The Jātaka Translation

translated by
T.W. Rhys Davids, Robert Chalmers, H.T. Francis,
W.H.D. Rouse and E.B. Cowell

1880 – 1907

revised by
Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

December 2021

(ver. 1.2)
Introduction to the Revised Translation

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

History of the Text and Translation

In 1877 the great Danish scholar Viggo Fausböll began the publication of the Jātaka commentary, a task which would take him another 20 years to complete. The dates for the publications were Vol 1, 1877; Vol. 2, 1879; Vol 3, 1883; Vol 4, 1887; Vol 5, 1891 and Vol 6, 1896.¹ These were based on manuscripts of the Sinhalese tradition, and only latterly included variants from the Burmese and Thai traditions, which Fausböll came to regard as being different recensions of the Jātaka text.²

Meanwhile a translation was begun, even before all the volumes of the text were published. The intention at the beginning was to have T.W. Rhys Davids make the complete translation, but after translating the Nidānakathā, which is the Introduction to the main collection, and a small collection of Jātakas, he made way for a team of translators led by Prof. E.B. Cowell, who took over and translated the Jātaka stories proper.

Volumes then appeared in the following order Vol 1, trans. by Robert Chalmers in 1895; Vol 2, translated by W.H.D. Rouse, also in 1895; Vol 3 trans. by H.T. Francis and R.A. Neil, 1897; Vol 4, again by W.H.D. Rouse, 1901; Vol 5, by H.T. Francis, 1905; Vol 6 by E.B. Cowell and W.H.D. Rouse, 1907. The translation was finished before the Tipiṭaka had been completely published in Latin script, let alone translated into English.

I mention this because the translation of the Jātaka itself was a pioneering work, and one of the utmost importance, but the scholars who worked on it were often at a great disadvantage when it came to undertaking the task. The fact that they did it so well, under such difficult circumstances, is a testament to their great scholarly acumen and judgement.

¹ [In 1913 an index to the Jātaka was added by Dines Anderson, but without the promised Postscriptum by Fausböll. In 2003 an more complete Index to the Jātaka by M. Yamazaki and Y. Ousaka was published, based on this original edition.]
² [See his Preliminary Remarks to Vol IV.]

Nevertheless, the translation left much to be desired, and now, well over a hundred years on, that lack is felt even more acutely. Many times over the years I have been asked to provide a new translation of the text, but felt unable to undertake a work which, given my age, I may not be able to complete.

I am very happy to say that a new generation of scholars are at present working on such a project, and the early fruits can be judged by the excellent new translation of the last ten birth stories, in The Ten Great Birth Stories of the Buddha, by Naomi Appleton and Sarah Shaw (Chiang Mai, 2015). However, these efforts may still take a while to complete, and may not be freely available even then, but tied in copyright, and not be posted to the internet.

I therefore felt that although a completely new translation was not possible for me, a revision and an improvement of the old one was, and it is that which I present in this work. The changes that have been made to the original translation can be summarised under the following headings.

Revised Vocabulary

The revision of the translation has been made in a number of ways. Wherever possible, I attempted to update the language from Late Victorian English to a more modern usage. I have revised the vocabulary, especially in regard to technical terminology regarding doctrine and cosmology, which was quite unestablished at the time of the original translation, and for which the translators often struggled to find adequate English terms. I have also tried to impose a certain consistency regarding the vocabulary throughout, something which was lacking in the original translation.

To give just a small idea of some of the problems that were in the original translations. Abhiññā was variously translated as Higher Knowledges, Supernatural or Higher Faculties (which I here translate as Super Knowledges); both jhāna and vippasana were translated as Insight (while jhāna was elsewhere given as Ecstatic Meditation and Mystic Meditation) (here translated as Absorption and Insight); mettā (here translated as Loving-Kindness) was sometimes translated as Generosity (which is here reserved for Dāna)!
Besides this doctrinal vocabulary, the translators often struggled to find English equivalents for the supernatural beings mentioned in the Buddhist texts, and used such forms as gods and angels to translate the terms Brahmā and Devas, fairies for Devas and Devatās, gnomes and elves for Yakkhas and Rakkhasas, spirits and sprites for Devatās, titans for Asuras, and nymphs for Devaccharā and Accharā, etc.

As such terms do not seem to be helpful now, I have thought it better to use the normal Pāḷi terms, which include Mahābrahmā, Brahmā, Deva, Devaputta, Devī, Devadhītā, Devaccharā, Accharā in the heavens; and more earthbound supernatural beings as Devatā, Nāga, Supaṇṇa and Garuḍa, Amanussa, Yakkha, Rakkhasa, Pisāca, Kinnara and Kimpurisa.

Reconstruction of the Stories

Another way the present translation differs from the original is that I have reconstructed the text for the reader wherever it was necessary to complete the story. Many times both the text and the original translation would refer the reader to other parts of the text, or to outside texts, for the story to be completed. For a bhāṇaka (reciter) this may have been within his or her abilities to do, and they may have used their knowledge to reconstruct the text when they were reciting it.

For the ordinary reader, however, this presents a formidable obstacle, and many of the stories are difficult to follow owing to the reader’s inability to find the correct passages to make up the complete story. In this edition I have done the work of the bhāṇaka and identified the passages, included them at the relevant spot, and made whatever other changes were suitable, such as when changes in names were required.

On occasion I have also included materials from outside the Jātaka, when this is referred to by the commentary as being essential to the story. These include quotations from other commentaries, as well as extracts from the suttas, and vinaya materials. Some of these materials I have translated myself, some of which I have translated for the first time; sometimes I have used standard translations, slightly modified for consistency.

Such an approach has the advantage of making each story now complete in and of itself, but it also means that some stories, which were reused many times, now recurr many times in this translation. These reconstructions add around 10%, or nearly 300 pages, to the translation. I have therefore marked the resused passages in italic, so if the story is remembered, it can be easily identified and skipped through, but if it is new, or is in a new context, it can be read again.

Occasionally the original translators felt unable to give a translation into English, and instead either translated a story into Latin (see Ja 273 Kacchapajātaka), or omitted passages from a story (see e.g. Ja 12 Nigrodhamigajātaka, Ja 227 Gūthapāṇajātaka, Ja 526 Naḷinikājātaka), usually because of their explicit sexual content. In such cases I have included an English translation of the whole passage or story.

As part of the reconstruction I have also included the Nidānakathā, which Cowell and his translation team had omitted from the translation. They did so because there was an existing translation by Rhys Davids, which had been published before the Cowell work. Here I have revised Rhys Davids’ translation and added it in at the beginning of the work, as I regard it as integral to the commentary.

The Component Parts

There are three basic component parts of the Jātaka stories: first there is a Story of the Present (Paccuppannavatthu), in which some incident presents an occasion for the Buddha to tell a Story of the Past (Atītavatthu), this is then followed by the Connection (Samodhāna) in which the relationships between the people in the present and the past are explained.3

The verses usually occur in the Story of the Past, but occasionally in the Connection, and sometimes in both. Verses do occur in the Story of the Present, but these are never considered canonical Jātaka verses, rather they are non-Jātaka verses that are recited in the course of setting the story. Verses sometimes also occur in the Story of the Past, or the Connection, which are not considered Jātaka verses.

3 [For an examination of the dates of the various parts of the Jātakas, see Rhys Davids’ essay on The Date of the Jātaka, forming the Introduction to the Nidānakathā in this volume.]
The rule is: if it is numbered it is a verse from the canonical Jātaka collection, if it is not numbered it is simply being quoted by the commentary.

Sometimes a story deviates from this structure, as when we are referred to another Jātaka for the story, and no Present Story or Connection is given. In Jātaka 428 Kosambijātaka, only one short paragraph summarises the Story of the Past, and the rest of the story which precedes and follows this summary is the Story of the Present.

The Titles and Overviews

The original translation did not provide a translation of the titles of the Jātakas, which made for difficulties when trying to identify a particular Jātaka, especially when titles recur, as they often do.

For instance there are three Jātakas called Vaṭṭakajātaka (Ja 35, 118, and 394). Here I have not only translated the title, but added information in to make identifying each story easier: Ja 35 The Story about the (Young) Quail; Ja 118 The Story about the (Starving) Quail; Ja 394 The Story about the (Fat) Quail.

Again, the four Jātakas called Tittira (Ja 37, 117, 319, 438) are here identified as Ja 37 The Story about the (Elder) Partridge; Ja 117 The Story about the (Noisy) Partridge; Ja 319 The Story about the (Decoy) Partridge and Ja 438 The Story about the (Wise) Partridge.

At the beginning of each Jātaka I provide an overview of the story, giving alternative titles where available, either as noted in the commentary, or as found in other traditions. A synopsis of the present and past stories; a list of characters; a list of cross references for the stories, which are either quoted verbatim elsewhere, or have the story in a parallel version; and a short list of keywords.

In the online edition of this work the Overview sections have been extracted and collected into a searchable Table (which in PDF format would span 60 pages). This makes researching relevant information, as well as searching for particular stories easier. There is also a custom search engine for the work – these facilities are to help the student quickly find the story or the material they are looking for.
Annotation and Page Numbers

As mentioned previously, the original translations were pioneering works, and made before all the texts in the canon or commentary were known, and in many cases, before they were even published. The annotation therefore often relied on incomplete appraisals of the Buddhist texts, and which are no longer considered good guides to the Buddhist doctrine. In most cases I have removed these notes.

On the other hand some of the notes contained mistakes, or non-standard references, these I have corrected and updated, sometimes replacing them with more reliable information, and sometimes silently modifying them for consistency. I have also added explanatory notes of my own, all of which are marked in square brackets.

As I give all references to other Jātakas, and other canonical and commentarial sources, as well as a few to those in early Sanskrit sources, in the Overview section of each Jātaka, I have also removed notes that included these references in the original translation, while keeping a few I haven't covered myself.

I have by no means tried to be comprehensive in the list of parallels, believing a select list is more useful in most cases than any attempt to be comprehensive would be. For those who want an exhaustive list of parallels I suggest using A Concordance of Buddhist Birth Stories by Leslie Grey, M.D. (PTS, Oxford, 2000).

Some quotations in the notes were given in Greek and Latin, and wherever I have been able to, I have translated these into English also, as we can no longer presume familiarity with these languages amongst a general readership.4

4 [One or two I was unable to find a translation for and have retained them in the quoted language.]
Studies

The Number of Jātakas

It should be noted that the number of the Jātakas is usually given as being 547, and in round figures is elsewhere said to be 500. This is rather misleading, however, as many Jātakas are simply quotations from other Jātakas, and many of them lack an introductory story, or a connection.

The Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga, for instance, is the source for 12 Jātakas: Ja 110 Sabbasaṁhārakapañña, Ja 111 Gadrabhapāñña, Ja 112 Amarādevīpañña, Ja 170 Kakaṇṭaka, Ja 192 Sirikālakaṇṭa, Ja 350 Devatāpañña, Ja 364 Khajjopanaka, Ja 452 Bhūripañña, Ja 471 Meṇḍaka, Ja 500 Sirimanda, Ja 508 Pañcapaṇḍita, Ja 517 Dakarakkhasa.

Ja 545 Vidhurapaṇḍita gives us Ja 441 Catuposathika, Ja 413 Dhūmakāri and Ja 495 Dasabrāhmaṇa. Ja 464 Cullakūnāla is extracted from Ja 536 Kuṇāla; Ja 470 Kosiya from Ja 535 Sudhābhōjana; Ja 502 Hāṁsa from Ja 533 Cullahaṁsa. Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa gives us the story found in Ja 106 Udāñcani and Ja 435 Haliddirāga. When this is taken into consideration, it means that the number of Jātakas found in this collection is closer to 527.

On the other hand, a number of Jātaka stories contain secondary Jātaka stories within the main one, so the number would go back up again. For instance Ja 536 Kuṇālajātaka, tells a total of eight other Jātaka stories within its own Story of the Past, where the Bodhisatta is named as having been:

Ajjuna, an unnamed goldsmith, a Garuḷa, the youth Chaḷaṅga,

[The Cullaniddesa on Posālamāṇavapucchā says: Bhagavā pañcajātakasatāni bhāsanto; the Fortunate One was reciting 500 Jātakas.]

[There are also numerous so-called Apocryphal Jātakas, and even collections, such as the SE Asian Paññasajātaka (Fifty Jātakas) but these are not listed here.]
an unnamed narrator, king Pañcālacaṇḍa,
king Baka
and king Brahmadatta.

This is apart from being the bird Kuṇāla, who is the main character for the Bodhisatā in this life.

The Sections

The Jātaka collection was organised roughly according to the number of verses in each section, starting with one verse (150 stories), two verses (100 stories), three, etc. up to the final book, the Mahānipāta, which contain more than 100 verses, the longest being the Vessantarajātaka, which has 786 verses.

However, at present the number of verses in each section often varies from the stated number as will be shown in the table below, and in most cases it is hard to identify where this has been done, so seamless is the integration of the new verses.

It is thought that the prose sections, which would have been told in the vernacular during transmission, were not as fixed as the verses, which would have been remembered in the original Pāli. It may be, however, that the recitors took the liberty to include more verses on occasion.\(^7\)

Here is a table listing the number of verses, together with the exceptions, and the number of stories in each section:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Numbers of Verses</th>
<th>Exceptions</th>
<th>Number of Stories</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 verse</td>
<td>no exceptions</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2 verses</td>
<td>159 (4), 203 (5).</td>
<td>100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3 verses</td>
<td>no exceptions</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4 verses</td>
<td>no exceptions</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\(^7\) [Only very rarely are the exceptions because of a lack of verses.]
The 13 Jātakas of the Pakiṇṇaka (Miscellaneous) section have no fixed number of verses, but vary widely from 15 verses to 48. One might have expected to find seven of these in the 20s section, and one in the 40s section. They are as follows:

484 (17), 485 (25), 486 (18), 487 (15), 488 (24), 489 (25), 490 (16), 491 (17), 492 (20), 493 (23), 494 (20), 495 (48), 496 (20).

After the Pakiṇṇaka section more of The Story of the Past is carried by the verses, which indeed accounts for the high verse count in these Jātakas, but it still seems to me that the prose is integral and necessary for a proper comprehension of the story.
The Mahānipāta has 10 Jātakas with 100+ verses, counted as follows: 538 (117), 539 (170), 540 (125), 541 (167), 542 (168), 543 (199), 544 (193), 545 (324), 546 (302), 547 (786).

The Verses

One of the most difficult choices the original translators had to make was in the form they chose to translate the verse part of the texts. In the early volumes, where there are fewer verses, this was less problematic than in the later ones. Here is how the various translators approached this problem:

Nidānakathā: Rhys Davids (prose, divided into lines),
Vol I: Robert Chalmers (decasyllabic, blank verse, with some rhyming verse),
Vol II: W.H.D. Rouse (rhyming verse),
Vol III: H.T. Francis & R. A. Neil (rhyming verse),
Vol IV: W.H.D. Rouse (rhyming verse),
Vol V: H.T. Francis (rhyming verse),

It should be noted that Pāli verses do not rhyme, but are normally divided into syllabic length, with 4x8 syllables being the most popular form for a verse (the Siloka form); and 4x11 syllables being the second most popular form (the Tuṭṭhubha form).

While making the changes in vocabulary I have always respected the way the translators had chosen to translate the verses. So if the verse was 8 syllables long and rhyming before the changes in vocabulary, I maintained the length and rhyme after the changes.

In the Kuṇālajātaka (Ja 536) we find a verse form, the Veḍha metre, which is unique in the Pāḷi texts, and which went unnoticed by Fausböll and the translator. It was identified by Bollée in his edition of the text, first published in 1970. In the present work I have identified the verse parts working from Bollée’s edition, and formatted the text accordingly.

In the original translation the numbers for the verses were omitted, but I have included them here, as it certainly makes referencing much easier; but also when we come to the last book of the translation, it shows how many verses were omitted, or abbreviated, which in some of the Jātakas was substantial.

For example, in Ja 539 Mahājanakajātaka, vs. 25-115 were compressed into just 7 verses, something which only becomes apparent when the verses are numbered. In the last book so much abbreviation of this kind was done that in most cases I have had to leave the translation as it is, without trying to reconstruct all the missing verses.

Again in the last book of the original translation large parts of the verse translations were presented as though they were prose. Here I have divided the text and identified it as verse, with the numbers that it corresponds to included.

Having the numbers also helps identify which are actually canonical Jātaka verses, and which are from the commentarial text. This makes it easy to see which are the actual Jātaka verses as they have been numbered, while other verses that occur are not.

In the text there was an additional section which provided a word commentary on the verses, which was sometimes quite extensive, amounting to roughly 20% of the work. The word commentary, however, was not translated by Cowell’s

---

9 [This book, which comprises the last ten Jātaka stories, now has a good translation, as noted above, by Appleton and Shaw.] team, and, although a translation of these passages is a desideratum, it has not been possible to include it in this revised translation.

Reuse of the Verses

Many of the verses have been reused elsewhere in a variety of ways. Sometimes a verse in one Jātaka recurs in other Jātakas, sometimes with small variations, such as a change of name, or a change of one word.

For instance, the verse from Ja 8 Gāmanijātaka also appears much later in the collection in a Ja 538 Mūgapakkhajātaka vs. 30 and 41; the verse from Ja 41 Losakajātaka is also found in Ja 42 Kapotajātaka, Ja 43 Veḷukajātaka and Ja 378 Darīmukhajātaka vs. 3. The verse in Ja 51 Mahāśīlavajātaka is also found in Ja 52 Cullajanakajātaka, Ja 124 Ambajātaka, Ja 483 Sarabhamigajātaka and Ja 539 Mahājanakajātaka.

Sometimes a verse appears in other parts of the Tipiṭaka. So the verse from Ja 35 Vaṭṭakajātaka is also found in the retelling of the same story in the Cariyāpiṭaka, Cp 29:10; Ja 10 Sukhavihārijātaka can also be found in Thag 11.1 vs. 4; and the Ja 31 Kulāvakajātaka verse is found at SN 11.6 vs. 1, etc.

And we also find verses that occur both within and outside the Jātaka collection. For instance the verse from Ja 12 Nigrodhamigajātaka occurs again in the Jātakas at Ja 445 Nigrodhajātaka, vs. 10, and in the Apadāna at Tha-ap 537, vs. 17. The verse from Ja 55 Pañcāvudhajātaka is also found in the following story Ja 56 Kaṇcanakkhandhajātaka, as well as one of the verses at Ja 156 Alīnacittajātaka, and outside the Jātakas it occurs at Iti 17 vs. 3 and Thag 16 vs. 7.

As there are nearly 7,000 verses in this collection, I didn’t think it was necessary to examine all of them. The results for the first book are shown in the table below. Only those Jātakas where verses recurred are shown, and only whole verses, not partial matches, but this should give an idea of how widespread reuse has been:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Jātaka Number and Name</th>
<th>Verse Parallels</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Ja 8 Gāmanijātaka</td>
<td>Ja 538:30 ≠ Ja 538:41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (Prince) Gāmani</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 10 Sukhavihārijātaka</td>
<td>Thag 11.1:4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the One who lives Happily</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jātaka Number and Name</td>
<td>Verse Parallels</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>---------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 12 Nigrodhamigajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 445:10 ≠ Tha-ap 537:17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Deer (named) Nigrodha</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 30 Muṇikajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 286:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (the Pig) Muṇika</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 31 Kulāvakajātaka</td>
<td>SN 11.6:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Nest</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 35 Vaṭṭakajātaka</td>
<td>Cp 29:10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Young Quail</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 36 Sakunajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 432:7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Bird</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 37 Tittirajātaka</td>
<td>Vin Cv 6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Partridge</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 41 Losakajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 42 ≠ Ja 43 ≠ Ja 378:3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (the Unfortunate Monk) Losaka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 42 Kapotajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 41 ≠ Ja 43 ≠ Ja 378:3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Pigeon</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 43 Veḷukajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 41 ≠ Ja 42 ≠ Ja 378:3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (the Viper) Veḷuka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 46 Ārāmadūsakajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Park</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 47 Vārunijātaka</td>
<td>Ja 46</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about Spoiling the Drinks</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 51 Mahāśīlavajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 52 ≠ Ja 483:1 ≠ Ja 539:14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about One with Great Virtue</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 52 Cullajanakajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 51 ≠ Ja 124 ≠ Ja 483:1 ≠ Ja 539:14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Short Story about (King) Janaka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 55 Pañcāvudhajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 56 ≠ Ja 156 Iti 17:3 Thag 16:7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (Prince) Pañcāvudha</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 56 Kañcanakkhandhajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 55 ≠ Ja 156 Iti 17:3 Thag 16:7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Block of Gold</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 57 Vānarindajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 224:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Lord of the Monkeys</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jātaka Number and Name</td>
<td>Verse Parallels</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------------------------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 59 Bherivādajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 60</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Drummer</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 60 Saṅkhadhamanajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Conch Blower</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 61 Asātamantajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 536:47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Disagreeable Charms</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 64 Durājānajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 519:26 ≠ Ja 536:59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about what is Difficult to Know</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 65 Anabhiratijātaka</td>
<td>Ja 464:9 ≠ Ja 536:34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about Discontent</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 71 Varanajātaka</td>
<td>Thag 3.3:1 ≠ Thag 3.15:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Temple Tree</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 72 Sīlavanāgajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 438:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Virtuous Elephant</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 73 Saccānkirajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 482:7 ≠ Ja 547:516</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Assertion of Truth</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 74 Rukkhadhammajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 492:18</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Way of Trees</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 75 Macchajātaka</td>
<td>Cp 30:7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Fish</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 82 Mittavindajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 369:2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (the Merchant) Mittavindaka</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsanajātaka</td>
<td>Ja 290:1 ≠ Ja 330:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 87 Maṅgalajātaka</td>
<td>Snp 2.13:2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Omens</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 90 Akataṇṇujātaka</td>
<td>Ja 409:5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about Ingratitude</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 91 Littajātaka</td>
<td>DN 23:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about what is Smeared (with Posison)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 94 Lomahaṁsajātaka</td>
<td>MN 12:1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about the Bristling Hair</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ja 95 Mahāsudassanajātaka</td>
<td>DN 16:23 ≠ DN 17:1 ≠ DN 15:20:2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Story about (King) Mahāsudassana</td>
<td>SN 6.15:2 ≠ SN 15:20:2</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The translators made no attempt to harmonize their translations across books, so it is sometimes difficult to see they are even translating the same verse. For instance, the verse that occurs in Ja 36 Sakuṇajātaka in Pāḷi reads like this:

\[
\text{Yāṁ nissitā jagatiruham vihaṅgamā,}
\]
\[
\text{sv-āyaṁ aggiṁ pamuñcati,}
\]
\[
\text{disā bhajatha vakkaṅgā, jātaṁ saraṇato bhayan-ti.}
\]

and is translated by Rouse thus:
You denizens of air, that in these boughs
Have sought a lodging, mark the seeds of fire
This earthborn tree is breeding! Safety seek
In flight! Our trusted stronghold harbours death!

The verse recurs in Ja 432 Padakusalamāṇavajātaka (vs 7) in essentially the same form, where Francis and Neil translate it:

Flame issues from the tree where we have lain:
Scatter, you birds. Our refuge proves our bane.

It has of course not been possible to harmonize these readings across books, as reuse is too common.

Characters in the Jātakas

The Bodhisatta’s Roles

I have made a survey of the roles that are played by the Bodhisatta and other people close to him in the Jātakas, and the findings are below.

The most popular epithet for the Bodhisatta in these stories is as a paṇḍita, a wise man, animal or god (1, 3, 5, 22, 25, 27, 33, 36, 37, 39, 44, 46, 49, 63, 70, 74, 80, 89, 91, 92, 98, 107, 108, 110, 111, 112, 138, 158, 170, 176, 183, 184, 186, 189, 192, 195, 215, 223, 242, 247, 272, 280, 305, 316, 317, 324, 331, 332, 333, 336, 345, 350, 364, 452, 367, 368, 387, 396, 401, 402, 404, 413, 438, 440, 446, 454, 461, 463, 466, 467, 471, 473, 480, 481, 495, 497, 498, 500, 508, 510, 515, 517, 530, 532, 538, 540, 542, 546). He is also named in a similar role, as a teacher (ācariya, sattha), in the following stories: 8, 41, 43, 61, 64, 65, 71, 81, 97, 117, 119, 123, 124, 130, 161, 169, 175, 182, 185, 197, 200, 203, 245, 252, 271, 287, 353, 373, 453, 522.

