alas, I have done a sinful deed, unbecoming my character,” and showing his emotion he spoke the eighth verse: \{3.519\}

8. “This cruel act is of desire the fruit;
The growth of lust I’ll cut down to the root.”

Then the king said: “Friend, fear not, offer the sacrifice, and I will now give you the princess Candavatī, and my kingdom and a pile of the seven treasures.” On hearing this Kassapa said: “Sire, I do not want this defilement,” and spoke the concluding verse:

\textsuperscript{769} See Weber, \textit{Ind. Stud.} x. 348.
9. “Curse on the sensual desires upon this earth so rife,
    Better by far than these the ascetic life;
    I will forsaking wrong an ascetic be:
    Keep you your realm and fair Candavati.”

With these words he focused on the Meditation Object, and recovering discrimination sat cross-legged in the air, teaching the Dhamma to the king, and, admonishing him to be zealous in good works, he bade him destroy the sacrificial pit and grant an amnesty to the people. And at the king’s request, flying up into the air he returned to his own abode. And as long as he lived, he cultivated the Brahmā perfections and became destined to birth in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher having ended his lesson revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the worldly-minded monk became an Arahant, “In those days the great councillor Sayha was Sāriputta, Lomasakassapa was myself.”

Ja 434 Cakkavākajātaka

The Story about the Ruddy Geese

Alternative Title: Kākajātaka (Comm)

In the present one monk is very greedy in all his doings, troubling the supporters with his excessive needs. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who wanted to be as beautiful as the ruddy goose, and asked them what they ate, but was rebuked for the harm he caused to creatures by his omnivorous eating habits.

The Bodhisatta = the ruddy goose (cakkavāka),
Rāhulamātā = (his wife) the ruddy goose (cakkavākī),
the greedy monk = the crow (kāka).

Present Source: Ja 434 Cakkavāka,
Quoted at: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 260 Dūta, Ja 395 Kāka,
Past Compare: Ja 434 Cakkavāka, Ja 451 Cakkavāka.

Keywords: Greed, Harm.

“Twin pair of birds.” {3.520} This story the Teacher dwelling at Jetavana told concerning a greedy monk. He was, it was said, greedy after the requisites and casting off all duties of master and pastor, entered Sāvatthi quite early, and after drinking excellent rice-gruel served with many a kind of solid food in the house of Visākhā, and after eating in the daytime various dainties, paddy, meat and boiled rice, not satisfied with this he went about thence \[3.310\] to the house of Culla Anāthapiṇḍika, and the king of Kosala, and various others.

So one day a discussion was raised in the Dhamma Hall concerning his greediness. When the Teacher heard what they were discussing, he sent for that monk and asked him if it were true that he was greedy. And when he said: “Yes,” the Teacher asked, “Why, monk, are you greedy? Formerly too through your greediness, not being satisfied with the dead bodies of elephants, you left Benares and wandering about on the bank of the Ganges, entered the Himālayas.” And hereupon he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, a greedy crow went about eating the bodies of dead elephants, and not satisfied with them he thought: “I will eat the fat of fish on the bank of the Ganges,” and after staying a few days there eating dead fish he went into the Himālayas and lived on various kinds of wild fruits. Coming to a large lotus-tank abounding in fish and turtles, he saw there two golden-coloured geese who lived on the aquatic eelgrass plant. He thought: “These birds are very beautiful and well-favoured: their food must be delightful. I will ask them what it is, and by eating the same I too shall become golden-coloured.” So he went to them, and after the usual kindly greetings to them as they sat perched on the end of a bough, he spoke the first verse in connection with their praises:

1. “Twin pair of birds in yellow dressed,
   So joyous roaming to and fro;
   What kind of birds do men love best?
   This is what I would want to know.” \(3.521\)

The ruddy goose on hearing this spoke the second verse:
2. “O bird, of human kind the pest,
   We above other birds are blessed.
   All lands with our devotion ring
   And men and birds our praises sing.
   Know then that ruddy geese are we,
   And fearless wander o’er the sea.”

Hearing this the crow spoke the third verse:

3. “What fruits upon the sea abound,
   And whence may flesh for geese be found?
   Say on what heavenly food you live,
   Such beauty and such strength to give.”

Then the ruddy goose spoke the fourth verse:

4. “No fruits are on the sea to eat,
   And whence should ruddy geese have meat?
   Eelgrass plant, stripped of its skin,
   Yields food without a taint of sin.”

Then the crow spoke two verses:

5. “I like not, goose, the words you use:
   I once believed the food we choose
   To nourish us, ought to agree
   With what our outward form might be.

---

770 The ruddy goose, in the poetry of the Hindus, is their turtle-dove. See Wilson’s Meghadūta, p. 77.
771 By the word “sea” the Ganges is here intended.
6. But now I doubt it, for I eat
Rice, salt, and oil, and fruit, and meat:
As heroes feast returned from fight,
So I too in good cheer delight.
But though I live on dainty fare,
My looks with yours may not compare.” (3.523)

Then the ruddy goose told the reason why the crow failed to attain to personal beauty, while he himself attained to it, and spoke the remaining verses:

7. “Not satisfied with fruit, or garbage found Within the precincts of the charnel ground,
The greedy crow pursues in wanton flight
The casual prey that tempts his appetite.

8. But all that thus shall work their wicked will,
And for their pleasure harmless creatures kill,
Upbraided by their conscience pine away,
And see their strength and comeliness decay.

9. So happy beings that no creatures harm
In form gain vigour and in looks a charm,
For beauty surely be it understood
Depends not wholly on the kind of food.” (3.524)

Thus did the ruddy goose in many ways reproach the crow. And the crow having brought this reproach upon himself said: “I want not your beauty.” And with a cry of, “Caw, Caw,” he flew away.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, revealed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the greedy monk attained to fruition of the Second Path, “In those days the crow was the greedy monk, the female goose was the mother of Rāhula, the male goose myself.”

Ja 435 Haliddirāgajātaka

The Story about being Dyed with Passion (9s)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the monastic life through the temptations of a young woman. The Buddha tells a story of a woman who seduced a young ascetic who was then tempted to leave his way of life, until his father persuaded him otherwise.

The Bodhisatta = the father ascetic (pitā tāpaso),
the dissatisfied monk = the young ascetic (tāpasakumāra),
the sensual woman = the young woman (kumārikā).

Present Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 30 Muṇika, Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 286 Sālūka, Ja 348 Arañña, Ja 435 Haliddirāga,
Present Compare: Vin Mv 1 (1.35),
Past Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Past Quoted at: Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 435 Haliddirāga.

Keywords: Lust, Sensuality, Women.

“In lonesome forest.” This story the Teacher at Jetavana told about a youth who was tempted by a certain coarse maiden. The introductory story will be found in the Thirteenth Book in the Cullanāradajātaka [Ja 477].

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.”

At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma

[772 [I include the Introductory story here, and part of the actual Jātaka, which is missing otherwise.]
and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.” “Is this true which they say,” asked he, “that you are discontented, monk?” “Yes, sir, true it is.” “Then what made you so?” “A sensual girl, sir.” “Monk,” said he, “long, long ago, when you were living in the forest, this same girl was a hindrance to your holiness, and did you great harm; then why are you again discontented on her account?” Then at the request of the monks he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family of great wealth, and after his education was finished managed the estate. Then his wife brought forth a son, and died. He thought: “As with my beloved wife, so with me death shall not be ashamed; 773 what is a home to me? I will become an ascetic.” So forsaking his sensual desires, he went with his son to the Himālayas; and there with him entered upon the ascetic life, developed the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and dwelt in the woods, supporting life on fruits and roots.

At that time the borderers raided the countryside; and having assailed a town, and taken prisoners, laden with spoil they returned to the border. Amongst them was a maiden, beautiful, but endowed with all a deceitful person’s cunning. This girl thought to herself, “These men, when they have carried us off home, will use us as slaves; I must find some way to escape.” So she said: “My lord, I wish to retire; let me go and stay away for a moment.” Thus she deceived the robbers, and fled.

Now the Bodhisatta had gone out to fetch fruits and the like, leaving his son in the hut.

Now in the old legend this maiden knew that if the young ascetic should break the moral law, he would be in her power, and thinking to cajole him and bring him back to the haunts of men, she said: “Virtue that is safe-guarded in a forest, where the qualities of sense such as beauty and the like have no existence, does not prove very fruitful, but it bears abundant fruit in the haunts of men, in the immediate presence of beauty and the like. So come with me and guard your virtue there. What have you to do with a forest?” And she uttered the first verse:

1. “In lonesome forest one may well be pure,
'\text{Tis easy there temptation to endure;}
But in a village with seductions rife,
A man may rise to a far nobler life.”

On hearing this the young ascetic said: “My father is gone into the forest. When he returns, I will ask his leave and then accompany you.” She thought, \(3.525\) “He has a father, it seems; if he should find me here, he will strike me with the end of his carrying-pole and kill me, I must be off beforehand.” So she said to the youth, “I will start on the road before you, and leave a trail behind me, you are to follow me.” When she had left him, he neither fetched wood, nor brought water to drink, but just sat meditating, and when his father arrived, he did not go out to meet him. So the father knew that his son had fallen into the power of a woman and he said: “Why, my son, did you neither fetch wood nor bring me water to drink, nor food to eat, but why do you do nothing but sit and meditate?” The youthful ascetic said: “Father, men say that virtue that has to be guarded in a forest is not very fruitful, but that it brings forth much fruit in the haunts of men. I will go and guard my virtue there. My companion has gone forward, bidding me follow: so I will go with my companion. But when I am dwelling there, what manner of man am I to affect?” And asking this question he spoke the second verse:

\[773\text{ i.e. it shall master me too one day.}\]

2. “This doubt, my father, solve for me, I pray;
If to some village from this wood I stray,
Men of what school of morals, or what sect
Shall I most wisely for my friends affect?”

Then his father spoke and repeated the rest of the verses:

3. “One that can gain your confidence and love,
Can trust your word, and with you patient prove,
4. In thought and word and deed will ne’er offend –
Take to your heart and cling to him as friend.
5. To men capricious as the monkey kind,
And found unstable, be not you inclined,
6. Though to some wilderness your lot’s confined. [3.313]
Eschew foul ways, e’en as you would keep clear
7-8. Of angry serpent, or as charioteer {3.526}
Avoids a rugged road. Sorrows abound
Whene’er a man in folly’s train is found:

[774] [Verses 2-5 correspond to verses 1-4 in Ja 328. 6-8 are additional.]
9. Consort not you with fools – my voice obey –
The fool’s companion is to grief a prey.”

Being thus admonished by his father, the youth said: “If I should go to the haunts of men, I should not find sages like you. I dread going there. I will dwell here in your presence.” Then his father admonished him still further and taught him how to focus on the Meditation Object. And before long, the son developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and with his father became destined to birth in the Brahmā World.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, proclaimed the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the monk who longed for the world attained to fruition of the First Path, “In those days the young ascetic was the worldly-minded monk, the maiden then is the maiden now, but the father was myself.”

Ja 436 Samuggajātaka

The Story about the Casket (9s)

Alternative Title: Karaṇḍakajātaka (Comm)

In the present through desire for a woman a monk thinks to return to the lay life. The Buddha tells a story of a Rakkhasa who fell in love with a beautiful woman, and kept her in a casket in his belly. Still she found a way to cheat on him!

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic with divine sight (dibbacakkhukatāpasa).

Keywords: Lust, Sensuality, Devas, Women.

“Whence come you, friends.” [3.312] {3.527} This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Jetavana, told of a worldly-minded monk. The Teacher, they say, asked him if it were true that he was hankering after the world, and on his confessing that it was so, he said: “Why, monk, do you desire a woman? Verily woman is wicked and ungrateful. Of old Rakkhasas swallowed women, and though they guarded them in their belly, they could not keep them faithful to one man. How then will you be able to do so?” And hereupon he related a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta foregoing sinful pleasures entered the Himālayas and adopted the ascetic life. And he dwelt there living on wild fruits, and developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments.
Not far from his hut of leaves lived a Rakkhasa. From time to time he drew near to the Great Being and listened to the Dhamma, but taking his stand in the forest on the high road where men gathered together, he caught and ate them.

At this time a certain noble lady in the kingdom of Kāsi, of exceeding beauty, settled in a frontier village. One day she went to visit her parents, and as she was returning this Rakkhasa caught sight of the men that formed her escort and rushed upon them in a terrible form. The men let fall the weapons in their hands and took to flight. The Rakkhasa on seeing the lovely woman seated in the chariot, fell in love with her, and carrying her off to his cave made her his wife. Thenceforth he brought her ghee, husked rice, fish, flesh, and the like, as well as ripe fruit to eat, and arrayed her in robes and ornaments, and in order to keep her safe he put her in a box which he swallowed, and so guarded her in his belly.

One day he wished to bathe, and coming to the tank he threw up the box and taking her out of it he bathed and anointed her, and when he had dressed her he said: “For a short time enjoy yourself in the open air,” and without suspecting any harm he went a little distance and bathed. At this time the son of Vāyu, who was a magician, girt about with a sword, was walking through the air. When she saw him, she put her hands in a certain position and signed to him to come to her. The magician quickly descended to the ground. Then she placed him in the box, and sat down on it, waiting the approach of the Rakkhasa, and as soon as she saw him coming, before he had drawn near to the box, she opened it, and getting inside lay over the magician, and wrapped her garment about him. The Rakkhasa came and without examining the box, thought it was only the woman, and swallowed the box and set out for his cave. While on the road he thought: “It is a long time since I saw the ascetic, I will go today and pay my respects to him.” So he went to visit him. The ascetic, spying him while he was still a long way off, knew that there were two people in the Rakkhasa’s belly, and uttering the first verse, he said:
1. “Whence come you, friends?
Right welcome all you three!
Be pleased to rest with me awhile,
I pray: I trust you live at ease and happily;
’Tis long since any of you passed this way.”

On hearing this the Rakkhasa thought: “I have come quite alone to see this ascetic, and he speaks of three people: what does he mean? Does he speak from knowing the exact state of things, or is he mad and talking foolishly?” Then he drew near to the ascetic, and saluted him, and sitting at a respectful distance he conversed with him and spoke the second verse: {3.529}

2. “I’ve come to visit you alone today,
Nor does a creature bear me company.
Why do you then, O holy ascetic, say,
Whence come you, friends?
Right welcome, all you three.” [3.315]

Said the ascetic, “Do you really wish to hear the reason?” “Yes, venerable sir.” “Hear then,” he said, and spoke the third verse:

3. “Thyself and your dear wife are twain, be sure;
Enclosed within a box she lies secure:
Safe-guarded ever in your belly, she
With Vāyu’s son does sport her merrily.”

On hearing this the Rakkhasa thought: “Magicians surely are full of tricks: supposing his sword should be in his hand, he will rip open my belly and make his escape.” And being greatly alarmed he threw up the box and placed it before him.

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening to make the matter clear, repeated the fourth verse:

4. “The Rakkhasa by the sword, greatly terrified,
And from his maw disgorged the box upon the ground; {3.530}
His wife, with lovely wreath adorned as if a bride,
With Vāyu’s son disporting merrily was found.”

No sooner was the box opened than the magician muttered a spell and seizing his sword sprang up into the air. On seeing this, the Rakkhasa was so pleased with the Great Being that he repeated the remaining verses, inspired mainly with his praises:

5. “O stern ascetic, your clear vision saw
   How low poor man, a woman’s slave, may sink;
   As life itself tho’ guarded in my maw,
   The wretch did play the wanton, as I think.

6. I tended her with care both day and night,
   As forest ascetic cherishes a flame,
   And yet she did wrong, beyond all sense of right:
   To do with woman needs must end in shame.

7. I thought within my body, hid from sight,
   She must be mine – but ‘Wanton’ was her name –
   And so she did wrong beyond all sense of right:
   To do with woman needs must end in shame.

8. Man with her thousand wiles does vainly cope,
   In vain he trusts that his defence is sure;
   Like precipices down to Hell that slope,
   Poor careless souls she does to doom allure.

9. The man that shuns the path of womankind
   Lives happily and from all sorrow free;
   He his true bliss in solitude will find,
   Afar from woman and her treachery.” {3.531}

With these words the Rakkhasa fell at the feet of the Great Being, and praised him, saying: “Venerable sir, through you my life was saved. Owing to that wicked woman I was nearly killed by the magician.” Then the Bodhisatta expounded the Dhamma to him, saying: “Do no harm to her: [3.316] keep the Precepts,” and established him in the Five Precepts. The Rakkhasa said: “Though I guarded her in my belly, I could not keep her safe. Who else will keep her?” So he let her go, and returned straight to his forest home.

The Teacher, his lesson ended, proclaimed the Truths, and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths the worldly-minded monk attained fruition of the First Path, “In those days the ascetic with Supernormal Powers of sight was myself.”
The Story about (the Jackal) Pūtimāṇsa (9s)

In the present many monks live without guarding their senses. The Buddha tells a story of how a pair of jackals tried to fool a goat so they could capture and eat her, and how she scared them off.

The Bodhisatta = the Devatā who lived in an old forest tree (vanajethakarukkhe nibbattadavatā).

Keywords: Deception, Appearances, Devas, Animals.

“Why thus does Pūtimāṇsa.” [3.532] This was a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana concerning the subjugation of the senses. For at one time there were many monks who kept no guard over the avenues of the senses. The Teacher said to the elder Ānanda, “I must admonish these monks,” and owing to their want of self-restraint he called together the assembly of the monks, and seated in the middle of a richly-adorned couch he thus addressed them, “Monks, it is not right that a monk under the influence of personal beauty should set his affections on mental or physical attributes, for should he die at such a moment, he is reborn in hell and the like evil states; therefore set not your affections on material forms and the like. A monk ought not to feed his mind on mental and physical attributes. They who do so even in this present condition of things are utterly ruined. Therefore it is good, monks, that the eye of the senses should be touched as with a red-hot iron pin.”

And here he gave other details, adding, “There is a time for you to regard beauty, and a time to disregard it: at the time of regarding it, regard it not under the influence of what is agreeable, but of what is disagreeable. Thus will you not fall away from your proper sphere. What then is this sphere of yours? Even the Four Ways of Mindfulness, the four Right Efforts, the four Supernormal Powers, the Noble Eight-fold Path, the nine Supermundane Attainments. If you walk in this your proper domain, Māra will not find an entrance, but if you are subject to passion and regard things under the influence of personal beauty, like the jackal Pūtimāṇsa, you will fall away from your true sphere,” and with these words he related a story of the past.
In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, many hundreds of wild goats dwelt in a mountain cave in a wooded district on the slopes of the Himālayas. Not far from their place of abode a jackal named Pūtimaṁsa [Rotten Meat] with his wife Veṇī [Braided Hair] lived in a cave. One day as he was ranging about with his wife, he spied those goats and thought: “I must find some means to eat the flesh of these goats,” and by some device he killed a single goat. Both he and his wife by feeding on goat’s flesh waxed strong and gross of body. Gradually the goats diminished in number. {3.533}

Amongst them was a wise female goat named Meḷamātā [Goat Mother]. The jackal though he had skill in means could not kill her, and taking counsel with his wife he said: “My dear, all the goats have died out. We must devise how to eat this female goat. Now here is my plan. You are to go by yourself, and become friendly with her, and when confidence has sprung up between you, I will lie down and pretend to be dead. Then you are to draw nigh to the goat and say, “My dear, my husband is dead and I am desolate; except you I have no friend, come, let us weep and lament, and bury his body.” And with these words come and bring her with you. Then I will spring up and kill her by a bite in the neck.”

She readily agreed and after making friends with the goat, when confidence was established, she addressed her in the words suggested by her husband. The goat replied, “My dear, all my kinsfolk have been eaten by your husband. I am afraid; I cannot come.” “Do not be afraid; what harm can the dead do you?” “Your husband is cruel-minded; I am afraid.” But afterwards being repeatedly importuned the goat thought: “He certainly must be dead,” and consented to go with her. But on her way there she thought: “Who knows what will happen?” and being suspicious she made the female jackal go in front, keeping a sharp look-out for the jackal. He heard the sound of their steps and thought: “Here comes the goat,” and put up his head and rolling his eyes looked about him. The goat on seeing him do this said: “This wicked wretch wants to take me in and kill me, he lies there making a pretence of being dead,” and she turned about and fled. When the female jackal asked why she ran away, the goat gave the reason and spoke the first verse: {3.534}
1. “Why thus does Pūtimaṁsa stare?
    His look misliketh me:
    Of such a friend one should beware,
    And far away should flee.”

With these words she turned about and made straight for her own abode. And the female jackal, failing to stop her, was enraged with her, and went to her husband and sat down lamenting. Then the jackal rebuking her spoke the second verse:

2. “Veṇī, my wife, seems dull of wit,
    To boast of friends that she has made;
    Left in the lurch she can but sit
    And grieve, by MeJa’s art betrayed.” [3.318]

On hearing this the female jackal spoke the third verse:

3. “You too, my lord, were hardly wise,
    And, foolish creature, raised your head,
    Staring about with open eyes,
    Though feigning to be dead.”

4. “At fitting times they that are wise
    Know when to ope or close their eyes,
    Who look at the wrong moment, will,
    Like Pūtimaṁsa, suffer ill.”

This verse was spoken after Fully Awakening. [3.535]

But the female jackal comforted Pūtimaṁsa and said: “My lord, do not vex yourself, I will find a way to bring her here again, and when she comes, be on your guard and catch her.” Then she sought the goat and said: “My friend, your coming proved of service to us; for as soon as you appeared, my lord recovered consciousness, and he is now alive. Come and have friendly speech with him,” and so saying she spoke the fifth verse:
5. “Our former friendship, goat, once more revive,
And come with well-filled bowl to us, I pray,
My lord I took for dead is still alive,
With kindly greeting visit him today.”

The goat thought: “This wicked wretch wants to fool me. I must not act like an open foe; I will find means to deceive her,” and she spoke the sixth verse:

6. “Our former friendship to revive,
A well-filled bowl I gladly give:
With a big escort I shall come;
To feast us well, go hasten home.”

Then the female jackal inquired about her followers, and spoke the seventh verse:

7. “What kind of escort will you bring,
That I am bid to feast you well?
The names of all remembering
To us, I pray you, truly tell.”

The goat spoke the eighth verse and said:

8. “Hounds775 grey and tan, four-eyed one too,
With Jambuk form my escort true:
Go hurry home, and quick prepare
For all abundance of good fare.” [3.319] (3.536)

“Each of these,” she added, “is accompanied by five hundred dogs: so I shall appear with a guard of two thousand dogs. If they should not find food, they will kill and eat you and your mate.” On hearing this the female jackal was so frightened that she thought: “I have had quite enough of her coming to us; I will find means to stop her from coming,” and she spoke the ninth verse:

---

775 Maliya and Piṅgiya probably refer to the colour of the dogs; Caturakṣa is one of Yama’s dogs in the Rigveda; Jambuka is a spirit in the train of Skanda.
9. “Don’t leave your house, or else I fear
   Your goods will all soon disappear:
   I’ll take your greeting to my lord;
   Don’t stir, nay, not another word!”

With these words she ran in great haste, as for her life, and taking her lord with her, fled away. And they never did come back to that spot.

The Teacher here ended his lesson and identified the Jātaka, “In those days I was the divinity that dwelt there in an old forest tree.”

Ja 438 Tittirajātaka

The Story about the (Wise) Partridge (9s)

Alternative Title: Daddarajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are discussing about how Devadatta goes round trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story of how a partridge listened to a famous teacher and became learned in the Vedas, how a false ascetic killed and ate him, and the vengeance the bird’s friends took on him.

The Bodhisatta = the wise partridge (tittirapaṇḍita),
Mahākassapa = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo),
Sāriputta = the lion (sīha),
Moggallāna = the tiger (vyaggha),
Uppalavaṇṇā = the iguana (godhā),
Devadatta = the cheating matted-haired ascetic (kūṭaṭāṭila).

Keywords: Killing, Deception, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Your harmless offspring.” This story the Teacher, while dwelling at Vulture Peak, told concerning the going about of Devadatta to slay him. It was at this time that they started a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Alas, sirs, how shameless and base was Devadatta. Joining himself to Ajātasattu, he formed a plot to kill the excellent and supreme Buddha, by the hiring of archers, the hurling of a rock, and the letting loose of Nālāgiri.” The Teacher came and inquired of the monks what they were discussing in their assembly, and on being told what it was said, \{3.537\} “Not only now, but formerly too, Devadatta went about to kill me, but now he cannot so much as frighten me,” and he related a story of the past.
In the past in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, a world-renowned teacher at Benares gave instruction in science to five hundred young brahmins. One day he thought: “So long as I dwell here, I meet with hindrances to the ascetic life, and my pupils are not perfected in their studies. I will retire into a forest home on the slopes of the Himālayas and carry on my teaching there.” He told his pupils, and, bidding them bring sesame, husked rice, oil, garments and such like, he went into the forest and building a hut of leaves took up his abode close by the highway. His pupils too each built a hut for himself. Their kinsfolk sent rice and the like, and the natives of the country saying: “A famous teacher, they say, is living in such and such a place in the forest, and giving lessons in science,” brought presents of rice, and the foresters also offered their gifts, while a certain man gave a milking cow and a calf, to supply them with milk.

Now a lizard along with her two young ones came to dwell in the hut of the teacher, and a lion and a tiger ministered to him. A partridge too constantly resided there, and from hearing their master teach sacred texts to his pupils, the partridge got to know the three Vedas. And the young brahmins became very friendly with the bird. By and by before the youths had attained to proficiency in the sciences, their master died. His pupils had his body burnt, set up a Stūpa of sand over his ashes, and with weeping and lamentation adorned it with all manner of flowers.

So the partridge asked them why they wept. “Our master,” they replied, “has died while our studies are still incomplete.” “If this is so, do not be distressed: I will teach you science.” “How do you know it?” “I used to listen to your master, while he was teaching you, and got the three Vedas by heart.” “Then do you impart to us what you have learned by heart.” The partridge said: “Well, listen,” and he expounded knotty points to them, as easily as one lets down a stream from a mountain height. The young brahmins were highly delighted and acquired science from the learned partridge. And the bird stood in the place of the far-famed teacher, and gave lectures in science. The youths made him a golden cage and fastening an awning over it, they served him with honey and parched grain in a golden dish and presenting him with divers coloured flowers, they paid great honour to the bird. It was blazed abroad throughout all Jambudīpa that a partridge in a forest was instructing five hundred young brahmins in sacred texts.
At that time men proclaimed a high festival – it was like a gathering together of the people on a mountain top. The parents of the youths sent a message for their sons to come and see the festival. They told the partridge, and entrusting the learned bird and all the hermitage to the care of the lizard, they left for their several cities. At that moment an ill-conditioned wicked ascetic wandering about here and there came to this spot.

The lizard on seeing him entered into friendly talk with him, [3.321] saying: “In such and such a place you will find rice, oil and such like; boil some rice and enjoy yourself,” and so saying he went off in quest of his own food. Early in the morning the wretch boiled his rice, and killed and ate the two young lizards, making a dainty dish of them. At midday he killed and ate the learned partridge and the calf, and in the evening no sooner did he see the cow had come home than he killed her too and ate the flesh. Then he lay down grunting at the foot of a tree and fell asleep.

In the evening the lizard came back and missing her young ones went about looking for them. A Tree Devatā observing the lizard all of a tremble because she could not find her young ones, by an exercise of divine power stood in the hollow of the trunk of the tree and said: “Cease trembling, lizard: your young ones and the partridge and the calf and cow have been killed by this wicked fellow. Give him a bite in the neck, and so bring about his death.” And thus talking with the lizard the deity spoke the first verse: [3.539]

1. “Your harmless offspring he did eat,
   Though you did rice in plenty give;
   Your teeth make in his flesh to meet,
   Nor let the wretch escape alive.”

Then the lizard repeated two verses:

2. “Filth does his greedy soul, like nurse’s garb, besmear,
   His person all is proof against my fangs, I fear.

776 The reading is doubtful. Another reading is nikkāruṇiko, “pitiless”: Morris for niggaṭiko suggests nigaṇṭho, “naked ascetic”.

_________________________________________________________________________
3. Flaws by the base ingrate are everywhere espied,
Not by the gift of worlds can he be satisfied.”

The lizard so saying thought: “This fellow will wake up and eat me,” and to save her own life she fled. Now the lion and the tiger were on very friendly terms with the partridge. Sometimes they used to come and see the partridge, and sometimes the partridge went and taught the Dhamma to them. Today the lion said to the tiger, “It is a long time since we saw the partridge; it must be seven or eight days, go and bring back news of him.” The tiger readily assented, and he arrived at the place the very moment that the lizard had run away, and found the vile wretch sleeping. In his matted locks were to be seen some feathers of the partridge, and close by appeared the bones of the cow and calf.

King tiger seeing all this and missing the partridge from his golden cage thought: “These creatures must have been killed by this wicked fellow,” and he roused him by a kick. At the sight of the tiger the man was terribly frightened. Then the tiger asked, “Did you kill and eat these creatures?” “I neither killed nor ate them.” “Vile wretch, if you did not kill them, tell me who else would? And if you do not tell me, you are a dead man,” Frightened for his life he said: “Yes, sir, I did kill and eat the young lizards and the cow and the calf, but I did not kill the partridge.” And though he protested much, the tiger did not believe him but asked, “Whence did you come here?” “My lord, I hawked about merchant’s wares for a living in the Kāliṅga country, and after trying one thing and another I have come here.” But when the man had told him everything that he had done, the tiger said: “You wicked fellow, if you did not kill the partridge, who else could have done so? Come, I shall bring you before the lion, the king of beasts.” So the tiger went off, driving the man before him. When the lion saw the tiger bringing the man with him, putting it in the form of a question he spoke the fourth verse:
4. “Why thus in haste, Subāhu,⁷⁷⁷ are you here,
And why with you does this good youth appear?
What need for urgency is here, I pray?
Quick, tell me truly and without delay.” (3.541)

On hearing this the tiger spoke the fifth verse:

5. “The partridge, sire, our very worthy friend,
I doubt, today has come to a bad end:
This fellow’s antecedents make me fear
We may ill news of our good partridge hear.”

Then the lion spoke the sixth verse:

6. “What may the fellow’s antecedents be,
And what defilements he confessed to you,
To make you doubt that some misfortune may
Have fallen on the learned bird today?”

Then in answer to him king tiger repeated the remaining verses:

7. “As pedlar through Kāliṅga land
Rough roads he travelled, staff in hand;
With acrobats he has been found,
And harmless beast in toils has bound;

8. With dicers too has often played,
And snares for little birds has laid;
In crowds with cudgel-sticks has fought,
And gain by measuring corn has sought:
False to his vows, in midnight fray
Wounded, he washed the blood away:
His hands he burned through being bold
To snatch at food too hot to hold. (3.542)

---

⁷⁷⁷ Subāhu (strong-arm) is the name of the tiger. Compare no. 361 supra, p. 127.
9. Such was the life I heard he led,
Such defilements upon his head,
And since we know the cow is dead,
And feathers midst his locks appear,
I greatly for friend partridge fear.”

The lion asked the man, “Did you kill the learned partridge?” “Yes, my lord, I did.” The lion on hearing him speak the truth, was anxious to let him go, but king tiger said: “The villain deserves to die,” and then and there rent him with his teeth. Then he dug a pit and threw the body into it. The young brahmins when they returned home, not finding the partridge, with weeping and lamentation left the place.

The Teacher ended his lesson saying: “Thus, monks, did Devadatta of old too go about to kill me,” and he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the ascetic was Devadatta, the lizard Kisāgotamī, the tiger Moggallāna, the lion Sāriputta, the world-renowned teacher Kassapa, and the learned partridge was myself.”
The Jātaka, Volume IV

or, stories of the Buddha's former births.

translated from the Pāli by various hands

under the editorship of

Professor E. B. Cowell.

Vol. IV. translated by

W.H.D. Rouse, M.A.,

Sometime Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.

[1901]

revised by

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

November 2021
Book X. Dasanipāta
The Section with Ten Verses

Ja 439 Catudvārajātaka
The Story about the Four Doors

Alternative Title: Mahāmittavindakajātaka (Comm)

In the present one monk, though taught the way of a monastic, refuses to listen, and wants to live according to his own ideas. The Buddha tells how in a previous life the same person had been disobedient to his mother, and had suffered greatly as a result.

The Bodhisatta = the King of the Gods (Devarājā), the disobedient monk = (the rich young man) Mittavindaka.

Present Source: Ja 427 Gijjha,
Quoted at: Ja 116 Dubbaca, Ja 161 Indasamānagotta, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439
Catudvāra,
Past Compare: Ja 41 Losaka, Ja 82 Mittavinda, Ja 104 Mittavinda, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja
439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Wilfulness, Greed, Retribution, Devas.

“Four gates.” [4.1] [4.1] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain unruly person. The circumstances have already been set forth in the first Jātaka of the Ninth Book [Ja 427].

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana concerning a disobedient monk. He was, they say, of gentle birth, and though ordained in the dispensation that leads to safety, was admonished by his well-wishers, masters, teachers, and fellow-students to this effect, “Thus must you advance and thus retreat; thus look at or away from objects; thus must the arm be stretched out or drawn back; thus are the inner and outer garment to be worn; thus is the bowl to be held, and when you have received sufficient food to sustain life, after self-examination, thus are you 778 See Avadāna-Śataka, iiii. 6. (36), and Feer’s note on p. 137 of that book.

779 [Gijjhajātaka. I include the story here.]
to partake of it, keeping guard over the door of the senses; in eating you are to be moderate and exercise watchfulness; you are to recognize such and such duties towards monks who come to or go from the monastery; these are the fourteen sets of monastic duties, and the eighty great duties to be duly performed; these are the thirteen ascetic practices; all these are to be scrupulously performed.” Yet was he disobedient and impatient, and did not receive instruction respectfully, but refused to listen to them, saying: “I do not find fault with you. Why do you speak thus to me? I shall know what is for my good, and what is not.”

Then the monks, hearing of his disobedience, sat in the Dhamma Hall, telling of his faults. The Teacher came and asked them what it was they were discussing, and sent for the monk.

Here again the Teacher asked this monk, “Is it true, as they say, that you are disobedient?” “Yes, sir.” “Long ago,” said he, “when by disobedience you refused to do the bidding of wise men, a razor-wheel was given to you.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, there dwelt in Benares a merchant, whose wealth was eighty crores of money, having a son named Mittavindaka. The mother and father of this lad had entered upon the First Path, but he was wicked, an unbeliever.

When by and by the father was dead and gone, the mother, who in his stead managed their property, thus said to her son, “My son, the state of man is one hard to attain; give alms, practise virtue, keep the holy day, give ear to the Dhamma.” Then said he, “Mother, no almsgiving or such like for me; never name them to me; as I live, so shall I fare hereafter.” On a certain full-moon holy day, as he spoke in this fashion, his mother answered, “Son, this day is set apart as a high holy day. Today take upon you the holy day vows; visit the cloister, and all night long listen to the Dhamma, and when you come back I will give you a thousand pieces of money.”

---

780 Among the five gatis.
For desire of this money the son consented. As soon as he had broken his fast he went to the monastery, and there he spent the day; but at night, to ensure that not one word of the Dhamma should reach his ear, he lay down in a certain place, and fell asleep. On the next day, very early in the morning, he washed his face, and went to his own house and sat down.

Now the mother thought within herself, “Today my son after hearing the Dhamma will come back early in the morning, bringing with him the elder who has preached the Dhamma.” So she made ready gruel, and food hard and soft, and prepared a seat, and awaited his coming. When she saw her son coming all alone, “Son,” said she, “why have you not brought the preacher with you?” “No preacher for me, mother!” says he. “Here then,” said the woman, “you drink this gruel.” “You promised me a thousand pieces, mother,” he says, “first give this to me, and afterward I will drink.” “Drink first, my son, and then you shall have the money.” Said he, “No, I will not drink till I get the money.” Then his mother laid before him a purse of a thousand pieces. And he drank the gruel, took the purse with a thousand pieces, and went about his business; and so thereafter, until in no long time he had gained two million.

Then it came into his mind that he would equip a ship, and do business with it. So he equipped a ship, and said to his mother, “Mother, I mean to do business in this ship.” Said she, “You are my only son, and in this house there is plenty of wealth; the sea is full of dangers. Do not go!” But he said: “Go I will, and you cannot prevent me.” “Yes, I will prevent you,” she answered, and took hold of his hand; but he thrust her hand away, and struck her down, and in a moment he was gone, and under way.

On the seventh day, because of Mittavindaka, the ship stood immovable upon the deep. Lots were cast, and thrice was the lot found in the hand of Mittavindaka. Then they gave him a raft; and saying: “Let not many perish for the sole sake of this one,” they cast him adrift upon the deep. In an instant the ship sprang forth with speed over the deep.

---

781 The reader will be reminded of the story of Jonah.
And he upon his raft came to a certain island. There in a crystal palace he espied four female spirits of the dead. [4.3] They used to be in woe seven days and seven in happiness. In their company he experienced bliss divine. Then, when the time came for them to undergo their penance, they said: “Master, we are going to leave you for seven days; while we are gone, bide here, and be not distressed.” So saying they departed.

But he, full of longing, again embarked upon his raft, and passing over the ocean came to another isle; there in a palace of silver he saw [4.3] eight other spirits. In the same way, he saw upon another island, sixteen in a palace all of jewels, and on yet another, thirty-two that were in a golden hall. With these, as before, he dwelt in divine blessedness, and when they went away to their penance, sailed away once more over the ocean; till at last he beheld a city with four gates, surrounded by a wall. That, they say, is the Ussada hell, the place where many beings, condemned to hell, endure their own deeds: but to Mittavindaka it appeared as though a beautiful city. He thought: “I will visit that city, and be its king.”

So he entered, and there he saw a being in torment, supporting a wheel sharp as a razor; but to Mittavindaka it seemed as though that razor-wheel upon his head were a lotus bloom; the five-fold fetters upon his breast seemed as it were a splendid and rich vesture; the blood dripping from his head seemed to be the perfumed powder of red sandalwood; the sound of groaning was as the sound of sweetest song. So approaching he said: “Hey, man! Long enough you have been carrying that lotus flower; now give it to me!” He replied, “My lord, no lotus it is, but a razor-wheel.” “Ah,” said the first, “so you say because you do not wish to give it.” Thought the condemned wretch, “My past deeds must be exhausted. No doubt this fellow, like me, is here for smiting his mother. Well, I will give him the razor-wheel.” Then he said: “Here then, take the lotus,” and with those words he cast the razor-wheel upon his head; and on his head it fell, crushing it in. In an instant [4.4] Mittavindaka knew then that it was a razor-wheel, and he said: “Take your wheel, take back your wheel!” groaning aloud in his pain; but the other had disappeared.

At that moment the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā, and with a great following was making a round through the Ussada hell, and arrived at that spot. Mittavindaka, espying him, cried out, “Lord King of the Gods, this razor-wheel is piercing and tearing me like a pestle crushing mustard seeds! What wrong have I committed?” and in asking this question he repeated these two verses:

1. “Four gates this iron city has, where I am trapped and caught:
   A rampart girds me round about: what evil have I wrought?

2. Now fast are closed the city gates: this wheel destroyeth me:
   Why like a caged bird am I caught? Why, Yakkha, should it be?”

Then the King of the Gods, to explain the matter to him, uttered these verses:

3. “A hundred thousand you, good sir, did own, and twenty eke:
   Yet to a friend you would not lend thine ear, when he would speak.

4. Swift did you flee across the sea, a perilous thing, I ween;
   The four, the eight, did visit straight, and with the eight, sixteen,

5. And with sixteen the thirty-two; and lust did ever feel:
   See now, the meed of utter greed upon your head, this wheel. [4.4]

6. Who tread the highway of desire that spacious thoroughfare,
   That highway great, insatiate – ’tis theirs this wheel to bear.

7. Who will not sacrifice their wealth, nor to the path repair,
   Who do not know this should be so – ’tis theirs this wheel to bear. [4.5]

8. Ponder the issue of your deeds, and see How great your wealth, and do not crave to be Lord of ill-got gains; do what friends advise
   And the wheel shall never come nigh to thee.” [4.6]

Hearing this, Mittavindaka thought to himself, “This Devaputta has explained exactly what I have done. No doubt he knows also the measure of my punishment.” And he repeated the ninth verse:

9. “How long, O Yakkha, shall this wheel upon my head remain?
   How many thousand years? Reveal, nor let me ask in vain!”

Then the Great Being declared the matter in the tenth verse:
10. “The wheel shall roll, and on shall roll, no saviour shall appear, Fixed on your head till you be dead – O Mittavinda, hear!”

Thus saying, the Devaputta returned to his own place, and the other fell into great misery.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, identified the Jātaka, “At that time the unruly monk was Mittavindaka, and I myself was the King of the Devas.”

Ja 440 Kaṇhajātaka

The Story about (the Wise Ascetic) Kaṇha (10s)

In the present the Buddha smiled upon entering a park. When asked why, he told a story of an ascetic of old and of the austere life he led, and the boons he asked for from Sakka.

The Bodhisatta = the wise ascetic Kaṇha (Kaṇhapaṇḍita),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Keywords: Renunciation, Aspirations.

“Behold that man.” This story the Teacher told at Kapilavatthu, in the Banyan Park, about smiling. [4.7] At that time they say that the Teacher, wandering afoot with his band of monks in the Banyan Park at evening time, at a certain spot gave a smile. The elder Ānanda said: “What can be the cause, what the reason, that the Fortunate One should smile? Not without cause do the Tathāgatas smile. I will ask him, then.” So with a gesture of obeisance he asked of this smile. Then the Teacher said to him, “In days of yore, Ānanda, there was a certain sage, named Kaṇha, who on this spot of earth lived, meditative, delighting in meditation; and by power of his virtue Sakka’s abode was shaken.” But as this speech about the smile was not quite clear, at the elder’s request he told this story of the past. [4.5]

In the past, when Brahmadatta ruled in Benares, there was a certain childless brahmin, having wealth to the amount of eighty crores, who took upon him the vows of virtue, and prayed for a son; the Bodhisatta was conceived in the womb of this brahmin’s wife, and from his black colour they gave him on his nameday the name of Kaṇhakumāra, young Blackie. At the age of sixteen years, being full of splendour, as it were an image of some precious stone, he was sent by his father to Taxila, where he learned all the liberal arts, and returned again. Then his father provided a wife suitable for him. And by and by he came in for all his parent’s property.

Now one day, after inspecting his treasure houses, as he sat on his gorgeous divan, he took in his hand a golden plate, and reading upon the golden plate these lines inscribed by his kinsmen of former days, “So much of the property gained by such a one, so much by another,” he thought: “Those who won this wealth are seen no more, but the wealth is still seen; not one of them could take it where he is gone; we cannot tie our wealth in a bundle and take it with us to the next world. Seeing that it is connected with the Five Defilements, the better part is to distribute in alms this vain wealth; seeing that this vain body is connected with much disease, to show honour and kindness to the virtuous is the better part; seeing that this transient and vain life is but transient, to strive after spiritual insight is the better part. Therefore these vain treasures I will distribute in alms, that by so doing I may gain the better part.” So he rose up from his seat, and having asked the king’s consent, he gave bounteous alms.

Up to the seventh day {4.8} seeing no diminution in his wealth, he thought: “What is wealth to me? While I am yet unmastered by old age, I will even now take the ascetic vow, I will cultivate the Super Knowledges and Attainments, I will become destined for Brahmā’s Realm!” So he caused all the doors of his dwelling to be set open, and bade them take it all as freely given; and spurning it as a thing unclean, he forsook all desire of the eyes, and amid the lamentations and tears of a great multitude, went forth from the city, even unto the Himālayas region.

There he embraced the solitary life; and seeking out for a pleasant place to dwell in, he found this place, and there he resolved to dwell; and choosing a gourd tree for his place of feeding, there he did abide, and lived at the root of that tree; lodging never within a village he became a dweller in the woods, never a hut of leaves he made, but abode at the foot of this tree, in the open air, sitting ever, or if he desired to lie, lying upon the ground, not a pestle but only teeth to grind his food with, eating only things uncooked by the fire, and never even a grain in the husk passed his lips, eating once in the day, and at one sitting. On the ground, as though he were one with\textsuperscript{782} the four elements, he lived, \textsuperscript{[4.6]} taking upon him the ascetic virtues.\textsuperscript{783} In that Jātaka the Bodhisatta, as we learn, had very few wants.

Thus before long he attained the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and lived in that spot in meditative Absorption. For wild fruits he went no further afield; when fruit grew upon the tree, he ate the fruit; in time of flowers, he ate flowers; when the leaves grew, he ate leaves; when leaves there were none, he ate the bark of trees. Thus in the highest contentment he lived a long time in that place. As in the morning he used to pick up the fruits of that tree, never once even did he from greediness rise up and pick fruit in any other place. In the place where he sat, he stretched out his hand, and gathered all the fruit that there was within a handsweep; these he would eat as they came, making no distinction between what was pleasing and not pleasing. As he continued to take pleasure in this, by the power of his virtue the yellowstone throne of Sakka grew hot.

(This throne, they say, grows hot when Sakka’s life draws towards its end, or when his merit is exhausted and worked out, \textsuperscript{[4.9]} or when some mighty being prays, or through the efficacy of virtue in monastics or brahmins full of potency.)\textsuperscript{784}

Then Sakka thought: “Who is it would dislodge me now?” Surveying all around, he saw, living in a forest, in a certain spot, the sage Kaṇha, picking up fruit, and knew that yonder was the sage of dread austerity, all sense subdued, “To him will I go,” he thought: “I will cause him to proclaim the Dhamma in trumpet tones, and having heard the teaching that gives peace, I will satisfy him with a boon, and make his tree bear fruit unceasingly, and then I will return here.” Then by his mighty power quickly descending, and taking his stand at the root of that tree \textsuperscript{782} i.e. he had no more feeling than these.

\textsuperscript{783} See Childers, p. 123 \textit{a}. These thirteen ascetic practices include living under a tree, living alone, living in the forest, sleeping in a sitting posture, mentioned already in the text.
\textsuperscript{784} The following is a curious parallel to this idea about Indra’s throne: “The kings had a heritage at that time. When they did not know how to split justice properly, the judgement seat would begin to kick, and the king’s neck would take a twist when he did not do justice as he ought.” Campbell’s \textit{Popular Tales of the West Highlands}, ii. p. 159.
behind the sage, he said, by way of testing whether or no the sage would be angry at mention of his ugliness, the first verse:

1. “Behold that man, all black of hue, that dwells on this black spot, Black is the meat that he does eat – my spirit likes him not!”

Dark Kaṇha heard him. “Who is it speaks to me?” by his divine insight he perceived that it was Sakka; and without turning, replied with the second verse:

2. “Though black of hue, a brahmin true at heart, O Sakka, see: Not by skin, but if he do wrong, then black a man must be.” [4.7]

And then, after this, having explained in their several kinds and blamed the defilements which make black such beings, and praised the goodness of virtue, {4.10} he discoursed to Sakka, and it was as though he made the moon to rise in the sky. Sakka at the hearing of his discourse, charmed and delighted, offered the Great Being a boon, and repeated the third verse:

3. “Fair spoken, brahmin, nobly put, most excellently said: Choose what you will – as bids your heart, so let your choice be made.”

Hearing this the Great Being thought thus within himself. “I know how it must be. He wished to test me, and see should I be angry at mention of my ugliness; therefore he abused the colour of my skin, my food, my place of dwelling; perceiving that I was not angry, he is pleased, and offers me a boon; no doubt he thinks that I practise this manner of life through a desire for the power of Sakka or of Brahмā; and now, to make him certain, I must choose these four boons: that I may be calm, that I may have within me no hatred or malice against my neighbour, and that I may have no greed for my neighbour’s glory or lust towards my neighbour.” Thus pondering, to resolve the doubt of Sakka, the sage uttered the fourth verse, claiming these four boons:

4. “Sakka, the lord of all the world, a choice of blessings gave. From malice, hatred, covetise, deliverance I would have, And to be free from every lust: these blessings four I crave.” [4.11]

Hereupon thought Sakka, “The sage Kaṇha, in choosing his boon, has chosen four most blameless blessings. Now I will ask him what is good or bad with these four things.” And he asked the question by repeating the fifth verse:
5. “In lust, in hatred, covetise, in malice, brahmin, say
What evil thing do you behold? This answer me, I pray.”

“Hear then,” replied the Great Being, and gave utterance to four verses:

6. “Because hatred, of ill-will bred, aye grows from small to great,
Is ever full of bitterness, therefore I want no hate.

7. ’Tis ever thus with wicked men: first word, then touch we see,
Next fist, then staff, and last of all the swordstroke flashing free:
Where malice is, there follows hate – no malice then for me.

8. When men make speed egged on by greed, fraud and deceit arise,
And swift pursuit of savage loot – therefore, no covetise.

9. Firm are the fetters bound by lust, that thrives abundantly
Within the heart, for bitter smart – no lusting then for me.” {4.13}

Sakka, his questions thus solved, replied, “Wise Kaṇha, by you sweetly are my questions answered, with a Buddha’s skill; well pleased [4.8] with you am I; now choose another boon,” and he repeated the tenth verse:

10. “Fair spoken, brahmin, nobly put, most excellently said:
Choose what you will – as bids your heart, so let your choice be made.”

Instantly the Bodhisatta repeated a verse:

11. “O Sakka, lord of all the world, a boon you did me cry.
Where in the woods I ever dwell, where all alone dwell I,
Grant no disease may mar my peace, or break my ecstacy.”

On hearing this, thought Sakka, “Wise Kaṇha, in choosing a boon, chooses no thing connected with food; all he chooses bears upon the ascetic life.” Delighted ever more and more, he added thereto yet another boon and recited another verse:

12. “Fair spoken, brahmin, nobly put, most excellently said:
Choose what you will – as bids your heart, so let your choice be made.”

And the Bodhisatta, in stating his boon, declared the Dhamma in the concluding verse: {4.14}
The Section with Ten Verses – 1600

13. “O Sakka, lord of all the world, a choice you bid declare:
   No creature be aught harmed for me, O Sakka, anywhere,
   Neither in body nor in mind: this, Sakka, is my prayer.”785

Thus the Great Being, on six occasions making choice of a boon, chose only that which pertained to the life of renunciation. Well knew he that the body is diseased, and Sakka cannot do away the disease of it; not with Sakka lies it to cleanse living beings in the Three Doors;786 albeit so, he made his choice to the end that he might declare the Dhamma to him. And Sakka made that tree bear fruit perennially, and saluting him by raising joined hands to his head,787 he said: “Dwell here ever free from disease,” and went to his own place. But the Bodhisatta, never breaking his Absorption, became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

This lesson ended, the Teacher said: “This, Ānanda, is the place where I dwelt previously,” and thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time Anuruddha was Sakka, and for myself, I was Kaṇha the Wise.”

Ja 441 Catuposathikajātaka
The Story about the Four Fast Days (10s)

Alternative Title: Catuposathikajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are talking about the Buddha’s wisdom. The Buddha tells a story of four supporters who, hearing of different heavenly realms, were reborn in them. On a fast day they all came to a park to observe the precepts, and there they sought who was the most virtuous amongst them, a question that was settled by the wise Vidhura.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Vidhura (Vidhurapaṇḍita), Ānanda = the king of the Kurus Dhanañjaya (Dhanañjayakorabyarājā),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Moggallāna = the king of the Supaṇṇas (Supaṇṇarāja),
Sāriputta = Varuṇa, the king of the Nāgas (Varuṇanāgarājā).

785 These lines occur in Milinda, p. 384.
786 Of body, speech, mind: the three gates through which evil enters.
787 Reading patiṭṭhāpetvā, and in line 12 vyādhidhammaṁ.
The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning the Perfection of Wisdom. One day the monks raised a discussion in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, the Teacher has great and wide wisdom, he is ready and quick-witted, he is sharp and keen-witted and able to crush the arguments of his opponents, by the power of his wisdom he overthrows the subtle questions propounded by noble sages and reduces them to silence, and having established them in the three refuges and the moral precepts, causes them to enter on the path which leads to immortality.” The Teacher came and asked what was the topic which the monks were debating as they sat together; and on hearing what it was he said: “It is not wonderful, monks, that the Tathāgata, having attained the Perfection of Wisdom, should overthrow the arguments of his opponents and convert nobles and others. For in the earlier ages, when he was still seeking for supreme knowledge, he was wise and able to crush the arguments of his opponents. Yea verily in the time of Vidhurakumāra, on the summit of the Black Mountain which is sixty leagues in height, by the force of my wisdom I converted the Yakkha general, Puṇṇaka, and reduced him to silence and made him give his own life as a gift,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past in the Kuru kingdom in the city of Indapatta a king ruled named Dhanañjayavakoravya. He had a minister named the wise Vidhura who gave his instructions concerning temporal and spiritual matters; and having a sweet tongue and great eloquence in discoursing on the Dhamma, he bewitched all the kings of Jambudīpa by his sweet discourses concerning the Dhamma as elephants are fascinated by a favourite lute. Nor did he suffer them to depart to their own kingdoms, but dwelt in that city in great glory, teaching the Dhamma to the people with all the power of a Buddha.

---

[The title is an alternative for Ja 545 Vidhurajātaka. I include the story here.]
Now there were four rich brahmin householders in Benares, friends, who, having seen the misery of desires, went into the Himalayas and embraced the ascetic life, and having entered upon the Super Knowledges and Attainments, continued to dwell a long time there, feeding on the forest roots and fruits, and then, as they went their rounds to procure salt and sour condiments, came to beg in the city Kālacampā in the kingdom of Aṅga.

There four householders who were friends, being pleased with their behaviour, having paid them respect and taken their begging vessels, waited upon them with choice food, each in his own house, and taking their promise arranged a home for them in their garden. So the four ascetics having taken their food in the houses of the four householders, went away to pass the day, one going to the heaven of the Thirty-Three, another to the world of the Nāgas, another to the world of the Supaṇṇas, and the fourth to the park Migācira belonging to the Koravya king.

Now he who spent his day in the world of the gods, after beholding Sakka’s glory, described it in full to his attendant, and so too did he who spent his day in the Nāga and Supaṇṇa world, and so too he who spent his day in the park of the Koravya king Dhanañjaya; each described in full the glory of that respective king.

So these four attendants desired these heavenly abodes, and having performed gifts and other works of merit, at the end of their lives, one was born as Sakka, another was born with a wife and child in the Nāga world, another was born as the Supaṇṇa king in the palace of the Simbali lake, and the fourth was conceived by the chief queen of king Dhanañjaya; while the four ascetics were reborn in the Brahmā Realm.

The Koravya prince grew up, and on his father’s death assumed his kingdom and ruled in righteousness, but he was famed for his skill in dice. He listened to the instruction of the wise Vidhura and gave alms and kept the moral law and observed the fast. One day when he had undertaken the fast, he went into the garden, determining to practise pious meditation, and, having seated himself in a pleasant spot, he performed the duties of an ascetic. Sakka also, having undertaken to keep the fast, found that there were obstacles in the world of the gods, so he went into that very garden in the world of men, and, having seated himself in a pleasant spot, performed the duties of an ascetic. Varuṇa also, the Nāga king, having undertaken to keep the fast, found that there were obstacles in the Nāga world, so he went into that same garden, and, having seated himself in a pleasant place, performed the duties of an ascetic. The Supaṇṇa king also, having undertaken to keep the fast, found that there were obstacles in the Supaṇṇa world, so he went into that same garden, and, having seated himself in a pleasant spot, performed the duties of an ascetic.

Then these four, having risen from their places at evening time, as they stood on the bank of the royal lake, came together and looked at one another, and, being filled with their old kindly affection, they awakened their former friendship and sat down with a pleasant greeting. Sakka sat down on a royal seat, and the others seated themselves as befitted the dignity of each.

Then Sakka said to them, “We are all four kings – now what is the preeminent virtue of each?” Then Varuṇa the Nāga king replied, “My virtue is superior to that of you three,” and when they inquired why, he said: “This Supaṇṇa king is our enemy, whether before or after we are born, yet even when I see him, such a destructive enemy of our race, I never feel any anger; therefore my virtue is superior,” and he then uttered the first verse of the Catuposathajātaka [Ja 441]:

1. “The good man who feels no anger towards one who merits anger and who never lets anger arise within him, he who even when angered does not allow it to be seen – him they indeed call an ascetic.”

“These are my qualities; therefore my virtue is superior.”

The Supaṇṇa king, hearing this, said: “This Nāga is my chief food; but since, even though I see such food at hand, I endure my hunger and do not commit evil for the sake of food, my virtue is superior,” and he uttered this verse:

2. “He who bears hunger with a pinched belly, a self-restrained ascetic who eats and drinks by rule, and commits no evil for the sake of food – him they indeed call an ascetic.”

Then Sakka the King of the Devas said: “I left behind various kinds of heavenly glory, all immediate sources of happiness, and came to the world of mankind in order to maintain my virtue – therefore my virtue is superior,” and he uttered this verse:
3. “Having abandoned all sport and pleasure, he utters no false word in the world, he is averse to all outward pomp and carnal desire – such a man they indeed call an ascetic.”

Thus did Sakka describe his own virtue.

Then king Dhanañjaya said: “I today have abandoned my court and my harem with sixteen thousand dancing girls, and I practise an ascetic’s duties in a garden;
therefore my virtue is superior,” and he added this verse:

4. “Those who with full knowledge abandon all that they call their own and all the workings of lust, he who is self-restrained, resolute, unselfish, and free from desire – him they indeed call an ascetic.”

Thus they each declared their own virtue as superior, and then they asked Dhanañjaya, “O king, is there any wise man in your court who could solve this doubt?” “Yes, O kings, I have the wise Vidhura, who fills a post of unequalled responsibility and declares civil and ecclesiastical law, he will solve our doubt, we will go to him.” They at once consented. So they all went out of the garden and proceeded to the hall for monastic assemblies, and, having ordered it to be adorned, they seated the Bodhisatta on a high seat, and, having offered him a friendly greeting, sat down on one side and said: “O wise sir! A doubt has risen in our minds, do you solve it for us:

5. We ask you the minister of lofty wisdom: a dispute has arisen in our utterances – do you consider and solve our perplexities today, let us through you today escape from our doubt.”

The wise man, having heard their words, replied, “O kings, how shall I know what you said well or ill concerning your virtue, as you uttered the verses in your dispute?” and he added this verse:

6-7. “Those wise men who know the real state of things and who speak wisely at the proper time – how shall they, however wise, draw out the meaning of verses which have not been uttered to them? How does the Nāga king speak, how Garuḷa, the son of Vinatā? Or what says the king of the Gandhabbas? Or how speaks the most noble king of the Kurus?”

Then they uttered this verse to him:
8. “The Nāga king preaches forbearance, Garuḍa the son of Vinatā gentleness, the king of the Gandhabbas abstinence from carnal lust, and the most noble king of the Kurus freedom from all hindrances.”

Then the Great Being, having heard their words, uttered this verse:

9. “All these sayings are well spoken – there is nothing here uttered amiss; and he in whom these are properly fitted like the spokes in the nave of a wheel – he, who is endowed with these four virtues, is called an ascetic indeed.”

Thus the Great Being declared the virtue of each of them to be one and the same. Then the four, when they heard him, were well pleased, and uttered this verse in his praise:

10. “You are the best, you are incomparable, you are wise, a guardian and knower of the Dhamma: having grasped the problem by your wisdom, you cut the doubts in your skill as the ivory-workman the ivory with his saw.”

Thus all the four were pleased with his explanation of their question. Then Sakka rewarded him with a robe of heavenly silk, Garuḍa with a golden garland, Varuṇa the Nāga king with a jewel, and king Dhanañjaya with a thousand cows, etc.; then Dhanañjaya addressed him in this verse:

11. “I give you a thousand cows and a bull and an elephant, and these ten chariots drawn with thoroughbred horses, and sixteen excellent villages, being well pleased with your solution of the question.”

Then Sakka and the rest, having paid all honour to the Great Being, departed to their own abodes.

Ja 442 Sañkhajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin) Sañkha (10s)

Alternative Title: Sañkhabrāmañjātaka (Comm)

In the present one layman gives gifts of shoes to the Buddha and the monastics. The Buddha tells a story of a merchant who gave shoes to a Pacekabuddha, and was subsequently saved from the ocean by a deity, and given a magic ship.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin Sañkha (Sañkhabrāhmaṇa), Ānanda = the attendant (upaṭṭhākapurisa), Uppalavaṇṇā = Devadhītā (Maṇimekhalā).
Past Compare: Cp 2 Saṅkhacariyā.

Keywords: Giving, Generosity, Devas.

“O learned brahmin.” {4.15} This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about the giving of all the requisites.789

At Sāvatthi, it is said, a certain lay brother having heard the Tathāgata’s discourse, being pleased at heart, gave an invitation for the morrow; at his door he set up a pavilion, richly decorated, and sent to say that it was time. The Teacher came attended by five hundred monks, and sat in the gorgeous seat appointed for him. The layman, having made rich presents to the company of monks headed by the Buddha, bade them again for the morrow; and so for seven days he invited them, and offered gifts, and on the seventh gave them all a monk’s requisites. In this presentation he offered a special gift of shoes. The pair of shoes offered to the Buddha were worth a thousand pieces of money, those offered to the two chief disciples790 were worth five hundred, and shoes to the value of a hundred were given to each of the five hundred monks who remained. And after this presentation made of all that the monks need, he sat down before the Fortunate One, along with his company. Then the Teacher returned thanks in a voice of much sweetness, “Layman, most generous is your gift; be joyful. In olden days, before the Buddha came into the world, there were those who by giving one pair of shoes to a Pacceka-buddha, in consequence of that gift found a refuge on the sea where refuge there is none; and you have given to the whole of Buddha’s company all that a monk can need – how can it be, but that your gift of shoes should prove a refuge to you?” and at his request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, this Benares was named Molinī. While Brahmadatta reigned in Molinī as king, a certain brahmin Saṅkha, rich, of great wealth, had built alms halls in six places, one at each of the four city gates, one in the midst of it, one by his own 789 Misprints on this page [of the text] should be corrected: line 10 pañcasatagghanakā, 12 parikkhāradānanā, 14 anuppanne.

790 Sāriputta and Moggallāna.
door. Daily he gave in alms six hundred thousand pieces of money, and to wayfarers and beggars he did much bounty. [4.10]

One day he thought to himself, “My store of wealth once gone, I shall have nothing to give. While it is still available I will take ship, and sail for the Gold Country, whence I will bring back wealth.” So he caused a ship to be built; filled it with merchandise; and said he, as he bade farewell to wife and child, [4.16] “Until I come again, see that you make no stay in distributing of alms.” This said, he took up his sunshade, donned his shoes, and with his servants about him, setting his face towards the seaport, at midday he departed.

At that moment, a Paccekabuddha on Mount Gandhamādana, meditating, saw him on his way to get wealth, and he thought: “A great man is journeying to get wealth: will there be anything on the sea to hinder him, or no? There will. If he sees me he will present me with shoes and sunshade; and in consequence of this gift of shoes, he will find refuge when his vessel is wrecked upon the sea. I will help him.” So passing through the air, he alighted not far from the traveller, and moved to meet him, treading the sand hot as a layer of burning embers in the fierce wind and sunshine. “Here,” thought the brahmin, “is a chance of gaining merit; here I must sow a seed this day.” In high delight he made haste to meet and greet him. “Sir,” says he, “be so kind as to come aside from the road awhile, under this tree.” Then as the man came in beneath the tree, he brushed up the sand for him, and spread his upper robe, and made him sit down; with water perfumed and purified he washed his feet, anointed him with sweet scented oil; from his own feet he took off the shoes, wiped them clean and anointed them with scented oil, and put them on him, and presented him with shoes and sunshade, bidding him wear the one, and spread the other overhead as he went his ways. The other, to please him, took the gift, and as the brahmin gazed upon him for the increase of his faith, flew up and went on his way again to Gandhamādana.

The Bodhisatta on his part, glad at heart, proceeded to the harbour, and took ship. When they were come to the high seas, on the seventh day the ship sprang a leak, and they could not bale the water clear. All the people in fear for their lives made a great outcry, calling each upon his own god. The Great Being chose him one servitor, and anointing all his body with oil, ate a mess of powdered sugar with ghee as much as he desired, and giving the man to eat also, he climbed up the mast. “In that direction,” said he, “lies our city,” pointing out the direction, and casting off all fear of the fish and turtles, he dived off with the man to a distance of more than a hundred and fifty cubits. A multitude of men perished; but the Great Being, with his servant, began to make his way over the sea. For seven days he kept on swimming. Even then he kept the holy fast day, washing his mouth with the salt water.

---

791 Said to be the district of Burmah and Siam [i.e. Myanmar and Thailand], “the Golden Chersonese.” See Childers, p. 492.

Now at that time a Devadhītā named Maṇimekhalā, which by interpretation is Jewel-zone, had been commanded by the four lords of the world, “If by shipwreck any ill befall men who have gone to the Three Refuges, or are endued with virtue, or who worship their parents, you should save them,” and to protect any such, the deity took station upon the sea. In her divine power she kept no outlook for seven days, but on the seventh day, scanning the sea, she saw the virtuous brahmin Saṅkha, and thought she, “It is now the seventh day since that man was cast into the sea: were he to die, great would be my blame.” So troubled at heart the deity filled a golden plate full of all manner of divine meats, and hastening wind-swift towards him, came to a stop before him in mid-air, saying: “Seven days, brahmin, have you taken no food: eat this!” The brahmin looked at her, and replied, “Take your food away, for I am keeping fast.”

His attendant, who came behind, saw not the deity, but heard only the sound; and he thought: “The brahmin babbles, I think, being of tender frame, and from his seven days’ fasting, being in pain and in fear of death: I will comfort him.” And he repeated the first verse:

---

792 Again the reader will be reminded of Jonah (i. 5). Compare also the scene in Erasmus’ dialogue Naufragium.
1. “O learned brahmin, full of sanctity,
   Pupil of many a holy teacher, why {4.18}
   All out of reason do vain babbling use,
   When none is here, save me, to make reply?”

The brahmin heard, and knowing that he had not seen the deity, he said: “Good fellow, ’tis not fear of death; but I have another here to converse with me,” and he repeated the second verse:

2. “ ’Tis a fair radiant presence, gold-bespent,
   That offers me food for my nourishment,
   All bravely set upon a plate of gold:
   To her I answer ‘No,’ with heart content.”

Then the man repeated the third verse:

3. “If such a wondrous being one should see,
   A man should ask a blessing hopefully.
   Arise, beseech her, holding up clasped hands:
   Say, are you human, or a deity?” [4.19]

“You say well,” said the brahmin, and asked his question by repeating the fourth verse:

4. “As you beholdest me in kindly way
   And ‘Take and eat this food’ to me do say,
   I ask you, lady, excellent in might,
   Are you a Devī, or a woman, pray?” [4.12]

Thereupon the Devadhītā repeated two verses:

5. “A Devī excellent in might am I;
   And to mid-ocean hitherward did hie,
   Full of compassion and in heart well-pleased,
   For your sake come in this extremity.

6. Here food, and drink, and place of rest behold,
Vehicles various and manifold;
You, Saṅkha, I make lord of every thing
Which for desirable your heart may hold.”

On hearing this the Great Being thought it over. “Here is this Devadhītā (thought he), in the middle of the ocean, offering me this thing and that thing. Why does she wish to offer them to me? Is it for any virtuous act of mine, or by her own power, she does it? Well, I will ask the question.” And he asked it in the words of the seventh verse:

7. “Of all my sacrifice and offering
You are the queen, and thine the governing;
You of fair slender waist, you beauteous-browed:793
What deed of mine hath brought to fruit this thing?” {4.20}

The Devadhītā listened to him, thinking: “This brahmin has put his question, I suppose, because he imagines I know not what good deed he has done. I will just tell him.” So she told him, in the words of the eighth verse:

8. “A solitary, on the burning way,
Weary and footsore, thirsty, you did stay,
O brahmin Saṅkha, for a gift of shoes:
That gift your Cow of Plenty is this day.”

When the Great Being heard this, he thought to himself, “What! In this impracticable ocean the gift of shoes given by me has become a give-all to me! Ah, lucky was my gift to the Paccekabuddha!” Then, in great contentment, he repeated the ninth verse:

793 In line 29 read subbhu suvilākamajjhe: cp. Commentary.
9. “A ship of planks well built let there be,
Sped by fair winds, impervious to the sea;
No place is here for other vehicle;
This very day take me to Molinī.” 794 [4.21]

The Devadhītā, well pleased at hearing these words, caused a ship to appear, made of the seven things of price; in length it was eight hundred cubits, in width six hundred cubits, twenty fathoms in depth; it had three masts made of sapphire, cordage of gold, silver sails, and of gold were also the oars and the rudders. This vessel the deity filled with the seven precious things; then embracing the brahmin, set him aboard the gorgeous ship. She did not notice the attendant; howbeit the brahmin [4.13] gave him a share of his own good fortune; he rejoiced, the deity embraced him also, and set him in the ship. Then she guided the ship to the city of Molinī, and having stored all this wealth in the brahmin’s house, returned to her place of dwelling.

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered the final verse:

10. “She pleased, delighted, with a happy cheer,
A vessel marvellous caused to appear;
Then, taking Saṅkha with his serving man,
To that most lovely city brought them near.”

And the brahmin all his life long dwelt at home, distributing bounty without end, and observing virtue; and at the end of his days he with his man went to swell the host of heaven. {4.22}

When the Teacher had made an end of this discourse he declared the Truths: now at the conclusion of the Truths the layman entered upon the First Path: and he thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time Uppalavaṇṇā was the Devadhītā [Maṇimekhalā], Ānanda was the attendant, and I myself was the brahmin Saṅkha.”

794 Benares.
The Section with Ten Verses – 1612

Ja 443 Cullabodhijātaka
The Story about Little Wisdom (10s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷabodhijātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is quick to anger. The Buddha tells a story of a couple who became ascetics together. The husband refused to let anger arise, even when the king carried off his ex-wife; and he explained to the king how dangerous anger is.

The Bodhisatta = the wanderer (paribbājaka),
Rāhulamātā = the female wanderer (paribbājikā),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Past Compare: Ja 328 Ananusociya, Ja 443 Cullabodhi, Cp 14, Cullabodhicariya, Jm 21, Cullabodhi.

Keywords: Anger, Restraint, Devas.

“If one seize.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a passionate man. This man, after having become an ascetic in this dispensation which leads to safety with all its blessings, was unable to control his passion: passionate he was, full of resentment; but little said, and he grew angry, flew in a passion, was bitter and obstinate. The Teacher, hearing of his passionate behaviour, sent for him and asked, was it true that he was passionate, as rumour had it. “Yes, sir,” replied the man. “Monk,” the Teacher said, “passion must be restrained; such an ill-doer has no place either in this world or the next. After embracing the dispensation of the Supreme Buddha, who knows not passion, why do you show thyself passionate? Wise men of old, even those who embraced an outside dispensation, have refrained from anger.” And he told him a story of the past. [4.14]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there was in a certain town of Kāsi a brahmin rich, wealthy, and of great possessions, but he was childless; and his wife longed for a son. At that time the Bodhisatta, descending from the Brahmā Realm, was conceived in the womb of that lady; and on his name-day they gave him the name of Bodhikumāra, or Wiseman. When he came of age he repaired to Taxila, where he studied all sciences; and after his homecoming, much against his will, his parents found him a damsel to wife from a family of the same caste. She too had descended to this world from the Brahmā Realm, and was of surpassing beauty, like a Devaccharā. These two were married together, though neither of them desired it. Never had either done any wrong, and in the way of passion neither so much as cast a look at the other; never even in sleep had they done the deed of kind, so pure were they.

795 bāhiraäsane is doubtless a misprint for bāhirasāsane.

Now it happened that after a while, when his parents were dead, and he had decently disposed of their bodies, the Great Being calling his wife, said to her, “Now, lady, you {4.23} take this fortune of eighty crores, and live in happiness.” “Not so, but you, noble sir.” Said he, “Wealth I want none; I shall go to the region of the Himālayas, and become a recluse, and there find a refuge.” “Well, noble sir, is it men only that should live the ascetic life?” “No,” said he, “but women also.” “Then I will not take that which you spew out of your mouth; for wealth I care no more than you, and I, like you, will live as a recluse.”

“Very good, lady,” said he. And they both distributed a great quantity of alms; and setting forth, in a pleasant spot they made a hermitage. There living upon any wild fruits which they could glean, they dwelt for ten whole years, yet did not attain Absorption.

And after living there in the happiness of the ascetic life for ten years, they traversed the countryside to get salt and seasoning, and in due course came to Benares, where they resided in the royal park.

Now one day the king, espying the park-keeper who came with a present in his hand, said: “We will make merry in our park, therefore set it in order,” and when the park was cleansed and made ready, he entered it along with a great retinue. At that time these two were also sitting in a certain part of the park, spending their time in the bliss of the ascetic life. And the king in passing through the park, perceived them both sitting there; and as his eye fell on this amiable and very beautiful lady, he fell in love. Trembling with desire, he determined to ask what she was to the ascetic; so approaching the Bodhisatta, he put the question to him. “Great king,” he said, “she is nothing to me; she only shares my ascetic life, but when I lived in the world she was my wife.” On hearing this the king thought within him, “So he says she is nothing to him, but in his worldly life she was his wife. Well, if I [4.15] seize her by my sovereign power what will he do? I will take her, then.” And so coming near he repeated the first verse: {4.24}
1. “If one seize the large-eyed lady, and carry her off from you,\textsuperscript{796}
The dear one that sits there smiling, brahmin, what would you do?”

In answer to this question, the Great Being repeated the second verse:

2. “Once risen, it never would leave me my life long, no, never at all:
As a storm of rain lays the dust again, quench it while yet it be small.”

Thus did the Great Being make answer, loud as a lion’s roar. But the king, though he heard it, was yet unable for blind folly to master his enamoured heart, and gave orders to one of his suite that he should take the lady into the palace. The courtier, obedient, led her away, in spite of her complaints and cries that lawlessness and wrong were the world’s way. The Bodhisatta, who heard her cries, looked once but looked no more. So weeping and wailing she was conveyed to the palace.

And the king of Benares made no delay in his park, but quickly returned indoors, and sending for the woman, showed her great honour. And she spoke of the worthlessness of such honour, and the sole worth of the solitary life. The king, finding that by no means could he win her mind over, caused her to be placed in a room apart, and began to think, “Here is an ascetic woman who cares not for all this honour, and that ascetic never cast an angry look even when the man led away so beauteous a dame! Deep are the wiles of ascetics; he will lay a plot doubtless and work me some harm. \textsuperscript{4.25} Well, I will return to him, and find out why he sits there.” And so unable to keep still, he went into the park.

The Bodhisatta sat stitching his cloak. The king, almost alone, came up without sound of footfall, softly. Without one look at the king, the other went on with his sewing. “This fellow,” thought the king, “will not speak to me because he is angry. This ascetic, humbug that he is, first roars out, ‘I will not let anger arise at all, but if it does, I will crush it while it is small,’ and then is so obstinate in wrath that he won’t speak to me!” With this idea the king repeated the third verse:

---

\textsuperscript{796} Sammillabhāsini, which is an epithet in the first verse here, is a proper name in Ja 328 Ananusociyajātaka.
3. “You that were loud in boasting only awhile ago,
Now dumb for very anger there you sit and sew!”

When the Great Being heard this, he perceived that the king thought him silent from anger; and desirous to show that he was not influenced by anger, repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Once risen, it never had left me, it never would leave me at all:
As a storm of rain lays the dust again, I quenched it while it was small.”

On hearing these words, the king thought: “Is it anger of which he [4.16] speaks, or some other thing? I will ask him.” And he asked the question, repeating the fifth verse:

5. “What is it that never has left you your life long, never at all?
As a storm of rain lays the dust again, what quenched you while it was small?”

 Said the other, “Great king, anger brings much wretchedness, and much ruin; it just began within me, but by cherishing kindly feelings I quenched it,” and then he repeated the following verses to declare the misery of anger.

6. “That without which a man sees clearly, with which he goes blindly ahead,
Arose within me, but was not left free – anger, on foolishness fed.

7. What causes our foes satisfaction, who wish to bring woes on our head,
Arose within me, but was not left free – anger, on foolishness fed.

8. That which if it rises within us blinds all to our spiritual good,
Arose within me, but was not left free – anger, with folly for food.

9. That which, supreme, destroys each great blessing,
Which makes its dupes forsake each worthy thing,
Mighty, destructive, with its swarm of fears –
Anger – refused to leave me, O great king!

10. The fire will rise the higher, if the fuel be stirred and turned;
And because the fire uprises, the fuel itself is burned.

11. And thus in the mind of the foolish, the man who cannot discern,
From wrangling arises anger, and with it himself will burn.
12. Whose anger grows like fire with fuel and grass that blaze,
As the moon in the dark fortnight, so his honour wanes and decays.

13. He who quiets his anger, like a fire that fuel has none,
As the moon in the light fortnight, his honour waxes well grown.” (4.27)

When the king had listened to the Great Being’s discourse, he was well pleased, and bade one of his courtiers lead the woman back; and invited the passionless recluse to stay with her in that park, in the enjoyment of their solitary life, and he promised to watch over them and defend them as he ought. Then asking pardon, he politely took leave, and the two of them dwelt there. By and by the woman died, and after her death, the man returned to the Himālayas, and cultivating the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and causing the Divine Abidings to spring up within him, he became destined for Brahmā’s Realm.

When the Teacher had ended his discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka; now at the conclusion of the Truths the passionate monk became established in the fruit of the Third Path. “At that time Rāhula’s mother was the ascetic lady, Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 444 Kaṇhadīpāyanajātaka

The Story about (the Ascetic) Kaṇhadīpāyana (10s)

In the present one monk is discontented with the monastic life and declares his wish to leave it. The Buddha tells a story of how an ascetic used his declaration of a secret truth to partially cure a child who was bitten by a snake, and how the family used the same method to cure him completely.

The Bodhisatta = (the ascetic) Kaṇhadīpāyana (Kaṇhadīpāyano), Śāriputta = (the ascetic) Maṇḍavya the Peg (Āṇimaṇḍavya),
Rāhula = the son (putta),
Visākhā = the wife (bhariyā),
Ānanda = (the householder) Maṇḍavya.

Present Source: Ja 531 Kusa,
Quoted at: Ja 444 Kaṇhadīpāyana, Ja 458 Udaya, Ja 488 Bhisa, 797 This story, with the first verse, is briefly given in the Cariyāpiṭaka, p 99f.

The story tells that he was of noble birth and lived at Sāvatthi, and on his heartily embracing the dispensation he adopted the ascetic life. Now one day as he was going his rounds for alms in Sāvatthi, he met a fair lady and fell in love with her at first sight. Overcome by his passion he lived an unhappy life, and letting his nails and hair grow long and wearing soiled robes, he pined away and became quite sallow, with all his veins standing out on his body. And just as in the Deva world, the Devaputtas who are destined to fall from their heavenly existence manifest five well-known signs, that is to say, their garlands wither, their robes soil, their bodies grow ill-favoured, perspiration pours from their armpits, and they no longer find pleasure in their Deva home, so too in the case of worldly monks, who fall from the Dhamma, the same five signs are to be seen: the flowers of faith wither, the robes of righteousness soil, through discontent and the effects of an evil name their persons grow ill-favoured, the sweat of corruption streams from them and they no longer delight in a life of solitude at the foot of forest trees – all these signs were to be found in him. So they brought him into the presence of the Teacher, saying: “Venerable sir, this fellow is discontented.”

When the Teacher had enquired whether this report was true, and the man answered that it was true, he said: “Monk, wise men in days long gone by, before the Buddha had arisen, even men who had entered upon an outside sect, for more than fifty years, walking in holiness without caring for it, from the scruples of a sensitive nature never told any one that they had fallen back; and why have you, who have embraced such a dispensation as ours, that leads to safety, and who stand in presence of a venerable Buddha such as I am, why have you declared your discontent before the four kinds of disciples? Why do you not preserve your scruples?” Thus saying, he told a story of the past.
In the past, in the kingdom of Vaṁsa, reigned in Kosambi a king named Kosambika. At that time there were two brahmins in a certain town, each possessed of eighty crores, and dear friends one of the other; who, having perceived the mischief which lies in lust, and distributed much goods in generosity, both forsook the world, and amid the weeping and wailing of many people, departed to the Himālayas, and there built them a hermitage. There for fifty years they lived as ascetics, feeding upon the fruits and roots of the forests where they might chance to glean them; but unto Absorption they were unable to attain.

After these fifty years had passed by, they went on pilgrimage through the countryside to get salt and seasoning, and came to the kingdom of Kāsi. In a certain town of this kingdom lived a householder named Maṇḍavya, who had been a lay friend in householder days of the ascetic Dīpāyana. To this Maṇḍavya came our two friends; who when he saw them, enraptured, built them a hut of leaves, and provided them both with the four necessaries of life. Three or four seasons they dwelt there, and then taking leave of him proceeded on pilgrimage to Benares, where they lived in a cemetery grown over with the Hiptage shrub. When Dīpāyana had remained there as long as he wished, he returned to his old comrade again; Maṇḍavya the other ascetic still dwelt in the same place.

Now it happened that one day a robber had committed robbery in the town, and was returning from the fact with a quantity of spoil. The owners of the house, and the watchmen, aroused, set up a cry of, “Thief!” and the thief, pursued by these, escaped through the sewer, and as he ran swiftly by the cemetery dropped his bundle at the door of the ascetic’s hut of leaves. When the owners saw this bundle, they cried, “Ah, you rascal! you are a robber by night, and in the daytime you go about in the disguise of an ascetic!” So, with reviling and blows, they carried him into the presence of the king.

The king made no enquiry, but only said: “Off with him, impale him upon a stake!” To the cemetery they took him, and lifted him up on a stake of acacia

---

798 On the Ganges.

799 In this confusing tale, Maṇḍavya is the name of one of the ascetics and also of the householder, Dīpāyana is the name of the other ascetic.
wood; but the stake would not pierce the ascetic’s body. Next they brought a nimble stake, but this too would not pierce him; then an iron spike, and no more would that pierce his body. The ascetic wondered what past deed of his could have caused this, and surveyed the past; then there arose in him the knowledge of former existences, and by this as he surveyed the past he saw what he had done long ago; and this it was – the piercing of a fly upon a splinter of ebony.

It is said that in a former existence he had been the son of a carpenter. Once he went to the place where his father was wont to hew trees, and with an ebony splinter pierced a fly as if impaling it. And it was just this wrong that found him out when he came to that supreme moment. He perceived that here then was no getting free from wrong; so to the king’s men he said: “If you wish to impale me, take a stake of ebony wood.” This they did, and spitted him upon it, and leaving a guard to watch him they went away.

The watchmen from a place of concealment observing all that came to look upon him. Now Dīpāyana, thinking: “It is long since I saw my comrade the ascetic,” came to find him; and having heard that he had been hanging a whole day impaled by the roadside, he went up to him, and standing on one side, asked what he had done. “Nothing,” said he. “Can you guard against ill feeling, or not?” asked the other. “Good friend,” said he, “neither against those who have seized me, nor against the king, either, is there any ill feeling in my mind.” “If that is so, the shadow of one so virtuous is delightful to me,” and with these words he sat down by the side of the stake. Then upon his body from the body of Maṇḍavya fell gouts of gore; and these as they fell upon the golden skin, and dried there, became black spots upon it; which gave him the name of Kaṇha or Black Dīpāyana from thenceforth. And he sat there all the night.

Next day the watchmen went and told the matter to the king. “I [4.19] have acted rashly,” said the king; and with speed he hastened to the spot, [4.30] and asked Dīpāyana what made him sit by the stake. “Great king,” answered he, “I sit here to guard him. But say, what has he done, or what left undone, that you treat him thus?” He explained that the matter had not been investigated. The other replied, “Great king, a king ought to act with circumspection; an idle layman who loves pleasure is not good, etc.,”\textsuperscript{800} and with other such admonitions he discoursed to him.

When the king found that Maṇḍavya was innocent, he ordered the stake to be drawn out. But try as they would, it would not come out. Said Maṇḍavya, “Sire, I have received this dire disgrace for a fault done long ago, and it is impossible to draw the stake from my body. But if you wish to spare my life, bring a saw, and cut it off flush with the skin.” So the king had this done; and the part of the stake within his body remained there. For on that previous occasion they say that he took a little piece of diamond, and pierced the fly’s duct, so that it did not die then, nor until the proper end of its life; and therefore also the man did not die, they say.

The king saluted these ascetics, and craved pardon; and settling them both in his park, he looked after them there. And from that time Maṇḍavya was called Maṇḍavya the Peg. And he lived in this place near the king; and Dīpāyana, after healing his friend’s wound, went back to his friend Maṇḍavya the householder. When they saw him enter the leaf-hut, they told it to his friend. When he heard it, he was delighted; and with wife and child, taking plenty of scents, garlands, oil, and sugar, and so forth, he came to the leaf hut; greeting Dīpāyana, washing and anointing his feet, and giving him to drink, he sat listening to the tale of Maṇḍavya the Peg.

Then his son, a young man named Yaññadatta, was playing with a ball at the end of the covered walk. There a snake lived in an ant-hill. The lad’s ball, thrown upon the ground, ran into the hole of the ant-hill and fell upon the snake. Not knowing this, the lad put his hand into the hole. The enraged snake bit the boy’s hand; down he fell in a faint because of the strength of the snake’s poison. \textsuperscript{[4.31]} Thereupon his parents, finding their son snake-bitten, lifted him up and took him to the ascetic; laying him at the ascetic’s feet, they said: “Sir, ordained people know medicines and charms; please cure our son.” “I know no medicines; I do not ply

\textsuperscript{800} See Ja 351 Maṇikuṇḍalajātaka [There it reads in verse: The idle sensual layman I detest, The false ascetic is a rogue confessed. A bad king will a case unheard decide, Wrath in the sage can ne’er be justified. The warrior prince a well-weighed verdict gives, Of righteous judge the fame for ever lives.] the physician’s trade.” “You are a man of dispensation. Have pity then, sir, upon this lad, and do the Assertion of Truth.” “Good,” said the ascetic, “an Assertion of Truth I will do.” And laying hands upon the head of Yaññadatta, he recited the first verse: [4.20]

1. “Seven days serene in heart
   Pure I lived, desiring merit:
   Since then, for fifty years apart,
   Self-absorbed, I do declare it,
   Here, unwillingly, I live:
   May this truth a blessing give:
   Poison baulked, the lad revive!”

This Assertion of Truth was no sooner made, out from the chest of Yaññadatta the poison came, and sank into the ground. The lad opened his eyes, and with a look at his parents, cried, “Mother!” then turned over, and lay still. Then Black Dīpāyana said to the father, “See, I have used my power; now is the time to use yours.” He answered, “So will I do an Assertion of Truth,” and laying a hand upon his son’s breast, he repeated the second verse:

2. “If for gifts I cared no jot,
   All chance comers entertaining, {4.32}
   Yet still the good and wise knew not
   I was my true self restraining;
   If unwillingly I give,
   May this truth a blessing give,
   Poison baulked, the lad revive!”

After the making of this Assertion of Truth, out from his back came the poison, and sank into the ground. The lad sat up, but could not stand. Then the father said to the mother, “Lady, I have used my power; now it is yours by an Assertion of Truth to cause your son to arise and walk.” Said she, “I too have a Dhamma to tell, but in your presence I cannot declare it.” “Lady,” said he, “by all and any means make my son whole.” She answered, “Very well,” and her Assertion of Truth is given in the third verse:
3. “The serpent that bit you today
In yonder hole, my son,
And this your father, are, I say,
In my indifference, one:
May this Truth a blessing give:
Poison baulked, the lad revive!” \{4.33\}

No sooner done was this Assertion of Truth, than all the poison fell and sank into the ground; and Yaññadatta, rising with all his body purged of the poison, began to play. When the son had in this way risen up, Maṇḍavya asked what was in Dīpāyana’s mind by the fourth verse:

4. “They leave the world who are serene, subdued,
Save Kaṇha, all in no unwilling mood;
What makes you shrink, Dīpāyana, and why
Unwilling walk the path of sanctity?”

To answer this, the other repeated the fifth verse: \{4.21\}

5. “He leaves the world, and then again turns back;
An idiot, a fool! So might one think:
'Tis this that makes me shrink,
Thus walk I holy, though the wish I lack,
The cause why I do well, is this –
Praised of the wise the good man’s dwelling is.”\{801\}

Thus having explained his own thought, he asked Maṇḍavya yet again in the sixth verse: \{4.34\}

---

\[801\] Or, Praised of the wise and good religion is.
6. “This your house was like a mere, 802
Food and drink in store supplying:
Sages, travellers, brahmins here
Thirst and hunger satisfying.
Did you fear some scandal, still Giving, yet against your will?”

Then Maṇḍavya explained his thoughts by the seventh verse:

7. “Sire and grandfather holy were,
Lords of gifts most free in giving;
And I followed with all care
Our ancestral way of living;
Lest degenerate I should be
I gave gifts unwillingly.”

After saying this, Maṇḍavya asked his wife a question in the words of the eighth verse: {4.35}

8. “When, a young girl, with undeveloped sense,
I brought you from your home to be my wife,
You did not tell me your indifference,
How without love you lived all your life.
Then why, O fair-limbed lady, did you stay
And live with me in this unloving way?”

And she replied to him by repeating the ninth verse:

9. “'Tis not the custom in this family
For wedded wife to take a newer mate,
Nor ever has been; and this custom I
Would keep, lest I be called degenerate.
'Twas fear of such report that bade me stay
And live with you in this unloving way.” {4.36}

But when this was said, a thought passed through her mind, “My secret is told to my husband, the secret never told before! He will be angry with me; I will crave 802 The word may possibly mean public-house: either is a “drinking place” (avapāna).

pardon in the presence of this ascetic, our confidant.” And to this end she repeated the tenth verse:

10. “Now I have spoken what should be unsaid:
For our son’s sake may it be pardoned.
Stronger than parents’ love is nothing here;
Our Yaññadatta lives, who was but dead!” [4.22]

“Arise, lady,” said Maṇḍavya, “I forgive you. Henceforth do not be hard to me; I will never grieve you.” And the Bodhisatta said, addressing Maṇḍavya, “In gathering ill-gotten gains, and in disbelieving that when you give liberally, the deed is a seed that brings fruit, in this you have done wrong. For the future believe in the merit of gifts, and give them.” This the other promised, and in his turn said to the Bodhisatta, “Sir, you have yourself done wrong in accepting our gifts when walking the path of holiness against your will. Now in order that your deeds may bear abundant fruit, do you for the future walk in holiness with a tranquil heart and pure, delighting in Absorption.” Then they took leave of the Great Being and departed.

From that time forward the wife loved her husband; Maṇḍavya with tranquil heart gave gifts with faith; the Bodhisatta, dispelling his unwillingness, cultivated the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and became destined for Brahmā’s Realm.

This discourse ended, the Teacher declared the Truths; now at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk was established in the fruit of the First Path; and identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was Maṇḍavya, {4.37} Visākhā the wife, Rāhula the son, Sāriputta was Maṇḍavya the Peg, and I was myself Black Dīpāyana.”

Ja 445 Nigrodhajātaka
The Story about Nigrodha (the Orphan) (10s)

In the present the monks remind Devadatta of how the Buddha has taught him well, which he denies. The Buddha tells a story of how three children were raised together, and through one of them they attained to power, but through jealousy the one who had helped them was scorned.

The Bodhisatta = (the orphan who became king) Nigrodha,
“Who is the man.” This story the Teacher told in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. One day the monks said to him, “Friend Devadatta, the Teacher is most helpful to you! From the Teacher you received your ordination, lesser and greater; you have learned the Three Baskets, the word of the Buddha; you have caused Absorption to arise within you; the glory and gain of the One with Ten Powers belong to you.” At this he held up a blade of grass, with the words, “I can see no good that the ascetic Gotama has done me, not even this much!”

They talked it over in the Dhamma Hall. When the Teacher came in, he asked what they talked about as they sat together. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time, but long ago as now Devadatta was ungrateful and treacherous to friends.” And he told them a tale of olden days.

In the past a great monarch named Magadha reigned in Rājagaha. And a merchant of that city brought home for his son’s wife the daughter of some country merchant. But she was barren. In course of time less respect was paid to her for this cause; they all talked, that she might hear, as thus, “While there is a barren wife in our son’s household, how can the family line be kept up?” As this talk kept coming to her ears, she said to herself, “Oh, well, I will pretend to be with child, and trick them.” So she asked a good old nurse of hers, “What is it that women do when they are with child?” and being instructed what to do for preserving the child, concealed the time of her courses; showed a fancy for sour and strange tastes; at the time when the arms and legs begin to swell, she caused them to beat hands and feet and back until they grew swollen; day by day she bandaged her body round with rags and cloths and made it appear greater; blackened the nipples of her breasts; and save that nurse alone, permitted no other to be present at her toilet. Her husband too showed her the attentions proper to her state. After nine months had passed in this fashion, she declared her wish to return home and bring forth her child in her father’s house. So taking leave of her husband’s parents, she mounted a carriage, \(4.38\) and with a large number of attendants left Rājagaha behind her, and proceeded along the road.

803 In vol. ii. page 2 (page 1 of translation, note 4) it is suggested that this may be a magical rite. It may; but the passage here translated supports a simpler meaning. The word in both cases is gabbhaparihāra. Compare p. 124. 14 below (p. 79 of this. book).

Now travelling in front of her was a caravan; and she always came about breakfast time to the place whence that caravan had just gone. And one night, a poor woman in that caravan had borne a son under a banyan tree; and thinking that without the caravan she could not get along, but that if she lived she might receive the child, covered him up\(^804\) as he was, and left him lying there, at the foot of the banyan tree. And the deity of the tree took care of him; he was not any ordinary child, but the Bodhisattva himself had come into the world in that form.

At breakfast time the other travellers arrived at the spot. The woman, with her nurse, going apart to the shade of the banyan tree for her toilet, saw a babe of the colour of gold lying there. By and bye she called out to the nurse that their object was gained; unwound the bandages from her loins;\(^805\) and declared that the babe was her own, and that she had just brought him forth.

The attendants at once raised a tent to seclude her, and in high delight sent a letter back to Rājagaha. Her husband’s parents wrote in \(4.24\) reply that as the babe was born, there was no longer need for her to go to her father’s house; let her return. So to Rājagaha she returned at once. And they acknowledged the babe; and when the babe came to be named, named him after the place where he was born, Nigrodhakumāra, or Master Banyan. That same day, the daughter-in-law of a merchant, on her way home to her father for the birth, brought forth a son beneath the branches of a tree; and him they named Sākhakumāra, Master Branch. And on the same day, the wife of a tailor in the employ of this merchant bore a son amidst his bits of cloth; and him they called Pottika, or Dollie.

\(^{804}\) Lit. partum illuviemque puerperii. [The Pāḷi reads: gabbhamaḷaṇ-ca attharitvā, after covering over the afterbirth from the womb.]

\(^{805}\) Lumbos illuvie puerperii inquinavit. [The Pāḷi reads: pilotikāyo apanetvā ucchaṅgapadesāṁ lohitena ca gabbhamalaṇa ca makkhetvā attano gabbhuvaṭṭhānaṁ ārocesi, after removing the cloth from the loin, and smearing it with blood and afterbirth, she declared that she herself had given birth.]
The great merchant sent for these two children, as having been born on Master Banyan’s birthday, and brought them up with him.

They all grew up together, and by and by went to Taxila to complete their education. Both the merchants’ sons had two thousand pieces to give their teacher for a fee; [4.39] Master Banyan provided Pottika with an education under his own wing.

When their education was finished, they took leave of their teacher, and left him, with intent to learn the customs of the country folk; and travelling on and on, in time they came to Benares, and lay down to rest in a temple. It was then the seventh day since the king of Benares had died. Proclamation was made through the city by beat of drum, that on the morrow the festal carriage would be prepared. The three comrades were lying under a tree asleep, when at dawn Pottika awoke, and sitting up began to massage Banyan’s feet.

Some chickens were roosting upon that tree, and the chicken at the top let a dropping fall upon a chicken near the bottom. [806] “What is that fell upon me?” asked this chicken. “Do not be angry, sir,” answered the other, “I did not mean to do it.” “Oh, so you think my body is a place for your droppings! You don’t know my importance, that is plain!” To this said the other, “Oh, still angry, though I declared that I did not mean it! And what is your importance, pray?” “Whoever kills me and eats my flesh will receive a thousand pieces of money this very morning! Is that not something to be proud of?” “Pooh, pooh,” said the other, “proud of a little thing like that! Why, if any one kills me and eats of my fat, he will become a king this very morning; he that eats the middle flesh, becomes commander-in-chief; who eats the flesh about the bones, he will be treasurer!”

All this Pottika overheard. “A thousand pieces –” he thought, “what is that? Best to be a king!” So gently climbing the tree, he seized the chicken that was roosting atop, and killed it, and cooked it in the embers; the fat he gave to Banyan, the middle flesh to Branch, and himself ate the flesh that was about the bones. When they had eaten, he [4.25] said: “Banyan, sir, today you will be king; Branch, sir, you will be commander-in-chief; and as for me, I’m the treasurer!” They asked him how he knew; he told them.

So about the time for the first meal of the day, they entered the city of Benares. At the house of a certain brahmin they received a meal of rice-porridge, with ghee and sugar; and then emerging from the city, they entered the royal park.

Banyan lay down upon a slab of stone, the other two lay beside it. It so happened that at the moment they were just sending forth the ceremonial chariot, with the five symbols of royalty in it. (The details of this will be given in the Mahājanakajātaka [Ja 539].) In rolled the carriage, and stopping, stood ready for them to enter. “Some being of great merit must be present here!” thought the family priest to himself. He entered the park, and espied the young man; and then removing the cloth from his feet he examined the marks upon them. “Why,” said he, “he is destined to be king of all Jambudīpa, let alone Benares!” and he ordered all the gongs and cymbals to strike up.

Banyan awaking threw the cloth from his face, and saw a crowd assembled round him! He turned round and for a moment or two he lay still; then arose, and sat with his legs crossed. The family priest fell upon one knee, saying: “Divine being, the kingdom is thine!” “So be it,” said the youth; the family priest placed him upon the heap of precious jewels, and sprinkled him to be king.

Thus made king, he gave the post of commander-in-chief to his friend Branch, and entered the city in great pomp; and Pottika went with them.

From that day onward the Great Being ruled righteously in Benares.

One day the memory of his parents came into his mind; and addressing Branch, he said: “Sir, it is impossible to live without father and mother; take a large company of people, and go fetch them.” But Branch refused, “That is not my business,” said he. Then he told Pottika to do it. Pottika agreed, and making his way to Banyan’s parents, told them that their son had become a king, and begged 807 Sword, parasol, diadem, slippers, fan.

---

808 [There are no more details given there.]
809 After this point he is several times called Pottiya.
them to come to him. But they declined, saying that they had power and wealth; enough of that, they would not go. He asked Branch’s parents also to come, and they too preferred to stay; and when he invited his own, they said: “We live by tailoring; enough, enough,” and refused like the rest.

As he didn’t fulfil his desire, he then returned to Benares. Thinking that he would rest from the fatigue of the journey in the house of the commander-in-chief, before seeing Banyan, he went to that house. [4.26] [4.41]

“Tell the commander-in-chief,” said he to the door-keeper, “that his comrade Pottika is here.” The man did so. But Branch had conceived a grudge against him, because, said he, the man had given his comrade Banyan the kingdom instead of himself; so on hearing this message, he waxed angry. “Comrade indeed! Who is his comrade? A mad baseborn churl! Seize him!” So they beat him and kicked him, and belaboured him with foot, knee and elbow, then clutching him by the throat cast him forth.

“Branch,” thought the man, “gained the post of commander-in-chief through me, and now he is ungrateful, and malicious, and has beaten me, and cast me forth. But Banyan is a wise man, grateful and good, and to him I will go.” So to the king’s door he went, and sent a message to the king, that Pottika his comrade was waiting at the door. The king asked him in, and as he saw him approach, rose up from his seat, and went forth to meet him, and greeted him with affection; he caused him to be shaved and cared for, and adorned with all manner of ornaments, then gave him rich meats of every sort to eat; and this done, sat graciously with him, and enquired after his parents, who as the other informed him, refused to come.

Now Branch thought to himself, “Pottika will be slandering me in the king’s ear, but if I am by, he will not be able to speak,” so he also repaired there. And Pottika, even in his presence, spoke to the king saying: “My lord, when I was weary with my journey, I went to Branch’s house, hoping to rest there first and then to visit you. But Branch said, ‘I know him not!’ and evilly treated me, and haled me forth by the neck! Could you believe it!” and with these words, he uttered three verses of verse:

1. “‘Who is the man? I know him not! And the man’s father, who? Who is the man?’ so Sākha said: ‘Nigrodha, what think you?’
2. Then Sākha’s men at Sākha’s word dealt buffets on my face,
And seizing me about the throat cast me forth from the place.

3. That such a deed in treachery an evil man should do!
An ingrate is a shame, O king – and he your comrade, too!” {4.42}

On hearing these, Banyan recited four verses:

4. “I know not, nor have ever heard in speech from any one,
Any such ill as this you tell which Sākha now has done.

5. With me and Sākha you have lived; we both your comrades were;
Of dominion among mankind you gave us each a share:
By you we got Supernormal Powers, and not a doubt is there.

6. As when a seed in fire is cast, it burns, and cannot grow;
Do a good turn to evil men, it perishes even so.

7. The grateful, good, and virtuous, such men are not as they;
In good soil seeds, in good men deeds, are never thrown away.” [4.27]

As Banyan was reciting these lines, Branch stood still where he was. Then the king asked him, “Well, Branch, do you recognise this man Pottika?” He was dumb. And the king laid his bidding upon the man in the words of the eighth verse:

8. “Seize on this worthless traitor here, whose thoughts so evil be;
Spear him! For I would have him die – his life is nought to me!”

But Pottika, on hearing this, thought within himself, “Let not this fool die for my sake!” and uttered the ninth verse: {4.43}

9. “Great king, have mercy! Life once gone is hard to bring again:
My lord forgive, and let him live! I wish the churl no pain.”

When the king heard this, he forgave Branch; and he wished to bestow the place of commander-in-chief upon Pottika, but he would not take it. Then the king gave him the post of Treasurer, and with it went the judgeship of all the merchant guilds. Before that no such office had existed, but there was this office ever after. And by and by Pottika the Royal Treasurer, being blessed with sons and with daughters, uttered the last verse for their admonition:
10. “With Nigrodha one should dwell;
    To wait on Sākha is not well.
    Better with Nigrodha death
    Than with Sākha to draw breath.”

This discourse ended, the Teacher said: “So, monks, you see that Devadatta was ungrateful before,” and then identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Devadatta was Sākha, Ānanda was Pottika, and I myself was Nigrodha.”

Ja 446 Takkaḷajātaka

The Story about the Bulbous Plant (10s)

Alternative Title: Takkalajātaka (Cst)

In the present one layman’s wife encourages him to dispose of his father, but he resists. The Buddha tells a story of the past in which the son almost did dispose of his father, until his own son dug a grave for him too!

The Bodhisatta = the wise boy (paṇḍitakumāra), the father, son and daughter-in-law = the same in the past (pitā ca putto ca suṇisā ca).

Keywords: Ingratitude, Filial piety, Women.

“No bulbs are here.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about a layman who supported his father.

This man we learn was reborn in a needy family. After his mother’s death, he used to rise up early in the morning, and prepare the tooth-twigs and water for cleansing the mouth; then by working for hire or ploughing in the fields, he used to procure rice gruel, and thus fed his father in a manner suiting his station in life. Said his father to him, “My son, whatever is to be done indoors and out you do alone. Let me find you a wife, and she shall do the [4.28] household work for you.” “Father,” says he, “if women come into the house they will bring no peace of mind

---

810 This is a variant of a famous story, known as the Housse Partie. See Clouston, Popular Tales and Fictions, “The ungrateful son” (ii. 372); Jacques de Vitry’s Exempla (Folk Lore Society, 1890), No. 288, with bibliographical note on p. 260.
for me or for you. Pray do not dream of such a thing! While you live, I will support you; \(4.44\) and when you pass away, I shall know what to do.”

But the father sent for a girl, much against his son’s wish; and she looked after her husband and his father; but a low creature she was. Now her husband was pleased with her, for attending upon his father; and whatever he could find to please her, that he brought and gave her; and she presented it to her father-in-law. And there came a time when the woman thought: “Whatever my husband gets, he gives to me, but nothing to his father. It is clear that for his father he cares nothing. I must find some way of setting the old man at variance with my husband, and then I shall get him out of the house.”

So from that time she began to make the water too cold or too hot for him, and the food she salted too much or not at all, and the rice she served up all hard or else soaking wet; and by this kind of thing did all she could to provoke him. Then, when he grew angry, she scolded, “Who can wait on an old creature like this!” said she, and stirred up strife. And all over the ground she would spit, and then stir up her husband. “Look there!” would she say, “that’s your father’s doing! I am constantly begging him not to do this and that, and he only gets angry. Either your father must leave this house, or I!” Then the husband answered, “Lady, you are young, and you can live where you will; but my father is an old man. If you don’t like him, you can leave the house.” This frightened her. She fell at the old man’s feet, and craved pardon, promising to do so no more; and began to care for him as before.

The worthy layman was so worried at first by her goings-on that he omitted visiting the Teacher to hear his discourse; but when she had come to herself again, he went. The Teacher asked why he had not been to hear his preaching this seven or eight days. The man related what had happened. “This time,” said the Teacher, “you refused to listen to her, and to turn out your father; but in former times you did as she bade; you took him to a cemetery, and dug him a pit. At the time when you were about to kill him I was a seven-year-old, and I by recounting the goodness of parents, held you back from parricide. At that time you listened to me; and by tending your father while he lived became destined for paradise. I admonished you then, and warned you not to forsake him when you should come into another life; for this cause you have now refused to do as the woman bade you, and your father has not been killed.” Thus saying, at the man’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there was in a family of a certain village of Kāsi an only son named Vasiṭṭhaka. {4.45} This man supported his parents, and after his mother’s death, he supported his father as has been described in the introduction. But there is this difference. When the woman said: “Look there! That is your father’s doing! I am constantly begging him not to do this and that, and he only gets angry!” she went on, “My lord, your father is fierce and violent, for ever picking quarrels. A decrepit old man like that, tormented with disease, is bound to die soon; and I can’t live in the same house with him. He will die of himself before many days are out; well, take him to a cemetery, and dig a pit, throw him in and break his head with the spade; and when he is dead, shovel the earth upon him, and leave him there.”

At last, by dint of this dinning in his ears, he said: “Wife, to kill a man is a serious matter: how can I do it?” “I will tell you of a way,” said [4.29] she. “Say on, then.” “Well, my lord, at break of day, go to the place where your father sleeps; tell him very loud, that all may hear, that a debtor of his is in a certain village, that you went and he would not pay you, and that if he dies the man will never pay at all; and say that you will both drive there together in the morning. Then at the appointed time get up, and put the animals to the cart, and take him in it to the cemetery. When you get there, bury him in a pit, make a noise as if you had been robbed, wound and wash your head, and return.” “Yes, that plan will do,” said Vasiṭṭhaka. He agreed to her proposal, and got the cart ready for the journey.

Now the man had a son, a lad of seven years, but wise and clever. The lad overheard what his mother said: “My mother,” he thought, “is a wicked woman, and is trying to persuade my father to murder his father. I will prevent my father from doing this murder.” He ran quickly, and lay down beside his grandfather. Vasiṭṭhaka, at the time suggested by the wife, prepared the cart. “Come, father, let us get that debt!” said he, and placed his father in the cart. But the boy got in first of all. {4.46} Vasiṭṭhaka could not prevent him, so he took him to the cemetery with them. Then, placing his father and his son together in a place apart, with the cart, he got down, took spade and basket, and in a spot where he was hidden from them began to dig a hole. The boy got down, and followed him, and as though ignorant what was afoot, opened a conversation by repeating the first verse:

1. “No bulbs are here, no herbs for cooking meet,
   No catmint, nor no other plant to eat.
   Then father, why this pit, if need be none,
   Delve in Death’s acre mid the woods alone?”

Then his father answered by repeating the second verse:

2. “Your grandfather, son, is very weak and old,
   Oppressed by pain from ailments manifold:
   Him will I bury in a pit today;
   In such a life I could not wish him stay.”

Hearing this, the boy answered by repeating a half-verse:

3a. “You have done sinfully in wishing this,
    And for the deed, a cruel deed it is.”

With these words, he caught the spade from his father’s hands, and at no great distance began to dig another pit. [4.47]

His father approaching asked why he dug that pit; to whom he made reply by finishing the third verse:

3b. “I too, when you are aged, father mine,
    Will treat my father as you trestest thine;
    Following the custom of the family
    Deep in a pit I too will bury thee.” [4.30]

To this the father replied by repeating the fourth verse:

4. “What a harsh saying for a boy to say,
   And to upbraid a father in this way!
   To think that my own son should rail at me,
   And to his truest friend unkind should be!”

When the father had thus spoken, the wise lad recited three verses, one by way of answer, and two as exalted utterances in verses:
5. “I am not harsh, my father, nor unkind,
Nay, I regard you with a friendly mind:
But this you do, this act of wrong, your son
Will have no strength to undo again, once done.

6. Whoso, Vasittha, hurts with ill intent
His mother or his father, innocent,
He, when the body is dissolved, shall be
In hell for his next life undoubtedly.

7. Whoso with meat and drink, Vasittha, shall His mother or his father feed withal, {4.48}
He, when the body is dissolved, shall be
In heaven for his next life undoubtedly.”

The father, after hearing his son thus discourse; repeated the eighth verse:

8. “You are no heartless ingrate, son, I see,
But kindly-hearted, O my son, to me;
’Twas in obedience to your mother’s word
I thought to do this horrid deed abhorred.”

Said the lad, when he heard this, “Father, women, when a wrong is done and they are not rebuked, again and again do wrong. You must bend my mother, that she may never again do such a deed as this.” And he repeated the ninth verse:

9. “That wife of yours, that ill-conditioned dame,
My mother, she that brought me forth – the same –
Let us from far out our dwelling expel,
Lest she work other woe on you as well.”

Hearing the words of his wise son, Vasiṭṭhaka was well pleased, and saying: “Let us go, my son!” he seated himself in the cart with son and father.

Now the woman too, this sinner, was happy at heart; for, thought she, this ill-luck is out of the house now. She plastered the place with wet cowdung, and cooked a mess of rice porridge. But as she sat watching the road by which they would return, she espied them coming. “There he is, back with old ill-luck again!” thought she, much in anger. “Fie, good-for-nothing!” cried she, “what, bring back the ill-luck you took away with you!” Vasiṭṭhaka said not a word, but unyoked the cart. [4.31]
Then said he, “Wretch, what is that you say?” He gave her a sound drubbing, and bundled her head over heels out of doors, bidding her never darken his door again. Then he bathed his father and his son, and took a bath himself, \{4.49\} and the three of them ate the rice porridge. The sinful woman dwelt for a few days in another house.

Then the son said to his father, “Father, for all this my mother does not understand. Now let us try to vex her. You give out that in such and such a village lives a niece of yours, who will attend upon your father and your son and you; so you will go and fetch her. Then take flowers and perfumes, and get into your cart, and ride about the country all day, returning in the evening.” And so he did. The women in the neighbour’s family told his wife this; “Have you heard,” they said, “that your husband has gone to get another wife in such a place?” “Ah, then I am undone!” said she, “and there is no place for me left!” But she would enquire of her son; so quickly she came to him, and fell at his feet, crying, “Save you I have no other refuge! Henceforward I will tend your father and grandfather as I would tend a beauteous shrine! Give me entrance into this house once more!” “Yes, mother,” replied the lad, “if you do no more as you did, I will; be of good cheer!” and at his father’s coming he repeated the tenth verse:

\[
10. \text{“That wife of yours, that ill-conditioned dame,} \\
\text{My mother, she that brought me forth – the same –} \\
\text{Like a tamed elephant, in full control,} \\
\text{Let her return again, that sinful soul.”}
\]

So said he to his father, and then went and summoned his mother. She, being reconciled to her husband and the husband’s father, was thenceforward tamed, and endued with righteousness, and watched over her husband and his father and her son; and these two, steadfastly following their son’s advice, gave alms and did good deeds, and became destined to join the hosts of heaven. \{4.50\}

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, declared the Truths; at the conclusion of the Truths, the dutiful son was established in the fruit of the First Path; then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, father and son and daughter-in-law were the same as they are now, and the wise boy was I myself.”
The Section with Ten Verses – 1637

Ja 447 Mahādhammapālajātaka

The Long Story about (the Youth) Dhammapāla (10s)

In the present king Suddhodana refused to believe it when told his son Siddhattha had passed away. The Buddha tells a story of a long lived family, and a father's refusal to believe his son had died, as all in that family passed only in old age owing to their care of the precepts.

The Bodhisatta = the youth Dhammapāla (Dhammapālakumāra), Sāriputta = (his) teacher (ācariya),
members of the royal household = the mother and father (mātāpitaro),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Mvu ii p 107 Dharmapāla.

Keywords: Longevity, Trust.

What custom is it. [4.32] This story the Teacher told, after his first visit (as Buddha) to Kapilapura, while he lodged in his father’s Banyan Grove, about the king his father’s refusal to believe.

At the time, they say that the great king Suddhodana, having given a meal of rice gruel at his own dwelling to the Buddha at the head of twenty thousand monks, during the meal talked pleasantly to him, saying: “Sir, at the time of your striving, some deities came to me, and poised in the air, said: “Your son, prince Siddhattha, has died of starvation.” And the Teacher replied, “Did you believe it, great king?” “Sir, I did not believe it! Even when the deities came hovering in the air, and told me this, I refused to believe it, saying that there was no death for my son until he had obtained Buddhahood at the foot of the Bodhi tree.” Said the Teacher, “Great king, long ago in the time of the great Dhammapāla, even when a world-famed teacher said: “Your son is dead, these are his bones,” you refused to believe, answering, ‘In our family, they never die young;’ then why should you believe now?” and at his father’s request, the Teacher told a tale of long ago.

---

811 Compare Mahāvastu, No. 19.
812 The six years of austerities practised by the Buddha, before he found the peace of Buddhahood.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there was in the kingdom of Kāsi a village named Dhammapāla, and it took that name because the family of one Dhammapāla dwelt there. From his keeping the Ten Paths of Virtue this brahmin was known where he dwelt as Dhammapāla [Dhamma Protector]. In his household, even the servitors gave alms, and observed virtue, and kept the holy day.

At that time the Bodhisatta came to life in that household, and to him they gave the name of Dhammapālakumāra [the Young Dhamma Protector]. As soon as he came of age, his father gave him a thousand pieces, and sent him to study at Taxila. There he went, and studied with a world-famed teacher, and became the chief pupil in a company of five hundred youths.

Just then the eldest son of the teacher died; and the teacher, \{4.51\} surrounded by his pupils, in the midst of his kith and kin, weeping did the lad’s obsequies in the cemetery. Then the teacher with his company of kinsfolk, and all his pupils, were weeping and wailing, but Dhammapāla neither wept nor wailed. When afterwards the five hundred youths had returned from the cemetery, they sat down in their teacher’s presence, \{4.33\} and said: “Ah, so fine a lad, so good, a tender child, to be cut off in his tender age and parted from father and mother!” Dhammapāla replied, “Tender indeed, as you say! Well, why did he die at a tender age? ’Tis not right that children of tender age should die.” Then they said to him, “Why, sir, do you not know that such persons are but mortal?” “I know it; but in tender years they die not; people die when they are grown old.” “Then are not all component things transitory and unreal?” “Transitory they are, it is true; but in the days of youth creatures do not die; it is only when they are grown old that they die.” “Oh, is that the custom of your family?” “Yes, that is the custom in my family.” The lads told this conversation to their teacher. He sent for Dhammapāla, and asked him, “Is it true, Dhammapāla, my son, that in your family they do not die young?” “Yes, teacher,” said he, “it is true.”

On hearing this, the teacher thought: “This is a most marvellous thing he says! I will make a journey to his father, and ask him about it; and if it be true, I will live according to his rule of right.”

So when he had finished for his son all that should be done, after lapse of seven or eight days he sent for Dhammapāla, and said: “My son, I am going away from home; while I am away, you are to instruct these my pupils.” So saying, \{4.52\} he procured the bones of a wild goat, washed them and scented them, and put them in a bag; then taking with him a little page-boy, he left Taxila, and in course of time arrived at that village. There he enquired his way to Mahādhammapāla’s house, and stopped at the door.

The first servant of the brahmin who saw him, whoever it was, took the sunshade from his hand, and took his shoes, and took the bag from the servant. He bade them tell the lad’s father, here was the teacher of his son Dhammapāla the Younger, standing at the door. “Good,” said the servants, and summoned the father to him. Quickly he came to the threshold, and, “Come in!” said he, leading the way into his house. Seating the visitor upon a couch, he did a host’s duty by washing his feet, and so forth.

When the teacher had eaten food, and they sat down for a kindly talk together, said he, “Brahmin, your son young Dhammapāla, when full of wisdom, and a perfect master of the Three Vedas and the Eighteen Accomplishments, by an unhappy chance has lost his life. All component things are transitory; grieve not for him!” The brahmin clapped his hands, and laughed loudly. “Why do you laugh, brahmin?” asked the other. “Because,” said he, “it is not my son who is dead; it must be some other.” “No, brahmin,” was the answer, “your son is dead, and no other. Look on his bones, and believe.” So saying, he unwrapped the bones. “These are your son’s bones,” said he. “A wild goat’s bones, perhaps,” said [4.34] the other, “or a dog’s; but my son is not dead. In our family for seven generations no such thing has been, as a death in tender years; and you are speaking falsehood.” Then they all clapped their hands, and laughed aloud.

The teacher, when he beheld this wonderful thing, was much pleased, and said: “Brahmin, this custom in your family line cannot be without cause, that the young do not die. Why is it then that you do not die young?” And he asked his question by repeating the first verse:

1. “What custom is it, or what holy way,
   Of what good deed is this the fruit, I pray?
   Tell me, O brahmin, what the reason is,
   Why in your line they never die young – say!” [4.53]

Then the brahmin, to explain what virtues had the result that in his family no one died young, repeated the following verses:
2. “We walk in uprightness, we speak no lies,
All foul defilements we do keep afar,
We do eschew all things that evil are,
Therefore in youth not one among us dies.

3. We hear the deeds of foolish and of wise;
Of what the foolish do no heed we take,
The wise we follow, and the fools forsake;
Therefore in youth not one among us dies.

4. In gifts beforehand our contentment lies;
Even while giving we are well content;
Nor having given, do we then repent:
Therefore in youth not one among us dies.

5. Priests, brahmins, wayfarers we satisfy,
Beggars, and mendicants, and all who need,
We give them drink, and hungry folk we feed:
Therefore the young among us do not die.

6. Wedded, for others’ wives we do not sigh,
But we are faithful to the marriage vow;
And faithful are our wives to us, I know:
Therefore the young among us do not die.

7. The children that from these true wives are sprung
Are wise abundantly, to learning bred,
Versed in the Vedas, and all perfected;
Therefore none dies of us while he is young.

8. Each to do right for sake of heaven tries:
So lives the father, and so lives the mother,
So son and daughter, sister so and brother:
Therefore no one of us when youthful dies.

9. For sake of heaven our servants too apply
Their lives to goodness, men and maidens all, [4.54]
Retainers, servitors, each meanest thrall:
Therefore the young among us do not die.” [4.35]

And lastly, by these two verses he declared the goodness of those who walk in righteousness:
10. “Righteousness saves him that thereto is bent;\textsuperscript{813}
Righteousness practised well brings happiness;
Them that do righteously this boon does bless –
The righteous comes not into punishment. \{4.55\}

11. Righteousness saves the righteous, as a shade
Saves in the time of rain: the lad still lives.
Goodness to Dhammapāla safety gives;
Some other’s bones are these you have conveyed.”

On hearing this, the teacher replied, “A happy journey is this journey of mine, fruitful, not without fruit!” Then full of happiness, he begged pardon of Dhammapāla’s father, and added, “I came here, and brought with me these wild goat’s bones, on purpose to try you. Your son is safe and well. I pray you, impart to me your rule of preserving life.” Then the other wrote it upon a leaf; and after tarrying in that place some few days, he returned to Taxila, and having instructed Dhammapāla in all branches of skill and learning, he dismissed him with a great troop of followers.

When the Teacher had thus discoursed to the great king Suddhodana, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the truths the king became established in the fruit of the Third Path. “At that time, mother and father were the great king’s kin, the teacher was Sāriputta, the retinue was the Buddha’s retinue, and I myself was the younger Dhammapāla.”

\textbf{Ja 448 Kukkuṭajātaka}
\textbf{The Story about the (Undeceived) Chicken (10s)}

In the present Devadatta sets out to kill the Buddha, who replies that he did this in the past also, and tells a story of how a falcon tried to lure a chicken to a place where he could kill him, but the chicken was too wise to be deceived.

The Bodhisatta = the chicken (kukkuṭa),
Devadatta = the falcon (sena).

\textsuperscript{813} These four lines occur in the \textit{Life of Buddha} which is prefixed to the Jātaka, vol. i. p. 31 (Pali) [i.e. in the Jātakanidāna], not in the present translation (Rhys Davids, \textit{Buddhist Birth Stories}, p. 34). Compare also Dhp p. 126; Thag p. 35.
Keywords: Deceit, Killing, Animals, Birds.

“Trust not in those.” This story the Teacher told in the Bamboo Grove, on the subject of going about to kill.

In the Dhamma Hall, the monks were discussing the evil nature of Devadatta. “Why, sir, by hiring archers and others to the task, Devadatta is making an attempt to murder the One with Ten Powers!” {4.56} The Teacher, entering, enquired, “What is this, monks, that you speak of [4.36] as you sit here together?” They told him. Said he, “ ’Tis not now the first time that he has tried to murder me, but it was the same before,” and he told them a story.

In the past there reigned in Kosambi814 a king named Kosambaka. At that time the Bodhisatta became the offspring of a wild hen that dwelt in a grove of bamboo trees, and afterwards was the chief of a flock of several hundred fowls in the forest. Not far off lived a falcon, which as he found opportunity caught the fowls one by one and ate them, and in course of time he devoured all the others, and the Bodhisatta was left alone. But he used all caution in seeking his food, and dwelt in a thicket of bamboo. Here the falcon could not get at him, so he set about thinking by what trick he might entice him to capture.

Then he alighted on a branch nearby, and called out, “Worthy Fowl, what makes you fear me? I am anxious to make friends with you. Now in such a place (naming it) is food in plenty; let us feed there together, and live like friends in company.” “No, good sir,” replied the Bodhisatta, “betwixt you and me no friendship can ever be; so begone!” “Good sir, for my former defilements you cannot trust me now; but I promise that I will never do so again!” “No, I care not for such a friend; begone, I say!” Again for the third time the Bodhisatta refused, “With a creature of such qualities,” said he, “friendship there must never be,” and he made the wide woods resound, the deities applauding as he uttered this discourse:

1. “Trust not in those whose words are lies, nor those who only know Self-interest, nor who have done wrong, nor who too-pious show.

814 A city on the Ganges.
2. Some men have nature like the kine, thirsty and full of greed:
   Have words in truth a friend to soothe, but never come to deed.

3. These hold out dry and empty hands; the voice conceals their heart;
   From those who know not gratitude (vain creatures!) keep apart. [4.57]

4. Put not your trust in woman or in man of fickle mind,
   Nor such as having made a pact to break it are inclined.

5. The man who walks in evil ways, to all things threatening death, Unsteadfast, put no trust in him, like keenest sword in sheath.

6. Some speak smooth words that come not from the heart, and try to please
   With many a show of friendship feigned: put not your trust in these.

7. When such an evil-minded man beholds or food or gain,
   He works all ill, and go he will, but first will be your bane.” [4.37] [4.58]

These seven verses were repeated by the king of the fowls. Then were the four verses following recited by the king of the Dhamma, after Fully Awakening:

8. “In friendly show full many a foe follows, his aid to give;
   As the fowl left the falcon, so ’twere best bad men to leave.

9. Who is not quick to recognise the meaning of events,
   Under his foes’ control he goes, and afterward repents.

10. Whoso the meaning of events is quick to recognise,
   As from the falcon’s toils the fowl, so from his foes he flies.

11. From such inevitable and treacherous snare,
   Deadly, set deep mid many a forest tree,
   As from the falcon far the fowl did flee,
   The man of seeing eye afar should fare.”

And he again, after reciting these verses, called the falcon, and reproached him, saying: “If you continue to live in this place, I shall know what to do.” The falcon flew away thence and went to another place. [4.59]

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, said: “Monks, long ago as now Devadatta tried to compass my destruction,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Devadatta was the falcon, and I was myself the fowl.”
Ja 449 Maṭṭakuṇḍalijātaka
The Story about Polished Earrings (10s)

Alternative Title: Maṭṭhakuṇḍalijātaka (Cst)

In the present one layman who has lost his son is given over to grieving. The Buddha tells him a story of one in a similar situation long ago, and how his own son, reborn as a Devas, convinced him grieving was wrong.

The Bodhisatta = the Devaputta who taught Dhamma (Dhammadesakadevaputta).

Present Source: Ja 454 Ghata,
Quoted at: Ja 449 Maṭṭhakuṇḍali,
Past Compare: Dhp-a I.2 Maṭṭhakuṇḍali.

Keywords: Grief, Impermanence, Wisdom, Devas.

“Why in the woodland.” This story the Teacher told while sojourning in Jetavana, about a landowner whose son had died. At Sāvatthi, we learn that death took a beloved son of a certain landowner who used to wait upon the Buddha. Afflicted with grief for his son, the man washed not and ate not, and neither went about his own business nor waited upon the Buddha, only cried, “O my beloved son, you have left me, and gone before!”

As in the morning time the Teacher was looking abroad upon the world, he perceived that this man was ripe for attaining the Fruit of the First Path. So next day, having led his followers through the city of Sāvatthi in search of alms, after his meal was done, he sent the monks away, and attended by elder Ānanda walked to the place where this man lived. They told the landowner that the Teacher had come. Then they of his household prepared a seat, and [4.38] made the Teacher sit down upon it, and led the landowner into the Teacher’s presence. After greeting him, as he sat on one side, the Teacher addressed in a voice tender with compassion, “Do you mourn, lay brother, for an only son?” He answered, “Yes, sir.” Said the Teacher, “Long, long ago, lay brother, wise men who went about afflicted with grief for a son’s death, listened to the words of the wise, and clearly discerning that nothing could bring back the lost, felt no grief, no not even a little.” So saying, at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the son of a very wealthy brahmin, at the age of fifteen or sixteen years, was smitten by a disease, and dying came to being again in the world of the gods. From the time of his son’s death, the brahmin would go to the cemetery, and make his moan, walking around the heap of ashes; and leaving undone all his duties, he walked about smitten with woe. A Devaputta, as he went about, saw the father, and devised a plan for consoling his misery. He went to the cemetery at the time of his mourning, taking upon himself the semblance of the man’s very son, and adorned with all sorts of ornaments, he stood on one side, holding his head in both hands, and lamenting with a loud voice. The brahmin heard the sound, and looked, and full of the love which he bore his son, stopped before him, saying: “My son, dear lad, why do you stand mourning in the midst of this cemetery?” Which question he put in the words of the following verse:

1. “Why in the woodland are you standing here,
   Decorated, with earrings in each ear,
   Fragrant of sandal, holding out your hands?
   What sorrow makes you drop the falling tear?”

And then the youth told his tale by repeating the second verse:

2. “Made of fine gold, and shining brilliantly
   My chariot is, wherein I use to lie:
   For this a pair of wheels I cannot find;
   Therefore I grieve so sore that I must die!”

The brahmin listened, and repeated the third verse:

3. “Golden, or set with jewels, any kind,
   Brazen or silvern, that you have in mind,
   Speak but the word, a chariot shall be made,
   And I thereto a pair of wheels will find!”

Now the Teacher himself, after Fully Awakening, having heard the verse repeated by the young man, repeated the first line of another:

4a. “The brahmin youth replied, when he had done.”

while the young man repeats the remainder: {4.61}
4b. "Monks up yonder are the moon and sun!
By such a pair of wheels as yonder twain
My golden car new radiance hath won!" [4.39]

And immediately after:

5. "You are a fool for this that you have done,
To pray for that which should be craved by none;
I think, young sir, you needs must perish soon,
For you will never get or moon or sun!"

Then:

6. "Before our eyes they set and rise, colour and course unfailing:
None sees a ghost; then which is now more foolish in his wailing?"

So said the youth; and the brahmin, comprehending, repeated a verse:

7. "Of us two mourners, O most sapient youth,
I am the greater fool – you sayest truth,
In craving for a spirit from the dead,
Like a child crying for the moon, in truth!"

Then the brahmin, consoled by the youth’s words, rendered thanks to him by reciting the remaining verses:

8. "Blazing was I, as when a man pours oil upon a fire:
You did bring water, and did quench the pain of my desire. [4.62]

9. Grief for my son – a cruel shaft was lodged within my heart;
You have consoled me for my grief, and taken out the dart.

10. That dart extracted, free from pain, tranquil and calm I keep;
Hearing, O youth, your words of truth no more I grieve, nor weep."[815]

Then said the youth, "I am that son, brahmin, for whom you weep; I have been born in the world of the gods. Henceforward grieve not for me, but give alms and observe virtue, and keep the holy Upasatha." With this admonition, he departed to his own place. And the brahmin followed his advice; and after much generosity and other good deeds, he died, and was born in the world of gods.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths, the landowner was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time, I was myself the Devaputta who uttered this admonition.”

Ja 450 Bīḷārikosiyajātaka

The Story about (the Wealthy Man) Bīḷārikosiya (10s)

In the present one monk is very generous, and will not eat or drink without sharing first. The Buddha tells a story of how the sixth generation child in a generous family proved to be selfish, and how his forebears, reborn as gods, came to teach him the virtuous ways of his family.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Ānanda = (the heavenly musician) Pañcasikha,
Kassapa = (the charioteer) Mātali,
Moggallāna = (the sun god) Sūriya,
Sāriputta = (the moon god) Canda,
the generous monk = the wealthy man (seṭṭhi).

Past Compare: Ja 313 Khantivādi, Ja 450 Bīḷārikosiya, Cp 17 Mātaṅgacariyā, Mvu iii p 455 Kṣāntivāda, Jm 28 Kṣānti.

Keywords: Generosity, Giving, Devas.

“When food is not.” [4.40] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about a monk who was devoted to giving.

This man, we are told, having heard the preaching of the Dhamma, from the time when he embraced the dispensation was devoted to giving, eager for giving. Never a bowlful he ate unless he shared it with another; even water he would not drink, unless he gave of it to another, so absorbed was he in giving.

Then they began to talk of his good qualities in the Dhamma Hall. Entered the Teacher, and asked what they talked about as they sat there, and they told him. Sending for the monk, he asked him, “Is it true, what I hear, monk, that you are devoted to giving, eager to give?” He replied, “Yes, sir.” Said the Teacher, “Long ago, monks, this man was without faith and unbelieving; not so much as a drop of oil on the end of a blade of grass did he give to any one; then I humbled him, and converted him and made him humble, and taught him the fruit of giving; and this giving heart of his does not leave him even in another life.” So saying, he told a story of the past.816

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a rich man’s family; and coming of age, he acquired a property, and at his father’s death received his father’s station as merchant.

One day, as he reviewed his wealth, he thought: “My wealth is here, sure enough, but where are those who gathered it? I must disperse my wealth, and give alms.” So he built an alms house, and while he lived distributed much alms; and when his days were drawing to a close, charging his son not to discontinue the practice of generosity, he was born again as Sakka in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three. And the son gave alms as his father had given, and with the like charge to his son, was born as Canda, the Moon, among the Devaputtas. And his son became Suriya, the Sun, who begat another that became Mātali the Charioteer,817 and his son was born again as Pañcasikha, one of the Gandhabbas, or celestial musicians. But the sixth of the line was without faith, hardhearted, loveless, stingy; and he demolished the alms house, burnt it, beat the beggars and sent them about their business; gave no one so much as an oil drop on the end of a blade of grass.

Then Sakka, King of the Devas, looked back over his doings in the past, wondered, “Does my tradition of generosity continue or no?” Pondering he perceived this, “My son continued the giving, and he is become Canda; and his son is Suriya, and his son is Mātali, and his son has been born as Pañcasikha; but the sixth in line has broken the tradition.” Then this thought occurred to him; he would go humble that bad man, and teach him the fruit of giving. So he summoned to him Canda, Suriya, Mātali, Pañcasikha, and said: “Sirs, the sixth in our line has broken our family tradition; he has burnt the alms house, the beggars he has driven away;

---

816 Part of this tale occurs in No. 313, vol. iii.
817 i.e. of Sakka, or Indra.
he gives nothing to any one. Then let us humble him!” So with them he proceeded to Benares.