Another role that is similar to that of the wise man is that of an ascetic, of various sorts, tāpasa: 17, 76, 77, 87, 106, 144, 154, 162, 166, 167, 173, 207, 234, 244, 246, 251, 259, 273, 281, 284, 285, 293, 301, 313, 319, 328, 334, 337, 338, 346, 348, 376, 392, 411, 414, 418, 425, 426, 431, 433, 435, 436, 440, 444, 488, 490, 496, 511, 526, 532, 538); sometimes he is an ājivaka (94); or a wanderer (paribbājaka) (235, 408, 443, 528); or a sage (isi): 66, 362, 523.
He also appears as the family priest (purohita) 34, 86, 120, 214, 216, 241, 310, 330, 377, 487. A purohita is, of course, a brahmin, and besides these occasions the Bodhisatta is also named as a brahmin (brāhmaṇa) in the following Jātakas: 65, 71, 155, 163, 174, 237, 290, 299, 354, 389, 403, 405, 422, 432, 442, 479, 481, 509. He is also mentioned as a brahmin student (māṇava) a number of times: 163, 305, 356, 398, 405, 432, 467, 478.

He also appears as a wealthy man (seṭṭhi): 4, 40, 45, 47, 53, 83, 84, 93, 103, 125, 127, 131, 164, 171, 232, 238, 261, 315, 340, 363, 382); a merchant (vāṇija) = 3, 44, 98, 249, 324, 365; a caravan leader (satthavāha): 1, 2, 54, 85, 256, 366, 493; a landlord (kuṭumbika): 39; or a valuer (agghāpanika): 5. He features also as a salesman: 63; horse-dealer: 254; mariner: 463; doctor: 69, farmer: 56, 189, watchman: 265.

Rarely he also appears as an outcaste (caṇḍāla): 179, 309, 373, 497, 498; or in low-caste jobs, as a mahout: 182; potter: 178; stone cutter 137; smith: 387; carpenter: 466; barber: 78; acrobat: 212; drummer: 59; conch-blower: 60. He is also a gambler: 91; and a thief: 318.

Some roles are either quotes from other Jātakas, or the same character appearing in more than one Jātaka: the Bodhisatta appears as the wise Mahosadha in 111, 112, 170, 192, 350, 364, 452, 471, 500, 508, 517 as well as this being the lead character in 542.

Many times the Bodhisatta appears as Sakka, Lord of the Gods: 31, 202, 228, 264, 291, 300, 344, 372, 374, 386, 391, 393, 410, 417, 450, 458, 469, 470, 489, 512, 535; he is Mahābrahmā: 99, 101, 134, 135, 545; or a Deva or Devatā of some sort or other, often simply as a witness to the action of the story: 18, 19, 38, 74, 82, 102, 104, 105, 109, 113, 121, 139, 146, 147, 187, 190, 205, 209, 217, 227, 243, 272, 283, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 307, 311, 360, 361, 369, 400, 412, 419, 437, 439, 475, 485, 492, 506, 518, 520, 524.

The Bodhisatta appears as an animal quite frequently, often as a king, and sometimes simply as a wise member, of the species. He is found as a lion 143, 152, 153, 157, 172, 188, 222, 267, 357, 455, 456, 457, 514; monkey 20, 57, 58, 177, 208, 219, 222, 224, 342, 404, 407, 516; deer 11, 12, 15, 16, 21, 206, 359, 385, 482, 483, 501; bull: 28, 29, 278; buffalo: 88, ox, 30, 88, 286; horse 24, 196, 266; dog 22; jackal 142; pig 388; rat 128; mouse 129; iguana 138, 141, 325; and frog 239.

Many times he is a bird, either generic: 36, 115, 133, 308, 321, 384, 521; or specifically, as a goose: 32, 136, 270, 370, 434, 451, 502, 533, 534; quail: 33, 35, 118, 168, 394; partridge: 37, 438; pigeon: 42, 274, 275, 277, 375, 395; parrot: 145, 198, 255, 329, 429, 430, 484, 503; crow: 140, 204, 292; peacock: 159, 339, 491; vulture: 164, 381, 399, 427; chicken: 383, 448; cuckoo: 464, 536; or a woodpecker: 210; and in three stories he is a fish 75, 114, 236.

Other People’s Roles

We can see that there are several stock roles that are assigned to people known from Buddha Gotama’s life. Some are unsurprising: Suddhodana and Mahāmāyā often play the Bodhisatta’s parents in his previous lives, either separately: 428, 500, 508; or together: 7, 35, 156, 163, 201, 452, 461, 509, 542, 547; his wife, Rāhulamātā (mostly named as such in the Jātakas), very often plays the same role in the stories: 11, 95, 194, 201, 276, 281, 292, 328, 340, 387, 397, 408, 411, 415, 421, 424, 434, 443, 451, 458, 459, 461, 485, 506, 513, 525, 531, 539, 544, 546, 547, and she is once named as Bimbā in 542; Rāhula himself is often his son in a previous life: 9, 16, 95, 173, 188, 201, 250, 319, 354, 408, 444, 486, 525, 529, 539, 544, 546, 547.

Others are perhaps less obvious: as noted above, Sakka is quite often assigned to the Bodhisatta himself, but when it is not the Bodhisatta, it is usually Anuruddha:
194, 243, 316, 347, 429, 430, 441, 480, 485, 494, 499, 537, 540, 541, 546, 547, although on one occasion Moggallāna plays this role: 78.

Ānanda is very often designated as the king in the story, and most times as the king of Benares (often named as Brahmadatta): 12, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 66, 70, 77, 78, 107, 120, 140, 149, 155, 158, 159, 164, 171, 176, 182, 183, 184, 195, 214, 215, 226, 243, 251, 254, 259, 284, 292, 309, 310, 334, 346, 368, 376, 377, 388, 391, 396, 398, 403, 409, 418, 425, 431, 443, 455, 465, 473, 474, 476, 478, 482, 483, 512, 521, 540; though sometimes he is king of the Kurus (where named, he is Dhanañcaya): 441, 495, 496, 515, 546; the king of Pañcāla: 323, 503; the king of Kosala: 385; or a king of thieves: 282. For other male disciples who often appear in these Jātakas, but in no specific roles, look up Sāriputta, Moggallāna, Cassapa.

Of the female disciples, Uppalavaṇṇā often gets to be a goddess: 382, 392, 414, 442, 470, 511, 535, 538, 539, 540; though she plays a variety of roles other than this also: as a sister (15, 397, 488, 513, 543), mother (16), an old woman (29), a queen (66), a courtesan (276), a daughter (354, 408, 527, 547), an iguana (438), a deer (501), a mynah (521), a wise woman (542), a princess (544), and as a Nāga queen (546). Khemā, who was known for her wisdom, appears in 354, 397, 501, 502, 534, 539, in various roles. Khujuttarā, who remembered the collection known as the Itivuttaka, appears as a nurse in 354, 488, 525, 531.

One character who appears quite often is the Buddha’s brother-in-law and cousin, Devadatta. Again, he plays various roles, but always as someone in opposition to the Bodhisatta: 1, 3, 11, 12, 20, 21, 33, 51, 57, 58, 72, 73, 113, 122, 131, 142, 143, 160, 168, 174, 184, 189, 193, 199, 204, 206, 208, 209, 210, 220, 221, 222, 224, 231, 233, 240, 241, 243, 277, 294, 295, 308, 313, 326, 329, 335, 342, 353, 357, 358, 367, 389, 397, 404, 407, 416, 422, 438, 445, 448, 455, 457, 466, 472, 474, 482, 485, 492, 503, 505, 506, 514, 516, 518, 542, 543, 544, 545, 547. Another villain who appears quite often is Devadatta’s follower, Kokālika: 117, 172, 188, 189, 272, 294, 331, 466, 481.

Jātakas Outside of this Collection

Sometimes stories in the Jātaka collection have parallels in other places in the canon, for instance, most of the stories of the Cariyāpiṭaka are retold in the Jātaka book: 9, 35, 75, 95, 224, 276, 278, 303, 316, 442, 443, 444, 455, 457, 460, 480, 482, 488, 497, 499, 505, 506, 510, 513, 524, 532, 537, 538, 540, 541, 543, 544, 547. Cp 28 Saccasavhayapanḍitacariya, and the last story in the Cariyāpiṭaka, Cp 35 Mahālomahaṃsacariya, have no parallel in the collection. And contrarily, some Jātakas are not found in this collection, for instance, Mahāgovinda’s story which is found in DN 19 Mahāgovindasutta and Cp 5 Mahāgovindacariya.

We find some of the stories also told in the Vinaya: 10, 28, 37, 88, 183, 203. Mahāsuddasana’s story is told in the Dīghanikāya (DN 17), and appears also in Jātaka 95. As to how these stories probably came into being and developed their final form, please see Rhys Davids’ essay which follows this Introduction.

Buddhavaṃsa

The Buddhavaṃsa10 details the twenty-four Buddhas prior to our Buddha Gotama, and mainly focuses on who they were, their lifespans, their disciples and other items that parallel the life of Gotama. The first of these Buddhas is Dīpaṅkara, and it is under him that Sumedha makes his aspiration to become a Buddha himself. As the Bodhisatta has to renew his aspiration under each Buddha, he also appears in these stories.

In these stories the Bodhisatta is named as:

1. the brahmin Sumedha (brāhmaṇa)
2. the noble Vijitāvī (khattiya)
3. the brahmin Suruci (brāhmaṇa)
4. the king of the nāgas Atula (Nāgarājā)
5. the brahmin Atideva (brāhmaṇa)
6. the brahmin Sujāta (brāhmaṇa)
7. a Yakkha of great spiritual power (Yakkho mahiddhiko)
8. a lion (sīha)
9. a matted-haired ascetic (jaṭila)
10. the district governor Jaṭila (raṭṭhika)
11. the brahmin student Uttara (māṇava)

10 [cf. the Jātakanidāna, which expands on these stories.]
12. the lord of four continents (catudīpamhi issaro)
13. the brahmin Kassapa (brāhmaṇa)
14. the matted-haired ascetic Susīma (jaṭila)
15. Sakka Purindada
16. the ascetic Maṅgala (tāpasa)
17. the noble Sujāta (khattiya)
18. the noble Vijitāvī (again) (khattiya)
19. the king of the nāgas Atula (again) (Nāgarājā)
20. the noble Arindama (khattiya)
21. the noble Sudassana (khattiya)
22. the noble Khema (khattiya)
23. the noble Pabbata (khattiya)
24. the brahmin Jotipāla (brāhmaṇa) (see MN 81 below).

Cariyāpiṭaka

The Basket of Conduct

In 33 out of 35 of these stories which were written to illustrate the Perfections (Pārami) there is a parallel found in the larger collection. Two, Cp 28 and Cp 35, have no parallel.

Cp 1 Akitticariya (see Ja 480 Akittijātaka, Jm 7 Agastyya)
Cp 2 Saṅkhacariya (see Ja 442 Saṅkhajātaka)
Cp 3 Kurudhammacariya (see Ja 276 Kurudhammajātaka) Cp 4 Mahāsudassana (see Ja 95 Mahāsudassanajātaka, DN 17 Mahāsudassanasutta)
Cp 5 Mahāgovindacariya (see DN 19 Mahāgovindasutta)
Cp 6 Nimirājacariya (see Ja 541 Nimijātaka)
Cp 7 Candakumāracariya (see Ja 542 Khanḍahālajātaka)
Cp 8 Sivirājacariya (see Ja 499 Sivijātaka, Jm 2 Śibi)
Cp 9 Vessantaracariya (see Ja 547 Vessantarajātaka, Jm 9 Viśvantara)
Cp 10 Sasapaṇḍitacariya (see Ja 316 Sasajātaka, Jm 6 Śaśa)
Cp 11 Mātioposakacariya (see Ja 455 Mātioposakajātaka)
Cp 12 Bhūridattacariya (see Ja 543 Bhūridattajātaka)
Cp 13 Campeyyanāgacariya (see Ja 506 Campeyyajātaka, Mvu ii p 225 Campaka Mvu ii p 225 Campaka)
Cp 14 Cullabodhicariya (see Ja 443 Cullabodhijātaka, Jm 21 Cullabodhi)
Cp 15 Mahisarājacariya (see Ja 278 Mahisajātaka, Jm 33 Mahiša)
Cp 16 Rurumigāracariya (see Ja 482 Rurujātaka, Jm 26 Ruru)
Cp 17 Mātaṅgacariya (see Ja 497 Mātaṅgajātaka)
Cp 18 Dhammadesvaputtacariya (see Ja 457 Dhammajātaka)
Cp 19 Alīnasattucariya (see Ja 513 Jayaddisajātaka)
Cp 20 Saṅkhapālacariya (see Ja 524 Saṅkhapālajātaka)
Cp 21 Yudhañjayacariya (see Ja 460 Yuvañjayajātaka)
Cp 22 Somanassacariya (see Ja 505 Somanassajātaka)
Cp 23 Ayogharacariya (see Ja 510 Ayogharajātaka, Jm 32 Ayogṛha)
Cp 24 Bhisacariya (see Ja 488 Bhisajātaka, Jm 19 Bisa)
Cp 25 Soṇapanditacariya (see Ja 532 Soṇanandajātaka)
Cp 26 Temiyapanditacariya (see Ja 538 Mūgapakkhajātaka)
Cp 27 Kapirājacariya (see Ja 57 Vānarindajātaka, Mvu iii p 40 Vānara (II))
Cp 28 Saccasavhayapanditacariya (no parallel. Only one verse, he is said to have protected the truth)
Cp 29 Vaṭṭapotakacariya (see Ja 35 Vattakajātaka, Jm 16 Vartakāpītaka)
Cp 30 Maccharājacariya (see Ja 75 Macchajātaka, Jm 15 Matsya)
Cp 31 Kaṇhadjāpacariya (see Ja 444 Kaṇhadipāyanajātaka)
Cp 32 Sutasomacariya (see Ja 537 Mahāsutasomajātaka, Jm 31 Sutasoma)
Cp 33 Suvaṇṇasāmacariya (see Ja 540 Sāmajātaka)
Cp 34 Ekarājacariya (see Ja 303 Ekarājajātaka)

The last one, Cp 35 Mahālomahāmsacariya, The Great Hair-Raising Conduct, has no parallel in the main collection, but the Bodhisatta is there described as an ascetic who lives in a cemetery, and is unaffected by derision or praise.

DN 5 Kūṭadantasutta, section entitled Mahāvijitarājayaṅnakathā
The Long Story of King Mahāvijita’s Sacrifice

The brahmin Kūṭadanta and his friends go to see the Buddha and ask about sacrifices, and the Buddha tells of a great sacrifice made by a righteous king of old, Mahāvijita, in which no animals were killed, and no one was forced to contribute in any way.

The Bodhisatta = an unnamed family priest (purohita).
Introduction – xxiii

DN 19 Mahāgovinda

The Story of Mahāgovinda

cf. Cp. 4 Mahāgovindacariya

The story of a King's steward who inherited his father's title, and became the greatest steward of his age, dividing up much of the Middle Country. After going into seclusion and meditating on compassion, he meets with the Great Brahmā, and decides to go forth. Many follow his example and attain high states of being.

The Bodhisatta = the great steward, Mahāgovinda.

MN 81 Ghaṭikārasutta

The Story of Ghaṭikāra (and Jotipāla)

cf. Bv 24, also Ap 39.10.1

Two friends living in the time of the Buddha Kassapa, one of them, the potter Ghaṭikāra, is full of faith, and takes his friend the brahmin student Jotipāla, who is sceptical and speaks bad of the Buddha, to meet him. After listening to a Dhamma talk, Jotipāla gains faith and goes forth. The Buddha praises his friend Ghaṭikāra to Kiki, the king of Kāsi.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin student, Jotipāla (brāhmaṇa)

SN 22.96 Gomayapiṇḍasutta

A Lump of Cow Dung

The Bodhisatta was once a great king with 84,000 of everything, but he and all he possessed passed away, such is the power of impermanence.

The Bodhisatta = an unnamed king (rājā).

AN 3.15 Pacetanasutta

The Story of (King) Pacetana

A story of a chariot-maker who builds two wheels for King Pacetena, one in six months and another in six days. The one taking longer being of good quality, while the one made quickly being defective.
The Bodhisatta = the chariot-maker (rathakāra).

AN 9.20 Velāmasutta
The Story of (the Brahmin) Velāma

The story tells of a brahmin who gave a most magnificent gift, but there was no one worthy to receive and purify the gift.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin Velāma (brāhmaṇa).

Ap 39.10 Pubbakammapilotika-Buddhāpadāna
The Traditions about the Buddha (known as) the Connection with Previous Deeds

Ten lives and stories explaining why the Buddha suffered in his last life as a result of bad deeds in previous lives.

In four of these lives the Bodhisatta is named as:

1. the brahmin student Jotipāla (brāhmaṇamāṇava)
2. the scoundrel Munāḷi (dhutta)
3. the scoundrel Munāḷi (again) (dhutta)
4. the brahmin Sutavā (brāhmaṇa) in others he is unnamed, but appears as:

5. a younger brother (kaniṭṭhabhātā)
6. a young man of family (kula)
7. an elephant’s groom (hatthigopaka)
8. a king in a border country (paccantadese rājā)
9. a fisherman (kevaṭṭa)
10. a young man of family (kula)
11. a wrestler (malla)
12. as a physician (vejja).
Acknowledgements

The original transcription of this work was made by a team working at sacred-texts.com from 2006-2010; these were then collected and converted into epub files by Ven Khemaratana. The present revision was made by first proof-reading these files, then modifying them as explained in the Introduction.

At the beginning of the revision I often had to make document-wide find and replace operations on a 3,000 page plus document. The dangers of this will be understood by anyone who has tried it! I am very grateful indeed, therefore, to the people who read it through and helped me iron out many of the mistakes.

First of all, I should mention my long time helper, Donny Hacker, who read through the early revisions of this work, and picked up many mistakes that had crept in. Latterly, Dr. Ari Ubeyskara read through the entire work, in a very short time, and made many corrections and intelligent suggestions.

I am grateful to Ven Dhammika who read through the Introduction and helped me improve it in many places. Over the years we have had many interesting conversations about the Jātakas, and about India at the time of the Buddha, which has helped me understand the text and its context better.

The work is more consistent, and lacks many faults, because of the generosity of these helpers. If any mistakes or inconsistencies remain, I would be very grateful if you would take the time to point them out, so I can improve on what I now present in this first edition of the revised translation.

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu
November, 2021
Select Bibliography

The Text

The Translation

Francis, H. T. The Jātaka, or Stories of the Buddha’s Former Births Vol V. University Press, 1905.

Other Works

Introduction

Horner, I. B. Minor Anthologies, Buddhavaṃsa (Chronicle of Buddhas) and Jayawickrama, N. A. The Story of Gotama Buddha (Jātaka-Nidāna). The Pali Text Ñāṇamoli, Bhikkhu, and Bhikkhu Bodhi. The Middle Length Discourse of the Buddha.
Rhys Davids, T.W. Buddhist India. T. Fisher Unwin, 1911.

Abbreviations

Ja = Jātaka-aṭṭhakathā (as reconstructed on ABT)
DN = Dīghanikāya (Sutta Number)
MN = Majjhimanikāya (Sutta Number)
SN = Saṁyuttanikāya (Saṁyutta and Sutta Number)
Ud = Udāna (Section and Number)
Vv = Vimānavatthu
Cp = Cariyāpiṭaka (Number)
Vin Pār = Vinaya Pārājika (Section)

[All Vinaya references are followed by PTS Volume and Page Number in brackets.]
Introduction – xxviii

Vin Sd = Vinaya Sañghādisesa
Vin Nis Pāc = Vinaya Nissaggapācittiya (Section)
Vin Pāc = Vinaya Pācittiya (Section)
Vin Sekh = Vinaya Sekhiya (Section)
Vin Bhikkhunī Pāc = Vinaya Bhikkhunī Pācittiya (Section)
Vin Mv = Vinaya Mahāvagga (Section)
Vin Cv = Vinaya Cullavagga (Section)

Dhp-a = Dhammapada-aṭṭhakathā (Chapter and Section)
Snp-a = Suttanipāta-aṭṭhakathā (Sutta Number)
DN-a = Dīghanikāya-aṭṭhakathā (Sutta Number)

Mvu = Mahāvastu (Marciniak Edition)
Jm = Jātakamālā (Chapter)

Rāmāyaṇa
Krṣṇāyaṇa
The Dates of the Jātaka Book

T.W. Rhys Davids

The [189] Jātaka book,[13] which we have now had before us for some years, in full, in the admirable edition of the Pāli text by Professor Fausboll, is now also approaching its completion in the English translation published at Cambridge under the supervision of Professor Cowell. It is so full of information on the daily habits and customs and beliefs of the people of India, and on every variety of the numerous questions that arise as to their economic and social conditions, that it is of the utmost importance to be able to determine the period to which the evidence found in this book is applicable. The problem is somewhat complicated. But if only the right distinctions be drawn, the solution of it seems to me substantially sure, and really perfectly simple.

That we should have to draw distinctions between different parts of the same book is nothing [190] surprising. As Professor Deussen has said of the early Upanishads, and as Professor Winternitz has said of the Mahābhārata, so also may be said of the Nikāyas and of the Vinaya (and even of some portions of the Abhidhamma), that “we must judge each separate piece by itself.” And this is really only the very natural and necessary result of what has been pointed out above,[14] that the books grew up gradually, that they were not books in our modern sense, and that they had no single authors.

The distinctions we have to draw will best be shown by an example. The following is an abstract of a typical Jātaka.

---

12 [This was one chapter of Prof. Rhys Davids' Buddhist India, published in 1903. There it was titled: Chapter XI. The Jātaka Book. The transcript is slightly altered from the original so that it follows the formatting of the present work.]

13 The following is an enlarged restatement of views first put forward in the introduction (written in August, 1878) to my Buddhist Birth Stories [from which the translation of the Jātakanidāna has been extracted].

14 [I.e. in a previous chapter, not reproduced here.]
The Dates of the Jātaka Book – xxx

The Banyan-Deer Birth Story [Ja 12]

‘

“Follow rather the Banyan Deer.” This the Master told when at Jetavana about the mother of Kumārakassapa,’ and so on.

Then follows the story of this lady, how, after being wrongly found guilty of immoral conduct, she had been declared innocent through the intervention of the Buddha. Then it is said that the brethren talking this matter over at eventide, the Buddha came there, and learning the subject of their discourse said: “Not now only has the Tathāgata proved a support and protection to these two [the lady and her son]; formerly also he was the same.” Then, on request, he revealed that matter, concealed by change of birth.

“Once upon a time, when Brahmadatta was [191] reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was reborn as a deer, a king of the deer, by name the Banyan Deer,” and so on.

This is the Jātaka proper. It tells how there were two herd of deer shut in in the king’s park. The king or his cook went daily to hunt for deer for venison. For each one killed many were wounded or harassed by the chase. So the golden coloured Banyan Deer, king of one of the herds, went to the king of the other herd, the Branch Deer, and persuaded him to a compact that lots should be cast, and that, every day, the one deer on whom the lot fell should go voluntarily to the cook’s place of execution, and lay his head upon the block. And this was done. And so by the daily death of one the rest were saved from torture and distress.

Now one day the lot fell upon a pregnant doe in Branch Deer’s herd. She applied to the king of that herd to order that the lot, “which was not meant to fall on two at once,” should pass her by. But he harshly bade her begone to the block. Then she went to King Banyan Deer and told her piteous tale. He said he would see to it, and he went himself and laid his head on the block. Now the king had decreed immunity to the two kings of the respective herds. When the cook saw King Banyan Deer lying there with his head on the block, he went hastily and told the king of the men. The latter mounted his chariot, and with a great retinue went to the spot, and said:

“My friend, the king of the deer, did I not grant your life? Why are you here?”