At that moment the merchant had been to wait upon the king, and having returned, was walking to and fro under the seventh gate-tower, looking along the road. Sakka said to the others, “Do you wait until I go in, and then follow one after another.” With these words he went forward, and standing before the rich merchant, said to him, “Ho, sir! Give me to eat!” “There is nothing to eat for you here, brahmin; go elsewhere.” “Ho, great sir! When brahmins ask for food, it must not be refused them!” “In my house, brahmin, is neither food cooked nor food ready for cooking; away with you!” “Great sir, I will repeat to you a verse of poetry – listen.” Said he, “I want none of your poetry; get you gone, and do not keep standing here.” But Sakka, without attending to his words, recited two verses:

1. “When food is not within the pot, the good would get, and not deny:
   And you are cooking! ’Twere not good, if you would now no food supply.

2. He who remiss and niggard is, ever to give denies;
   But he who virtue loves, must give, and he whose mind is wise.”

When the man had heard this, he answered, “Well, come in and sit down; and you shall have a little.” Sakka entered, repeating these verses, and sat down.

Next up came Canda, and asked for food. “There’s no food for you,” said the man, “go away!” He replied, “Great sir, there is one brahmin seated within; there must be a free meal for a brahmin, I suppose, so I will enter too.” “There is no free meal for a brahmin!” said the man, “be off with you!” Then Canda said: “Great sir, please do listen to a verse or two,” and repeated two verses: (whenever a terrified niggard gives to none, that very thing that he fears comes to him as he gives not:)

3. “When fear of hunger or of thirst makes niggard souls afraid,
   In this world and the next those fools shall fully be repaid.

---

819 This seems to be a gloss.
4. Therefore give alms, flee covetise, purge filth of greed away,
In the next world men’s virtuous deeds shall be their surest stay.” \{4.65\}

Having listened to these words also, the man said: “Well, come in, and you shall have a little.” In he came, and took a seat with Sakka. \[4.42\]

After waiting a little while, Suriya came up, and asked for food by repeating two verses:

5. “’Tis hard to do as good men do, to give as they can give,
   Bad men can hardly imitate the life that good men live.

6. And so, when good and evil go to pass away from earth,
   The bad are born in hell below, in heaven the good have birth.”

The rich man, not seeing any way out of it, said to him, “Well, come in and sit down with these brahmins, and you shall have a little.” And Mātali, after waiting a little while, came up and asked for food; and when he was told there was no food, as soon as the words were spoken, repeated the seventh verse:

7. “Some give from little, some give not though they have plenteous store:
   Who gives from little, if he gave a thousand, ’twere no more.” \[4.66\]

To him also the man said: “Well, come in and sit down.” Then after waiting a little while, Pañcasikha came up and asked for food. “There’s none, go away,” was the reply. Said he, “What a number of places I have visited! There must be a free meal for brahmins here, I think!” And he began to hold forth to him, repeating the eighth verse:

8. “Even he who lives on scraps should righteous be,
   Giving from little store, though sons have he;
   The hundred thousand which the wealthy give,
   Are worth not one small gift from such as he.”

The rich man pondered, on hearing the speech of Pañcasikha. Then he repeated the ninth verse, to ask an explanation of the little worth of such gifts:
9. “Why is a rich and generous sacrifice
Not equal to a righteous gift in price,
How is a thousand, which the wealthy gives,
Not worth a poor man’s gift, though small in size?” {4.67}

In reply, Pañcasikha recited the concluding verse:

10. “Some who in evil ways do live
Oppress, and slay, then comfort give:
Their cruel sour-faced gifts are less
Than any given with righteousness.
Thus not a thousand from the wealthy can Equal the little gift of such a man.”

Having listened to the admonition of Pañcasikha, he replied, “Well, go indoors and be seated; you shall have a little.” And he too entered, and sat with the rest.

Then the rich merchant Bīḷārikosiya, beckoning to a maidservant, said to her, “Give yonder brahmins a measure apiece of rice in the husk.” [4.43]

She brought the rice, and approaching them, bade them bake it, and get it cooked somewhere, and eat. “We never touch rice in the husk,” said they. “Master, they say that they never touch rice in the husk!” “Well, give them husked rice.” She brought them husked rice, and bade them take it. They said: “We accept nothing that is uncooked.” “Teacher, they accept nothing that is uncooked!” “Then cook them some cows’ food in a pot, and give them that.” She cooked in a pot a mess of cows’ food, and brought it to them. All the five of them took up each a mouthful, and put it into their mouths, but let it stick in the throat; then rolling their eyes, they became unconscious, and lay as though dead.

The serving-maid seeing this thought they must be dead, and much afraid went and told the merchant, saying: “Master, those brahmins could not swallow the cows’ food, {4.68} and they are dead!” He thought: “Now people will upbraid me, saying, ‘This lewd fellow gave a mess of cows’ food to delicate brahmins, which they could not swallow, and they died!’ ” Then he said to the maid, “Go quickly, take away the food from their bowls, and cook them a mess of all sorts of the finest rice.” She did so.

The merchant fetched in the passers-by from the road within, and when he had gathered a number of them together he said: “I gave these brahmins food after my own manner of eating, and they were greedy and made great lumps, and so as they ate, the food stuck in the throat, and they are dead. I call you to witness that I am guiltless.” Before the crowd thus gathered together the brahmins arose, and said, looking upon the multitude, “Behold the deceitfulness of this merchant! He gave us of his own food, said he! A mess of cow’s food is all he gave us at first, and then while we lay as dead, he caused this food to be prepared.” And they cast forth from their mouths the food which they had taken, and showed it. The crowd upbraided the merchant, crying, “Blind fool! You have broken the custom of your family; you have burnt the alms-hall; the beggars you have taken by the throat and cast forth; and now when you were giving food to these delicate brahmins, all you gave was a mess of cows’ food! As you go to the other world, I suppose you will carry the wealth of your house fast about your neck!”

At this moment, Sakka asked the crowd, “Do you know whose is the wealth of this house?” “We know not,” they replied. Said he, “You have heard tell of a great merchant of Benares, who lived in this city once upon a time, and built halls of alms house, and in generosity gave much?” “Yes,” they said, “we have heard of him.” “I am that merchant,” he said, “and by those gifts I am now become Sakka, King of the Devas; and my son, who did not break my tradition, has become a Devaputta, Canda; and his son is Suriya, and his son is Mātali, and his son is Pañcasikha; of these, yonder is Canda, and that is Suriya, and this is Mātali the charioteer, and this again is Pañcasikha, now a heavenly musician, once father of yonder lewd fellow! So potent is the giving of gifts; therefore wise men ought to do virtuously.”

Thus speaking, with a view to dispelling the doubts of the people there assembled, they rose up in the air, and remained poised, by their mighty power surrounding themselves with a great host, their bodies all ablaze, so that the whole city seemed to be on fire. Then Sakka addressed the crowd, “We left our heavenly glory in coming here, and we came on account of this sinner Biḷārikosiya, this last of his race, the devourer of all his race. In pity for him are we come, because we knew that this sinner had broken the tradition of his family, and burnt the alms house, and haled forth the beggars by the throat, and had violated our custom, and that by ceasing to give alms he would be born again in hell.” Thus did he discourse to the crowd, telling the potency of generosity. Biḷārikosiya put his hands together in supplication, and made a vow, “My lord, from this time forth I will no more break the family custom, but I will distribute alms; and beginning from this very day, I will never eat, without sharing with another my own supplies, even the water I drink and the tooth-cleaner which I use.”

Sakka having thus humbled him, and made him self-denying, and established him in the five precepts, went away to his own place, taking the four Devaputtas with him. And the merchant gave alms as long as he lived, and was born in the heaven of the Thirty-Three.

The Teacher, having finished this discourse, said: “Thus, monks, this monk in former times was unbelieving, and never gave even a little to any one, but I humbled him, and taught him the fruit of generosity; and that mind leaves him not, even when he enters another life.” Then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, the generous monk was the rich man, Sāriputta was Canda, Moggallāna was Suriya, Kassapa was Mātali, Ānanda was Pañcasikha, and I myself was Sakka.”

Ja 451 Cakkavākajātaka

The Story about the Ruddy Geese (10s)

In the present one monk is very greedy, and the monks talk about him. The Buddha tells a story about a crow who tried various kinds of food, in the hope of looking better, and the goose who taught him that virtue, not food, makes one attractive.

The Bodhisatta = the ruddy goose (cakkavāka),
Rāhulamātā = (his wife) the ruddy goose (cakkavākī),
the greedy monk = the crow (kāka).

Past Compare: Ja 434 Cakkavāka, Ja 451 Cakkavāka.

Keywords: Greed, Virtue.

Fine-coloured are you. [4.70] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a greedy monk. This man, it is said, dissatisfied with his mendicant’s garb and so forth, used to march about asking, “Where is there a meal for the Saṅgha? Where is there an invitation?” and when he heard mention [4.45] of meat, he showed great delight. Then some well-meaning monks, from kindness towards him, told the Teacher about it. The Teacher summoning him, asked, “Is it true, monk, as I hear, that you are greedy?” “Yes, my lord, it is true,” said he. “Monk,” said the Teacher, “why are you greedy, after embracing a dispensation like ours, that leads to safety? The state of greed is sinful; long ago, by reason of greed, you were not satisfied with the dead bodies of elephants and other offal in Benares, and went away into the mighty forest.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a greedy crow was not content with the corpses of elephants in Benares, and all the other offal. “Now I wonder,” he thought, “what the forests may be like?” So to the forest he went; but neither was he satisfied with the wild fruits that he found there, and proceeded to the Ganges. As he passed along the bank of the Ganges, spying a pair of ruddy geese, he thought: “Yonder birds are very beautiful; I suppose they find plenty of meat to eat on this Ganges bank. I will question them, and if I too can eat their food doubtless I shall have a fine colour like them.” So perching not far from the pair, he put his question to the ruddy goose by reciting two verses:

1. “Fine-coloured are you, fair of form, all plump in body, red of hue, O Goose! I swear you are most fair, your face and senses clear and true!

2. Sitting on the Ganges’ bank you feedest on the pike and bream, Roach, carp, and all the other fish that swim along the Ganges’ stream!”

The ruddy goose contradicted him by reciting the third verse: {4.71}

3. “No bodies from the tide I eat, nor lying in the wood: All kinds of weed – on them I feed; that, friend, is all my food.”

Then the crow recited two verses:

4. “I cannot credit what the goose avers about his meat. Things in the village soused with salt and oil are what I eat,

5. A mess of rice, all clean and nice, which a man makes and pours Upon his meat; but yet, my colour, goose, is not like yours.”

Thereupon the ruddy goose recited to him the remaining verses showing forth the reason of his ugly colour, and declaring righteousness:

820 cakkavāko, Anas Casarca.
821 The fish named are: pāvusa, vālaja, muñja, rohita (Cyprinus Rohita), and pāṭhīna (Silvans Boalis).
6. “Beholding wrong your heart within, destroying humankind,
In fear and fright your food you eat; therefore this hue you find.

7. Crow, you erred in the world by defilements of former lives,
You have no pleasure in your food; 'tis this your colour gives.

8. But, friend, I eat and do no hurt, not anxious, at my ease,
Having no trouble, fearing nought from any enemies. [4.46]

9. Thus you should do, and mighty grow, renounce your evil ways,
Walk in the world and do no hurt; then all will love and praise.

10. Who to all creatures kindly is, nor wounds nor makes to wound,
Who harries not, none harry him, 'gainst him no hate is found.” [4.72]

“Therefore if you wish to be beloved by the world, abstain from all evil passions,” so said the ruddy goose, declaring righteousness. The crow replied, “Don’t prate to me of your manner of feeding!” and crying, “Caw! Caw!” flew away through the air to the dunghill of Benares.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths; now at the conclusion of the Truths, the greedy monk was established in the fruit of the Third Path), “At that time, the greedy monk was the crow, Rāhula’s mother was the mate of the ruddy goose, and I was the ruddy goose myself.”

Ja 452 Bhūripaññajātaka

The Story about the Profound Question (10s)

Alternative Title: Bhūripaññajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks speak about the Buddha’s wisdom, and he tells this story illustrating his wisdom in a past life. A king vanquished a wise man unjustly, but when he found his advisors could not calm his fears, he sent four of his courtiers to find him and bring him back. He came and admonished him for his injustice.

The Bodhisatta = (paṇḍita) Mahosadha,
Suddhodana = his father (piṭā),
Mahāmāyā = his mother (mātā),
Bimbasundarī = (his wife) Amarā.

Past Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Is it true, indeed.” This Bhūripañhajātaka will appear in the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

The king, smitten with mortal fear, sent out the next day four of his courtiers, with orders to mount each in a chariot, and to go forth from the four gates of the city, and wheresoever they should find his son, the wise Mahosadha, to show him all honour and speedily to bring him back. Three of these found not the sage; but the fourth who went out by south gate found the Great Being in the south town, who, after fetching clay and turning his master’s wheel, sat all clay-besmeared on a bundle of straw eating balls of rice dipped in a little soup. Now the reason why he did so was this: he thought that the king might suspect him of desiring to grasp the sovereign power, but if he heard that he was living by the craft of a potter this suspicion would be put away. When he perceived the courtier he knew that the man had come for himself; he understood that his prosperity would be restored, and he should eat all manner of choice food prepared by the lady Amarā: so he dropped the ball of rice which he held, stood up, and rinsed his mouth. At that moment up came the courtier: now this was one of Senaka’s faction, so he addressed him rudely as follows, “Wise Teacher, what Senaka said was useful information. Your prosperity gone, all your wisdom was unavailing; and now there you sit all besmeared with clay on a truss of straw, eating food like that!” and he recited this verse from the Bhūripañha or Question of Wisdom, Book X:

1. “Is it true, as they say, that you are one of profound wisdom? So great prosperity, cleverness, and intelligence does not serve you, thus brought to insignificance, while you eat a little soup like that.”

Then the Great Being said: “Blind fool! By power of my wisdom when I want to restore that prosperity I will do it,” and he recited a couple of verses.

2. “I make weal ripen by woe, I discriminate between seasonable and unseasonable times, hiding at my own will; I unlock the doors of profit; therefore I am content with boiled rice.”
3. When I perceive the time for an effort, maturing my profit by my designs, I will bear myself valiantly like a lion, and by that mighty power you shall see me again."

Then the courtier said: “Wise sir, the deity who lives in the parasol has put a question to the king, and the king asked the four wise men – not a man of them could solve it! Therefore the king has sent me for you.” “In that case,” said the Great Being, “do you not see the power of wisdom? At such a time prosperity is of no use, but only one who is wise.” Thus he praised wisdom. Then the courtier handed over to the Great Being the thousand pieces of money and the suit of clothes provided by the king, that he might bathe him and dress at once. The potter was terrified to think that Mahosadha the sage had been his workman, but the Great Being consoled him, saying: “Fear not, my master, you have been of great help to me.” Then he gave him a thousand pieces; and with the mud-stains yet upon him mounted in the chariot and went to town.

The courtier told the king of his arrival. “Where did you find the sage, my son?” “My lord, he was earning his livelihood as a potter in the south town; but as soon as he heard that you had sent for him, without bathing, the mud yet staining his body, he came.” The king thought: “If he were my enemy he would have come with pomp and retinue; he is not my enemy.” Then he gave orders to take him to his house, and bathe him, and adorn him, and to bid him come back with the pomp that should be provided. This was done. He returned, and entered, and gave the king greeting, and stood on one side. The king spoke kindly to him, then to test him spoke this verse:

4. “Some do no wrong because they are wealthy, but others do no wrong for fear of the taint of blame. You are able, if your mind desired much wealth. Why do you not do me harm?”

The Bodhisatta said:

5. “Wise men do not sinful deeds for the sake of the pleasure that wealth gives. Good men, even though struck by misfortune and brought low, neither for friendship nor for enmity will renounce the right.”

Again the king recited this verse, the mysterious saying of a Khattiya:
6. “He who for any cause, small or great, should upraise himself from a low place, thereafter would walk in righteousness.”

And the Great Being recited this verse with an illustration of a tree:

7. “From off a tree beneath whose shade a man should sit and rest, 'Twere treachery to lop a branch. False friends we do detest.”

Then he went on, “Sire, if it is treachery to lop a branch from a tree which one has used, what are we to say of one who kills a man? Your majesty has given my father great wealth, and has shown me great favour: how could I be so treacherous as to injure you?” Thus having demonstrated altogether his loyalty he reproached the king for his fault:

When any man has disclosed the right to any, or has cleared his doubts, the other becomes his protection and refuge; and a wise man will not destroy this friendship.

Now admonishing the king he spoke these two verses:

8. “The idle sensual layman I detest,
The false ascetic is a rogue confessed.
A bad king will a case unheard decide;
Wrath in the sage can ne’er be justified.

9. The warrior prince takes careful thought, and well-weighed verdict gives,
When kings their judgment ponder well, their fame for ever lives.”

Ja 453 Mahāmaṅgalajātaka
The Story about the Great Omens (10s)

In the present people are undecided as to what constitutes a true omen in the world. The Buddha tells a story of how a wise man of old had answered the very same question and what are the real omens in life.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
Sāriputta = the elder pupil who asked what was auspicious (maṅgalapañhapucchako jetṭhantevāsika), the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s followers (isigaṇa).

Present and Past Compare: Snp II.4 Mahāmaṅgalasutta.
Keywords: Superstition, Wisdom.

“Declare the truth.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about the Mahāmaṅgala Discourse, or the Treatise on Omens.\(^{822}\) At the city of Rājagaha for some cause or another a great company had gathered in the royal resting-house, and among these was a man who got up, and went out, with the words, “This is a day of good omen.” Someone else heard it, and said: “That fellow has gone out talking of ‘omens;’ what does he mean by omen?” Said a third, “The sight of anything with a lucky look is a good omen; suppose a man \(^{4.47}\) rises early and see a perfectly white bull, or a woman with child, or a red fish,\(^{823}\) or a jar filled to the brim, or new-melted ghee of cow’s-milk, or a new unwashed garment, or rice porridge, there is no omen better than these.” Some of the bystanders commended this explanation, “Well put,” said they.

But another \(^{4.73}\) broke in, “No, there’s no omen in those; what you hear is the omen. A man hears people saying ‘Full,’ then he hears ‘Full-grown’ or ‘Growing,’ or he hears them say ‘Eat’ or ‘Chew’: there’s no omen better than these.” Some bystanders said: “Well put,” and commended this explanation.

Another said: “There’s no omen in all that; what you touch\(^{824}\) is the omen. If a man gets up early, and touches the earth, or touches green grass, fresh cow-dung, a clean robe, a red fish, gold or silver, food, there’s no better omen than these.” And here too some of the bystanders approved, and said it was well put. And then the partisans of omens of sight, omens of sound, omens of touch formed into three groups, but were unable to convince one another.

From the deities of the earth to Brahmā’s Realm none could say exactly what an omen was. Sakka thought: “Among gods and men no one but the Fortunate One is able to solve this question of the omens. To the Fortunate One I will go, and put the question to him.” So at night he paid a visit to the Fortunate One, and greeted him, and placing his hands together in supplication, he put the question beginning, “Many gods and men there be.” Then the Teacher in twelve verses told him the eight-and-thirty great omens. And as he repeated the omen-verses one after \(^{822}\) See Snp 2.4.

\(^{823}\) Cyprinus Rohita.

\(^{824}\) Mutamū must be here a corrupt form of Skt. mṛṣṭamū “touched.”
another, gods to the number of ten thousand millions became Arahats, and of those who entered the other three Paths there is no counting. When Sakka had heard the omens he returned to his own place. When the Teacher had told the omens, the world of men and the world of gods approved, and said: “Well put.”

Then in the Dhamma Hall they began to discuss the virtues of the Tathāgata, “Sirs, the Omen Problem was beyond the scope of others, but the Buddha comprehended the hearts of men and of gods, and solved their doubt, as if he were making the moon rise in the sky! Ah, very wise is the Tathāgata, my friends!” The Teacher entered and asked what they were talking about, as they sat there, and they told him. Said he, “It is no marvel, monks, that I solved the problem of the omens now that I am possessed of perfect wisdom; but even when I walked on earth as Bodhisatta, I solved the doubts of men and of gods, by answering the Omen Problem.” So saying, he told a story of the past. {4.74}

In the past the Bodhisatta was born in a certain town in the family of a wealthy brahmin, and they named him Rakkhitakumāra [Young Protector]. When he grew up, and had completed his education at Taxila, he married a wife, and on his parents’ demise, he made enquiry into his treasures; then being much exercised in mind, he distributed alms, and mastering his passions became an ascetic in the regions of the Himālayas, where he developed Supernormal Powers, and dwelt in a certain spot, nourishing himself upon the roots and fruits of the forest. In course of time his followers became a great number, five hundred disciples that lived with him.

One day, these ascetics, approaching the Bodhisatta, thus addressed him, “Teacher, when the rainy season comes, let us go down from the Himālayas, and traverse the countryside to get salt and seasoning; thus [4.48] our bodies will become strong, and we shall have performed our pilgrimage.” “Well, you may go,” said he, “but I will stay where I am.” So they took leave of him, and went down from the Himālayas, and proceeded on their rounds till they came to Benares, where they took up their dwelling in the king’s park, and much honour and hospitality was shown to them.

Now one day there was a great crowd come together in the royal rest-house at Benares, and the Omen Problem was discussed. All must be understood to happen as in the introduction to this story. Then, as before, the crowd saw no one who could allay the doubts of men and solve the problem of the omens; so they repaired to the park, and put their problem to the body of sages. The sages addressed the king, saying: “Great king, we cannot solve this question, but our Teacher, the ascetic Rakkhita, a most wise man, dwells in the Himālayas; he will solve the question, for he comprehends the thoughts of men and of gods.” Said the king, “The Himālayas, good sirs, is far, and hard to come at; we cannot go there. Will you not go yourselves to your Teacher, and ask him the question, and when you have learned it, return and tell it to us?” This they promised to do; and when they had returned to their Teacher, and greeted him, and he had asked of the king’s well-being and the practices of the country folk, they told him all the story of the omens of sight and so forth, from beginning to end, \[4.75\] and explained how they came on the king’s errand, to hear the answer to the question with their own ears, “Now, sir,” they said, “be pleased to make clear this Omen Problem to us, and tell us the truth.” Then the eldest disciple asked his question of the Teacher by reciting the first verse:

1. “Declare the truth to mortal man perplexed,
   And tell what scripture, or what holy text,
   Studied and said at the auspicious hour,
   Gives blessing in this world and in the next?”

When the eldest disciple had put the omen problem in these words, the Great Being, allaying the doubts of gods and men, answered, “This and this is an omen,” and thus describing the omens with a Buddha’s skill, said,

2. “Whoso the gods, and all that fathers\[825\] be,
   And reptiles, and all beings, which we see,
   Honours for ever with a kindly heart,
   Surely a blessing to all creatures he.” \[4.76\]

Thus did the Great Being declare the first omen, and then proceeded to declare the second, and all the rest:

---

\[825\] “Brahmins of the world of Form and of No-Form.” Commentator.
3. “Who shows to all the world a modest cheer,
   To men and women, sons and daughters dear,
   Who to reviling answers not in kind,
   Surely a blessing he to every peer. [4.49]

4. Who clear of intellect, in crisis wise,
   Nor playmates nor companions does despise,
   Nor boasts of birth or wisdom, caste, or wealth,
   Among his mates a blessing does arise.

5. Who takes good men and true his friends to be,
   That trust him, for his tongue from venom free,
   Who never harms a friend, who shares his wealth,
   Surely a blessing among friends is he.

6. Whose wife is friendly, and of equal years,
   Devoted, good, and many children bears,
   Faithful and virtuous and of gentle birth,
   That is the blessing that in wives appears.

7. Whose king the mighty Lord of Beings is,
   That knows pure living and all potencies,
   And says, ‘He is my friend,’ and means no guile
   That is the blessing that in monarchs lies.

8. The true believer, giving drink and food,
   Flowers and garlands, perfumes, ever good,
   With heart at peace, and spreading joy around:
   This in all heavens brings beatitude.

9. Whom by good living virtuous sages try
   With effort strenuous to purify, [4.77]
   Good men and wise, by tranquil life built up,
   A blessing he mid saintly company.” [4.78]

Thus the Great Being brought his discourse to its peak in being an Arahant; and having in eight verses explained the Omens, in praise of those same Omens recited the last verse:
10. “These blessings then, that in the world befall,
   Esteemed by all the wise, magnifical,
   What man is prudent let him follow these,
   For in the omens is no truth at all.”

The sages, having heard about these Omens, stayed for seven or eight days, and then took leave and departed to that same place.

The king visited them and asked his question. They explained the Problem of the Omens in the same way as it had been told to them, and went back to the Himālayas. Thenceforward the matter of omens was understood in the world. And having attended to the matter of omens, as they died they went each to swell the hosts of heaven. The Bodhisatta cultivated the Divine Abidings, and along with his band of followers was born in Brahmā’s Realm.

The Teacher having ended this discourse, said: “Not now alone, monks, but in olden days I explained the Problem of the Omens,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, the company of Buddha’s followers were the band of sages; Sāriputta was the senior of the pupils, who asked the question about omens; and I myself was the Teacher.”

Ja 454 Ghatajātaka

The Story about (the Wise) Ghata (10s)

Alternative Title: Ghaṭapaṇḍitajātaka (Cst)

In the present one layman who has lost his son is given over to grieving. The Buddha tells a story-cycle of a woman who had ten sons and how they conquered first their uncle’s kingdom, and then other kingdoms. And how an ass guarded a city, and how a king was instructed following the loss of his son.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Ghata (Ghatapaṇḍita),
Sāriputta = (the king) Vāsudeva,
Ānanda = (the courtier) Rohiṇeyya,
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast.

826 The prophecy, and the tower, and the result, will remind the reader of Danae.
This story the Teacher told in Jetavana about a son’s death. The circumstances are like those in the Maṭṭhakunḍalijātaka [Ja 449].

As in the morning time the Teacher was looking abroad upon the world, he perceived that this man was ripe for attaining the Fruit of the First Path. So next day, having led his followers through the city of Sāvatthi in search of alms, after his meal was done, he sent the monks away, and attended by elder Ānanda walked to the place where this man lived. They told the landowner that the Teacher had come. Then they of his household prepared a seat, and made the Teacher sit down upon it, and led the landowner into the Teacher’s presence.

Here again the Teacher asked the lay brother, “Are you in grief, layman?” He replied, “Yes, sir.” “Layman,” said the Teacher, “long ago wise men listened to the bidding of the wise, and did not grieve for the death of a son.” And at his request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, a king named Mahākaṁsa reigned in Uttarāpatha, in the Kaṁsa district, in the city of Asitaṅjanā. He had two sons, Kaṁsa and Upakaṁsa, and one daughter named Devagabbhā. On her birthday the brahmins who foretold the future said of her, “A son born of this girl will one day destroy the country and the lineage of Kaṁsa.” The king was too fond of the girl to put her to death; but leaving her brothers to settle it, lived his days out, and then died. When he died Kaṁsa became king, and Upakaṁsa was viceroy. They thought that there would be an outcry were they to put their sister to death, so they resolved to give her in marriage to no one, but to keep her husbandless, and watched over; and they built a single round-tower, for her to live in.
Now she had a serving-woman named Nandagopā, and the woman’s husband, Andhakaven̄hu, was the servant who watched her. At that time a king named Mahāsāgara reigned in Upper Madhurā, and he had two sons, Sāgara and Upasāgara. At their father’s death, Sāgara became king, and Upasāgara was viceroy. This lad was Upakaṁsa’s friend, brought up together with him and trained by the same teacher. But he intrigued in his brother’s harem, and being detected, ran away to Upakaṁsa in the Kaṁsa estate. Upakaṁsa introduced him to king Kaṁsa, {4.80} and the king had him in great honour.

Upasāgara while waiting upon the king observed the tower where dwelt Devagabbhā; and on asking who lived there, heard the story, and fell in love with the girl. And Devagabbhā one day saw him as he went with Upakaṁsa to wait upon the king. She asked who that was; and being told by Nandagopā that it was Upasāgara, son of the great king Sāgara, she too fell in love with him. Upasāgara gave a present to Nandagopā, saying: “Sister, you can arrange a meeting for me with Devagabbhā.” “Easy enough,” said Nandagopā, and told the girl about it. She being [4.51] already in love with him, agreed at once.

One night Nandagopā arranged a tryst, and brought Upasāgara up into the tower; and there he stayed with Devagabbhā. And by their constant intercourse, Devagabbhā conceived. By and by it became known that she was with child, and the brothers questioned Nandagopā. She made them promise her pardon, and then told the ins and outs of the matter. When they heard the story, they thought: “We cannot put our sister to death. If she bears a daughter, we will spare the babe also; if a son, we will kill him.” And they gave Devagabbhā to Upasāgara to wife.

When her full time came to be delivered, she brought forth a daughter. The brothers on hearing this were delighted, and gave her the name of the lady Añjanā. And they allotted to them a village for their estate, named Govaḍḍhamāna. Upasāgara took Devagabbhā and lived with her at the village of Govaḍḍhamāna.

Devagabbhā was again with child, and that very day Nandagopā conceived also. When their time was come, they brought forth on the same day, Devagabbhā a son and Nandagopā a daughter. But Devagabbhā, in fear that her son might be put to death, sent him secretly to Nandagopā, and received Nandagopā’s daughter in return. They told the brothers of the birth. “Son or daughter?” they asked. {4.81} “Daughter,” was the reply. “Then see that it is reared,” said the brothers. In the same way Devagabhā bore ten sons, and Nandagopā ten daughters. The sons lived with Nandagopā and the daughters with Devagabhā, and not a soul knew the secret.

The eldest son of Devagabhā was named Vāsudeva, the second Baladeva, the third Candadeva, the fourth Suriyadeva, the fifth Aggideva, the sixth Varuṇadeva, the seventh Ajjuna, the eighth Pajjuna, the ninth Ghatapaṇḍita, the tenth Aṅkura. 827 They were well known as the sons of Andhakaveṇhu the servitor, the ten slave-brothers.

In course of time they grew big, and being very strong, and withal fierce and ferocious, they went about plundering, they even went so far as to plunder a present being conveyed to the king. The people came crowding in the king’s courtyard, complaining, “Andhakaveṇhu’s sons, the ten brothers, are plundering the land!” So the king summoned Andhakaveṇhu, and rebuked him for permitting his sons to plunder. In the same way complaint was made three or four times, and the king threatened him. He being in fear of his life craved the boon of safety from the king, and told the secret, that how these were no sons of his, but of Upasāgara. The king was alarmed. “How can we get hold of them?” he asked his courtiers. They replied, “Sire, they are wrestlers. Let us hold a wrestling match in the city, and when they enter the ring we will catch them and put them to death.” So they sent for two wrestlers, Cānura and Muṭṭhika, and caused proclamation to be made throughout the city by beat of drum, “that on the seventh day there would be a wrestling match.”

The wrestling ring was prepared in front of the king’s gate; there was an enclosure for the games, the ring was decked out gaily, the flags of victory were ready tied. The whole city was in a whirl; line over line rose the seats, tier above tier. Cānura and Muṭṭhika went down into the ring, and strutted about, jumping, shouting, clapping their hands. The ten brothers came too. On their way they plundered the washer men’s street, and clad themselves in robes of bright colours, and stealing perfume from the perfumers’ shops, and wreaths of flowers from the florists, with their bodies all anointed, garlands upon their heads, earrings in their ears, they strutted into the ring, jumping, shouting, clapping their hands.

827 Krishna, Balarāma (Krishna’s brother), Moon, Sun, Fire, Varuṇa the heaven-god, the tree Terminalia Arjuna, the Rain-cloud (? pājjunno, Skr. parjunya, while pradyumna is a name of Kāma), Ghee-sage (? or ghaṭa-p., an ascetic), Sprout. The story seems to contain a kernel of nature-myth.

At the moment, Cānura was walking about and clapping his hands. Baladeva, seeing him, thought: “I won’t touch that fellow with my hand!” so catching up a thick strap from the elephant stable, jumping and shouting he threw it round Cānura’s belly, and joining the two ends together, brought them tight, then lifting him up, swung him round over his head, and dashing him on the ground rolled him outside the arena. When Cānura was dead, the king sent for Muṭṭhika. Up got Muṭṭhika, jumping, shouting, clapping his hands. Baladeva smote him, and crushed in his eyes; and as he cried out, “I’m no wrestler! I’m no wrestler!” Baladeva tied his hands together, saying: “Wrestler or no wrestler, it is all one to me,” and dashing him down on the ground, killed him and threw him outside the arena.

Muṭṭhika in his death-throes, uttered a prayer, “May I become a Yakkha, and devour him!” And he became a Yakkha, in a forest called by the name of Kāḷamattiya. The king said: “Take away the ten slave brothers.” At that moment, Vāsudeva threw a wheel, which lopped off the heads of the two brothers. The crowd, terrified, fell at his feet, and besought him to be their protector.

Thus the ten brothers, having slain their two uncles, assumed the sovereignty of the city of Asitaṅjanā, and brought their parents there.

They now set out, intending to conquer all Jambudīpa. In a while they arrived at the city of Ayojjhā, the seat of king Kāḷasena. This they encompassed about, and destroyed the jungle around it, breached the [4.53] wall and took the king prisoner, and took the sovereignty of the place into their hands. Thence they proceeded to Dvāravaṭī. Now this city had on one side the sea and on one side the mountains. They say that the place was haunted by Amanussas. A Yakkha would be stationed on the watch, who seeing his enemies, in the shape of an ass would bray as the ass brays. {4.83} At once, by Yakkha magic the whole city used to rise in the air, and 828 A kind of weapon.

---

829 i.e. the king and his brother.
deposit itself on an island in the midst of the sea; when the foe was gone, it would come back and settle in its own place again. This time, as usual, no sooner the ass saw those ten brothers coming, than he brayed with the bray of an ass. Up rose the city in the air, and settled upon the island. No city could they see, and turned back; then back came the city to its own place again. They returned – again the ass did as before. The sovereignty of the city of Dvāravatī they could not take.

So they visited Kaṇhadīpāyana, and said: “Sir, we have failed to capture the kingdom of Dvāravatī; tell us how to do it.” He said: “In a ditch, in such a place, is an ass walking about. He brays when he sees an enemy, and immediately the city rises in the air. You must clasp hold of his feet, and that is the way to accomplish your end.” Then they took leave of the ascetic; and went all ten of them to the ass, and falling at his feet, said: “Sir, we have no help but you! When we come to take the city, do not bray!” The ass replied, “I cannot help braying. But if you come first, and four of you bring great iron ploughs, and at the four gates of the city dig great iron posts into the ground, and when the city begins to rise, if you will fix on the post a chain of iron fastened to the plough, the city will not be able to rise.” They thanked him; and he did not utter a sound while they got ploughs, and fixed the posts in the ground at the four gates of the city, and stood waiting. Then the ass brayed, the city began to rise, but those who stood at the four gates with the four ploughs, having fixed to the posts iron chains which were fastened to the ploughs, the city could not rise. Thereupon the ten brothers entered the city, killed the king, and took his kingdom.

Thus they conquered all Jambudīpa, and in three and sixty thousand cities they slew by the wheel all the kings of them, and lived at Dvāravatī, dividing the kingdom into ten shares. But they had forgotten their sister, the lady Añjanā. So, “Let us make eleven shares of it,” said they. But Aṅkura answered, “Give her my share, and I will take to some business for a living; only you must remit my taxes each in your own country.” They consented, and gave his share to his sister; and with her they dwelt in Dvāravatī, nine kings, while Aṅkura embarked in trade.

830 The Sage already mentioned in No. 444 (see p. 18, above).
831 i.e. beseech him.
In course of time, they were all increased with sons and with daughters; and after a long time had gone by, their parents died. At that period, they say that a man’s life was twenty thousand years.

Then died one dearly beloved son of the great king Vāsudeva. The king, half dead with grief, neglected everything, and lay lamenting, and clutching the frame of his bed. Then Ghatapaṇḍita thought to himself, “Except me, no one else is able to soothe my brother’s grief; I will find some means of soothing his grief for him.” So assuming the appearance of madness, he paced through the whole city, gazing up at the sky, and crying out, “Give me a hare! Give me a hare!” All the city was excited, “Ghatapaṇḍita has gone mad!” they said. Just then a courtier named Rohiṇeyya, went into the presence of king Vāsudeva, and opened a conversation with him by reciting the first verse:

1. “Black Kaṇha, rise! Why close the eyes to sleep? Why lying there Thine own born brother – see, the winds away his wit do bear, Away his wisdom!832 Ghata raves, you of the long black hair!”

When the courtier had thus spoken, the Teacher perceiving that he had risen, after Fully Awakening uttered the second verse:

2. “So soon the long-haired Kesava heard Rohiṇeyya’s cry,
He rose all anxious and distressed for Ghata’s misery.”

Up rose the king, and quickly came down from his chamber; and proceeding to Ghatapaṇḍita, he got fast hold of him with both hands; and speaking to him, uttered the third verse:

3. “In maniac fashion, why do you pace Dvāraka all through,
And cry, ‘Hare, hare!’ Say, who is there has taken a hare from you?”

To these words of the king, he only answered by repeating the same cry over and over again. But the king recited two more verses:

832 Lit. “his heart and his right eye” (Sch.): cf. Sanskr. vāyugrasta “mad.”
4. “Be it of gold, or made of jewels fine,
Or brass, or silver, as you may incline,⁸³³
Shell, stone, or coral, I declare
I’ll make a hare.

5. And many other hares there be, that range the woodland wide,
They shall be brought, I’ll have them caught; say, which do you decide?”

On hearing the king’s words, the wise man replied by repeating the sixth verse:

[4.55]

6. “I crave no hare of earthly kind, but that within the moon:⁸³⁴
O bring him down, O Kesava! I ask no other boon!”

“Undoubtedly my brother has gone mad,” thought the king, when he heard this.
In great grief, he repeated the seventh verse: {4.86}

7. “In truth, my brother, you will die, if you make such a prayer,
And ask for what no man may pray, the moon’s celestial hare.”

Ghatapāṇḍīta, on hearing the king’s answer, stood stock still, and said: “My brother, you know that if a man prays for the hare in the moon, and cannot get it, he will die; then why do you mourn for your dead son?”

8. “If, Kaṇha, this you know, and can console another’s woe, Why are you mourning still the son who died so long ago?”

Then he went on, standing there in the street, “And I, brother, pray only for what exists, but you are mourning for what does not exist.” Then he instructed him by repeating two more verses:

9. “My son is born, let him not die! Neither man nor Amanussa Can have that boon; then wherefore pray for what can never be?

---

⁸³³ These lines have occurred already in No. 449.
⁸³⁴ What we call the Man in the Moon is in India called the Hare in the Moon, cf. Ja 316.
10. Nor mystic charm, nor magic roots, nor herbs, nor money spent,
Can bring to life again that ghost whom, Kaṇha, you lament.”

The king, on hearing this, answered, “Your intent was good, dear one. You did it to take away my trouble.” Then in praise of Ghatapāṇḍita he repeated four verses:

11. “Men had I, wise and excellent to give me good advice:
But how has Ghatapāṇḍita opened this day mine eyes!”

12. Blazing was I, as when a man pours oil upon a fire;\[835\]
You did bring water, and did quench the pain of my desire.

13. Grief for my son, a cruel shaft was lodged within my heart;
You have consoled me for my grief, and taken out the dart.

14. That dart extracted, free from pain, tranquil, and calm I keep;
Hearing, O youth, your words of truth, no more I grieve nor weep.”

And lastly:

15. “Thus do the merciful, and thus they who are wise indeed:
They free from pain, as Ghata here his eldest brother freed.”

This is the verse spoken after Fully Awakening.

In this manner Vāsudeva was consoled by prince Ghata.

After the lapse of a long time, during which he ruled his kingdom, the sons of the ten brothers thought: “They say that Kaṇhadīpāyana is [4.56] possessed of divine insight. Let us put him to the test.” So they procured a young lad, and dressed him up, and by binding a pillow about his belly, made it appear as though he were with child. Then they brought him into his presence, and asked him, “When, sir, will this woman be delivered?” The ascetic perceived\[836\] that the time was come for the destruction of the ten royal brothers; then, looking to see what the term of his own life should be, he perceived that he must die that very day. Then he said: “Young sirs, what is this man to you?” “Answer us,” they replied persistently. He answered, “This man on the seventh day from now will bring forth a knot of acacia wood. With that he will destroy the line of Vāsudeva, even though you should take the piece of wood and burn it, and cast the ashes into the river.” “Ah, false ascetic!” they said, “a man can never bring forth a child!” and they did the rope and string business, and killed him at once. The kings sent for the young men, and asked them why they had killed the ascetic. [4.88] When they heard all, they were frightened. They set a guard upon the man; and when on the seventh day he voided from his belly a knot of acacia wood, they burnt it, and cast the ashes into the river. The ashes floated down the river, and stuck on one side by a back gate; from thence sprung an eraka plant.

---

\[835\] These lines occur above, p. 39.
\[836\] i.e. by his miraculous vision.

One day, the kings proposed that they should go and disport themselves in the water. So to this back gate they came; and they caused a great pavilion to be made, and in that gorgeous pavilion they ate and drank. Then in sport they began to catch hold of hand and foot, and dividing into two parts, they became very quarrelsome. At last one of them, finding nothing better for a club, picked a leaf from the eraka plant, which even as he plucked it became a club of acacia wood in his hand. With this he beat many people. Then the others plucked also, and the things as they took them became clubs, and with them they cudgelled one another until they were killed. As these were destroying each other, four only – Vāsudeva, Baladeva, the lady Añjanā their sister, and the family priest – mounted a chariot and fled away; the rest perished, every one.

Now these four, fleeing away in the chariot, came to the forest of Kāḷamattikā. There Muṭṭhika the Wrestler had been born, having become according to his prayer a Yakkha. When he perceived the coming of Baladeva, he created a village in that spot; and taking the semblance of a wrestler, he went jumping about, and shouting, “Who’s for a fight?” snapping his fingers the while. Baladeva, as soon as he saw him, said: “Brother, I’ll try a fight with this fellow.” Vāsudeva tried and tried his best to prevent him; but down he got from the chariot, and went up to him, snapping his fingers. The other just seized him in the [4.57] hollow of his hand, and gobbled him up like a radish-bulb.

Vāsudeva, perceiving that he was dead, went on all night long with his sister and the family priest, and at sunrise arrived at a frontier village. He lay down in the shelter of a bush, and sent his sister and the family priest into the village, with orders to cook some food and bring it to him. A huntsman (his name was Jarā, or Old Age) noticed the bush shaking. “A pig, sure enough,” thought he; he threw a spear, and pierced his feet. “Who has wounded me?” cried out Vāsudeva. The huntsman, finding that he had wounded a man, set off running in terror. [4.89] The king, recovering his wits, got up, and called the huntsman, “Uncle, come here, don’t be afraid!” When he came, “Who are you?” asked Vāsudeva. “My name is Jarā, my lord.” “Ah,” thought the king, “whom Old Age wounds will die, so the ancients used to say. Without doubt I must die today.” Then he said: “Fear not, Uncle; come, bind up my wound.” The mouth of the wound bound up, the king let him go. Great pains came upon him; he could not eat the food that the others brought. Then addressing himself to the others, Vāsudeva said: “This day I am to die. You are delicate creatures, and will never be able to learn anything else for a living; so learn this science from me.” So saying, he taught them a science, and let them go; and then died immediately.

Thus excepting the lady Añjanā, they perished every one, it is said.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Lay brother, thus people have got free from grief for a son by attending to the words of wise men of old; do not you think about it.” Then he declared the Truths; at the conclusion of the Truths the lay brother was established in the fruit of the First Path; and identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Ānanda was Rohiṇeyya, Sāriputta was Vāsudeva, the followers of the Buddha were the other persons, and I myself was Ghatapaṇḍita.”
Book XI. Ekādasanipāta
The Section with Eleven Verses

Ja 455 Mātiposakajātaka
The Story about (the Elephant) who Supported his Mother
(11s)

Alternative Title: Mātuposakajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk supports his parents who have fallen into poverty and have no one left at home to support them. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story about an elephant who was taken to the king, but refused to eat as he had left his mother behind. The king allowed him to return and look after her.

The Bodhisatta = the elephant who supported his mother (mātuposakanāga), Mahāmāyā = the mother elephant (mātā hatthinī),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Sāriputta = the elephant trainer (hatthācariya),
Devadatta = the wicked man (pāpapurisa).

Present Source: Ja 540 Sāma,
Quoted at: Ja 164 Gijjha, Ja 398 Sutano, Ja 399 Gijjha, Ja 455 Mātiposaka, Ja 484 Sālikedāra, Ja 513 Jayaddisa, Ja 532 Sonananda, Past Compare: Cp. 11, Mātiposakacariya.

Keywords: Filial piety, Gratitude, Animals.

“Though far away.” [4.58] [4.90] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about an elder who had his mother to support. The circumstances of the event are like those of the Sāmajātaka [Ja 540].

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain monk who supported his mother. They say that there was a wealthy merchant at Sāvatthī, who was worth eighteen crores; and he had a son who was very dear and winning to his father and mother. One day the youth went upon the terrace of the house, and opened a window and looked down on the street; and when he saw the great crowd going to Jetavana with perfumes and garlands in their hands to hear the Dhamma preached, he exclaimed that he would go too.
So having ordered perfumes and garlands to be brought, he went to the monastery, and having distributed robes, medicines, drinks, etc. to the assembly and honoured the Fortunate One with perfumes and garlands, he sat down on one side. After hearing the Dhamma, and perceiving the evil consequences of desire and the blessings arising from adopting the ascetic life, when the assembly broke up he asked the Fortunate One for ordination, but he was told that the Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone who has not obtained the permission of his parents; so he went away, and lived a week without food, and having at last obtained his parents’ consent, he returned and begged for ordination. The Teacher sent a monk who ordained him; and after he was ordained he obtained great honour and gain; he won the favour of his teachers and preceptors, and having received full orders he mastered the Dhamma in five years.

Then he thought to himself, “I live here distracted – it is not suitable for me,” and he became anxious to reach the goal of insight; so having obtained instruction in meditation from his teacher, he departed to a frontier village and dwelt in the forest, and there having entered a course of insight, however much he laboured and strove for twelve years, he failed to attain any special insight.

His parents also, as time went on, became poor, for those who hired their land or carried on merchandise for them, finding out that there was no son or brother in the family to enforce the payment, seized what they could lay their hands upon and ran away as they pleased, and the servants and labourers in the house seized the gold and coin and made off therewith, so that at the end the two were reduced to an evil plight and had not even a jug for pouring water; and at last they sold their dwelling, and finding themselves homeless, and in extreme misery, they wandered begging for alms, clothed in rags and carrying potsherds in their hands.

Now at that time a monk came from Jetavana to the son’s place of abode; he performed the duties of hospitality and, as he sat quietly, he first asked whence he was come; and learning that he was come from Jetavana he asked after the health of the Teacher and the principal disciples and then asked for news of his parents, “Tell me, sir, about the welfare of such and such a merchant’s family in Sāvatthi.” “O friend, don’t ask for news of that family.” “Why not, sir?” “They say that there was one son in that family, but he has become an ascetic in this dispensation, and since he left the world that family has gone to ruin; and at the present time the two old people are reduced to a most lamentable state and beg for alms.”

When he heard the other’s words he could not remain unmoved, but began to weep with his eyes full of tears, and when the other asked him why he wept, “O sir,” he replied, “they are my own father and mother, I am their son.” “O friend, your father and mother have come to ruin through you – do you go and take care of them.” “For twelve years,” he thought to himself, “I have laboured and striven but never been able to attain the Path or the Fruit; I must be incompetent; what have I to do with the ascetic life? I will become a householder and will support my parents and give away my wealth, and will thus eventually become destined for heaven.”

So having determined he gave up his abode in the forest to the elder, and the next day departed and by successive stages reached the monastery at the back of Jetavana which is not far from Sāvatthi. There he found two roads, one leading to Jetavana, the other to Sāvatthi. As he stood there, he thought: “Shall I see my parents first or the One with Ten Powers?” Then he said to himself, “In old days I saw my parents for a long time, from henceforth I shall rarely have the chance of seeing the Buddha; I will see the Fully Awakened One today and hear the Dhamma, and then tomorrow morning I will see my parents.” So he left the road to Sāvatthi and in the evening arrived at Jetavana.

Now that very day at daybreak, the Teacher, as he looked upon the world, had seen the potentialities of this young man, and when he came to visit him he praised the virtues of parents in the Mātiposakasutta [SN 7.19]. As he stood at the end of the assembly of elders and listened, he thought: “If I become a householder I can support my parents; but the Teacher also says, ‘A son who has become an ascetic can be helpful,’ I went away before without seeing the Teacher, and I failed in such an imperfect ordination; I will now support my parents while still remaining an ascetic without becoming a householder.” So he took his ticket and his ticket-food and gruel, and felt as if he had committed a wrong deserving expulsion after a solitary abode of twelve years in the forest. In the morning he went to Sāvatthi and he thought to himself, “Shall I first get the gruel or see my parents?” He reflected that it would not be right to visit them in their poverty empty-handed; so he first got the gruel and then went to the door of their old house.
When he saw them sitting by the opposite wall after having gone their round for the alms given in broth, he stood not far from them in a sudden burst of sorrow with his eyes full of tears. They saw him but knew him not; then his mother, thinking that it was someone standing for alms, said to him, “We have nothing fit to be given to you, be pleased to pass on.” When he heard her, he repressed the grief which filled his heart and remained still standing as before with his eyes full of tears, and when he was addressed a second and a third time he still continued standing.

At last the father said to the mother, “Go to him; can this be your son?” She rose and went to him and, recognising him, fell at his feet and lamented, and the father also joined his lamentations, and there was a loud outburst of sorrow. To see his parents he could not control himself, but burst into tears; then, after yielding to his feelings, he said: “Do not grieve, I will support you,” so having comforted them and made them drink some gruel, and sit down on one side, he went again and begged for some food and gave it to them, and then went and asked for alms for himself, and having finished his meal, took up his abode at a short distance off.

From that day forward he watched over his parents in this manner; he gave them all the alms he received for himself, even those at the fortnightly distributions, and he went on separate expeditions for his own alms, and ate them; and whatever food he received as provision for the rainy season he gave to them, while he took their worn-out garments and dyed them with the doors fast closed and used them himself; but the days were few when he gained alms and there were many when he failed to win anything, and his inner and outer clothing became very rough.

As he watched over his parents he gradually grew very pale and thin and his friends and intimates said to him, “Your complexion used to be bright, but now you have become very pale – has some illness come upon you?” He replied, “No illness has come upon me, but a hindrance has befallen me,” and he told them the history. “Sir,” they replied, “the Teacher does not allow us to waste the offerings of the faithful, you do an unlawful act in giving to laymen the offerings of the faithful.” When he heard this he shrank away ashamed.

But not satisfied with this they went and told it to the Teacher, saying: “So and so, sir, has wasted the offerings of the faithful and used them to feed laymen.”
The Teacher sent for the young man of family and said to him, “Is it true that you, an ascetic, take the offerings of the faithful and support laymen with them?” He confessed that it was true. Then the Teacher, wishing to praise what he had done and to declare an old action of his own, said: “When you support laymen whom do you support?” “My parents,” he answered.

On this occasion also the Teacher said, addressing the monks, “Be not angry, monks, with this man; wise men there have been of old, who even when born from the womb of animals, being parted asunder from their mothers, refused for seven days to take food, pining away; and even when they were offered food fit for a king, did but reply, ‘Without my mother I will not eat;’ yet took food again when they saw the mother.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as an elephant in the Himālayas region. All white he was, a magnificent beast, and a herd of eighty thousand elephants surrounded him; but his mother was blind. He would give his elephants the sweet wild fruit, so sweet, to convey to her; yet to her they gave none, but themselves ate all of it. When he made enquiry, and heard news of this, said he, “I will leave the herd, and cherish my mother.” So in the night, unknown to the other elephants, taking his mother with him, he departed to Mount Caṇḍorāṇa; and there he placed his mother in a cave of the hills, nearby a lake, and cherished her.

Now a certain forester, who dwelt in Benares, lost his way; and being unable to get his bearings, {4.91} began to lament with a great noise. Hearing this noise, the Bodhisatta thought to himself, “There is a man in distress, and it is not good that he come to harm while I am here.” So he drew near to the man; but the man fled in fear. Seeing which, the elephant said to him, “Ho man! You have no need to fear me. Do not flee, but say why you walk about weeping?” [4.59]

“My lord,” said the man, “I have lost my way, this seven days gone.”

Said the elephant, “Fear not, O man; for I will put you in the path of men.” Then he made the man sit on his back, and carried him out of the forest, and then returned.

This wicked man determined to go into the city, and tell the king. So he marked the trees, and marked the hills, and then made his way to Benares. At that time the king’s state elephant had just died. The king caused it to be proclaimed by beat of drum, “If any man has in any place seen an elephant fit and proper for the king’s riding, let him declare it!” Then this man came before the king, and said: “I, my lord, have seen a splendid elephant, white all over and excellent, fit for the king’s riding. I will show the way; send but with me the elephant trainers, and you shall catch him.” The king agreed, and sent with the man a forester and a great troop of followers.

The man went with him, and found the Bodhisatta feeding in the lake. When the Bodhisatta saw the forester, he thought: “This danger has doubtless come from none other than that man. But I am very strong; I can scatter even a thousand elephants; in anger I am able to destroy all the beasts that carry the army of a whole kingdom. But if I give way to anger, my virtue will be marred. So today I will not be angry, not even though pierced with knives.” With this resolve, bowing his head he remained immovable.

Down into the lotus-lake went the forester, and seeing the beauty of his points, said: “Come, my son!” Then seizing him by the trunk (and like a silver rope it was), he led him in seven days to Benares.

When the Bodhisatta’s mother found that her son came not, she thought that he must have been caught by the king’s nobles. 4.92 “And now,” she wailed, “all these trees will go on growing, but he will be far away,” and she repeated two verses:

1. “Though far away this elephant should go,
   Still olibane and kuṭaja\textsuperscript{837} will grow,
   Grain, grass, and oleander, lilies white,
   On sheltered spots the bluebells dark still blow.

\textsuperscript{837} A medicinal plant.
2. Somewhere that royal elephant must go,
   Full fed by those whose breast and body show
   All gold-bedecked, that king or prince may ride
   Fearless to triumph o’er the mail-clad foe.”

Now the trainer, while he was yet in the way, sent on a message to tell the king. And the king caused the city to be decorated. The trainer led the Bodhisatta into a stable all adorned and decked out with festoons and with garlands, and surrounding him, with a screen of many colours, sent word to the king. And the king took all manner of fine food and caused it to be given to the Bodhisatta. But not a bit would he eat, “Without my mother, I will eat nothing,” said he. The king besought him to eat, repeating the third verse: {4.93}

3. “Come, take a morsel, elephant, and never pine away:
   There’s many a thing to serve your king that you shall do one day.”

Hearing this, the Bodhisatta repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Nay, she by Mount Caṇḍoraṇa, poor blind and wretched one,
   Beats with a foot on some tree-root, without her royal son.”

The king said the fifth verse to ask his meaning:

5. “Who is’t by Mount Caṇḍoraṇa, what blind and wretched one,
   Beats with a foot on some tree-root, without her royal son?”

To which the other replied in the sixth verse:

6. “My mother by Caṇḍoraṇa, ah blind, ah wretched one!
   Beats with her foot on some tree-root for lack of me, her son!”

And hearing this, the king gave him freedom, reciting the seventh verse:

7. “This mighty elephant, who feeds his mother, let go free:
   And let him to his mother go, and to all his family.”

The eighth and ninth verses are those of the Buddha after Fully Awakening:
8. “The elephant from prison freed, the beast set free from chain,
With words of consolation went back to the hills again. {4.94}

9. Then from the cool and limpid pool, where Elephants frequent,
He with his trunk drew water, and his mother all besprent.”

But the mother of the Bodhisatta thought it had begun to rain, and repeated the tenth verse, rebuking the rain:

10. “Who brings unseasonable rain – what evil deity?
For he is gone, my own, my son, who used to care for me.”

Then the Bodhisatta repeated the eleventh verse, to reassure her:

11. “Rise mother! Why should you there lie? Your own, your son has come!
Vedeha, Kāsi’s glorious king, has sent me safely home.”

And she returned thanks to the king by repeating the last verse:

12. “Long live that king! Long may he bring his realms prosperity,
Who freed that son who ever has done so great respect to me!” [4.61]

The king was pleased with the Bodhisatta’s goodness; and he built a town not far from the lake, and did continual service to the Bodhisatta and to his mother. Afterwards, when his mother died, and the Bodhisatta had performed her obsequies, {4.95} he went away to a monastery called Karaṇḍaka. In this place five hundred sages came and dwelt, and the king did the like service for them. The king had a stone image made in the figure of the Bodhisatta, and great honour he paid to this. There the inhabitants of all Jambudīpa year by year gathered together, to perform what was called the Elephant Festival.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths the monk who supported his mother was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time, Ānanda was 838 The Commentator explains that the elephant discoursed on virtue to the king, then told him to be careful, and departed, amid the plaudits of the multitude, who threw flowers upon him. He then went home, and fed and washed his mother. To explain this, the Master repeated the two verses.

---

the king, the lady Mahāmāyā was the female elephant, and I was myself the elephant that fed his mother.”

Ja 456 Juṭhajātaka

The Story about (King) Juṭha

In the present the Buddha is growing older and is looking for a permanent attendant to help him. All are willing, but the Buddha turns them down. Ven. Ānanda then says he will do it if he is granted eight boons, and he is chosen. The Buddha then tells a story of how a brahmin had asked for several boons from a king in the past, and had been granted his heart’s desire.

Present Source: Ja 456 Juṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 289 Nānacchanda.

Keywords: Recompense, Just reward, Devas.

“O king of men.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana about the boons received by elder Ānanda. During the twenty years of his first Buddhahood the Fortunate One's attendants were not always the same: sometimes elder Nāgasamāla, sometimes Nāgita, Upavāṇa, Sunakkhatta, Cunda, Sāgala, sometimes Meghiya waited upon the Fortunate One. One day the Fortunate One said to the monks, “Now I am old, monks: and when I say, ‘Let us go in this way,’ some of the Saṅgha go by another way, some drop my bowl and robe on the ground. Choose out one monk to attend always upon me.”

Then they all rose up, beginning with elder Sāriputta, and laid their joined hands to their heads, crying, “I will serve you, sir, I will serve you!” But he refused them, saying: “Your prayer is forestalled! Enough.” Then the monks said to the elder Ānanda, “Do you, friend, ask for the post of attendant.” The elder said: “If the Fortunate One will not give me the robe which he himself has received, if he will not give me his dole of food, if he will not grant me to dwell in the same fragrant cell, if he will not have me with him to go where he is invited; but if the Fortunate

---

One will go with me where I am invited, if I shall be granted to introduce the company at the moment of coming, which comes from foreign parts and foreign countries to see the Fortunate One, if I shall be granted to approach the Fortunate One as soon as doubt shall arise, if whenever the Fortunate One shall discourse in my absence he will repeat his discourse to me as soon as I shall return: then I will attend upon the Fortunate One.” These eight boons he craved, four negative and four positive. And the Fortunate One granted them to him. [4.62]

After that he attended continually upon his Teacher for five and twenty years. So having obtained the preeminence in the five points, and having gained seven blessings – blessing of Dhamma, blessing of instruction, blessing of the knowledge of causes, blessing of inquiry as to one’s good, blessing of dwelling in a holy place, blessing of enlightened devotion, blessing of potential Buddhahood – in the presence of the Buddha he received the heritage of eight boons, and became famous in the Buddha’s dispensation, and shone as the moon in the heavens.

One day they began to talk about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, the Tathāgata has satisfied elder Ānanda by granting his boons.” The Teacher entered, and asked, “What are you speaking of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. Then he said: “It is not now the first time, monks, but in former days as now I satisfied Ānanda with a boon; in former days, as now, whatsoever he asked, I gave him.” And so saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, a son of his named prince Juṇha, or the Moonlight prince, was studying at Taxila. One night, after he had been listening carefully to his teacher’s instruction, he left the house of his teacher in the dark, and set out for home. A certain brahmin had been seeking alms, and was going home, and the prince not perceiving him ran up against the brahmin, and broke his alms bowl with a blow of his arm. The brahmin fell, with a cry. In compassion the prince turned round, and taking hold of the man’s hands raised him to his feet. The brahmin said: “Now, my son, you have broken my alms-bowl, so give me the price of a meal.” Said the prince, “I cannot now give you the price 840 Are these the five abhabbatthānas?

of a meal, brahmin; but I am prince Juṇha, son of the king of Kāsi, and when I come to my kingdom, you may come to me and ask for the money.”

When his education was finished, he took leave of his teacher, and returning to Benares, showed his father what he had learned.

“I have seen my son before my death,” said the king, “and I will see him king indeed.” Then he sprinkled him and made him king. [4.97] Under the name of king Juṇha the prince ruled in righteousness. When the brahmin heard of it, he thought now he would recover the price of his meal. So to Benares he came, and saw the city all decorated, and the king moving in solemn procession right-wise around it. Taking his stand upon a high place, the brahmin stretched out his hand, and cried, “Victory to the king!” The king passed by without looking at him. When the brahmin found that he was not noticed, he asked an explanation by repeating the first verse:

1. “O king of men, hear what I have to say!
   Not without cause have I come here this day.
   ’Tis said, O best of men, one should not pass
   A wandering brahmin standing in the way.” [4.63]

On hearing these words the king turned back the elephant with his jewelled goad, and repeated the second verse:

2. “I heard, I stand: come brahmin, quickly say,
   What cause it is has brought you here today?
   What boon is it that you would crave of me
   That you are come to see me? Speak, I pray!”

What further king and brahmin said to each other by way of question and answer, is told in the remaining verses:

3. “Give me five villages, all choice and fine,
   A hundred slave girls, seven hundred kine,
   More than a thousand ornaments of gold,
   And two wives give me, of like birth with mine.” [4.98]
4. “Have you a penance, brahmin, dread to tell,
Or have you many a charm and many a spell,
Or Yakkhas, ready your behests to do,
Or any claim for having served me well?”

5. “No penance have I, nor no charm and spell,
No Yakkhas ready to obey me well,
Nor any meed for service can I claim;
But we have met before, the truth to tell.”

6. “I cannot call to mind, in time past o’er,
That I have ever seen your face before.
Tell me, I beg you, tell this thing to me,
When have we met, or where, in days of yore?”

7. “In the fair city of Gandhāra’s king,
Taxila, my lord, was our dwelling.
There in the pitchy darkness of the night
Shoulder to shoulder you and I did fling.

8. And as we both were standing there, O prince,
A friendly talk between us straight begins.
Then we together met, and only then,
Nor ever once before, nor ever since.”

9. “Whenever, brahmin, a wise man has met
A good man in the world, he should not let Friendship once made or old acquaintance go
For nothing, nor the thing once done forget.

10. ’Tis fools deny the thing once done, and let Old friendships fail of those they once have met.
Many a deed of fools to nothing comes,
They are ungrateful, and they can forget.

11. But trusty men cannot forget the past,
Their friendship and acquaintance ever fast.
A trifle done by such is not disowned:
Thus trusty men are grateful to the last.
12. Five villages I give you, choice and fine,
A hundred slave girls, and seven hundred kine,
More than a thousand ornaments of gold,
And more, two wives of equal birth with thine.” [4.64]

13. “O king, thus is it when the good agree:
As the full moon among the stars we see,
Even so, O Lord of Kāsi, so am I,
Now you have kept the bargain made with me.” [4.100]

The Bodhisatta added great honour to him.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that I have satisfied Ānanda with boons, but I have done it before.” With these words, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the brahmin, and I was myself the king.”

Ja 457 Dhammajātaka

The Story about (the Devaputta named) Dhamma (11s)

Alternative Title: Dhammadevaputtajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are discussing how Devadatta fought against the Buddha and was swallowed by the earth. The Buddha tells a story of how two gods gave opposite advice and the one that recommended an evil course fell into hell.

The Bodhisatta = (the god) Dhamma (Righteous),
Devadatta = the god Adhamma (Unrighteous) (Adhammo devaputto), Devadatta’s followers = his followers (parisā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Cp 18 Dhammadevaputtacariyā.

Keywords: Ingratitude, Righteousness, Devas.

“I do the right.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, how Devadatta was swallowed up in the earth. They gathered in the Dhamma Hall to talk, “Friend, Devadatta fell at odds with the Tathāgata, and was swallowed up in the earth.” The Teacher entered and asked what they were talking of as they sat there. They told him. He replied, “Now, monks, he has been swallowed up in the earth because he dealt a blow at my victorious authority; but formerly he dealt a blow at the authority of the Dhamma, and was swallowed up in the earth, and went on his way to nethermost hell.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into the world of the Devaputtas, and was named Dhamma, or Right, while Devadatta was called Adhamma, or Wrong.

As on the Uposatha of the full moon, in the evening when meals were done, men were sitting in enjoyment each at his own house-door in village and city and royal capital, Dhamma appeared before them, poised in the air, in his celestial chariot mounted, and adorned with celestial array, in the midst of a multitude of Accharā, and thus addressed them:

“Take not the life of living creatures, and the other ten paths of evildoing eschew, fulfil the duty of service to mother and the duty of service to father and the threefold course of right; thus you shall become destined for heaven, and shall receive great glory.” Thus did he urge men to follow the ten paths of doing right, and made a solemn circuit around Jambudīpa right-wise. But Adhamma taught them, “Kill that which lives,” and in like manner urged men to follow the other ten paths of evildoing, and made a circuit around Jambudīpa left-wise.

Now their chariots met face to face in the air, and their attendant multitudes asked each the other, “Whose are you?” “And whose are you?” They replied, “We are of Dhamma,” and, “We of Adhamma,” and made room, so that their paths were divided. But Dhamma said to Adhamma, “Good sir, you are Adhamma, and I am Dhamma; I have the right of way; turn your chariot aside, and give me way,” repeating the first verse:

1. “I do the right, men’s fame is of my grace,
   Me sages and me brahmins ever praise,
   Worshipped of men and gods, the right of way
   Is mine. Right am I; then, O Wrong, give place!”

These next follow:

841 Right doing, right saying, right thinking.
2. “In the strong car of Wrong enthroned on high
Me mighty there is nought can terrify:
Then why should I, who never yet gave place,
Make way today for Right to pass me by?”