Then the king of [192] the deer told him all. And the man-king was greatly touched, and said: “Rise up! I grant you your lives, both to you and to her!” Then the rejoinder came: “But though two be thus safe, what shall the rest of the herds do, O king of men?” So they also obtained security. And when the Banyan Deer had similarly procured protection for all the various sorts of living things, the king of the deer exhorted the king of men to justice and mercy, preaching the truth to him “with the grace of a Buddha.”

And the doe gave birth to a son, beautiful as buds of flowers, and he went playing with the Branch Deer’s herd. Then his mother exhorted him in a verse:

   “Follow rather the Banyan, dear;
    Cultivate not the Branch!
   Death, with the Banyan, were better far,
    Than, with the Branch, long life.”\(^{15}\)

And the Banyan Deer made a compact with the men that wherever leaves were tied round a field the deer should not trespass, and he made all the deer keep to the bargain. From that time, they say, the sign of the tying of leaves was seen in the fields.\(^{16}\)

This is the end of the Jātaka proper, the “Story of the Past.”

Then the Teacher identified the characters in the story as being himself and his contemporaries in a [193] former birth. “He who was then the Branch is now Devadatta, his herd the members of the Order who followed Devadatta in his schism, the doe is now Kumārakassapa’s mother, the deer she gave birth to is now her son Kumārakassapa, the king of the [194] men is now Ānanda, but Banyan, the king of the deer, was I myself.”

\textbf{The Banyan Deer Jātaka Story}

\(^{15}\) I have tried to imitate the form of riddle in which the verse appears in Pāli.
\(^{16}\) Very probably the origin of the fable is to be found in a popular explanation of this curious old custom.
[Three episodes on one bas-relief.]

The bas-relief here reproduced from the Bharhut Tope illustrates, on one picture, several scenes from this Jātaka.

In this story we have first the outer framework, constituted by the introductory episode and the concluding identification. Encased in this we have the Jātaka proper, the “Story of the past,” as it is called in Pāli. And in this again we have what is, in the existing canonical Jātaka book, the kernel of the whole, the verse. Each of these has a separate history.
The oldest form in which we find any Jātaka is, as might be naturally expected, the simple fable or parable itself, without the outer framework at all, and without the verse. Thus in one of the Nikāyas\(^\text{17}\) we have an exhortation to maintain a constant presence of mind, for that is “the proper sphere” of a religieux. Should he do otherwise, should he allow worldly things to agitate his mind, then will he fall – as the field quail, when he left his customary and ancestral haunts, fell into the power of the hawk. And the fable is told as an introduction to the exhortation. It has, as yet, no framework. And it contains no verse.\(^\text{18}\) It has not yet, therefore, become a Jātaka.\(^\text{[195]}\)

But one of the Jātakas is precisely this very fable, in identical words for the most part. It is decked out with a framework of introductory story and concluding identification, just as in the example just given. And two verses are added, one in the fable itself, and one in the framework. And there can be no question as to which is the older document; for the Jātaka quotes as its source, and by name and chapter, the very passage in the Saṁyutta in which the fable originally occurs.\(^\text{19}\)

This is not an isolated case. Of the Jātakas in the present collection I have discovered also the following in older portions of the canonical books, and no doubt others can still be traced.\(^\text{20}\)

2. Ja 1\(^\text{21}\) Apanṇakajātaka is based on DN 23 Pāyāsisutta (2.342)
3. Ja 9 Makhādevajātaka is based on MN 83 Makhādevasutta (2.75)
4. Ja 10 Sukhavīharijātaka is based on Vin Cv 7 (2.182)
5. Ja 37 Tittirajātaka is based on Vin Cv 6 (2.161)
6. Ja 91 Littajātaka is based on DN 23 Pāyāsisutta (2.348)
7. Ja 95 Mahāsuddassanajātaka is based on DN 17 Mahāsuddassanasutta (2.169)

---

\(^\text{17}\) SN 54 Ānāpānasāmyuttaṁ 5, Akusalarāsisutta (5.146), of the M. Feer’s edition for the Pali Text Society.

\(^\text{18}\) M. Feer, indeed, prints two lines as if they were verse. But this is a mistake. The lines so printed are not verse.

\(^\text{19}\) Ja 168 Sakuṇagghijātaka (2.58).

\(^\text{20}\) Thus Ja 28 = Vin. 4.5.

\(^\text{21}\) [The presentation of the references have been modified for clarity.]
8. Ja 203 Khandhavattajātaka is based on Vin Cv 5 (2.109)\(^{22}\)
9. Ja 253 Maṇikaṭṭhajātaka is based on Vin Sd 6 (3.145)
10. Ja 405 Bakabrahmajātaka is based on MN 49 Brahmanimantanikasutta (1.328) & SN 6.8 Bakabrahmasutta (1.142)

The heroes of two of these stories, Makhādeva and Mahāsudassana, are already in these older documents identified at the end of the stories with the Buddha in a previous birth. In the Mahāsudassana, in the Litta, and in the second of the two older versions of the Baka story, the verses are given. In all the rest both identification and verses are still, as yet, wanting. [196]

The reverse case is about as frequent; that is to say, stories are told in the older documents, and the hero is expressly identified with the Buddha in a previous birth, and nevertheless these stories are not included in our Jātaka collection.\(^{23}\) Such stories even before the Jātaka book grew up were called Jātakas.

There is a very ancient division found already in the Nikāyas, of Buddhist literature into nine classes.\(^{24}\) One of these is “Jātakam,” that is to say, Jātakas. And this must refer to such episodes in previously existing books. It cannot refer to the Jātaka book now included in the Canon, for that was not yet in existence. And it is important to notice that in no one of these instances of the earliest compositions that were called Jātakas is the Buddha identified in his previous birth with an animal. He is identified only with famous sages and teachers of olden time. This was the first idea to be attached to the word Jātaka. What we find in the canonical book is a later development of it.

Such are the oldest forms, in the Buddhist literature, of the Jātakas. And we learn from them two facts, both of importance. In the first place these oldest forms

\(^{22}\) [Mistakenly given as 3.1095 in the original.]
\(^{23}\) So for instance MN 81 Ghaṭikārasutta (2.53); DN 19 Mahāgovindasutta (PTS 2.220); Pacetana’s wheelwright AN 3.15 Sacetanasutta (1.111); and Mahāvijaya’s priest DN 5 Kūṭadantasutta (1.143). The story of Mahāgovinda occurs, as a Jātaka, in the Cariyāpiṭaka.
\(^{24}\) MN 21 Kākacūpamasutta (1.123): AN 4.6. Appassutasutta (2.7, etc.) — P.P., 43, 178; Vinaya, 3.8. The phrase Navaṅganī Buddhavacanani is later.
have, for the most part, no framework and no verse. They are fables, parables, legends, entirely (with two exceptions) in prose.

Secondly, our existing Jātaka book is only a partial [197] record. It does not contain all the Jātakas that were current, in the earliest period of their literature, among the Buddhist community.

So much is certain. But I venture to go farther and to suggest that the character of these ten earlier Jātakas, in their pre-Jātaka shape, enables us to trace their history back beyond the Buddhist literature altogether. None of them are specially Buddhist. They are modified, perhaps, more or less to suit Buddhist ethics. But even the Mahāsudassana, which is the most so, is in the main simply an ancient Indian legend of sun worship. And the rest are pre-Buddhistic Indian folklore. There is nothing peculiarly Buddhist about them. Even the ethics they inculcate are Indian. What is Buddhist about them, in this their oldest shape, is only the selection made. There was, of course, much other folklore, bound up with superstition. This is left out. And the ethic is, of course, of a very simple kind. It is milk for babes. This comes out clearly in the legend of the Great King of Glory – the Mahāsudassana. In its later Jātaka form it lays stress on the impermanence of all earthly things, on the old lesson of the vanity of the world. In its older form, as a Suttanta, it lays stress also on the Absorptions (the Jhānas), which are perhaps pre-Buddhistic, and on the Divine Abidings (the Brahmavihāras), which are certainly distinctively Buddhistic (though a similar idea occurs in the later Yoga Sutra, 1.33). These are much deeper, and more difficult, matters. [198]

So much for the earliest forms in which we find the Jātakas. The next evidence in point of date is that of the bas-reliefs on the Bharhut and Sānchi Stūpas – those invaluable records of ancient Indian archaeology of which so much use has been made in this volume. Among the carvings on the railings round these stūpas are a number of scenes, each bearing as a title in characters of the third century B.C., the name of a Jātaka; and also other scenes, without a title, but similar in character. Twenty-seven of the scenes have been recognised as illustrating passages in the existing Jātaka Book. Twenty-three are still unidentified, and some of these latter are meant, no doubt, to illustrate Jātaka stories current in the community, but not included in the canonical collection.

Now let the reader compare the bas-relief above with the Jātaka story given above. In the background three deer are being shot at, two are running away, one is looking back in fear, one has fallen. In the foreground, to the left, a deer lies with its head on the block. In the centre foreground, the king of the deer, distinguished by his antlers, crouches beside the block, and close by him is a man, presumably the cook. In the centre the king of the deer exhorts the king of the men.

It may be noticed in passing that this strange device of putting several scenes of the same story on one plate is not confined to Indian art. The Greeks did the same, and it was common in Europe at the time of the revival of the arts after the dark ages. [199]

But while the Indian artist has not hesitated to suggest in his plate so many points in the story, he omits all reference to the verse, or even to that episode in which the verse occurs. The bas-relief, however, resembles the verse in one important respect. It would be absolutely unintelligible to anyone not familiar with the story as told in prose. It is the same with all these bas-reliefs. None of them, except as explained below, illustrate the verse, or the framework of the story. None are intelligible without a knowledge of the prose.

The exception referred to is the figure on the Bharhut Stupa (Plate xxvi.), unfortunately broken, but bearing in clear letters the inscription, “Yañ bamaṇo avayesi Jātaka.” These are the opening words of the verse in this story which, in the printed edition, is called the Anḍabhūtajātaka [Ja 62]. This is exactly as if the deer story above were called the “Follow rather the Banyan” Jātaka. The fact is, as I pointed out already in 1880, that very great uncertainty prevails as to the titles of these stories, the same story being very often called in the existing collection by different names. Even one of these very old bas-reliefs itself has actually inscribed over it two distinct names in full. The carving illustrates a fable about a cat and a cock; and it is labelled, in Pāḷi, both “Cat Jātaka” and “Cock Jātaka.”

As I then said:

“The reason for this is very plain. When a fable about a lion and a jackal was told (as in Ja 157) to show the advantage of a good character, and it was necessary to choose a short title for it, it was called the “Lion Jātaka” or the “Jackal Jātaka” or even the “Good Character Jātaka.” And when a fable was told about a turtle, to show the evil results which follow on talkativeness (as in Ja 215), the fable might as well be called the “Chatterbox Jātaka” as the “Turtle Jātaka”; and it is referred to accordingly under both those names. It must always have been difficult, if not impossible, to fix upon a short title which should at once characterise the lesson to be taught, and the personages through whose acts it was taught. And different names would thus arise, and become interchangeable.”

---

25 Cunningham, Stūpa of Bharhut, Pl. xlvii.

We should not be surprised, therefore, to find in this one instance the catchwords of the verse used also as a title. And it is a most fortunate thing that in this solitary instance the words of the verse are extant in an inscription of the third century B.C.

The next evidence we have to consider is that of the Jātaka Book itself. The canonical work, containing the verses only (and therefore quite unintelligible without a commentary), is very rare even in MSS., and has not yet been edited. It would be very interesting to see what it has to say about the titles, and whether it gives any various readings in the verses.

What we have, in the well-known edition by Professor Fausböll, is the commentary. We do not know its date. But as we know of no commentaries of this sort written before the fifth century A.D. – they were all handed down till then by word of [201] mouth – it is probable that this one also is of about the same date. The author gives a slight account of himself in the opening verses, but without mentioning his name. He names three scholars who instigated him to undertake the work, and says it is based on the tradition as then handed on in the Great Monastery at Anuradhapura in Ceylon. Twice in the seven long volumes he alludes to Ceylon scholars of the second century A.D. And though he only does so in notes, we may fairly conclude from all this that he probably wrote in Ceylon. Professor Childers thought he was identical with the Buddhaghosa famous as the 26 Buddhist Birth Stories, p. lxi.

---

27 I have discussed these two difficult and interesting notes in an article entitled, “The Last to go Forth,” JRAS, 1902.
author of other great commentaries. But for reasons given elsewhere, this is, I think, impossible. 28

How far, then, did our unknown author vary from the tradition handed down to him? How far had that tradition, with respect at least to the historical inferences suggested by it, preserved the tone and character of that much more ancient date to which the verses themselves can be assigned? It is a difficult question, and can only be finally solved when, by a careful and detailed study of the whole of these volumes, we shall have been able to discover every case of probable age, and to weigh the general result to be derived from them all. Dr. Lüders, in two admirable articles on the Isisiṅga Legend, has shown how, in two or three instances, the prose [202] version in the commentary gives us a version of the story, later, in some respects, than that implied by the verses. 29 This is not exactly the point we are considering, but it is closely allied to it. Dr. Fick has subjected all the references contained in the Jātaka Book to the social conditions in North eastern India to a detailed and careful analysis. He has come to the conclusion that, as regards the verses and the prose part of the stories themselves, as distinct from the framework, they have been scarcely altered from the state they were in when they were handed down from mouth to mouth among the early Buddhists, and that they can be referred undoubtedly, in all that relates to those social conditions, to the time of the Buddha himself. 30 Hofrath Bühler, perhaps the very highest authority we had in Indian history, and a scholar whom no one will accuse of partiality to Buddhism, says:

“The chief point for consideration is if, in effecting the loan, the Buddhist monks altered much; and especially if the descriptions of life which the Jātakas contain have been made to agree with that of the times when Buddhism had become a power in India. The answer can only be that there are remarkably few traces of Buddhism in those stories, and that they do 28 Buddhist Birth Stories, pp. lxiii., foll. Also the note in Dialogues of the Buddha, i. 17.

29 In the Proceedings of the Royal Academy at (Göttingen, 1897 and 1901).
30 Dr. Richard Fick, Sociale Gliederung im nordöstlichen Indian zu Buddha’s zeit, pp. vi., vii.
The Dates of the Jātaka Book – xxxix not describe the condition of India in the third or fourth century B.C., \textit{but an older one.}” [203]

And he gives his reasons:

“The descriptions of the political, religious, and social conditions of the people clearly refer to the ancient time before the rise of the great Eastern dynasties of the Nandas and the Mauryas, when Pataliputra had become the capital of India. The Jātakas mention neither the one nor the other, and they know nothing of great empires which comprised the whole or large parts of India. The number of the kingdoms, whose rulers play a part in the Stories, is very considerable. The majority of the names, as Madra, the two Pañcālas, Kosala, Videha, Kāsi, and Vidarbha, agree with those mentioned in the Vedic literature; while a few others, like Kāliṅga and Assaka, occur, in brahminical literature, first in the Epics and in Pāṇini’s Sūtras. The characteristic names of the Andhras, the Pāṇḍyas, and the Keralas are not mentioned.

Though a political centre was wanting, frequent statements regarding the instruction of the young brahmins and nobles show that there was an intellectual centre, and that it lay in Takkasila, the capital of distant Gandhara… And it is very credible that Gandhāra, the native country of Pāṇini, was a stronghold of brahminical learning certainly in the fourth and fifth centuries B.C., and perhaps even earlier. The statements regarding the religious condition of India point to an equally early period. Just as the Three Vedas are the basis of the higher instruction, so the prevalent religion is that of the path of works with its ceremonies and sacrifices, among which several, like the Vājapeya and the Rājasūya, are specially and repeatedly mentioned. Side by side with these appear popular festivals, celebrated, when the Nakṣatra had [204] been proclaimed, with general merrymakings and copious libations of \textit{surā}, as well as the worship of demons and trees, all of which go back to the earliest times. Nor are the hermits in the woods and the wandering ascetics unknown… The state of civilisation described in the Jātakas is in various respects primitive, and particularly noteworthy is the prevalence of wood architecture, which, on the evidence of the earliest sculptures, had almost disappeared in the third century B.C. The Jātakas even describe the palaces of kings as usually constructed of wood. Many other details might be added, but the facts given are sufficient for our purpose.”

Professor Fausböll himself, the editor of the Jātaka book, expresses, in the Preface to the last volume, a very similar opinion. The consensus of opinion among these distinguished scholars – the only ones who have written on this particular point – is sufficient, at least, to shift the burden of proof. Instead of neglecting altogether, for the history of India, what the Jātaka says, we may make historical inferences from statements made in the stories themselves (not in the framework) as presumptive evidence for the period in which, by a fortunate chance, the stories were preserved for us by their inclusion in the Basket of Buddhist tradition. That tradition is found to have preserved, fairly enough, in political and social matters, the earlier view. The verses, of course, are the most trustworthy, as being, in language, some centuries older. But the prose, which must have accompanied them throughout, and is [205] taken for granted in the illustrations on the ancient bas-reliefs, ought also, in such questions, to have due weight attached to it.

We may already note some points in the comparative age of the Jātakas, as compared one with another, especially at two stages in the formation of the tradition. The whole of the longer stories, some of them as long as a modern novelette, contained in Vol. VI. of the edition, are later, both in language and in their view of social conditions in India, than those in the earlier volumes. Yet several of those latest in the collection are shown by the bas-reliefs to have been already in existence in the third century B.C. And this holds good, not only of the verses, but also of the prose, for the bas-reliefs refer to the prose portions of the tales.

So also, at an earlier stage, it is possible to conclude that some of the tales, when they were first adopted into the Buddhist tradition (that is, certainly, not later than the beginning of the third century, B.C.), were already old. We have seen above that, out of those tales of which we can trace the pre-Jātaka book form, a large proportion, 60 to 70 per cent., had no verses. Now, in the present collection, there are a considerable number of tales which, as tales, have no verses. The verses (necessarily added to make the stories into Jātakas) are found only in the framework. And there are [306] other tales, where the verses do not occur in the story itself, but are put, like a chorus, into the mouth of a Devatā who has really nothing else to do with the story. It follows, I think, that these stories existed, without the verses, before they were adopted into the Buddhist scheme of Jātakas by having verses added to them; and that they are, therefore, probably, not only pre-Buddhistic, but very old.

---

On the other hand, as we have seen in the last chapter, the very custom, on which the Jātaka system is based, of handing down tales or legends in prose, with only the conversation in verse, is itself pre-Buddhistic. And the Jātaka Book is only another example, on a very extensive scale, of that pre-Epic form of literature of which there are so many other, shorter, specimens preserved for us in the earlier canonical texts.

To sum up:

1. The canonical Book of the Jātakas contains only the verses. It was composed in North India, in the so-called 'Middle Country,' before the time of Asoka. It is still unpublished.

2. It is absolutely certain that, with these verses, there must have been handed down, from the first, an oral commentary giving the stories in prose; for the verses without the stories are unintelligible.

3. Bas-reliefs of the third century B.C. have been found illustrating a number of these prose stories. One of these bas-reliefs gives also half of a verse.

4. There are Jātaka stories in those canonical books that are older than the Jātaka Book.

5. These oldest extant Jātakas are similes, parables, [207] or legends. They usually give us neither framework nor verses. In them the Buddha, in his previous birth, is never identified with an animal, or even with an ordinary man. He is identified only with some famous sage of bygone times.

6. Our present edition is not an edition of the text, but of the commentary. It was written probably in the fifth century A.D. in Ceylon by an author whose name is not known.
7. This commentary, which contains all the verses, contains also the prose stories in which they occur. To each such story it further gives a framework of introductory episode (stating when and where and on what occasion the story is supposed to have been spoken by the Buddha); and of final identification (of the characters in each story with the Buddha and his contemporaries in a previous birth).

8. This commentary is a translation into Pālī of the commentary as handed down in Ceylon. That earlier commentary, now lost, was in the Singhalese language throughout, except as regards the verses, which were in Pālī.

9. The Pālī commentary, as we now have it, has in the stories preserved, for the most part, the tradition handed down from the third century B.C. But in one or two instances variations have already been discovered.

10. As regards the allusions to political and social conditions, they refer, for the most part, to the state of things that existed in North India in and before the Buddha’s time.

11. When the original Jātaka was being gradually formed most of the stories were taken bodily over from the existing folklore of North India.

12. Some progress has already been made in determining the relative age, at that time, of the stories. Those in the sixth and last volumes are both the longest and latest. Some of these were already selected for illustration on the bas-reliefs of the third century B.C.

13. All the Jātakas have verses attached to them. In a few instances these verses are in the framework, not in the stories themselves. Such stories, without the verses, have probably preserved the original form of the Indian folklore.

14. In a few instances, the verses, though in the stories, are in them only as a sort of chorus, and do not form part of the narrative. In these instances, also, a similar conclusion may be drawn.

15. The whole collection forms the most reliable, the most complete, and the most ancient collection of folklore now extant in any literature in the world.
The Nidānakathā

or, Introduction to the Jātaka Stories from

Buddhist Birth Stories

or

Jātaka Tales

The oldest collection of folk-lore extant being the

Jātakathavaṇṇanā

For the first time Edited in the Original Pāli by

V. Fausböll

and translated by

T. W. Rhys Davids

1880 translation revised by

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

November 2021
Nidānakathā

Introduction

vv. 1-11. [1.1] {1.1} The Apanṇaka and other Jātaka Stories, which in times gone by were recounted on various occasions by the great illustrious Sage, and in which during a long period our Teacher and Leader, desiring the salvation of mankind, fulfilled the vast conditions of Buddhahood, were all collected together and added to the canon of Dhamma by those who made the recension, and rehearsed them under the name of the Jātaka. Having bowed at the feet of the Great Sage, the lord of the world, by whom in innumerable existences boundless benefits were conferred upon mankind, and having paid reverence to the Dhamma, and ascribed honour to the Saṅgha, the receptacle of all honour; and having removed all dangers by the efficacy of that meritorious act of veneration and honour referring to the Three Jewels, I proceed to recite a Commentary upon this Jātaka, illustrating as it does the infinite efficacy of the actions of great men – a commentary based upon the method of exposition current among the inmates of the Great Monastery [Mahāvihāra]. And I do so at the personal request of the elder Atthadāsī, who lives apart from the world and ever dwells with his fraternity, and who desires the perpetuation of this chronicle of Buddha; and likewise of Buddhāmitta the tranquil and wise, sprung from the race of Mahiṁśasaka, skilled in the canons of interpretation; and moreover of the monk Buddhadeva of clear intellect. May all good men lend me their favourable attention while I speak! {1.2}

Inasmuch as this comment on the Jātaka, if it be expounded after setting forth the three Epochs, the distant, the middle, and proximate, will be clearly understood by those who hear it by being understood from the beginning, therefore I will 32 Lit. perfected the vast constituents of Buddhahood, the Pāramitā are meant.

33 Lit. in thousands of koṭis of births; a koṭi is ten millions.
34 [In Anurādhapura, Sri Lanka.]
35 [It is interesting to note that the writer acknowledges a heterodox monastic, even while promoting his interpretation as orthodox.]
36 The above lines in the original are in verse. I have found it impossible to follow the arrangement of the verses, owing to the extreme involution of the style.
expound it after setting forth the three Epochs. Accordingly from the very outset it will be well to determine the limits of these Epochs. Now the narrative of the Bodhisatta’s existence, from the time that, at the feet of Buddha Dīpankara, he formed a resolution to become a Buddha to his rebirth in the Tusita heaven after leaving the Vessantara existence, is called the Distant Epoch. From his leaving the Tusita heaven to his attainment of omniscience on the throne of Awakening, the narrative is called the Intermediate Epoch. And the Proximate Epoch is to be found in the various places in which he sojourned (during his ministry on earth).

The following is:

I The Distant Epoch

[The Story of Sumedha]

Tradition tells us that four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand cycles ago there was a city called Amaravatī. In this city there dwelt a brahmin named Sumedha, of good family on both sides, on the father’s and the mother’s side, of pure conception for seven generations back, by birth unreproached and respected, a man comely, well-favoured and amiable, and endowed with remarkable beauty. He followed his brahminical studies without engaging in any other pursuit.