3. “Right of a truth was first made manifest,
Primeval he, the oldest, and the best;
Wrong was the younger, later born in time.
Way, younger, at the elder-born's behest!”

4. “Nor if you worthy be, nor if you pray,
Nor if it be but fair, will I give way: [4.102]
Here let us two today a battle wage;
He shall have place, whoever wins the fray.”

5. “Known am I in all regions far and near,
Mighty, of boundless glory, without peer,
All virtues are united in my form.
Right am I: Wrong, how can you conquer here?

6. By iron gold is beaten, nor do we Gold used for beating iron ever see:
If Wrong ’gainst Right shall win the fight today,
Iron as beautiful as gold will be.

7. If you indeed are mighty in the fray,
Though neither good nor wise is what you say,
Swallow I will all these your evil words;
And willy nilly I will make you way.”

These six verses they repeated, one answering the other. [4.103]

But at the very moment when the Bodhisatta repeated this verse, Adhamma could no longer stand in his carriage, but head foremost plunged into the earth which gaped to receive him, and was born again in nethermost hell. [4.66]
The Fortunate One no sooner perceived that this had happened, than after Fully Awakening he recited the remaining verses:

8. “The words no sooner heard, Wrong from the height
Plunged over heels head-foremost out of sight:
This was the end and direful fate of Wrong.
I had no battle, though I longed to fight.

9. Thus by the Mighty-in-Forbearance lies Conquered the Mighty Warrior Wrong, and dies
Swallowed in earth: the other, joyful, strong,
Truth-armoured, in his car away he hies.

10. Who in his house no due observance pays
To parents, sages, brahmins, when he lays
The body down, and bursts its bonds asunder,
He, even from this world, goes straight to hell,
Even as Adhamma down head-foremost fell.

11. Who in his house all due observance pays
To parents, sages, brahmins, when he lays
The body down, and bursts its bonds asunder,
Straight from this world, onward to heaven he hies,
As Dhamma in his chariot sought the skies.” {4.104}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Not only now, monks, but in former times also, Devadatta attacked me, and was swallowed up in the earth,” then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was Adhamma, and his attendants were the attendants of Devadatta, and I was Dhamma, and the Buddha’s attendants were the attendants of Dhamma.”

Ja 458 Udayajātaka

The Story about (King) Udaya (11s)

In the present one monk is discontented with the monastic life and declares his wish to leave it. The Buddha tells a story of how two gods were reborn, one male and one female, and how they lived together in chastity, until the male died and was reborn as Sakka. Later he visited, and tried to tempt his former wife, but she remained chaste.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Rāhulamātā = the princess (rājadhītā).
“You flawless.” This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a discontented monk. The occasion will be explained under the Kusajātaka [Ja 531].

The story tells that he was of noble birth and lived at Sāvatthi, and on his heartily embracing the dispensation he adopted the ascetic life. Now one day as he was going his rounds for alms in Sāvatthi, he met a fair lady and fell in love with her at first sight. Overcome by his passion he lived an unhappy life, and letting his nails and hair grow long and wearing soiled robes, he pined away and became quite sallow, with all his veins standing out on his body. And just as in the Deva world, the Devaputtas who are destined to fall from their heavenly existence manifest five well-known signs, that is to say, their garlands wither, their robes soil, their bodies grow ill-favoured, perspiration pours from their armpits, and they no longer find pleasure in their Deva home, so too in the case of worldly monks, who fall from the Dhamma, the same five signs are to be seen: the flowers of faith wither, the robes of righteousness soil, through discontent and the effects of an evil name their persons grow ill-favoured, the sweat of corruption streams from them and they no longer delight in a life of solitude at the foot of forest trees – all these signs were to be found in him. So they brought him into the presence of the Teacher, saying: “Venerable sir, this fellow is discontented.”

Again the Teacher asked the man, “Is it true, monk, that you are discontent, as they say?” And he replied, “Yes, sir.” Then he said: “O monk, why are you discontent from a dispensation such as ours, that leads to safety, and all for fleshly sensual desires? Wise men of old, who were kings in Surundha, a city prosperous and measuring twelve leagues either way, though for seven hundred years they lived in one chamber with a woman beauteous as the Devaccharās, yet did not yield to their senses, and never so much as looked at her with desire.” So saying, he told a story of the past. [4.67]

In the past, when king Kāsi was reigning over the realm of Kāsi, in Surundha his city, neither son nor daughter had he. So he bade his queens offer prayer for sons. Then the Bodhisatta, passing out of the Brahmā Realm, was conceived in the womb of his chief queen. And because by his birth he cheered the hearts of a great multitude, he received the name of Udayabhadda, or Welcome. At the time when the lad could walk upon his feet, another being came into this world from the Brahmā Realm, and became a girl child in the womb of another of this king’s wives, and she was named with the same name, Udayabhaddā.

When the prince came of years, he attained a mastery in all branches of education; more, he was chaste to a degree, and knew nothing of the deeds of the flesh, not even in dream, nor was his heart bent on sinfulness. The king desired to make his son king, with the solemn sprinkling, and to arrange plays for his pleasure; and gave command accordingly. But the Bodhisatta replied, “I do not want the kingdom, and my heart is not bent on sinfulness.” Again and again he was entreated, but his reply was to have made a woman’s image of red gold, which he sent to his parents, with the message, “When I find such a woman as this, I will accept the kingdom.” This golden image they dispatched over all Jambudīpa, but found no woman like to it. Then they decked out Udayabhaddā very fine, and confronted her with the image; and her beauty surpassed it as she stood. Then they wedded her to the Bodhisatta for consort, against their wills though it were, his own sister the princess Udayabhaddā, born of a different mother, and sprinkled him to be king.

These two lived together a life of chastity. In course of time, when his parents were dead, the Bodhisatta ruled the realm. The two dwelt together in one chamber, yet denied their senses, and never so much as looked upon one another in the way of desire; nay, a promise they even made, that which of them soever should first die, he should return to the other from his place of new birth, and say, “In such a place am I born again.”

Now from the time of his sprinkling the Bodhisatta lived seven hundred years, and then he died. There was no other king, the commands of Udayabhaddā were promulgated, the courtiers administered the kingdom. The Bodhisatta had become Sakka in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, and by the magnificence of his glory was for seven days unable to remember the past. So he, after the course of 843 In the text, the king’s words should begin at the word puttaṁ, as the context shows.

---

seven hundred years, according to man’s reckoning, remembered, and said to himself, “To the king’s daughter Udayabhaddā I will go, and I will test her with riches, and roaring with the roar of a lion I will discourse, and will fulfil my promise!”

In that age they say that the length of man’s life was ten thousand years. Now at that time, it being the time of night, the palace doors were fast closed, and the guard set, and the king’s daughter was sitting quiet and alone, in a magnificent chamber upon the fine terrace of her seven-storeyed mansion, meditating upon her own virtue. Then Sakka took a golden dish filled with coins all of gold, and in her very sleeping-chamber appeared before her; and standing on one side, began speech with her by reciting the first verse:

1. “You flawless in your beauty, pure and bright,
   You sitting lonely on this terrace-height,
   In pose most graceful, eyed like nymphs of heaven,
   I pray you, let me spend with you this night!”

To this the princess made answer in the two verses following:

2. “To this battlemented city, dug with moats, approach is hard,
   While its trenches and its towers hand and sword unite to guard.

3. Not the young and not the mighty entrance here can lightly gain;
   Tell me – what can be the reason why to meet me you are fain?”

Then Sakka recited the fourth verse:

4. “I, fair beauty, am a Yakkha, I that now appear to you:
   Grant to me your favour, lady, this full bowl receive from me.”

On hearing which the princess replied by repeating the fifth verse:

---

844 Does this mean that Sakka’s day equals 100 of our years?
5. “I ask for none, since Udaya has died,
Nor god nor Yakkha, nor nor man, beside:
Therefore, O mighty Yakkha, get you gone, Come no more hither, but far off abide.”

Hearing her lion’s note, he stood not, but made as though to depart; and at once disappeared. Next day at the same hour, he took a silver bowl filled with golden coins and addressed her by repeating the sixth verse:

6. “That chief joy, to lovers known completely,
Which makes men do full many an evil thing,
Despise not you, O lady, smiling sweetly:
See, a full bowl of silver here I bring!”

Then the princess began to think, “If I allow him to talk and prate, he will come again and again. I will have nothing to say to him now.” [4.108] So she said nothing at all. Sakka finding that she had nothing to say, disappeared at once from his place.

Next day, at the same time, he took an iron bowl full of coins, and said: “Lady, if you will bless me with your love, I will give this iron bowl full of coins to you.” When she saw him, the princess repeated the seventh verse: [4.69]

7. “Men that would woo a woman, raise and raise
The bids of gold, till she their will obeys.
The gods’ ways differ, as I judge by you:
You comest now with less than other days.”

The Great Being, when he heard these words, made reply, “Lady princess, I am a wary trader, and I waste not my substance for nought. If you were increasing in youth or beauty, I would also increase the present I offer you; but you are fading, and so I make the offering dwindle also.” So saying, he repeated three verses:

8. “O woman! Youthful bloom and beauty fade
Within this world of men, you fair-limbed maid.
And you today are older grown than erst,
So dwindles less the sum I would have paid.

9. Thus, glorious daughter of a king, before my gazing eyes
As goes the flight of day and night your beauty fades and dies.
10. But if, O daughter of a king most wise, it pleases you
   Holy and pure to aye endure, more lovely shall you be!” {4.109}

Hereupon the princess repeated another verse:

   11. “The gods are not like men, they grow not old;
   Upon their flesh is seen no wrinkled fold.
   How is’t the gods have no corporeal frame?
   This, mighty Yakkha, I would now be told!”

Then Sakka explained the matter by repeating another verse:

   12. “The gods are not like men: they grow not old;
   Upon their flesh is seen no wrinkled fold:
   Tomorrow and tomorrow ever more
   Celestial beauty grows, and bliss untold.” {4.110}

When she heard the beauty of the world of gods, she asked the way to go there in another verse:

   13. “What terrifies so many mortals here?
   I ask you, mighty Yakkha, to make clear
   That path, in such diversity explained:
   How faring heavenwards need no one fear?”

Then Sakka explained the matter in another verse:

   14. “Who keeps in due control both voice and mind,
   Who with the body loves not wrong to do,
   Within whose house much food and drink we find,
   Large-handed, bounteous, in all faith all true,
   Of favours free, soft-tongued, of kindly cheer –
   He that so walks to heaven need nothing fear.” {4.111}

When the princess had heard his words, she rendered thanks in another verse:

   15. “Like a mother, like a father, Yakkha, you admonish me:
   Mighty one, O beauteous being, tell me, tell me who you be?” {4.70}

Then the Bodhisatta repeated another verse:
16. “I am Udaya, fair lady, for my promise come to you:
Now I go, for I have spoken; from the promise I am free.”

The princess drew a deep breath, and said: “You are king Udayabhadda, my lord!” then burst into a flood of tears, and added, “Without you I cannot live! Instruct me, that I may live with you always!” So saying she repeated another verse:

17. “If you’re Udaya, come hither for your promise – truly he – Then instruct me, that together we, O prince, again may be!”

Then he repeated four verses by way of instruction:

18. “Youth passes soon: a moment – ’tis gone by;
No standing-place is firm: all creatures die
To new life born: this fragile frame decays:
Then be not careless, walk in piety.

19. If the whole earth with all her wealth could be
The realm of one sole king to hold in fee,
A holy saint would leave him in the race:
Then be not careless, walk in piety. [4.112]

20. Mother and father, brother-kin, and she
(The wife) who with a price can purchased be,
They go, and each the other leave behind:
Then be not careless, walk in piety.

21. Remember that this body food shall be
For others; joy alike and misery,
A passing hour, as life succeeds to life:
Then be not careless, walk in piety.”

In this manner discoursed the Great Being. The lady being pleased with the discoursing, rendered thanks in the words of the last verse: [4.113]

22. “Sweet the saying of this Yakkha: brief the life that mortals know,
Sad it is, and short, and with it comes inseparable woe.
I renounce the world: from Kāśi, from Surundhana, I go.”

Having thus discoursed to her, the Bodhisatta went back to his own place.
The next day the princess entrusted her courtiers with the government; and in that very city of hers, in a delightful park, she became a recluse. There she lived Righteously, until at the end of her days she was born again in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, as the Bodhisatta’s handmaiden.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths, the discontented monk was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time Rāhula’s mother was the princess, and Sakka was I myself.”

Ja 459 Pānīyajātaka

The Story about (Stealing) Water

Alternative Title: Paññasajātaka, Paññājātaka (Comm)

In the present some monks harbor wrongful thoughts. The Buddha tells a story of how the wise of old, having done a small wrong, regretted it greatly, gained insight, and became Paccekabuddhas.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Kāsi, or Benares) (rājā),
Rāhulamātā = the queen (devī).

Present Source: Ja 408 Kumbhakāra,
Quoted at: Ja 370 Palāsa, Ja 412 Koṭisimbali, Ja 459 Pānīya,
Present Compare: Ja 305 Śīlavimamsana,
Past Compare: Mvu ii p 289 Śiriprabha.

Keywords: Virtue, Renunciation, Devas.

“The water-draught.” [4.71] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about the subduing of evil passions.

At one time, we learn, five hundred citizens of Sāvatthi, being householders and friends of the Tathāgata, had heard the Dhamma and had renounced the world, and been ordained as monastics. Living in the house of the Golden Pavement, at midnight they indulged in thoughts of wrong. (All the details are to be understood as in a previous story.)

_The Teacher regards his disciples three times a night and three times a day, six times every night and day, as a jay guards her egg, or a yak-cow her tail, or a mother her beloved son, or a one-eyed man his remaining eye; so in the very instant he overcame wrong which was beginning. He was observing Jetavana on that midnight and knowing the monks' conduct and their thoughts, he considered, “This wrong among these monks if it grows will destroy the foundation for becoming an Arahant. I will this moment repudiate this wrong and show them how to become Arahats,” so leaving the perfumed chamber he called Ānanda, and bidding him collect all the monks dwelling in the place, he got them together and sat down on the seat prepared for Buddha._

At the command of the Fortunate One, the Saṅgha was assembled by the venerable Ānanda. The Teacher sat in the appointed seat, and without asking them, “Do you indulge in thoughts of wrongdoing?” he addressed them comprehensively and in general terms, “Monks, there is no such thing as a petty wrong. A monk must check all defilements as they each arise. Wise men of old, before the Buddha came, subdued their defilements and attained to the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha.” With these words, he told there a story of the past. {4.114}

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, there were two friends in a certain village in the kingdom of Kāsi. These had gone afield, taking with them vessels for drinking, which they laid out of the way as they broke the clods, and when they were thirsty, went and drank water out of them. One of them, on going for a drink, conserved the water in his own pot, and drank out of the pot of the other. In the evening, when he came out from the woodland, and had bathed, he stood thinking. “Have I done any wrong today,” he thought, “either by the door of the body, or any other?” Then he remembered how he drank the stolen water, and grief came upon him, and he cried, “If this thirst grows upon me, it will bring me to some evil birth! I will subdue my wrongs.” So with this stolen draught of 845 [Ja 408 Kumbhakārajātaka. I include the story here.]

846 i.e. word, or thought.
water for cause, he gradually acquired supernatural insight, and attained the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha; and there he stood, reflecting upon the knowledge which he had attained.

Now the other man, having bathed, got up, saying: “Come, friend, let us go home.” Said the other, “Go home, you; home is nothing to me, I am a Paccekabuddha.” “Pooh! Are Paccekabuddhas like you?” “What are they like, then?” “Hair two fingers long, they wear yellow robes, they live in Nandamūla cave high up in the Himalayas.” The other stroked his head, and in that very moment the marks of a layman disappeared, [4.72] a pair of red cloths were wrapped round him, a waist-band yellow like a flash of lightning was tied about him, the upper robe of the colour of red lac was thrown over one shoulder, a dust-heap ragged cloth dingy as a storm-cloud lay on his shoulder, a bee-brown earthen bowl dangled from over his left shoulder; there he stood poised in mid-air, and having delivered a discourse, he rose and did not descend until he came to the mountain cave of Nandamūla.

Another man, who also lived in a village of Kāsi, a landowner, was sitting in the bazaar, when he saw a man approach leading his wife. Seeing her (and she was a woman of surpassing beauty) he broke the moral principles, and looked upon her; then again he thought: “This desire, if it increases, will cast me into some evil birth.” Being exercised in mind, he developed supernatural insight, and attained the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha; then poised in the air, he delivered a discourse, {4.115} and he also went to the Nandamūla cave.

Villagers of a place in Kāsi were likewise two, a father and a son, who were going on a journey together. At the entering in of a forest robbers were posted. These robbers, if they took a father and son together, would keep the son with them, and send the father away, saying: “Bring back a ransom for your son,” or if two brothers, they kept the younger and sent the elder away; or if teacher and pupil, they kept the teacher and sent the pupil – and the pupil for love of learning would bring money and release his teacher. Now when this father and son saw the robbers lying in wait, the father said: “Don’t you call me ‘father,’ and I will not call you ‘son.’ ” And so they agreed. So when the robbers came up, and asked how they stood to one another, they replied, “We are nothing to one another,” thus telling a premeditated lie. When they came out of the forest, and were resting after the evening bath, the son examined his own virtue, and remembering this lie, he thought: “This wrong, if it increases, will plunge me in some evil birth. I will subdue my wrongdoing!” Then he developed supernatural insight, and attained to the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha, and poised in the air delivered a discourse to his father, and he too went to the Nandamūla cave.

---

847 That is, he made this the subject of his meditation (ārammaṇāṁ), and thus sunk into an ecstatic trance.

848 Cf., Vidabbhajātaka, vol. i. no. 48.

In a village of Kāsi also lived a village headman, who laid an interdict upon all slaughter. Now when the time came when offering was wont to be made to the spirits, a great crowd gathered, and said: “My lord! This is the time for sacrifice: let us slay deer and swine and other animals, and make offering to the Yakkhas,” he replied, “Do as you have done previously.” The people made a great slaughter. The man seeing a great quantity of fish and flesh, thought to himself, “All these living creatures the men have slain, and all because of my word alone!” He repented: and as he stood [4.73] by the window, he developed supernatural insight, and attained to the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha, and poised in the air delivered a discourse, then he too went to the Nandamūla cave.

Another village headman who lived in the kingdom of Kāsi, prohibited the sale of strong drink. A crowd of people cried out to him, “My lord, what shall we do? It is the time-honoured drinking festival!” He replied, “Do as you have always done previously.” [4.116] The people made their festival, and drank strong drink, and fell quarrelling; there were broken legs and arms, and cracked crowns, and ears torn off, and many a penalty was inflicted for it. The village headman seeing this, thought to himself, “If I had not permitted this, they would not have suffered this misery.” Even for this trifle he felt remorse: then he developed supernatural insight, and attained the knowledge of a Paccekabuddha, poised in the air he discoursed, and bade them be vigilant, then he too went to the Nandamūla cave.

Some time afterwards, the five Paccekabuddhas all alighted at the gate of Benares, seeking for alms. Their upper robe and lower robe neatly arranged, with gracious address they went on their rounds, and came to the gate of the king’s palace. The king was much pleased to behold them; he invited them into his palace, and washed their feet, anointed them with fragrant oil, set before them savoury food both hard and soft, and sitting on one side, thus addressed them, “Sirs, that you in your youth have embraced the ascetic life, is beautiful; at this age, you have become ascetics, and you see the misery of evil sensual desires. What was the cause of your action?” They replied as follows:

1. “The water-draught of my own friend, although a friend, I stole:
Loathing the wrong which I had done, I afterwards was fain
To leave the world, an eremite, lest I do wrong again.”

2. “I looked upon another’s wife; lust rose within my soul:
Loathing the wrong which I had done, I afterwards was fain
To leave the world, an eremite, lest I do wrong again.”

3. “Thieves caught my father in a wood: to whom I did forth tell
That he was other than he was – a lie, I knew it well:
Loathing the wrong which I had done, I afterwards was fain
To leave the world, an eremite, lest I do wrong again.”

4. “The people at a drinking-feast full many beasts did kill,
And not against my will:
Loathing the wrong which I had done, I afterwards was fain
To leave the world, an eremite, lest I do wrong again.”

5. “Those persons who in former times of liquors drank their fill,
Now carried out a drinking-bout, whence many suffered ill, \(4.117\)
And not against my will:
Loathing the wrong which I had done, I afterwards was fain
To leave the world, an eremite, lest I do wrong again.”

These five verses they repeated one after the other.

When the king had heard the explanation of each, he uttered his praise, saying: “Sirs, your asceticism becomes you well.” \(4.74\)

The king was delighted at the discourse of these men. He bestowed upon them cloth for outer and inner garments, and medicines, then let the Paccekabuddhas go away. They thanked him, and returned to the place whence they came. Ever after that the king loathed the pleasures of sense, was free from desire, ate \(849\) his \(849\) Ought we to read abhuñjītvā, “did not care to eat”?

choice and dainty food, but to women he would not speak, would not look at them, rose up disgusted at heart and retired to his magnificent chamber, and there he sat: stared at a white wall until focusing on the Meditation Object, he attained Absorption. In this rapture rapt, he recited a verse in dispraise of desire:

6. “Come, out on lust, I say, unsavoury, thorn-beset!
Never, though long I followed wrong, such joy as this I met!” \{4.118\}

Then his chief queen thought to herself, “That king heard the discoursing of the Paccekabuddhas, and now he never speaks to us, but buries himself despondent in his magnificent chamber. I must take him in hand.” So she came to the door of that lordly chamber, and standing at the door, heard the king’s exalted utterances, in dispraise of desire. She said: “O mighty king, you speak ill of desire! But there is no joy like the joy of sweet desire!” Then in praise of desire she repeated another verse:

7. “Great is the joy of sweet desire: no greater joy than love:
Who follow this attain the bliss of paradise above!”

Hearing this, the king made reply, “Perish, vile jade! What say you? Whence comes the joy of desire? There are miseries which come to pay for it,” with which he uttered the remaining verses in dispraise:

8. “Ill-tasting, painful is desire, there is no worser woe:
Who follow wrong are sure to win the pains of hell below.

9. Than sword well whetted, or a blade implacable, athirst,
Than knives deep driven in the heart, desires are more accursed.

10. A pit as deep as men are tall, where live coals blazing are,
A ploughshare heated in the sun – desires are worser far.

11. A poison very venomous, an oil of little ease,\(^{850}\)
Or that vile thing to copper clings\(^{851}\) – desires are worse than these.” \{4.119\}

Thus the Great Being discoursed to his consort. Then he gathered his courtiers, and said: “O courtiers, do you manage the kingdom: I am about to renounce the \(^{850}\) “Extracted oil”? (cf. Suśrūta, i. 181). Apparently some kind of poison.

\(^{851}\) Verdigris.
world.” Amidst the wailing and lamentation of a great multitude, he rose before them, and poised in the air, delivered a discourse. Then along the path of the wind he past to the furthest Himālayas, and in a delightful spot built a [4.75] hermitage; there he lived the life of a sage, until at the end of his days he became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, added, “Monks, there is no such thing as a petty wrong: the very smallest wrong must be checked by a wise man.” Then he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka; now at the conclusion of the Truths the five hundred monks became Arahats. “At that time the Paccekabuddhas attained Nibbāna, Rāhula’s mother was the queen consort, and I myself was the king.”

Ja 460 Yuvañjayajātaka

The Story about (Prince) Yuvañjaya (11s)

Alternative Title: Yudhañcayajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are discussing how the Bodhisatta had renounced his kingdom. The Buddha tells a story of a young prince who saw how the dew on the grass vanished and decided to renounce his kingdom, and took his young brother with him.

The Bodhisatta = (the prince) Yuvañjaya, Ānanda = (his brother) Yudhiṭṭhila,
members of the royal family = the mother and father (mātāpitaro).

Past Compare: Cp 21 Yudhañjayacariyā.

Keywords: Impermanence, Renunciation.

“I greet the lord.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about the Great Renunciation.⁸⁵²

One day the monks had assembled in the Dhamma Hall. “Monks,” one would say to his fellow, “the One with Ten Powers might have dwelt in a house, he might have been a Universal Monarch in the centre of the great world, possessed of the Seven Precious Things, glorious with the Four Paths to Power, surrounded with sons more than a thousand! Yet all this magnificence he renounced when he perceived the bane that lies in desires. At midnight, with Channa in company, he mounted his horse Kanthaka, and departed: on the banks of Anomā, the River Glorious, he renounced the world, and for six years he tormented himself with austerities, and then attained to perfect wisdom.” Thus they talked of the Buddha’s virtues. The Teacher entering, asked, “What are you speaking of now, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that the Tathāgata has made the Great Renunciation. In days of yore he retired and gave up the kingdom of Benares City, which was twelve leagues in extent.”

So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past a king named Sabbadatta reigned in the city of Ramma. The place which we now call Benares is named Surundhana City in the Udayājātaka [Ja 458], and Sudassana in the Cullasutasomajātaka [Ja 525], and [4.76] Brahmavaddhana in the Sonanadajātaka [Ja 532], and Pupphavatī in the Khaṇḍahālajātaka [Ja 542]: but in this Yuvañjaya jātaka [Ja 460] it is named Ramma City. In this manner its name changes on each several occasion. At that time the king Sabbadatta had a thousand sons; and to his eldest son Yuvañjana he gave the viceroyalty.

One day early in the morning he mounted his splendid chariot, and in great pomp went to sport in the park. On the tree-tops, on the grass-tips, at the ends of the branches, on all the spiders’ webs and threads, on the points of the rushes, he saw the dew-drops hanging like so many strings of pearls. “Friend charioteer,” said he, “what is this?” “This, my lord,” he replied, “is what falls in the cold weather, and they call it dew.” The prince took his pleasure in the park for a portion of the day. In the evening, as he was returning home, he could see none of it. “Friend charioteer,” said he, “where are the dew-drops? I do not see them now.” “My lord,” said the other, “as the sun rises higher, they all melt and sink into the ground.” On hearing this, the prince was distressed, and said: “The life of us living beings is fashioned like dew-drops on the grass. I must be rid of the oppression of 853 See iii. 454 (p. 272 of this translation).

---

disease, old age, and death; I must take leave of my parents, and renounce the world.” So because of the dew-drops, he perceived the Three Worlds\textsuperscript{854} as it were in a blazing fire. When he came home, he went into the presence of his father in his magnificent Hall of Judgement, and greeting his father, he stood on one side, and repeated the first verse, asking his leave to renounce the world:

1. “I greet the lord of charioteers with friends and courtiers by:
   The world, O king! I would renounce: let not my lord deny.”

Then the king repeated the second verse, dissuading him:

2. “If aught you crave, Yuvañjana, I will fulfil it quite:
   If any hurt you, I protect: be you no eremite.” \{4.121\}

Hearing this, the prince recited the third verse:

3. “No man there is that does me harm, my wishes nothing lack;
   But I would seek a refuge, where old age makes no attack.”

By way of explaining this matter, the Teacher uttered a half-verse:

4a. “The son speaks to his father thus, the father to his son,”

The remaining half-verse was uttered by the king:

4b. “Leave not the world, O prince! So cry the townsfolk every one.” \[4.77\]

The prince again repeated this verse:

5. “O do not from the unworldly life, great monarch, make me stay, Lest I, intoxicate with sensual desires, to age become a prey!”

This said, the king hesitated. Then the mother was told, “Your son, my lady, is asking his father’s leave to renounce the world.” “What do you say?” she asked. It took her breath away. Seated in her litter of gold she went swiftly to the Hall of Judgement, and repeating the sixth verse, asked:

\textsuperscript{854} Kāmabhavo, rūpabhavo, arūpabhavo: sense-existence, body-existence (where there is form, but no sensual enjoyment), formless-existence. See Hardy, \textit{Manual of Buddhism}, p. 3, for a fuller account.
6. “I beg you, it is I, my dear, and I would make you stay! Long wish I you, my son, to see, O do not go away!” (4.122)

On hearing which the prince repeated the seventh verse:

7. “Like as the dew upon the grass, when the sun rises hot, So is the life of mortal men, O mother, stay me not!”

When he had said this, she begged him again and again to the same effect. Then the Great Being addressed his father in the eighth verse:

8. “Let those that bear this litter, lift, let not my mother stay Me, mighty king! From entering upon my holy way.”

When the king heard his son’s words, he said: “Go, lady, in your litter, back to our palace of Perennial Delight.” At his words her feet failed her: and surrounded with her company of women, she departed, and entered the palace, and stood looking towards the Hall of Judgement, and wondering what news of her son. After his mother’s departure the Bodhisatta again asked leave of his father. The king could not refuse him, and said: “Have your will, then, dear son, and renounce the world.”

When this consent was gained, the Bodhisatta’s youngest brother, prince Yudhiṣṭhila, greeted his father, and likewise asked leave to follow the ascetic life, and the king consented. Both brothers bade their father farewell, and having now renounced worldly sensual desires departed from the Hall of Judgement, amidst a great company of people. The queen looking upon the Great Being cried weeping, “My son has renounced the world, and the city of Ramma will be empty!” Then she repeated a couple of verses:

9. “Make haste, and bless you! Empty now is Rammaka, I know; King Sabbadatta has allowed Yuvañjana to go. (4.123)

---

855 Tarati means technically to “flee from the City of Destruction.”
10. The eldest of a thousand, he, like gold to look upon,
This mighty prince has left the world the yellow robe to don.”

The Bodhisatta did not at once embrace the ascetic life. No, he first bade farewell to his parents; then taking with him his youngest brother, prince Yudhiṭṭhila, he left the city, and sending back the great multitude which followed them, they both made their way to the Himālayas. There in a delightful spot they built a hermitage, and embraced the life of a holy sage, and cultivating the transcendent rapture of meditation, they lived all their lives long upon the fruits and roots of the forest, and became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

This matter is explained in the verse spoken after Fully Awakening which comes last:

11. “Yuvañjana, Yudhiṭṭhila, in holy life remain:
Their father and their mother left, they break in two death’s chain.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that the Tathāgata renounced a kingdom to follow the ascetic life, but it was the same before,” then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time members of the present king’s family were the father and mother, Ānanda was Yudhiṭṭhila, and I was Yuvañjana myself.”

Ja 461 Dasarathajātaka

The Story about (Rāma’s Father, King) Dasaratha (11s)

In the present one layman’s father dies and he is overwhelmed with grief. The Buddha tells a story of a prince of old who to avoid controversy went to the wilderness to await his father’s death, and when news came, grieved not, for all life must die.

The Bodhisatta = the wise (prince) Rāma (Rāmapaṇḍita), Rāhulamātā = (his wife) Sītā,
Sāriputta = (his brother) Lakkhaṇa,
Ānanda = (his brother) Bhārata,

856 Edited and translated by v. Fausböll, The Dasarathajātaka, Copenhagen, 1871. The story is like that of the Rāmāyaṇa, except that here Sītā is the hero’s sister, not his wife.
Mahāmāyā = his mother (mātā),
Suddhodana = the great king Dasaratha (Dasarathamahārājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Rāmāyaṇa.

Keywords: Impermanence, Grief.

“Let Lakkhaṇa.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana about a landowner whose father was dead. This man on his father’s death was overwhelmed with sorrow: leaving all his duties undone, he gave himself up to his sorrow wholly. The Teacher at dawn of day looking out upon mankind, perceived that he was ripe for attaining the fruit of the First Path. Next day, after going his rounds for alms in Sāvatthi, his meal done, he dismissed the monks, and taking with him a junior monk, went to this man’s house, and gave him greeting, and addressed him as he sat there in words of honey sweetness. “You are in sorrow, lay brother?” said he. “Yes, sir, afflicted with sorrow for my father’s sake.” Said the Teacher, “Lay brother, wise men of old who exactly knew the eight conditions of this world, felt at a father’s death no grief, not even a little.” Then at his request he told a story of the past.

In the past, at Benares, a great king named Dasaratha renounced the ways of evil, and reigned in righteousness. Of his sixteen thousand wives, the eldest and queen-consort bore him two sons and a daughter; the elder son was named Rāmapaṇḍita, or Rāma the Wise, the second was named prince Lakkhaṇa [Lucky], and the daughter’s name was the lady Sītā [Furrow].

In course of time, the queen-consort died. At her death the king was for a long time crushed by sorrow, but urged by his courtiers he performed her obsequies, and set another in her place as queen-consort. She was dear to the king and beloved. In time she also conceived, and all due attention having been given her, she brought forth a son, and they named him prince Bharata.

857 Gain and loss, fame and dishonour, praise and blame, bliss and woe.
858 “Cool,” which has in India the same pleasant associations as warm has for us.
The king loved his son much, and said to the queen, “Lady, I offer you a boon: choose.” She accepted the offer, but put it off for the time. When the lad was seven years old, she went to the king, and said to him, “My lord, you promised a boon for my son. Will you give it me now?” “Choose, lady,” said he. “My lord,” said she, “give my son the kingdom.” The king snapped his fingers at her, “Out, vile jade!” said he angrily, “my other two sons shine like blazing fires; would you kill them, and ask the kingdom for a son of yours?” She fled in terror to her magnificent chamber, but on other days again and again asked the king for this.

The king would not give her this gift. He thought within himself, “Women are ungrateful and treacherous. This woman might use a forged letter or a treacherous bribe to get my sons murdered.” So he sent for his sons, and told them all about it, saying: “My sons, if you live here some mischief may befall you. Go to some neighbouring kingdom, or to the woodland, and when my body is burnt, then return and inherit the kingdom which belongs to your family.” Then he summoned soothsayers, and asked them the limits of his own life. They told him he would live yet twelve years longer. [4.125] Then he said: “Now, my sons, after twelve years you must return, and uplift the umbrella of royalty.” They promised, and after taking leave of their father, went forth from the palace weeping. The lady Sītā said: “I too will go with my brothers,” she bade her father farewell, and went forth weeping.

These three departed amidst a great company of people. They sent the people back, and proceeded until at last they came to the Himālayas. There in a spot well-watered, and convenient for the getting of wild fruits, they built a hermitage, and there lived, feeding upon the wild fruits.

Lakṣaṇaṇaṇḍita and Sītā said to Rāmaṇaṇḍita, “You are in place of a father to us; remain then in the hut, and we will bring wild fruit, and feed you.” He agreed and thenceforward Rāmaṇaṇḍita stayed where he was, the others brought the wild fruit and fed him with it. [4.80]

Thus they lived there, feeding upon the wild fruit; but king Dasaśratha pined after his sons, and died in the ninth year. When his obsequies were performed, the queen gave orders that the umbrella should be raised over her son, prince Bharata. But the courtiers said: “The lords of the umbrella are dwelling in the forest,” and they would not allow it. Said prince Bharata, “I will fetch back my brother Rāmaṇaṇḍita from the forest, and raise the royal umbrella over him.” Taking the five emblems of royalty,\textsuperscript{859} he proceeded with a complete host of the four arms\textsuperscript{860} to their dwelling-place.

Not far away he caused camp to be pitched, and then with a few courtiers he visited the hermitage, at the time when Lakṣaṇapāṇḍita and Sītā were away in the woods. At the door of the hermitage sat Rāmapāṇḍita, undismayed and at ease, like a figure of fine gold firmly set. The prince approached him with a greeting, and standing on one side, told him of all that had happened in the kingdom, and falling at his feet along with the courtiers, burst into weeping. Rāmapāṇḍita neither sorrowed nor wept; emotion in his mind was none.

When Bharata had finished weeping, and sat down, towards evening the other two returned with wild fruits. Rāmapāṇḍita thought: “These two are young; all-comprehending wisdom like mine is not theirs. [4.126] If they are told on a sudden that our father is dead, the pain will be greater than they can bear, and who knows but their hearts may break. I will persuade them to go down into the water, and find a means of disclosing the truth.” Then pointing out to them a place in front where there was water, he said: “You have been out too long, let this be your penance – go into that water, and stand there.” Then he repeated a half-verse:

\begin{quote}
1a. “Let Lakṣaṇa and Sītā both into that pond descend.”
\end{quote}

One word sufficed, into the water they went, and stood there. Then he told them the news by repeating the other half-verse:

\begin{quote}
1b. “Bharata says, king Dasaratha’s life is at an end.”
\end{quote}

When they heard the news of their father’s death, they fainted. Again he repeated it, again they fainted, and when even a third time they fainted away, the courtiers raised them and brought them out of the water, and set them upon dry ground. When they had been comforted, they all sat weeping and wailing together. Then prince Bharata thought: “My brother prince Lakṣaṇa, and my sister the lady Sītā, cannot restrain their grief to hear of our father’s death; but Rāmapāṇḍita \textsuperscript{859} Sword, umbrella, diadem, slippers, and fan.

\textsuperscript{860} Elephants, cavalry, chariots, infantry.
neither wails nor weeps. I wonder what can the reason be that he [4.81] grieves not? I will ask.” Then he repeated the second verse, asking the question:

2. “Say by what power you grieves not, Rāma, when grief should be? Though it is said your sire is dead grief overwhelms not thee!”

Then Rāmapaṇḍita explained the reason of his feeling no grief by saying,

3. “When man can never keep a thing, though loudly he may cry, Why should a wise intelligence torment itself thereby? {4.127}

4. The young in years, the older grown, the fool, and yes, the wise, For rich, for poor one end is sure: each man among them dies.

5. As sure as for the ripened fruit there comes the fear of fall, So surely comes the fear of death to mortals one and all.

6. Who in the morning light are seen by evening oft are gone, And seen at evening time, is gone by morning many a one.

7. If to a fool infatuate a blessing could accrue When he torments himself with tears, the wise this same would do.

8. By this tormenting of himself he waxes thin and pale; This cannot bring the dead to life, and nothing tears avail.

9. Even as a blazing house may be put out with water, so The strong, the wise, the intelligent, who well the scriptures know, Scatter their grief like cotton when the stormy winds do blow.

10. One mortal dies – to kindred ties born is another straight: Each creature’s bliss dependent is on ties associate.

11. The strong man therefore, skilled in sacred text, Keen-contemplating this world and the next, Knowing their nature, not by any grief, However great, in mind and heart is vexed.
12. So to my kindred I will give, them will I keep and feed,
All that remain I will maintain: such is the wise man’s deed.861

In these verses he explained the impermanence of things. [4.129]

When the company heard this discourse of Rāmapanḍita, illustrating the teaching of Impermanence, they lost all their grief. Then prince Bharata saluted Rāmapanḍita, begging him to receive the kingdom of Benares. “Brother,” said Rāma, “take Lakkhaṇa and Sītā with you, and administer the kingdom yourselves.” “No, my lord, you take it.” “Brother, my father commanded me to receive the kingdom at the end of twelve years. If I go now, I shall not carry out his bidding. After three more years I will come.” “Who will carry on the government all that time?” “You do it.” “I will not.” “Then until I come, these slippers shall do it,” said Rāma, and doffing his slippers of straw he gave them to his brother. So these three persons took the slippers, and bidding the wise man farewell, went to Benares with their great crowd of followers. [4.82]

For three years the slippers ruled the kingdom. The courtiers placed these straw slippers upon the royal throne, when they judged a cause. If the cause were decided wrongly, [4.130] the slippers beat upon each other, 862 and at that sign it was examined again; when the decision was right, the slippers lay quiet.

When the three years were over, the wise man came out of the forest, and came to Benares, and entered the park. The princes hearing of his arrival proceeded with a great company to the park, and making Sītā the queen consort, gave to them both the ceremonial sprinkling. The sprinkling thus performed, the Great Being standing in a magnificent chariot, and surrounded by a vast company, entered the city, making a solemn circuit right-wise; then mounting to the great terrace of his splendid palace Sucandaka, he reigned there in righteousness for sixteen thousand years, and then went to swell the hosts of heaven.

This verse spoken after Fully Awakening explains the upshot:

---

861 The commentator quotes on p. 129 a verse which occurred in the Kālabāhu Birth, No. 329 (vol. iii. p. 66 of this translation), beginning “Gain and loss”.

862 This last incident is an addition to the narrative in the Rāmāyaṇa, ii. 115, nor is it found in Tulsīdās’ Hindi version.
13. “Years sixty times a hundred, and ten thousand more, all told, Reigned strong-armed Rāma, on his neck the lucky triple fold.”

The Teacher having ended this discourse, declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths, the landowner was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time the king Suddhodana was king Dasaratha, Mahāmāya was the mother, Rāhulā’s mother was Sītā, Ānanda was Bharata, and I myself was Rāmapaṇḍita.”

Ja 462 Saṁvarajātaka

The Story about (the Great King) Saṁvara

In the present a monk goes to the forest and strives, but fails to attain. When brought to the Buddha he is reproved and told about a previous life where, though the youngest of one hundred sons of the king of Benares, he won the affections of all and attained precedence through his efforts.

The Bodhisatta = the minister who gave advice (ovādadāyako amacco), various monks = the other brothers (sesabhātikā), Sāriputta = prince Uposatha (Uposathakumāra), the monk (who gave up striving) = the great king Saṁvara (Saṁvaramahārājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Quoted at: Ja 8 Gāmanijātaka, Ja 156 Alīnacittajātaka, Past Compare: Ja 462 Saṁvarajātaka.

Keywords: Effort, Persistence.

“Your nature, mighty monarch.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a monk who had ceased to strive. This, we learn, was a young man of family, who lived in Sāvatthi. Having heard the Teacher’s discoursing, he renounced the world. Fulfilling the tasks imposed by his teachers and preceptors, he learned by heart both the Pātimokkhas. [4.83]

---

863 Kambugīvo: three folds on the neck, like shell-spirals, were a token of luck.
864 Gotama Buddha’s father and mother.
865 Gotama Buddha’s wife.
When five years were past, he said: “When I have been instructed in the mode of attaining Absorption, I will go dwell in the forest.” Then he took leave of his teachers and preceptors, and proceeded to a frontier village in the kingdom of Kosala. The people were pleased with his behaviour, \[4.131\] and he made a hut of leaves and there was attended to.

Entering upon the rainy season, zealous, eager, striving in strenuous endeavour he strove after Absorption for the space of three months, but of this not a trace could he produce. Then he thought: “Verily I am the most devoted to worldly conditions among the four classes of men taught by the Teacher! What have I to do with living in the forest?” Then he said to himself, “I will return to Jetavana, and there in beholding the beauty of the Tathāgata, and hearing his discourse sweet as honey, I will pass my days.” So he relaxed his striving; and setting forth he came in course of time to Jetavana.

His preceptors and teachers, his friends and acquaintances asked him the cause of his coming. He informed them, and they reproved him for it, asking him why he had done so. Then they led him into the Teacher’s presence. “Why, monks,” said the Teacher, “do you lead here a monk against his will?” They replied, “This monk has come here because he has relaxed his striving.” “Is this true, as they tell me?” asked the Teacher. “Yes, sir,” said the man. Said the Teacher, “Why have you ceased to strive, monk? For a weak and slothful man there is in this dispensation no high fruition, no becoming an Arahat, they only who make strenuous effort accomplish this. In days long gone by you were full of strength, easy to teach, and in this way, though the youngest of all the hundred sons of the king of Benares, by holding fast to the admonition of wise men you obtained the white umbrella.”

So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the youngest of his hundred sons was named prince Saṁvara. The king gave his sons in charge each of a separate courtier, with directions to teach them each what they ought to learn. The courtier who instructed the prince Saṁvara was the Bodhisatta, wise, learned, \[866\] An arhat is called \textit{apado}, sc. devoid of conditions for rebirth, such as human passion, desire, karma, kleśa, &c. (Childers, p. 313); \textit{padaparamo} seems to mean the opposite.

\[867\] The quotation should include \textit{Jetavanaṁ gantvā}, as is shown by line 7.
filling a father's place to the king's son. As each of the sons was educated, the courtiers brought them for the king to see. The king gave them each a province, and let them go.

When the prince Saṃvara had been perfected in all learning, he asked the Bodhisatta, "Dear father, if my father sends me to a province, what am I to do?" He replied, "My son, when a province is offered you, you should refuse it, and say, 'My lord, I am the youngest of all, if I go too, there will be no one about your feet, I will remain where I am, at your feet.'" Then one day, when prince Saṃvara had saluted him, and was standing on one side, the king asked him, "Well, my son, have you finished your learning?" "Yes, my lord." "Choose a province." "My lord, there will be emptiness about your feet, let me remain here at your feet, and in no other place!" The king was pleased, and consented.

After that he remained there at the king's feet; and again asked the Bodhisatta, "What else am I to do, father?" "Ask the king," said he, "for some old park." The prince complied, and asked for a park, with the fruits and flowers that there grew he made friends with the powerful men in the city.

Again he asked what he was to do. "Ask the king's leave, my son," said the Bodhisatta, "to distribute the food-money within the city." So he did, and without the least neglect of any person he distributed the food-money within the city.

Again he asked the Bodhisatta's advice, and after soliciting the king's consent, distributed food within the palace to the servitors and the horses and to the army, without any omission; to messengers come from foreign countries he assigned their lodging and so forth, for merchants he fixed the taxes, all that had to be arranged he did alone.

Thus following the advice of the Great Being, he made friends with everybody, those in the household and those without, all in the city, the subjects of the kingdom, strangers, by his winsomeness binding them to him as it were by a band of iron, to all of them he was dear and beloved.

When in due time the king lay on his deathbed, the courtiers asked him, "When you are dead, my lord, to whom shall we give the white umbrella?" "Friends," said he, "all my sons have a right to the white umbrella. But you may give it to him that pleases your mind." So after his death, and when the obsequies had been performed, on the seventh day they gathered together, and said: “Our king bade us give the Umbrella to him that pleases our mind. He that our mind desires is prince Saṁvara.” Over him therefore they uplifted the white umbrella with its festoons of gold, escorted by his kinsmen.
The Section with Eleven Verses – 1715

The great king Saṁvara cleaving to the advice of the Bodhisatta reigned in righteousness.

The other ninety nine princes heard that their father was dead, and that the Umbrella had been uplifted over Saṁvara. (4.133) “But he is the youngest of all,” said they, “the Umbrella does not belong to him. Let us uplift the Umbrella over the eldest of us all.” They all joined forces, and sent a letter to Saṁvara, bidding him resign the Umbrella or fight; then they surrounded the city.

The king told this news to the Bodhisatta, and asked what he was to do now. He answered, “Great king, you must not fight with your brothers. Divide the treasure belonging to your father into a hundred portions, and to your brothers send ninety-nine of them, with this message, “Accept this share of your father’s treasure, for fight with you I will not.” So he did.

Then the eldest of all the brothers, prince Upasatha by name, summoned the rest together, and said to them, “Friends, there is no one able to overcome the king; and this our youngest brother, though he has been our enemy, does not remain so, but he sends us his wealth, and refuses to [4.85] fight with us. Now we cannot all uplift the Umbrella at the same moment; let us uplift it over one only, and let him alone be king; so when we see him, we will hand over the royal treasure to him, and return to our own provinces.”

Then all these princes raised the siege of the city, and entered it, foes no longer. And the king told his courtiers to welcome them, and sent them to meet the princes. The princes with a great following entered on foot, and mounting the steps of the palace, and using all humility towards the great king Saṁvara, sat down in a lowly place. King Saṁvara was seated under the white umbrella upon a throne; great magnificence was his, and great pomp; what place soever he looked upon, trembled and quaked. Prince Upasatha seeing the magnificence of the mighty king Saṁvara, thought to himself, “Our father, I think, knew that prince Saṁvara would be king after his decease, and therefore gave us provinces and gave him none,” then addressing him, repeated three verses: (4.134)
1. “Your nature, mighty monarch, sure the lord of men well knew;
The other princes honoured he, but nothing gave to you.

2. While the king lived was it, or when a god to heaven he went,
That seeing their own benefit, your kinsmen gave consent?

3. Say by what power, O Saṁvara, you stand above your kin:
Why do your brothers not unite from you the place to win?”

On hearing this, king Saṁvara repeated six verses to explain his own character:

4. “Because, O prince, I never grudge great sages what is meet;
Ready to pay them honour due, I fall before their feet.

5. Me envying none, and apt to learn all conduct meet and right,
Wise sages each good precept teach in which they take delight.

6. I listen to the bidding of these sages great and wise;
My heart is bent to good intent, no counsel I despise.

7. Elephant troops and chariotmen, guard royal, infantry,
I took no toll of daily dole, but paid them all their fee.

8. Great nobles and wise counsellors waiting on me are found;
With food, wine, water (so they boast) Benares does abound. {4.135}

9. Thus merchants prosper, and from many a realm they come and go,
And I protect them. Now the truth, Upasatha, you know.”

Prince Upasatha listened to this account of his character, and then repeated two verses:

10. “Then be above your kith and kin, and rule in righteousness,
So wise and prudent, Saṁvara, your brothers you shall bless.

11. Your treasure-heaps your brothers will defend, and you shall be Safe from your foes as Sakka’s self from his arch enemy.”{4.86} {4.136}

King Saṁvara gave great honour to all his brothers. They remained with him a month and half a month; then they said to him, “Great king, we would go and see {868} The king of the Asuras.

if there be any brigands afoot in our provinces; all happiness to your rule!” They departed each to his province. And the king lived by the admonition of the Bodhisatta, and at the end of his days went to swell the hosts of heaven.

The Teacher, having finished this discourse, added, “Long ago, monk, you followed instruction, and why do you not now sustain your effort?” Then he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths this monk was established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time this monk was the great king Saṃvara, Sāriputta was prince Uposatha, the elders and secondary elders were the other brothers, the Buddha’s followers were their followers, and I myself was the courtier who advised the king.”

Ja 463 Suppārakajātaka
The Story about (the Wise Mariner) Suppāraka (11s)

In the present the monks are discussing the Buddha’s perfect wisdom. The Buddha tells a story of a wise man of old, who, after he retired from his life as a mariner, eventually went on one last great voyage where he guided merchants over the seas and by an act of truth brought them safely home again.

The Bodhisatta = the wise (mariner) Suppāraka (Suppārakapaṇḍita), the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Jm 14 Supāraga.

Keywords: Wisdom, Truth.

“Men with razor pointed.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about the Perfection of Wisdom.

One day, we are told, at evening, the monks were awaiting the coming of the Tathāgata to preach to them, and as they sat in the Dhamma Hall, they were saying one to another, “Verily, monks, the Teacher has great wisdom! Wide wisdom! Ready wisdom! Swift wisdom! Sharp wisdom! Penetrating wisdom! His wisdom hits on the right plan for the right moment; wide as the world, like a mighty unfathomable ocean, as the heavens spread abroad; in all Jambudīpā no wise man exists who can match the One with Ten Powers. As a billow that rises upon the great sea cannot reach the shore, or if it reaches the shore it breaks; {4.137} so no man can reach the One with Ten Powers in wisdom, or if he comes to the Teacher’s feet he is broken.” In these words they sang the praises of the One with Ten Powers’ Perfection of Wisdom. The Teacher came in, and asked, “What are you talking of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. He said: “Not only now is the Tathāgata full of wisdom. In former days, even when his knowledge was immature, he was wise. Blind though he was, he knew by the signs of the ocean that in the ocean such and such a jewel was hid.” Then he told a story of the past.

In the past, a king named Bharu reigned in the kingdom of Bharu. There was a seaport town named Bharukaccha, or the Marsh of Bharu. At that time the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a master mariner there; he was amiable, and of complexion a golden brown. They gave him the name of Suppārakakumāra. He grew up with great distinction; and even when he was no more than sixteen years old, he had gained a complete mastery over the art of seamanship. Afterwards when his father died he became the head of the mariners and plied the mariner’s calling, he was wise, and full of intelligence; with him aboard, no ship ever came to harm.

In time it so happened that injured by the salt water both his eyes lost their sight. After which, though he was head of the mariners, he plied no more the mariner’s trade; but resolved to live in the king’s service, and approached the king to that end. And the king appointed him to the office of valuer and assessor. From that time he assessed the worth of valuable elephants, valuable horses, choice pearls and gems.

One day an elephant was brought to the king, of the colour of a black rock, that he might be the state elephant. The king gave him a glance, and commanded that he be shown to the wise man. They led the creature before him. The man passed his hand over the elephant’s body, and said: “This elephant is not fit to be the elephant of state. This has the qualities of an elephant that is deformed behind. When his dam brought him forth, she could not take him on her shoulder; so she let him fall on the ground, and thus he became deformed in his hind feet.” They questioned those who had brought the elephant; and they replied that the wise man spoke the truth. {4.138} When the king heard of this, he was pleased, and ordered eight pieces of money to be given him.

On another day, a horse was brought for the king’s horse of state. This too was sent to the wise man. He felt it all over with his hand, and then said: “This is not fit to be the king’s state charger. On the day this horse was born, his dam died, and so for lack of the mare’s milk he did not grow properly.” This saying of his was true also. When the king heard of it, he was pleased, and caused him to be presented with eight pieces more.

Another day, a chariot was brought, to be the king’s state chariot. This too the king sent to him. He felt it over with his hand and said: “This chariot was made out of a hollow tree, and therefore it is not fit for the king.” This saying of his was true like the others. The king was pleased again when he heard of it, and gave him eight more pieces.

Then again they brought him a precious rug of great price, which the king sent to the man as before. He felt it all over, and said: “There is one place here where a rat has bitten a hole.” They examined and found the place, and then told the king. Pleased was the king, and ordered eight pieces to be given him again.

Now the man thought: “Only eight pieces of money, with such marvels as these to see! This is a barber’s gift; this king must be a barber’s [4.88] brat. Why should I serve such a king? I will return to my own home.” So back he went to the seaport of Bharukaccha, and there he lived.

It happened that some merchants had got ready a ship, and were casting about for a skipper. “That clever Suppāraka,” thought they, “is a wise man, having skill in means; with him aboard no ship comes to harm. Blind though he be, the wise Suppāraka is the best.” So to him they repaired, and asked him to be their skipper. “Blind am I, friends,” he replied, “and how can I sail your ship?” “Blind you may be, master,” said the merchants, “but you are the best.” As they pressed him unceasingly, he at length consented, “As you put it to me,” said he, “I will be your skipper.” [4.139] Then he went aboard their vessel.

They sailed in their ship upon the high seas. For seven days the ship sailed without mishap, then an unseasonable wind arose. Four months the vessel tossed about on a primeval ocean, until she arrived at what is called the Khuramāla sea. 869 Here fish with bodies like men, and sharp razor-like snouts, dive in and out of the water.

869 There is an account of the mythological seas which follow in Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, pp. 12 ff.
The merchants observing these asked the Great Being what that sea was named, repeating the first verse:

1. “Men with razor-pointed noses rising up and diving down! Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us by what name this sea is known?”

The Great Being, at this question, reflecting over in mind his mariner’s lore, answered by repeating the second verse:

2. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey, This is Khuramāli ocean where your ship has gone astray.”

Now it happens that in this ocean diamonds are to be found. The Great Being reflected, that if he told them this was a diamond sea, they would sink the ship in their greed for collecting the diamonds. So he told them nothing; but having brought the ship to, he got a rope, and lowered a net as if to catch fish. With this he brought in a haul of diamonds, and stored them in the ship; then he caused the wares of little value to be cast overboard.

The ship passed over this sea, and came to another called Aggimāla. This sea sent forth a radiance like a blazing bonfire, like the sun at midday. The merchants questioned him in this verse:

3. “Lo! An ocean like a bonfire blazing, like the sun, we see! Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us what the name of this may be?”

The Great Being replied to them in the verse next following: [4.140]

4. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey, This is Aggimāli ocean where your ship has gone astray.” [4.89]

Now in this sea was abundance of gold. In the same manner as before, he got a haul of gold from it, and laid it aboard. Passing over this sea, the ship next came to an ocean called Dadhimāla, gleaming like milk or curds. The merchants enquired its name in a verse:

5. “Lo! An ocean white and milky, white as curds we seem to see! Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us what the name of this may be?”

The Great Being answered them by the following verse:
6. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey, This is Dadhimāli ocean where your ship has gone astray.”

In this sea there was an abundance of silver. He procured it in the same way as before, and laid it aboard. Over this sea the ship sailed, and came to an ocean called Nilavaṇṇakusamāla, which had the appearance of a stretch of dark kusa grass, or a field of corn. The merchants enquired its name in a verse:

7. “Lo! An ocean green and grassy, like young corn we seem to see! Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us what the name of this may be?”

He replied in the words of the verse next following:

8. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey, This is Kusamāli ocean where your ship has gone astray.”

Now in this ocean was a great quantity of precious emeralds. As before, he made a haul of them, and stored them on board. Passing over this sea, the ship came to a sea called Nalamāla, which had the aspect of an expanse of reeds or a grove of bamboos. The merchants asked its name in a verse:

9. “Lo! An ocean like a reed-bed, like a Bamboo Grove we see! Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us what the name of this may be?”

The Great Being replied by the following verse:

10. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey, This is Nalamāli ocean where your ship has gone astray.”

Now this ocean was full of coral of the colour of bamboos. He made a haul of this also and got it aboard.

---

870 Poa Cynosuroides.
871 The commentator explains that the sea was red, like the reeds called “scorpion-reed” or “crab-reed,” which are red in colour: the word translated “bamboo” (velu) he says may also mean “coral.” He adds that the haul was coral, which is also the word used at the end of the story (pavālo). The word so translated here is veluriyaṁ, which Childers renders “a kind of precious stone, perhaps lapis lazuli”.
After passing the Nalamāli sea, the merchants came to a sea named Vaḷabhāmukha. Here the water is sucked away and rises on every side; and the water thus sucked away on all sides rises in sheer precipices leaving what looks like a great pit. A wave rises on one side like a wall, a terrific roar is heard, which seems as it would burst the ear and break the heart. On sight of this the merchants were terrified, and asked its name in a verse:

11. “Hear the awful sound terrific of a huge unearthly sea!
Lo a pit, and to the waters in a steep declivity!
Speak, Suppāraka, and tell us what the name of this may be?”

The Bodhisatta replied in this following verse:

12. “Merchants come from Bharukaccha, seeking riches to purvey,
This is Valabhāmukhi ocean where your ship has gone astray.”

He went on, “Friends, once a ship has got into the Valabhāmukha sea there is no returning. If this ship gets there, she will sink and go to destruction.” Now there were seven hundred souls aboard this ship, and they were in fear of death; with one voice they uttered a very bitter cry, like the cry of those who are burning in the lowest hell. The Great Being thought: “Except me, no other can save these merchants; I will save them by an Assertion of Truth.” Then he said aloud, “Friends, bathe me speedily in scented water, and put new garments upon me, prepare a full bowl, and set me in front of the ship.” They quickly did so. The Great Being took the full bowl in both hands, and standing in the front of the ship, performed an Assertion of Truth, repeating the final verse:

13. “Since I can myself remember, since intelligence first grew,
Not one life of living creature have I taken, that I knew;
May this ship return to safety if my solemn words are true!”

Four months the vessel had been voyaging in far distant regions; and now as though endued with Supernormal Powers, it returned in one single day to the seaport town of Bharukaccha, and even upon the dry land it went, till it rested before the mariner’s door, having sprung over a space of eleven hundred cubits.

---

872 See Hardy, Manual, p. 13. It was a kind of hollow like a saucer.
873 Avīci.
The Great Being divided amongst the merchants all the gold and silver, jewels, coral, and diamonds, saying, {4.143} “This treasure is enough for you, voyage on the sea no more.” Then he discoursed to them; and after giving gifts and doing good his life long, he went to swell the hosts of heaven.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, said: “Then, monks, the Tathāgata was most wise in former days, as he is now,” and identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Buddha’s company were the company (of merchants), and I myself was the wise Suppāraka.”
There is no story of the present. The Buddha tells a story of how a queen was caught in an affair with her groom, and was removed from her high position.

The Bodhisatta = king (of the cuckoos) Kuṇāla.

Past Source: Ja 536 Kuṇāla, Quoted at: Ja 464 Cullakuṇālajātaka.

Keywords: Lust, Adultery.

“Poor fickle creatures.” [4.91] (4.144) This birth will be given under the Kuṇālajātaka [Ja 536].

In the past the wife of Brahmadatta, Piṇgiyāṇī by name, opening her window looked out and saw a royal groom, and, when the king had fallen asleep, she got down through the window and committed adultery with him, and then again climbed back to the palace and shampooed her person with perfumes and lay down with the king. Now one day the king thought: “I wonder why at midnight the person of the queen is always cool: I will examine into the matter.” So one day he pretended to be asleep and got up and followed her and saw her committing folly with a groom. He returned and climbed up to his chamber, and she too after she had been guilty of adultery came and lay down on the small bed. Next day the king, in the presence of his ministers, summoned her and made known her misconduct, saying: “All women alike are sinners.” And he forgave her offence, though it deserved death, imprisonment, mutilation, or cleaving asunder, but he deposed her from her high rank and made someone else his queen consort. At that time king Kuṇāla was Brahmadatta, and so it was that he told this story as of something he had seen with his own eyes, and by way of illustration he repeated this verse:
1. “Fair Piṅgīyāṇī was as wife adored
   By Brahmādatta, earth's all conquering lord,
   Yet did wrong with devoted husband’s slave,
   And lost by lechery both king and cheat.”

After telling of the defilements of women in old world stories, in yet another way, still speaking of their misdeeds, he said:

2. “Poor fickle creatures women are, ungrateful, treacherous they,
   No man if not possessed would deign to credit aught they say.

3. Little reck they of duty’s call or plea of gratitude,
   Insensible to parents’ love and ties of Saṅgha,
   Transgressing every law of right, they play a shameless part,
   In all their acts obedient to the wish of their own heart.

4. However long they dwell with him, though kind and loving he,
   Tender of heart and dear to them as life itself may be,
   In times of trouble and distress, leave him they will and must,
   I for my part in womenfolk can never put my trust.

5. How often is a woman’s mind like shifty monkey’s found,
   Or like the shade cast by a tree on height or depth around,
   How changeful too the purpose lodged within a woman’s breast,
   Like tire of wheel revolving swift without a pause or rest.

6. Whene’er with due reflection they look round and see their way
   To captivate some man of wealth and make of him their prey,
   Such simpletons with words so soft and smooth they captive lead,
   E’en as Cambodian groom with herbs will catch the fiercest steed.

7. But if when looking round with care they fail to see their way
   To get possession of his wealth and make of him a prey,
   They drive him off, as one that now has reached the furthest shore
   And cuts adrift the ferry boat he needeth nevermore.

8. Like fierce devouring flame they hold him fast in their embrace,
   Or sweep him off like stream in flood that hurries on apace;
   They court the man they hate as much as one that they adore,
   E’en as a ship that hugs alike the near and farther shore.
9. They not to one or two belong, like open stall are they,
One might as soon catch wind with net as women hold in sway.

10. Like river, road, or drinking shed, assembly hall or inn,
So free to all are womenfolk, no limits check their sins.

11. Fell as black serpent’s head are they, as ravenous as a fire,
As kine the choicest herbage pick, they lovers rich desire.

12. From elephant, black serpent, and from flame that’s fed on ghee,
From man besprinkled to be king, and women we should flee.
All these whoso is on his guard will treat as deadly foe,
Indeed their very nature it is very hard to know.

13. Women who very clever are or very fair to view,
And such as many men admire – all these one should eschew;
A neighbour’s wife and one that seeks a man of wealth for mate,
Such kind of women, five in all, no man should cultivate.”

Ja 465 Bhaddasālajātaka
The Story about (the King of the Gods) Bhaddasāla

In the present the Sākiyans deceive the king of Kosala and send him the daughter of a slave girl as his new queen. When the son of this arrangement finds out he determines to destroy the clan. The Buddha tries to save them, but in the end he cannot. He then tells how a Devatā of a large tree succeeded in saving his relations in the past.

The Bodhisatta = the King of the Devas, Bhaddasāla (Bhaddasāladevarājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the gods who dwelt in the young Sāla trees (taruṇasālesu nibbattadevatā),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 465 Bhaddasāla,
Compare: Ja 7 Kaṭṭhahārijātaka, Dhp-a IV.3 Viḍūḍabha,
Quoted at: Ja 22 Kukkurajātaka, Ja 407 Mahākapijātaka.

Keywords: Kinship, Loyalty, Devas.

“Who are you.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana about doing good to one’s kith and kin. At Sāvatthi in the house of Anāthapiṇḍika there was always unfailing food for five hundred monks, and the same with Visākhā and the king of Kosala. But in the king’s palace, various and fine as was the fare given, no one was friendly to the monks. The result was that the monks never ate in the palace, but they took their food and went off to eat it at the house of Anāṭhapinīḍika or Visākhā or some other of their trusted friends.

One day the king said: “A present has been brought; take this to the monks,” and sent it to the refectory. An answer was brought that no monks were there in the refectory. “Where are they gone?” he asked. They were sitting in their friends’ houses to eat, was the reply. So the king after his morning meal came into the Teacher’s presence, and asked him, “Good sir, what is the best kind of food?” “The food of friendship is the best, great king,” said he, “even sour rice-gruel given by a friend becomes sweet.” “Well, sir, and with whom do the monks find friendship?” “With their kindred, great king, or with the Sakya families.” Then the king thought, what if he were to make a Sakya girl his queen-consort; then the monks would be his friends, as it were with their own kindred.

So rising from his seat, he returned to the palace, and sent a message [4.92] to Kapilavatthu to this effect, “Please give me one of your daughters in marriage, for I wish to become connected with your family.” On receipt of this message the Sakyas gathered together and deliberated. “We live in a place subject to the authority of the king of Kosala; if we refuse a daughter, he will be very angry, and if we give her, the custom of our clan will be broken. What are we to do?” Then Mahānāma said to them, “Do not trouble about it. I have a daughter, named Vāsabhakhattiyā. Her mother is a slave woman, Nāgamunḍā by name; she is some sixteen years of age, of great beauty and auspicious prospects, and by her father’s side noble. We will send her, as a girl nobly born.” The Sakyas agreed, and sent for the messengers, and said they were willing to give a daughter of the clan, and that they might take her with them at once. But the messengers reflected: “These Sakyas are desperately proud, in matters of birth. Suppose they should send a girl who was not of them, and say that she was so? We will take none but

---

874 A famous female disciple, for whose history see Hardy, Manual, 220 ff.
875 Headquarters of the Sakya clan, and Buddha’s birthplace.
876 A Sakya prince: see Hardy, Manual, 227.
877 Khattiya.
one who eats along with them.” So they replied, “Well, we will take her, but we will take one who eats along with you.”

The Sakyas assigned a lodging for the messengers, and then wondered what to do. Mahānāma said: “Now do not trouble about it; I will find a way. At my mealtime bring in Vāsabhakhattiyā dressed up in her finery; then just as I have taken one mouthful, produce a letter, and say, ‘My lord, such a king has sent you a letter; be pleased to hear his message at once.’ ”

They agreed; and as he was taking his meal they dressed and adorned the maid. “Bring my daughter,” said Mahānāma, “and let her take food with me.” “In a moment,” they said, “as soon as she is properly adorned,” and after a short delay they brought her in. Expecting to take food with her father, she dipped her hand into the same dish. Mahānāma had taken one mouthful with her, and put it in his mouth; but just as he stretched out his hand for another, they brought him a letter, saying: “My lord, such a king has sent a letter to you: be pleased to hear his message at once.” Said Mahānāma, “Go on with your meal, my dear,” and holding his right hand in the dish, with his left took the letter and looked at it. As he examined the message the maiden went on eating. When she had eaten, he washed his hand and rinsed out his mouth. The messengers were firmly convinced that she was his daughter, for they did not divine the secret.

So Mahānāma sent away his daughter in great pomp. The messengers brought her to Sāvatthi, and said that this maiden was the true-born daughter of Mahānāma. The king was pleased, and caused the whole city to be decorated, and placed her upon a pile of treasure, and by a ceremonial sprinkling made her his chief queen. She was dear to the king, and beloved.

In a short time the queen conceived, and the king caused the proper treatment to be used; and at the end of ten months, she brought forth a son whose colour was a golden brown. On the day of his naming, the king sent a message to his grandmother, saying: “A son has been born to Vāsabhakhattiyā, daughter of the Sakya king; what shall his name be?” Now the courtier who was charged with this message was slightly deaf; but he went and told the king’s grandmother. When she heard it, she said: “Even when Vāsabhakhattiyā had never borne a son, she was more than all the world; and now she will be the king’s darling.” The deaf man did not hear the word “darling” aright, but thought she said: “Viḍūḍabha,” so back he went to the king, and told him that he was to name the prince Viḍūḍabha. This, the king thought, must be some ancient family name, and so named him Viḍūḍabha. After this the prince grew up and was treated as a prince should be.

When he was at the age of seven years, having observed how the other princes received presents of toy elephants and horses and other toys from the family of their mothers’ fathers, the lad said to his mother, “Mother, the rest of them get presents from their mothers’ family, but no one sends me anything. Are you an orphan?” Then she replied, “My boy, your grandfathers are the Sakya kings, but they live a long way off, and that is why they send you nothing.” Again when he was sixteen, he said: “Mother, I want to see your father’s family.” “Don’t speak of it, child,” she said. “What will you do when you get there?” But though she put him off, he asked her again and again. At last his mother said, “Well, go then.” So the lad got his father’s consent, and set out with a number of followers. Vāsabhakhāṭiyā sent on a letter before him to this effect, “I am living here happily; let not my masters tell him anything of the secret.” But the Sakyas, on hearing of the coming of Viḍūḍabha, sent off all their young children into the country. “It is impossible,” they said, “to receive him with respect.”

When the prince arrived at Kapilavatthu, the Sakyas had assembled in the royal rest-house. The prince approached the rest house, and waited. Then they said to him, “This is your mother’s father, this is her brother,” pointing them out. He walked from one to the other, saluting them. But although he bowed to them till his back ached, not one of them vouchsafed a greeting; so he asked, “Why is it that none of you greet me?” The Sakyas replied, “My dear, the youngest princes are all in the country,” then they entertained him grandly.

After a few days stay, he set out for home with all his retinue. Just then a slave woman washed the seat which he had used in the rest house with milk-water, saying insultingly, “Here’s the seat where sat the son of Vāsabhakhāṭiyā, the slave girl!” A man who had left his spear behind was just fetching it, when he overheard

878 Vallabhā.
the abuse of prince Viṭūḍabha. He asked what it meant. He was told that Vāsabhakhattiya was born of a slave to Mahānāma the Sakya. This he told to the soldiers; a great uproar arose, all shouting, “Vāsabhakhattiya is a slave woman’s daughter, so they say!” The prince heard it. “Yes,” he thought, “let them pour milk-water over the seat I sat in, to wash it! When I am king, I will wash the place with the blood of the hearts!”

When he returned to Sāvatthi, the courtiers told the whole matter to the king. The king was enraged against the Sakyas for giving him a slave’s daughter to marry. He cut off all allowances made to Vāsabhakhattiya and her son, and gave them only what is proper to be given to slave men and women.

Some few days later the Teacher came to the palace, and took a seat. The king approached him, and with a greeting said: “Sir, I am told that your clansmen gave me a slave’s daughter to marry. I have cut off their allowances, mother and son, and grant them only what slaves would get.” Said the Teacher, “The Sakyas have done wrong, O great king! [4.148] If they gave any one, they ought to have given a girl of their own blood. But, O king, this I say: Vāsabhakhattiya is a king’s daughter, and in the house of a noble king she has received the ceremonial sprinkling; Viṭūḍabha too was begotten by a noble king. Wise men of old have said, what matters the mother’s birth? The birth of the father is the measure; and to a poor wife, a picker of sticks, they gave the position of queen consort; and the son born of her obtained the sovereignty of Benares, twelve leagues in extent, and became king Kaṭṭhavāhana, the wood-carrier,” whereupon he told him the story of the Kaṭṭhahārijātaka [Ja 7].

When the king heard this speech he was pleased; and saying to himself, “The father’s birth is the measure of the man,” he again gave mother and son the treatment suited to them.

Now the king’s commander-in-chief was a man named Bandhula. His wife, Mallikā, was barren, and he sent her away to Kusināra, telling her to return to her own family. “I will go,” said she, “when I have saluted the Teacher.” She went to Jetavana, and greeting the Tathāgata stood waiting on one side. “Where are you going?” he asked. She replied, “My husband has sent me home, sir.” “Why?” asked the Teacher. “I am barren, sir, I have no son.” “If that is all,” said he, “there is no reason why you should go. Return.” She was much pleased, and saluting the Teacher went home again. Her husband [4.94] asked her why she had come back.
She answered, “The One with Ten Powers sent me back, my lord.” “Then,” said the commander-in-chief, “the Tathāgata must have seen good reason.” The woman soon after conceived, and when her cravings began, told him of it. “What is it you want?” he asked. “My lord,” said she, “I desire to go and bathe and drink the water of the tank in Vesālī City where the families of the kings get water for the ceremonial sprinkling.” The commander-in-chief promised to try. Seizing his bow, strong as a thousand bows, he put his wife in a chariot, and left Sāvatthi, and drove his chariot to Vesālī.

Now at this time there lived close to the gate a Licchavi named Mahāli, who had been educated by the same teacher as the king of Kosala’s general, Bandhula. This man was blind, and used to advise the Licchavis on all matters temporal and spiritual. Hearing the clatter of the chariot as it went over the threshold, he said: “The noise of the chariot of Bandhula the Mallian! This day there will be fear for the Licchavis!” By the tank there was set a strong guard, within and without; above it was spread an iron net; not even a bird could find room to get through. But the general, dismounting from his carriage, put the guards to flight with the blows of his sword, and burst through the iron network, and in the tank bathed his wife and gave her to drink of the water; then after bathing himself, he set Mallikā in the chariot, and left the town, and went back by the way he came.

The guards went and told all to the Licchavis. Then were the kings of the Licchavis angry; and five hundred of them, mounted in five hundred chariots, departed to capture Bandhula the Mallian. They informed Mahāli of it, and he said: “Go not! For he will slay you all.” But they said: “Nay, but we will go.” “Then if you come to a place where a wheel has sunk up to the nave, you must return. If you return not then, return back from that place when you hear the noise of a thunderbolt. If then you turn not, turn back from that place where you shall see a hole in front of your chariots. Go no further!” But they did not turn back according to his word, but pursued on and on.

Mallikā espied them and said: “There are chariots in sight, my lord.” “Then tell me,” said he, “when they all look like one chariot.” When they all in a line looked like one, she said: “My lord, I see as it were the head of one chariot.” “Take the reins, then,” said he, and gave the reins into her hand; he stood upright in the chariot, and strung his bow. The chariot-wheel sank into the earth nave-deep. The Licchavis came to the place, and saw it, but turned not back. The other went on a little further, and twanged the bow string; then came a noise as the noise of a thunderbolt, yet even then they turned not, but pursued on and on. Bandhula stood up in the chariot and sped a shaft, and it cleft the heads of all the five hundred chariots, and passed right through the five hundred kings in the place where the girdle is fastened, and then buried itself in the earth. As they did not perceive that they were wounded they pursued still, shouting, “Stop, holloa, stop!” Bandhula stopped his chariot, and said: “You are dead men, and I cannot fight with the dead.” “What!” they said, “dead, such as we now are?” “Loose the girdle of the first man,” said Bandhula. {4.150}

\[879\] Called Mahālicchavi in Dhp (p. 219).

They loosed his girdle, and at the instant the girdle was loosed, he fell dead. Then he said to them, “You are all of you in the same condition; go to your homes, and set in order what should be ordered, and give your directions to your wives and families, and then doff your armour.” They did so, and then all of them gave up the ghost.880

And Bandhula conveyed Mallikā to Sāvatthi. She bore twin sons sixteen times in succession, and they were all mighty men and heroes, and became perfected in all manner of accomplishments. Each one of them had a thousand [4.95] men to attend him, and when they went with their father to wait on the king, they alone filled the courtyard of the palace to overflowing.

One day some men who had been defeated in court on a false charge, seeing Bandhula approach, raised a great outcry, and informed him that the judges of the court had supported a false charge. So Bandhula went into the court, and judged the case, and gave each man his own. The crowd uttered loud shouts of applause. The king asked what it meant, and on hearing was much pleased; all 880 This is a variation of a well-known incident. A headsman slices off a man's head so skilfully, that the victim does not know it is done. The victim then takes a pinch of snuff, sneezes, and his head falls off. Another form is: Two men dispute, and one swings his sword round. They go on talking, and by and bye the other gets up to depart, and falls in two parts.

those officers he sent away, and gave Bandhula charge of the judgement court, and thenceforward he judged aright. Then the former judges became poor, because they no longer received bribes, and they slandered Bandhula in the king’s ear, accusing him of aiming at the kingdom himself. The king listened to their words, and could not control his suspicions. “But,” he reflected, “if he be slain here, I shall be blamed.” He instigated certain men to harry the frontier districts; then sending for Bandhula, he said: “The borders are in a blaze; go with your sons and capture the brigands.” With him he also sent other men sufficient, mighty men of war, with instructions to kill him and his two-and-thirty sons, and cut off their heads, and bring them back.

While he was yet on the way, the hired brigands got wind of the general’s coming, and took to flight. He settled the people of that district in their homes, and quieted the province, and set out for home. Then when he was not far from the city, those warriors cut off his head and the heads of his sons.

On that day Mallikā had sent an invitation to the two chief disciples along with five hundred of the monks. Early in the forenoon a letter was brought to her, with news that her husband and sons had lost their heads. \(4.151\) When she heard this, without a word to a soul, she tucked the letter in her dress, and waited upon the company of the monks. Her attendants had given rice to the monks, when bringing in a bowl of ghee they happened to break the bowl just in front of the elders. Then the Captain of the Dhamma said: “Pots are made to be broken; do not trouble about it.” The lady produced her letter from the fold of her dress, saying: “Here I have a letter informing me that my husband and his two-and-thirty sons have been beheaded. If I do not trouble about that, am I likely to trouble when a bowl is broken?” The Captain of the Dhamma now began, “Unseen, unknown,” and so forth, then rising from his seat uttered a discourse, and went home.

She summoned her two-and-thirty daughters-in-law, and to them said: “Your husbands, though innocent, have reaped the fruit of their former deeds. Do not you grieve, nor commit a wrong worse even than the king’s.” This was her advice. The king’s spies hearing this speech brought word to him that they were not angry.

---

\(^{881}\) Snp. 574, Sallasutta: “Unseen, unknown, is the life of men here below:” and so forth, for twenty verses.
Then the king was distressed, and went to her dwelling, and craving pardon of Mallikā and her sons’ wives, offered a boon. She replied, “Be it accepted.” She set out the funeral feast, and bathed, and then went before the king. “My lord,” said she, “you granted me a boon. I want nothing but this, that you permit my two-and-thirty daughters-in-law and me to go back to our own homes.” The king consented. Each of her two-and-thirty sons’ wives she sent away to her home, and herself returned to the home of her family in the city of Kusināra. And the king gave the post of commander-in-chief to one Dīgha-kārayana, sister’s son to the general Bandhula. But he went about picking faults in the king and saying: “He murdered my uncle.”

Ever after the murder of the innocent Bandhula the king was devoured by remorse, and had no peace of mind, felt no joy in being king.

At that time the Teacher dwelt near a country town of the Sakyas, named Ulumpa. There went the king, pitched a camp not far from the park, and with a few attendants went to the monastery to salute the Teacher. The five symbols of royalty he handed to Kārayana, and alone entered the Perfumed Chamber. All that followed must be described as in the Dhammacetiyasutta [MN 89]. When he [4.96] entered the Perfumed Chamber, Kārayana took those symbols of royalty, {4.152} and made Viḍūḍabha king; and leaving behind for the king one horse and a serving woman, he went to Sāvatthi.

After a pleasant conversation with the Teacher, the king on his return saw no army. He enquired of the woman, and learned what had been done. Then set out for the city of Rājagaha, resolved to take his nephew with him, and capture Viḍūḍabha. It was late when he came to the city, and the gates were shut; and lying down in a shed, exhausted by exposure to wind and sun, he died there.

When the night began to grow brighter, the woman began to wail, “My lord, the king of Kosala is past help!” The sound was heard, and news came to the king. He performed the obsequies of his uncle with great magnificence.

———

882 See above, p. 80 note.
883 The quotation should begin at bhāgineyyām, since the king was alone.
Viḍūḍabha once firmly established on the throne remembered that grudge of his, and determined to destroy the Sakyas one and all; to which end he set out with a large army. That day at dawn the Teacher, looking forth over the world, saw destruction threatening his kin. “I must help my kindred,” thought he. In the forenoon he went in search of alms, then after returning from his meal lay down lion-like in his Perfumed Chamber, and in the evening-time, having past through the air to a spot near Kapilavatthu, sat beneath a tree that gave scanty shade. Hard by that place, a huge and shady banyan tree stood on the boundary of Viḍūḍabha’s realms. Viḍūḍabha seeing the Teacher approached and saluting him, said: “Why, sir, are you sitting under so thin a tree in all this heat? Sit beneath this shady banyan, sir.” He replied, “Let be, O king! The shade of my kindred keeps me cool.” “The Teacher,” thought the other, “must have come here to protect his clansmen.” So he saluted the Teacher, and returned again to Sāvatthi. And the Teacher rising went to Jetavana.

A second and a third time the king called to mind his grudge against the Sakyas, a second and a third time he set forth, and again saw the Teacher seated in the same place, then again returned.

A fourth time he set out; and the Teacher, scanning the former deeds of the Sakyas, perceived that nothing could do away with the effect of their evildoing, in casting poison into the river; so he did not go there the fourth time. Then king Viḍūḍabha slew all the Sakyas, beginning with babes at the breast, and with the blood of the hearts washed the bench, and returned.

On the day after the Teacher had gone out for the third time and returned, he, having gone his rounds for alms, and his meal over, was resting in his Perfumed Chamber, the monks gathered from all directions into the Dhamma Hall, and seating themselves, began to tell of the virtues of the Great Being, “Sirs, the Teacher but showed himself, and turned the king back, and set free his kinsmen from fear of death. A helpful friend is the Teacher to his clan!” The Teacher entered, and asked what they talked about as they sat there. They told him. Then he said: “Not only now, monks, does the Tathāgata act for the benefit of his kinsmen; he did the same long ago.” With these words, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta ruled as king in Benares, and observed the Ten Royal Virtues, he thought to himself, “All over Jambudīpa the kings live in palaces supported by many a column. There is no marvel, then, in a palace supported by many columns; but what if I make a palace with one column only to support it? Then I shall be the leading king of all kings!” So he summoned his builders, and told them to build him a magnificent palace supported on one column. “Very good,” they said, and away they went into the forest.

There they beheld many a tree, straight and great, worthy to be the single column of such a palace. “Here are these trees,” they said, “but the road is rough, and we can never transport them; we will go ask the king about it.” When they did so, the king said: “By hook or by crook you must bring them, and quickly.” But they answered, “Neither by hook nor by crook can the thing be done.” “Then,” said the king, “Search for a tree in my park.”

The builders went to the park, and there they espied a lordly Sāl tree, straight and well grown, worshipped by village and town, and to it the royal family also were wont to pay tribute and worship; and they told the king. Said the king, “In my park you have found me a tree, good—go and cut it down.” “So be it,” they said, and repaired to the park, with their hands full of perfumed garlands and the like; then hanging upon it a five-spray garland, and encircling it with a string, fastening to it a nosegay of flowers, and kindling a lamp, they did worship, explaining, “On the seventh day from now we shall cut down this tree; it is the king’s command so to cut it down. Let the deities who dwell in this tree go elsewhere, and not unto us be the blame.”

The Devaputta who dwelt in the tree hearing this, thought to himself, “These builders are determined to cut down this tree, and to destroy my place of dwelling. Now my life only lasts as long as this my abiding place. And all the young Sāl trees that stand around this, where dwell the deities my kinsfolk, and they are many, will be destroyed. My own destruction does not touch me so near as the destruction of my children: therefore I must protect their lives.” Accordingly at the hour of midnight, adorned in divine splendour, he entered into the magnificent chamber of the king, and filling the whole chamber with a bright 884 See note in vol. ii. p. 72.

---

radiance, stood weeping beside the king's pillow. At sight of him the king, overcome by terror, uttered the first verse:

1. “Who are you, standing high in air, with heavenly vesture swathed:
   Whence come your fears, why flow the tears in which thine eyes are bathed?”

On hearing which the King of the Devas repeated two verses:

2. “Within your realm, O king, they know me as the Lucky Tree:
   For sixty thousand years I stood, and all have worshipped me.

3. Though many a town and house they made, and many a king’s dwelling,
   Yet me they never did molest, to me no harm did bring:
   Then even as they did worship pay, so worship you, O king!” [4.155]

Then the king repeated two verses:

4. “But such another mighty trunk I never yet did see,
   So fine a kind in girth and height, so thick and strong a tree.

5. A lovely palace I will build, one column for support;
   There I will place you to abide – your life shall not be short.” [4.98]

On hearing this the King of the Devas repeated two verses:

6. “Since you are bent to tear my body from me, cut me small,
   And cut me piecemeal limb from limb, O king, or not at all. [4.156]

7. Cut first the top, the middle next, then last the root of me:
   And if you cut me so, O king, death not will painful be.”

Then the king repeated two verses:

8. “First hands and feet, then nose and ears, while yet the victim lives,
   And last of all the head let fall – a painful death this gives.

9. O Lucky Tree! O woodland king! What pleasure couldst you feel,
   Why, for what reason do you wish to be cut up piecemeal?”

Then the Lucky Tree answered by repeating two verses:

10. “The reason (and a reason ’tis full noble) why piecemeal
    I would be cut, O mighty king! Come listen while I tell.
11. My kith and kin all prospering round me well-sheltered grow;
These I should crush by one huge fall – and great would be their woe.” [4.157]

The king, hearing this, was much pleased, “‘Tis a worthy Devaputta this,” he thought, “he does not wish that his kinsfolk should lose their dwelling-place because he loses his; he acts for his kinsfolk’s good.” And he repeated the remaining verse:

12. “O Lucky Tree! O woodland king! Your thoughts must noble be;
You would befriend your kindred, so from fear I set you free.”

The King of the Devas, having discoursed to this king, then departed. And the king being established according to his admonition, gave gifts and did other good deeds, till he went to fill the hosts of heaven.

The Teacher having ended this discourse said: “Thus it is, monks, that the Tathāgata acts so as to do good to his kith and kin,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, the followers of the Buddha were the deities which were embodied in the young saplings of the Sāl tree, and I was myself Lucky Tree, the King of the Devas.”

Ja 466 Samuddavaṇījajātaka
The Story about the Merchant (who Traveled) the Ocean (12s)

In the present both Devadatta and the families that supported him are doomed through their opposition to the Buddha. The latter tells a story of some carpenters who, having sailed to an island, offended the Yakkhas who inhabited the place, who then threatened to destroy them; some listened and some ignored the warnings and were destroyed by a tsunami.

The Bodhisatta = the wise carpenter (paṇḍitavaḍḍhakī),
Devadatta = the foolish carpenter (bālavaḍḍhakī),
Sāriputta = the Devaputta Dhammika (Righteous) (Dhammikadevaputta), Kokālika = the Devaputta Adhammika (Unrighteous) (Adhammikadevaputta).

Present Compare: Dhp-a I.12 Devadattassa vatthu.

Keywords: Greed, Gains, Devas.
“Others sow.” {4.158} This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about Devadatta, when he had gone down into hell, taking with him five hundred families. {4.99}

Now Devadatta, when the chief disciples had gone away, taking his followers with them, being unable to swallow his pain, spat up hot blood from his mouth, and departed; then tormented by great agony, as he remembered the virtues of the Tathāgata, he said to himself, “For nine months I have thought evil of the Tathāgata, but in the Teacher’s heart is never a sinful thought for me; in the eighty chief elders is no malice towards me; by my own deeds that I have done I am become all forlorn, and I am renounced by the Teacher, by the great elders, by elder Rāhula chief of my family, and by all the royal clans of the Sakyas. I will go to the Teacher, and reconcile myself with him.” So beckoning to his followers, he caused himself to be carried in a litter, and travelling always by night he made his way to the city of Kosala.

Ānanda the elder told the Teacher, saying: “Devadatta is coming, they say, to make his peace with you.” “Ānanda, Devadatta shall not see me.” Again when he had arrived at the city of Sāvatthi, the elder told it to the Teacher; and the Fortunate One replied as before. When he was at the gate of Jetavana, and moving towards the Jetavana lake, his wrongdoing came to a head: a fever arose in his body, and desiring to bathe and drink, he commanded them to let him out of the litter, that he might drink. No sooner had he alighted, and stood upon the ground, and before he could refresh himself, the great earth gaped, a flame arose from the nethermost hell of Avīci and surrounded him. Then he knew that his wrong deeds had come to a head, and remembering the virtues of the Tathāgata, he repeated this verse:

With these my bones to that supreme Being,
Marked with one hundred lucky marks, all-seeing,
God, more than God, who man’s bull-spirit tames,

885 Sāriputta and Moggallāna.
887 Devadatta was brother-in-law of the Buddha.
888 [Milindapañhā 4.3.]
With my soul to Buddha I am fleeing!

But in the very act of taking refuge, he was doomed to the hell Avīci. And there were five hundred families of his attendants, which families following him reviled the One with Ten Powers, and abused him, and in the Avīci hell were born, they also. Thus he went to Avīci, taking with him five hundred families.

So one day they were talking in the Dhamma Hall, “Monk, the sinful Devadatta, through greed of gain, set his anger without cause against the Supreme Buddha, and with no regard for the terrors of the future, with five hundred families was doomed to hell.” The Teacher entered and asked of what they were speaking, and they told him. Said he, “Monks, Devadatta being greedy of gain and honour had no eye for the terrors of the future; and in former times, as now, regarding not the terrors of the future, he with his followers through greed of present happiness came to utter ruin.” So saying, he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there stood near Benares a great town of carpenters, containing a thousand families. The carpenters from this town used to profess that they would make a bed, or a chair, or a house, and after receiving a large advance from men’s hands, they proved able to make nothing whatever. The people used to upbraid every carpenter they met with, and interfered with them. So those debtors were so much harassed that they could live there no longer. “Let us go into some foreign land,” they said, “and find some place or other to dwell in,” so to the forest they went.

They cut down trees, they built a mighty ship, and launched her in the river, and took her away from that town, and at a distance of some three-quarters of a league they laid her up. Then in the middle of the night they returned to the town to fetch their families, whom they conveyed on board ship, and then proceeded in due course to the ocean. There they sailed at the wind’s will, until they reached an island that lay in the midst of the sea. Now in that island grew all manner of wild plants and wild fruit trees, rice, sugar-cane, banana, mango, Jambu plum, jack, coconut, and what not. There was another man who had been 889 See vol. ii. p. 147, note. [Which reads: Gāvutaddhayojanamatte. It may possibly mean ‘an eighth.’] shipwrecked and had taken possession of that island before them, and lived therein, eating the rice and enjoying the sugar-cane and all the rest, by which he had grown stout and sturdy; naked he went, and his hair and beard were grown long. The carpenters thought: “If yonder island is haunted of Yakkhas, we shall all perish; so we will explore it.” Then seven brave and strong men, \( \text{\textsuperscript{4.160}} \) armed them with the five kinds of weapons, \( \text{\textsuperscript{890}} \) disembarked and explored that island.

The Section with Twelve Verses – 1741

At that moment the castaway had just broken his fast, and drunk of the juice of the sugar-cane, and in high contentment was lying on his back in a lovely spot, cool in the shade on some sand which glistered like silver plate; and he was thinking: “No such happiness as this have they who dwell in Jambudīpa, that plough and sow; better to me is this island than Jambudīpa!” He uttered this exalted utterance, and was at the height of bliss.

The Teacher, to explain how this castaway uttered this exalted utterance, repeated the first verse:

1. “Others sow and others plough,
   Living by the sweat o’ the brow;
   In my realm they have no share:
   Jambudīpa? This better far!”

The scouts who were exploring the isle caught the sound of his singing, and said: “It seems the voice of man that we hear; let us make acquaintance with him.” Following the sound, they came upon the man, but his aspect horrified them. “It is a Yakkha!” they cried, and put arrow to bow. When the man saw them, he was in fear of being wounded, so he called out, “I am no Yakkha, sirs, but a man: spare my \( \text{\textsuperscript{4.101}} \) life!” “What!” they said, “do men go all naked and defenceless like you?” and asked him again and again, only to receive the same answer, that he was a man.

At last they approached him, and all began to talk pleasantly together, and the newcomers asked how he came there. The other told them the truth of it. “As a reward for your good deeds you have come here,” said he, “this is a first-rate island. No need here to work with your hands for a living; of rice and sugar-cane, \( \text{\textsuperscript{890}} \) Sword, spear, bow, shield, axe.

---

and all the rest, there is no end here, and all growing wild; you may live here without anxiety.” “Is there nothing else,” they asked, 4.161 “to hinder our living here?” “No fear is there but this, the isle is haunted by Amanussas, and the Amanussas would be incensed to see the excretions of your bodies; so when you would relieve yourselves, dig a hole in the sand and hide it there. That is the only danger; there is no other; only always be careful on this point.”

Then they took up their abode in the place.

But among these thousand families there were two master workmen, one at the head of each five hundred of them; and one of these was foolish and greedy of the best food, the other wise and not bent on getting the best of everything.

In course of time as they continued to dwell there, all grew stout and sturdy. Then they thought: “We have not been merry men this long time, we will make some toddy from the juice of the sugar-cane.” So they caused the strong drink to be made, and being drunken, sang, danced, sported, then in thoughtlessness relieved themselves here, there, and everywhere without hiding it, so that they made the island foul and disgusting.

The deities were incensed because these men made their playing-place all foul. “Shall we bring the sea over it,” they deliberated, “and cleanse the island? This is the dark fortnight; now our gathering is broken up. Well, on the fifteenth day from now, at the first of the full moon, at the time of the moon’s rising, we will bring up the sea and make an end of them all.” Thus they fixed the day. At this a righteous Devaputta who was one of them thought: “I would not that these should perish before my eyes.” So in his compassion, at the time when the men were sitting at their doors in pleasant converse, after their evening meal, he made the whole island one blaze of light, and adorned in all splendour stood poised in the air towards the north, and spoke to them thus, “O you carpenters! The deities are angry with you. Dwell no longer in this place, for in half a month from this time, 891 There seems to be something wrong with the text: as it stands, the meaning is: “For a long time these have not been heroes.” But the word sūro is used idiomatically, sūro hutvā “as bold as brass,” i. 262. 30, ii. 119. 22. It might well be used of “Dutch courage.” — Or perhaps surā (brandy) in some form may lurk here.

---

the [4.102] deities will bring up the sea, [4.162] and destroy you one and all. Therefore flee from this place.” And he repeated the second verse:

2. “In thrice five days the moon will rise to view:
   Then from the sea a mighty flood is due
   This mighty island to o’erwhelm: then haste,
   Elsewhere take shelter, that it hurt not you.”

With this advice, he returned to his own place. He gone, another comrade of his, a cruel Devaputta, thought: “Perhaps they will follow his advice and escape; I will prevent their going, and bring them all to utter destruction.” So adorned in divine splendour, he made a great blaze of light over the whole place, and approaching them, remained poised in the air towards the south, as he asked, “Has there been a Devaputta here?” “There has,” was the reply. “What did he tell you?” They answered, “Thus and thus, my lord.” He then said: “This god does not wish you to live here, and in anger speaks. Go not elsewhere, but stay even here.” And with these words, he repeated two verses:

3. “To me by many signs it is made clear,
   That mighty ocean flood of which you hear
   Shall never this great island overwhelm:
   Then take your pleasure, grieve not, never fear.

4. Here you have lit upon a wide abode,
   Full of all things to eat, of drink and food;
   I see no danger for you: come, enjoy
   Unto all generations this your good.” [4.163]

Having thus in these two verses offered to relieve their anxiety, he departed. When he was gone, the foolish carpenter lifted up his voice, and paying no heed to the saying of the righteous Devaputta, he cried, “Let your honours listen to me!” and addressed all the carpenters in the fifth verse:

5. “That god, who from the southern quarter clear
   Cries out, ‘All safe!’ From him the truth we hear;
   Fear or fear not, the northern knows no whit:
   Why grieve, then? Take your pleasure – never fear!”

On hearing him, the five hundred carpenters who were greedy of good things inclined to the counsel of the foolish carpenter. But then the wise carpenter refused to hearken to his saying, and addressing the carpenters repeated four verses:

6. “While these two Yakkhas ’gainst each other cry,
One calling fear, and one security,
Come hear advice, lest soon and out of hand
You all together perish utterly.

7. Let us join all to build a mighty bark,
A vessel stout, and place within this ark
All fittings: if this southern spoke the truth,
And the other said but folly, off the mark.

8. This vessel for us good at need shall be;
Nor will we leave this isle incontinent;
But if the northern god spake truthfully,
The southern did but foolishness present – {4.164}
Then in the ship we all embark together,
And where our safety lies, all hie us there.

9. Take not for best or worst what first you hear;
But whoso lets all pass within the ear,
And then deliberating takes the mean,
That man to safest harbourage will steer.”

After this, he again said: “Come now, let us follow the words of both the deities. Let us build a ship, and then if the words of the first be true, into that ship we will climb and depart; but if the words of the other be true, we will put the ship out of the way, and dwell here.” When he had thus spoken, said the foolish carpenter: {4.165} “Go to! You see a crocodile in a teacup! You are far too slow! The first Devaputta spake in anger against us, the second in affection. If we leave this choicest of isles, whither shall we go? But if you needs must go, take your tail with you, and make your ship, we want no ship, we!”

The wise man with those that followed him, built a ship, and put all the fittings aboard, and he and the whole company stood in the ship. Then on the day of the 892 This metaphor is not in the Pāli.

---

full moon, at the time of moon-rising, up front the ocean a wave arose, and knee-deep it swept over the whole island. The wise man, when he observed the rising of the wave, cast loose the ship. Those of the foolish carpenter’s party, five hundred families they were, sat still, saying to one another, “A wave has arisen, to sweep over the island, but it will be no deeper.” Then the ocean-wave rose waist-deep, man-deep, deep as a palm tree, as seven palm trees, and over the whole island it rolled. The wise man, having skill in means, not snared by greed of good things, departed in safety; but the foolish carpenter, greedy of good things, not regarding the fear of the future, with five hundred families was destroyed.

The other three verses, full of instruction, illustrating this matter, are verses spoken after Fully Awakening:

10. “As through mid-ocean, by the deeds they did,
The traders they escaped in happiness:
So wise men, comprehending what lies hid
Within the future, will no jot transgress.

11. Fools in their folly, eaten up with greed
Who future dangers do not comprehend,
Sink overwhelmed, in face of present need,
As these in middest-ocean found their end. [4.104] [4.166]

12. Accomplish then the deed before the need,
Let not lack hurt me of the needful thing.
Who timely do the necessary deed
Come time, come never into suffering.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Not now for the first time, monks, but formerly also, has Devadatta been ensnared by pleasures of the present, and without a look to the future, has come to destruction with all his companions.” So saying, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Devadatta was the foolish carpenter, Kokālika was the unrighteous Devaputta that stood in the southern region, Sāriputta was the Devaputta who stood in the northern part, and I was myself the wise carpenter.”
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1746

Ja 467 Kāmajātaka
The Story about Desire

In the present one brahmin, after carefully tending his crops with the intention of giving a gift to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, loses all in all night’s flood. The Buddha then tells a story of the past in which a greedy king loses his chance to gain three kingdoms, before being taught the wisdom of impermanence, and putting his grief aside.

The Bodhisatta = the wise young brahmin (pañḍatamāṇava), the brahmin = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 467 Kāma,
Quoted at: Ja 228 Kāmaṇīta.

Keywords: Attachment, Grief.

“He that desires.” {4.167} This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a certain brahmin.

A brahmin, so they say, who dwelt at Sāvatthi, was felling trees on the bank of the Aciravatī, in order to cultivate the land. The Teacher, when he visited Sāvatthi for alms, perceiving his destiny, went out of his road to talk sweetly with him. “What are you doing, brahmin?” he asked. “O Gotama,” said the man, “I am cutting a space free for cultivation.” “Very good,” he replied, “go on with your work, brahmin.”

In the same manner the Teacher came and talked with him when the felled trunks were all away, and the man was clearing his acre, and again at plowing time, and at making the little embanked squares for water. Now on the day of sowing, the brahmin said: “Today, O Gotama, is my plowing festival. When this corn is ripe, I will give alms in plenty to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head.”

---

893 i.e. his capacity in the spiritual life.
894 Refer to the following passage in Vedāntaparibhāṣā: “yathā taḍāgodakāṁ kulyātmanā kedārān praviśya tadvadeva catuṣkoṇādyākāraṁ bhavati.” (For this note I am indebted to Prof. Cowell.) See also Sleeman, Rambles &c. ii. 178.
895 There was a great yearly ceremony of this kind, at which the king held the plough; see Hardy’s Manual of Buddhism, p. 150.
Teacher accepted his offer, and went away. On another day he came, and saw the brahmin watching the corn. “What are you doing, brahmin?” asked he. “Watching the corn, O Gotama!” “Very good, brahmin,” said the Teacher, and away he went. Then the brahmin thought: “How often Gotama the ascetic comes this way! Without doubt he wants food. Well, food I will give him.” On the day when this thought came into his mind, when he went home, there he found the Teacher come also. Thereat arose in the brahmin a wondrous great confidence.

By and by, when ripe was the corn, the brahmin resolved, tomorrow he would reap the field. But while he lay in bed, in the upper reaches of the Aciravatī the rain fell heavily; down came a flood, and carried the whole crop away to the sea, so that not one stalk was left. When the flood subsided, and the brahmin beheld the destruction of his crops, he had not the strength to stand: pressing his hand to his heart – for he was overcome with great sorrow – he went weeping home, and lay down lamenting.

In the morning the Teacher saw this brahmin overwhelmed with his woe, and he thought: “I will be the brahmin’s support.” So next day, after his alms-round in Sāvatthi, on his return from receipt of food he sent the monks back to their monastery, and himself with the junior who attended him visited the man’s house. When the brahmin heard of his coming, he took heart, thinking: “My friend must be come for a kindly talk.” He offered him a seat; the Teacher entering sat upon the seat indicated, and asked, “Why are you downhearted, brahmin? What has happened to displease you?” “O Gotama!” said the man, “from the time that I cut down the trees on the bank of the Aciravatī, you know what I have been doing. I have been going about, and promising gifts to you when that crop should be ripe: now a flood has carried off the whole crop, away to the sea, nothing is left at all! Grain has been destroyed to the amount of a hundred wagon-loads, and so I am deep in grief!” “Why, will what is lost come back for grieving?” “No, Gotama, that will it not.” “If that is so, why grieve? The wealth of beings in this world, or their corn, when they have it, they have it, and when it is gone, why, gone it is. No composite thing but is subject to destruction; do not brood over it.” Thus comforting him, the Teacher repeated the Kāma discourse [Snp 4.1] as appropriate to his case. At the conclusion of the discourse, the mourning brahmin was established in the Fruit of the First Path. The Teacher having eased him of his pain, arose from his seat, and returned to the monastery.
All the town heard how the Teacher had found such a brahmin pierced with the pangs of grief, had consoled him and established him in the Fruit of the First Path.

The monks talked of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Hear, sirs! The One with Ten Powers made friends with a brahmin, grew intimate, took his opportunity to declare the Dhamma to him, when pierced with the pangs of grief, eased him of pain, and established him in the Fruit of the First Path!” The Teacher came in, and asked, “What do you speak of, monks, as you sit here together?” They told him. He replied, “This is not the first time, monks, I have cured his grief, but I did the same long, long ago,” and with these words he told a story of the past.

In the past, Brahmadatta king of Benares had two sons. To the elder he gave the viceroyalty, the younger he made commander-in-chief. Afterwards when Brahmadatta was dead, the courtiers were for making the elder son king by the ceremonial sprinkling. But he said: “I care nought for a kingdom: let my younger brother have it.” They begged and besought him, but he would have none of it; and the younger was sprinkled to be king. The elder cared not for the viceroyalty, or any such thing; and when they begged him to remain, and feed on the fat of the land, “Nay,” said he, “I have nothing to do in this city,” and he departed from Benares. To the frontier he went; and dwelt with a rich merchant’s family, working with his own hands. These after a while, learning that he was a king’s son, would not allow him to work, but waited upon him as a prince should be attended.

Now after a time the king’s officers came to that village, for taking a survey of the fields. Then the merchant came to the prince, and said, “My lord, we support you; will you send a letter to your younger brother, and procure for us remission of taxes?” To this he agreed, and wrote as follows, “I am living with the family of such a merchant; I pray you remit their taxes for my sake.” The king consented, and so did. Thereupon all the villagers, and the people of the countryside, came to him, and said: “Get our taxes remitted, and we will pay taxes to you.” For them too he sent his petition, and got the taxes remitted. After that the people paid their taxes to him. Then his receipts and honour were great; and with this greatness grew his covetousness also. So by degrees he asked for all the district, he asked for the office of viceroy, and the younger brother gave it all. Then as his greed kept growing, he was not content even with viceroyalty, and determined to seize the kingdom; to which end he set out with a host of people, and taking up a position outside the city, sent a letter to his younger brother, “Give me the kingdom, or fight for it.”

The younger brother thought: “This fool once refused kingdom, and viceroyalty, and all; and now says he, I will take it by battle! If I slay him in battle, it will be my shame; what care I for being king?” So he sent a message, “I have no wish to fight: you may have the kingdom.” The other accepted it, and made his younger brother viceroy.

Thenceforward he ruled the kingdom. But so greedy was he, that one kingdom could not content him, but he craved for two kingdoms, then for three, and yet saw no end to his greed.

At that time Sakka, King of the Gods, looked abroad, “Who are they,” he thought, “carefully tend their parents? Who give alms and do good? Who are in the power of greed?” He perceived that this man was subject to greed, “That fool,” he thought, “is not satisfied with being king of Benares. Well, I will teach him a lesson.” So in the guise of a young brahmin, he stood at the door of the palace, and sent in word, that at the door stood a young man having skill in means. He was admitted, and wished victory to the king; then the king said: “Why have you come?” “Mighty king!” he answered, “I have a thing to say to you, but I desire privacy.” By power of Sakka, at that very instant the people retired. Then said the young man, “O great king! I know three cities, prosperous, thronged with men, strong in troops and horses, of these by my own power I will obtain the lordship, and deliver it to you. But you must make no delaying, and go at once.” The king being full of covetise gave his consent. (But by Sakka’s power he was prevented from asking, “Who are you? Whence come? And what are you to receive?”) So much Sakka said, and then returned to the abode of the Thirty-Three.

Then the king summoned his courtiers, and thus addressed them. “A youth has been here, promising to capture and give me the lordship of three kingdoms! Go, look for him! Send the drum beating about the city, assemble the army, make no delay, for I am about to take three kingdoms!” “O great king!” they said, “did you offer hospitality to the young man, or did you ask where he dwelt?” “No, no, I offered him no hospitality, I did not ask where he dwelt: go, and look for him!” They searched, but found him not; they informed the king, they could not in the whole city find the young man. On hearing this the king became gloomy. “The lordship over three cities is lost,” he thought again and again, “I am shorn of great glory. Doubtless the young man went away angry with me, that I gave him no money for his expenses, nor a place to dwell in.”

896 The quotation of the youth’s words begins at tīni.

Then in his body, full of greed, a burning arose; as the body burnt, his bowels were moved to a bloody flux; as the food went in, so it came out; physicians could not cure him, the king was exhausted. His illness was bruited abroad all through the city.

At that time, the Bodhisatta had returned to his parents in Benares from Taxila, after mastering all branches of learning. He hearing the news about the king, proceeded to the palace door, with intent to cure him, and sent in a message, that a young man was there ready to cure the king. The king said: “Great and most renowned physicians, known far and near, are not able to cure me: what can a young lad do? Pay his expenses, and let him depart.” The young man made answer, “I want no fee for my physic, but I will cure him; let him simply and solely pay me the price of my remedy.” When the king heard this, he agreed, and admitted him. The young man saluted the king, “Fear nothing, O king!” said he, “I will cure you; do but tell me the origin of your disorder.” The king answered in wrath, “What is that to you? Make up your medicine.” “O great king,” said he, “it is the way of physicians, first to learn whence the disease arises, then to make a remedy to suit.” “Well, well, my son,” said the king, and proceeded to tell the origin of the disease, beginning where that young man had come, and made his promise, that he would take and give to him the lordship over three cities. “Thus, my son, the disease arose from greed; now cure it if you can.” “What, O king!” said he, “can you capture those cities by grieving?” “Why no, my son.” “Since that is so, why grieve, O great king? Everything, animate or inanimate, must pass away, and leave all behind, even its own body. Even should you obtain rule over four cities, you could not at one time eat four plates of food, recline on four couches, wear four sets of robes. You ought not to be the slave of desire; for desire, when it increases, allows no release from the four states of suffering.” Thus having admonished him, the Great Being declared the Dhamma in the following verses:
1. “He that desires a thing, and then this his desire fulfilment blesses,
Sure a glad-hearted man is he, because his wish he now possesses. 897

2. He that desires a thing, and then this his desire fulfilment blesses, Desires throng on him more and more, as thirst in time of heat oppresses.

3. As in the hornéd kine, the horn with their growth larger grows:
So, in a foolish undiscerning man, that nothing knows,
While grows the man, the more and more grows thirst, and craving grows.

4. Give all the rice and corn on earth, slave-men, and kine, and horse,
'Tis not enough for one: this know, and keep a righteous course.

5. A king that should subdue the whole world wide,
The whole wide world up to the ocean bound,
With this side of the sea unsatisfied
Would crave what might beyond the sea be found.

6. Brood on desires within the heart – content will ne’er arise.
Who turns from these, and the true cure descries,
He is content, whom wisdom satisfies.

7. Best to be full of wisdom: these no lust can set afire;
Never the man with wisdom filled is slave unto desire.

8. Crush your desires, and little want, not greedy all to win:
He that is like the sea is not burnt by desire within,
But like a cobbler, cuts the shoe according to the skin.  {4.173}

9. For each desire that is let go a happiness is won:
He that all happiness would have, must with all lust have done.”  {4.174}

But as the Bodhisattva was repeating these verses, his mind being concentrated on the king’s white sunshade, there arose in him Absorption attained through focusing on the Meditation Object of white light. 898 The king on his part became whole and well; he arose in joy from his seat, and addressed him thus, “When all 897 [Snp 4.1].

898 This is one of the ten kinds of Kasiṇa, or ways in which the devotee may develop Jhāna.
See Childers, s.v.
those physicians could not heal me, a wise youth has made me whole by the medicine of his wisdom!” And he then repeated the tenth verse: [4.175]

10. “Eight verses have you uttered, worth a thousand pieces each: Take, O great brahmin! Take the sum, for sweet is this your speech.”

At which the Great Being repeated the eleventh:

11. “For thousands, hundreds, million times a million, nought care I: As the last verse I uttered, in my heart desire did die.”

More and yet more delighted, the king recited the last verse in praise of the Great Being:

12. “Wise and good is indeed this youth, all the lore of all worlds knowing: All desire in very truth is mother of misery by his showing.” [4.109]

“Great king!” said the Bodhisatta, “be circumspect, and walk in righteousness.” Thus admonishing the king, he passed through the air to the Himālayas, and living the life of a recluse, while life lasted, cultivated the Divine Abidings, and became destined for the Brahmā Realm.

This discourse ended, the Teacher said: “Thus, monks, in former days as now, I made this brahmin whole,” so saying, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time this brahmin was the king, and I was the wise young man.”

Ja 468 Janasandhajātaka

The Story about (King) Janasandha (12s)

In the present the king of Kosala neglects attendance on the Buddha. The latter tells a story of a prince who taught his people the ten things to be practiced, which will bring suffering if they are not fulfilled.

The Bodhisatta = king Janasandha (Janasandharājā), the Buddha’s disciples = his rest of the cast (parisā).

899 “Beginning with the second, those which explain the misery of desire are eight,” said the Commentator. The first verse, it will be remembered, is a quotation from Suttanipāta, and possibly may have been added later.

900 The number nahutain is 1 followed by 28 ciphers.
Keywords: Good conduct, Virtue.

“Thus spake.” {4.176} This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, for the instruction of the king of Kosala.

At one time, they say the king, intoxicated with power, and devoted to the pleasures of wrongdoing, held no court of justice, and grew remiss in attending upon the Buddha. One day he remembered the One with Ten Powers; and thought: “I must visit him.” So after breaking his fast, he ascended his magnificent chariot, and proceeding to the monastery, greeted him and took a seat. “How is it, great king,” asked the Bodhisatta, “that you have not showed yourself for so long?” “O, sir,” replied the king, “I have been so busy, that there has been no opportunity of waiting upon you.” “Great king,” said he, “it is not good to neglect such as I am, a Supreme Buddha, who can give admonition, dwelling too in a monastery in front. A king ought to rule vigilant in all kingly duties, to his subjects like mother or father, forsaking all evil courses, never omitting the ten virtues of a king. When a king is righteous, those who surround him are righteous also. No marvel were it, in truth, if under my instruction you were to rule in righteousness; but wise men of old, even when there was no teacher to instruct them, by their own understanding established in the threefold practice of well-doing, declared the Dhamma to a great multitude of people, and with all their attendants went to swell the hosts of heaven.” With these words, at his request, the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as son of his queen consort. They gave him the name of prince Janasandha. Now when he came of age, and had returned from Taxila, where he had been educated in all accomplishments, the king gave a general pardon to all prisoners, and gave him the viceroyalty. Afterwards when his father died, he became king, and then he caused to be built six alms houses: at the four gates of the city, in the midst of it, and at the palace gate. There day by day he used to distribute six hundred thousand pieces of money, and stirred up all Jambudīpa with his generosity; the prison doors he opened for good and all, the places of execution he destroyed, all the world he protected with the four sorts of beneficence,\(^\text{901}\)

---

\(^\text{901}\) Liberality, Affability, Impartiality, Good Rule.
he kept the five precepts, observed the holy Uposatha, and ruled in righteousness. From time to time he would gather together his subjects, and declare the Dhamma to them, “Give alms, practise virtue, righteously follow your business and calling, educate yourselves in the days of your youth, gain wealth, do not behave like a village cheat or a dog, be not harsh nor cruel, do your duty in caring for mother and for father, in family life honour your elders.” Thus he confirmed multitudes of people in good living.

Once on the holy day, fifteenth of the fortnight, having undertaken to keep the holy day, he thought to himself, “I will declare the Dhamma to the multitudes, for the continual increase of good and blessing to them, and to make them vigilant in their life.” Then he caused the drum to beat, and beginning with the women of his own household, gathered together all the people of the city. In the courtyard of his palace he sat, on a splendid couch set apart, beneath a pavilion adorned with jewels, and declared the Dhamma in these words, “O people of the city! To you I will declare the practices that will cause you suffering, and those which will not. Be vigilant, and hear with care and attention.”

The Teacher opened his mouth, a precious jewel among mouths, full of truth, and with a voice sweet as honey explained this address of the king of Kosala:

1. “Thus spake king Janasandha: Ten things in truth there be, Which if a man omit to do, he suffers presently.

2. Not to have got nor gathered store in time, the heart torments; To think he sought no wealth before he afterwards repents.

3. How hard is life for men untaught! He thinks, repenting sore That learning, which he now might use, he would not learn before.

4. A slanderer once, dishonest once, a backbiter unkind, Cruel, and harsh was I: good cause for sorrow now I find. {4.178}

5. A slayer was I, merciless, and to no creature gave, Contemptible: for this (said he) much sorrow now I have.

6. When I had many wives (thinks he) to whom I owed their due, I left them for another's wife; which now I dearly rue.
7. When plenteous store of food and drink there was, he sorrows sore,
To think he never gave a gift in the old time before.

8. He grieves to think that when he could, he would not care and tend Mother and father, now grown old, their youth now at an end.

9. To have slighted teacher, preceptor, or father, who would try
To gratify his every wish, causes deep misery.

10. To have treated brahmins with neglect, ascetics many a one
Holy, and learned, in the past, makes him repent anon.

11. Sweet is austerity performed, a good man honoured well:
That he did no such thing before ’tis sad to have to tell.

12. Who these ten things in wisdom brings to full accomplishment,
And to all men his duty does, will never need repent.”

Thus twice in the month did the Great Being discourse in the same way to the multitude. And the multitude, established in his admonition, fulfilled these ten things, and became destined for heaven.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Thus, O great king, wise men of old, untaught and from their own intelligence, declared the Dhamma, and established multitudes in the way to heaven.” With these words, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the Buddha's followers were the people, and I was myself king Janasandha.”

Ja 469 Mahākaṇhajātaka

The Story about the Great Black (Hound)

In the present the monks talk about the effort the Buddha makes to help and save others.
The Buddha tells a story of how, as Sakka, he had frightened a dissolute people into obedience by threatening them with destruction at the hands of a big black hound.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Ānanda = (his charioteer) Mātali.

---

902 Compare Snp, vv. 95, 124.
“A black, black hound.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about living for the benefit of the world.

One day, they say, the monks as they sat in the Dhamma Hall, were talking together. “Sirs,” one would say, “the Teacher, ever practising friendship towards the multitudes of the people, has forsaken an agreeable abode, and lives just for the good of the world. He has attained supreme wisdom, yet of his own accord takes bowl and robe, and goes on a journey of eighteen leagues or more. For the five elders[^903] he set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma; on the fifth day of the half-month he recited the Anattalakkhana discourse, and made them Arahats; he went to Uruvela,[^904] and to the ascetics with matted hair he showed three and a half thousand miracles, and persuaded them to join the Saṅgha; at Gayāsīsa[^905] he taught the Discourse upon Fire, and made a thousand of these ascetics Arahats; [^4.112] to Mahākassapa,[^906] when he had gone forward three miles to meet him, after three discourses he gave the higher ordination; all alone, after the noon-day meal, he went a journey of forty-five leagues, and then established in the Fruit of the Third Path Pukkusa (a youth of very good birth); to meet Mahākappina he went forward a space of two thousand leagues, and made him an Arahat; alone, in the afternoon he went a journey of thirty leagues, and made that cruel and harsh man Aṅgulimāla an Arahat;[^907] thirty leagues also he traversed, and established Āḷavaka in the Fruit of the First Path, and saved the prince; in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three he dwelt three months, and taught Abhidhamma to eight hundred millions of deities;[^908] to the Brahmā Realm he went, and destroyed

[^903]: The five who accompanied Buddha when he began his life as an ascetic: Aññakoṇḍaṇña, Bhaddiya, Vappa, Assaji, Mahānāma.
[^904]: He there preached to the fire-worshippers.
[^905]: Now Brahmāthati, a mountain near Gayā.
[^906]: See Journal of the Pali Text Society 1888, p. 67.
[^907]: [Aṅgulimāla was a brahmin student.]
[^908]: The beings who dwelt in the three worlds of Brahma were called “brahma.” The story alluded to here is given in No. 405 (iii. 219 of this translation); Hardy, Manual, p. 336.
the false Dhamma of Baka Brahmā, and made ten thousand Brahmās Arahats; every year he goes on pilgrimage in three districts, and to such men as are capable of receiving, he gives the Refuges, the Precepts, and the Fruits of the different stages; he even acts for the good of Nāgas and Garuḷas and the like, in many ways.”

In such words they praised the goodness and worth of the One with Ten Powers’ life for the good of the world. The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about as they sat there? They told him. “And no wonder, monks,” said he. “I who now in my perfect wisdom would live for the world’s good, even I in the past, in the days of passion, lived for the good of the world.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the days of the Supreme Buddha Kassapa, there reigned a king named Usīnara. It was a long time after the Supreme Buddha Kassapa had declared the Four Truths, and liberated multitudes of people from bondage, and had been translated to swell the number of those who dwell in Nibbāna; and the dispensation had fallen into decay. The monks gained their livelihood in the twenty-one unlawful ways; they associated with the nuns, and sons and daughters were born to them; monks forsook the duties of the Saṅgha, and nuns forsook the duties of nuns, lay brethren and sisters the duties of such, brahmins no longer did the duties of a brahmin: men for the most part followed the ten paths of evil-doing, and as they died thus filled the hosts of all states of suffering.

Then Sakka, observing that no new deities came into being, looked abroad upon the world; and then he perceived how men were born into states of suffering, and that the dispensation of the Buddha had decayed. “What shall I do, now?” he wondered. “Ah, I have it!” thought he, “I will scare and terrify mankind; and when I see they are terrified, I will console them, I will declare the Dhamma, I will restore dispensation which has decayed, I will make it last for another thousand years!” With this resolve, he made the Devaputta Mātali into the shape of a huge black hound, of pure breed, having four tusks as big as a plantain,

---

909 Cp. ii. p. 57 of this translation.
910 Cp. ii. p. 57 of this translation.
911 His charioteer.
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1758

horrible, with a hideous shape and a fat belly, as of a woman ready to be delivered of a child; him fastening with five-fold chain, \(4.182\) and putting on him a red wreath, he led by a cord. Himself he put on a pair of yellow garments, and bound his hair behind his head, and donned a red wreath; taking a huge bow, fitted with bowstring of the colour of coral, and twirling in his fingers a javelin tipped with adamant, he assumed the aspect of a forester, and descended at a spot one league away from the city. “The world is doomed to destruction, is doomed to destruction!” he called out thrice with a loud sound, so that he terrified the people; and when he reached the entering in of the city, he repeated the cry. The people on seeing the hound were frightened, and hasted into the city, and told the king what had happened.

The king speedily caused the city gates to be closed. But Sakka leapt over the wall, eighteen cubits in height, and with his hound stood within the city. The people in terror ran away into the houses, and made the doors fast. The Black Hound gave chase to every man he saw, and scared them, and finally entered into the king’s palace. The people who in their fright had taken refuge in the courtyard, ran into the palace, and shut the door. And as for the king, he with the ladies of his household went up on the terrace. The Black Hound raised his forefeet, and putting them in at the window roared a great roar. The sound of his roaring reached from hell to the highest heaven; the whole universe was one great roar.

The three great roars that were the loudest ever heard in Jambudīpa are these: the cry of king Puṇṇaka in the Puṇṇakajātaka [Ja 545], the cry of the snake king Sudassana in the Bhūridattajātaka [Ja 543], and this roar in the Mahākaṇhajātaka [Ja 469], telling the story of the Black Hound.\(^{912}\) The people were terrified and horrified, and not a man of them could say a word to Sakka.

The king plucked up heart, and approaching the window, cried out to Sakka, “Ho, huntsman! \(4.183\) why did your hound roar?” Said he, “The hound is hungry.” “Well,” said the king, “I will order some food to be given him.” So he told them to give him his own food, and the food of all his household. The hound seemed to make but one mouthful of the whole, then roared again. Again the king put his \(^{912}\) Four sounds are given as proverbial by Hardy, Manual, p. 263; two of which are the first and third of these.

question. “My hound is still hungry,” was the reply. Then he had all the food of his elephants and horses and so forth brought and given to him. This also he finished off all at once; and then the king had all the food in the city given him. He swallowed this in like manner, and roared again. Said the king, “This is no hound. Beyond all doubt he is a Yakkha. I will ask him wherefore he is come.” So terrified with fear, he asked his question by repeating the first verse:

1. “A black, black hound, with five cords bound, with fangs all white of hue, Majestic, awful – mighty one! What makes he here with you?”

On hearing this, Sakka repeated the second verse:

2. “Not to hunt game the Black Hound came, but he shall be of use To punish men, Usīnara, when I shall let him loose.”

Then said the king, “What, huntsman! Will the hound devour the flesh of all men, or of your enemies only?” “Only my enemies, great king.” “And who are your enemies?” “Those, O king, who love unrighteousness, and walk wickedly.” “Describe them to us,” he asked. And the King of the Devas described them in the verses:

3. “When the false monk, bowl in hand, in one robe clad, shall choose Tonsured the plough to follow, then the Black Hound I will loose.

4. When nuns of the Saṅgha shall in single robe be found, Tonsured, yet walking in the world, I will let loose the Hound.

5. What time ascetics, usurers, protruding the upper lip, Foul-toothed and filthy-haired shall be – the Black Hound I’ll let slip.

6. When brahmins, skilled in sacred books and holy rites, shall use Their skill to sacrifice for pelf, the Black Hound shall go loose.

7. Whoso his parents now grown old, their youth now come to an end, Would not maintain, although he might, gainst him the Hound I’ll send.

8. Who to his parents now grown old, their youth now come to an end, Cries, ‘Fools are you!’ gainst such as he the Black Hound I will send.

---

913 Thus far the two verses occur in Snp, 98 and 124.
9. When men go after others’ wives, of teacher, or of friend, Sister of father, uncle’s wife, the Black Hound I will send.

10. When shield on shoulder, sword in hand, full-armed as highway men
They take the road to kill and rob, I’ll lose the Black Hound then.

11. When widows’ sons, with skin groomed white, in skill all useless found,
Strong-armed, shall quarrel and shall fight, then I will loose the Hound.

12. When men with hearts of evil full, false and deceitful men,
Walk in and out the world about, I’ll loose the Black Hound then.” {4.186}

When he had thus spoken, “These,” said he, “are my enemies, O king!” and he made as though he would let the hound leap forth and devour all those who did the deeds of enemies. But as all the multitude was terror-struck, he held in the hound by the leash, and seemed as [4.115] it were to fix him to the spot; then putting off the disguise of a hunter, by his power he rose and poised himself in the air, all blazing as it appeared, and said: “O great king, I am Sakka, King of the Devas! Seeing that the world was about to be destroyed, I came here. Now indeed men as they die are filling the states of suffering, because their deeds are evil, and heaven is become empty. From henceforth I will know how to deal with the wicked, but do you be vigilant.” Then having in four verses well worth remembering declared the Dhamma, and established the people in the virtues of liberality, he strengthened the waning power of dispensation so that it lasted for yet another thousand years, and then with Mātali returned to his own place.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he added, “Thus, monks, in former times as now I have lived for the good of the world,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was Mātali, and I was Sakka.”

Ja 470 Kosiyajātaka

The Story about (the Miser) Kosiya (12s)

There is no story of the present. The Buddha tells a story of a man who, although born in a family of generous givers, was a miser and how his forebears, now gods, persuaded him to follow in the family traditions.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Ānanda = (his charioteer) Mātali,
Moggallāna = (the god) Canda,
Kassapa = (the god) Suriya,
Anuruddha = (the heavenly musician) Pañcasikha,
the generous monk = (the miser) Kosiya.

Past Source: Ja 535 Sudhābhojana,
Quoted at: Ja 470 Kosiya.

Keywords: Generosity, Deeds, Devas.

The Kosiyajātaka will be given under the Sudhābhojanajātaka [Ja 535].

In the past when Brahmadatta was king of Benares there lived a wealthy householder possessed of eighty crores and the king conferred on him the office of Treasurer. Being thus honoured by the king and highly esteemed by citizens and country folk alike, he was one day dwelling upon his worldly prosperity, and he thought: “This glory was not won by me by slothfulness and sinful acts in a former existence but was attained by accomplishing deeds of virtue; it behoves me to make my safety sure in the future.” So he sought the king’s presence and addressed him thus, “In my house, sire, is treasure amounting to eighty crores: accept it from me.” And when the king said: “I have no need of your riches; I have abundant wealth: henceforth take and do whatever you like with it,” he said: “Can I, sire, bestow my money in generosity?” The king said: “Do as you please,” and he had six alms halls built, one at each of the four city gates, one in the heart of the city and one at the door of his dwelling-house, and by a daily expenditure of six hundred thousand pieces of money he set on foot almsgiving on a grand scale, and so long as he lived he dispensed alms and instructed his sons, saying: “See that you do not break away from this tradition of mine, of giving alms,” and at the close of his life he was reborn as Sakka.

His son, in like manner giving alms, was reborn as Canda, Canda’s son as Suriya, Suriya’s son as Mātali, Mātali’s son as Pañcasikha. Now Pañcasikha’s son, the sixth in descent, was the Treasurer was named Maccharikosiya (the Miser Kosiya) and he still owned eighty crores. But he thought: “My forefathers were fools. They flung away the wealth that was so sorely scraped together, but I will guard my treasure. I will not give a penny to a soul.” And he demolished and burned down the alms-hall and became a confirmed miser. So the beggars assembled at his gate and stretching forth their arms cried with a loud voice, “O Lord High Treasurer, do not away with the tradition of your forefathers, but give alms.” On hearing this the people blamed him, saying: “Maccharikosiya has done away with the tradition of his family.” Being ashamed he set a watch to prevent the beggars from standing at his gate, and being thus left utterly destitute they never again set eyes upon his door.

Thenceforth he continued to accumulate money, but he neither enjoyed it himself nor shared it with his wife and children. He lived on rice with red powder, served with sour gruel, and wore coarse garments, being merely the filaments of roots and stalks of berries, shading his head with a parasol of leaves, and he rode upon a crazy old chariot, yoked to worn-out oxen. Thus all this wicked fellow’s money was as it were a coconut found by a dog.

Now one day when he was going to wait upon the king he thought he would take the sub-treasurer with him, and at the moment when he reached his house he found the sub-treasurer seated in the midst of his wife and children, and eating some rice porridge prepared with powdered sugar to sweeten it and cooked with fresh ghee. On seeing Maccharikosiya he rose from his seat and said: “Come and sit on this couch, Lord High Treasurer, and have some rice porridge with me.” When he saw the rice porridge, his mouth watered and he longed to partake of it, but the thought occurred to him, “If I should take some porridge, when the sub-treasurer comes to my house I shall have to make him some return of hospitality and in this way my money will be wasted. I will not eat it.” Then on being pressed again and again he refused, saying: “I have already dined; I am sated.” But while the sub-treasurer was enjoying his food, he sat looking on with his mouth watering, and when the meal was ended he repaired with him to the palace.

On returning home he was overwhelmed with a craving for rice porridge, but thought: “If I should say I want to eat rice porridge, a lot of people would also want to eat it and a quantity of husked rice and the like would be wasted. I will not say a word to a creature.” So night and day he passed his time thinking of nothing but porridge, but from fear of spending his money he told no one and kept his craving to himself. But being unable to bear with it he gradually grew paler and paler, and so through fear of wasting his substance he spoke of his craving to no one, and by and by becoming very weak he lay down, hugging his bed. Then his wife came to see him and stroking his back with her hand she inquired, “Is my lord ill?” “Ill yourself!” he cried, “I am quite well.” “My lord, you have grown pale. Have you anything on your mind? Is the king displeased or have you been treated with disrespect by your children? Or have you conceived a craving for something?” “Yes, I have a craving.” “Tell me what it is, my lord.” “Can you keep a secret?” “Yes, I will be silent about any cravings that ought to be kept secret.”

But even so, through fear of wasting his substance he had not the courage to tell her, but eventually being repeatedly pressed by her he said: “My dear, one day I saw the sub-treasurer eating rice porridge prepared with ghee, honey, and powdered sugar, and from that day I have had a craving to eat the same kind of porridge.” “Poor wretch, are you so badly off? I will cook porridge enough for all the inhabitants of Benares.” Then he felt just as if he had been struck on the head with a stick. Being angry with her he said: “I am well aware that you are very rich. If it comes from your family, you may cook and give rice porridge to the whole city.” “Well then I will make and cook enough for the dwellers in a single street.” “What have you to do with them? Let them eat what belongs to them.” “Then I will make enough for seven households taken at random here and there.” “What are they to you?” “Then I will cook it for the attendants in this house.” “What are they to you?” “Well, then, I will cook for our kinsfolk only.” “What are they to you?” “Then I will cook, my lord, for you and me.” “And pray who are you? It is not allowable in your case.” “I will cook it for you only, my lord.” “Pray do not cook it for me: if you cook it in the house, a lot of people will look for it. But just give me a measure of husked rice, a quarter of milk, a pound of sugar, a pot of honey and a cooking vessel, and going into the forest I will there cook and eat my porridge.” She did so, and bidding a slave take it all he ordered him to go and stand in such and such a place. Then sending the slave forward, all alone he made himself a veil and in this disguise he went there and by the river side at the foot of a shrub he had an oven made and firewood and water brought to him and he said to the slave, “Go and stand in yonder road and, if you see anyone, make a sign to me, and when I call you come back to me.” Sending off the slave he made a fire and cooked his porridge.

At that moment Sakka, king of heaven, contemplating the splendid city of the gods, ten thousand leagues in extent, and the golden street sixty leagues long, and Vejayanta reared a thousand leagues high, and Sudhammā compassing five hundred leagues, and his throne of yellow marble, sixty leagues in extent, and his white umbrella with its golden wreath, five leagues in circumference, and his own person accompanied with a glorious array of twenty-five millions of Devakaññās
- contemplating, I say, all this glory of his he thought: “What can I have done to have attained to such honour as this?” And he saw in his mind’s eye the almsgiving he had established when he was Lord High Treasurer at Benares, and then he thought: “Where are my descendants born?” and considering the matter he said: “My son Canda was born in a Devaputta form, and his son was Suriya.” And marking the birth of all of them, “What,” he cried, “has been the fate of the son of Pañcasikha?” And on reflection he saw that the tradition of the race had been done away with, and the thought occurred to him, “This wicked fellow being stingy neither enjoys his wealth himself nor gives anything to others: the tradition of the race has been destroyed by him. When he dies he will be reborn in hell. By admonishing him and by re-establishing my tradition I will show him how to be reborn in the city of the gods.”