His parents died while he was still young. A minister of state, who acted as steward of his property, bringing forth the roll-book of his estate, threw open the stores filled with gold and silver, gems and pearls, and other valuables, and said: “So much, young man, belonged to your mother, so much to your father, so much to your grandparents and great-grandparents,” and pointing out to him the property inherited through seven generations, he bade him guard it carefully. The wise Sumedha thought to himself, “After amassing all this wealth my parents and ancestors when they went to another world took not a farthing with them, can it be right that I should make it an object to take my wealth with me when I go?” And informing the king of his intention, he caused proclamation to be made in the city, gave largess to the people, and embraced the ascetic life.

---

37 An asaṅkheyya is a period of vast duration, lit. an incalculable.
38 Lit. “caused the drums to be beat.”
To make this matter clear the Story of Sumedha must here be related. This story, though given in full in the Buddhavaṃsa, from its being in a metrical form, is not very easy to understand. I will therefore relate it with sentences at intervals explaining the metrical construction.

Four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand cycles ago there was a city called Amaravatī or Amara, resounding with the ten city cries, concerning which it is said in Buddhavaṃsa, [1.3]

12. “Four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand cycles ago
There was a city called Amara, beautiful and pleasant, Resounding with the ten cries, abounding in food and drink.”

Then follows a verse of Buddhavaṃsa, enumerating some of these cries, 13. “The trumpeting of elephants, the neighing of horses, (the sound of) drums, trumpets, and chariots,

   And viands and drinks were cried, with the invitation: Eat and drink.”

It goes on to say,

14. “A city supplied with every requisite, engaged in every sort of industry, Possessing the seven precious things, thronged with dwellers of many races.”

The abode of devout men, like the prosperous city of the Devas.

15. “In the city of Amaravatī dwelt a brahmin named Sumedha, Whose hoard was many tens of millions, blest with much wealth and store;

16. Studious, knowing the Mantras, versed in the three Vedas, Teacher of the science of divination and of the traditions and observances of his caste.”

Now one day the wise Sumedha, having retired to the splendid upper apartment of his house, seated himself cross-legged, and started thinking. “Oh! Wise man, grievous is rebirth in a new existence, and the dissolution of the body in each 39 Here a gloss in the text enumerates the whole ten cries.

40 The Bodhisatta is frequently called paṇḍita, e.g. sasapaṇḍito (Five Jāt. 52), Rāmapaṇḍito (Dasaratha Jāt. 1). successive place where we are reborn. I am subject to birth, to decay, to disease, to death – it is right, being such, that I should strive to attain the great deathless Nibbāna, which is tranquil, and free from birth, and decay, and sickness, and grief and joy; surely there must be a road that leads to Nibbāna and releases man from existence.”

Accordingly it is said,

17. “Seated in seclusion, I then thought as follows:
   Grievous is rebirth and the breaking up of the body.

18. I am subject to birth, to decay, to disease,
   Therefore will I seek Nibbāna, free from decay and death, and secure.

19. Let me leave this perishable body, this pestilent congregation of vapours,
   And depart without desires and without wants. [1.4]

20. There is, there must be a road, it cannot but be:
   I will seek this road, that I may obtain release from existence.” [1.5]

Further he reasoned thus, “For as in this world there is pleasure as the correlative of pain, so where there is existence there must be its opposite the cessation of existence; and as where there is heat there is also cold which neutralizes it, so there must be a Nibbāna that extinguishes (the fires of) lust and the other passions; and as in opposition to a bad and evil condition there is a good and blameless one, so where there is evil birth there must also be Nibbāna, called the birthless, because it puts an end to all rebirth.”

Therefore it is said,

21. “As where there is suffering there is also bliss,
   So where there is existence we must look for non-existence.

22. And as where there is heat there is also cold,
   So where there is the threefold fire of passion extinction must be sought.

41 Lit. “Extinction.”
23. And as coexistent with evil there is also good,
Even so where there is birth\textsuperscript{42} the cessation of birth should be sought.”

Again he reasoned thus, “Just as a man who has fallen into a heap of filth, if he beholds afar off a great pond covered with lotuses of five colours, ought to seek that pond, saying, ‘By what way shall I arrive there?’ But if he does not seek it the fault is not that of the pond; even so where there is the lake of the great deathless Nibbāna for the washing of the defilement of sin, if it is not sought it is not the fault of the lake. And just as a man who is surrounded by robbers, if when there is a way of escape he does not fly it is not the fault of the way but of the man; even so when there is a blessed road leading to Nibbāna for the man who is encompassed and held fast by sin, its not being sought is not the fault of the road but of the person. And as a man who is oppressed with sickness, there being a physician who can heal his disease, if he does not get\textsuperscript{[1.6]} cured by going to the physician that is no fault of the physician; even so if a man who is oppressed by the disease of sin seeks not a spiritual guide who is at hand and knows the road which puts an end to sin, the fault lies with him and not with the sin-destroying teacher.”

Therefore it is said,

24. “As a man fallen among filth, beholding a brimming lake,
If he seek not that lake, the fault is not in the lake;

25. So when there exists a lake of Nibbāna that washes the stains of sin,
If a man seek not that lake, the fault is not in the lake of Nibbāna. \textsuperscript{[1.5]}

26. As a man beset with foes, there being a way of escape,
If he flee not away, the fault is not with the road;

27. So when there is a way of bliss, if a man beset with sin
Seek not that road, the fault is not in the way of bliss.

28. And as one who is diseased, there being a physician at hand,
If he bid him not heal the disease, the fault is not in the healer:

\textsuperscript{42} Mr. Fausböll points out to me that in tīvidhaggi and jāti we have Vedic abbreviations.
29. So if a man who is sick and oppressed with defilements Seek not the spiritual teacher, the fault is not in the teacher.”

And again he argued, “As a man fond of adornment, throwing off a corpse bound to his shoulders, goes away rejoicing, so must I, throwing off this perishable body, and freed from all desires, enter the city of Nibbāna. And as men and women depositing filth on a dungheap do not gather it in the fold or skirt of their garments, but loathing it, throw it away, feeling no desire for it; so shall I also cast off this perishable body without regret, and enter the deathless city of Nibbāna. And as seamen abandon without regret an unseaworthy ship and escape, so will I also, leaving this body, which distils corruption from its nine festering apertures, enter without regret the city of Nibbāna. And as a man carrying various sorts of jewels, and going on the same road with a band of robbers, out of fear of losing his jewels withdraws from them and gains a safe road; even so this impure body is like a jewel-plundering robber, if I set my affections thereon the precious spiritual jewel of the sublime path of holiness will be lost to me, therefore [1.7] ought I to enter the city of Nibbāna, forsaking this robber-like body.”

Therefore it is said,

30. “As a man might with loathing shake off a corpse bound upon his shoulders,
And depart secure, independent, master of himself;

31. Even so let me depart, regretting nothing, wanting nothing,
Leaving this perishable body, this collection of many foul vapours.

32. And as men and women deposit filth upon a dungheap,
And depart regretting nothing, wanting nothing,

33. So will I depart, leaving this body filled with foul vapours,
As one leaves a cesspool after depositing ordure there.

34. And as the owners forsake the rotten bark that is shattered and leaking,
And depart without regret or longing, [1.6]

35. So shall I go, leaving this body with its nine apertures ever running,
As its owners desert the broken ship.
36. And as a man carrying wares, walking with robbers, Seeing danger of losing his wares, parts company with the robbers and gets him gone,

37. Even so is this body like a mighty robber –
Leaving it I will depart through fear of losing good.”

Having thus in nine similes pondered upon the advantages connected with retirement from the world, the wise Sumedha gave away at his own house, as aforesaid, an immense hoard of treasure to the indigent and wayfarers and sufferers, and kept open house. And renouncing all pleasures, both material and sensual, departing from the city of Amara, away from the world in the Himālayas he made himself a hermitage near the mountain called Dhammaka, and built a hut and a perambulation hall free from the five defects which are hindrances (to meditation). And with a view to obtain the power residing in the Super Knowledges, which are characterized by the eight causal qualities described in the words beginning, “With a mind thus tranquillised, [purified and cleansed, unblemished, free from impurities, malleable, workable, established and having gained imperturbability]”⁴³ he embraced in that [1.8] hermitage the ascetic life of a Sage, casting off the cloak with its nine disadvantages, and wearing the garment of bark with its twelve advantages. And when he had thus given up the world, forsaking this hut, crowded with eight drawbacks, he repaired to the foot of a tree with its ten advantages, and rejecting all sorts of grain lived constantly upon wild fruits. And strenuously exerting himself both in sitting and in standing and in walking, within a week he became the possessor of the eight Attainments and the five Super Knowledges; and so, in accordance with his prayer, he attained the might of the Super Knowledges.

Therefore it is said,

38. “Having pondered thus I gave many thousand millions of wealth
To rich and poor, and made my way to the Himālayas.

⁴³ Evaṁ samāhite citte parisuddhe pariyoṭṭhe anāṅgaṇe vigatupakkilese mudubhūte kammaniye ṭhite ānejjappatte īṅnaṁدادonnéya cittaṁ abhiniharati (Sāmaññaphalasutta, [DN 2] see Lotus, p. 476, line 14).
39. Not far from the Himālayas is the mountain called Dhammaka, Here I made an excellent hermitage, and built with care a leafy hut.

40. There I built a cloister, free from five defects,
Possessed of the eight good qualities, and attained the strength of the Super Knicknowledges.

41. Then I threw off the cloak possessed of the nine faults,
And put on the raiment of bark possessed of the twelve advantages.

42. I left the hut, crowded with the eight drawbacks,
And went to the foot of the tree, which is possessed of ten advantages.

43. Wholly did I reject the grain that is sown and planted,
And partook of the constant fruits of the earth, possessed of many advantages.

44. Then I strenuously strove, in sitting, in standing, and in walking,
And within seven days attained the strength of the Super Knicknowledges.

Now while the ascetic Sumedha, having thus attained the strength of the Super Knicknowledges, was living in the bliss of the (eight) Attainments, the teacher Dīpaṅkara appeared in the world. At the moment of his conception, of his birth, of his attainment of Buddhahood, of his preaching his first discourse, the whole universe of ten thousand worlds trembled, shook and quaked, and gave forth a mighty sound, and the thirty-two prognostics showed themselves. But the ascetic Sumedha, living in the bliss of the Attainments, neither heard that sound nor beheld those signs.

Therefore it is said,

44 Mr. Fausböll writes to me that guṇe for guṇehi must be viewed as an old Pali form originating in the Sanskrit guṇāth.

45 Here follow four pages of later commentary or gloss, which I leave untranslated [in fact throughout the translation the gloss, amounting to perhaps 20-25% of the text, was left untranslated].
45. “Thus when I had attained the consummation, while I was subject to the dispensation,
The Conqueror named Dīpaṅkara, chief of the universe, appeared.

46. At his conception, at his birth, at his Buddhahood, at his preaching,
I saw not the four signs, plunged as I was in the delight of Absorption.”

At that time Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, accompanied by a hundred thousand saints, wandering his way from place to place, reached the city of Ramma, and took up his residence in the great monastery of Sudassana. And the dwellers of the city of Ramma heard it said: “Dīpaṅkara, lord of ascetics, having become a supreme Buddha, and set on foot the wheel of the Dhamma, wandering his way from place to place, has come to the town of Ramma, and dwells at the great monastery of Sudassana.” And taking with them ghee and butter and other medicinal requisites and clothes and raiment, and bearing perfumes and garlands and other offerings in their hands, their minds bent towards the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, inclining towards them, hanging upon them, they approached the teacher and worshipped him, and presenting the perfumes and other offerings, sat down on one side. And having heard his preaching of the Dhamma, and invited him for the next day, they rose from their seats and departed. And on the next day, having prepared almsgiving for the poor, and having decked out the town, they repaired the road by which the One with Ten Powers was to come, throwing earth in the places that were worn away by water and thereby levelling the surface, and scattering sand that looked like strips of silver. And they sprinkled fragrant roots and flowers, and raised aloft flags and banners of many-coloured cloths, and set up banana [1.10] arches and rows of brimming jars.

Then the ascetic Sumedha, ascending from his hermitage, and proceeding through the air till he was above those men, and beholding the joyous multitude, exclaimed, “What can be the reason?” Alighting, he stood on one side and questioned the people, “Tell me, why are you adorning this road?”

Therefore it is said,

47. “In the region of the border districts, having invited the Tathāgata,
With joyful hearts they are clearing the road by which he should come.
48. And I at that time leaving my hermitage,
Rustling my barken tunic, departed through the air.

49. And seeing an excited multitude joyous and delighted,
Descending from the air I straightway asked the men, \[1.12\]

50. The people are excited, joyous and happy,
For whom is the road being cleared, the path, the way of his coming?”

And the men replied, “Lord Sumedha, do you not know? Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, having attained supreme Awakening, and set rolling the Dhamma wheel, travelling from place to place, has reached our town, and dwells at the great monastery Sudassana; we have invited the Fortunate One, and are making ready for the fortunate Buddha the road by which he is to come.” And the ascetic Sumedha thought: “The very sound of the word Buddha is rarely met with in the world, much more the actual appearance of One with Ten Powers; it behoves me to join those men in clearing the road.” He said therefore to the men, “If you are clearing this road for the Buddha, assign to me a piece of ground, I will clear the ground in company with you.” They consented, said: “It is well,” and perceiving the ascetic Sumedha to be possessed of Supernormal Power, they fixed upon a swampy piece of ground, and assigned it to him, saying: “Prepare this spot.” Sumedha, his heart filled with joy of which the Buddha was the cause, thought within himself, “I am able to prepare \[1.11\] this piece of ground by my Supernormal Power, but if so prepared it will give me no satisfaction; this day it behoves me to perform menial duties,” and fetching earth he threw it upon the spot.

But ere the ground could be cleared by him – with a train of a hundred thousand miracle-working saints endowed with the six Super Knowledges, while Devas offered celestial wreaths and perfumes, while celestial hymns rang forth, and men paid their homage with earthly perfumes and with flowers and other offerings, Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, with all a Buddha's transcendant majesty, like a lion rousing himself to seek his prey on the Vermilion plain, came down into the road all decked and made ready for him.

Then the ascetic Sumedha – as the One with Ten Powers with unblenching eyes approached along the road prepared for him, beholding that form endowed with the perfection of beauty, adorned with the thirty-two characteristics of a great man, and marked with the eighty minor marks, attended by a halo of a fathom’s depth, and sending forth in streams the six-hued Buddha-rays, linked in pairs of different colours, and wreathed like the varied lightnings that flash in the gem-studded vault of heaven – exclaimed, “This day it behoves me to make sacrifice of my life for the One with Ten Powers: let not the Blessed one walk in the mire – nay, let him advance with his four hundred thousand saints trampling on my body as if walking upon a bridge of jewelled planks, this deed will long be for my good and my happiness.” So saying, he loosed his hair, and spreading in the inky mire his ascetic’s skin mantle, roll of matted hair and garment of bark, he lay down in the mire like a bridge of jewelled planks.

Therefore it is said,

51. “Questioned by me they replied, ‘An incomparable Buddha is born into the world,
The Conqueror named Dīpaṅkara, lord of the universe,

For him the road is cleared, the way, the path of his coming.’ [1.12 ]

52. When I heard the name of Buddha joy sprang up forthwith within me, Repeating, ‘a Buddha, a Buddha!’ I gave utterance to my joy.

53. Standing there I pondered, joyful and excited,
Here I will sow the seed, may the happy moment not pass away.

54. ‘If you clear a path for the Buddha, assign to me a place,
I also will clear the road, the way, the path of his coming.’

55. Then they gave me a piece of ground to clear the pathway;
Then repeating within me, ‘a Buddha, a Buddha!’ I cleared the road.

56. But ere my portion was cleared, Dīpaṅkara the great sage,
The Conqueror, entered the road with four hundred thousand saints like himself, Possessed of the six Super Knowledges, pure from all taint of wrong.

57. On every side men rose to receive him, many drums sent forth their music,
Men and Devas were overjoyed, shouting forth their applause.

58. Devas look upon men, men upon Devas,
And both with clasped hands upraised approach the Tathāgata.
59. Devas with celestial music, men with earthly music,
Both sending forth their strains approach the Tathāgata.

60. Devas floating in the air sprinkle down in all directions
Celestial Erythrina flowers, lotuses and coral flowers.

61. Men standing on the ground throw upwards in all directions
Champac and Salaḷa flowers, Kadamba and fragrant Mesua, PunNāga, and Ketaka.

62. Then I loosed my hair, and spreading in the mire
Bark robe and mantle of skin, lay prone upon my face.

63. Let the Buddha advance with his disciples, treading upon me;
Let him not tread in the mire, it will be for my blessing.”

And as he lay in the mire, again beholding the Buddha-majesty of Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, with his unblenching gaze, he thought as follows, “Were I willing, I could enter the city of Ramma as a novice in the priesthood, after having destroyed all human passions; \(1.14\) but why should I disguise myself\(^{46}\) to attain Nibbāna after the destruction \([1.13]\) of human passion? Let me rather, like Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, having risen to the supreme Awakening, enable mankind to enter the Ship of the Dhamma and so carry them across the Ocean of Existence, and when this is done afterwards attain Nibbāna; this indeed it is right that I should do.” Then having enumerated the eight conditions \(^{46}\) The following is what I take to be the meaning of this passage: “If I chose I could at once enter the Buddhist priesthood, and by the practice of ecstatic meditation (Jhāna) free myself from human passion, and become an Arahat or saint. I should then at death at once attain Nibbāna and cease to exist. But this would be a selfish course to pursue, for thus I should benefit myself only. Why should I thus slip unobserved and in the humble garb of a monk into Nibbāna? Nay, let me rather qualify myself to become a Buddha, and so save others as well as myself.” This is the great Act of Renunciation by which the Bodhisattva, when Nirvāṇa was within his grasp, preferred to endure ages of heroic trials in the exercise of the Pāramitā, that he might be enabled to become a Buddha, and so redeem mankind. See D’Alwis’s Introduction to Kacchāyana’s Grammar, p. vi.

(necessary to the attainment of Buddhahood), and having made the resolution to become Buddha, he laid himself down.

Therefore it is said,

64. “As I lay upon the ground this was the thought of my heart, ‘If I wished it I might this day destroy within me all human passions.

65. But why should I in disguise arrive at the knowledge of the Dhamma? I will attain omniscience and become a Buddha, and (save) men and Devas.

66. Why should I cross the ocean resolute but alone? I will attain omniscience, and enable men and Devas to cross.

67. By this resolution of mine, I, a man of resolution, Will attain omniscience, and save men and Devas,

68. Cutting off the stream of transmigration, annihilating the three forms of existence, Embarking in the ship of the Dhamma, I will carry across with me men and Devas.”

[Wherefore wishing for Buddhahood (he said):

69. “Conditioned by being a human being and male, meeting a teacher, Going-forth, being endowed with virtue, aspiration and wholesome desire, Resolve, with these eight things combined he will succeed.”] {1.15}

And the blessed Dīpaṅkara having reached the spot stood close by the ascetic Sumedha’s head. And opening his eyes possessed of the five kinds of grace as one opens a jewelled window, and beholding the ascetic Sumedha lying in the mire, thought to himself, “This ascetic who lies here has formed the resolution to be a Buddha; will his prayer be fulfilled or not?” And casting forward his prescient gaze into the future, and considering, he perceived that four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand aeons from that time he would become a Buddha named Gotama. And standing there in the midst of the assembly he delivered this

---

47 What follows from yasmā to nipajji belongs to a later commentary. I resume the translation with p. 15, line 11.

48 [This line and the following verse were omitted by Rhys Davids.]
prophecy, “Do you see this austere ascetic lying in the mire?” “Yes, Lord,” they answered. [1.14] “This man lies here having made the resolution to become a Buddha, his prayer will be answered; at the end of four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand cycles hence he will become a Buddha named Gotama, and in that birth the city Kapilavatthu will be his residence, queen Māyā will be his mother, king Suddhodana his father, his chief disciple will be therī Upatissa, his second disciple therī Kolita, the Buddha’s servitor will be Ānanda, his chief female disciple the nun Khemā, the second the nun Uppalavaṇṇā. When he attains to years of ripe knowledge, having retired from the world and made the great exertion, having received at the foot of a banyan tree a meal of rice milk, and partaken of it by the banks of the Nerañjarā, having ascended the throne of Awakening, he will, at the foot of an Assattha tree, attain Supreme Buddhahood.”

Therefore it is said,

70. “Dīpaṅkara, knower of all worlds, receiver of offerings, Standing by that which pillowed my head, spoke these words:

71. ‘See ye this austere ascetic with his matted hair, Countless ages hence he will be a Buddha in this world. {1.16}

72. Lo, the Tathāgata departing from pleasant Kapila, Having fought the great fight, performed all manner of austerities.

73. Having sat at the foot of the Ajapāla tree, the Tathāgata there received milk rice, Shall approach the Nerañjarā river.

74. Having received the milk rice on the banks of the Nerañjarā, the Conqueror Shall come by a fair road prepared for him to the foot of the Bodhi tree.

75. Then, unrivalled and glorious, reverentially saluting the throne of Awakening, At the foot of an Assattha tree he shall attain Buddhahood.

76. The mother that bears him shall be called Māyā, His father will be Suddhodana, he himself will be Gotama.

77. His chief disciples will be Upatissa and Kolita, Void of human passion, freed from desire, calm-minded and tranquil.
78. The servitor Ānanda will attend upon the Conqueror, Khemā and Uppalavaṇṇā will be his chief female disciples,

79. Void of human passion, freed from desire, calm-minded and tranquil.
The sacred tree of this Buddha is called the Assattha.” [1.15]

The ascetic Sumedha, exclaiming, “My prayer, it seems, will be accomplished,” was filled with happiness. The multitudes, hearing the words of Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, were joyous and delighted, exclaiming, “The ascetic Sumedha, it seems, is a Buddha seed, a tender shoot that will grow up into a Buddha.” For thus they thought: “As a man fording a river, if he is unable to cross to the ford opposite him, crosses to a ford lower down the stream, even so we, if in the dispensation of Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, fail to attain the paths and their fruition, yet when you shall become Buddha we shall be enabled in thy presence to make the paths and their fruition our own,” – and so they recorded their prayer (for future assurance).

The Buddha Dīpaṅkara, the One with Ten Powers, having praised the Bodhisatta, and made an offering to him of eight handfuls of flowers, reverentially saluted him and departed. And the Arahats, also, four hundred thousand in number, having made offerings to the Bodhisatta of perfumes and garlands, reverentially saluted him and departed. And the Devas and men having made the same offerings, and bowed down to him, went their way.

And the Bodhisatta, when all had retired, rising from his seat and exclaiming, “I will investigate the Perfections,” sat himself down cross-legged on a heap of flowers. And as the Bodhisatta sat thus, the Devas in all the ten thousand worlds assembling shouted applause. “Venerable ascetic Sumedha,” they said, “all the auguries which have manifested themselves when former Bodhisattas seated themselves cross-legged, saying, ‘We will investigate the Perfections,’ – all these this day have appeared: assuredly you shall become Buddha. [1.17] This we know, to whom these omens appear, he surely will become a Buddha; do you make a strenuous effort and exert thyself.” With these words they lauded the Bodhisatta with varied praises.

Therefore it is said, [1.16]
80. “Hearing these words of the incomparable Sage,
Devas and men delighted, exclaimed, ‘This is a seed of a Buddha.’

81. A great clamour arises, men and Devas in ten thousand worlds
Clap their hands, and laugh, and make obeisance with clasped hands.

82. ‘Should we fail,’ they say, ‘in this Buddha’s dispensation,
Yet in time to come we shall stand before him.

83. As men crossing a river, if they fail to reach the opposite ford, Gaining the lower ford cross the great river,

84. Even so we all, if we lose this Buddha,
In time to come shall stand before him.’

85. The world-knowing Dīpaṅkara, the receiver of offerings,
Having celebrated my meritorious act, went his way.49

86. All the disciples of the Buddha that were present saluted me with reverence, Men, Nāgas, and Gandhabbas bowed down to me and departed.

87. When the lord of the world with his following had passed beyond my sight,
Then glad, with gladsome heart, I rose up from my seat.