So he summoned Canda and the rest and saying: “Come, we will visit the haunts of men: the tradition of our family has been abolished by Maccharikosiya, the alms halls have been burned down and he neither enjoys wealth himself nor gives anything to others, but now being desirous of eating porridge and thinking: “If it is cooked in the house, the porridge will have to be given to someone else as well,” he has gone into the forest and is cooking it all alone. We will go and convert him and teach him the fruits of generosity. If however he were asked by all of us at once to give us some food, he would fall dead on the spot. I will go first and when I have asked him for porridge and have taken my seat, then do you come, one after another, disguised as brahmins, and beg of him.”

So saying he himself in the likeness of a brahmin approached him and cried, “Ho! Which is the road to Benares?” Then Maccharikosiya said: “Have you lost your wits? Do you not even know the way to Benares? Why are you coming this way? Get you gone from hence.” Sakka, pretending not to hear what he said, came close up to him, asking him what he said. Then he bawled, “I say, you deaf old brahmin, why are you coming this way? Go yonder.” Then Sakka said: “Why do you bawl so loud? Here I see smoke and a fire, and rice porridge is cooking. It must be some occasion for entertaining brahmins. I too when the brahmins are being fed will take somewhat. Why are you driving me away?” “There is no entertainment of brahmins here. Be off with you.” “Then why are you so angry? When you eat your meal, I will take a little.” He said: “I will not give you even a single lump of boiled rice. This scanty food is only just enough to keep me alive, and even this was got by begging. You go and look for your food elsewhere” and this he said in reference to the fact of his having asked his wife for the rice - and he spoke this verse:

1. “No huckster I to buy or vend,
   No stores are mine to give or lend:
   This dole of rice ’twas hard to gain,
   ’Tis scarce enough to serve us twain.”

On hearing this Sakka said: “I too with honey-sweet voice will repeat a verse for you; hearken to me,” and though he tried to stop him, saying: “I do not want to hear your verse,” Sakka repeated a couple of verses:

2. “From little one should little give, from moderate means likewise,
   From much give much: of giving nought no question can arise.

3. This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms from what is thine:
   Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
   By generosity you may ascend the noble path divine.”

On hearing his words he said: “This is a gracious saying of thine, brahmin; when the porridge is cooked, you shall receive a little. Pray, take a seat.” Sakka sat down on one side. When he was seated, Canda in like manner drew nigh and starting a conversation in the same way, though Maccharikosiya kept trying to stop him, he spoke a couple of verses:

4. “Vain is your sacrifice and vain the craving of your heart,
   Should you eat food and grudge to give your guest some little part.

5. This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms from what is thine:
   Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
   By generosity you may ascend the noble path divine.”

On hearing his words, the miser very reluctantly said: “Well, sit down, and you shall have a little porridge.” So he went and sat down near Sakka. Then Suriya in like manner drew nigh and starting a conversation in the same way, though the miser tried to stop him, he spoke a couple of verses:

6. “Real your sacrifice nor vain the craving of your heart,
   Should you not eat your food alone, but give your guest a part.
7. This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms from what is thine:
   Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
   By generosity you may ascend the noble path divine.”

On hearing his words the miser with great reluctance said: “Well, sit down, and you shall have a little.” So Suriya went and sat by Canda. Then Mātali in like manner drew nigh and starting a conversation, though the miser tried to stop him, spoke these verses:

8. “Who offers gifts to lake or flood of Gayā’s stream that laves
Or Timbaru or Doṇa shrine with rapid-flowing waves,

9. Herein gains fruit of sacrifice and craving of his heart,
If with a guest he shares his food nor sits and eats apart.

10. This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms from what is thine:
   Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
   By generosity you may ascend the noble path divine.”

On hearing his words also, overwhelmed as it were with a mountain peak, he reluctantly said: “Well, sit down, and you shall have a little.” Mātali came and sat by Suriya. Then Pañcasikha in like manner drew nigh and starting a conversation, though the miser tried to stop him, spoke a couple of verses:

11. “Like fish that swallows greedily hook fastened to a line
Is he who with a guest at hand all by himself shall dine.

12. This then I tell you, Kosiya, give alms from what is thine:
   Eat not alone, no bliss is his that by himself shall dine,
   By generosity you may ascend the noble path divine.”

Maccharikosiya on hearing this, with a painful effort and groaning aloud, said: “Well, sit down, and you shall have a little.” So Pañcasikha went and sat by Mātali. And when these five brahmins had just taken their seats, the porridge was cooked. Then Kosiya taking it from the oven told the brahmins to bring their leaves. Remaining seated as they were they stretched forth their hands and brought leaves of a creeper from the Himalayas. Kosiya on seeing them said: “I cannot give you any porridge in these large leaves of yours: get some leaves of the acacia and similar trees.” They gathered such leaves and each one was as big as a warrior’s shield. So he helped all of them to some porridge with a spoon. By the time he had helped the last of all, there was still plenty left in the pot. After serving the five brahmins he himself sat down, holding the pot.

Ja 471 Meṇḍakajātaka

The Story about (the Question about) the Goat (12s)

Alternative Title: Meṇḍakapañhajātaka (Cst)

There is no story of the present. The Buddha tells a story of a dog who was caught stealing meat, and a goat was caught stealing grass, so they made a pact to work together as no one would suspect a goat of stealing meat, or a dog of taking grass. Only the wise man Mahosadha could solve the problem of how they became friends.

The Bodhisatta = (pañḍita) Mahosadha.

Past Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 471 Meṇḍaka.

Keywords: Cooperation, Theft, Animals.

The Problem of Meṇḍaka will be given under the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

[One] day, the king after breakfast was walking up and down in the long walk when he saw through a doorway a goat and a dog making friends. Now this goat was in the habit of eating the grass thrown to the elephants beside their stable before they touched it; the elephant-keepers beat it and drove it away; and as it ran away bleating, one man ran quickly after and struck it on the back with a stick. The goat with its back humped in pain went and lay down by the great wall of the palace, on a bench.

Now there was a dog which had fed all its days upon the bones, skin, and refuse of the royal kitchen. That same day the cook had finished preparing the food, and had dished it up, and while he was wiping the sweat off his body the dog could no longer bear the smell of the meat and fish, and entered the kitchen, pushed off the cover and began eating the meat. But the cook hearing the noise of the dishes ran in and saw the dog: he clapped to the door and beat it with sticks and stones. The dog dropped the meat from his mouth and ran off yelping; and the cook seeing him run, ran after and struck him full on the back with a stick. The dog humping his back and holding up one leg came to the place where the goat was lying. Then the goat said: “Friend, why do you hump your back? Are you suffering from colic?” The dog replied, “You are humping your back too, have you an attack of colic?” He told his tale. Then the goat added, “Well, can you ever go to the kitchen again?” “No, it is as much as my life’s worth. Can you go to the stable again?” “No more than you, ’tis as much as my life’s worth.” Well, they began to wonder, how they could live?

Then the goat said: “If we could manage to live together I have an idea.” “Pray tell it.” “Well, sir, you must go to the stable; the elephant-keepers will take no notice of you, for (think they) he eats no grass; and you must bring me my grass. I will go to the kitchen, and the cook will take no notice of me, thinking that I eat no meat, so I will bring you your meat.” “That’s a good plan,” said the other, and they made a bargain of it: the dog went to the stable and brought a bundle of grass in his teeth and laid it beside the great wall; the other went to the kitchen and brought away a great lump of meat in his mouth to the same place. The dog ate the meat and the goat ate the grass; and so by this device they lived together in harmony by the great wall.

When the king saw their friendship he thought: “Never have I seen such a thing before. Here are two natural enemies living in friendship together. I will put this in the form of a question to my wise men; those who cannot understand it I will banish from the realm, and if anyone guesses it I will declare him the sage incomparable and show him all honour. There is no time today; but tomorrow when they come to wait upon me I will ask them the question.

So next day when the wise men had come to wait upon him, he put his question in these words:

1. “Two natural enemies, who never before in the world could come within seven paces of each other, have become friends and go around inseparable. What is the reason?”

After this he added another verse:

2. “If this day before noon you cannot solve me this question, I will banish you all. I have no need of ignorant men.”

Now Senaka was seated in the first seat, the sage in the last; and thought the sage to himself, “This king is too slow of wit to have thought out this question by himself, he must have seen something. If I can get one day’s grace I will solve the riddle. Senaka is sure to find some means to postpone it for a day.” And the other four wise men could see nothing, being like men in a dark room: Senaka looked at the Bodhisattva to see what he would do, the Bodhisattva looked at Senaka. By the way Mahosadha looked, Senaka perceived his state of mind; he sees that even this wise man does not understand the question, he cannot answer it today but wants a day’s grace; he would fulfil this wish. So he laughed loudly in a reassuring manner and said: “What, sire, you will banish us all if we cannot answer your question?” “Yes, sir.” “Ah, you know that it is a knotty question, and we cannot solve it; do but wait a little. A knotty question cannot be solved in a crowd. We will think it over, and afterwards explain it to you. So let us have a chance.” So he said relying on the Great Being, and then recited these two verses:

3. “In a great crowd, where is a great din of people assembled, our minds are distracted, our thoughts cannot concentrate, and we cannot solve the question.

4. But alone, calm in thought, apart they will go and ponder on the matter, in solitude grappling with it firmly, then they will solve it for you, O lord of men.”

The king, exasperated though he was at his speech, said, threatening them, “Very well, think it over and tell me; if you do not, I will banish you.” The four wise men left the palace, and Senaka said to the others, “Friends, a delicate question this which the king has put; if we cannot solve it there is great fear for us. So take a good meal and reflect carefully.” After this they went each to his own house.

The sage on his part rose and sought out queen Udumbarā, and to her he said: “O queen, where was the king most of today and yesterday?” “Walking up and down the long walk, good sir, and looking out of the window.” “Ah,” thought the Bodhisattva, “he must have seen something there.” So he went to the place and looked out and saw the doings of the goat and the dog. “The king’s question is solved!” he concluded, and home he went. The three others found out nothing, and came to Senaka, who asked, “Have you found out the question?” “No, master.” “If so, the king will banish you, and what will you do?” “But you have found it out?” “Indeed no, not I.” “If you cannot find it out, how can we? We roared like lions before the king, and said, ‘Let us think and we will solve it;’ and now if we cannot, he will be angry. What are we to do?” “This question is not for us to solve: no doubt the sage has solved it in a hundred ways.” “Then let us go to him.”

So they came all four to the Bodhisatta’s door, and sent to announce their coming, and entering spoke politely to him; then standing on one side they asked the Great Being. “Well, sir, have you thought out the question?” “If I have not, who will? Of course I have.” “Then tell us too.” He thought to himself, “If I do not tell them, the king will banish them, and will honour me with the seven precious things. But let not these fools perish – I will tell them.” So he made them sit down on low seats, and to uplift their hands in salutation, and without telling them what the king had really seen, he composed four verses, and taught them one each in the Pāli language, to recite when the king should ask them, and sent them away. Next day they went to wait on the king, and sat where they were told to sit, and the king asked Senaka, “Have you solved the question, Senaka?” “Sire, if I do not know it who can?” “Tell me, then.” “Listen, my lord,” and he recited a verse as he had been taught:

5. “Young beggars and young princes like and delight in ram’s flesh; dog’s flesh they do not eat. Yet there might be friendship betwixt ram and dog.”

Although Senaka recited the verse he did not know its meaning; but the king did because he had seen the thing. “Senaka has found it out,” he thought; and then turned to Pukkusa and asked him. “What? Am not I a wise man?” asked Pukkusa, and recited his verse as he had been taught:

6. “They take off a goatskin to cover the horse’s back withal, but a dogskin they do not use for covering: yet there might be friendship betwixt ram and dog.”

Neither did he understand the matter, but the king thought he did because he had seen the thing. Then he asked Kāvinda and he also recited his verse:

7. “Twisted horns has a ram, the dog has none at all; one eats grass, one flesh: yet there might be friendship betwixt ram and dog.”

“He has found it out too,” thought the king, and passed on to Devinda; who with the others recited his verse as he had been taught:
8. “Grass and leaves both the ram eat, the dog neither grass nor leaves; the dog would take a hare or a cat: yet there might be friendship betwixt ram and dog.”

Next the king questioned the sage, “My son, do you understand this question?” “Sire, who else can understand it from Avīci to Bhavagga, from lowest hell to highest heaven?” “Tell me, then.” “Listen, sire,” and he made clear his knowledge of the fact by reciting these two verses:

9. “The ram, with eight half-feet on his four feet, and eight hooves, unobserved, brings meat for the other, and he brings grass for him.

10. The chief of Videha, the lord of men, on his terrace beheld with his own eyes the interchange of food given by each to the other, between bow-wow and full-mouth.”

The king, not knowing that the others had their knowledge through the Bodhisatta, was delighted to think that all five had found out the riddle each by his own wisdom, and recited this verse:

11. “No small gain is it that I have men so wise in my house. A matter profound and subtle they have penetrated with noble speech, the clever men!”

So he said to them, “One good turn deserves another,” and made his return in the following verse:

12. “To each I give a chariot and a female mule, to each a rich village, very choice, these I give to all the wise men, delighted at their noble speech.”

All this he gave.

Ja 472 Mahāpadumajātaka

The Story about (Prince) Mahāpaduma

In the present Ciñcā falsely accuses the Buddha of fathering her child. After Sakka reveals the falsehood, she falls into hell. The Buddha tells a story about how he was falsely accused by his stepmother one time, and the retribution that came to her.

The Bodhisatta = prince (Mahāpaduma) (rājaputta),
Devadatta = his father (pitā),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = his mother (mātā),
Sāriputta = the Devatā (Devatā),
Ānanda = the wise Nāga (paṇḍito nāgo).

Present Source: Ja 472 Mahāpaduma,
Quoted at: Ja 120 Bandhanamokkha,
Present Compare: Dhp-a XIII.9 Ciñcamāṇavikā.

Keywords: Slander, Truth, Devas.

“No king should.” [4.116] {4.187} This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about Ciñcamāṇavikā.\textsuperscript{914}

When the One with Ten Powers first attained supreme wisdom, after disciples had multiplied, and innumerable gods and men had been born into heavenly states, and the seeds of goodness had been cast abroad, great honour was shown him, and great gifts given. The heretics were like fireflies after sunrise; they had no honours and no gifts; in the street they stood, and cried out to the people, “What is the ascetic Gotama the Buddha? We are Buddhas also! Does that gift only bring great fruit, which is given to him? That which is given to us also has great fruit for you! Give to us also, work for us!” But cry as they would, they got no honour nor gifts. Then they came together in secret, and consulted, “How can we cast a stain upon Gotama the ascetic in the face of men, and put an end to his honour and his gifts?”

Now there was at that time in Sāvatthi a certain nun, named Ciñcamāṇavikā; she was very lovely, full of all grace, like a Devaccharā; rays of brilliancy shone forth from her body. Some one uttered a counsel of cruelty thus, “By the help of Ciñcamāṇavikā we will cast a stain upon the ascetic Gotama, and put an end to his honour and the gifts he receives.” “Yes,” they all agreed, “that is the way to do it.”

She came to the monastery of the heretics, and greeted them, and stood still. The heretics said nothing to her. She said: “What blemish is there in me? Three times I have greeted you!” She said again, “Sirs, what blemish is in me? Why do you not speak to me?” They replied, “Know you not, sister, that Gotama the ascetic is going about and doing us harm, cutting off all the honour and liberality that was shown us?” “I did not know it, sirs; but what can I do?” “If you wish us well, sister by your own doing bring a stain upon the ascetic Gotama, and put an end to his honour and the gifts he receives.” She replied, “Very good, sirs, leave that to me; do not trouble about it.” With these words she departed.

\textsuperscript{914} Who falsely accused the Buddha of incontinence.

After that, she used all a woman’s skill in deceit. When the people of Sāvatthi had heard the Dhamma, and were coming away from Jetavana, she used to go towards Jetavana, clad in a robe dyed with cochineal, and with fragrant garlands in her hands. [4.188] When any one asked her, “Whither away at this hour?” she would reply, “What have you to do with my goings and comings?” She spent the night in the heretics’ monastery, which was close by Jetavana; and when early in the morning, the lay associates of the order came forth from the city to pay their morning salutation, she would meet them as though she had spent the night in Jetavana, going towards the city. If any one asked where she had stayed, she would answer, “What are my stayings and lodgings to you?” But after some six weeks, she replied, “I spent the night in Jetavana, with Gotama the ascetic, in one fragrant cell.” Then the unconverted began to wonder, could this be true, or not.

After three or four months, she bound bandages about her belly, and made it appear as though she were with child, and wrapped a red robe around her. Then she declared that she was with child by the ascetic Gotama, and made blind fools believe. After eight or nine months, she fastened about her pieces of wood in a bundle, and over all her [4.117] red robe; hands, feet, and back she caused to be beaten with the jawbone of an ox, so as to produce swellings; and made as though all her senses were wearied.

One evening, when the Tathāgata was sitting on the splendid seat of preaching, and was preaching the Dhamma, she went among the Saṅgha, and standing in front of the Tathāgata, said: “O great ascetic! You preach indeed to great multitudes; sweet is your voice, and soft is the lip that covers your teeth; but you have got me with child, and my time is near; yet you assign me no chamber for the childbirth, you give me no ghee nor oil; what you will not do yourself, you do not ask another of the lay associates to do, the king of Kosala, or Anāthapiṇḍika, or Visākhā the great lay sister. Why do you not tell one of them to do what is to be done for me? You know how to take your pleasure, but you do not know how to care for that which shall be born!” So she reviled the Tathāgata in the midst of the Saṅgha, as one might try to besmirch the moon’s face with a handful of filth.
The Tathāgata stopped his discourse, and roaring like a lion in clarion tones, he said: “Sister, whether that which you have said be true or false, you know and I only know.” “Yes, truly,” said she, “this happened through something that you and I only know of.”

Just at that moment, Sakka’s throne became hot. Reflecting, he perceived the reason, “Ciñcamāṇavikā is accusing the Tathāgata of what is not true.” Determined to clear up this matter, he came there with four Devaputtas in his company. The Devaputtas took on them the shape of mice, and all at once gnawed through the cords that bound the bundle of wood: a wind-puff blew up the robe she wore, and the bundle of wood was disclosed and fell at her feet: the toes of both her feet were cut off. The people cried out, “A wretch is accusing the Supreme Buddha!” They spat on her head, and drove her forth from Jetavana with staves and clods in their hands. And as she passed beyond the range of the Tathāgata’s vision, the great earth yawned and showed a huge cleft, flames came up from the lowest hell, and she, enveloped in it as it were with a garment which her friends should wrap about her, fell to the lowest hell and there was born again.

Next day they were conversing in the Dhamma Hall, “Monks, Ciñcamāṇavikā falsely accused the Supreme Buddha, great in virtue, worthy of all gifts! And she came to dire destruction.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they talked of, sitting there together. They told him. Said he, “Not only now, monks, has this woman falsely accused me, and come to dire destruction, but it was the same before.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of his chief queen; and because his all-blessed countenance was like to a lotus full-blown, Padumakumāra they named him, which is to say, the Lotus prince. When he grew up he was educated in all arts and accomplishments. Then his mother departed this life; the king took another consort, and appointed his son viceroy.

After this the king, being about to set forth to quell a rising on the frontier, said to his consort, “Do you, lady, stay here, while I go forth to quell the frontier insurrection.” But she replied, “No, my lord, here I will not remain, but I will go with you.” Then he showed her the danger which lay on the field of battle, adding to it this, “Stay then here without vexation until my return, and I will give charge to prince Paduma, that he be careful in all that should be done for you, and then I will go.” So thus he did, and departed.

When he had scattered his enemies, and pacified the country, he returned, and pitched his camp without the city. The Bodhisatta learning of his father’s return, adorned the city, and setting a watch over the royal palace, went forth alone to meet his father. The queen observing the beauty of his appearance, became enamoured of him. In taking leave of her, the Bodhisatta said: “Can I do anything for you, mother?” “Mother, do you call me?” said she. She rose up and seized his hands, saying: “Lie on my couch!” “Why?” he asked. “Just until the king comes,” she said, “let us both enjoy the bliss of love!” “Mother, my mother you are, and you have a husband living. Such a thing was never before heard of, that a woman, a matron, should break the moral law in the way of fleshly lust. How can I do such a deed of pollution with you?” Twice and thrice she besought him, and when he would not, said she, “Then you refuse to do as I ask?” “Indeed I do refuse.” “Then I will speak to the king, and cause you to be beheaded.” “Do as you will,” answered the Great Being; and he left her ashamed. Then in great terror she thought: “If he tell the king first, there is no life for me! I must get speech of him first myself.” Accordingly leaving her food untouched she donned a soiled robe, and made nail-scratches upon her body; giving orders to her attendants,

———

Puran Mal (MS. written by Rām Gharīb Sharmā, Chāturvaidya, and collected by Mr. W. Crooke). Another is the Legend of Rup and Basant, or Sit and Basant (MS.). In both of these the Queen falls in love with her stepson.

918 Reading, lāmakavatthaṁ.
that what time the king should ask of the queen’s whereabouts, he should be told she was ill, she lay down making a pretence of illness.

Now the king made solemn procession about the city right-wise, and went up into his dwelling. When he saw her not, he asked, “Where is the queen?” “She is ill,” they said. He entered the state chamber, and asked her, “What is amiss with you, lady?” She made as though she heard nothing. Twice and yet thrice he asked, and then she answered, “O great king, why do you ask? Be silent: women that have a husband must be even as I am.” “Who has annoyed you?” said he. \[4.191\] “Tell me quickly, and I will have him beheaded.” “Whom did you leave behind \[4.119\] you in this city, when you went away?” “Prince Paduma.” “And he,” she went on, “came into my room, and I said, ‘My son, do not so, I am your mother,’ but say what I would, he cried, ‘None is king here but I, and I will take you to my dwelling, and enjoy your love;’ then he seized me by the hair of my head, and plucked it out again and again, and as I would not yield to his will, he wounded and beat me, and departed.”

The king made no investigation, but furious as a serpent, commanded his men, “Go and bind prince Paduma, and bring him to me!” They went to his house, swarming as it were through the city, and bound him and beat him, bound his hands fast behind his back, put about his neck the garland of red flowers,\[919\] making him a condemned criminal, and led him there, beating him the while. It was clear to him that this was the queen’s doing, and as he went along he cried out, “Ho fellows, I am not one that has offended against the king! I am innocent.” All the city was bubble with the news, “They say the king is going to execute prince Paduma at the bidding of a woman!” They flocked together, they fell at the prince’s feet, lamenting with a great noise, “You have not deserved this, my lord!”

At last they brought him before the king. At sight of him, the king could not restrain what was in his heart, and cried out, “This fellow is no king, but he plays

---

\[919\] This was the \textit{vajjhamālā}, put on the head or neck of a criminal condemned to death. In the Toy Cart, Act x, one being led forth to execution wears a wreath of \textit{Karavīra} flowers. The Pali has \textit{Kaṇavera}, which is not known as a flower: this may be a corrupt form of the Sanskrit word. [\textit{Kaṇavera} or \textit{kaṇavīra} is the poisonous oleander flower.]
the king finely! My son he is, yet he has insulted the queen. Away with him, down with him over the thieves’ cliff, make an end of him!” But the prince said to his father, “No such crime lies at my door, father. Do not kill me on a woman’s word.” The king would not listen to him. Then all those of the royal harem, in number sixteen thousand, raised a great lamentation, saying: “Dear Paduma, mighty prince, this dealing you have never deserved!” {4.192} And all the warrior chiefs and great magnates of the land, and all the attendant courtiers cried, “My lord! The prince is a man of goodness and virtuous life, observes the traditions of his race, heir to the kingdom! Do not slay him at a woman’s word, without a hearing! A king’s duty it is to act with all circumspection.” So saying, they repeated seven verses:

1. “No king should punish an offence, and hear no pleas at all, Not throughly sifting it himself in all points, great and small.”
2. The warrior chief who punishes a fault before he tries, Is like a man born blind, who eats his food all bones and flies.
3. Who punishes the guiltless, and lets go the guilty, knows No more than one who blind upon a rugged highway goes. {4.120}
4. He who all this examines well, in things both great and small, And so administers, deserves to be the head of all.
5. He that would set himself on high must not all-gentle be Nor all-severe: but both these things practise in company.
6. Contempt the all-gentle wins, and he that’s all-severe, has wrath: So of the pair be well aware, and keep a middle path.
7. Much can the angry man, O king, and much the cheat can say: And therefore for a woman’s sake your son you must not slay.” {4.193}

But for all they could say in many ways the courtiers could not win him to do their bidding. The Bodhisatta also, for all his beseeching, could not persuade him to 920 These lines occur in Dhp-a XIII.9.

---

listen: nay, the king said, blind fool, “Away! Down with him over the thieves’ cliff!” repeating the eighth verse:

8. “One side the whole world stands, my queen on the other all alone;
   Yet her I cleave to: cast him down the cliff, and get you gone!”

At these words, not one among the sixteen thousand women could remain unmoved, while all the populace stretched out their hands, and tore their hair, with lamentations. The king said, \(4.194\) “Let these but try to prevent the throwing of this fellow over the cliff!” and amidst his followers, though the crowd wailed around, he caused the prince to be seized, and cast down the precipice over heels head-first.

Then the deity that dwelt in the hill, by power of his own kindliness, comforted the prince, saying: “Fear not, Paduma!” and in both hands he caught him, pressed him to his heart, sent a divine thrill through him, set him in the abode of the serpents of the eight ranges,\(^{921}\) within the hood of the king of the serpents. The serpent king received the Bodhisatta into the abode of the serpents, and gave him half of his own glory and state. There for one year he dwelt. Then he said: “I would go back to the ways of men.” “Whither?” they asked. “To the Himālayas, where I will live an ascetic life.” The serpent king gave his consent; taking him, he conveyed him to the place where men go to and fro, and gave him the requisites of an ascetic, and went back to his own place.

So he proceeded to the Himālayas, and embraced the ascetic life, and cultivated the Absorptions and Super Knowledge; there he lived, feeding upon fruits and roots of the woodland.

Now a certain wood-ranger, who dwelt in Benares, came to that place, and recognised the Great Being. “Are you not,” he asked, “the great prince Paduma, my lord?” “Yes, sir,” he replied. The other saluted him, and there for some days he remained. Then he returned to Benares, and said to the king, “Your son, my lord, has embraced the ascetic life in the region of the Himālayas, and lives in a \(^{921}\) See Wilson’s Viṣṇupurāṇa, ii. p. 123.

hut of leaves. I have been staying with him, and thence I come.” “Have you seen him with your [4.121] own eyes?” asked the king. “Yes, my lord.”

The king with a great host went there, and on the outskirts of the forest he pitched his camp; then with his courtiers around him, went to salute the Great Being, who sat at the door of his hut of leaves, in all the glory of his golden form, and sat on one side; the courtiers also greeted him, and spoke pleasurably to him, and sat on one side. The Bodhisatta on his part invited the king to share his wild fruits, and talked pleasurably with him. Then said the king, “My son, [4.195] by me you were cast down a deep precipice, and how is it you are yet alive?” Asking which, he repeated the ninth verse:

9. “As into hell-mouth, you were cast over a beetling hill,
No succour – many palm trees deep: how are you living still?”

These are the remaining verses, and of the five, taken alternately, three were spoken by the Bodhisatta, and two by the king.

10. “A serpent mighty, full of force, born on that mountain land, Caught me within his coils; and so here safe from death I stand.”

11. “Lo! I will take you back, O prince, to my own home again:
And there – what is the wood to you? With blessing you shall reign.”

12. “As who a hook has swallowed down, and draws it forth all blood, Drawn forth, is happy: so I see in me this bliss and good.”

13. “Why speak you thus about a hook, why speak you thus of gore, Why speak about the drawing out? Come tell me, I implore.”

14. “Lust is the hook: fine elephants and horse by blood I show;
These by renouncing I have drawn; this, chieftain, you must know.” [4.196]

“Thus, O great king, to be king is nothing to me; but do you see to it, that you break not the Ten Royal Virtues, but forsake evildoing, and rule in righteousness.”
In those words the Great Being admonished the king. He with weeping and wailing departed, and on the way to his city he asked his courtiers, “On whose account was it that I made a breach with a son so virtuous?” they replied, “The queen’s.” Her the king caused to be seized, and cast headlong over the thieves’ cliff, and entering his city ruled in righteousness.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Thus, monks, this woman maligning me in days of yore, and came to dire destruction,” and then identified the Jātaka by repeating the last verse:

“Lady Ciñcā was my mother,
Devadatta was my father,
I was then the prince their son:
Sāriputta was the spirit,
And the good snake, I declare it,
Was Ānanda. I have done.”

Ja 473 Mittāmittajātaka
The Story about Friends and Foes (12s)

In the present courtiers who are jealous of one honest courtier try to slander him, and the king goes to the Buddha to find out if what they say is true. The Buddha tells a story of a similar situation in the past, and the signs by which a friend and a foe can be identified.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Slander, Truth.

“How should the wise.” [4.122] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about an upright courtier of the king of Kosala.

This man, they say, was most useful to the king, and then the king bestowed on him great honour. The other courtiers being unable to stomach him, accused him to the king of having done things to the king’s hurt. The king made enquiry about him, and finding in him no fault, thought: “I see no fault in the man; how can I know whether he be my friend or foe?” Then he thought: “No one, save the Tathāgata, {4.197} will be able to decide this question; I will go and ask him.” So after he had broken his fast he visited the Teacher, and said: “How can one tell, sir, of any man, whether he be friend or foe?” Then the Teacher replied, “Wise men of old, O king, have pondered this problem, and have questioned the wise about it, and following their advice, have discovered the truth, and renouncing their enemies have paid attention to their friends.” This said, at his request, he told a story of the past.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a courtier who advised him on things spiritual and things temporal. At that time, the rest slandered a certain courtier who was upright. The king seeing no fault in him, asked the Great Being, “Now in what can one tell friend or foe?” repeating the first verse:

1. “How should the wise and prudent strive, how may discernment know, What deeds declare to eye or ear the man that is a foe?”

Then the Great Being repeated these five verses to explain the marks of an enemy:

2. “He smiles not when you see him, no welcome will he show, He will not turn his eyes that way, and answers you with ‘No’.”

3. Your enemies he honours, he cares not for your friends, Those who would praise your worth, he stays, your slanderers commends.

4. No secret tells he to you, your secret he betrays, Speaks never well of what you do, your wisdom will not praise.

5. He joys not at your welfare, but at your evil fame: Should he receive some dainty, he thinks not of your name, Nor pities you, nor cries aloud – ‘O, had my friend the same!’

6. These are the sixteen tokens by which a foe you see These if a wise man sees or hears he knows his enemy.

How should the wise and prudent strive, what will discernment lend, What deeds declare to eye and ear the man that is a friend?”

The other, thus questioned in these lines, recited the remaining verses:

7. “The absent he remembers; returned, he will rejoice: Then in the height of his delight he greets you with his voice.

8. Your foes he never honours, he loves to serve your friends, Those who would slander you, he stays; who praise you, he commends.

---

922 This couplet has occurred already in vol. ii. p. 92, of the translation.
923 This also occurs above, vol. ii. p. 92, of this translation (two words differ).
9. He tells his secrets to you, your secret ne’er betrays,
Speaks ever well of all you do, your wisdom loves to praise.

10. He joys to hear your welfare, not in your evil fame:
Should he receive some dainty, he straight thinks on your name,
And pities you, and cries aloud – ‘O had my friend the same!’

11. These are the sixteen tokens in friends established well,
Which if a wise man sees or hears he can a true friend tell.”  {4.199}

The king, delighted at the speech of the Great Being, gave him the highest honour.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, said: “Thus, great king, this question arose in days of yore, even as now, and wise men said their say; by these two-and-thirty signs may friend or foe be known.” With those words, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the wise courtier.”

Book XIII. Terasanipāta
The Section with Thirteen Verses (474-483)

Ja 474 Ambajātaka
The Story about the Mango (13s)

In the present Devadatta asserts that the Buddha is not his teacher, and soon comes to destruction. The Buddha tells a story of a brahmin who learned a charm from an outcaste, which was given on condition he acknowledge his teacher. When he repudiated him, he lost the charm and died forlorn.

The Bodhisatta = the outcaste’s son (caṇḍālaputta),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Devadatta = the ungrateful young brahmin (akataññū māṇavo).

Keywords: Acknowledgement, Gratitude, Honesty.

“Young student, when.” {4.124} {4.200} This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about Devadatta. Devadatta repudiated his teacher, saying: “I will be Buddha myself, and Gotama the ascetic is no teacher or preceptor of mine!” So, aroused from his Absorption, he made a breach in the Saṅgha. Then step by step he proceeded to Sāvatthi, and outside Jetavana, the earth yawned, and he went down into the hell Avīci.
Then they were all talking of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Monk, Devadatta deserted his Teacher, and came to dire destruction, being born to another life in the deep hell Avīci!” The Teacher, entering, asked what they spoke of, and they told him. Said he, “Not only now, but in former days, as now, Devadatta deserted his teacher, and came to dire destruction.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, his family priest’s family was destroyed by malarial fever. One son only broke through the wall and escaped. He came to Taxila, and under a world-renowned teacher learned all the arts and accomplishments. Then he bade his teacher farewell, and departed, with the intent to travel in different regions; and on his travels he arrived at a frontier village. Near to this was a great village of outcasts. Then the Bodhisatta lived in this village, a learned sage. A charm he knew which could make fruit to be gathered out of due season. Early of a morning he would take his carrying pole, he would go forth from that village, until he reached a mango tree which grew in the forest; and standing seven foot off, he would recite that charm, and throw a handful of water so as to strike on that tree. In a twinkling down fall the dry leaves, the new sprout forth, flowers bloom and flowers fall, the mango fruits swell out: but one moment – they are ripe, they are sweet and luscious, they grow like divine fruit, they drop from the tree! The Great Being chooses and eats such as he will, then fills the baskets hung from his pole, goes home and sells the fruit, and so finds a living for wife and child.

Now the young brahmin saw the Great Being offer ripe mangoes for sale out of season. “Without doubt,” he thought, “it must be by virtue of some charm that these are grown. This man can teach me a charm which has no price.” He watched

---

924 See No. 178, and note on p. 55 of vol. ii. of this translation [which reads: ahīvātarogo occurs in the Comm. on Therīgāthā (P. T.S. 1893), p. 120, line 20, but no hint as to its meaning is given. The word should mean, “snake-wind-disease,” perhaps malarial fever, which e.g. in the Terai is believed to be due to snake’s breath. Or is it possible that ahī, which may mean the navel, could here be the bowels, and some such disease as cholera be meant? [CPED lists the disease as bubonic plague.]]

925 See loc. cit. note 2. [which reads: It is noteworthy that here the same means is used to outwit the spirit of disease as is often taken to outwit the ghosts of the dead; who might be supposed to guard the door, but not the parts of the house where there was no outlet.]
to see the manner in which the Great Being procured his fruit, and found it out exactly. Then he went to the Great Being’s house at the time when he was not yet returned from the forest, and making as though he knew nothing, asked the wise man’s wife, “Where is the teacher?” Said she, “Gone to the woods.” He stood waiting until he saw him come, then went to him, and taking the pole and baskets from him, carried them into the house and there set them. The Great Being looked at him, and said to his wife, “Lady, this youth has come to get the charm; but no charm will stay with him, for no good man is he.” But the youth was thinking: “I will get the charm by being my teacher’s servant,” and so from that time he did all that was to be done in the house: brought wood, pounded the rice, did the cooking, brought all that was needed for washing the face, washed the feet.

One day when the Great Being said to him, “My son, bring me a stool to support my feet,” the youth, seeing no other way, kept the Great Teacher’s feet on his own thigh all night. When at a later season the Great Being’s wife brought forth a son, he did all the service that has to be done at a childbirth. The wife said one day to the Great Being, “Husband, this lad, well-born though he is, for the charm’s sake performs menial service for us. Let him have the charm, whether it stays with him or no.” To this he agreed. {4.202} He taught him the charm, and spoke after this fashion, “My son, ’tis a priceless charm; and you will get great gain and honour thereby. But when the king, or his great minister, shall ask you who was your teacher, do not conceal my name; for if you are ashamed that a low-caste man taught you the charm, and say your teacher was a great magnate of the brahmins, you will have no fruit of the charm.” “Why should I hide your name?” said the lad. “Whenever I am asked, I shall say it is you.” Then he saluted his teacher, and he departed from the low-caste village, pondering on the charm, and in due time came to Benares. There he sold mangoes, and gained much wealth.

Now on a day the keeper of the park presented to the king a mango which he had bought from him. The king, having eaten it, asked whence [4.126] he procured so fine a fruit. “My lord,” was the answer, “there is a young man who brings mangoes out of season, and sells them: from him I procured it.” “Tell him,” says the king,” from henceforth to bring the mangoes here to me.” This the man did; and from that time the young man took his mangoes to the king’s household. The king, inviting him to enter his service, he became a servant of the king; and gaining great wealth, by degrees he grew into the king’s confidence.
One day the king asked him, and said: “Young man, where do you get these mangoes out of season, so sweet and fragrant and of fine colour? Does some Nāga or Garuḷa give them to you, or a Deva, or is this by the power of magic?” “No one gives them to me, O mighty king!” replied the young man, “but I have a priceless charm, and this is the power of the charm.” “Well, what do you say to showing me the power of the charm one of these days?” “By all means, my lord, and so I will,” said he.

Next day the king went with him into the park, and asked to be shown this charm. The young man was willing, and approaching a mango tree, stood at a distance of seven foot from it, and repeated the charm, throwing water against the tree. On the instant the mango tree had fruit in the manner above described: {4.203} a shower of mangoes fell, a very storm; the company showed great delight, waving their kerchiefs; the king ate of the fruit, and gave him a great reward, and said: “Young man, who taught you this charm so marvellous?” Now thought the young man, ‘If I say a low-caste outcaste taught me, I shall be put to shame, and they will flout me; I know the charm by heart, and now I can never lose it; well, I will say it was a world-renowned teacher. So he lied, and said: “I learned it at Taxila, from a teacher renowned the wide world over.” As he said the words, denying his teacher, that very instant the charm was gone. But the king, greatly pleased, returned with him into the city.

On another day the king desired mangoes to eat; and going into the park, and taking his seat upon a stone bench, which was used on state occasions, he bade the youth get him mangoes. The youth, willing enough, went up to a mango tree, and standing at a distance of seven foot from the tree, set about repeating the charm; but the charm would not come. Then he knew that he had lost it, and stood there ashamed. But the king thought: “Formerly this fellow gave me mangoes even in the midst of a crowd, and like a heavy shower the fruit rained down. Now there he stands like a stock: what can the reason be?” Which he enquired by repeating the first verse:
1. “Young student, when I asked it you of late,
    You brought me mango fruit both small and great:
    Now no fruit, brahmin, on the tree appears,
    Though the same charm you still reiterate!” [4.127]

When he heard this, the young man thought to himself, if he should say this day no fruit was to be had, the king would be angry; wherefore he thought to deceive him with a lie, and repeated the second verse:

2. “The hour and moment suit not: so wait I
    Fit junction of the planets in the sky. [4.204]
    The due conjunction and the moment come,
    Then will I bring you mangoes plenteously.”

“What is this?” the king wondered. “The fellow said nothing of planetary conjunctions before!” To resolve which questions, he repeated two verses:

3. “You said no word of times and seasons, nor
    Of planetary junctions heretofore:
    But mangoes, fragrant, delicate in taste,
    Of colour fine, you brought in plenteous store.

4. Previously, brahmin, you produced well
    Fruit on the tree by muttering of your spell:
    Today you cannot, mutter as you may.
    What means this conduct, I would have you tell?”

Hearing this, the youth thought: “There is no deceiving the king with lies. If, when the truth is told, he punishes me, let him punish me: but the truth I will tell.” Then he recited two verses:

5. “A low-caste man my teacher was, who taught
    Duly and well the charm, and how it wrought:
    Saying, ‘If you are asked my name and birth,
    Hide nothing, or the charm will come to nought.’
6. Asked by the Lord of Men, though well I knew,
Yet in deceit I said what was not true;
‘A brahmin's spells,’ I lying said; and now,
Charm lost, my folly bitterly I rue.” [4.205]

This heard, the king thought within himself, “The sinful man to take no care of such a treasure! When one has a treasure so priceless, what has birth to do with it?” And in anger he repeated the following verses:

7. “Nimb, castor oil, or plassey tree,\textsuperscript{926} whatever be the tree
Where he who seeks finds honeycombs, ’tis best of trees, thinks he.

8. Be it Khattiya, brahmin, Vessa, he from whom a man learns right –
Sudda, Caṇḍāla, Pukkusa – seems chief in his sight.\textsuperscript{927} [4.128]

9. Punish the worthless churl, or even slay,
Hence take him by the throat without delay,
Who having gained a treasure with great toil,
Throws it with overweening pride away!”

The king’s men so did, saying: “Go back to your teacher, and win his forgiveness; then, if you can learn the charm once more, you may come here again, but if not, never more may you set eyes on this country.” Thus they banished him.

The man was all forlorn. “There is no refuge for me,” he thought, “except my teacher. To him I will go, and win his pardon, and learn the charm again.” So lamenting he went on his way to that village. [4.206] The Great Being perceived him coming, and pointed him out to his wife, saying: “See, lady, there comes that \textsuperscript{926} Butea Frondosa. As Plassey was named from this tree, it is perhaps admissible as a name of the tree.

\textsuperscript{927} These are the names of six castes: Kṣatriya, Brāhmaṇa, Vaiśya, Śūdra, the four castes familiar in Sanskrit books, together with two Caṇḍāla and Pukkaśa, both mixed castes and much despised. More about these castes, and the Buddhist system as contrasted with the brahminical, may be seen in R. Fick's \textit{Sociale Gliederung im Nordöstlichen Indien zu Buddha's Zeit}, Kiel, 1897. Fick denies that the Suddas were ever a real caste (p. 202). For Caṇḍāla, see p. 203; for Pukkusa, p. 206; both, in his opinion, non-Aryan subject races, serfs almost. The order of the list in our verse should be noticed. The \textit{Jātaka} gives the Khattiyas, or Warriors, precedence over the brahmins.
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1788

scoundrel again, with his charm lost and gone!” The man approached the Great Being, and greeted him, and sat on one side. “Why are you here?” asked the other. “O my teacher!” the man said: “I uttered a lie, and denied my teacher, and I am utterly ruined and undone!” Then he recited his transgression in a verse, asking again for the charms:

10. “Oft he who thinks the level ground is lying at his foot,
    Falls in a pool, pit, precipice, trips on a rotten root;
    Another treads what seems a cord, a jet-black snake to find;
    Another steps into the fire because his eyes are blind:
    I have done wrong, and lost my spell; but you, O teacher wise, Forgive! And let me once again find favour in your eyes!”

Then his teacher replied, “What say you, my son? Give but a sign to the blind, he goes me clear of pools and what not; but I told it to you once, and what do you want here now?” Then he repeated the following verses:

11. “To you in right due manner I did tell,
    You in due manner rightly learned the spell,
    Full willingly its nature I explained:
    Ne’er had it left you, had you acted well. [4.207]

12. Who with much toil, O fool! Hath learned a spell
    Full hard for those who now in this world dwell,
    Then, foolish one! A living gained at last,
    Throws all away, because he lies will tell,

    13. To such a fool, unwise, of lying fain,
        Ungrateful, who can not himself restrain –
        Spells, indeed! Mighty spells we give not him:
        Go hence away, and ask me not again!” [4.129]

Thus dismissed by his teacher, the man thought: “What is life to me?” and plunging into the woods, died forlorn.

The Teacher having made an end of this discourse, said: “Not only now, monk, has Devadatta denied his teacher, and come to dire destruction,” and so saying, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the ungrateful man, Ānanda was the king, and I was the low caste man.”
Ja 475 Phandanajātaka
The Story about the Phandana Tree (13s)

In the present the Sākiyans and the Koliyans are come to war over the supply of water. The Buddha tells a story of how a lion got angry with a tree, and arranged with a woodman to have it chopped down, while the deity of the tree arranged with the same woodman to have the lion killed, they both losing out.

The Bodhisatta = the Devatā who lived in the tree in the grove (vanasāṇḍe nivutthadevatā).

Present Source: Ja 536 Kuṇāla,
Quoted at: Ja 475 Phandana,
Present Compare: Ja 74 Rukkhadhamma,
Past Source: Ja 475 Phandana,
Quoted: Ja 536 Kuṇāla (Present).

Keywords: Quarrels, Revenge, Devas, Animals.

“O man, who stand.” This story the Teacher told on the bank of the river Rohinī, about a family quarrel. The circumstances will be described at large under the Kuṇālajātaka [Ja 536].

This was a story told by the Teacher, while dwelling beside lake Kuṇāla, concerning five hundred monks who were overwhelmed with discontent. Here follows the story in due order. The Sākiya and Koliya tribes had the river Rohinī which flows between the cities of Kapilavatthu and Koliya confined by a single dam and by means of it cultivated their crops. In the month Jeṭṭhamūla when the crops began to flag and droop, the labourers from amongst the dwellers of both cities assembled together. Then the people of Koliya said: “Should this water be drawn off on both sides, it will not prove sufficient for both us and you. But our crops will thrive with a single watering: give us then the water.” The people of Kapilavatthu said: “When you have filled your garners with corn, we shall hardly have the courage to come with ruddy gold, emeralds and copper coins, and with baskets and sacks in our hands, to hang about your doors. Our crops too will thrive with a single watering: give us the water.” “We will not give it,” they said. “Neither will we,” said the others.
As words thus ran high, one of them rose up and struck another a blow, and he in turn struck a third and thus it was that what with interchanging of blows and spitefully touching on the origin of their princely families they increased the tumult. The Koliya labourers said: “Be off with your people of Kapilavatthu, men who like dogs, jackals, and such like beasts, cohabited with their own sisters. What will their elephants and horses, their shields and spears avail against us?” The Sākiya labourers replied, “Nay, do you, wretched lepers, be off with your children, destitute and ill-conditioned fellows, who like brute beasts had their dwelling in a hollow jujube tree (koli). What shall their elephants and horses, their spears and shields avail against us?”

So they went and told the councillors appointed to such services and they reported it to the princes of their tribes. Then the Sākiyas said: “We will show them how strong and mighty are the men who cohabited with their sisters,” and they sallied forth, ready for the fray. And the Koliyas said: “We will show them how strong and mighty are they who dwelt in the hollow of a jujube tree,” and they too sallied forth ready for the fight.

But other teachers tell the story thus, “When the female slaves of the Sākiyas and Koliyas came to the river to fetch water, and throwing the coils of cloth that they carried on their heads upon the ground were seated and pleasantly conversing, a certain woman took another’s cloth, thinking it was her own; and when owing to this a quarrel arose, each claiming the coil of cloth as hers, gradually the people of the two cities, the serfs and the labourers, the attendants, headmen, councillors and viceroys, all of them sallied forth ready for battle.” But the former version being found in many commentaries and being plausible is to be accepted rather than this one.

Now it was at eventide that they would be sallying forth, ready for the fray. At that time the Fortunate One was dwelling at Sāvatthi, and at dawn of day while contemplating the world he beheld them setting out to the fight, and on seeing them he wondered whether if he were to go there the quarrel would cease, and he made up his mind and thought: “I will go there and, to quell this feud, I will relate three Jātaka Stories, and after that the quarrelling will cease. Then after telling two Jātaka Stories, to illustrate the blessings of union, I will teach them the Attadāṇḍasutta [Snp 4.15] and after hearing my sermon the people of the two cities will each of them bring into my presence two hundred and fifty youths, and I shall admit them to the Saṅgha and there will be a huge gathering.”

Thus after performing his toilet, he went his rounds in Sāvatthi for alms, and on his return, after taking his meal, at eventide he issued forth from his Perfumed Chamber and without saying a word to any man he took his bowl and robe and went by himself and sat cross-legged in the air between the two hosts. And seeing it was an occasion to startle them, to create darkness he sat there emitting (dark-blue) rays from his hair. Then when their hearts were troubled he revealed himself and emitted the six-coloured rays.

The people of Kapilavatthu on seeing the Fortunate One thought: “The Teacher, our noble kinsman, is come. Can he have seen the obligation laid upon us to fight?” “Now that the Teacher has come, it is impossible for us to discharge a weapon against the person of an enemy,” and they threw down their arms, saying: “Let the Koliyas slay us or roast us alive.” The Koliyas acted in exactly the same way. Then the Fortunate One alighted and seated himself on a magnificent Buddha throne, set in a charming spot on a bed of sand, and he shone with the incomparable glory of a Buddha. The kings too saluting the Fortunate One took their seats.

Then the Teacher, though he knew it right well, asked, “Why are you come here, mighty kings?” “Venerable sir,” they answered, “we are come, neither to see this river, nor to disport ourselves, but to get up a fight.” “What is the quarrel about, sires?” “About the water.” “What is the water worth?” “Very little, venerable sir.” “What is the earth worth?” “It is of priceless value.” “What are warrior chiefs worth?” “They too are of priceless value.” “Why on account of some worthless water are you for destroying chiefs of high worth? Verily, there is no satisfaction in this quarrel, but owing to a feud, sire, between a certain Tree Devatā and a black lion a grudge was set up, which has reached down to this present aeon,” and with these words he told them the Phandanajātaka [Ja 475].

On this occasion the Teacher addressed himself to the kinsmen, O king, and said.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there stood outside the city a village of carpenters. In it was a brahmin carpenter, who gained his livelihood by bringing wood from the forest, and making carts.
At that time there was a great plassey tree in the region of the Himālayas. A black lion used to go and lie at its root when hunting for food. One day a wind smote the tree, and a dry branch fell, and came down upon his shoulder. The blow gave him pain, and in fear he speedily rose up, and sprang away; then turning, he looked on the path he came by, and seeing nothing, thought: “There is no other lion or tiger, nor any in pursuit. Well, I think, the deity of that tree cannot deal with my lying there. I will find out if so it be.” So thinking, he grew angry out of season, and struck the tree, and cried, “Not a leaf on your tree did I eat, not a branch did I break; you can put up with other creatures abiding here, and you cannot put up with me! What is wrong with me? Wait a few days, and I will tear you out root and branch, I will get you chopped up chipmeal!” Thus he upbraided the deity of the tree, and then away he went in search of a man.

At that time the brahmin carpenter aforesaid with two or three other men, had come in a wagon to that neighbourhood to get wood for his trade as a cartwright. He left his wagon in a certain spot, and then adze and hatchet in hand went searching for trees. He happened to come near this plassey tree. The lion seeing him went and stood under the tree, for, he thought: “Today I must see the back of my enemy!” But the cartwright looking this way and that fled from the neighbourhood of the tree. “I will speak to him before he gets quite away,” thought the lion, and repeated the first verse:

1. “O man, who stand with axe in hand, within this woodland haunt,
   Come tell me true, I ask of you, what tree is it you want?”

“Lo, a miracle!” said the man, on hearing this address, “I swear, I never yet saw beast that could talk like a man. Of course he will know what kinds of wood are good for the cartwright. I'll ask him.” Thus thinking, he repeated the second verse:

---

928 The phandana is a tree of the same kind as the palāṣa [or Plassey], “butea frondosa.”
2. “Up hill, down dale, along the plain, a king you range the wood:
   Come tell me true, I ask of you – what tree for wheels is good?”

The lion listened, and said to himself, “Now I shall gain my heart’s desire!” then he repeated the third verse:

3. “Not Sāl, acacia, not mare’s-ear,\(^{929}\) much less a shrub\(^{930}\) is good;
   There is a tree they call plassey, and there’s your best wheel-wood.”

The man was pleased to hear this, and thought: “A happy day it was brought me into the woodland. Here’s a creature in the shape of a beast to tell me what wood is good for the wheelwright! Hey, but that’s fine!” So he questioned the lion in the fourth verse:

4. “What is the fashion of the leaves, what sort the trunk to see,
   Come tell me true, I ask of you, that I may know that tree?”

In reply the lion repeated two verses:

5. “This is the tree whose branch you see droop, bend, but never break;
   This is the plassey, on whose roots my standing-place I take.

6. For spoke or felloe, pole of car, or wheel, or any part,
   This plassey tree will do for you in making of a cart.”

After this declaration, the lion moved aside, joy in his heart. The cartwright began to fell the tree. Then the Tree Devatā thought: “I never dropped anything on that beast; he fell in a rage out of season, and now he\(^{4.131}\) is for destroying my home, and I too shall be destroyed. \(^{4.210}\) I must find some way of destroying his majesty.” So assuming the shape of a woodman, he came up to the cartwright, and said to him, “Ho man! A fine tree you have there! What will you do with it when it is down?” “Make a cart wheel.” “What! Has any one told you that tree is good for a cart?” “Yes, a black lion.” “Very good, well said black lion. You can make a fine cart out of that tree, says he. But I tell you that if you flay off the skin from a black lion’s neck, and put it around the outer edge of the wheel, like a sheath of iron, just a strip four fingers wide, the wheel will be very strong, and you will gain \(^{929}\) Vatica Robusta: so called from the shape of its leaves.

\(^{930}\) dhavo: Grislea Tomentosa.
a great deal by it.” “But where can I get the skin of a black lion?” “How stupid you are! The tree stands fast in the forest, and won’t run away. You go and find the lion who told you about this tree, and ask him in what part of the tree you are to cut, and bring him here. Then while he suspects nothing, and points out this place or that, wait till he sticks his jaw out, and smite him as he speaks with your sharpest axe, kill him, take the skin, eat the best of the flesh, and fell the tree at your leisure.” Thus he indulged his wrath.

To explain this matter, the Teacher repeated the following verses:

7. “Thus did at once the plassey tree his will and wish make clear:
I too a message have to tell: O Bhāradvāja, hear!

8. ‘From shoulder of the king of beasts cut off four inches wide,
And put it round the wheel, for so more strong it will abide.’

9. So in a trice the plassey tree, indulging in his ire,
On lions born and those unborn brought down destruction dire.’

The cartwright hearing the Tree Devatā’s directions, cried out, “Ah, this is a lucky day for me!” He killed the lion, cut down the tree, and away he went. \[4.211\]

The Teacher explained the matter by reciting:

10. “Thus plassey tree contends with beast,\textsuperscript{931} and beast with tree contends,
So each with mutual dispute to death the other sends.

11. So among men, where’er a feud or quarrel does arise,
They, as the beast and tree did now, cut capers peacock-wise.\textsuperscript{932}

12. This tell I you, that well is you what time you are at one:
Be of one mind, and quarrel not, as beast and tree have done. \[4.132\]

\textsuperscript{931} The word is īṣo, “lord,” i.e. lion, king of beasts. So above.

\textsuperscript{932} The commentator explains that men expose themselves in a quarrel, as peacocks expose their privy parts. This is perhaps an allusion to No. 32.
13. Learn peace with all men; this the wise all praise; and who is fain
Of peace and righteousness, he sure will final peace attain.”

When they heard the discourse of the king, they were reconciled.

The Teacher, having brought this discourse to an end, identified the Jātaka, “At that time, I was the deity who lived in that wood, and saw the whole business.”

Ja 476 Javanahāṁsajātaka
The Story about the Swift Goose (13s)

In the present the Buddha teaches about the quickness of the decay of life’s elements. Then he tells a story of a goose who was swifter than the sun, and when asked if anything was swifter than he, taught Dhamma to the king, thereby converting him.

The Bodhisatta = the quick goose (javanahāṁsa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Sāriputta = the middle (goose) (majjhima),
Moggallāna = the youngest (goose) (kaniṁṭha),
the Buddha’s disciples = the other geese (sesahaṁsaganā).

Keywords: Impermanence, Animals, Birds.

“Come, goose.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about the Dalhādhammasuttanta or the Parable of the Strong Men.933 The Fortunate One said: “Suppose, monks, four archers to stand at the four points of the compass, strong men, well trained and of great skill, perfect in archery and then let a man come and say, “If these four archers, strong, well trained, and of great skill, perfect in archery {4.212} shoot forth arrows from four points, I will catch those arrows as they are shot, and before they touch the ground,” would you not agree, sure enough, that he must be a very swift man and the perfection of swiftness?
Well, monks, great as the swiftness of such a man might be, great as the swiftness of sun and moon, there is something swifter: great, I say, monks, as the swiftness of such a man might be, great as the swiftness of the sun and moon, and though the gods outfly sun or moon in swiftness, there is something swifter than the gods:
great, monks, as the swiftness of that man (and so forth), yet more swiftly than

933 [This refers to SN 20.6, Dhanuggahasutta.]
the gods can go, the elements which make up life do decay. Therefore, monks, this you must learn, to be careful; verily I say unto you, this you must learn.”

Two days after this teaching, they were talking about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Monks, the Teacher in his own peculiar province as Buddha, illustrating the nature of what makes up life, showed it to be transient and weak, and smote with extreme terror monks and unconverted alike. Oh, the might of a Buddha!” The Teacher entered and asked what they talked of. They told him; and he said: “It is no marvel, monks, if I in my omniscience alarm the monks by my teaching, and show how transient are life’s elements. Even I, when without natural cause I was conceived by a goose, showed forth the transient nature of the elements of life, and by my teaching alarmed the whole court of a king, together with the king of Benares himself.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Great Being was born as a swift goose, which lived in Mount Cittakūṭa in a flock of ninety thousand other such geese. One day, having along with his flock eaten the wild rice that grew in a certain pool in the plains of Jambudīpa, he flew through the air (and it was as though a golden mat were spread from end to end of the city of Benares), and he flew slowly as in sport to Cittakūṭa. Now the king of Benares saw him; and said to his courtiers, “That bird must be a king, as I am.” He took a fancy to the bird, and taking with him garlands, perfumes and unguents, went looking for the Great Being; and with him he caused to go all manner of music. When the Great Being saw him doing honour in this way, he asked the other geese, “When a king would do such honour to me, what does he want?” “He wants to make friends with you, my lord.” “Well, let me be friends with the king,” said he; and he made friends with the king, and then returned.

One day after this, when the king was in his park, and went to Lake Anotatta, the bird flew to the king, having water on one wing and powder of sandalwood on the other; with the water he sprinkled the king, and cast the powder upon him, then while the company looked on, away he flew with his flock to Cittakūṭa. From 934 A mode of coming into existence all of a sudden, without the natural processes.

that time the king used to long for the Great Being; he would linger, watching the way by which he came, and thinking: “Today my comrade will come.”

Now the two youngest geese belonging to the flock of the Great Being, made up their minds to fly a race with the sun; so they asked leave of the Great Being, to try a race with the sun. “My lads,” said he, “the sun’s speed is swift, and you will never be able to race with him. You will perish in the course, so do not go.” A second time they asked, and a third time; but the Bodhisatta withstood them up to the third time of asking. But they stood to it, not knowing their own strength, and were resolved without telling the king to fly with the sun. So before sunrise they had taken their places on the peak of the Mount Yugandhara. The Great Being missed them, and asked whither they had gone. When he heard what had happened, he thought: “They will never be able to fly with the sun, but will perish in the course. I will save their lives.” So he too went to the peak of Yugandhara, and sat beside them.

When the sun’s round showed over the horizon, the young geese rose, and darted forward along with the sun; the Great Being flew forward with them. The youngest flew on into the forenoon, then grew faint; in the joints of his wings he felt as if a fire had been kindled. Then he made a signal to the Great Being, “Brother, I can’t do it!” “Fear not,” said the Great Being, “I will save you,” and taking him on his outspread wings, he soothed him, and conveyed him to Mount Cittakūta, and placed him in the midst of the geese. Then he flew off, and catching up the sun, went [4.134] on side by side with the other. Until near midday [4.214] the other flew with the sun, and then he grew faint and felt as though a fire had been kindled in the joints of his wings. Making a sign to the Great Being, he cried, “Brother, I cannot do it!” Him too the Great Being comforted in the same way, and taking him on his outspread wings, bore him to Cittakūta.

At that moment the sun was plumb overhead. The Great Being thought: “Today I will test the sun’s strength,” and darting back with one swoop, he perched on Yugandhara. Then rising with one swoop he overtook the sun, and flying now in front, now behind, thought to himself, “For me to fly with the sun is profitless, born of mere folly: what is he to me? Away I will go to Benares, and there tell my 935 One of the seven great ranges that surround Mount Meru.

comrade the king a message of righteousness and truth.” Then turning, before yet the sun had moved from the middle of the sky, he traversed the whole world from end to end; then slackening speed, traversed from end to end the whole of Jambudipā, and came at last to Benares.

The whole city, twelve leagues in compass, was as it were under the bird’s shadow, there was not a crack or crevice; then as by degrees the speed slackened, holes and crevices appeared in the sky. The Great Being went slower, and came down from the air, and alighted in front of a window. “My comrade is come!” cried the king in great joy; and getting a golden seat for the bird to perch on, said: “Come in, friend, and sit here,” and recited the first verse:

1. “Come, noble goose, come sit you here; dear is your sight to me;
Now you are master of the place; choose anything you see.”

The Great Being perched on the golden seat. The king anointed him under the wings with unguents a hundred times refined, nay, a thousand times, gave him sweet rice and sugared water in a golden dish, and talked with him in a voice of honey: (4.215) “Good friend, you have come alone; whence come you now?” The bird told him the whole matter at large. Then the king said to him, “Friend, show me too your swiftness against the sun.” “O mighty king, that swiftness cannot be shown.” “Then show me something like it.” “Very good, O king, I will show you something like it. Summon your archers who can shoot swift as lightning.” The king sent for them. The Great Being chose four of these, and with them went down from the palace into the courtyard. There he caused to be set up in the ground a stone column, and about his own neck a bell to be bound.

He then perched on the top of the stone pillar, and placing the four archers looking away from the pillar towards the four points, said: “O king, let these four men shoot four arrows at the same moment in four different directions, and I will catch these arrows before they touch the ground, and lay them at the men’s feet. You will know when I am gone for the arrows by the tinkling of this bell, but I shall not be seen.” Then all at one moment the men shot the four arrows; he catched them and laid them at the men’s feet, and was seen to be sitting upon the 936 The meaning is, the bird circled so fast over it as to give the appearance of a canopy.

So on p. 133 of the “golden mat.”
pillar. “Did you see my speed, O king?” he asked; then went on, “that speed, O great king, is not my swiftest nor my middle speed, ’tis my slowest of the slow: and this will show you how swift I am.”

Then the king asked him, “Well, friend, is there any speed swifter than yours?” “There is, my friend. Swifter than my swiftest a hundredfold, a thousandfold, nay a hundred thousandfold, is the decay of the elements of life in living beings: so they crumble away, so are they destroyed.” Thus he made clear, how the world of form crumbles away, being destroyed moment by moment. The king hearing this was in fear of death, could not keep his senses, but fell in a faint. The multitude were in despair, they sprinkled the king’s face with water, and brought him round. Then the Great Being said to him, “O great king, fear not; but remember death. Walk in righteousness, give alms and do good, be careful.” Then the king answered and said: “My lord, without a wise teacher like you I cannot live, do not return to mount Cittakūṭa, but stay here, instruct me, be my teacher to teach me!” and he put this request in two verses:

2. “By hearing of the loved one love is fed,
   By sight the craving for the lost falls dead:
   Since sight and hearing makes men lief and dear,
   With sight of you let me be favouréd.

3. Dear is your voice, and dearer far your presence when I see:
   Then since I love the sight of you, O Goose, come dwell with me!”

The Bodhisatta said:

4. “Ever would I dwell with you, in the honour thus conferred;
   But you might say in wine one day: ‘Broil me that royal bird!’ ”

“No,” said the king, “then I will never touch wine or strong drink,” and he made this promise in the following verse:

937 Reading agantvā in line 4.
5. “Accursed be both food and drink I should love more than you; And I will taste no drop nor sup while you shall stay with me!”

After this the Bodhisatta recited six verses:

6. “The cry of jackals or of birds is understood with ease; Yea, but the word of men, O king, is darker far than these!

7. A man may think, this is my friend, my comrade, of my kin, But friendship goes, and often hate and enmity begin.\[4.136\]

8. Who has your heart, is near to you, with you, where’er he be; But who dwells with you, and your heart estranged, afar is he.

9. Who in your house of kindly heart shall be Is kindly still though far across the sea: Who in your house shall hostile be of heart, Hostile he is though ocean-wide apart.

10. Your foes, O lord of chariots! Though near you, are afar: But, fosterer of your realm! The good in heart closely linked are.

11. Who stay too long, find oftentimes that friend is changed to foe; Then ere I lose your friendship, I will take my leave, and go.” [4.218]

Then the king said to him:

12. “Though I with folded hands beseech, you will not give me ear; You spare no word for us, to whom your service would be dear I crave one favour: come again and pay a visit here.”

Then the Bodhisatta said:

13. “If nothing comes to snap our life, O king! If you and I Still live, O fosterer of your folk! Perhaps I’ll hither fly, And we may see each other yet, as days and nights go by.”

With this address to the king, the Great Being departed to Cittakūṭa.

\[938\] These two couplets occur again in No. 478 (p. 141).
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Thus, monks, long ago, even when I was born as one of the animals, I showed the frailty of all life’s elements, and declared the Dhamma.” So saying, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, Moggallāna was the youngest bird, Sāriputta was the second, the Buddha’s followers were all geese of the flock, and I myself was the swift goose.”

Ja 477 Cullanāradajātaka
The Short Story about Nārada

Alternative Title: Cūḷanāradajātaka (Cst); Cūḷanāradakassapajātaka (Comm)

In the present one monk is in danger of falling away from the monastic life through the temptations of a young woman. The Buddha tells a story of a father who took his son and went to the Himālayas to become ascetics. There a woman seduced the son, but after listening to his father’s advice on the troubles of the lay life, he gave up the idea of going to the city with her.

The Bodhisatta = the father (pitā),
the dissatisfied monk = the young ascetic (tāpasakumāra),
the young girl = the same in the past (kumārikā).

Present Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 30 Muṇika, Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 286 Sālūka, Ja 348 Arañña, Ja 435 Haliddirāga,
Present Compare: Vin Mv 1 (1.35),
Past Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 435 Haliddirāga.

Keywords: Renunciation, Sensuality.

“No wood is chopped.” [4.219] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about the allurements of a sensual girl.