88. Joyful I am with a great joy, glad with a great gladness;
Flooded with rapture then I seated myself cross-legged.

89. And even as thus I sat I thought within myself,
‘I am subject to Absorption, I have mastered the Super Knowledges.

90. In a thousand worlds there are no sages that rival me, Unrivalled in Supernormal Powers I have reached this bliss.’

91. When thus they beheld me sitting,50 the dwellers of the ten thousand worlds Raised a mighty shout, ‘Surely you will be a Buddha!’

49 Lit. “raised his right foot (to depart).”
50 Lit. “at my sitting cross-legged.”
92. The omens\textsuperscript{51} beheld in former ages when the Bodhisatta sat cross-legged,
The same are beheld this day.

93. Cold is dispelled and heat ceases,
This day these things are seen – verily you will be a Buddha.

94. A thousand worlds are stilled and silent,
So are they seen today – verily you will be a Buddha. \{1.18\}

95. The mighty winds blow not, the rivers cease to flow,
These things are seen today – verily you will be a Buddha.

96. All flowers blossom on land and sea,
This day they all have bloomed – verily you will be a Buddha.

97. All creepers and trees are laden with fruit,
This day they all bear fruit – verily you will be a Buddha.

98. Gems sparkle in earth and sky,
This day all gems do glitter – verily you will be a Buddha. \[1.17\]

99. Music earthly and celestial sounds,
Both these today send forth their strains – verily you will be a Buddha.

100. Flowers of every hue rain down from the sky,
This day they are seen – verily you will be a Buddha.

101. The mighty ocean bends itself, ten thousand worlds are shaken,
This day they both send up their roar – verily you will be a Buddha.

102. In hell the fires of ten thousand worlds die out,
This day these fires are quenched – verily you will be a Buddha.

103. Unclouded is the sun and all the stars are seen,
These things are seen today – verily you will be a Buddha.

104. Though no water fell in rain, vegetation burst forth from the earth,
This day vegetation springs from the earth – verily you will be a Buddha.

\textsuperscript{51} Mr. Fausböll writes that \textit{yaṁ} is a mistake of the copyist for \textit{yā = yāni}.
105. The constellations are all aglow, and the lunar mansions in the vault of heaven, Visākhā is in conjunction with the moon – verily you will be a Buddha.

106. Those creatures that dwell in holes and caves depart each from his lair,
This day these lairs are forsaken – verily you will be a Buddha.

107. There is no discontent among mortals, but they are filled with contentment,
This day all are content – verily you will be a Buddha.

108. Then diseases are dispelled and hunger ceases,
This day these things are seen – verily you will be a Buddha.

109. Then desire wastes away, hate and ignorance perish,
This day all these are dispelled – verily you will be a Buddha.

110. No danger then comes near; this day this thing is seen,
By this sign we know it – verily you will become a Buddha.

111. No dust flies abroad; this day this thing is seen,
By this sign we know it – verily you will be a Buddha.

112. All noisome odours flee away, celestial fragrance breathes around,
Such fragrance breathes this day – verily you will be a Buddha. {1.19}

113. All the Devas are manifested, the formless only excepted,
This day they all are seen – verily you will be a Buddha.

114. All the hells become visible,
These all are seen this day – verily you will be a Buddha.

115. Then walls, and doors, and rocks are no impediment,
This day they have melted into air, 52 – verily you will be a Buddha.

116. At that moment death and birth do not take place,
This day these things are seen – verily you will be a Buddha.

52 Or, “have risen into the air”?
117. Do you make a strenuous effort, hold not back, go forward,
This thing we know – verily you will be a Buddha.’ ” [1.18]

And the Bodhisatta, having heard the words of Dīpañkara, the One with Ten Powers, and of the Devas in ten thousand worlds, filled with immeasurable resolution, thought thus within himself, “The Buddhas are beings whose word cannot fail; there is no deviation from truth in their speech. For as the fall of a clod thrown into the air, as the death of a mortal, as the sunrise at dawn, as a lion’s roaring when he leaves his lair, as the delivery of a woman with child, as these things are sure and certain – even so the word of the Buddhas is sure and cannot fail, verily I shall become a Buddha.”

Therefore it is said,

118. “Having heard the words of Buddha and of the Devas of ten thousand worlds, Glad, joyous, delighted, I then thought thus within myself:

119. ‘The Buddhas speak not doubtful words, the Conquerors speak not vain words,
There is no falsehood in the Buddhas – verily I shall become a Buddha.

120. As a clod cast into the air does surely fall to the ground,
So the word of the glorious Buddhas is sure and everlasting.

121. As the death of all mortals is sure and constant,
So the word of the glorious Buddhas is sure and everlasting.

122. As the rising of the sun is certain when night has faded,
So the word of the glorious Buddhas is sure and everlasting.

123. As the roaring of a lion who has left his den is certain,
So the word of the glorious Buddhas is sure and everlasting.

124. As the delivery of women with child is certain,
So the word of the glorious Buddhas is sure and everlasting.’ ”

And having thus made the resolution, “I shall surely become Buddha,” with a view to investigating the conditions that constitute a Buddha, exclaiming, “Where are the conditions that make the Buddha, {1.20} are they found above or below, in the principal or the minor directions?” investigating successively the principles of all things, and beholding the first Perfection of Generosity [Dāna], practised and followed by former Bodhisattas, he thus admonished his own soul, “Wise Sumedha, from this time forth [1.19] you must fulfil the perfection of Generosity; for as a water-jar overturned discharges the water so that none remains, and cannot recover it, even so if you, indifferent to wealth and fame, and wife and child, and goods great and small, give away to all who come and ask everything that they require till nought remains, you will sit at the foot of the Bodhi tree and become a Buddha.” With these words he strenuously resolved to attain the first perfection of Generosity.

Therefore it is said,

125. “Come, I will search the Buddha-making conditions, this way and that,
Above and below, in all the ten directions, as far as the principles of things extend.

126. Then, as I made my search, I beheld the first Perfection of Generosity,
The high road followed by former sages.

127. Do you strenuously taking it upon thyself advance
To this first Perfection of Generosity, if you will attain Buddhahood.

128. As a brimming water-jar, overturned by any one,
Discharges entirely all the water, and retains none within,

129. Even so, when you see any that ask, great, small, and middling,
Do you give away all in alms, as the water-jar overthrown.’ ”

But considering further, “There must be beside this other conditions that make a Buddha,” and beholding the second Perfection of Virtue [Sīla], he thought thus, “O wise Sumedha, from this day forth may you fulfil the perfection of Virtue; for as the Yak, regardless of his life, guards his bushy tail, even so you will become a Buddha, if from this day forward regardless of your life you keep the moral precepts.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the second perfection of Virtue.

Therefore it is said,

130. “For the conditions of a Buddha cannot be so few,
Let me investigate the other conditions that bring Buddhahood to maturity.

131. Then investigating I beheld the second Perfection of Virtue
Practised and followed by former sages. [1.20]
132. ‘This second one do you strenuously undertake,
And reach the Perfection of Virtue if you would attain Buddhahood.

133. And as the Yak cow, when her tail has got entangled in anything,
Then and there awaits death, and will not injure her tail,\(^{53}\) [1.21]

134. So also do you, having fulfilled the moral precepts in the four stages, Ever guard Virtue as the Yak guards her tail.’ ”

But considering further, “These cannot be the only Buddha-making conditions,” and beholding the third Perfection of Renunciation [Nekkhamma], he thought thus, “O wise Sumedha, may you henceforth fulfil the perfection of Renunciation; for as a man long the denizen of a prison feels no love for it, but is discontented, and wishes to live there no more, even so do you, likening all births to a prison-house, discontented with all births, and anxious to get rid of them, set thy face toward renunciation, thus will you become Buddha.” And he strenuously made the resolution to attain the third perfection of Renunciation.

Therefore it is said,

135. “For the conditions that make a Buddha cannot be so few,
I will investigate others, the conditions that bring Buddhahood to maturity.

136. Investigating then I beheld the third Perfection of Renunciation Practised and followed by former sages.

137. ‘This third one do you strenuously undertake,
And reach the Perfection of Renunciation, if you would attain Buddhahood.

138. As a man long a denizen of the house of bonds, oppressed with suffering, Feels no pleasure therein, but rather longs for release,

\(^{53}\) Viz., I suppose, by dragging it forcibly away. This metaphor, which to us appears wanting in dignity, is a favourite one with the Hindus. The tail of the Yak or Tibetan ox (Bos Grunniens) is a beautiful object, and one of the insignia of Hindu royalty.
139. Even so do you look upon all births as prison-houses, Set thy face toward Renunciation, to obtain release from Existence.’ ”

But considering further, “These cannot be the only Buddha-making conditions,” and beholding the fourth Perfection of Wisdom [Paññā], he thought thus, “O wise Sumedha, \([1.21]\) do you from this day forth fulfil the perfection of Wisdom, avoiding no subject of knowledge, great, small, or middling, \(^{54}\) do you approach all wise men and ask them questions; for as the mendicant on his begging rounds, avoiding none of the families, great and small, that he frequents, \(^{55}\) and wandering for alms from place to place, speedily gets food to support him, even so will you, approaching all wise men, and asking them questions, become a Buddha.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the fourth perfection of Wisdom.

Therefore it is said,

140. “For the conditions that make a Buddha cannot be so few,
I will investigate the other conditions that bring Buddhahood to maturity.

141. Investigating then I beheld the fourth Perfection of Wisdom
Practised and followed by former sages.

142. ‘This fourth do you strenuously undertake,
And reach the Perfection of Wisdom, if you would attain Buddhahood. \([1.22]\)

143. And as a monk on his begging rounds avoids no families,
Either small, or great, or middling, and so obtains subsistence,

144. Even so you, constantly questioning wise men,
And reaching the Perfection of Wisdom, will attain supreme Buddhahood.’ ”

But considering further, “These cannot be the only Buddha-making conditions,” and seeing the fifth Perfection of Effort [Viriya], he thought thus, “O wise Sumedha, do you from this day forth fulfil the perfection of Exertion. As the lion, the king of beasts, in every action \(^{56}\) strenuously makes an effort himself, so if you in all existences and in all your acts are strenuous in effort, and not a laggard, you will become a Buddha.” And he made a firm resolve to attain the fifth perfection of Effort.

\(^{54}\) Lit. “not avoiding anything among things great, small, and middling.”

\(^{55}\) After kiñci understand kulaṁ, as will be seen from v. 143.

\(^{56}\) Lit. in all postures, walking, standing, etc.

Therefore it is said, [1.22]

145. “For the conditions of a Buddha cannot be so few,
I will investigate the other conditions which bring Buddhahood to maturity.

146. Investigating then I beheld the fifth Perfection of Effort
Practised and followed by former sages.

147. ‘This fifth do you strenuously undertake,
And reach the Perfection of Effort, if you would attain Buddhahood.

148. As the lion, king of beasts, in lying, standing and walking,
Is no laggard, but ever of resolute heart,

149. Even so do you also in every existence strenuously exert thyself,
And reaching the Perfection of Effort, you will attain the supreme Buddhahood.’

But considering further, “These cannot be the only Buddha-making conditions,” and beholding the sixth Perfection of Patience [Khanti], he thought to himself, “O wise Sumedha, do you from this time forth fulfil the perfection of forbearance; be you patient in praise and in reproach. And as when men throw things pure or foul upon the earth, the earth does not feel either desire or repulsion towards them, but suffers them, endures them and acquiesces in them, even so you also, if you are patient in praise and reproach, will become a Buddha.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the sixth perfection of Patience.

Therefore it is said,

150. “For the conditions of a Buddha cannot be so few,
I will seek other conditions also which bring about Buddhahood.

151. And seeking then I beheld the sixth Perfection of Patience
Practised and followed by former Buddhas.

152. ‘Having strenuously taken up this sixth Perfection,
Then with unwavering mind you will attain supreme Buddhahood. {1.23}
153. And as the earth endures all that is thrown upon it,
Whether things pure or impure, and feels neither anger nor pity,

154. Even so enduring the praises and reproaches of all men,
Going on to perfect Patience, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.’ ”

But further considering, “These cannot be the only conditions that make a Buddha,” and beholding the seventh Perfection of Truth [Sacca], he thought thus within [1.23] himself, “O wise Sumedha, from this time forth do you fulfil the perfection of Truth; though the thunderbolt descend upon your head, do you never under the influence of desire and other passions utter a conscious lie, for the sake of wealth or any other advantage. And as the planet Venus at all seasons pursues her own course, nor ever goes on another course forsaking her own, even so, if you forsake not truth and utter no lie, you will become a Buddha.” And he strenuously turned his mind to the seventh perfection of Truth.

Therefore it is said,

155. “For these are not all the conditions of a Buddha,
I will seek other conditions which bring about Buddhahood.

156. Seeking then I beheld the seventh Perfection of Truth
Practised and followed by former Buddhas.

157. ‘Having strenuously taken upon thyself this seventh Perfection,
Then free from duplicity of speech you will attain supreme Buddhahood.

158. And as the planet Venus, balanced in all her times and seasons,
In the world of men and Devas, departs not from her path,

159. Even so do you not depart from the course of truth,57
Advancing to the Perfection of Truth, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.’ ”

But further considering, “These cannot be the only conditions that make a Buddha,” and beholding the eighth Perfection of Determination [Adhiṭṭhāna], he thought thus within himself, “O wise Sumedha, do you from this time forth fulfil the perfection of Determination; whatsoever you resolve be you unshaken in that resolution. For as a mountain, the wind beating upon it in all directions, trembles not, moves not, but stands in its place, even so you, if unswerving in thy resolution, will become a Buddha.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the eighth perfection of Determination.

57 Lit. depart from your course in the matter of truthful things.

Therefore it is said,

160. “For these are not all the conditions of a Buddha,
I will seek out other conditions that bring about Buddhahood. [1.24] [1.24]

161. Seeking then I beheld the eighth Perfection of Determination Practised and followed by former Buddhas.

162. ‘Do you resolutely take upon thyself this eighth Perfection,
Then you being immovable will attain supreme Buddhahood.

163. And as the rocky mountain, immovable, firmly based,
Is unshaken by many winds, and stands in its own place,

164. Even so do you also remain ever immovable in resolution,
Advancing to the Perfection of Resolution, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.’

But further considering, “These cannot be the only conditions that make a Buddha,” and beholding the ninth Perfection of Loving-Kindness [Mettā], he thought thus within himself, “O wise Sumedha, do you from this time forth fulfil the perfection of Loving-Kindness, may you be of one mind towards friends and foes. And as water fills with its refreshing coolness good men and bad alike, even so, if you are of one mind in friendly feeling towards all mortals, you will become a Buddha.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the ninth perfection of Loving-Kindness.

Therefore it is said,

165. “For these are not all the conditions of a Buddha,
I will seek out other conditions that bring about Buddhahood.

Lit. having made its coldness exactly alike for bad people and good people, pervades them.
166. Seeking I beheld the ninth Perfection of Loving-Kindness
Practised and followed by former Buddhas.

167. ‘Do you, taking resolutely upon thyself this ninth Perfection, Become unrivalled in kindness, if you will become a Buddha.

168. And as water fills with its coolness
Good men and bad alike, and carries off all impurity,

169. Even so do you look with friendship alike on the evil and the good,
Advancing to the Perfection of Loving-Kindness, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.’”

But further considering, “These cannot be the only conditions that make a Buddha,” and beholding the tenth Perfection of Equanimity [Upekkhā], he thought thus within himself, “O wise Sumedha, from this time do you fulfil the [1.25] perfection of Equanimity, be you of equal mind in prosperity and adversity. And as the earth is indifferent when things pure or impure are cast upon it, even so, if you are indifferent in prosperity and adversity, you will become a Buddha.” And he strenuously resolved to attain the tenth perfection of Equanimity.

Therefore it is said, [1.25]

170. “For these cannot be all the conditions of a Buddha,
I will seek other conditions that bring about Buddhahood.

171. Seeking then I beheld the tenth Perfection of Equanimity
Practised and followed by former Buddhas.

172. ‘If you take resolutely upon thyself this tenth Perfection,
Becoming well-balanced and firm, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.

173. And as the earth is indifferent to pure and impure things cast upon her,
To both alike, and is free from anger and favour,

174. Even so do you ever be evenly-balanced in joy and grief, Advancing to the Perfection of Equanimity, you will attain supreme Buddhahood.’”

Then he thought: “These are the only conditions in this world that, bringing Buddhahood to perfection and constituting a Buddha, have to be fulfilled by Bodhisattas; beside the Ten Perfections there are no others. And these Ten Perfections are neither in the heaven above nor in the earth below, nor are they to be found in the east or the other quarters, but reside in my heart of flesh.” Having thus realized that the Perfections were established in his heart, having strenuously resolved to keep them all, grasping them again and again, he mastered them forwards and backwards;\(^{59}\) taking them at the end he went backward to the beginning, taking them at the beginning he placed them at the end,\(^{60}\) taking them at the middle he carried them to the two ends, taking them at both ends he carried them to the middle. [1.26]

Repeating, “The Perfections are the sacrifice of limbs, the Lesser Perfections are the sacrifice of property, the Unlimited Perfections are the sacrifice of life,” he mastered them as the Perfections, the Lesser Perfections and the Unlimited Perfections – like one who converts two kindred oils into one,\(^{61}\) or like one who, using Mount Meru for his churning-rod, churns the great Cakkavāla ocean. And as he grasped again and again the Ten Perfections, by the power of his piety this earth, four nahutas and eight hundred thousand leagues in breadth, like a bundle of reeds trodden by an elephant, or a sugar-mill in motion, uttering a mighty roar, trembled, shook and quaked, and spun round like a potter’s wheel or the wheel of an oil-mill.

Therefore it is said,

175. “These are all the conditions in the world that bring Buddhahood to perfection:
Beyond these are no others, therein do you stand fast.

176. While he grasped these conditions natural and intrinsic,\(^ {62}\)
By the power of his piety the earth of ten thousand worlds quaked.

\(^{59}\) i.e. alternately from the first to the tenth and from the tenth to the first.

\(^{60}\) i.e. put the first last.

\(^{61}\) Vijesinha.

\(^{62}\) Vijesinha writes to me, “Natural and intrinsic virtues. The Sinhalese gloss says: \textit{paramārthavū rasasahitavū lakṣaṇa-ati nohot svabhāvalakṣaṇa hā sarvadharmasādīḥaraṇālakṣaṇa-ati}. In the latter case it would mean, having the quality of conformity with all laws.”
177. The earth swayed and thundered like a sugar-mill at work,
Like the wheel of an oil-mill so shakes the earth.” [1.26]

And while the earth was trembling the people of Ramma, unable to endure it, like great Sāl trees overthrown by the wind that blows at the end of a cycle, fell swooning here and there, while waterpots and other vessels, revolving like a jar on a potter’s wheel, struck against each other and were dashed and ground to pieces. The multitudes in fear and trembling approaching the Teacher said: “Tell us, Fortunate One, is this turmoil caused by dragons, or is it caused by either bhūtas, or Yakkhas, or by Devas? for this we know not, but truly this whole multitude is grievously afflicted. Does [1.27] this portend evil to the world or good? tell us the cause of it.” The Teacher hearing their words said: “Fear not, nor be troubled, there is no danger to you from this. The wise Sumedha, concerning whom I predicted this day, ‘Hereafter he will be a Buddha named Gotama,’ is now mastering the Perfections, and while he masters them and turns them about, by the power of his piety the whole ten thousand worlds with one accord quake and thunder,” Therefore it is said,

178. “All the multitude that was there in attendance on the Buddha, Trembling, fell swooning there upon the ground.

179. Many thousands of waterpots and many hundred jars
Were crushed and pounded there and dashed against each other.

180. Excited, trembling, terrified, confused, their senses disordered,
The multitudes assembling, approached the Buddha,

181. Say, will it be good or evil to the world?
The whole world is afflicted, ward off this (danger), Omniscient One.

182. Then the Great Sage Dipaṅkara enjoined upon them,
Be confident, be not afraid at this earthquake:

183. He concerning whom I predicted this day, ‘He will be a Buddha in this world,’
The same is investigating the time-honoured Conditions followed by the Buddhas.
184. Therefore while he is investigating fully these Conditions, the groundwork of a Buddha,

The earth of ten thousand worlds is shaken in the world of men and of Devas.”

And the people hearing the Tathāgata’s words, joyful and delighted, taking with them garlands, perfumes and unguents, left the city of Ramma, and went to the Bodhisatta. And having offered their flowers and other presents, and bowing to him and respectfully saluting him, they returned to the city of Ramma. And the Bodhisatta, having made a strenuous exertion and resolve, rose from the seat on which he sat.

Therefore it is said, \( 1.27 \)

185. “Having heard the Buddha’s word, their minds were straightway calmed,

All of them approaching me again paid me their homage. \( 1.28 \)

186. Having taken upon me the Perfections of a Buddha, having made firm my resolve, Having bowed to Dīpaṅkara, I rose from my seat.”

And as the Bodhisatta rose from his seat, the Devas in all the ten thousand worlds having assembled and offered him garlands and perfumes, uttered these and other words of praise and blessing, “Venerable ascetic Sumedha, this day you have made a mighty resolve at the feet of Dīpaṅkara Buddha, may you fulfil it without let or hindrance: fear not nor be dismayed, may not the slightest sickness visit your frame, quickly exercise the Perfections and attain supreme Buddhahood. As the flowering and fruit-bearing trees bring forth flowers and fruit in due season, so do you also, not letting the right season pass by, quickly reach the supreme knowledge of a Buddha.” And thus having spoken, they returned each one to his celestial home.

Then the Bodhisatta, having received the homage of the Devas, made a strenuous exertion and resolve, saying: “Having fulfilled the Ten Perfections, at the end of four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand cycles I shall become a Buddha.” And rising into the air he returned to Himavanta.

Therefore it is said,
187. “As he rose from his seat both Devas and men
Sprinkle him with celestial and earthly flowers.

188. Both Devas and men pronounce their blessing,
A great prayer you have made, may you obtain it according to your wish.

189. May all dangers be averted, may every sickness vanish,
May you have no hindrance – quickly reach the supreme knowledge of a Buddha.

190. As when the season is come the flowering trees do blossom, Even so do you, O mighty One, blossom with the wisdom of a Buddha.

191. As all the Buddhas have fulfilled the Ten Perfections, Even so do you, O mighty One, fulfil the Ten Perfections.

192. As all the Buddhas are enlightened on the throne of knowledge, Even so do you, O mighty One, receive Awakening in the wisdom of a Buddha.

193. As all the Buddhas have established the supremacy of the Dhamma, Even so do you, O mighty One, establish the supremacy of the Dhamma.

194. As the moon on the mid-day of the month shines in her purity, Even so do you, with thy mind at the full, shine in ten thousand worlds.

195. As the sun released by Rāhu glows fervently in his heat,
Even so, having redeemed mankind, do you shine in all thy majesty.

196. As all the rivers find their way to the great ocean,
Even so may the worlds of men and Devas take refuge in thee.

197. The Bodhisatta extolled with these praises, taking on himself the ten Conditions,
Commencing to fulfil these Conditions, entered the forest.

   End of the Story of Sumedha

[Buddha Dīpaṅkara]

And the people of the city of Ramma, having returned to the city, kept open house to the monastics with the Buddha at their head. The Teacher having preached the Dhamma to them, and established them in the three Refuges and so on, departing from the city of Ramma, living thereafter his allotted span of life, having fulfilled all the duties of a Buddha, in due course attained Nibbāna in that element of annihilation in which no trace of existence remains. On this subject all that need be said can be learned from the narrative in the Buddhavaṁsa, for it is said in that work, 198. “Then they, having entertained the chief of the world with his monastics, Took refuge in the Teacher Dīpaṅkara.

199. Some the Tathāgata established in the refuges, Some in the five precepts, others in the ten precepts.

200. To some he gives the four glorious fruits of the ascetic life, On some he bestows those peerless qualities the analytical knowledges.

201. To some the Lord of men grants the eight sublime Attainments, On some he bestows the three knowledges and the six Super Knowledges.

202. In this order the Great Sage exhorts the multitude. Therewith the dispensation of the world’s Protector was spread wide abroad. [1.30]

203. He of the mighty jaw, of the broad shoulder, Dīpaṅkara by name, Procured the salvation of many men, warded off from them future punishment.

204. Beholding persons ripe for salvation, reaching them in an instant, Even at a distance of four hundred thousand leagues, the Great Sage awakened them (to the knowledge of the truth).

205. At the first conversion the Buddha converted a thousand millions. At the second the Protector converted a hundred thousand.

206. When the Buddha preached the truth in the Deva world, There took place a third conversion of nine hundred millions. {1.29}

207. The Teacher Dīpaṅkara had three assemblies, The first was a meeting of a million millions.

-------

Vijesinha says, “In that order, viz. in the Saraṇāgamana first, then in the Pañcasīla, then in the Dasasīla, and so on.”
208. Again when the Conqueror went into seclusion at Nārada peak, A thousand million spotless Arahats met together.

209. When the Mighty One dwelt on the lofty rock Sudassana, Then the Sage surrounded himself with nine hundred thousand millions.

210. At that time I was an ascetic wearing matted hair, a man of austere penances, Moving through the air, accomplished in the five Super Knowledges.

211. The (simultaneous) conversion of tens of thousands, of twenties of thousands, took place, Of ones and twos the conversions were beyond computation.⁶⁴

212. Then did the pure dispensation of Dīpaṅkara Buddha become widely spread, Known to many men prosperous and flourishing.

213. Four hundred thousand saints, possessed of the six Super Knowledges, endowed with psychic powers, Ever attend upon Dīpaṅkara, knower of the three worlds.

214. Blameworthy are all they who at that time leave the human existence, Not having obtained final sanctity, still imperfect in knowledge.

215. The word of Buddha shines in the world of men and Devas, made to blossom by Arahats such as these, Freed from human passion, void of all taint (of sin).

216. The city of Dīpaṅkara Buddha was called Rammavatī, The khattiya Sumedha was his father, Sumedhā his mother.

217. Sumaṅgala and Tissa were his chief disciples, And Sāgata was the servitor of Dīpaṅkara Buddha.

218. Nandā and Sunandā were his chief female disciples. The Bodhi tree of this Buddha is called the Pipphali.⁶⁵

219. Eighty cubits in height the Great Sage Dīpaṅkara Shone conspicuous as a Deodar pine, or as a noble Sāl tree in full bloom. [1.31]

⁶⁴ Lit. “arithmetically innumerable.”
⁶⁵ [The Asvattha, or Indian Fig tree].
220. A hundred thousand years was the age of this Great Sage,
And so long as he was living on earth he brought many men to salvation.

221. Having made the Dhamma to flourish, having saved great multitudes of men, Having flamed like a mass of fire, he died together with his disciples.

222. And all these powers, this glory, these jewel-wheels on his feet,
All is wholly gone — are not all existing things vanity! {1.30}

223. After Dīpaṅkara was the leader named Koṇḍañña,
Of infinite powers, of boundless renown, immeasurable, unrivalled.”

[Buddha Koṇḍañña]

Next to the Dīpaṅkara Buddha, after the lapse of one asaṅkheyya, the Teacher Koṇḍañña appeared.

He also had three assemblies of saints,
at the first assembly there were a million millions,
at the second ten thousand millions,
at the third nine hundred millions.

At that time the Bodhisatta, having been born as a Universal Monarch named Vijitāvī, kept open house to the monastics with the Buddha at their head, in number a million of millions. The Teacher having predicted of the Bodhisatta, “He will become a Buddha,” preached the Dhamma. He having heard the Teacher’s preaching gave up his kingdom and became a Buddhist monk. Having mastered the Three Baskets,66 having obtained the six Super Knowledges, and having practised without failure the Absorptions, he was reborn in the Brahmā Realms.

The city of Koṇḍañña Buddha was Rammavaṭī, the khattiya Sunanda was his father,
his mother was queen Sujātā,
Bhadda and Subhadda were his two chief disciples,
Anuruddha was his servitor,
Tissā and Upatissā his chief female disciples,

66 The three divisions of the Buddhist Scriptures [i.e. the Tipiṭaka].
his Bodhi tree was the beautiful Sāla,
his body was eighty-eight cubits high,
and the duration of his life was a hundred thousand years.

[Buddha Maṅgala]

After him, at the end of one asaṅkheyya, in one and the same cycle four Buddhas were born, Maṅgala, Sumana, Revata and Sobhita.

Maṅgala Buddha had three assemblies of saints, of these at the first there were \([1.32]\) a million million priests,
at the second ten thousand millions,
at the third nine hundred millions.

It is related that a step-brother of his, prince Ānanda, accompanied by an assembly of nine hundred millions, went to the Teacher to hear him preach the Dhamma. The Teacher gave a discourse dealing successively with his various doctrines, and Ānanda and his whole retinue attained Arahatship together with the analytical knowledges.

The Teacher looking back upon the meritorious works done by these men of family in former existences, and perceiving that they had enough merit to acquire the robe and bowl by Supernormal Powers, stretching forth his right hand exclaimed, “Come, priests.”\(^{67}\) Then straightaway all of them having become equipped with obtained robes and bowls by Supernormal Powers, and perfect in decorum,\(^ {68}\) as if they were elders of sixty years standing, paid homage to the Teacher and attended upon him. This was his third assembly of saints.

Whereas with other Buddhas a light shone from their bodies to the distance of eighty cubits on every side, it was not so with this Buddha, but the light from his body permanently filled ten thousand worlds, and trees, earth, mountains, seas and all other things, not excepting even pots and pans and such-like articles, became as it were overspread with a film of gold. The duration of his life was ninety thousand years, and during the whole of this period the sun, moon and other heavenly bodies could not shine by their own light, and there was no distinction between night and day. By day all living beings \{1.31\} went about in the light of the Buddha as if in the light of the sun, and men ascertained the limits of night and day only by the flowers that blossomed in the evening and by the birds and other animals that uttered their cries in the morning. If I am asked, “What, do not other Buddhas also possess this power?” I reply, “Certainly \[1.33\] they do,” for they might at will fill with their lustre ten thousand worlds or more. But in accordance with a prayer made by him in a former existence, the lustre of Maṅgala Buddha permanently filled ten thousand worlds, just as the lustre of the others permanently extended to the distance of a fathom.\(^69\)

\(^{67}\) The formula by which a Buddha admits a layman to the priesthood.

\(^{68}\) Vijesinha.

The story is that when he was performing the duties of a Bodhisatta,\(^70\) being in an existence corresponding to the Vessantara existence,\(^71\) he dwelt with his wife and children on a mountain like the Vaṅka mountain (of the Vessantara-jātaka). One day a demon named Kharadāṭhika,\(^72\) hearing of the Bodhisatta’s inclination to giving, approached him in the guise of a brahmin, and asked the Bodhisatta for his two children. The Bodhisatta, exclaiming, “I give my children to the brahmin,” cheerfully and joyfully gave up both the children, thereby causing the ocean-girt earth to quake.\(^73\) The demon, standing by the bench at the end of the cloistered walk, while the Bodhisatta looked on, devoured the children like a bunch of roots. Not a particle of sorrow\(^74\) arose in the Bodhisatta as he looked on the demon, and saw his mouth as soon as he opened it disgorging streams of blood like flames of fire, nay, a great joy and satisfaction welled within him as he thought: “My gift was well given.” And he put up the prayer, “By the merit of this deed may rays of light one day issue from me in this very way.” In consequence of this prayer of his it was that the rays emitted from his body when he became Buddha filled so vast a space.

\(^69\) Lit. “like the fathom-light of the others, so the personal lustre of Maṅgala Buddha remained constantly pervading ten thousand worlds.”

\(^70\) i.e. the \textit{Pāramitā}.

\(^71\) i.e. his last birth before attaining Buddhahood.

\(^72\) This name means “sharp-fanged.”

\(^73\) In approval of his act of faith.

\(^74\) Lit. “no grief as big as the tip of a hair.”
There was also another deed done by him in a former existence. It is related that, when a Bodhisatta, having visited the relic shrine of a Buddha, he exclaimed, “I ought to sacrifice my life for this Buddha,” and having wrapped round the whole of his body in the same way that torches are wrapped, and having filled with clarified butter a golden vessel with jewelled wick-holders, worth a hundred thousand pieces, he lit therein a thousand wicks, and having set fire to the whole of his body beginning with his head, he spent the whole night in circumambulating the shrine. And as he thus strove till dawn not the root of a hair of his head was even heated, ’twas as one enters the calyx of a lotus, for the Truth guards him who guards himself.

Therefore has the Fortunate One said,

224. “Dhamma verily protects him who walks according thereto,
Dhamma rightly followed brings happiness.
This blessing is then in rightly following the Dhamma,
The righteous man goes not to a state of punishment.”

And through the merit of this work also the bodily lustre of this Buddha constantly extended through ten thousand worlds. At this time our Bodhisatta, having been born as the brahmin Suruci, approached the Teacher with the view of inviting him to his house, and having heard his sweet discourse, said: “Lord, take your meal with me tomorrow.” “Brahmin, how many monks do you wish for?” “Nay but how many monks have you in your escort?” At that time was the Teacher’s first assembly, and accordingly he replied, “A million millions.” “Lord, bring them all with you and come and take your meal at my house.” The Teacher consented.

The brahmin having invited them for the next day, on his way home thought to himself, “I am perfectly well able to supply all these monks with broth and rice and clothes and such-like necessaries, but how can there be room for them to sit down?” This thought of his caused the marble throne of the King of the Devas, three hundred and thirty-six thousand leagues away, to become warm.

---

75 [Ed: Thag 303.]
76 Viz. Gotama Bodhisatta.
77 When a good man is in difficulty, Sakka is apprised of it by his marble throne becoming warm.
exclaiming, “Who wishes to bring me down from my abode?” and looking down with the divine eye beheld the Bodhisatta, and said: “The brahmin Suruci having invited the clergy with the Buddha at their head is perplexed for room to seat them, it behoves me also to go there and obtain a share of his merit.” And having miraculously assumed the form of a carpenter, axe in hand he appeared before the Bodhisatta and said: “Has any one got a job to be done for hire?” The Bodhisatta seeing him said: “What sort of work can you do?” “There’s no art that I do not know; any house or hall that anybody orders me to build, I'll build it for him.” “Very well, I’ve got a job to be done.” “What is it, sir?” “I’ve invited a million million priests for tomorrow, will you build a hall to seat them all?” “I'll build one with pleasure if you’ve the means of paying me.” “I have, my good man.” “Very well, I’ll build it.” And he went and began looking out for a site.

There was a spot some fifty leagues in extent as level as a Meditation Object circle. Sakka fixed his eyes upon it, while he thought to himself, “Let a hall made of the seven precious stones rise up over such and such an extent of ground.” Immediately the edifice bursting through the ground rose up. The golden pillars of this hall had silver capitals, the silver pillars had golden capitals, the gem pillars had coral capitals, the coral pillars had gem capitals, while those pillars which were made of all the seven precious stones had capitals of the same. Next he said: “Let the hall have hanging wreaths of little bells at intervals,” and looked again. The instant he looked a fringe of bells hung down, whose musical tinkling, as they were stirred by a gentle breeze, was like a symphony of the five sorts of instruments, or as when the heavenly choirs are going on. He thought: “Let there be hanging garlands of perfumes and flowers,” and there the garlands hung. He thought: “Let seats and benches for a million million monks rise up through the earth,” and straightaway they appeared. He thought: “Let water vessels rise up at each corner of the building,” and the water vessels arose. Having by his effected all this, he went to the brahmin and said: “Come, sir, look at your hall, and pay me my wages.”

---

78 Lit. twelve or thirteen yojanas; a yojana is four leagues.
79 Used in absorption, jhāna, meditation.
80 The Pali word for the capital of a column is ghaṭaka, “little pot.”
The Bodhisatta went and looked at the hall, and as he looked his whole frame was thrilled in every part with fivefold joy. And as he gazed on the hall he thought thus within himself, “This hall was not wrought by mortal hands, but surely through my good intention, my good action, the palace of Sakka became hot, and hence this hall must have been built by the King of the Devas Sakka; it is not right that in such a hall as this I should give alms for a single day, I will give alms for a whole week.” For the gift of external goods, however great, cannot give satisfaction to the Bodhisattas, but the Bodhisattas feel joy at their self-renunciation when they sever the crowned head, put out the henna-anointed eyes, cut out the heart and give it away.

For when our Bodhisatta in the Sivijātaka [Ja 499] gave alms in the middle of his capital, at the four gates of the city, at a daily expenditure of five bushels of gold coins, this liberality failed to arouse within him a feeling of satisfaction at his renunciation. But on the other hand, when the King of the Devas Sakka came to him in the disguise of a brahmin, and asked for his eyes, then indeed, as he took them out and gave them away, laughter rose within him, [1.37] nor did his heart swerve a hair’s breadth from its purpose. And hence we see that as regards generosity the Bodhisattas can have no satiety.

Therefore this Bodhisatta also thinking: “I ought to give alms for seven days to a million million priests,” seated them in that hall, and for a week gave them the alms called gavapāna. \[81\] Men alone were not able to wait upon them, but the Devas themselves, taking turns with men, waited upon them. A space of fifty leagues or more sufficed not to contain the monks, yet they seated themselves each by his own power. On the last day, having caused the bowls of all the monks to be washed, and filled them with butter clarified and unclarified, honey and molasses, for medicinal use, he gave them back to them, together with the three robes. The robes and cloaks received by novices and ordained priests were worth a hundred thousand.

The Teacher, when he returned thanks, considering, “This man has given such great alms, who can he be?” and perceiving that at the end of two asaṅkheyyas \[81\] According to the gloss printed in the text it is a compound of milk, rice, honey, sugar and clarified butter.

and four thousand cycles he would become a Buddha named Gotama, addressing the Bodhisatta, made this prediction, “After the lapse of such and such a period you will become a Buddha named Gotama.” The Bodhisatta, hearing the prediction, thought, {1.34} “It seems that I am to become a Buddha, what good can a householder’s life do me? I will give up the world,” and, treating all this prosperity like so much drivel, he received ordination at the hands of the Teacher. And having embraced the ascetic life and learned the word of Buddha, and having attained the Super Knowledges and the Attainments, at the end of his life he was reborn in the Brahmā Realms.

The city of Maṅgala Buddha was called Uttara, his father was the khattiya Uttara;
his mother was Uttarā,
Sudeva and Dhammasena were his two chief [1.38] disciples,
Pālita was his servitor,
Śīvalī and Asokā his two chief female disciples.
The Nāga was his Bodhi tree,
his body was eighty-eight cubits high.

When his death took place, after he had lived ninety thousand years, at the same instant ten thousand worlds were involved in darkness, and in all worlds there was a great cry and lamentation of men.

225. “After Koṇḍañña the leader named Maṅgala, Dispelling darkness in the world, held aloft the torch of truth.”

[Buddha Sumana]

And after the Buddha had died, shrouding in darkness ten thousand worlds, the Teacher named Sumana appeared.

He also had three great assemblies of saints, at the first assembly the priests were a million millions, at the second, on the Golden Mountain, ninety million of millions, at the third eighty million of millions.

At this time the Bodhisatta was the Nāga king Atula, mighty and powerful. And he, hearing that a Buddha had appeared, left the Nāga world, accompanied by his assembled kinsmen, and, making offerings with celestial music to the Buddha, whose retinue was a million million of monastics, and having given great gifts, bestowing upon each two garments of fine cloth, he was established in the Three Refuges. And this Teacher also foretold of him, “One day he will be a Buddha.”

The city of this Buddha was named Khema, Sudatta was his father,
Sirimā his mother,
Sarana and Bhāvitatta his chief disciples,
Udena his servitor,
Soṇā and Upasōṇā his chief female disciples.
The Nāga was his Bodhi tree,
his body was ninety cubits high,
and his age ninety thousand years.

226. “After Maṅgala came the leader named Sumana,
In all things unequalled, the best of all beings.” {1.35}

[Buddha Revata]

After him the Teacher Revata appeared.

He also had [1.39] three assemblies of saints.
At the first assembly the priests were innumerable,
at the second there were a million millions,
so also at the third.

At that time the Bodhisatta having been born as the brahmin Atideva, having heard the Teacher’s preaching, was established in the Three Refuges. And raising his clasped hands to his head, having praised the Teacher’s abandonment of human passion, presented him with a monk’s upper robe. And he also made the prediction, “You will become a Buddha.”

Now the city of this Buddha was called Sudhaññavatī, his father was the khattiya Vipula,
his mother Vipulā,
Varuṇa and Brahmadeva his chief disciples,
Sambhava his servitor,
Bhaddā and Subhaddā his chief female disciples,
and the Nāga tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was eighty cubits high,
and his age sixty thousand years.

227. “After Sumana came the leader named Revata,
The Conqueror unequalled, incomparable, unmatched, supreme.”

[Buddha Sobhita]

After him appeared the Teacher Sobhita.

He also had three assemblies of saints;
at the first assembly a thousand million monks were present, at the second nine hundred millions,
at the third eight hundred millions.

At that time the Bodhisatta having been born as the brahmin Ajita, and having heard the Teacher’s preaching, was established in the Three Refuges, and gave a great donation to the monastic Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. To this man also he prophesied, saying: “Thou will become a Buddha.”

Sudhamma was the name of the city of this Fortunate One,
Sudhamma the king was his father,
Sudhammā his mother,
Asama and Sunetta his chief disciples,
Anoma his servitor,
Nakulā and Sujātā his chief female disciples,
and the Nāga tree his Bodhi tree;
his body was fifty-eight cubits high,
and his age ninety thousand years. [1.40]

228. “After Revata came the leader named Sobhita, Subdued and mild, unequalled and unrivalled.”

[Buddha Anomadassī]

After him, when an asaṅkheyya had elapsed, three Buddhas were born in one kalpa – Anomadassī, Paduma, and Nārada.

Anomadassī had three assemblies of saints;
at the first eight hundred thousand monks were present,
at the second seven,
at the third six.

At that time the Bodhisatta was a Yakkha chief, mighty and powerful, the lord of many millions of Yakkhas. He, hearing that a Buddha had appeared, came and gave a great donation to the monastic Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. And the Teacher prophesied to him too, saying: “Hereafter you will be a Buddha.”

The city of Anomadassī the Fortunate One was called Candavatī, Yasava the king was his father,
Yasodharā his mother,
Nisabha and Anoma his chief disciples,
Varuṇa his servitor,
Sundarī and Sumanā his chief female disciples,
the Arjuna tree his Bodhi tree;
his body was fifty-eight cubits high,
his age a hundred thousand years.

229. “After Sobhita came the perfect Buddha – the best of men – Anomadassī, of infinite fame, glorious, difficult to surpass.”

[Buddha Paduma]

After him appeared the Teacher named Paduma.

He too had three assemblies of saints;
at the first assembly a million million monks were present, at the second three hundred thousand, at the third two hundred thousand of the monks who dwelt at a great grove in the uninhabited forest.

At that time, while the Tathāgata was living in that grove, the Bodhisatta having been born as a lion, saw the Teacher plunged in Absorption, and with trustful heart made obeisance to him, and walking round him with reverence, experienced great joy, and thrice uttered a mighty roar. For seven days he laid not aside the bliss arising from the thought of the Buddha, but through joy and gladness, seeking not after prey, he kept in attendance there, offering up his life. When the Teacher, after seven days, aroused himself from his trance, he looked upon the lion and thought: “He will put trust in the monastic Saṅgha and make obeisance to them; let them draw near.” At that very moment the monks drew near, and the lion put faith in the Saṅgha. The Teacher, knowing his thoughts, prophesied, saying: “Hereafter he shall be a Buddha.”

Now the city of Paduma the Fortunate One was called Campaka, his father was Paduma the king,
his mother Asamā,
Śāla and Upasāla were his chief disciples,
Varuṇa his servitor,
Rāmā and Uparāmā his chief female disciples,
the Trumpet Flower tree his Bodhi tree;
his body was fifty-eight cubits high,
and his age was a hundred thousand years.

230. “After Anomadassī came the perfect Buddha, the best of men, Paduma by name, unequalled, and without a rival.”

[Buddha Nārada]

After him appeared the Teacher named Nārada.

He also had three assemblies of saints;
at the first assembly a million million monks were present, at the second ninety million million, at the third eighty million million.

At that time the Bodhisatta, having taken the vows as a sage, acquired the five Super Knowledges and the eight sublime Attainments, and gave a great donation to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head, making an offering of red sandal wood. And to him also he prophesied, “Hereafter you will be a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Dhaññavati, his father was Sumedha the warrior,
his mother Anomā,
Bhaddasāla and Jetamitta his chief disciples,
Vāseṭṭha his servitor,
Uttarā and Pagguṇī his chief female disciples, the great Trumpet Flower [1.42] tree was his Bodhi tree;
his body was eighty-eight cubits high,
and his age was ninety thousand years.

231. “After Paduma came the perfect Buddha, the best of men, Nārada by name, unequalled, and without a rival.”

[Buddha Padumuttara]

After Nārada the Buddha, a hundred thousand world-cycles ago there appeared in one kalpa only one Buddha called Padumuttara.

He also had three assemblies of saints;
at the first a million million monks were present, at the second, on the Vebhāra Mountain, nine hundred thousand million, at the third eight hundred thousand million.

At that time the Bodhisatta, born as the Great Minister of the name of Jaṭila, gave an offering of robes to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. And to him also he announced, “Hereafter you will be a Buddha.” And at the time of Padumuttara the Fortunate One there were no infidels, but all, men and Devas, took refuge in the Buddha.

His city was called Haṁsavatī, his father was Ānanda the warrior,
his mother Sujātā,
Devala and Sujāta his chief disciples,
Sumana his servitor,
Amitā and Asamā his chief female disciples,
the Sāla tree his Bodhi tree;
his body was eighty-eight cubits high,
the light from his body extended twelve leagues,
and his age was a hundred thousand years.

232. “After Nārada came the perfect Buddha, the best of men, Padumuttara by name, the Conqueror unshaken, like the sea.”

[Buddha Sumedha]

After him, when thirty thousand world-cycles had elapsed, two Buddhas, Sumedha and Sujāta, were born in one kalpa.
Sumedha also had three assemblies of his saints; at the first assembly, in the city Sudassana, a thousand million sinless ones were present, at the second [1.43] nine hundred, at the third eight hundred.

At that time the Bodhisatta, born as the brahmin youth named Uttara, lavished eight hundred millions of money he had saved in giving a great donation to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. And he then listened to the Dhamma, and accepted the refuges, and abandoned his home, and took the vows. And to him also the Buddha prophesied, saying: “Hereafter you will be a Buddha.”

The city of Sumedha the Fortunate One was called Sudassana, Sudattā the king was his father, Sudattā his mother, Sarana and Sabbakāma his two chief disciples, Sāgara his servitor, Rāmā and Surāmā his two chief female disciples, the great Campaka tree his Bodhi tree; his body was eighty-eight cubits high, and his age was ninety thousand years.

233. “After Padumuttara came the leader named Sumedha, The Sage hard to equal, brilliant in glory, supreme in all the world.”

[Buddha Sujāta]

After him appeared the Teacher Sujāta.

He also had three assemblies of his disciples; at the first assembly sixty thousand monks were present, at the second fifty, at the third forty.

At that time the Bodhisatta was a Universal Monarch; and hearing that a Buddha was born he went to him and heard the Dhamma, and gave to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head, his kingdom of the four continents with its seven treasures, and took the vows under the Teacher. All the dwellers in the land, taking advantage of the birth of a Buddha in their midst, did duty as servants in the monasteries, and continually gave great donations to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. And to him also the Teacher prophesied.

The city of this Fortunate One was called Sumaṅgala, Uggata the king was his father, Pabhāvatī his mother, Sudassana and Deva his chief disciples, Nārada his servitor, and Nāgā and Nāgasamālā his chief female disciples, and the great Bamboo tree his Bodhi tree; this tree, they say, had smaller hollows and thicker wood than ordinary bamboos have, and in its mighty upper branches it was as brilliant as a bunch of peacocks’ tails.

The body of this Fortunate One was fifty cubits high, and his age was ninety thousand years.

234. “In that age, the Maṇḍakalpa, appeared the leader Sujāta, Mighty jawed and grandly framed, whose measure none can take, and hard to equal.”