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.”
At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. (You must understand that a “fat” girl does not mean one whose body is fat, but be she fat or be she thin, by power of the five sensual passions she is called “fat”.) Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold

---

939 [This explanation doesn’t make much sense in English, but a fat (thulla) girl in Pāli, meant one who was mature but unmarried.]
on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.” “Is this true which they say,” asked he, “that you are discontented, monk?” “Yes, sir, true it is.” “Then what made you so?” “A sensual girl, sir.” “Monk,” said he, “long, long ago, when you were living in the forest, this same girl was a hindrance to your holiness, and did you great harm; then why are you again discontented on her account?” Then at the request of the monks he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family of great wealth, and after his education was finished managed the estate. Then his wife brought forth a son, and died. He thought: “As with my beloved wife, so with me death shall not be ashamed; what is a home to me? I will become an ascetic.” So forsaking his sensual desires, he went with his son to the Himālayas; and there with him entered upon the ascetic life, developed the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and dwelt in the woods, supporting life on fruits and roots.

At that time the borderers raided the countryside; and having assailed a town, and taken prisoners, laden with spoil they returned to the border. Amongst them was a maiden, beautiful, but endowed with all a deceitful person’s cunning. This girl thought to herself, “These men, when they have carried us off home, will use us as slaves; I must find some way to escape.” So she said: “My lord, I wish to retire; let me go and stay away for a moment.” Thus she deceived the robbers, and fled.

Now the Bodhisatta had gone out to fetch fruits and the like, leaving his son in the hut. While he was away, this girl, as she wandered about in the forest, came to the hut, in the morning; and tempting the son of the ascetic with desire of love, destroyed his virtue, and got him under her power. She said to him, “Why dwell here in the forest? Come, let us go to a village and make a home for ourselves. There it is easy to enjoy all the pleasures and passions of sense.” He consented, and said: “My father is now out in the woods looking for wild fruits. When we have seen him, we will both go away together.” Then the girl thought: “This young innocent knows nothing; but his father must have become an ascetic in his old age. When he comes in, he will want to know what I do here, and beat me, and drag me out by the feet, and throw me into the forest. I will get clear away before he comes.” So she said to the lad, “I will go first, and you may follow,” then pointing out the landmarks, she departed. After she had gone, the lad became sorrowful, and did none of his duties as he was used; but wrapped himself up head and all, and lay down within the hut, fretting.

---

940 i.e. it shall master me too one day.
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1804

When the Great Being came in with his wild fruits, he observed the girl’s footmark. “That is a woman’s footprint,” thought he, “my son’s virtue must have been lost.” Then he entered the hut, and laid down the wild fruit, and put the question to his son by repeating the first verse:

1. “No wood is chopped, and you have brought no water from the pool, No fire is kindled: why do you lie mooning like a fool?”

Hearing his father’s voice, the lad rose, and greeted him; and with all respect made known that he could not endure a forest life, repeating a couple of verses:

2. “I cannot live in forests: this, O Kassapa, I swear; Hard is the woodland life, and back to men I would repair.
3. Teach me, O brahmin, when I leave, that wheresoe’er I go, The customs of the countryside I may most fully know.” [4.222]

“Very good, my son,” said the Great Being, “I will tell you the customs of the country.” And he repeated this couple of verses:

4. “If ’tis your mind to leave behind the woodland fruits and roots And dwell in cities, hear me teach the way which that life suits:
5. Keep clear of every precipice, from poison keep afar, Sit never in the mud, and walk with care where serpents are.” [4.139]

The ascetic’s son, not understanding this pithy counsel, asked:

941 Literally “the kingdom.”
6. “What has your precipice to do with the ascetic way,
   Your mud, your poison, and your snake? Come tell me this, I pray.”

The other explained –

7. “There is a liquor in the world, my son, that men call wine,
   Fragrant, delicious, honey-sweet, and cheap, of flavour fine:
   This, Nārada, for holy men is poison, say the wise.

8. And women in the world can set fools’ wits a whirling round,
   They catch young hearts, as hurricanes catch cotton from the ground:
   The precipice I mean is this before the good man lies.

9. High honours shown by other men, respect and fame and gain,
   This is the mud, O Nārada, which holy men may stain.

10. Great monarchs with their retinue have in that world dwelling,
    And they are great, O Nārada, and each a mighty king: {4.223}

11. Before the feet of sovereign lords and monarchs walk not you,
    For, Nārada, these are the snakes of whom I spake just now.

12. The house you come to for your food, when men sit down to meat,
    If you see good within that house, there take your fill, and eat.

13. When by another entertained with food or drink, this do:
    Eat not too much, nor drink too much, and fleshly sensual desires eschew.

14. From gossip, drink, lewd company, and shops of goldsmith’s ware, Keep you afar as those who by the uneven pathway fare.”

As his father went on talking and talking, the lad came to his senses, and said:
“Enough of the world for me, dear father!” {4.224} Then his father instructed him how to develop kindliness and other good feelings. The son followed his father’s instruction, and before long caused Absorption to spring up within him. And both of them, father and son, without a break in the trance, were born again in the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time this sensual girl was the young woman, the discontented monk was the ascetic’s son, and I was the father.”
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1806

Ja 478 Dūtajātaka
The Story about the Messenger (13s)

In the present the monks are discussing the Buddha’s resourcefulness in teaching. The Buddha tells a story of a young brahmin who, having finished his studies, lost his teacher’s fee, and sat on the bank of the Ganges till the king came, as only the latter could repair the matter.

The Bodhisatta = the young brahmin (brāhmaṇamāṇava),
Sāriputta = the teacher (ācariya),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Skilful means, Resource.

“O plunged in thought.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about praise of his own wisdom. In the Dhamma Hall they were talking. “See, monks, the One with Ten Powers’ skill in resource! He showed that young [4.140] gentleman Nanda⁹⁴² the host of Accharā, and made him an Arahat; he gave a cloth to his little foot-page,⁹⁴³ and made him an Arahat along with the four branches of analytic knowledges;⁹⁴⁴ to the blacksmith he showed a lotus, and made him an Arahat; with what diverse expedients he instructs living beings!” The Teacher entered and asked what they sat talking of; they told him. Said he, “It is not the first time that the Tathāgata has had skill in means, and knew what will have the desired effect; he had skill in means before.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the country was without gold; for the king oppressed the country and so got treasure. At that time the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family of a certain village in Kāsi. When he came of age, he went to Taxila, saying: “I will get money to pay my teacher afterwards, by soliciting alms honourably.” He acquired learning, and when his education was ⁹⁴² Buddha’s half-brother. For the allusion see No. 182, Saṅgāvācarajātaka, and Hardy, Manual, p. 204; Warren, Buddhism in Translations, 269 ff.

---

⁹⁴³ Reading cullupāṭṭhākassa.
⁹⁴⁴ Of attha-, dhamma-, nirutti-, paṭibhāna-[paṭisambhidā]. For explanation of these obscure terms the reader is referred to Childers, p. 366; and Warren, Buddhism in Translations, Index s. v. “Analytical Sciences.”
done, he said: “I will use all diligence, my teacher, to bring you the money due for your teaching.” Then taking leave of him, he departed, and traversing the land sought alms.

When he had honourably and fairly got a few ounces\(^945\) of gold, he set out to hand them over to his teacher; and on the way went aboard a boat in order to cross the Ganges. As the boat swayed to and fro on the water, the gold fell in. Then he thought: “This is a country hard to get gold in; \(^{4.225}\) if I go seeking again for money to pay my teacher withal, there will be long delay. What if I sit fasting on the bank of the Ganges? The king will by and by come to learn of my sitting here, and he will send some of his courtiers, but I will have nothing to say to them. Then the king himself will come, and by that means I shall get my teacher’s fee from him.” So he wrapped about him his upper robe, and putting outside the sacrificial thread, sat on the bank of the Ganges, like a statue of gold upon the silver sand.

The passing crowds, seeing him sit there and take no food, asked him why he sat. But he had never a word for one of them. Next day the villagers of the suburb got wind of his sitting there, and they too came and asked, but he told them no more; the villagers seeing his exhausted condition went away lamenting. On the third day came people from the city, on the fourth came the city grandees, on the fifth those about the king, on the sixth day the king sent his ministers; but to none of them would the man speak. \(^{4.141}\)

On the seventh day the king in alarm came to the man, and asked an explanation, reciting the first verse:

1. “O plunged in thought on Ganges’ bank, why spoke you not again
   In answer to my messages? Will you conceal your pain?”

When this he heard, the Great Being replied, “O great king! The sorrow must be told to him that is able to take it away, and to no other,” and he repeated seven verses:

\(^{945}\) “Seven nikkhas.” Nikkho is a variable weight, equal to 250 phalas, which we may call grains.
2. “O fostering lord of Kāsi land! If sorrow be your lot,
Tell not that sorrow to a soul if he can help it not.

3. But whosoever can relieve one part of it by right,
To him let all his wish declare each sorrow-stricken wight.

4. The cry of jackals or of birds is understood with ease;
Yea, but the word of men, O king, is darker far than these. {4.226}

5. A man may think, ‘This is my friend, my comrade, of my kin,’
But friendship goes, and often hate and enmity begin!{4.226}

6. He who not being asked and asked again
Out of due season will declare his pain,
Surely displeases those who are his friends,
And they who wish him well lament amain.

7. Knowing fit time for speaking how to find,
Knowing a wise man of a kindred mind,
The wise to such a one his woe declares,
In gentle words with meaning hid behind.

8. But should he see that nothing can amend
His hardships, and that telling them will tend
To no good issue, let the wise alone
Endure, reserved and shamefast to the end.” {4.227}

Thus did the Great Being discourse in these seven verses to teach the king; and then repeated four others to show his search for money to pay the teacher withal:

9. “O king! Whole kingdoms I have scoured, the cities of each king,
Each town or village, craving alms, my teacher’s fee to bring.

10. Householder, courtier, man of wealth, brahmin – at every door
Seeking, a little gold I gained, an ounce or two, no more.
Now that is lost, O mighty king! And so I grieve full sore.

{4.226} These two couplets [4-5] occur above in No. 476 (p. 135).
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1809

11. No power had your messengers to free me from my pain:
I weighed them well, O mighty king! So I did not explain.

12. But you have power, O mighty king! To free me from my pain,
For I have weighed your merit well; to you I do explain.”

When the king heard his utterance, he replied, “Trouble not, brahmin, for I will give you your teacher’s fee,” and he restored him two-fold. [4.142]

To make this clear the Teacher repeated the last verse:

13. “The fostering lord of Kāsi land did to this man restore
(In fullest trust) of gold refined twice what he had before.”

When the Great Being had thus delivered himself, he proceeded to pay his teacher’s fee; and the king in like manner followed his advice, giving alms and doing good, and ruled in righteousness. So did they both finally pass away according to their deeds. [4.228]

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “So, monks, it is not only now, but the Tathāgata had skill in means previously.” Then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, Sāriputta the teacher, and I was the young man.”

Ja 479 Kāliṅgabodhijātaka
The Story about (King) Kāliṅga and the Bodhi Tree

In the present the devotees at Sāvatthi want a sign of the Buddha left behind when he goes on teaching tour. Ven. Ānanda gets permission to have a Bodhi tree planted in Jetavana, and for the Buddha to sit under it for one night. The Buddha then tells a story of how, as a Universal Monarch in a previous life, Ānanda had found the area of the Bodhi tree, and worshipped at it.

The Bodhisatta = (the brahmin) Kāliṅgabhāradvāja,
Ānanda = (the king of) Kāliṅga.

Present Source: Ja 479 Kāliṅgabodhi, Quoted at: Ja 261 Paduma.

Keywords: Devotion, Memorial.
“King Kāliṅga.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana about worship of the Bodhi tree performed by elder Ānanda.

When the Tathāgata had set forth on pilgrimage, for the purpose of gathering in those who were ripe for conversion, the citizens of Sāvatthi proceeded to Jetavana, their hands full of garlands and fragrant wreaths, and finding no other place to show their reverence, laid them by the gateway of the perfumed chamber and went off. This caused great rejoicings. But Anāthapiṇḍika got to hear of it; and on the return of the Tathāgata visited elder Ānanda and said to him, “This monastery, sir, is left unprovided while the Tathāgata goes on pilgrimage, and there is no place for the people to do reverence by offering fragrant wreaths and garlands. Will you be so kind, sir, as to tell the Tathāgata of this matter, and learn from him whether or not it is possible to find a place for this purpose.” The other, quite willingly, did so, asking, “How many shrines are there?” “Three, Ānanda.” “Which are they?” “Shrines for a relic of the body, a relic of use or wear, a relic of memorial.”

“Can a shrine be made, sir, during your life?” “No, Ānanda, not a body-shrine; that kind is made when a Buddha enters Nibbāna. A shrine of memorial is improper because the connection depends on the imagination only. But the great Bodhi tree used by the Buddhas is fit for a shrine, be they alive or be they dead.” “Sir, while you are away on pilgrimage the great monastery of Jetavana [4.143] is unprotected, and the people have no place where they can show their reverence. Shall I plant a seed of the great Bodhi tree before the gateway of Jetavana?” “By all means so do, Ānanda, and that shall be as it were an abiding place for me.”

The elder told this to Anāthapiṇḍika, and Visākhā, and the king. Then at the gateway of Jetavana he cleared out a pit for the Bodhi tree to stand in, and said to the chief elder, Moggallāna, “I want to plant a Bodhi tree in front of Jetavana. Will you get me a fruit of the great Bodhi tree?” The elder, willingly, passed through the air to the platform under the Bodhi tree. He placed in his robe a fruit that was dropping from its stalk but had not reached the ground, brought it back, and delivered it to Ānanda. The elder informed the king of Kosala that 947 The last class is said to be images of the Buddha.

948 Reading parigalantam.
he was to plant the Bodhi tree that day. So in the evening time the king came with a great concourse, bringing all things necessary; then also Anāthapiṇḍika and Visākhā came and a crowd of the faithful besides.

In the place where the Bodhi tree was to be planted the elder had placed a golden jar, and in the bottom of it was a hole; all was filled with earth moistened with fragrant water. He said: “O king, plant this seed of the Bodhi tree,” giving it to the king. But the king, thinking that his kingdom was not to be in his hands for ever, and that Anāthapiṇḍika ought to plant it, passed the seed to Anāthapiṇḍika, the great merchant. Then Anāthapiṇḍika stirred up the fragrant soil and dropped it in. The instant it dropped from his hand, before the very eyes of all, it sprang up as broad as a plough-head a Bodhi sapling, fifty cubits tall; on the four sides and upwards shot forth five great branches of fifty cubits in length, like the trunk. So stood the tree, a very lord of the forest already; a mighty miracle! The king poured round the tree jars of gold and of silver, in number eight hundred, filled with scented water, beauteous with a great quantity of blue water-lilies, and caused to be set there a long line of vessels all full, and a seat he had made of the seven precious things, golden dust he had sprinkled about it, a wall was built round the precincts, he erected a gate chamber of the seven precious things. Great was the honour paid to it.

The elder, approaching the Tathāgata, said to him, “Sir, for the people’s good, accomplish under the Bodhi tree which I have planted that height of Attainment to which you attained under the great Bodhi tree.” “What is this you say, Ānanda?” replied he. “There is no other place can support me, if I sit there and attain to that which I attained in the enclosure of the great Bodhi tree.” “Sir,” said Ānanda, “I pray you for the good of the people, to use this tree for the rapture of Attainment, in so far as this spot of ground can support the weight.” The Teacher used it during one night for the rapture of Attainment.
The elder informed the king, and all the rest, and called it by the name of the Bodhi Festival. And this tree, having been planted by Ānanda, was known by the name of Ānanda’s Bodhi tree.\footnote{[In the story Anāthapiṇḍaka does the actual planting, monks not being allowed to dig the earth. We may understand it as being due to Ānanda that the tree was planted.]} At that time they began to talk of it in the Dhamma Hall. “Monks, while yet the Tathāgata lived, the venerable Ānanda caused a Bodhi tree to be planted, \footnote{The tokens are a familiar feature of folk-tales. We may compare the story of Theseus, with his father’s sword and sandals: Pausanias, i. 27. 8.} and great reverence to be paid to it. Oh, how great is the elder’s power!” The Teacher entered and asked what they were talking of. They told him. He said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Ānanda led captive mankind in the four great continents, with all the surrounding throngs, and caused a vast quantity of scented wreaths to be brought, and made a Bodhi Festival in the precinct of the great Bodhi tree.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the kingdom of Kāliṅga, and in the city of Dantapura, reigned a king named Kāliṅga. He had two sons, named Mahākāliṅga and Cullakāliṅga, Kāliṅga the Greater and the Less. Now fortune-tellers had foretold that the eldest son would reign after his father’s death; but that the youngest would live as an ascetic, and live by alms, yet his son would be a Universal Monarch.

Time passed by, and on his father’s death the eldest son became king, the youngest viceroy. The youngest, ever thinking that a son born of him was to be a Universal Monarch, grew arrogant on that account. This the king could not accept, so he sent a messenger to arrest Cullakāliṅga. The man came and said: “Prince, the king wishes to have you arrested, so save your life.” The prince showed the courtier charged with this mission his own signet ring, a fine rug, and his sword: these three. Then he said: “By these tokens\footnote{You shall know my son, and make him king.” With these words, he sped away into the forest. There he built a hut in a pleasant place, and lived as an ascetic upon the bank of a river.} you shall know my son, and make him king.” With these words, he sped away into the forest. There he built a hut in a pleasant place, and lived as an ascetic upon the bank of a river.

Now in the kingdom of Madda, and in the city of Sāgala, a daughter was born to the king of Madda. Of the girl, as of the prince, fortune-tellers foretold that she should live as an ascetic, but her son was to be a Universal Monarch. The kings of Jambudīpa, hearing this rumour, came together with one accord, and surrounded the city. The king thought to himself, “Now, if I give my daughter to one, all the other kings will be enraged. I will try to save her.” So with wife and daughter he fled disguised away into the forest; and after building him a hut some distance up the river, above the hut of prince Kāliṅga, he lived there as an ascetic, eating what he could pick up.

The parents, wishing to save their daughter, left her behind in the hut, and went out to gather wild fruits. While they were gone she gathered flowers of all kinds, and made them into a flower-wreath. Now on the bank of the Ganges there is a mango tree with beautiful flowers, which forms a kind of natural ladder. Upon this she climbed, and while playing managed to drop the wreath of flowers into the water.951

One day, as prince Kāliṅga was coming out of the river after a bath, this flower-wreath caught in his hair. He looked at it, and said: “Some woman made this, and no full-grown woman but a tender young girl. I must search for her.” So deeply in love he journeyed up the Ganges, until he heard her singing in a sweet voice, as she sat in the mango tree. He approached the foot of the tree, and seeing her, said: “What are you, fair lady?” “I am human, sir,” she replied. “Come down, then,” said he. “Sir, I cannot; I am of the warrior caste.”952 “So am I also, lady: come down!” “No, no, sir, that I cannot do. Saying will not make a warrior; if you are so, tell me the secrets of that mystery.” Then they repeated to each other these guild secrets. And the princess came down, and they transgressed with one another.

When her parents returned she told them about this son of the king of Kālinga, and how he came into the forest, in all detail. They consented to give her to him. While they lived together in happy union, the princess conceived, and after ten months brought forth a son with the signs of good luck and virtue; and they named 951 Another familiar episode in folk tales, but of Protean form. It is commonly a hair of the lady’s head that falls. See Clouston, Popular Tales and Fictions, i. 241 (India), 251, (Egypt); North Indian Notes and Queries, ii. 704; Lal Behari Day, Folk Tales of Bengal, No, 4.

952 Khattiyā.
him Kāliṅga. He grew up, and learned all arts and accomplishments from his father and grandfather.

At length his father knew from the conjunctions of the stars that his brother was dead. So he called his son, and said: “My son, you must not spend your life in the forest. Your father’s brother, Mahākāliṅga, is dead; you must go to Dantapura, and receive your hereditary kingdom.” (4.232) Then he gave him the things he had brought away with him, signet, rug, and sword, saying: “My son, in the city of Dantapura, in such a street, lives a courtier who is my very good servant. Descend into his house and enter his bedchamber, and show him these three things and tell him you are my son. He will place you upon the throne.”

The lad bade farewell to his parents and grandparents; and by power of his own virtue he passed through the air, and descending into the house of that courtier entered his bedchamber. “Who are you?” asked the other. “The son of Cullakāliṅga,” said he, disclosing the three tokens. The courtier told it to the palace, and all those of the court decorated the city and spread the umbrella of royalty over his head. Then the family priest, who was named Kāliṅgabhāradvāja, taught him the ten ceremonies which a Universal Monarch has to perform, and he fulfilled those duties. Then on the fifteenth day, the Uposatha, came to him from Cakkadaha the precious Wheel Jewel, from the Uposatha stock the Elephant Jewel, from the royal Valāha breed the Horse Jewel, from Vepulla the precious Jewel; and the Jewels of wife, retinue, and prince made their appearance. 953 Then he achieved sovereignty in the whole terrestrial sphere.

One day, surrounded by a company which covered six-and-thirty leagues, and mounted upon an elephant all white, tall as a peak of Mount [4.146] Kelāsa, in great pomp and splendour he went to visit his parents. But beyond the circuit 954 around the great Bodhi tree, the throne of victory of all the Buddhas, which has 953 For an account of the Cakkavatti, and the miracles at his appearing, consult Hardy’s Manual, 126 ff. See also Rhys Davids on the Questions of Milinda, vol. i. p. 57 (he renders the last two treasurer and adviser), and Buddhist Suttas, p. 257.

---

954 The word is used both of the seat under the tree and of the raised terrace built around it.
become the very navel of the earth, beyond this the elephant was unable to pass: again and again the king urged him on, but pass he could not.

Explaining this, the Teacher recited the first verse:

1. “King Kāliṅga, lord supreme,
   Ruled the earth by law and right,
   To the Bodhi tree once he came
   On an elephant of might.”

Hereupon the king’s family priest, who was travelling with the king, thought to himself, “In the air is no hindrance; why cannot the king make his elephant go on? {4.233} I will go, and see.” Then descending from the air, he beheld the throne of victory of all Buddhas, the navel of the earth, that circuit around the great Bodhi tree. At that time, it is said, for the space of a royal acre\textsuperscript{955} was never a blade of grass, not so big as a hare’s whisker; it seemed as it were a smooth-spread sand bright like a silver plate; but on all sides were grass, creepers, mighty trees like the lords of the forest, as though standing in reverent wise all about with their faces turned towards the throne of the Bodhi tree. When the brahmin beheld this spot of earth, “This,” he thought, “is the place where all the Buddhas have crushed all the desires of the flesh; and beyond this none can pass, no not if he were Sakka himself.” Then approaching the king, he told him the quality of the Bodhi tree circuit, and bade him descend.

By way of explaining this the Teacher recited these verses following:

2. “This Kāliṅgabhāradvāja told his king, the ascetic’s son,
   As he rolled the Wheel Jewel, guiding him, obeisance done:

3. This the place the poets sing of; here, O mighty king, alight!
   Here attained to Awakening perfect Buddhas, shining bright.

4. In the world, tradition has it, this one spot is hallowed ground,
   Where in attitude of reverence herbs and creepers stand around.\textsuperscript{956}

\textsuperscript{955} Or should it be a karisa round the king?

\textsuperscript{956} The commentator says of this mando: “As the age continues, at first it continues the same, then with the waning of the age wanes again and grows less.”
5. Come, descend and do obeisance; since as far as the ocean bound
In the fertile earth all-fostering this one spot is hallowed ground. [4.147]

6. All the elephants you ownest thoroughbred by dam and sire, Hither drive them, they will surely come thus far, but come no nigher.

7. He is thoroughbred you ride on; drive the creature as you will,
He can go not one step further: here the elephant stands still.

8. Spake the soothsayer, heard Kāliṅga; then the king to him, said he,
Driving deep the goa into him: ‘Be this truth, we soon shall see.’

9. Pierced, the creature trumpets loudly, shrill as any heron cries, Moved, then fell upon his haunches neath the weight, and could not rise.” [4.234]

Pierced and pierced again by the king, this elephant could not endure the pain, and so died; but the king knew not he was dead, and sat there still on his back.
Then Kāliṅgabhāradvāja said: “O great king! Your elephant is dead; pass on to another.”

To explain this matter, the Teacher recited the tenth verse:

10. “When Kāliṅgabhāradvāja saw the elephant was dead,
    He in fear and trepidation then to king Kāliṅga said:
    Seek another, mighty monarch: this your elephant is dead.” [4.235]

By the virtue and magical power of the king, another beast of the Uposatha breed appeared and offered his back. The king sat on his back. At that moment the dead elephant fell upon the earth.

To explain this matter, the Teacher repeated another verse:

11. “This heard, Kāliṅga in dismay
    Mounted another, and straightway
    Upon the earth the corpse sank down,
    And the soothsayer’s word for very truth was shown.”

Thereupon the king came down from the air, and beholding the precinct of the Bodhi tree, and the miracle that was done, he praised Bhāradvāja, saying:
12. “To Kāliṅgabhāradvāja king Kāliṅga thus did say: All you know and you understand, and you see all alway.”

Now the brahmin would not accept this praise; but standing in his own humble place, he extolled the Buddhas, and praised them. [4.148]

To explain this, the Teacher repeated these verses:

13. “But the brahmin straight denied it, and thus spake unto the king: I know truth of marks and tokens: but the Buddhas, every thing.

14. Though all-knowing and all-seeing, yet in marks they have no skill: They know all, but know by insight: I a man of books am still.”

The king, hearing the virtues of the Buddhas, was delighted in heart; and he caused all the dwellers in the world to bring fragrant wreaths in plenty, and for seven days he made them do worship at the circuit of the Great Bodhi tree. [4.236]

By way of explanation, the Teacher recited a couple of verses:

15. “Thus worshipped he the Bodhi tree with much melodious sound Of music, and with fragrant wreaths: a wall he set around,”

and after that the king went on his way:

16. “Brought flowers in sixty thousand carts an offering to be; Thus king Kāliṅga worshipped the circuit of the tree.”

Having in this manner done worship to the Great Bodhi tree, he visited his parents, and took them back with him again to Dantapura; where he gave alms and did good deeds, until he was born again in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three.

The Teacher, having finished this discourse, said: “It is not now the first time, monks, that Ānanda did worship the Bodhi tree, but previously also,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was Kāliṅga, and I myself was Kāliṅgabhāradvāja.”

_________________________

957 Reading tāṁ bodhiṁ. [The original mistakenly writes tain bodhim.]
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1818

Ja 480 Akittijātaka
The Story about the (Wise) Akitti (13s)

Alternative Title: Akittajātaka (Cst)

In the present one layman makes generous offerings to the Saṅgha, and is thanked by the Buddha, who then tells a story of a king who gave up a kingdom and eventually retired to a lonely island and lived on leaves and flowers. When Sakka came in guise of a brahmin, still he offered all his food to him, and lived on the joy he felt in giving.

The Bodhisatta = the wise Akitti (Akittipāṇḍita),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka.

Past Compare: Cp 1 Akitticariyā, Jm 7 Agastya.

Keywords: Generosity, Renunciation.

“Sakka, the lord of beings.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a generous donor who lived in Sāvatthi. This man, so it is said, invited the Teacher, and for seven days gave many gifts to the company which followed with him; on the last day he presented the company of the Ariya Saṅgha with all things necessary for them. Then said the Teacher, rendering thanks to him, “Lay brother, great is your generosity: a thing most difficult you have done. This custom of giving is the custom of wise men of old. Gifts must be given, be you in the world, be you in retirement from the world; the wise men of old, even when they had left the world and dwelt in the woodland, when they had to eat but Kāra958 leaves sprinkled with water, without salt or spice, {4.237} yet gave to all beggars that passed by to serve their need, and themselves lived on their own joy and blessedness.” The man answered, “Sir, this giving of all necessary things to the company is clear enough, but what you say is not clear. Will you not explain it to us?” Then the Teacher at his request told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the family of a brahmin magnate, whose fortune amounted to eighty crores. They named him Akitti. When the time came he was able to walk, a sister was born, and they gave her the name Yasavatī. The Great Being proceeded at the age of sixteen years to Taxila, where he completed his education and then returned. After that his mother and father died. He had performed all that behoves for the spirits of the dead, and was inspecting his treasure: “So and so,” ran the catalogue, “laid up so much and died, such another so much.” Hearing this he was disturbed in his mind, and thought: “This treasure is here for all to see, but they that gathered it are no more seen: they have all gone and left the treasure behind them, but when I pass away I will take it with me.” So sending for his sister, he said: “Take charge of this treasure.” “What is your own intent?” she asked. He replied, “To become an ascetic.” “Dear one,” she answered, “I will not take on my head that which you have spewed out of your mouth; I will have none of it, but I also will become an ascetic.”

Then having asked leave of the king, he caused the drum to beat all about the city, and proclamation to be made, “Oyez! Let all those who wish for money repair to the wise man’s house!” For seven days he distributed great store of alms, and yet the treasure did not come to an end. Then he thought to himself, “The elements of my being waste away, and what do I want with this treasure-game? Let those who desire it, take.” Then he opened wide the doors of the house, saying: “It is a gift; let the people take it.” So leaving the house with all its gold and precious metal, with his kinsfolk weeping around, he and his sister departed. And the gate of Benares by which they went was called Akitti’s Gate, and the landing-stage by which they went down to the river, this also was called the Quay of Akitti. Three leagues he traversed, and there in a pleasant spot made a hut of leaves and branches, and with his sister lived in it as an ascetic. [4.150] [4.238]

After the time of his retiring from the world, many others also did the same, villagers, townsfolk, citizens of the royal city; great was the company of them, great the gifts and the honour they received; it was like to the arising of a Buddha. Then the Great Being thought within himself, “Here is great honour and store of alms, here is a great company, yes passing great, but I ought to dwell alone.” So at a time when no man expected, without even warning his sister, alone he departed, and by and by came to the kingdom Damiḷa, where dwelling in a park near Kāvirapaṭṭana, he cultivated the Absorptions and the Super Knowledges. There also he received much honour and great store of gifts. This he did not like, and he forsook it, and passing through the air descended at the isle of Kāra, which is over against the island of Nāga. At that time, Kāradīpa was named Ahidīpa, the Isle of Snakes. There he built a hermitage beside a great kāra tree, and dwelt in it. But that he dwelt there no man knew.

Now his sister went searching for her brother, and in due course came to the kingdom of Damiḷa, saw him not, yet dwelt in the very place where he dwelt, but could not induce the Absorption. The Great Being was so contented that he went nowhere, but at the time of fruit fed upon the fruit of that tree, and at time of the putting forth of leaves fed on its leaves sprinkled with water. By the fire of his virtue Sakka’s marble throne became hot. “Who would bring me down from my place?” thought Sakka, and considering, he beheld the wise man. “Why is it,” he thought, “that ascetic guards his virtue? Is it that he aspires to become Sakka, or for some other cause? I will test him. The man lives in misery, eats kāra-leaves sprinkled with water: if he desires to become Sakka, he will give me his own sodden leaves; but if not, then he will not give them.” Then in the guise of a brahmin he went to the Bodhisatta.

The Bodhisatta sat at the door of his leaf-hut, having sodden the leaves and laid them down, “When they are cool,” he thought: “I will eat them.” At that moment Sakka stood before him, craving alms. When the Great Being beheld him, he was glad at heart, “A blessing for me,” he thought: “I see a beggar; this day I shall attain the desire of my heart, {4.239} and I shall give an alms.” When the food was ready, he took it in his bowl at once, and advancing towards Sakka, said to him, “This is my gift: be it the means of my gaining omniscience!” Then without

---

959 [The Tamils live in what is now called Tamil Nadu, which is opposite the Malabar coast.]
960 [Nāgadiḷa is an island just separated from the Jaffna peninsular, which is the northerly part of Sri Lanka; I think Kāra would need to be identified with Kurikadduwan, which is to the east.]
leaving any for himself, he laid the food in the other’s bowl. The brahmin took it, and moving a short way off disappeared.

But the Great Being, having given his gift, cooked no more again, but sat still in joy and blessedness. Next day he cooked again, and sat as before at [4.151] the entrance to the hut. Again Sakka came in the semblance of a brahmin, and again the Great Being gave him the meal, and continued in joy and blessedness. On the third day again he gave as before, saying: “See what a blessing for me! A few kāra-leaves have begotten great merit for me.” Thus in heartfelt joy, weak as he was for want of food for three days, he came out of his hut at noontide and sat in the door, reflecting upon the gift which he had given.

And Sakka thought: “This brahmin fasting for three days, weak as he is, yet gives to me, and takes joy in his giving. There is no other meaning in his thoughts; I do not understand what it is he desires and why he gives these gifts, so I must ask him, and find out his meaning, and learn the cause of his giving.” Accordingly he waited till past midday, and in great glory and magnificence came to the Great Being blazing like the young sun; and standing before him, put to him the question, “Ho, ascetic! Why do you practise the ascetic life in this forest, surrounded by the salt sea, with hot winds beating upon you?”

To make clear this matter, the Teacher repeated the first verse:

1. “Sakka, the lord of beings, saw Akitti honouréd:
   ‘Why, O great brahmin, do you rest here in the heat’? he said.”

When the Great Being heard this, and perceived that it was Sakka, he answered and said to him, “Those Attainments I do not crave; but craving for omniscience I live the life of a recluse.” To make this clear, he recited the second verse: [4.240]

2. “Rebirth, the body’s breaking up, death, delusion is pain:
   Therefore, O Sakka Vāsava! I here in peace remain.”

Hearing these words, Sakka was pleased in his heart, and thought: “He is dissatisfied with all kinds of being, and for Nibbāna’s sake dwells in the forest. I will offer him a boon.” Then he invited him to choose a boon in the words of the third verse:
3. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

The Great Being repeated the fourth verse, choosing his boon:

4. “Sakka, the lord of beings all, has offered me a boon,
Son, wife or treasure, grain in store, content not though possessed:
I pray no lust for such as these may harbour in my breast.” [4.152]

Then Sakka, much pleased, offered yet other boons, and the Great Being accepted them, each in turn repeating a verse as follows:

5. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

6. “Sakka, the lord of beings all, has offered me a boon.
Lands, goods, and gold, slaves, horse, and kine, grow old and pass away:
May I be not like them, nor be this fault in me, I pray.”

7. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

8. “Sakka, the lord of all the world, has offered me a boon.
May I not see or hear a fool, nor no such dwell with me,
Nor hold no converse with a fool, nor like his company.” [4.241]

9. “What has a fool e’er done to you, O Kassapa, declare!
Come tell me why fools’ company is more than you can bear?”

10. “The fool does wickedly, binds loads on him that none should bear,
Ill-doing is his good, he is angry when spoken fair,
Knows not right conduct; this is why I would have no fool there.”

11. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

---

961 This couplet has already been given: see p. 7, above.
962 See p: 7.
12. “Sakka, the lord of beings all, has offered me a boon.
    Be it mine the wise to see and hear, and may he dwell with me,
    May I hold converse with the wise, and love his company.”

13. “What has the wise man done to you, O Kassapa, declare!
    Why do you wish that where you are, the wise man should be there?”

14. “The wise does well, no burden binds on him that none should bear,
    Well-doing is his good, nor is he angry when spoken fair,
    Knows well right conduct; this is why ’tis well he should be there.”

15. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
    Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

16. “Sakka, the lord of beings all, has offered me a boon.
    May I be free from sensual desires, and when the sun begins to shine
    May holy mendicants appear, and grant me food divine;

17. May this not dwindle as I give, nor I repent the deed,
    But be my heart in giving glad: this choose I for my meed.”

18. “Fair spoken, Kassapa, well put, most excellently said:
    Choose now a boon – as bids your heart, so let the choice be made.”

19. “Sakka, the lord of beings all, to me a boon he gave:
    O Sakka, visit me no more: this boon is all I crave.”

20. “But many men and women too of those who live aright Desire to see me: can there be a danger in the sight?”

21. “Such is your aspect all divine, such glory and delight,
    This seen, I may forget my vows: this danger has the sight.” \{4.242\}

“Well, sir,” said Sakka, “I will never visit you again,” and so saluting him, and craving his pardon, Sakka departed. The Great Being then dwelt all his life long, cultivating the Divine Abidings, and was born again in the Brahmā Realm.

The Teacher, having completed this discourse, identified the Jātaka, “At that time Anuruddha was Sakka, and I myself was the wise Akitti.”
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1824

Ja 481 Takkāriyajātaka

The Story about (the Wise Young Brahmin) Takkāriya

Alternative Title: Mahātakkāriyajātaka (Comm)

In the present Kokālika blames the two chief disciples, and because of what he says, falls into hell. The Buddha tells a story of how a family priest had tried to destroy another and had ended up destroying himself.

The Bodhisatta = the wise (young brahmin) Takkāriya (Takkāriyapaṇḍita), Kokālika = (the family priest who was) toothless and dark (kalārapingala).

Present Source: Ja 481 Takkāriya,
Quoted at: Ja 117 Tittira, Ja 215 Kacchapa, Ja 272 Vyaggha, Ja 331 Kokālika.

Keywords: Blame, Slander, Devas.

“I spoke.” [4.153] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about Kokālika.

During one rainy season the two chief disciples, desiring to leave the multitude and to dwell apart, took leave of the Teacher, and went into the kingdom where Kokālika was. They repaired to the residence of Kokālika, and said this to him, “Monk Kokālika, [4.243] since for us it is delightful to dwell with you, and for you to dwell with us, we would abide here three months.” “How,” said the other, “will it be delightful for you to dwell with me?” They answered, “If you tell not a soul that the two chief disciples are dwelling here, we shall be happy, and that will be our delight in dwelling with you.” “And how is it delightful for me to dwell with you?” “We will teach the Dhamma to you for three months in your home, and we will discourse to you, and that will be your delight in dwelling with us.” “Dwell here, monks,” said he, “so long as you will,” and he allotted a pleasant

---

963 See L. Feer in Journal Asiatique, ix. Ser., xi. 189 ff. Compare also Zeitschr. der deutsch. morg. Gesellschaft, xlvii. 86, on ‘The goat is proffering the knife’. [Quoted in Greek in the original.]

964 Sāriputta and Moggallāna.
residence to them. There they dwelt in the fruition of the Attainments, and no man knew of their dwelling in that place.

When they had thus past the rains they said to him, “Monk, now we have dwelt with you, and we will go to visit the Teacher,” and asked his leave to go. He agreed, and went with them on the rounds for alms in a village over against the place where they were. After their meal the elders departed from the village. Kokālika leaving them, turned back and said to the people, “Lay brethren, you are like brute animals. Here the two chief disciples have been dwelling for three months in the monastery opposite, and you knew nothing of it: now they are gone.” “Why did you not tell us, sir?” the people asked.

Then they took ghee and oil and medicines, raiment and clothes, and approached the elders, saluting them and saying: “Pardon us, sirs we knew not you were the chief disciples, we have learned it but today by the words of the venerable monk Kokālika. Pray have compassion on us, and receive these medicines and clothes.” Kokālika went after the elders with them, for he thought: “The elders are frugal, and content with little; they will not accept these things, and then they will be given to me.” But the elders, because the gift was offered at the instigation of a monk, neither accepted the things themselves nor had them given to Kokālika. The lay folk then said: “Sirs, if you will not accept these, come here once again to bless us.” The elders promised, and proceeded to the Teacher’s presence.

Now Kokālika was angry, because the elders neither accepted those things themselves, nor had them given to him. The elders, however, having remained a short while with the Teacher, each chose five hundred monks as their following, and with these thousand monks went on pilgrimage seeking alms, as far as Kokālika’s country. The lay folk came out to meet them, and led them to the same monastery, and showed them great honour day by day. {4.244}

Great was the store given them of clothes and of medicines. Those monks who went out with the elders dividing the garments gave of them to all the monks which had come, but to Kokālika gave none, neither did the elders give him any. Getting no clothes Kokālika began to abuse and revile the elders, “Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire; they would not accept before what was offered them, but these things they do accept. There is no satisfying them, they have no regard for another.” But the elders, perceiving that the man was harbouring evil on their account, set out with their followers to depart; nor would they return, not though the people begged them to stay yet a few days longer.

Then a young monk said: “Where shall the elders stay, laymen? Your own particular elder does not wish them to stay here.” Then the people went to Kokālika, and said: “Sir, we are told you do not wish the elders to stay here. Go to! Either appease them and bring them back, or away with you and live elsewhere!” In fear of the people this man went and made his request to the elders. “Go back, monk,” answered the elders, “we will not return.” So he, being unable to prevail upon them, returned to the monastery. Then the lay brethren asked him whether the elders had returned. “I could not persuade them to return,” said he. “Why not, monk?” they asked. And then they began to think it must be no good monks would dwell there because the man did wrong, and they must get rid of him. “Sir,” they said, “do not stay here; we have nothing here for you.”

Thus dishonoured by them, he took bowl and robe and went to Jetavana. After saluting the Teacher, he said: “Sir, Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire, they are in the power of wicked desires!” The Teacher replied, “Say not so, Kokālika; let your heart, Kokālika, have confidence in Sāriputta and Moggallāna; learn that they are good monks.” Kokālika said: “You believe in your two chief disciples, sir; I have seen it with my own eyes; they have wicked desires, they have secrets within them, they are wicked men.” So he said thrice (though the Teacher would have stayed him), then rose from his seat, and departed. Even as he went on his way there arose over all his body boils of the size of a mustard seed, which grew and grew to the size of a ripe seed of the wood apple tree, burst, and blood ran all over him. Groaning he fell by the gate of Jetavana, maddened with pain.

A great cry arose, and reached even to the Brahmā Realm, “Kokālika has reviled the two chief disciples!” Then his spiritual teacher, the Brahmā Tudu by name, learning the fact, came with the intent of appeasing the elders, and said while poised in the air, “Kokālika, a cruel thing this you have done; make your peace with the chief disciples.” “Who are you, brother?” the man asked. “Tudu Brahmā, is my name,” said he. “Have you not been declared by the Fortunate

---

963 Aegle Marmelos. [Indian bael, or belli tree.]
One,” said the man, “one of those who return not?” That word means that such come not back to this earth. You will become a Yakkha upon a dunghill!” Thus he upbraided the Mahābrahmā. And as he could not persuade the man to do as he advised, he replied to him, “May you be tormented according to your own word.” Then he returned to his abode of bliss. And Kokālika after dying was born again in the Lotus Hell. That he had been born there the great and mighty Brahmā Sahampati told to the Tathāgata, and the Teacher told it to the monks.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks talked of the man’s wickedness, “Monks, they say Kokālika reviled Sāriputta and Moggallāna, and by the words of his own mouth came to the Lotus Hell.” The Teacher came in, and said he, “What speak you of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him. Then he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Kokālika was destroyed by his own word, and out of his own mouth was condemned to misery; it was the same before.” And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, his family priest was tawny-brown and had lost all his teeth. His wife did wrong with another brahmin. This man was just like the other. The family priest tried time and again to restrain his wife, but could not. Then he thought: “This my enemy I cannot kill with my own hands, but I must devise some plan to kill him.”

So he came before the king, and said: “O king, your city is the chief city of all Jambudīpa, and you are the leading king: but chief king though you are, your southern gate is unlucky, and ill put together.” “Well now, my teacher, what is to be done?” “You must bring good luck into it and set it right.” “What is to be done?” “We must pull down the old door, get new and lucky timbers, do sacrifice to the 966 Anāgāmi, those of the Third Path, who return not to be reborn on earth.

---

967 Not in Hardy’s list of the chief Hells (Manual, p. 26); but there were 136 of them. Burnouf gives it, Introductory p. 201.
968 Sahampati; the meaning of the first part is unknown [it means master of Sahā, his renowned wife]; he is the chief of the Brahmā Heaven, of which Tudu is an angel.
969 Pingalo is not a proper name; see p. 246. 6 (Pāli).
970 A full stop should be placed at va. As printed, this sentence is unintelligible.
The Section with Twelve Verses – 1828

beings that guard the city, and set up the new one on a lucky conjunction of the stars.” “So do, then,” said the king.

At that time, the Bodhisatta was a young man named Takkāriya, who was studying under this man.

Now the family priest caused the old gate to be pulled down, and the new was made ready; which done, he went and said to the king, “The gate is ready, my lord: tomorrow is an auspicious conjunction; before the morrow is over, we must do sacrifice and set up the new gate.” “Well, my teacher, and what is necessary for the rite?” “My lord, a great gate is possessed and guarded by great spirits. A brahmin, tawny-brown and toothless, of pure blood on both sides, must be killed; his flesh and blood must be offered in worship, and his body laid beneath, and the gate raised upon it. This will bring luck to you and your city.”

Very well, my teacher, have such a brahmin slain, and set up the gate upon him.”

The family priest was delighted. “Tomorrow,” said he, “I shall see the back of my enemy!” Full of energy he returned to his home, but could not keep a still tongue in his head, and said quickly to his wife, “Ah, you foul hag, whom will you have now to take your pleasure with? Tomorrow I shall kill your lover and make sacrifice of him!” “Why will you kill an innocent man?” “The king has commanded me to slay and sacrifice a tawny-brown brahmin, and to set up the city gate upon him. [4.156] Your lover is tawny-brown, and I mean to slay him for the sacrifice.” She sent her lover a message, saying: “They say the king wishes to slay a tawny-brown brahmin in sacrifice; if you would save your life, flee away in time, and with you all they who are like you.” So the man did: the news spread 971 Human sacrifice at the founding of a building, or the like, must have been common in ancient times, so persistent are the traditions about it. For India, see Crooke, Introduction to Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of North India, p. 237 and Index. When the Hooghly Bridge was built in Calcutta, I remember how it was commonly said by the natives that the builders had immured many young children in the foundations. For Greece it is attested by modern folk-songs such as the Bridge of Arta (Passow, Carm. Pop. Gr. no. 512), and one which I lately wrote down in Cos from oral tradition (published in Folk-Lore for 1899). The sacrifice is meant to propitiate the spirits disturbed by the digging. See Robertson Smith, Religion of the Semites, p. 158.

---

abroad in the city, and all those in the whole city who were tawny-brown fled away.

The family priest, nothing aware of his enemy’s flight, went early next morning to the king, and said: “My lord, in such a place is a tawny-brown brahmin to be found; have him taken.” The king sent some men for him, but they saw none, and returning informed the king that he was fled away. “Search elsewhere,” said the king. All over the city they searched, but found none. “Search quickly!” said the king. “My lord,” they replied, “except for your family priest there is no such other.” “A family priest,” said he, “cannot be killed.” “What do you say, my lord? According to the family priest, if the gate is not set up today, the city will be in danger. When the family priest explained the matter, he said that if we let this day go by, the auspicious moment will not come again until the end of a year. The city without a gate for a year, what a chance for our enemies! Let us kill someone, and sacrifice by the aid of some other wise brahmin, and set up the gate.” “But is there another wise brahmin like my teacher?” “There is, my lord, his pupil, a young man named Takkāriya; make him your family priest and do the lucky ceremony.” The king sent for him, and did honour to him, and made him family priest, and commanded to do as had been said.

The young man went to the gate with a great crowd following. In the king’s name they bound and brought the family priest. The Great Being caused a pit to be dug in the place where the gate was to be set up, and a tent to be placed over it, and with his teacher entered into the tent. The teacher beholding the pit, and seeing no escape, said to the Great Being, “My aim had succeeded. Fool that I was, I could not keep a still tongue, but hastily told that wicked woman. I have slain myself with my own weapon.” Then he recited the first verse:

1. “I spoke in folly, as a frog might call Upon snake in the forest: so I fall
Into this pit, Takkāriyā. How true,
Words spoken out of season one must rue!” {4.248}

Then the other addressing him, recited this verse:

---

972 The name here is feminine, as the commentator notes without explanation.
2. “The man who out of season speaks, will go
   Like this to ruin, lamentation, woe:
   Here you should blame yourself, now you must have
   This dug out pit, my teacher, for your grave.”

To these words he added yet this, “O teacher, not you only, but [4.157] many another likewise, has come to misery because he set not a watch upon his words.” So saying, he told him a story of the past to prove it.

In the past, they say, there lived a courtesan in Benares named Kālī, and she had a brother named Tuṇḍila. In one day Kālī would earn a thousand pieces of money. Now Tuṇḍila was a debauchee, a drunkard, a gambler; she gave him money, and whatever he got, he wasted. Do what she would to restrain him, restrain him she could not. One day he was beaten at hazard, and lost the very clothes he was clad in. Wrapping about him a rag of loin-cloth, he repaired to his sister’s house. But command had been given by her to her serving-maids, [4.249] that if Tuṇḍila should come, they were to give him nothing, but to take him by the throat and cast him out. And so they did: he stood by the threshold, and moaned.

Now a certain rich merchant’s son, who used constantly to give Kālī a thousand pieces of money, on that day happened to see him, and says he, “Why are you weeping, Tuṇḍila?” “Teacher,” said he, “I have been beaten at the dice, and came to my sister; and the serving-maids took me by the throat and cast me out.” “Well, stay here,” said the other, “and I will speak to your sister.” He entered the house, and said: “Your brother stands waiting, clad in a rag of loin-cloth. Why do you not give him something to wear?” “Indeed,” she replied, “I will give nothing. If you are fond of him, give it yourself.”

Now in that house of ill fame the fashion was this: out of every thousand pieces of money received, five hundred were for the woman, five hundred were the price of clothes, perfumes and garlands; the men who visited that house received garments to clothe themselves in, and stayed the night there, then on the next day they put off the garments they had received, and put on those they had brought, and went their ways. On this occasion the merchant’s son put on the garments provided for him, and gave his own clothes to Tuṇḍila. He put them on, and with loud shouts hastened to the tavern. But Kālī ordered her women that when the young man should depart next day, they should take away his clothes. Accordingly, when he came forth, they ran up from this side and that, like so many robbers, and took the clothes from him, and stripped him naked, saying: “Now, young sir, be off!” Thus they got rid of him. Away he went naked: the people made sport of him, and he was ashamed, and lamented, saying: “It is my own doing, because I could not keep watch over my lips!”

To make this clear, the Great Being recited the third verse:

3. “Why ask of Tuṇḍila how he should fare
   At Kālikā his sister’s hands? Now see!
   My clothes are gone, naked am I and bare;
   ’Tis monstrous like what happened late to you.” {4.250}

Another person relates this story:

By carelessness of the goat herds, [4.158] two rams fell fighting on a pasture at Benares. As they were hard at it, a certain fork-tail thought to himself, “These two will crack their horns and perish; I must restrain them.” So he tried to restrain them by calling out, “Uncle, don’t fight!” Not a word he got from them: in the midst of the battle, mounting first on the back, then on the head, he besought them to stop, but could do nothing. At last he cried, “Fight, then, but kill me first!” and placed himself between the two heads. They went on butting away at each other. The bird was crushed as by a pounder, and came to destruction by his own act. To explain this other tale the Great Being repeated the fourth verse:

4. “Between two fighting rams a fork-tail flew,
   Though in the fray he had no part nor share.
   The two rams’ heads did crush him then and there.
   He in his fate was monstrous like to you!”

Another:

There was a palm tree which the cowherds set great store by. The people of Benares seeing it sent a certain man up the tree to gather fruit. As he was throwing down the fruit, a black snake issuing forth from an anthill began to ascend the tree; they who stood below tried to drive him off by striking at him with sticks and other things, but could not. Then they called out to the other, “A snake is climbing the tree!” and he in terror uttered a loud cry. Those who stood below seized a stout cloth by the four corners, and bade him fall into the cloth. He let himself drop, and fell in the midst of the cloth between the four of them; swift as the wind he came, and the men could not hold him, [4.251] but knocked their four heads together and broke them, and so died. To explain this story the Great Being recited the fifth verse:

5. “Four men, to save a fellow from his fate,
Held the four corners of a cloth below.
They all fell dead, each with a broken pate.
These men were monstrous like to you, I know.”

Others again tell this:

Some goat-thieves who lived at Benares having stolen a female goat one night, determined to make a meal in the forest: to prevent her bleating they muffled her snout and tied her up in a bamboo clump. Next day, on their way to kill her, they forgot the chopper. “Now we’ll kill the goat, and cook her,” said they, “bring the chopper here!” But nobody had one. “Without a chopper,” they said, “we cannot eat the beast, even if we kill her: let her go! This is due to some merit of hers.” So they let her go. Now it happened that a worker in bamboos, who had been there for a bundle of them, left a basket-maker’s knife there hidden among the leaves, intending to use it when he came again. But the goat, thinking herself to be free, began playing about under the bamboo clump, and kicking with her hind legs made the knife drop. The thieves heard the sound of the falling knife, and on coming to [4.159] find out what it was, saw it, to their great delight; then they killed the goat, and ate her flesh.973 Thus to explain how this female goat was killed by her own act, the Great Being recited the sixth verse:

6. “A female goat, in a bamboo thicket bound,
Frisking about, herself a knife had found.
With that same knife they cut the creature’s throat.
It strikes me you are monstrous like that goat.” [4.252]

After recounting this, he explained, “But they who are moderate of speech, by watching their words have often been freed from the fate of death,” and then told a story of Kinnaras.

973 Zenobius, Prov. Cent. i. 27. So Suidas. [The original has a long quotation from Zenobius, which appears not to have been translated into English yet.]
A hunter, we are told, who lived in Benares, being once in the region of the Himālayas, by some means or other captured a couple of Kinnara who were husband and wife; and them he took and presented to the king. The king had never seen such beings before. “Hunter,” said he, “what kind of creatures are these?” Said the man, “My lord, these can sing with a honey-voice, they dance delightfully: no men are able to dance or sing as they can.” The king bestowed a great reward on the hunter, and commanded the Kinnara to sing and dance. But they thought: “If we are not able to convey the full sense of our song, the song will be a failure, they will abuse and hurt us; and then again, those who speak much speak falsely,” so for fear of some falsehood or other they neither sang nor danced, for all the king begged them again and again. At last the king grew angry, and said: “Kill these creatures, and cook them, and serve them up to me.” This command he delivered in the words of the seventh verse:

7. “No devas are these neither gandhabbas,\(^{974}\)
   Beasts brought by one who fain would fill his purse.
   So for my supper let them cook me one,
   And one for breakfast by the morrow’s sun.”

Then the Kinnarī thought to herself, “Now the king is angry; without doubt he will kill us. Now it is time to speak.” And immediately she recited a verse:

8. “A hundred thousand ditties all sung wrong
   All are not worth a tithe of one good song.
   To sing ill is a crime; and this is why
   (Not from folly) Kimpurisa\(^{975}\) would not try.” \[4.160\] \{4.253\}

The king, pleased with the Kinnarī, at once recited a verse:

\(^{974}\) gandhabbaputtā.

\(^{975}\) [It seems that Kinnara and Kimpurisa are equivalent terms, both here and elsewhere.]
9. “She that has spoken, let her go, that she
The Himālaya hill again may see,
But let them take and kill the other one,
And for tomorrow’s breakfast have him done.”

But the other Kinnara thought: “If I hold my tongue, surely the king will kill me; now is the time to speak,” and then he recited another verse:

10. “The kine depend upon the clouds,976 and men upon the kine,
And I, O king! Depend on you, on me this wife of mine.
Let one, before he seek the hills, the other’s fate divine.”

When he had said this, he repeated a couple of verses, to make it clear, that they had been silent not from unwillingness to obey the king’s word, but because they saw that speaking would be a mistake.

11. “O monarch! Other peoples, other ways:
’Tis very hard to keep you clear of blame. {4.254}
The very thing which for the one wins praise,
Another finds reproof for just the same.

12. Some one there is who each man foolish finds;977
Each by imagination different still;
All different, many men and many minds,
No universal law is one man’s will.”

Said the king, “He speaks the truth; ’tis a sapient Kinnara,” and much pleased he recited the last verse:

976 Because their food (grass etc.) depends on rain.
977 Reading paracitte: “everybody is foolish in some other man’s opinion.” In line 2, there may be a pun on citto (various): “all the world becomes different through the power of thought.”
13. “Silent they were, the Kimpurisa and his mate:
And he who now did utter speech for fear,
Unhurt, free, happy, let him go his gait.
This is the speech brings good, as oft we hear.”

Then the king placed the two Kinnara in a golden cage, and sending for the huntsman, made him set them free in the same place where he had caught them.

The Great Being added, “See, my teacher! In this manner the Kinnara kept watch on their words, and by speaking at the right time were set free for their well speaking; but you by your ill speaking have come to great misery.” Then after showing him this parallel, he comforted him, saying: “Fear not, my teacher; I will save your life.” “Is there indeed a way,” asked the other, “how you can save me?” He replied, “It is not yet the proper conjunction of the planets.” He let the day go by, and in [4.161] the middle watch of the night brought there a dead goat. “Go when you will, brahmin, and live,” said he, then let him go and never was a soul the wiser. And he did sacrifice with the flesh of the goat, and set up the gate upon it.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Kokālika was destroyed by his own words, but it was the same before,” after which he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Kokālika was the tawny-brown man, and I myself was the wise Takkāriya.”

Ja 482 Rurujātaka
The Story about (the King of) the Ruru Deer (13s)

Alternative Title: Rurumigarājajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are discussing the treachery of Devadatta, who denied owing anything to the Buddha. The Buddha told a story of a deer who saved the life of a man, and how he repaid him by treachery, leading the king to him, and how the king, hearing the deer’s story, declared safety for all deer, and asked the golden deer to teach Dhamma.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the Ruru deer (Rurumigarājā),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Devadatta = the merchant’s son (setṭhiputta).

Past Compare: Cp 16 Rurumigarājacariyā, Jm 26 Ruru.
Keywords: Treachery, Compassion, Animals.

“I bring you tidings.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. One might say to him, “The Teacher is most useful to you, friend Devadatta. You received holy orders from the Tathāgata, from him you learned the Three Baskets, you obtained gifts and honour.” When such things were said, it is credibly reported he would reply, “No, friend; the Teacher has done me no good, not so much as a blade of grass worth. Of myself I received holy orders, myself I learned the Three Baskets, by myself I gained gifts and honour.”

In the Dhamma Hall the monks talked of all this, “Ungrateful is Devadatta, my friend, and forgets a kindness done.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked of sitting there. They told him. Said he, “It is not now the first time, monks, that Devadatta is ungrateful, but he was ungrateful before; and in days long gone by his life was saved by me, yet he knew not the greatness of my merit.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a great merchant who possessed a fortune of eighty crores, had a son born to him; and he gave him the name of Mahādhanaka, or Great Moneyman. But never a thing he taught him; for said he, “My son will find study a weariness of the flesh.” Beyond singing and dancing, eating and feasting, the lad knew nothing. When he came of age, his parents provided him with a wife suitable for him, and afterwards died. After their death, the youth surrounded by profligates, drunkards, and dicers, {4.256} spent all his substance with all manner of waste and profusion. Then he borrowed money, and could not repay it, and was troubled by his creditors. At last he thought: “What is my life to me? In this one existence I am as it were already changed into another being; to die is better.” Whereupon he said to his creditors, “Bring your bills, and come here. I have a [4.162] family treasure laid up and buried on the bank of the Ganges, and you shall have that.” They went along with him. He made as though he were pointing out here and there the hiding place of his treasure (but all the while he intended to fall into the river and drown), and finally ran and threw himself into the Ganges. As the torrent bore him away, he cried aloud with a pitiful cry.

Now at that time the Great Being had been born as a deer, and having left the herd, was dwelling near a bend of the river all by himself, in a clump of Sāl trees mixed with fair-flowering mangoes: the skin of his body was of the colour of a gold plate well burnished, forefeet and hindfeet seemed as it were covered with lac, his tail like the tail of a wild ox, the horns of him were as spirals of silver, eyes had he like bright polished gems, when he turned his mouth in any direction it seemed like a ball of red cloth. About midnight he heard this sad outcry, and thought: “I hear the voice of a man. While I live let him not die! I will save his life for him.” Arising from off his resting place in the bush, he went down to the river bank, and called out in a comfortable voice, “Ho man! Have no fear, I will save you alive.” Then he cleft the current, and swam to him, and placed him upon his back, and bore him to the bank and to his own dwelling-place; where for two or three days he fed him with wild fruits. After this he said to the man, “O man, I will now convey you out of this wood, and set you in the road to Benares, and you shall go in peace. But I pray you, be not led away by greed of gain to tell the king or some great man, that in such a place a golden deer is to be found.” The man promised to observe his words; and the Great Being, having received his promise, took him upon his back and carried him to the road to Benares, and went his way.

On the day when he reached Benares, the queen consort, whose name was Khemā, saw at morning in a dream how a deer of golden colour preached the Dhamma to her; {4.257} and she thought: “If there were no such creature as this, I should not have seen him in my dream. Surely there must be such a one; I will announce it to the king.” Then she went to the king, and said: “Great king! I am anxious to hear the discourse of a golden deer. If I may, I shall live, but if not, there is no living for me.” The king comforted her, saying: “If such a creature exists in the world of men, you shall have it.” Then he sent for the brahmins, and put the question, “Are there such things as gold-coloured deer?” “Yes, there are, my lord.” The king laid upon the back of an elephant richly caparisoned a purse of a thousand pieces of money enclosed within a casket of gold: whoso should bring word of a golden deer, the king was willing to give him the purse with a thousand pieces, [4.163] the casket of gold, and that elephant withal or a better. He caused a verse to be engraved upon a tablet of gold, and delivered this to one of his court, bidding him 978 Read phalāphalāni.

---

cry the verse in his name among all the townsfolk. Then he recited that verse which comes first in this Jātaka:

1. “Who brings me tidings of that deer, choicest of all the breed?
Fair women and a choice village who wins him for his meed?”

The courtier took the golden plate, and caused it to be proclaimed throughout all the city. Just then this young merchant’s son was entering Benares; and on hearing the proclamation, he approached the courtier, and said: “I can bring the king news of such a deer; take me into his presence.” The courtier dismounted from his elephant, and led him before the king, saying: “This man, my lord, says he can tell you tidings of the deer.” Said the king, “Is this true, man?” He answered, “It is true, O great king! You shall give me that honour.” And he recited the second verse:

2. “I bring you tidings of that deer, choicest of all the breed:
Fair women and a village choice then give me for my meed.”

The king was glad when he heard these words of the treacherous friend. “Come now,” said he, “where is this deer to be found?” “In such a place, my lord,” he replied, and declared the way they should go. With a great following he made the traitor guide him to the place, and then he said, {4.258} “Order the army to halt.” When the army was brought to a halt, he went on, pointing with his hand, “There is the golden deer, in that place yonder,” and he repeated the third verse:

3. “Within that clump of flowering Sāl and mango, where the ground
Is all as red as cochineal, this deer is to be found.”

When the king heard these words, he said to his courtiers, “Suffer not the deer to escape, but with all speed set a circle about the grove, the men with their weapons in hand.” They did so, and made an outcry. The king with a certain number of others was standing apart, and this man also stood not far off. The Great Being heard the sound, and he thought: “It is the sound of a great host, therefore I must beware of them.” He rose, and spying at all the company perceived the place where the king stood. “Where the king stands,” he thought: “I shall be safe, and 979 Reading purisabhayena, or omitting me (with this it would be “I must beware of that man”).

---

there I must go,” and he ran towards the king. When the king saw him coming, he said: “A creature strong as an elephant would throw down everything in its path. I will put arrow to string and frighten the beast; if he is for running I will shoot him and make him weak, that I may take him.” Then stringing his bow, he stood facing the Bodhisatta. [4.164]

To explain this matter, the Teacher repeated a couple of verses:

4. “Forward he went: the bow was bent, the arrow on the string; When thus from far the deer called out, as he beheld the king:

5. ‘O lord of charioteers, great king, stand still! And do not wound: Who brought the news to you, that here this deer was to be found?’” [4.259]

The king was enchanted with his honey-voice; he let fall his bow, and stood still in reverence. And the Great Being came up to the king, and talked pleasantly with him, standing on one side. All the host also dropped their weapons, and came up and surrounded the king. At that moment the Great Being asked his question of the king with a sweet voice (it was like one tinkling a golden bell), “Who brought the news to you, that here this deer was to be found?” Just then the wicked man came closer, and stood within hearing. The king pointed him out, saying: “There is he that informed me,” and recited the sixth verse:

6. “That sinful man, my worthy friend, that yonder stands his ground, He brought the news to me, that here the deer was to be found.”

On hearing this, the Great Being rebuked his treacherous friend, and addressing the king recited the seventh verse:

7. “Upon the earth are many men, of whom the proverb’s true: ’Twere better save a drowning log than such a one as you.” [481]

When he heard this, the king repeated another verse:

---

980 This line is almost identical with iii. 274. 12 (p. 174, line 12 of this translation).
981 These lines are found in vol. i. p. 326. 8 (i. 180 of this translation).
8. “Who is it you would blame in this, O deer?
   Is it some man, or is it beast or bird? [4.260]
   I am possessed with an unbounded fear
   At this your human speech which late I hear.”

Hereupon the Great Being replied, “O great king, I blame no beast and I blame no bird, but a man,” to explain which he repeated the ninth verse:

9. “I saved him once, when like to drown
   On the swift swelling tide that bore him down:
   And now I am in danger through it.
   Go with the wicked, and be sure you’ll rue it.”

The king when he heard this was angry with the man. “What?” said he, “not to recognise his merit after such a good service! I will shoot him and kill him!” He then repeated the tenth verse:

10. “This four-winged flyer I’ll let fly,
    And pierce him to the heart! So let him perish,
    The evil-doer in his treachery,
    Who for such kindness done no thanks did cherish!” [4.165]

Then the Great Being thought: “I would not have him perish on my account,” and uttered the eleventh verse: [4.261]

11. “Shame on the fool, O king, indeed!
    But no good men approve a killing;
    Let the wretch go, and give his meed,
    All that you promised him fulfilling;
    And I will serve you at your need.”

The king was very glad to hear this, and lauding him, uttered the next verse:

12. “Surely this deer is good indeed,
    To pay back ill for ill unwilling.
    Let the wretch go! I give his meed,
    All that I promised him fulfilling.
    And you go where you will – good speed!”

At this the Great Being said: “O mighty king, men say one thing with their lips, and do another,” to expound which matter he recited two verses:
13. “The cry of jackals and of birds is understood with ease; Yea, but the word of men, O king, is harder far than these.

14. A man may think, ‘This is my friend, my comrade, of my kin;’ But friendship goes, and often hate and enmity begin.”

When the king heard these words, he answered, “O king of the deer! Do not suppose that I am one of that kind; for I will not deny the boon I have promised you, not even if I lose my kingdom for it. {4.262} Trust me.” And he gave him choice of a boon. The Great Being accepted this boon at his hands, and chose this: That all creatures, beginning with himself, should be free from danger. This boon the king granted, and then took him back to the city of Benares, and having adorned and decorated the city, and the Great Being also, caused him to discourse to the queen his wife. The Great Being discourse to the queen, and afterwards to the king and all his court, in a human voice sweet as honey; he admonished the king to hold fast by the Ten Royal Virtues, and he comforted the great multitude, and then returned to the woodland, where he dwelt among a herd of deer.

The king sent a drum beating about the city, with this proclamation, “I give protection to all creatures!” From that time onwards no one did so much as raise hand against beast or bird.

Herds of deer devoured the crops of mankind, and no one was able to drive them away. A crowd assembled in the king’s courtyard, and complained. [4.166]

To make this clear, the Teacher repeated the following verse:

15. “The country-folk and townsfolk all straight to the king they went: The deer are eating up our crops: this let the king prevent!”

Hearing this, the king recited a couple of verses:

16. “Be it the people’s wish or no, e’en if my kingdom cease, I cannot wrong the deer, to whom I promised life and peace.

982 These lines have been used before: pages 135 and 141.
17. The people may desert me all, my royal power may die,
The boon I gave that royal deer I never will deny.”

The people listened to the king’s words, and finding themselves unable to say anything, departed. This saying was spread abroad. The Great Being heard of it, and assembling all the deer, laid his bidding on them, “From this time forward you must not devour the crops of men.” {4.263} He then sent a message to men, that each should set up a placard on his own lands. The men did so; and at that sign even to this day the deer do not devour the crops.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has been ungrateful,” and then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time, Devadatta was the merchant’s son, Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the deer.”

Ja 483 Sarabhamigajātaka

The Story about the Sarabha Deer (13s)

In the present the Buddha gives a teaching that only Ven. Sāriputta can answer. The Buddha tells a story of how a stag rescued a king who was chasing him, and one morning spoke verses about it to himself. His advisor hearing these verses understood all that had unfolded.

The Bodhisatta = the Sarabha deer (Sarabhamiga),
Sāriputta = the family priest (purohita),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga,
Quoted at: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha, Present Compare: Dhp-a VII.10 Aññatara-ittthi, Past Compare: Jm 25 Śarabha.

Keywords: Gratitude, Mercy, Devas, Animals.

“Toil on, O man.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, to explain fully a question concisely put by himself to the Captain of the Dhamma.

---

983 cf. Ja 513.
At that time the Teacher put a question concisely to that elder. This is the full story, put briefly, of the descent from the world of gods. When the venerable Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja had by his Supernormal Powers gained the sandalwood bowl in the presence of the great merchant of Rājagaha, the Teacher forbade the monks to use their miraculous Supernormal Powers. [4.167]

Then the schismatics thought: “The ascetic Gotama has forbidden the use of miraculous Supernormal Powers: now he will do no miracle himself.” Their disciples were disturbed, and said to the schismatics, “Why didn’t you take the bowl by your Supernormal Powers?” They replied, “This is no hard thing for us, friend. But we think, ‘Who will display before the laity his own fine and subtle powers for the sake of a paltry wooden bowl?’ and so we did not take it. The ascetics of the Sakya class took it, and showed their Supernormal Powers for sheer foolish greed. Do not imagine it is any trouble to us to work miracles. Suppose we leave out of consideration the disciples of Gotama the ascetic: if we like, we too will show our Supernormal Powers with the ascetic Gotama himself: if the ascetic Gotama works one miracle, we will work one twice as good.”

The monks who heard this told the Fortunate One of it, “Sir, the schismatics say they will work a miracle.” Said the Teacher, “Let them do it, monks; I will do the like.” Bimbisāra, hearing this, went and asked the Fortunate One, “Will you work a miracle, sir?” “Yes, O king.” “Was there not a command given on this matter, sir?” “The command, O king, was given to my disciples; there is no command which can rule the Buddhas. (4.264) When the flowers and fruit in your park are forbidden to others, the same rule does not apply to you.” “Then where will you work this miracle, sir?” “At Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” “What have I to do, then?” “Nothing, sire.”

Next day, after breaking his fast, the Teacher went to seek alms. “Whither goes the Teacher?” asked the people. The monks answered to them, “At the gate of the 984 The story is told in Cullavagga, v. 8 (Vinaya Texts, iii. p. 78, in the Sacred Books of the East). The setṭhi had placed a sandalwood bowl on a high pole, and challenged any holy person to get it down. Piṇḍola rose in the air by magic power and took it. For this he was blamed by the Master, as having used his great gift for an unworthy end.

---

985 Reading vāritaṁ.
city of Sāvatthi, beneath Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, he is to work a twofold miracle to the confounding of the schismatics.” The crowd said: “This miracle will be what they call a masterpiece; we will go see it,” leaving the doors of their houses, they went along with the Teacher. Some of the schismatics also followed the Teacher, with their disciples, “We too,” they said, “will work a miracle, in the place where the ascetic Gotama shall work his.”

By and by the Teacher arrived at Sāvatthi. The king asked him, “Is it true, sir, you are about to work a miracle, as they say?” “Yes, it is true,” he said. “When?” asked the king. “On the seventh day from now, at the full moon of the month of July.” “Shall I set up a pavilion, sir?” “Peace, great king: in the place where I shall work my miracle Sakka will set up a pavilion of jewels twelve leagues in compass.” “Shall I proclaim this thing through the city, sir?” “Proclaim it, O king.” The king sent forth the announcer of the Dhamma on an elephant richly caparisoned, to proclaim thus, “News! The Teacher is about to perform a miracle, for the confounding of the schismatics, at the Gate of Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, seven days from now!” Each day was this proclamation made. When the schismatics heard this news, that the miracle will be done under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, they had all the mango trees near to Sāvatthi cut down, paying the owners for them.

On the night of the full moon the announcer of the Dhamma made proclamation, “This day in the morning the miracle will take place.” By the power of the gods it was as though all Jambudīpa was at the door and heard the proclamation; whosoever had it in his heart to go, they all betook themselves to Sāvatthi: for twelve leagues the crowd extended.

Early in the morning the Teacher went on his rounds seeking alms. The king’s gardener, Gaṇḍa by name, was just taking to the king a fine ripe mango fruit; thoroughly ripe, big as a bushel, when he espied the Teacher at the city gate. “This fruit is worthy of the Tathāgata,” said he, and gave it to him. The Teacher took it, and sitting down then and there on one side, ate the fruit. When it was eaten, he said: “Ānanda, give the gardener this stone to plant here on the spot; \(4.265\) this shall be Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” The elder did so.

The gardener dug a hole in the earth, and planted it. On the [4.168] instant the stone burst, roots sprouted forth, up sprang a red shoot tall as a plough-pole; even as the crowd stared it grew into a mango tree of a hundred cubits, with a trunk fifty cubits and branches of fifty cubits in height; at the same time flowers bloomed, fruit ripened; the tree stood filling the sky, covered with bees, laden with golden fruit; when the wind blew on it, sweet fruits fell; then the monks came up and ate of the fruit, and retired.

In the evening time the King of the Devas, reflecting, perceived that it was a task laid on him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things. So he sent the Devaputta Vissakamma, and caused him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things, twelve leagues in compass, covered all over with blue lotus. Thus the gods of ten thousand spheres were gathered together. The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha’s seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha’s seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, \(987\) and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the Rains Retreat under the great Coral Tree, \(988\) seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.

The people knew not the place whither the Teacher had gone; they looked, and said: “Let us go home,” and lived in that place during the rainy season. When the rainy season was near to its end, and the feast was at hand, the great elder Moggallāna went and announced it to the Fortunate One. Thereupon the Teacher asked him, “Where is Sāriputta now?” “He, sir, after the miracle which delighted him, remained with five hundred monks in the city of Saṅkassa, and is there still.”

---

\(987\) Mount Meru or Sineru, the Indian Olympus, is surrounded by seven concentric circles of hills, the innermost of which is Yugandhara.

\(988\) The tree named is the Erythmia Indica; a great one grew in Indra’s heaven.
“Moggallāna, on the seventh day from now I shall descend by the gate of Saṅkassa. Let those who desire to behold the Tathāgata assemble in the city of Saṅkassa.” The elder assented, went and told the people: the whole company he transported from Sāvatthi to Saṅkassa, a distance of thirty leagues, in the twinkling of an eye.

The Rains Retreat over, and the Invitation celebrated, the Teacher told king Sakka that he was about to return to the world of men. Then Sakka sent for Vissakamma, and said to him, “Make a stairway for the One with Ten Powers to descend into the world of men.” He placed the head of the stairway upon the peak of Sineru, and the foot of it by the gate of Saṅkassa, and between he made three stairways side by side: one of gems, one of silver, and one of gold: the balustrade and cornice were of the seven things of price. The Teacher, having performed a miracle for the world’s emancipation, descended by the midmost stair made out of gems. Sakka carried the bowl and robe, Suyāma a yak’s-tail fan, Brahmā, the lord of all beings bore a sunshade, and the deities of the ten thousand spheres worshipped with divine garlands and perfumes. When the Teacher stood at the foot of the staircase, first elder Sāriputta gave him greeting, afterwards the rest of the company.

Amidst this assembly the Teacher thought: “Moggallāna has been shown to possess supernatural power, Upāli as one who is versed in the sacred law, but the quality of high wisdom possessed by Sāriputta has not been shown. Save and except me, no other possesses wisdom so full and complete as his; I will make known the quality of his wisdom.” First of all he asked a question which is put to ordinary persons [puthujjana], and the ordinary persons answered it. Then he asked a question within the scope of those of the First Path, and this they of the First Path answered, but the ordinary folk knew nought of it. In the same way he asked questions in turn within the scope of those of the Second and Third Paths, of the Arahats, of the chief disciples; and in each case those who were below each grade in turn were unable to answer, but they who were above could answer. Then he put a question within the power of Sāriputta, and this the elder could answer, but the others not so. The people asked, “Who is this elder who answered the Teacher?” They were told, it was the Captain of the Dhamma, and Sāriputta was his name. “Ah, great is his wisdom!” they said. Ever afterwards the quality of the elder’s great wisdom was known to men and to gods. Then the Teacher said to him,
“Some have probations yet to pass, and some have reached the goal:
Their different behaviours say, for you do know the whole.”

Having thus asked a question which comes within a Buddha’s scope, he added, “Here is a point put with brevity, Sāriputta; what is the meaning of the matter in all its bearings?” The elder considered the problem. He thought: “The Teacher asks of the proper behaviour with which the monks attain progress, both those who are in the lower Paths and those who are Arahats?” As to the general question, he had no doubt. But then he considered, “The proper manner of behaviour may be described in many ways of speaking according to the essential elements of being, and so forth from that beginning; now in what fashion can I hit the Teacher’s meaning?” He was doubtful about the meaning. The Teacher thought: “Sāriputta has no doubt of the general question, but doubts what particular side of it I have in view. If I give no clue, he will never be able to answer, so a clue {4.267} I will give him.” This clue he gave by saying: “See here, Sāriputta: you grant this to be true?” (mentioning some point). Sāriputta granted the point.

The hint thus given, he knew that Sāriputta had taken his meaning, and would answer fully, starting from the very elements of being. Then the question stood out clear before the elder, as with a hundred hints, nay, a thousand; and he, at the Teacher’s hint given, answered the question which belonged to a Buddha’s scope.

The Teacher declared the Dhamma to this company which covered twelve leagues of ground: thirty crores of beings drank of the waters of life.

The company was dismissed, and the Teacher, going on pilgrimage for alms, came by and by to Sāvatthi. Next day, after seeking alms in Sāvatthi, he came back from his rounds, and told the monks of their duty, and entered his Perfumed Chamber. At evening time, the monks talked of the high worth of the elder as they sat in the Dhamma Hall. “Great in wisdom, sirs, is Sāriputta; he has wisdom wide, wisdom swift, wisdom sharp, wisdom keen. The One of Ten Powers put a question in brief, and he answered it fully at large.” The Teacher entered and asked what they talked about as they sat there. They told him. “This is not the first time, monks,”

---

989 Saṅkhata dhamma seems to mean an arahā or asekha. [Snp 5.1, Ajitamāṇavapucchā.]

990 The five khandhas.
said he, “that he answered at large a question briefly put, but he has done so before,” and he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta lived in the forest, having been born as a stag. Now the king much delighted in hunting, and a mighty man was he: he reckoned no other man worthy of the name of man. One day as he went hunting he said to his courtiers, “Whoever lets a deer go by him, such and such shall be his punishment.” They thought: “One may stand in the house and not find the granary. When a deer is put up, by hook or by crook we must drive him to the place where the king is.” They made a pact among them to this effect, and posted the king at the end of the path.

Then they surrounded a great covert and began to beat on the ground with cudgels and the like. The first to be put up was our stag. Thrice he went round the thicket, looking for a chance of escape: on all other sides he saw men standing without a break, arm jostling arm and bow jostling bow; only where the king was could he see a chance. With eyes glaring, he rushed at the king, dazzling him as though he cast sand in his eyes. Quickly the king saw him, shot an arrow, and missed. You must know these deer are clever to keep clear of arrows. When the shafts come straight at them, the deer stand still and let them fly; let them come from behind, the deer outfly them faster; if they fall from above, they bend the back; from the side, they swerve a little; if the shafts are aimed at the belly, they roll right over, and when they have gone by, off go the deer swift as a cloud which the wind scatters.

Thus the king, when he saw this stag roll over, thought he was hit and gave up a shout. Up rose the stag, swift as the wind he was off, breaking the circle of men. The courtiers on both sides who saw the stag get away collected together, and asked, “Whose post did the stag make for?” “The king’s!” “But the king is shouting, I’ve hit him! What has he hit? Our king has missed, I tell you! He has hit the ground!” Thus they made sport of the king, and no stint. “These fellows are laughing at me,” thought the king, “they know not my measure.” Then girding up his loins, on foot, and sword in hand, he set off at speed crying, “I will catch the 991 Doubtless a proverb: one may miss the most obvious things.

---

stag!" He kept him in sight and chased him for three leagues. The stag plunged into the forest, in plunged the king also.

Now in the stag’s way was a pit, a great hole where a tree had rotted away, sixty cubits deep, and full of water to a depth of thirty cubits, yet covered over with weeds. The stag sniffed the smell of the water, and perceiving that it was a pit, swerved aside somewhat from his course. But the king went straight on, and fell in. The stag, no longer hearing the sound of his footsteps, turned about; and seeing no man, understood that he must have fallen into the pit. So he went and looked, and saw him in dire straits, struggling in the deep water; for the evil he had done the stag bore no malice, but pitifully thought: “Let not the king perish before my eyes: I will set him free from this distress.”

Standing upon the edge of the pit, he cried out, “Fear nothing, O king, for I will deliver you from your distress.” Then with an effort, as earnest as though he would save his own beloved son, he supported himself upon the rock; and that king who had come after to slay him, he drew up from out of the pit, sixty cubits in depth, and comforted him, and set him upon his own back, and led him forth from the forest, and set him down not far from his army. Then he admonished the king, and established him in the five precepts. But the king could not leave the Great Being, but said to him, “My lord king of the stags, come with me to Benares, for I give you the lordship over Benares, a city that spreads over twelve leagues, that you may rule over it.” But he said: “Great king, I am one of the animals, and I want no kingdom. If you have any care for me, keep the good precepts I have taught you, and teach your subjects to keep them too.” With this advice, he returned into the forest. And the king returned to his army, and as he remembered the noble qualities of the stag his eyes filled with tears. Surrounded by a division of his army, he went through the city, while the drum of the Dhamma was beat, and caused this proclamation to be made, “From this day forward, let all the dwellers in this city observe the five precepts.”

But he told no one of the kindness done to him by the Great Being. After eating many choice meats, in the evening time, he reclined upon his gorgeous couch, and at daybreak remembering the noble qualities of the Great Being, he rose up and sat on the couch cross-legged, and with heart full of joy uttered these exalted utterances in six verses:
1. “Hope on O man, if you be wise, nor let your courage tire:
Myself I see, who now have won the goal of my desire.”
992

2. Hope on O man, if you be wise, tire not though harassed sore:
Myself I see, who from the waves have fought my way ashore.
993

3. Toil on O man, if you be wise, nor let your courage tire:
Myself I see, who now have won the goal of my desire.

4. Toil on O man, if you be wise, tire not though harassed sore:
Myself I see, who from the waves have fought my way ashore.

5. He that is wise, though overcome with pain,
Would never cease to hope for bliss again. {4.270}
Many are men’s feelings, both of joy and woe:
They think not of it, yet to death they go.

6. That comes to pass which is not thought; and that is thought of, fails:
For man or woman’s happiness not thought alone avails.”

As the king was in the act of uttering these exalted utterances, the sun uprose. His family priest had come thus early to enquire after the king’s welfare, and as he stood at the door he heard the sound of this exalted utterance, and thought to himself, “Yesterday the king went hunting. Doubtless he missed the stag, and being derided by his courtiers declared that he would catch and kill the quarry himself. Then no doubt he chased him, being pricked in his pride as a warrior, and fell into a sixty-cubit pit; and the merciful stag must have pulled him out without a thought of the king’s offence against him. That is why the king is chanting this exalted utterance, I think.”

Thus the brahmin heard every word of the king’s exalted utterance; and that which [4.172] fell out betwixt the king and the stag became clear as a face reflected in a well-polished mirror. He knocked at the door with his finger-tips. “Who is there?” the king asked. “It is I, my lord, your family priest.” “Come in, teacher,” said the king, and opened the door. He entered, and prayed victory for the king, 992 The same verse has occurred already in vol. i. p. 267 (i. 133 of this translation). The first line is found also in i. 450 (translation i. 274).

---

993 The same verse in i. 268 (translation i. 133).
and stood on one side. Then he said: “O great king! I know what happened to you in the forest. As you chased a stag you fell into a pit, and the stag resting upon the stone sides of the pit, drew you out of it. So you remembering his magnanimity uttered this exalted utterance.” Then he recited two verses:

7. “The stag that on a mountain steep your quarry was of late,
   He bravely gave you life, for he was free from greed and hate.

8. Out of the horrid pit, out of death’s jaws,
   Leaning upon a rock (a friend-at need)
   The great stag saved you: so you say with cause,
   His mind is far aloof from hate or greed.”

“What!” thought the king, on hearing this, “the man did not go hunting with me, yet he knows the whole matter! How can he know it? I will ask him,” and he repeated the ninth verse:

9. “O brahmin! Were you there upon that day?
   Or from some other witness did you hear?
   The veil of passion you have rolled away:
   You see all: your wisdom makes me fear.”

But the brahmin said: “I am no Buddha all-knowing; only I overheard the hymn that you sang, without missing the meaning, and so the fact became clear before me.” To explain which he repeated the tenth verse:

10. “O lord of men! I neither heard that thing,
    Nor was I there to see that day: {4.272}
    But from the verses you did sweetly sing
    Wise men can gather how the matter lay.”

The king was delighted, and gave him a rich present. From thenceforward the king was devoted to generosity and good deeds, and his people being also devoted to good deeds as they died went to swell the hosts of heaven.

---

994 This may mean “first trying his strength with a stone,” as vol. v. pp. 68 and 70. So p. 170 above.
Now one day it happened that the king went into his park with the family priest to shoot at a mark. At that period Sakka had been pondering whence came all the new Devas and Devakaññā, whom he beheld so numerous about him. Pondering, he perceived the whole story: how the king had been rescued from the pit by that stag, and how he had been established in virtue, and how by the power of this king, multitudes did good deeds and heaven was being filled; and now the king had gone into his park to shoot at a mark. Then he also went there, that with the voice of a lion he might proclaim the nobleness of the stag, and make known that he himself was Sakka, and poised in the air might discourse on the Dhamma, and declare the goodness of mercy and the five precepts, and then return. Now the king intending to shoot at his mark, strung a bow and fitted an arrow to the string. At that moment Sakka by his power made the stag to appear betwixt the king and the mark; the king seeing it did not let fly. Then Sakka, entering into the body of the family priest, repeated by him to the king the following verse:

11. “Your shaft is death to many a mighty thing:
Why do you hold it quiet on the string?
Let the shaft fly and kill the stag forthwith:
’Tis meat for monarchs, O most sapient king!” {4.273}

Thereto the king answered in a verse:

12. “I know it, brahmin, no less sure than you:
The stag is meat for warrior men, I vow,
But I am grateful for a service done,
And therefore hold my hand from killing now.”

Then Sakka repeated a couple of verses:

13. “’Tis no stag, O mighty monarch! But an Asura is this thing,
You are king of men; but kill it – of the gods you shall be king.
14. But if you hesitate, O valiant king!
To kill the stag, because he is your friend:
To death’s cold river⁹⁹⁵ and to death’s dread king⁹⁹⁶
You and your wife and children shall descend.”

At this the king repeated two verses:

15. “So be it: to death’s river and death’s king
Send me, my wives and children, all my train
Of friends and comrades; I’ll not do this thing,
And by my hand this stag shall not be slain. {4.274}

16. Once in a grisly forest full of dread
That very stag saved me from hopeless woe.
How can I wish my benefactor dead
After such service done me long ago?”

Then Sakka came forth from the family priest’s body, and put on his own shape, and poised in the air recited a couple of verses which showed forth the noble worth of the king:

17. “Live long on earth, O true and faithful friend!
Comfort with truth and goodness this domain;
Then hosts of maidens round you shall attend
While you as Sakka⁹⁹⁷ mid the gods shall reign.

---

⁹⁹⁵ Vetarani.
⁹⁹⁶ Yama.
⁹⁹⁷ Vāsava.
18. From passion free, with ever-peaceful heart,
When strangers crave, supply their weary need;
As power is given you, give, and play your part,⁹⁹⁸
Blameless, till heaven shall be your final meed.” [4.174] {4.275}

Thus saying, Sakka, King of the Devas, continued as follows, “I came here to try you, O king, and you have given me no hold. Only be vigilant.” And with this advice he returned to his own place.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Sāriputta knew in detail what was said only in general terms; but the same thing happened before.” Then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, Sāriputta was the family priest, and I myself the stag.”

---

Book XIV. Pakiṇṇakanipāta
The Section with a Miscellaneous Amount of Verses (484-496)

Ja 484 Sālikedārajātaka
The Story about the Rice Field (Pak)

In the present one monk supports his parents who have fallen into poverty and have no one left at home to support them. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of a parrot who first fed his children and his parents, and then all those in need; and how his captor set him free when he heard of his good deeds.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the parrots (suvarājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the parrot’s followers (suvagaṇā),
Ānanda = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Channa = the guardian of the fields (khettapāla),
members of the royal family = the mother and father (mātāpitaro).

Present Source: Ja 540 Sāma,
Quoted at: Ja 164 Gijjha, Ja 398 Sutano, Ja 399 Gijjha, Ja 455 Mātiposaka, Ja 484 Sālikedāra, Ja 513 Jayaddisa, Ja 532 Sonananda.

Keywords: Filial piety, Gratitude, Duty, Animals, Birds.

“The crop of rice.” [4.175] [4.276] This was a story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a monk who supported his mother. The occasion will be explained in the Sāmaṇḍakā [Ja 540].

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain monk who supported his mother. They say that there was a wealthy merchant at Sāvatthi, who was worth eighteen crores; and he had a son who was very dear and winning to his father and mother. One day the youth went upon the terrace of the house, and opened a window and looked down on the street; and when he saw the great crowd going to Jetavana with perfumes and garlands in their hands to hear the Dhamma preached, he exclaimed that he would go too.

So having ordered perfumes and garlands to be brought, he went to the monastery, and having distributed robes, medicines, drinks, etc. to the assembly and honoured the Fortunate One with perfumes and garlands, he sat down on one side. After hearing the Dhamma, and perceiving the evil consequences of desire and the blessings arising from adopting the ascetic life, when the assembly broke up he asked the Fortunate One for ordination, but he was told that the Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone who has not obtained the permission of his parents; so he went away, and lived a week without food, and having at last obtained his parents’ consent, he returned and begged for ordination. The Teacher sent a monk who ordained him; and after he was ordained he obtained great honour and gain; he won the favour of his teachers and preceptors, and having received full orders he mastered the Dhamma in five years.

Then he thought to himself, “I live here distracted – it is not suitable for me,” and he became anxious to reach the goal of insight; so having obtained instruction in meditation from his teacher, he departed to a frontier village and dwelt in the forest, and there having entered a course of insight, however much he laboured and strove for twelve years, he failed to attain any special insight.

His parents also, as time went on, became poor, for those who hired their land or carried on merchandise for them, finding out that there was no son or brother in the family to enforce the payment, seized what they could lay their hands upon and ran away as they pleased, and the servants and labourers in the house seized the gold and coin and made off therewith, so that at the end the two were reduced to an evil plight and had not even a jug for pouring water; and at last they sold their dwelling, and finding themselves homeless, and in extreme misery, they wandered begging for alms, clothed in rags and carrying potsherds in their hands.

Now at that time a monk came from Jetavana to the son’s place of abode; he performed the duties of hospitality and, as he sat quietly, he first asked whence he was come; and learning that he was come from Jetavana he asked after the health of the Teacher and the principal disciples and then asked for news of his parents, “Tell me, sir, about the welfare of such and such a merchant’s family in Sāvatthi.” “O friend, don’t ask for news of that family.” “Why not, sir?” “They say that there was one son in that family, but he has become an ascetic in this dispensation, and since he left the world that family has gone to ruin; and at the present time the two old people are reduced to a most lamentable state and beg for alms.”
When he heard the other’s words he could not remain unmoved, but began to weep with his eyes full of tears, and when the other asked him why he wept, “O sir,” he replied, “they are my own father and mother, I am their son.” “O friend, your father and mother have come to ruin through you – do you go and take care of them.” “For twelve years,” he thought to himself, “I have laboured and striven but never been able to attain the Path or the Fruit: I must be incompetent; what have I to do with the ascetic life? I will become a householder and will support my parents and give away my wealth, and will thus eventually become destined for heaven.”

So having determined he gave up his abode in the forest to the elder, and the next day departed and by successive stages reached the monastery at the back of Jetavana which is not far from Sāvatthi. There he found two roads, one leading to Jetavana, the other to Sāvatthi. As he stood there, he thought: “Shall I see my parents first or the One with Ten Powers?” Then he said to himself, “In old days I saw my parents for a long time, from henceforth I shall rarely have the chance of seeing the Buddha; I will see the Fully Awakened One today and hear the Dhamma, and then tomorrow morning I will see my parents.” So he left the road to Sāvatthi and in the evening arrived at Jetavana.

Now that very day at daybreak, the Teacher, as he looked upon the world, had seen the potentialities of this young man, and when he came to visit him he praised the virtues of parents in the Mātiposakasutta [SN 7.19]. As he stood at the end of the assembly of elders and listened, he thought: “If I become a householder I can support my parents; but the Teacher also says, ‘A son who has become an ascetic can be helpful,’ I went away before without seeing the Teacher, and I failed in such an imperfect ordination; I will now support my parents while still remaining an ascetic without becoming a householder.” So he took his ticket and his ticket-food and gruel, and felt as if he had committed a wrong deserving expulsion after a solitary abode of twelve years in the forest. In the morning he went to Sāvatthi and he thought to himself, “Shall I first get the gruel or see my parents?” He reflected that it would not be right to visit them in their poverty empty-handed; so he first got the gruel and then went to the door of their old house.

When he saw them sitting by the opposite wall after having gone their round for the alms given in broth, he stood not far from them in a sudden burst of sorrow with his eyes full of tears. They saw him but knew him not; then his mother, thinking that it was someone standing for alms, said to him, “We have nothing fit to be given to you, be pleased to pass on.” When he heard her, he repressed the grief which filled his heart and remained still standing as before with his eyes full of tears, and when he was addressed a second and a third time he still continued standing.

At last the father said to the mother, “Go to him; can this be your son?” She rose and went to him and, recognising him, fell at his feet and lamented, and the father also joined his lamentations, and there was a loud outburst of sorrow. To see his parents he could not control himself, but burst into tears; then, after yielding to his feelings, he said: “Do not grieve, I will support you,” so having comforted them and made them drink some gruel, and sit down on one side, he went again and begged for some food and gave it to them, and then went and asked for alms for himself, and having finished his meal, took up his abode at a short distance off.

From that day forward he watched over his parents in this manner; he gave them all the alms he received for himself, even those at the fortnightly distributions, and he went on separate expeditions for his own alms, and ate them; and whatever food he received as provision for the rainy season he gave to them, while he took their worn-out garments and dyed them with the doors fast closed and used them himself; but the days were few when he gained alms and there were many when he failed to win anything, and his inner and outer clothing became very rough.

As he watched over his parents he gradually grew very pale and thin and his friends and intimates said to him, “Your complexion used to be bright, but now you have become very pale – has some illness come upon you?” He replied, “No illness has come upon me, but a hindrance has befallen me,” and he told them the history. “Sir,” they replied, “the Teacher does not allow us to waste the offerings of the faithful, you do an unlawful act in giving to laymen the offerings of the faithful.” When he heard this he shrank away ashamed.

But not satisfied with this they went and told it to the Teacher, saying: “So and so, sir, has wasted the offerings of the faithful and used them to feed laymen.”

Then the Teacher sent for this monk, and asked him, “Is what I hear true, monk, that you support lay folks?” “It is true, sir.” “Who are they?” “My mother and father, sir.” Said the Teacher, “Well done, monk! Wise men of old, even when embodied as lower animals, having been born as parrots even, when their parents grew old laid them in a nest and fed them with food which they brought in their own beaks.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, a king named king Magadha reigned in Rājagaha. At that time there stood a brahmin village, named Sālindiyā, towards the north-east as you go out of the city. In this north-eastern district was property belonging to Magadha. There was a brahmin who lived in Sālindiyā, whose name was Kosiyagotta, and he held an estate of one thousand acres, where he grew rice. When the crop was standing, he made a stout fence, and gave the land in charge to his own men, to one fifty acres, to another sixty, and so he distributed among them some five hundred acres of his estate. The other five hundred he delivered to a hired man for a wage, and the man made a hut there and dwelt there day and night. Now to the north-east of this estate was a certain great wood of silk-cotton trees, growing upon the flat top of a hill, and in this wood lived a great number of parrots. [4.176]

At that time the Bodhisatta was born among this flock of parrots, as the son of the king of the parrots. He grew up handsome and strong, big his body was as the nave of a cart-wheel. His father now grown old said to him, “I am able no longer to go far afield; do you take care of this flock,” and committed the lordship of it to his son. From the next day onwards he refused to permit his parents to go foraging; but with the whole flock away he flew to the Himālayas hills, and after eating his fill of the clumps of rice that grew wild there, on his return brought food sufficient for his mother and father, and fed them with it.

One day the parrots asked him a question. “Formerly,” they said, “the rice was ripe by this time on the Magadha farm; is it grown now or not?” “Go and see,” he replied, and then sent two parrots to find out. The parrots departed, and alighted in the Magadha lands, in that part which was guarded by the hired man; rice they ate, and one head of rice they took back with them to their wood, and dropped it before the Great Being’s feet, saying: “Such is the rice which grows there.”

---

999 One of the “Kausika (owl) or Viśvāmitra clan.”
1000 karīsa.
1001 simbali: Bombax Heptaphyllum.
went next day to the farm, and alighted, with all his flock. The man ran this way and that, trying to drive off the birds, but drive them away he could not. The rest of the parrots ate, and departed with empty beaks; but the parrot king gathered together a quantity of rice, and brought it back to his parents. Next day the parrots ate the rice there again, and so afterwards. Then the man began to think, [4.278] “If these creatures go on eating for another few days, there will not be a bit left. The brahmin will have a price put on the rice, and fine me in the sum. I will go tell him.” Taking a handful of rice, and a gift with it, he went to see the brahmin, and greeted him, and stood on one side. “Well, my good man,” said the master, “is there a good crop of rice?” “Yes, brahmin, there is,” he replied, and repeated two verses:

1. “The crop of rice is very nice, but I would have you know,
The parrots are devouring it, I cannot make them go.

2. There is one bird, of all the herd the finest, who first feeds,
Then takes a bundle in his beak to meet his future needs.”

When the brahmin heard this, he conceived an affection for the parrot king. “My man,” said he, “do you know how to set a snare?” “Yes, I know.” The master then addressed him in this verse:

3. “Then set a snare of horse’s hair that captured he may be;
And see you take the bird alive and bring him here to me.”

The farm watchman was much pleased that no price had been put upon the rice, and no debt spoken of. He went straight and made a snare of horsehair. Then he found out when they were like to descend that day; and spying out the place where the parrot king alighted, next day very early in the morning he made a cage about the size of a waterpot, and set [4.177] the snare, and sat down in his hut looking for the parrots to come. The parrot king came amidst all his flock; and he being by no means greedy, [4.279] came down in the same place as yesterday, with his foot right in the noose. When he found his foot fast he thought: “Now if I cry out the cry of the captured, my kinsfolk will be so terrified, they will fly away foodless. I must endure until they have finished their food.” When at last he perceived that they had taken their fill, being in fear of his life, he thrice cried the cry of the captured. All the birds flew off. Then the king of the parrots said:
“All these my kith and kin, and not one to look back at me! What wrong have I done?” And upbraiding them he uttered a verse:

4. “They ate, they drank, and now away they hasten every one,
I only caught within a snare: what evil have I done?”

The watchman heard the cry of the parrot king, and the sound of the other parrots flying through the air. “What is that?” thought he. Up he got from his hut, and went to the place of his snare, and there he saw the king of the parrots. “The very bird I set the snare for is caught!” he cried, in high delight. He took the parrot out of the snare, and tied both his feet together, and making his way to Sālindiya village, he delivered the bird to the brahmin. The brahmin in his strong affection for the Great Being, caught hold of him tight in both hands, and seating him on his hip, bespoke him in these two verses:

5. “The bellies of all others are outbellied far by you:
First a full meal, then off you fly with a good beak-full too!

6. Have you a granary there to fill? Or do you hate me sore?
I ask it you, come tell me true – where do you put your store?”

On hearing this, the parrot king answered, repeating in a human voice sweet as honey the seventh verse: [4.280]

7. “I hate you not, O Kosiya! No granary I own;
Once in my wood I pay a debt, and also grant a loan,
And there I store a treasure up: so be my answer known.”

Then the brahmin asked him:

8. “What is that loan the which you grant? What is the debt you pay?
Tell me the treasure you store up, and then fly free away.”

To this request of the brahmin the parrot king made reply, explaining his intent in four verses:

9. “My callow chicks, my tender brood, whose wings are still ungrown,
Who shall support me by and by: to them I grant the loan.

10. Then my old ancient parents, who far from youth’s bounds are set,
With that within my beak I bring, to them I pay my debt.”
11. And other birds of helpless wing, and weak full many more,
To these I give in generosity: this sages call my store.

12. This is that loan the which I grant, this is the debt I pay,
And this the treasure I store up: now I have said my say.” [4.178]

The brahmin was pleased when he heard this pious discourse from the Great Being; and he repeated two verses:

13. “What noble principles of life! How blessed is this bird!
From many men who live on earth such rules are never heard. {4.281}

14. Eat, eat your fill whereas you will, with all your kindred too;
And, parrot! Let us meet-again: I love the sight of you.”

With these words, he looked upon the Great Being with a soft heart, as though it were his only son; and loosing the bonds from his feet, he rubbed them with oil a hundred times refined, and seated him on a seat of honour, and gave him to eat sweetened corn upon a golden dish, and gave him sugar-water to drink. After this the king of the parrots warned the brahmin to be careful, reciting this verse:

15. “O Kosiya! Within your dwelling here
I had both food and drink and friendship dear.
Give you to those whose burden is laid down,
Support your parents when they old are grown.”

The brahmin then delighted in heart uttered his exalted utterance in this verse:

16. “Surely Luck’s goddess came herself today
When I set eyes upon this peerless bird!
I will do kindly deeds and never stay,
Now that the parrot’s sweet voice I have heard.”

But the Great Being refused to accept the thousand acres which the brahmin offered him, but took only eight acres. The brahmin set up boundary stones, and made over this property to him; and then, raising his hands to his head in reverence, he said: “Go in peace, my lord, and console your weeping parents,” and then let him go. Much pleased, he took a head of rice, and carried it to his parents, and dropped it before them, saying: “Arise now, my dear parents!” They arose at his word, with weeping faces. {4.282} Then flocks of parrots began together, asking, “How did you get free, my lord?” He told them the whole story from beginning to end. And Kosiya followed\textsuperscript{1002} the advice of the king of the parrots, and distributed much alms to the righteous men, and ascetics, and brahmins.

The last verse was repeated by the Teacher explaining this:

17. “This Kosiya with joy and great delight
Common and plentiful made drink and food:
With food and drink he satisfied aright
Brahmins and holy men, himself all good.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Thus, monks, to support one’s parents is the traditional way of the wise and good.” Then, having declared the Truths, he identified the Jātaka, now at the conclusion of the Truths that monk became established in the fruit of the First Path. “At that time the Buddha’s followers were the flock of parrots, two of the king’s family were the father and mother, Channa was the watchman, Ānanda the brahmin, and I was myself the king of the parrots.”

\textbf{Ja 485 Candakinnarajātaka}
\textbf{The Story about the Kinnara Canda (Pak)}

Alternative Title: Candakinnarījātaka (Cst)

In the present it is told how the Bodhisatta’s wife lived ascetically at home, showing her devotion. The Buddha tells a story of two Kinnaras who lived happily in the sylvan woods, till the husband was shot by a wicked king, and how his wife managed to beseech Sakka and bring him back to life.

The Bodhisatta = the Kinnara Canda (Candakinnara), Rāhulamātā = (his mate) Candā,
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Devadatta = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Devotion, Faithfulness, Devas.

\textsuperscript{1002} Reading \textit{katvā} for \textit{datvā}, which contradicts the context.
“It is passing away.” [4.179] This is a story which the Teacher told, while dwelling in the banyan grove nearby Kapilapura about Rāhula’s mother when she was in the palace.

This Jātaka must be told beginning from the Distant Epoch of the Buddha’s existence. But the story of the Epochs, as far as the lion’s roar of Kassapa of Uruvelā, in Laṭṭhivana, the Bamboo Forest, has been told before in the Apanṇakajātaka [Ja 1]. Beginning from that point you will read in the Vessantarajātaka [Ja 547] the continuation of it as far as to the coming to Kapilavatthu. The Teacher, seated in his father’s house, during the meal, recounted the Mahādhammapālajātaka [Ja 447]; and after the meal was done he said: “I will praise the noble qualities of Rāhula’s mother in her own house, by telling the Candakinnarajātaka [Ja 485].” Then handing his bowl to the king, with the two chief disciples he passed over to the house of Rāhula’s mother. At that time there were forty thousand dancing girls who lived in her presence, and of them a thousand and ninety were maidens of the warrior caste. When the lady heard of the Tathāgata’s coming she bade all these put on yellow robes, and they did so. The Teacher came and took his seat in a place which was assigned him. Then all the women cried out with one voice, and there was a great sound of lamentation. Rāhula’s mother having wept and so put away her grief, welcomed the Teacher, and sat down, with the deep reverence due to a king.

Then the king began the tale of her goodness, “Listen to me, sir; she heard that you wore yellow robes, and so she robed herself in yellow; that garlands and such things are to be given up, and lo she has given up garlands and sits upon the 1003 The existence of the Buddha is divided into three periods: the Distant Epoch (dūrenidānaṁ), the Middle (avidūre°) and the Near (santike°). The Distant Epoch extends “from the time when he fell at the feet of Dīpankara to his birth in the city of the Tusita gods” (Jat. i. p. 47, Pali text): the Middle Epoch from that time until he obtained Buddhahood (Jat. i. 76); the Near Epoch, until his death. – See Rhys David’s Buddhist Birth Stories, pp. 2, 58; Warren, Buddhism in Translations, pp. 38, 82.

1004 One of three brahmin brothers living at Uruvelā, converted by the Buddha.

1005 Near Rājagaha: Jat. i. 84 (Pali).

1006 [This reference would seem to indicate that the commentator understood the Nidānakathā to belong to the first Jātaka.]
ground. When you entered upon the ascetic life she became a widow; and refused the gifts that other kings sent her. So faithful is her heart to you.” Thus he told of her goodness in many different ways. The Teacher said: “It is no marvel, great king! That now in my last existence the lady should love me, and should be of faithful heart and led by me alone. So also, even when born as an animal, she was faithful and mine alone.” Then at the king’s request he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king in Benares the Great Being was born in the region of the Himālayas as a Kinnara. His wife was [4.180] named Candā. These two dwelt together on a silver mountain named Candapabbata, or the Mountain of the Moon.

At that time the king of Benares had committed his government to his ministers, and all alone dressed in two yellow robes, and armed with the five weapons, he proceeded to the Himālayas. While eating his venison he remembered where was a little stream, and began to climb the hill. Now the Kinnaras that live on the Mountain of the Moon in the rainy season remain on the mountain, and come down only in the hot weather.

At that time the Kinnara Canda, with his mate, came down and wandered about, anointing himself with perfumes, eating the pollen of flowers, clothing himself in flower-gauze for inner and outer garments, swinging in the creepers to amuse himself, singing songs in a honey-voice. He too came to this stream; and at one halting-place he went down into it with his wife, scattering flowers about and playing in the water. Then they put on again their garments of flowers, and on a sandy spot white as a silver plate they spread a couch of flowers, and lay there. Picking up a piece of bamboo, the male Kinnara began to play upon it, and sang with a honey-voice; while his mate waving her soft hands danced nearby and sang withal. The king caught the sound, and treading softly that his footsteps might not be heard, he approached, and stood watching the Kinnaras from a secret place. He immediately fell in love with the female Kinnara. “I will shoot the 1007 Candā, m. means the Moon. The tale seems to contain a nature myth.

---

1008 Sword, spear, bow, battle-axe, shield.
husband,” he thought, “and kill him, and I will live here with his wife.” Then he shot the Kinnara Canda, who lamenting in his pain uttered four verses:

1. “'Tis passing away, I think, and my blood is flowing, flowing, I am losing my hold on life, O Candā! My breath is going!

2. 'Tis sinking, I am in pain, my heart is burning, burning: But 'tis for your sorrow, Candā, the heart within me is yearning.

3. As grass, as a tree I perish, as a waterless river I dry: But 'tis for your sorrow, Candā, my heart within me is yearning.

4. As rain on a lake at the mountain foot are the tears that fall from my eye: But 'tis for your sorrow, Candā, my heart within me is yearning.”

Thus did the Great Being lament in four verses; and lying upon his couch of flowers, he lost consciousness, and turned away. The king stood where he was. But the other Kinnara did not know that the Great Being was wounded, not even when he uttered his lament, being intoxicated with her own delight. Seeing him lie there turned away and lifeless, she began to wonder what could be the matter with her lord. As she examined him she saw the blood oozing from the mouth of the wound, and being unable to bear the great pain of sorrow for her beloved husband, she [4.181] cried out with a loud voice. “The Kinnara must be dead,” thought the king, and he came out and showed himself. When Candā beheld him she thought: “This must be the brigand who has slain my dear husband!” and trembling she took to flight. Standing upon the hill-top she denounced the king in five verses:

5. “That evil prince – ah, woe is me! – my husband dear did wound, Who there beneath a woodland tree now lies upon the ground.

6. O prince! The woe that wrings my heart may your own mother pay, The woe that wrings my heart with my Kimpurisa dead this day!

7. Yea, prince! The woe that wrings my heart may your own wife repay, The woe that wrings my heart with my Kimpurisa dead this day!

1009 [A synonym for a Kinnara.]
8. And may your mother mourn her lord, and may she mourn her son,
Who on my lord most innocent for lust this deed have done.

9. And may your wife look on and see the loss of lord and son,
For you upon my harmless lord for lust this deed have done.”

When she had thus made her lament in these five verses, standing upon the mountain top the king comforted her by another verse:

10. “Weep not nor grieve: the woodland dark has blinded you, I ween:
A royal house shall honour you, and you shall be my queen.” [4.286]

“What is this word you have said?” cried Candā, when she heard it; and loud as a lion’s roar she declaimed the next verse:

11. “No! I will surely slay myself! Thine I will never be,
Who slew innocent Kimpurisa, and all for lust for me.”

When he heard this his passion left him, and he recited another verse:

12. “Live if you will, O timid one! To the Himālayas go:
Creatures that feed on shrub and tree the woodland love, I know.”

With these words he departed indifferent. Candā so soon as she knew him gone came up and, embracing the Great Being, took him up to the hill-top, and laid him on the flat land there: placing his head on her lap, she made a lament in twelve verses:

13. “Here in the hills and mountain caves, in many a glen and grot,
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now that I see you not?

14. The wild beasts range, the leaves are spread on many a lovely spot:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now that I see you not?

15. The wild beasts range, sweet flowers are spread on many a lovely spot:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now that I see you not? [4.287]

16. Clear run the rivers down the hills, with flowers all overgrown:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now you have left me lone?

---

1010 Two are named, Corypha Taliera and Tabernaemontana Coronaria.
17. Blue are the Himālaya hills, most fair they are to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you? [4.182]

18. Gold tips the Himālaya hills, most fair they are to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you?

19. The Himālaya hills glow red, most fair they are to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you?

20. Sharp are the Himālaya peaks, they are most fair to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you?

21. White gleam the Himālaya peaks, they are most fair to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you?

22. The Himālayas, rainbow-hued, most fair it is to see:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now I behold not you?

23. Hill Fragrant\textsuperscript{1011} is to Yakkhas dear; plants cover every spot
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now that I see you not?

24. The Kimpurisas love the Fragrant Hill, plants cover every spot:
What shall I do, O Kimpurisa, now that I see you not?”

So did she make her lament; and putting the hand of the Great Being on her breast she felt that it still was warm. “Canda lives yet!” she thought: “I will taunt the gods\textsuperscript{1012} until I bring him to life again!” Then she cried aloud, taunting them, “Are there none who govern the world? \textsuperscript{4.288} Are they on a journey? Or peradventure they are dead, and therefore save not my dear husband!” By the power of her pain Sakka’s throne became hot. Pondering he perceived the cause; in the form of a brahmin he approached, and from a waterpot took water and sprinkled the Great Being with it. On the instant the poison ceased to act, his colour returned, he knew not so much as the place where the wound had been: the Great Being stood up \textsuperscript{1011} Gandhamādana.

\textsuperscript{1012} Ujjhānakamma\textsuperscript{katvā}, i.e. by “provoking” Sakka to help. The reader will be struck with the resemblance of Elijah’s taunts, 1 kings xviii. 27: “Cry aloud, for he is a god; either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeith and must be awaked.”
quite well. Candā seeing her well-beloved husband to be whole, in joy fell at the feet of Sakka, and sang his praise in the following verse:

25. “Praise, holy brahmin! Who did give unto a hapless wife
   Her well-loved husband, sprinkling him with the elixir of life!”

Sakka then gave this advice, “From this time forth go not down from the Mountain of the Moon among the paths of men, but abide here.” Twice he repeated this, and then returned to his own place. And Candā said to her husband, “Why stay here in danger, my lord? Come, let us go to the Mountain of the Moon,” reciting the last verse:

26. “To the mountain let us go,
   Where the lovely rivers flow,
   Rivers all o’ergrown with flowers:
   There for ever, while the breeze
   Whispers in a thousand trees,
   Charm with talk the happy hours.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he said: “Not only now, but long ago as now, she was devoted and faithful of heart to me.” Then he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Anuruddha was [Sakka, Devadatta was] the king, Rāhula’s mother was Candā, and I myself was the Devatā.”

Ja 486 Mahā-ukkusajātaka
The Long Story about the Hawk (Pak)

In the present one layman makes friends with everyone, and eventually comes into contact with the Buddha. The latter explains the importance of friendship with a story about a pair of hawks who made friends of the animals around them, who then protected their children when they were hunted.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha),
Sāriputta = the osprey (ukkusa),

[1013] Fausbøll’s Pāli text is faulty here, and in the translation that follows it. There is no doubt at all we need to reconstruct here, as in the Burmese text, which is quoted in the variant readings.]
Mahāmoggallāna = the father (pitā),
Rāhula = the turtle (puttakacchapa), the husband and wife = the male and female hawks (seno ca senī ca).

Keywords: Friendship, Cooperation, Animals, Birds.

“The country churls.” [4.183] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about Mittagandhaka, a lay brother. [4.289] This man, they say, the offspring of a decayed family at Sāvatthi, sent a companion to offer marriage to a young gentlewoman. The question was asked, “Has he friend or comrade who can dispose of any matter that needs looking to?” Reply was made, “No, there was none.” “Then he must make some friends first,” they said to him. The man followed this advice, and struck up a friendship with the four gatekeepers. After this he made friends by degrees with the town warders, the astrologers, the nobles of the court, even with the commander-in-chief and the viceroy; and by association with them he became the king’s friend, and after that a friend of the eighty chief elders, and through elder Ānanda, with the Tathāgata himself.

Then the Teacher established his family in the Refuges and the Precepts, the king gave him high place, and he was known as Mittagandhaka, the “man of many friends.” The king bestowed a great house upon him, and caused his nuptial feast to be celebrated, and a world of people from the king downwards sent him gifts. Then his wife received a present sent by the king, and the viceroy’s present sent by the viceroy, and the present of the commander-in-chief, and so forth, having all the people of the city bound to her. On the seventh day, with great ceremony the One with Ten Powers was invited by the newly married pair, great gifts were bestowed on the Buddha and his company to the number of five hundred; at the end of the feast they received the Teacher’s thanks and were both established in the fruit of the First Path.

In the Dhamma Hall all were talking about it. “Monks, the layman Mittagandhaka followed his wife’s advice, and by her means became a friend to everyone, and received great honour at the king’s hand; and having become friends with the Tathāgata both husband and wife were established in the fruit of the First Path.” The Teacher entered and asked what they talked of. They told him. He said: “This is not the first time, monks, that this man has received great honour by reason of this woman. In days long gone by, when he was an animal, by her advice he made many friends, and was set free from anxiety on a son's behalf.” So saying he told a story of the past.

1014 Literally “binder of friends.”

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, certain men of the marches used to make a settlement, wheresoever they could best find their food, dwelling in the forest, and killing meat for themselves and their families from the game which abounded there. (4.290) Not far from their village was a large natural lake, and upon its southward shore lived a hawk, on the west a female hawk; on the north a lion, king of the beasts; on the east an osprey, king of the birds; in the middle dwelt a turtle on a small island. The hawk asked the female hawk to become his wife. She asked him, “Have you any friends?” “No, madam,” he replied. “We must have someone who can defend us against any danger or trouble that may arise, and you must find some friends.” “Whom shall I make friends with?” “Why, with king osprey who lives on the eastern shore, and with the lion on the north, and with the turtle who dwells in the middle of this lake.” He took her advice and did so. Then the two lived together (it should be said that on a little islet in the same lake grew a kadamba tree, surrounded by the water on all sides) in a nest which they made.

Afterwards there were given to them two sons. One day, while the wings of the younglings were yet callow, some of the country folk went foraging through the woods all day and found nothing. Not wishing to return home empty-handed, they went down to the lake to catch a fish or a turtle. They got on the island, and lay down beneath the kadamba tree; and there being tormented by the bites of gnats and mosquitoes, to drive these away, they kindled a fire by rubbing sticks together, and made a smoke. The smoke rising annoyed the birds, and the young ones uttered a cry. “It is the cry of birds!” said the country folk. “Up, make up the fire: we cannot lie here hungry, but before we lie down we will have a meal of fowls' flesh.” They made the fire blaze, and built it up. But the mother bird hearing the sound, thought: “These men wish to eat our young ones. We made friends to save us from that danger. I will send my mate to the great osprey.” (4.291) Then she said: “Go, my husband, tell the osprey of the danger which threatens our young,” repeating this verse:
1. “The country churls build fires upon the isle,
   To eat my young ones in a little while:
   O hawk! To friend and comrade give the word,
   My children’s danger tell to every bird!”

The bird flew at all speed to the place, and gave a cry to announce his arrival. Leave given, he came near to the osprey, and made his greeting. “Why have you come?” asked the osprey. Then the bird repeated the second verse:

   2. “O wingèd fowl! The chief of birds are thou:
       So, osprey king, I seek your shelter now.
       Some country-folk hunting now are fain
       To eat my young: be you my joy again!”

   “Fear not,” said the osprey to the hawk, and consoling him he repeated the third verse:

   3. “In season, out of season, wise men make
       Both friends and comrades for protection’s sake:
       For you, O hawk! I will perform this deed;
       The good must help each other at their need.”  \{4.292\}

Then he went on to ask, “Have the churls climbed up the tree, my friend?” “They are not climbing yet; they are just piling wood on the fire.” “Then you had better go quickly and comfort my friend your mate, and say I am coming.” He did so. The osprey went also, and from a place near to the kadamba tree he watched for the men to climb, sitting upon a tree-top. Just as one of the boors who was climbing the tree had come near to the nest, the osprey dived into the lake, and from wings and beak sprinkled water over the burning brands, so that they were put out. Down came the men, and made another fire to cook the bird and its young; when they climbed again, once more the osprey demolished the fire. So whenever a fire was made, the bird put it out, and midnight came. The bird was much distressed: the skin under his stomach had become quite thin, his eyes were blood-shot. Seeing him, the hen-bird said to her mate, “My lord, the osprey is tired out; go and tell the turtle, that he may have a rest.” When he heard this, the bird approaching the osprey, addressed him in a verse:
4. “Good help the good: the necessary deed
   You have in pity done for us at need.
   Our young are safe, you living: have a care
   Of your own self, nor all your strength outwear.”

On hearing these words, loud as a lion’s roar he repeated the fifth verse:

5. “While I am keeping guard about this tree,
   I care not if I lose my life for you:
   So use the good: thus friend will do for friend:
   Yea, even if he perish at the end.” [4.293]

But the sixth verse was repeated by the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, as he praised the bird’s goodness:

6. “The egg-born bird that flies the air did a most painful work,
   The osprey, guarding well the chicks before the midnight mark.”

Then the hawk said: “Rest awhile, friend osprey,” and then away to the turtle, whom he aroused. “What is your errand, friend?” asked the turtle. “Such and such a danger has come upon us, and the royal osprey has been labouring hard ever since the first watch, and is very weary; that is why I have come to you.” With these words he repeated the seventh verse:

7. “Even they who fall through wrong or evil deed
   May rise again if they get help in need.
   My young in danger, straight I fly to you:
   O dweller in the lake, come, succour me!”

On hearing this the turtle repeated another verse:

8. “The good man to a man who is his friend,
   Both food and goods, even life itself, will lend.
   For you, O hawk! I will perform this deed:
   The good must help each other at their need.” [4.186]

His son, who lay not far off, hearing the words of his father thought: “I would not have my father troubled, but I will do my father’s part,” and therefore he repeated the ninth verse:
9. “Here at your ease remain, O father mine,
And I your son will do this task of thine. [4.294]
A son should serve a father, so 'tis best;
I'll save the hawk his young ones in the nest.”

The father turtle addressed his son in a verse:

10. “So do the good, my son, and it is true
That son for father service ought to do.
Yet they may leave the hawk’s young brood alone,
Perchance, if they see me so fully grown.”

With these words the turtle sent the hawk away, adding, “Fear not, my friend, but go you before and I will come presently after.” He dived into the water, collected some mud, and went to the island, quenched the flame, and lay still. Then the countrymen cried, “Why should we trouble about the young hawks? Let us roll over this cursed turtle, and kill him! He will be enough for all.” So they plucked some creepers and got some strings, but when they had made them fast in this place or that, and torn their clothes to strips for the purpose, they could not roll the turtle over. The turtle lugged them along with him and plunged in deep water. The men were so eager to get him that in they fell after: splashed about, and scrambled out with a belly-full of water.

“Just look,” said they, “half the night one osprey kept putting out our fire, and now this turtle has made us fall into the water, and swallow it, to our great discomfort. Well, we will light another fire, and at sunrise we will eat those young hawks.” Then they began to make a fire. The hen-bird heard the noise they were making, and said: “My husband, sooner or later these men will devour our young and depart: you go and tell our friend the lion.” [4.295] At once he went to the lion, who asked him why he came at such an unseasonable hour. The bird told him all from the beginning, and repeated the eleventh verse:

1015 Reading kāla-.
11. “Mightiest of all the beasts, both beasts and men
Fly to the strongest when beset with fear.
My young ones are in danger; help me then:
You are our king, and therefore I am here.”

This said, the lion repeated a verse:

12. “Yes, I will do this service, hawk, for you:
Come, let us go and slay this gang of foes!
Surely the prudent, he who wisdom knows,
Protector of a friend must try to be.”

Having thus spoken, he dismissed him, saying: “Now go, and comfort your young ones.” Then he went forward, churning up the crystal water. [4.187]

When the churls perceived him approaching, they were frightened to death, “The osprey,” they cried, “put out our fire-brands; the turtle made us lose the clothes we had on: but now we are done for. This lion will destroy us at once.” They ran this way and that: when the lion came to the foot of the tree, nothing could he see. [4.296] Then the osprey, the hawk, and the turtle came up, and accosted him. He told them the profitableness of friendship, and said: “From this time forth be careful never to break the bonds of friendship.” With this advice he departed: and they also went each to his own place. The hen-hawk looking upon her young, thought: “Ah, through friends have my young been given back to me!” and as she rejoiced, she spoke to her mate, and recited six verses declaring the effect of friendship:

13. “Get friends, a houseful of them without fail,
Get a great friend: a blessing he'll be found:1016
Vain strike the arrows on a coat of mail.
And we rejoice, our younglings safe and sound.

14. By their own comrade’s help, the friend who stayed to take their part,
One chirps, the fledglings chirp reply, with notes that charm the heart.

1016 Reading sukhāgamāya.
15. The wise asks help at friend’s or comrade’s hand,
Lives happy with his goods and brood of kind:
So I, my mate, and young, together stand,
Because our friend to pity was inclined.

16. A man needs king and warriors for protection:
And these are his whose friendship is perfection:
You cravest happiness: he is famed and strong;
He surely prospers to whom friends belong.

17. Even by the poor and weak, O hawk, good friends must needs be found:
See now by kindness we and ours each one are safe and sound.

18. The bird who wins a hero strong to play a friendly part,
As you and I are happy, hawk, is happy in his heart.” [4.297]

So she declared the quality of friendship in six verses. And all this company of friends lived all their lives long without breaking the bond of friendship, and then passed away according to their deeds.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, said: “This is not the first time, monks, that he won to bliss by his wife’s means; it was the same before.” With these words, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time the married pair were the pair of hawks, Rāhula was the young turtle, Moggallāna was the old turtle, Sāriputta the osprey, and I was myself the lion.

Ja 487 Uddālakajātaka\textsuperscript{1017}

The Story about (the Brahmin) Uddālaka (Pak)

In the present one monk gets his living in dishonest ways. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of a boy who was born of a brahmin and a prostitute. When he grew up he was the leader of a group of fake ascetics, till he was taught who was a real brahmin by his father.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
the deceiving monk = (his son) Uddālaka,
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

\textsuperscript{1017} Translated and discussed in Fick, \textit{Sociale Gliederung zu Buddhas Zeit}, p. 13 foll.
Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla,
Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādippaṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Dishonesty, Cheating, Asceticism.

“With uncleansed teeth.” [4.188] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a dishonest monk. This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was family priest, and a wise, learned man was he. On a certain day, he went into his park to disport him, and seeing a beauteous prostitute fell in love with her, and took up his abode with her. He got her with child, and when she perceived it she said to him, “Sir, I am with child; when he is born, and I am to name him, I will give him his grandfather’s name.” But he thought: “It can never be that the name of a noble family should be given to a slave girl’s bastard.” Then he said to her, “My dear, this tree here is called Uddāla, and you may name the child Uddālaka because he was conceived here.” Then he gave her a seal-ring, and said: “If it be a girl use this to help bring her up; but if a boy, bring him to me when he grows up.”

In due time she brought forth a son, and named him Uddālaka. When he grew up, he asked his mother, “Mother, who is my father?” “The family priest, my boy.” “If that is so, I will learn the holy books.” So receiving the ring from his mother,

---

1018 [Explained in the commentaries as seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting.]
1019 Cassia Fistula.
and a teacher’s fee, he journeyed to Taxila and learned there from a world-renowned teacher.

In the course of his studies he saw a company of ascetics. “These must surely have perfect knowledge,” he thought: “I will learn of them.” Accordingly he renounced the world, so eager was he for knowledge, and did menial service for them, begging them in return to teach him their own wisdom. So they taught him all they knew; but among the whole five hundred of them not one there was who outdid him in knowledge, he was the wisest of them all. Then they gathered together and appointed him to be their teacher.

He [4.189] said to them, “Venerable sirs, you always live in the woodland eating fruits and roots; why do you not go in the paths of men?” “Sir,” they said, “men are willing to give us gifts, but they make us show gratitude by declaring the Dhamma, they ask us questions: for fear of this we go not ever among them.” He answered, “Sirs, if you have me, let a Universal Monarch ask questions, leave me to settle them, and fear nothing.”

So he went on pilgrimage with them, seeking alms, and at last came to Benares, {4.299} and stayed in the king’s park. Next day, in company with them all, he sought alms in a village before the city gate. The folk gave them alms in plenty. On the day following the ascetics traversed the city, the folk gave them alms in plenty. The ascetic Uddālaka gave thanks, and blessed them, and answered questions. The people were edified, and gave all they had need of in great abundance.

The whole city buzzed with the news, ‘A wise teacher is come, a holy ascetic,’ and the king got wind of it.” Where do they live?” asked the king. They told him, “In the park.” “Good,” said he, “this day I will go and see them.” A man went and told it to Uddālaka, saying: “The king is to come and see you today.” He called the company together, and said: “Sirs, the king is coming: win favour in the eyes of the great for one day, it is enough for a lifetime.” “What must we do, teacher?” they asked. Then he said: “Some of you must be at the swinging penance,¹⁰²⁰ some squat on the ground, some lie upon beds of spikes, some practise the penance of the five fires, others go down into the water, others again recite holy verses in this place or that.” They did as he bade. Himself with wise men eight or ten sat upon a prepared seat with a head-rest disputing, a fair volume beside him laid upon a beautiful writing dish, and listeners all around.

¹⁰²⁰ See JPTS 1884, p. 95. Fick translates “sollen sich wie Fledermäuse benehmen,” and compares the “hen-saint” and “cow saint,” Oldenberg’s Buddha, p. 68.

At that moment the king with his family priest and a great company came into the park, and when he saw them all deep in their sham austerities, he was pleased and thought: “They are free from all fear of evil states hereafter.” Approaching Uddālaka, he greeted him graciously and sat down on one side; then in the delight of his heart began speaking to the family priest, and recited the first verse:

1. “With uncleansed teeth, and goatskin garb and hair
   All matted, muttering holy words in peace:
   Surely no human means to good they spare,
   Surely they know the truth, have won release.” [4.190] [4.300]

Hearing this, the family priest replied, “The king is pleased where he should not be pleased, and I must not be silent.” Then he repeated the second verse:

2. “A learned sage may do ill deeds, O king:
   A learned sage may fail to follow right.
   A thousand Vedas will not safety bring,
   Failing just works, or save from evil plight.”

Uddālaka, when he heard these words thought to himself, “The king was pleased with the ascetics, be they what you will; but this man comes a clap over the snout of the ox when he goes too fast, drops dirt in the dish all ready to eat: I must talk to him.” So he addressed to him the third verse:

1021 As though they had remained so for years, after the manner of some modern fakeers.
1022 One to each point of the compass, and the sun above.
1023 The first four verses are repeated from iii. 236-7, in this translation iii. 155.
3. “A thousand Vedas will not safety bring
   Failing just works, or save from evil plight:
   The Vedas then, must be a useless thing:
   True Dhamma is – control yourself, do right.” {4.301}

At this the family priest recited the fourth verse:

4. “Not so: the Vedas are no useless thing:
   Through works with self-control, true Dhamma is.
   To study well the Vedas fame will bring,
   But by right conduct we attain to bliss.”

Now thought Uddālaka, “It will never do to be on ill terms with this man. If I tell him I am his son, he needs must love me; I will tell him I am his son.” Then he recited the fifth verse:

5. “Parents and kinsmen claim one’s care;
   A second self our parents are:
   I’m Uddālaka, a shoot,
   Noble brahmin, from your root.”

“Are you indeed Uddālaka?” he asked. “Yes,” said the other. Then he said: “I gave your mother a token, where is it?” He said: “Here it is, brahmin,” and handed him the ring. The brahmin knew the ring again, and said: “Without doubt you are a brahmin; but do you know the duties of a brahmin?” He enquired concerning these duties in the words of the sixth verse: {4.302}

6. “What makes the brahmin? How can he be perfect? Tell me this:
   What is a righteous man, and how wins he Nibbāna’s bliss?”

Uddālaka explained it in the seventh verse:

7. “The world renounced, with fire, he worship pays,
   Pours water, lifts the sacrificial pole:
   As one who does his duty men him praise,
   And such a brahmin wins him peace of soul.”

The family priest listened to his account of the brahmin’s duties, but found fault with it, reciting the eighth verse as follows:
8. “Not sprinkling makes the brahmin pure, perfection is not this,
Nor peace nor kindness thus he wins nor yet Nibbāna’s bliss.” [4.191]

Hereupon Uddālaka asked, “If this does not make the brahmin, then what does?”
reciting the ninth verse:

9. “What makes the brahmin? How can he be perfect? Tell me this:
What is a righteous man? And how wins he Nibbāna’s bliss?” [4.303]

The family priest answered by reciting another verse:

10. “He has no field, no goods, no wish, no kin,
Careless of life, no sensual desires, no evil ways:
Even such a brahmin peace of soul shall win,
So as one true to duty men him praise.”

After this Uddālaka recited a verse:

11. “Khattiya, Brahmin, Vessa, Sudda, and Outcaste, Pukkusa,¹⁰²⁴
All these can be compassionate, can win Nibbāna’s bliss:
Who among all the saints is there who worse or better is?”

Then the brahmin recited a verse, to show that there is no higher or lower from the moment he has become an Arahat:

12. “Khattiya, Brahmin, Vessa, Sudda, and Outcaste, Pukkusa,
All these can be compassionate, can win Nibbāna’s bliss:
None among all the saints is found who worse or better is.”

But Uddālaka found fault with this, reciting a couple of verses:

13. “Khattiya, Brahmin, Vessa, Sudda, and Outcaste, Pukkusa,
All these can virtuous be, and all attain Nibbāna’s bliss:

14. None among all the saints is found who worse or better is.
You are a brahmin, then, for nought: vain is your rank, I wis.” [4.304]

Here the family priest recited two verses more, with a similitude:

¹⁰²⁴ Compare above, p. 127, and note the order of the first two. cf. iii. 194.
15. “With canvas dyed in many a tint pavilions may be made:
The roof, a many-coloured dome: one colour is the shade.