[Buddha Piyadassī]

After him, when eighteen hundred world-cycles had elapsed, three Buddhas, Piyadassī, Atthaḍassī, and Dhammadassī, were born in one kalpa.

Piyadassī also had three assemblies of his saints; at the first a million million monks were present, at the second nine hundred million, at the third eight hundred million.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as a young brahmin called Kassapa, who had thoroughly learned the three Vedas, listened to the Teacher’s preaching of the Dhamma, and built a monastery at a cost of a million million, and stood firm in the Refuges and the Precepts. And to him the Teacher prophesied, saying: “After the lapse of eighteen hundred kalpas you will become a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Anoma,

---

82 Compare Ja 20 below.
his father was Sudinna the king,
his mother Candā,
Pālita and Sabbadassī his chief disciples,
Sobhita his servitor,
Sujātā and Dhammadinnā his chief female disciples, and the Priyaṅgu tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was eighty cubits high,
and his age ninety thousand years. [1.45]

235. “After Sujāta came Piyadassī, leader of the world, Self-taught, hard to match, unequalled, of great glory.”

[Buddha Atthadassī]

After him appeared the Teacher called Atthadassī.

He too had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first nine million eight hundred thousand monks were present, at the second eight million eight hundred thousand,
and the same number at the third.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as the mighty ascetic Susīma, brought from heaven the sunshade of Mandārava flowers, and offered it to the Teacher, who prophesied also to him.

The city of this Fortunate One was called Sobhita, Sāgara the king was his father,
Sudassanā his mother,
Santa and Upasanta his chief disciples,
Abhaya his servitor,
Dhammā and Sudhammā his chief female disciples, and the Campaka his Bodhi tree.
His body was eighty cubits high,
the glory from his body always extended over a league,
and his age was a hundred thousand years.
236. “In the same Maṇḍakalpa Atthadassī, best of men, Dispelled the thick darkness, and attained supreme Awakening.”

[Buddha Dhammadassī]

After him appeared the Teacher named Dhammadassī.

He too had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first a thousand million monks were present, at the second seven hundred millions,
at the third eight hundred millions.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as Sakka the King of the Devas, made an offering of sweet-smelling flowers from heaven, and heavenly music. And to him too the Teacher prophesied.

The city of this Fortunate One was called Saraṇa, his father was Saraṇa the king,
his mother Sunandā,
Paduma and Phussadeva his chief disciples,
Sunetta his servitor,
Khemā and Sabbanāmā his chief female disciples, and the red Kuravaka tree (called also [1.46] Bimbijāla) his Bodhi tree.
His body was eighty cubits high,
and his age a hundred thousand years.

237. “In the same Maṇḍakalpa the far-famed Dhammadassī Dispelled the thick darkness, illumined earth and heaven.” [1.40]

[Buddha Siddhattha]

After him, ninety-four world-cycles ago, only one Buddha, by name Siddhattha, appeared in one kalpa.

Of his disciples too there were three assemblies;
at the first assembly a million million monks were present,
at the second nine hundred millions,
at the third eight hundred millions.
At that time the Bodhisatta, as the ascetic Maṅgala of great glory and gifted with the powers derived from the Higher Wisdom, brought a great jambu fruit and presented it to the Tathāgata. The Teacher, having eaten the fruit, prophesied to the Bodhisatta, saying: “Ninety-four kalpas hence you will become a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Vebhāra,
Jayasena the king was his father,
Suphassā his mother,
Sambala and Sumitta his chief disciples,
Revata his servitor,
Sīvalī and Surāmā his chief female disciples, and the Kanikāra tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was sixty cubits high,
and his age a hundred thousand years.

238. “After Dhammadassī, the leader named Siddhattha Rose like the sun, bringing all darkness to an end.”

[Buddha Tissa]

After him, ninety-two world-cycles ago, two Buddhas, Tissa and Phussa by name, were born in one kalpa.

Tissa the Fortunate One had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first a thousand millions of monks were present,
at the second nine hundred millions,
at the third eight hundred millions.

At that time the Bodhisatta was born as the wealthy and famous warrior-chief Sujāta. When he [1.47] had taken the vows and acquired the wonderful powers of a seer, he heard that a Buddha had been born; and taking a heaven-grown Mandārava lotus, and flowers of the Pāricchattaka tree (which grows in Sakka’s heaven), he offered them to the Tathāgata as he walked in the midst of his disciples, and he spread an awning of flowers in the sky. To him, too, the Teacher prophesied, saying: “Ninety-two kalpas hence you will become a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Khema, Janasandha the warrior-chief was his father,
Padumā his mother,
the god Brahmā and Udaya his chief disciples,
Sambhava his servitor,
Phussā and Sudattā his chief female disciples, and the Asana tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was sixty cubits high,
and his age a hundred thousand years.

239. “After Siddhattha, Tissa, the unequalled and unrivalled,
Of infinite virtue and glory, was the chief Guide of the world.”

[Buddha Phussa]

After him appeared the Teacher named Phussa.

He too had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first assembly six million monks were present, at the second five,
at the third three million two hundred thousand.

At that time the Bodhisatta, born as the warrior-chief Vijitāvī, laid aside his kingdom, and, taking the vows under the Teacher, learned the three \(1.41\) Piṭakas, and preached the Dhamma to the people, and fulfilled the Perfection of Virtue.\(^3\) And the Buddha prophesied to him in the same manner.

The city of this Fortunate One was called Kāsi (Benares), Jayasena the king was his father,
Sirimā his mother,
Surakkhita and Dhammasena his chief disciples,
Sabhiya his servitor,
Cālā and Upacālā his chief female disciples, \(1.48\) and the Āmalaka tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was fifty-eight cubits high,
and his age ninety thousand years.

\(^3\) Comp. pp. 19-20, verses 130-134.
240. “In the same Maṇḍakalpa Phussa was the Teacher supreme, Unequalled, unrivalled, the chief Guide of the world.”

[Buddha Vipassī]

After him, ninety world-cycles ago, appeared the Fortunate One named Vipassī.

He too had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first assembly six million eight hundred thousand monks were present; in the second one hundred thousand,
in the third eighty thousand.

At that time the Bodhisatta, born as the mighty and powerful snake king Atula, gave to the Fortunate One a golden chair, inlaid with the seven kinds of gems. To him also he prophesied, saying: “Ninety-one world-cycles hence you will become a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Bandhumatī, Bandhumā the king was his father, Bandhumatī his mother, Khandha and Tissa his chief disciples, Asoka his servitor, Candā and Candamittā his chief female disciples, and the Bignonia (or Pāṭali tree) his Bodhi tree.
His body was eighty cubits high, the effulgence from his body always reached a hundred leagues, and his age was a hundred thousand years.

241. “After Phussa, the Supreme Buddha, the best of men, Vipassī by name, the far-seeing, appeared in the world.”

[Buddha Sikhī]

After him, thirty-one world-cycles ago, there were two Buddhas, called Sikhī and Vessabhū.

Sikhī too had three assemblies of his saints; at the first assembly a hundred thousand monks were present, at the second eighty thousand, at the third seventy.
At that time the [1.49] Bodhisatta, born as king Arindama, gave a great donation of robes and other things to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head, and offered also a superb elephant, decked with the seven gems and provided with all things suitable. To him too he prophesied, saying: “Thirty-one world-cycles hence you will become a Buddha.”

The city of that Fortunate One was called Aruṇavatī, Aruṇa the warrior-chief was his father,
Pabhāvatī his mother,
Abhibhū and Sambhava his chief disciples,
Khemaṅkura his servitor,
Makhelā and Padumā his chief female disciples, and the Puṇḍarīka tree his Bodhi tree. [1.42]
His body was thirty-seven cubits high,
the effulgence from his body reached three leagues,
and his age was thirty-seven thousand years.

242. “After Vipassī came the Supreme Buddha, the best of men, Sikhī by name, the Conqueror, unequalled and unrivalled.”

[Buddha Vessabhū]

After him appeared the Teacher named Vessabhū.

He also had three assemblies of his saints;
at the first eight million priests were present,
at the second seven,
at the third six.

At that time the Bodhisatta, born as the king Sudassana, gave a great donation of robes and other things to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head. And taking the vows at his hands, he became righteous in conduct, and found great joy in meditating on the Buddha. To him too the Fortunate One prophesied, saying: “Thirty-one world-cycles hence you will become a Buddha.”

The city of this Fortunate One was called Anopama, Suppatīta the king was his father,
Yasavatī his mother,
Soṇa and Uttara his chief disciples,
Upasanta his servitor,
Dāmā and Sumālā his chief female disciples, and the Sāl tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was sixty cubits high,
and his age sixty thousand years. [1.50]

243. “In the same Maṇḍakaḷaṁpa, the Conqueror named Vessabhū, Unequalled and unrivalled, appeared in the world.”

[Buddha Kakusandha]

After him, in this world-cycle, four Buddhas have appeared – Kakusandha, Koṇāgaman, Kassapa, and our [Gotama] Buddha.

Kakusandha the Fortunate One had one assembly, at which forty thousand monks were present.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as Khema the king, gave a great donation, including robes and bowls, to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head, and having given also collyriums and drugs, he listened to the Dhamma preached by the Teacher, and took the vows. And to him also the Buddha prophesied.

The city of Kakusandha the Fortunate One was called Khema, Aggidatta the brahmin was his father,
Visākhā the brahmin woman his mother,
Vidhura and Sañjīva his chief disciples,
Buddhija his servitor,
Sāmā and Campakā his chief female disciples,
and the great Sirīsa tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was forty cubits high,
and his age forty thousand years.

244. “After Vessabhū came the perfect Buddha, the best of men, Kakusandha by name, infinite and hard to equal.” [1.43]

[Buddha Koṇāgaman]a

After him appeared the Teacher Koṇāgaman.

Of his disciples too there was one assembly, at which thirty thousand monks were present.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as Pabbata the king, went, surrounded by his ministers, to the Teacher, and listened to the preaching of the Dhamma. And having given an invitation to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head, he kept up a great donation, giving cloths of silk, and of fine texture, and woven with gold. And he took the vows from the Teacher’s hands. And to him too the Buddha prophesied.

The city of this Fortunate One was called Sobhavatī, Yaññadatta the brahmin was [1.51] his father,
Uttarā the brahmin woman his mother,
Bhiyyosa and Uttara his chief disciples,
Sotthija his servitor,
Samuddā and Uttarā his chief female disciples, and the Udumbara tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was twenty cubits high,
and his age was thirty thousand years.

245. “After Kakusandha came the Perfect Buddha, the best of men, Koṇāgamana by name, Conqueror, chief of the world, supreme among men.”

[Buddha Kassapa]

After him the Teacher named Kassapa appeared in the world.

Of his disciples too there was one assembly, at which twenty thousand monks were present.

At that time the Bodhisatta, as the brahmin youth Jotipāla, accomplished in the three Vedas, was well known on earth and in heaven as the friend of the potter Ghaṭīkāra. Going with him to the Teacher and hearing the Dhamma, he took the vows; and zealously learning the three Piṭakas, he glorified, by faithfulness in duty and in works of supererogation, the dispensation of the Buddha. And to him too the Buddha prophesied.

The birthplace of the Fortunate One was called Benares, Brahmadatta the brahmin was his father,
Dhanavatī of the brahmin caste his mother,
Tissa and Bhāradvāja his chief disciples,
Sabbamitta his servitor,
Anuḷā and Uruveḷā his chief female disciples, and the Nigrodha tree his Bodhi tree.
His body was twenty cubits high,
and his age was twenty thousand years.

246. “After Koṇāgamana came the Perfect Buddha, best of men, Kassapa by name, that Conqueror, king of Righteousness, and giver of Light.”

Again, in the kalpa in which Dīpaṅkara the Buddha appeared, three other Buddhas appeared also. On their part no prophecy was made to the Bodhisatta, they are therefore not mentioned here; but in the commentary, in order to mention all the Buddhas from this kalpa, it is said, 247. “Taṇhaṅkara and Medhaṅkara, and Saranaṅkara,

And the perfect Buddha Dīpaṅkara, and Koṇḍañña best of men, 248. And Maṅgala, and Sumana, and Revata, and Sobhita the sage,
Anomadassī, Paduma, Nārada, Padumuttara,
249. And Sumedha, and Sujāta, Piyadassī the famous one,
Atthaṅdassī, Dhammadassī, Siddhattha guide of the world,
250. Tissa, and Phussa the perfect Buddha, Vipassī, Sikhī, Vessabhū, Kakusandha, Koṇāgamana, and Kassapa too the Guide –
251. These were the perfect Buddhas, the sinless ones, the well-controlled;
Appearing like suns, dispelling the thick darkness;
They, and their disciples too, blazed up like flames of fire and went out.”

Thus our Bodhisatta has come down to us through four asaṅkheyyas plus one hundred thousand kalpas, making resolve in the presence of the twenty-four Buddhas, beginning with Dīpaṅkara. Now after Kassapa there is no other Buddha beside the present supreme Buddha. So the Bodhisatta received a prophecy from each of the twenty-four Buddhas, beginning at Dīpaṅkara.

And furthermore in accordance with the saying, [1.53]

“The resolve (to become a Buddha) only succeeds by the combination of eight qualifications: being a man, and of the male sex, and capable of attaining arahatship, association with the Teachers, renunciation of the world, perfection in virtue, acts of self-sacrifice, and earnest determination,”

he combined in himself these eight qualifications. And exerting himself according to the resolve he had made at the feet of Dīpañkara, in the words, “Come, I will search for the Buddha-making conditions, this way and that;”

and beholding the Perfections of Generosity and the rest to be the qualities necessary for the making of a Buddha, according to the words, he came down through many births, fulfilling these Perfections, even up to his last appearance as Vessantara. And the rewards which fell to him on his way, as they fall to all the Bodhisattas who have resolved to become Buddhas, are lauded thus:

“Then, as I made my search, I beheld the first Perfection of Generosity;”

252. “So the men, perfect in every part, and destined to Buddhahood, Traverse the long road through thousands of millions of ages.

253. They are not born in hell, nor in the space between the worlds; They do not become ghosts consumed by hunger, thirst, and want, And they do not become small animals, even though born to sorrow. [1.45]

254. When born among men they are not blind by birth, [1.54] They are not hard of hearing, they are not classed among the dumb.

255. They do not become women; among hermaphrodites and eunuchs They are not found – these men destined to Buddhahood.

256. Free from the deadly sins, everywhere pure-living, They follow not after vain philosophy, they perceive the workings of karma.

---

84 See verse 125, above p. 19.
85 See verse 126, above p. 19.
257. Though they dwell in heaven, they are not born into the Unconscious state, Nor are they destined to rebirth among the Devas in the Pure Abodes.86

258. Bent upon renunciation, holy in the world and not of it, They walk as acting for the world’s welfare, fulfilling all perfection.”

[Lives in which he Fulfilled the Perfections]

While he was thus fulfilling the Perfections, there was no limit to the existences in which he fulfilled the Perfection of Generosity. As, for instance, in the times of the brahmin Akitti [Ja 480], and the brahmin Saṅkha [Ja 442], and the king Dhanañjaya,87 and Mahāsudassana [Ja 95],88 and Mahāgovinda [DN 19], and the king Nimi [Ja 541],89 and the prince Canda [Ja 542],90 and the merchant Visayha [Ja 340], and the king Sivi [Ja 499], and Vessantara [Ja 547]. So, certainly, in the Jātaka as the Wise Hare [Ja 316], according to the words,91

259. “When I saw one coming for food, I offered my own self, There is no one like me in giving, such is my Perfection of Generosity” [1.55]

he, offering up his own life, acquired the Supreme Perfection called the Perfection of Generosity.

In like manner there is no limit to the existences – as, for instance, in the times when he was the snake king Sīlava [Ja 72], and the snake king Campeyya [Ja 506], the snake king Bhūridatta [Ja 543], the elephant king Chaddanta [Ja 514], and the prince Aḷīnasattu [Ja 513], son of king Jayaddisa – in which he fulfilled the 86 In the four highest of the thirty-one spheres of existence the Devas are unconscious, and the five worlds below these are called the Pure Abodes.

87 [There are two births in which a king Dhanañjaya appears, 515 and 545, but it is Ānanda who is identified with this king both times, and neither of them are about generosity.]
88 [This story does not illustrate generosity, but rather impermanence.]
89 [This story does not illustrate generosity, but rather impermanence.]
90 [This story does not seem very apt here.]
91 All the following verses down to verse 269 are quotations from the Cariyāpiṭaka [this is not quite right, some are found only in the commentary to Cp and other commentaries. This first one is from Cp 1.10.23.]
Perfection of Virtue. So, certainly, in the Sañkhapālaśūkta [Ja 524], according to the words,\(^92\)

260. “Even when piercing me with stakes, and striking me with javelins, I was not angry with the sons of Bhoja, such is my Perfection of Virtue,” he, offering up himself, acquired the Supreme Perfection, called the Perfection of Virtue.

In like manner there is no limit to existences – as, for instance, in the times when he was the prince Somanassa [Ja 505], and the prince Hatthipāla [Ja 509], and the wise man Ayoghara [Ja 510] – in which, forsaking his kingdom, he fulfilled the Perfection of Renunciation. So, certainly, in the Cullasutasmajātaka [Ja 525], according to the words,\(^93\) \(^{1.46}\)

261. “The kingdom, which was in my power, like spittle I rejected it,
And, rejecting, cared not for it, such is my Perfection of Renunciation,” he, renouncing the kingdom for freedom from the ties of attachment,\(^94\) acquired the Supreme Perfection, called the Perfection of Renunciation.

In like manner, there is no limit to the existences – as, \(^{1.56}\) for instance, in the times when he was the wise man Vidhura [Ja 545], and the wise man Mahāgovinda [DN 19], and the wise man Kuddāla [Ja 70], and the wise man Araka [Ja 169],\(^95\) and the ascetic Bodhi [Ja 528], and the wise man Mahosadha [Ja 546] – in which he fulfilled the Perfection of Wisdom. So, certainly, in the time when he was the wise man Senaka in the Sattubhastajātaka [Ja 402], according to the words,\(^96\)

\(^{92}\) [Cp 2.10.7]
\(^{93}\) [This verse is found only here and in other commentaries.]
\(^{94}\) The saṅgas, of which there are five – lust, hate, ignorance, pride, and false doctrine.
\(^{95}\) [This does not seem apt, as it illustrates loving-kindness, not wisdom.]
\(^{96}\) [Only found in the commentaries.]
262. “Searching the matter out by wisdom, I set the brahmin free from pain,
There is no one like me in wisdom; such is my Perfection of Wisdom,” he, pointing out the snake which had got into the bellows, acquired the Supreme Perfection called the Perfection of Wisdom.

So, certainly, in the Mahājanakajātaka [Ja 539], according to the words,

263. “Out of sight of the shore, in the midst of the waters, all men are as if dead,
There is no other way of thinking; such is my Perfection of Effort,” he, crossing the Great Ocean, acquired the Supreme Perfection called the Perfection of Effort.

And so in the Khantivādijātaka [Ja 313], according to the words,

264. “Even when he struck me with a sharp axe, as if I were a senseless thing,
I was not angry with the king of Kāsi; such is my Perfection of Patience,” he, enduring great sorrow as if he were a senseless thing, acquired the Perfection of Patience. [1.57]

And so in the Mahāsutasomajātaka [Ja 537], according to the words, 265. “Guarding the word of Truth, and offering up my life, I delivered the hundred warriors; such is my Perfection of Truth,” he, offering up his life, and observing truth, obtained the Perfection of Truth.

And in the Mūgapakkhajātaka [Ja 538], according to the words, 266. “Father and mother I hated not, reputation I hated not,

But Omniscience was dear to me, therefore was I resolute in duty,” [1.47] offering up even his life, and being resolute in duty, he acquired the Perfection of Determination.

97 [Only found in the commentaries.]
98 [Only found in the commentaries.]
99 [Only found in the commentaries.]
100 [Cp 3.1.6]
And so in the Ekarājajātaka [Ja 303], according to the words,

267. “No man terrifies me, nor am I in fear of any man; Firm in the power of loving-kindness, in purity I take delight,” regarding not even his life while attaining to kindness, he acquired the Perfection of Loving-Kindness.

So in the Lomahāṁsajātaka [Ja 94], according to the words, [Cp. 3.15.1]

268. “I lay me down in the cemetery, making a pillow of dead bones:
The village children mocked and praised: to all I was indifferent,” he was unshaken in equanimity, even when the villagers tried to vex or please him by spitting or by offering [1.58] garlands and perfumes, and thus he acquired the Perfection of Equanimity.

This is a summary only, the account will be found at length in the Cariyāpiṭaka.

Having thus fulfilled the Perfections, in his birth as Vessantara [Ja 547], according to the words,

269. “This earth, unconscious though she be and ignorant of joy or grief, E’en she by my free-giving’s mighty power was shaken seven times,” he performed such mighty acts of virtue as made the earth to shake. And when, in the fullness of time, he had passed away, he reassumed existence in the Tusita heaven.

Thus should be understood the period, called Dūrenidāna, from the Determination at the feet of Dīpaṅkara down to this birth in the City of Delight.

---

101 [Cp 3.13.3.]
102 [Cp. 1.9.58.]
II The Middle Epoch

The Proclamation

It was when the Bodhisatta was thus dwelling in the City of Delight, that the so-called ‘Buddha proclamation’ took place. For three such Proclamations take place on earth. These are the three. When they realize that at the end of a hundred thousand years a new dispensation will begin, the Devas called Lokabyūhā, with their hair flying and dishevelled, with weeping faces, wiping away their tears with their hands, clad in red garments, and with their clothes all in disorder, wander among men, and make proclamation, saying, “Friends, one hundred thousand years from now there will be a new dispensation; this system of worlds will be destroyed; even the mighty ocean \(1.48\) will dry up; this \([1.59]\) great earth, with Sineru the monarch of mountains, will be burned up and destroyed; and the whole world, up to the realms of the immaterial Devas, will pass away. Therefore, O friends, have loving-kindness, compassion, sympathy, and equanimity, cherish your mothers, support your fathers, honour the elders in your tribes.” This is called the Proclamation of a New Aeon \(\text{[Kappahalāhalaṁ]}\).

Again, when they realize that at the end of a thousand years an omniscient Buddha will appear on earth, the Deva-guardians of the world go from place to place and make proclamation, saying: “Friends, at the end of a thousand years from this time a Buddha will appear on earth.” This is called the Proclamation of a Buddha \(\text{[Buddhahalāhalaṁ]}\).

Again, when the Devas realize that at the end of a hundred years a Universal Monarch will appear, they go from place to place and make proclamation, saying: “Friends, at the end of a hundred years from this time a Universal Monarch will appear on earth.” This is called the Proclamation of a Universal Monarch \(\text{[Cakkavattihalāhalaṁ]}\). These are the three great proclamations.

\(^{103}\) [Rhys Davids headed this Avidūre Nidāna, which is not in keeping with the translation of the other sections. The title used here comes from the opening of the Nidānakathā].
When of these three they hear the Buddha-proclamation, the deities of the ten thousand world-systems assemble together; and having ascertained which of them living beings will become the Buddha, they go to him and beseech him to do so, so beseeching him when the first signs appear that his present life is drawing to its close. Accordingly on this occasion they all, with the King of the Devas in each world-system,\textsuperscript{104} assembled in one world, and going to the future Buddha in the Heaven of Delight, they besought him, saying,

“O Fortunate One, when you were fulfilling the Ten Perfections, you did not do so from a desire for the \textsuperscript{[1.60]} glorious state of a King of the Devas – Sakka, or Māra, or Brahmā – or of a mighty king upon earth; you were fulfilling them with the hope of reaching Omniscience for the sake of the Salvation of mankind! Now has the moment come, O Fortunate One, for thy Buddhahood; now has the time, O Fortunate One, arrived!”

The Five Points

But the Great Being, as if he had not granted the prayer of the deities, reflected in succession on the following five important points, viz. the time of his advent; the continent and country where he should appear; the tribe in which he should be born; the mother who should bear him, and the time when her life should be complete.

Of these he first reflected on the time, thinking: “Is this the time or not?” And on this point he thought: “When the duration of human existence is more than a hundred thousand years, the time has not arrived. Why not? Because in such a period men perceive not that living beings are subject to birth, decay, and death; the threefold pearl of the preaching of the Dhamma of the Buddhas is unknown; and when the Buddhas speak of the impermanence of things, of the universality of sorrow, and of the delusion of individuality, people will neither listen nor believe, saying, ‘What is this they talk of?’ At such a time there can be no perception of the truth, and without that the Dhamma it will not lead into the dispensation. That therefore is not the time. Neither is it the right time when the term of human existence is under one hundred years. Why not? Because then defilements are rife among men; and admonition addressed to those defiled finds no place for edification, but like a streak drawn on the water vanishes quickly away. {1.49} That therefore is not the time. When, however, the term of human existence is under a hundred thousand and over a hundred years, that is the proper time.” Now at that time the age of man was one hundred years. [1.61] The Great Being therefore saw that the time of his advent had arrived.

\textsuperscript{104} The names are given in the text; the four Mahārājas, Sakka, Suyāma, Santusita, Paranimittavasavatti, and Mahābrahmā. They are the great Devas in the different heavenly seats in each world-system (Cakkavāḷa) of the Buddhist cosmogony.

Then reflecting upon the continent, and considering the four great continents with their surrounding islands, he thought: “In three of the continents the Buddhas do not – but in Jambudīpa they do – appear,” and thus he decided on the continent.

Then reflecting upon the district, and thinking: “Jambudīpa indeed is large, ten thousand leagues in extent; now in which district of it do the Buddhas appear?” he fixed upon the Middle Country. And calling to mind that the town named Kapilavatthu was in that country, he concluded that he ought to be born in it.

Then reflecting on the tribe, he thought: “The Buddhas are not born in the Vessa caste, nor the Sudda caste; but either in the Brāhmaṇa or in the Khattiya caste, whichever is then held in the highest repute. The Khattiya caste is now predominant, I must be born in it, and Suddhodana the chief shall be my father.” Thus he decided on the tribe.

---

105 In the seas surrounding each continent (Mahādīpa) there are five hundred islands.

106 Majjhima-desa, of which the commentator adds, “This is the country thus spoken of in the Vinaya,” quoting the passage at Mahāvagga, v. 13, 12, which gives the boundaries as follows: “To the east the town Kajaṅgala, and bethathd it Mahāsaḷā; to the south-east the river Salalavatī; to the south the town Setakaṇṇika; to the west the brahmin town and district Thūṇa; and to the north the Usīraddhaja Mountain.” These are different from the boundaries of the Madhyadeśa of later Brahminical literature, on which see Lassen’s ‘Indische Alterthumskunde,’ vol. i. p. 119 (2nd edition). This sacred land was regarded as the centre of Jambudvīpa; that is, of the then known world – just as the Chinese talk of China as the Middle Country, and as other people have looked on their own capital as the navel or centre of the world, and on their world as the centre of the universe.
Then reflecting on the mother, he thought: “The mother of a Buddha is not eager for love, or cunning after drink, but has fulfilled the Perfections for a hundred thousand ages, and from her birth upwards has kept the Five Precepts unbroken. Now this lady Mahāmāyā is [1.62] such a one, she shall be my mother.” And further considering how long her life should last, he foresaw that it would still last ten months and seven days.

Having thus reflected on these five important points, he favoured the deities by granting their prayer, saying: “The time has arrived, dears, for me to become a Buddha.” He then dismissed them with the words, “You may depart,” and attended by the Devas of the heaven of Joy, he entered the grove of Gladness in the City of Delight.

Now in each of the Deva-heavens (Devalokas) there is such a Nandana grove; and there the Devas are wont to remind any one of them who is about to depart of the opportunities he has gained by good deeds done in a former birth, {1.50} saying to him, “When fallen hence, may you be reborn in bliss.” And thus he also, when walking about there, surrounded by Devas reminding him of his acquired merit, departed thence; and was conceived in the womb of queen Mahāmāyā.

The Dream of Mahāmāyā

In order to explain this better, the following is the account in fuller detail. At that time, it is said, the Midsummer festival was proclaimed in the city of Kapilavatthu, and the people were enjoying the feast. During the seven days before the full moon queen Mahāmāyā had taken part in the festivity, as free from intoxication as it was brilliant with garlands and perfumes. On the seventh day she rose early and bathed in perfumed water: and she distributed four hundred thousand pieces in giving great largesse. Decked in her richest attire she partook of the purest food: and vowing to observe the Eight Precepts, she entered her beautiful chamber, and lying on her royal couch she fell asleep and dreamt this dream.

The Four Kings of the gods, the Guardians of the World, lifting her up in her couch, carried her to the Himālayas mountains, and placing her under the Great Sāla tree, seven [1.63] leagues high, on the Crimson Plain, sixty yojanas broad, they stood respectfully aside. Their queens then came toward her, and taking her to the lake of Anotatta, bathed her to free her from human stains; and dressed her in heavenly garments; and anointed her with perfumes; and decked her with heavenly flowers. Not far from there is the Silver Hill, within which is a golden mansion; in it they spread a heavenly couch, with its head towards the east, and on it they laid her down. Then the future Buddha, who had become a superb white elephant, and was wandering on the Golden Hill, not far from there, descended thence, and ascending the Silver Hill, approached her from the north. Holding in his silvery trunk a white lotus flower, and uttering a far-reaching cry, he entered the golden mansion, and thrice doing obesiance to his mother’s couch, he gently struck her right side, and seemed to enter her womb.\(^{107}\)

Thus was he conceived at the end of the Midsummer festival. And the next day, having awoke from her sleep, she related her dream to the king. The king had sixty-four eminent brahmins summoned, and had costly seats spread on a spot made ready for the state occasion with green leaves and dalbergia flowers, and he had vessels of gold and silver filled with delicate milk-rice compounded with ghee and sweet honey, and covered with gold and silver bowls. This food he gave them, and he satisfied them with gifts of new garments and of tawny cows. And when he had thus satisfied their every desire, he had the dream told to them, and then he asked them, “What will come of it?”

The brahmins said: “Be not anxious, O king! Your queen has conceived: and the fruit of her womb will be a male child; it will not be a female child. You will have a son. And he, if he adopts a householder’s life, will become a king, a Universal Monarch; but if, leaving his home, he adopt the ascetic life, he will become a Buddha, who will remove from the world the veils of ignorance and sin.”

The Thirty-Two Signs

Now at the moment when the future Buddha made himself incarnate in his mother’s womb, the constituent elements of the ten thousand world-systems

\(^{107}\) It is instructive to notice that in later accounts it is soberly related as actual fact that the Bodhisatta entered his mother’s womb as a white elephant: and the Incarnation scene is occasionally so represented in Buddhist sculptures.
quaked, and trembled, and were shaken violently. The Thirty-two Good Omens also were made manifest.

In the ten thousand world-systems an immeasurable light appeared.
The blind received their sight, as if from very longing to behold this his glory.
The deaf heard the noise.
The dumb spake one with another.
The crooked became straight.
The lame walked.
All prisoners were freed from their bonds and chains.
In each hell the fire was extinguished.
The hungry ghosts received food and drink.
The wild animals ceased to be afraid.
The illness of all who were sick was allayed.
All men began to speak kindly.
Horses neighed gently.
Elephants trumpeted gently.
All musical instruments gave forth each its note, though none played upon them.
Bracelets and other ornaments jingled of themselves.
All the heavens became clear.
A cool soft breeze wafted pleasantly for all.
Rain fell out of due season.
Water, welling up from the very earth, overflowed.
The birds forsook their flight on high.
The rivers stayed their waters’ flow.
The waters of the mighty ocean became fresh.
 Everywhere the earth was covered with lotuses of every colour.
All flowers blossomed on land and in water.
The trunks, and branches, and creepers of trees were covered with the bloom appropriate to each.
On earth tree-lotuses sprang up by sevens together, breaking even through [1.65] the rocks.
Hanging-lotuses descended from the skies.
[Showers of flowers fell on all sides.
Heavenly music resounded in the sky.]
The ten-thousand world-systems revolved, and rushed as close together as a bunch of gathered flowers; and became as it were a woven wreath of worlds, as sweet-smelling and resplendent as a mass of garlands, or as a sacred altar decked with flowers.

From the moment of the conception, thus brought about, of the future Buddha, four Devaputtas, with swords in their hands, stood guard over the Bodhisatta and his mother, to shield them from all harm. Pure in thought, having reached the highest aim and the highest honour, the mother was happy and unwearied; and she saw the child \(1.52\) within her as plainly as one could see a thread passed through a transparent gem.\(^{108}\) But as a womb in which a future Buddha has dwelt, like a sacred relic shrine, can never be occupied by another; the mother of the Bodhisatta, seven days after his birth, died, and was reborn in the City of Delight.

The Birth

Now other women give birth, some before, some after, the completion of the tenth month, some sitting, and some lying down. Not so the mother of a Bodhisatta. She gives birth to the Bodhisatta, standing, after she has cherished him in her womb for exactly ten months. This is a distinctive quality of the mother of a Bodhisatta.

And queen Mahāmāyā, when she too had thus cherished the Bodhisatta in her womb, like oil in a vessel, for ten months, felt herself far gone with child: and wishing to go to her family home she spake to king Suddhodana, and said: “O king! I wish to go to Devadaha, to the city of my people.” The king, saying: “It is good,” consented, and had the road from Kapilavatthu to Devadaha made plain, and decked \[1.66\] with arches of plaintain trees, and well-filled waterpots, and flags, and banners. And seating the queen in a golden palanquin carried by a thousand attendants, he sent her away with a great retinue.

Now between the two towns there is a pleasure-grove of Sāl trees belonging to the people of both cities, and called the Lumbini grove. At that time, from the roots to the topmost branches, it was one mass of fruits and flowers; and amidst the

---

\(^{108}\) I once saw a notice of some medieval frescoes in which the Holy Child was similarly represented as visible within the Virgin’s womb, but have unfortunately mislaid the reference. [The Orthodox icons often show the baby as visible in the womb.]
blossoms and branches swarms of various-coloured bees, and flocks of birds of different kinds, roamed, warbling sweetly. The whole of the Lumbini grove was like a wood of variegated creepers, or the well-decorated banqueting hall of some mighty king. The queen beholding it was filled with the desire of besporting herself in the Sāl tree grove; and the attendants, carrying the queen, entered the wood. When she came to the monarch Sāl tree of the glade, she wanted to take hold of a branch of it, and the branch bending down, like a reed heated by steam, approached within reach of her hand. Stretching out her hand she took hold of the branch, and then her pains came upon her. The people drawing a curtain round her, retired. Standing, and holding the branch of the Sāl tree, she was delivered.

That very moment the four Suddhāvāsa Mahā Brahmā Devas came there bringing a golden net; and receiving the future Buddha on that net, they placed him before his mother, saying: “Be joyful, O lady! A mighty son is born to thee!”

Now other living things, when they leave their mother’s womb, leave it smeared with offensive and impure matter. Not so a Bodhisatta. {1.53} The future Buddha left his mother’s womb like a preacher descending from a Dhamma seat or a man from a ladder, erect, stretching out his hands and feet, unsoiled by any impurities from contact with his mother’s womb, pure and fair, and shining like a gem placed on [1.67] fine muslin of Benares. But though this was so, two showers of water came down from heaven in honour of them and refreshed the Bodhisatta and his mother.

From the hands of the Devas who had received him in the golden net, four kings received him on cloth of antelope skins, soft to the touch, such as are used on occasions of royal state. From their hands men received him on a roll of fine cloth; and on leaving their hands he stood up upon the ground and looked towards the east. Thousands of world-systems became visible to him like a single open space.
Men and Devas offering him sweet-smelling garlands, said: “O Great Being, there is no other like thee, how then a greater?” Searching the ten directions (the four points of the compass, the four intermediate points, the zenith and the nadir), and finding no one like himself, he took seven strides, saying: “This is the best direction.” And as he walked the King of the Devas Brahmā held over him the white umbrella, and the King of the Devas Suyāma followed him with the fan, and other deities with the other symbols of royalty in their hands. Then stopping at the seventh step, he sent forth his noble voice and shouted the shout of victory, beginning with:

“I am the chief of the world,
I am supreme in the world;
this is my last birth;
henceforth there will be no rebirth for me.”

Now the future Buddha in three births thus uttered his voice immediately on leaving his mother’s womb; in his birth as Mahosadha, in his birth as Vessantara, and in this birth. In the Mahosadha birth the King of the Devas Sakka came to him as he was being born, and placing some fine sandal-wood in his hand, went away. He came out from the womb holding this in his fist. His mother asked him, “What is it you hold, dear, as you come?” He answered, “Medicine, mother!” So because he came holding medicine, they gave him the name of Medicine-child (Osadhadāraka). Taking the medicine they kept it in an earthenware waterpot; and it became a drug by which all the sickness of the blind and deaf and others, as many as came, was healed. So the saying sprang up, “This is a powerful drug, this is a powerful drug;” and hence he was called Mahosadha (The Great Medicine Man).

Again, in the Vessantara birth, as he left his mother’s womb, he stretched out his right hand, saying: “But is there anything in the house, mother? I would give a gift.” Then his mother, saying: “You are born, dear, in a wealthy family,” took his hand in hers, and placed on it a bag containing a thousand.

Lastly, in this birth he sang the song of victory. Thus the future Buddha in three births uttered his voice as he came out of his mother's womb. And as at the moment of his conception, so at the moment of his birth, the thirty-two Good Omens were seen.

Now at the very time when our Bodhisatta was born in the Lumbini grove, the lady, the mother of Rāhula, [Ānanda, his future servitor], Channa the attendant, Kāḷudāyi the minister, Kanthaka the royal horse, the great Bodhi tree, and the four vases full of treasure, also came into being. Of these last, one was two miles, one four, one six, and one eight miles in size. These seven are called the Sahajātā, the Connatal Ones.¹⁰⁹

The people of both towns took the Bodhisatta and went to Kapilavatthu. On that day too, the choirs of Devas in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven were astonished and joyful; and waved their cloaks and rejoiced, saying: “In Kapilavatthu, [1.69] to Suddhodana the king, a son is born, who, seated under the Bodhi tree, will become a Buddha.”

The Predictions

At that time an ascetic named Kāḷa Devala (a confidential adviser of Suddhodana the king, who had passed through the eight Attainments¹¹⁰ had eaten his mid-day meal, and had gone to the Tāvatiṁsa heaven, to rest through the heat of the day. While there sitting resting, he saw these Devas, and asked them, “Why are you thus glad at heart and rejoicing? Tell me the reason of it.”

The Devas replied, “Sir, to Suddhodana the king is born a son, who seated under the Bodhi tree will become a Buddha, and will roll the Wheel of Dhamma.¹¹¹ To us it will be given to see his infinite grace and to hear his word. Therefore it is that we are glad!”

The ascetic, hearing what they said, quickly came down from the Deva world, and entering the king’s house, sat down on the seat set apart for him, and said: “A son they say is born to you, O king! Let me see him.”

The king ordered his son to be clad in splendour and brought in to salute the ascetic. But the future Buddha turned his feet round, and planted them on the ¹⁰⁹ There is some mistake here, as the list contains nine – or if the four treasures count as one, only six – Connatal Ones. I think before Kaḷudāyi we should insert Ānanda, the loving disciple [Rhys-Davids was right about this, and I have included Ānanda’s name in this edition after Rāhula]. The legend is certainly, as to its main features, an early one, for it is also found, in greatly exaggerated and contradictory terms, in the books of Northern Buddhists (Lalitavistara, Foucaux, p. 97, Beal, p. 53, comp. Senart, p. 294).

¹¹⁰ Samāpatti.

¹¹¹ Dhammacakkāṁ pavattessati. See my “Buddhism,” p. 45.
matted hair of the ascetic. For in that birth there was no one worthy to be saluted by the Bodhisatta, and if those ignorant ones had placed the head of the future Buddha at the feet of the ascetic, assuredly the ascetic's head would have split in two. The ascetic rose from his seat, and saying: “It is not right for me to work my own destruction,” he did homage to the Bodhisatta. And the king also seeing this wonder did homage to his own son. [1.70]

Now the ascetic had the power of calling to mind the events of forty aeons (kappas) in the past, and of forty ages in the future. Looking at the marks of future prosperity on the Bodhisatta’s body, he considered with himself, “Will he become a Buddha or not?” And perceiving that he would most certainly become a Buddha, he smiled, saying: “This is a wonderful child.” Then reflecting, “Will it be given to me to behold him when he has become a Buddha?” he perceived that it would not. “Dying before that time I shall be reborn in the Formless World; so that while a hundred or perhaps a thousand Buddhas appear among men, I shall not be able to go and be taught by them. And it will not be my good fortune to behold this so wonderful child when he has become a Buddha. Great, indeed, is my loss!” And he wept.

The people seeing this, asked, saying: “Our master just now smiled, and has now begun to weep! Will, sir, any misfortune befall our master’s little one?”

“There is no misfortune in him; assuredly he will become a Buddha,” was the reply.

“Why then do you weep?”

“It will not be granted to me,” he said, “to behold so great a man when he has become a Buddha. Great, indeed, is my loss! Bewailing myself, I weep.”

---

112 It was considered among the brahmins a sign of holiness to wear matted or platted hair. This is referred to in the striking Buddhist verse (Dhammapada, v. 394), “What is the use of platted hair, O fool! What of a garment of skins! Your low yearnings are within you, and the outside you make clean!”

113 “Our master” is here, of course, the sage. It is a pretty piece of politeness, not unfrequent in the Jātakas, to address a stranger as a relation. See below, Ja 3.
Then reflecting, “Will it be granted or not to any one of my relatives to see him as a Buddha?” He saw it would be granted to his nephew Nālaka. So he went to his sister’s house, and said to her, “Where is your son Nālaka?”

“In the house, brother.”

“Call him,” said he. When he came he said to him, “In the family of Suddhodana the king, dear, a son is [1.71] born, a young Buddha. In thirty-five years he will become a Buddha, and it will be granted you to see him. This very day give up the world!”

Bearing in mind that his uncle was not a man to urge him without a cause, the young man, though born in a family of incalculable wealth,114 straightaway took out of the inner store a yellow suit of clothes and an earthenware pot, and shaved his head and put on the robes. And saying: “I take the vows for the sake of the greatest Being upon earth,” he prostrated himself on the ground and raised his joined hands in adoration towards the Bodhisatta. Then putting the begging bowl in a bag, and carrying it on his shoulder, he went to the Himālayas mountains, and lived the life of a monastic.

When the Tathāgata had attained to complete Awakening, Nālaka went to him and heard the way of salvation.115 He then returned to the Himālayas, and reached Arahatship. And when he had lived seven months longer as a pilgrim along the most excellent Path, he passed away when standing near a Golden Hill, by that final extinction in which no part or power of man remains.116

Now on the fifth day they bathed the Bodhisatta’s head, saying: “Let us perform the rite of choosing a name for him.” So they perfumed the king’s house with four 114 Literally “worth eighty and seven times a koṭi,” both eighty and seven being lucky numbers.

115 Literally, “and caused him to declare, ‘The way of salvation for Nālaka.’ ” [See Snp 3.11, Nālakasutta]. Tathāgata, “gone, or come, in like manner; subject to the fate of all men,” is an adjective applied originally to all mortals, but afterwards used as a favourite epithet of Gotama. Childers compares the use of ‘Son of Man.’

116 Anupādisesāya Nibbānahātuyā parinibbāyi. In the translator’s “Buddhism,” p. 113, an analysis of this phrase will be found.
kinds of odours, and decked it with Dalbergia flowers, and made ready rice well cooked in milk. Then they sent for one hundred and eight brahmins who had mastered the three Vedas, and seated them in the king’s house, and gave them the pleasant food to eat, \( \{1.56\} \) and did [1.72] them great honour, and asked them to recognize the signs of what the child should be.

Among them:

270. “Rāma, and Dhaja, and Lakkhaṇa, and Mantī, Koṇḍañña and Bhoja, Suyāma and Sudatta,
These eight brahmins then were there,
Their senses all subdued; and they declared the mantra.”

Now these eight brahmins were recognizers of signs; it was by them that the dream on the night of conception had been interpreted. Seven of them holding up two fingers prophesied in the alternative, saying: “If a man having such marks should remain a householder, he becomes a Universal Monarch; but if he takes the vows, he becomes a Buddha.” And, so saying, they declared all the glory and power of a Cakkavatti king.

But the youngest of all of them, a young brahmin whose family name was Koṇḍañña, beholding the perfection of the auspicious marks on the Bodhisatta, raised up one finger only, and prophesied without ambiguity, and said: “There is no sign of his remaining amidst the cares of household life. Verily, he will become a Buddha, and remove the veil from the world.”

This man already, under former Buddhas, had made a deep resolve of holiness, and had now reached his last birth. Therefore it was that he surpassed the other seven in wisdom; that he perceived how the Bodhisatta would only be subject to this one life; and that, raising only one finger, he so prophesied, saying: “The lot of one possessed of these marks will not be cast amidst the cares of household life. Verily he will become a Buddha!”

Now those brahmins went home, and addressed their [1.73] sons, saying: “We are old, beloved ones; whether or not we shall live to see the son of Suddhodana the king after he has gained omniscience, do you, when he has gained omniscience, take the vows according to his dispensation.” And after they all seven had lived out their span of life, they passed away and were reborn according to their deeds.
But the young brahmin Koṇḍañña was free from disease; and for the sake of the wisdom of the Great Being he left all that he had and made the Great Renunciation. And coming in due course to Uruvelā, he thought: “Behold how pleasant is this place! How suitable for the exertions of a young man desirous of striving.” So he took up his residence there.

And when he heard that the Great Being had taken the vows, he went to the sons of those brahmins, and said to them, “Siddhattha the prince has taken the vows. Assuredly he will become a Buddha. If your fathers were in health they would today leave their homes, and take the vows: and now, if you should so desire, come, I will take the vows in imitation of him.” But all of them were not able to agree with one accord; three did not give up the world; the other four made Koṇḍañña the brahmin their leader, and took the vows. It was those five who came to be called “the Company of the Five elders.”

Then the king asked, “After seeing what, will my son forsake the world?”

“The four omens,” was the reply.

“Which four?”

“A man worn out by age, a, sick man, a dead body, and a monk.”

The king thought: “From this time let no such things come near my son. There is no good of my son’s becoming a Buddha. I should like to see my son exercising rule and sovereignty over the four great continents and the two thousand islands that surround them; and walking, as it were, in the vault of heaven, surrounded by an innumerable retinue.” Then, so saying, he placed guards two miles apart in the four directions to prevent men of those four kinds coming to the sight of his son.

That day also, of eighty thousand clansmen assembled in the festival hall, each one dedicated a son, saying: “Whether this child becomes a Buddha or a king, we give each a son; so that if he shall become a Buddha, he shall live attended and honoured by Khattiya monks, and if he shall become a king, he shall live attended

---

117 Literally: ‘a retinue thirty-six leagues in circumference,’ where ‘thirty-six’ is a mere sacred number.
and honoured by Khattiya nobles.” And the king appointed nurses of great beauty, and free from every fault, for the Bodhisatta. So the Bodhisatta grew up in great splendour and surrounded by an innumerable retinue.

The Ploughing Festival

Now one day the king held the so-called Ploughing Festival. On that day they ornamented the town like a palace of the gods. All the slaves and servants, in new garments and crowned with sweet-smelling garlands, assembled in the king’s house. For the king’s work a thousand ploughs were yoked. On this occasion one hundred and eight minus one were, with their oxen-reins and cross-bars, ornamented with silver. But the plough for the king to use was ornamented with red gold; and so also the horns and reins and goads of the oxen.

The king, leaving his house with a great retinue, took his son and went to the spot. There there was a Jambu tree thick with leaves and giving a dense shade. Under it the king had the child’s couch laid out; and over the couch a canopy spread inlaid with stars of gold, and round it a curtain hung. Then leaving a guard there, the king, clad in splendour and attended by his ministers, went away to plough.

At such a time the king takes hold of a golden plough, the attendant ministers one hundred and eight minus one silver ploughs, and the peasants the rest of the ploughs. Holding them they plough this way and that way. The king goes from one side to the other, and comes from the other back again.

On this occasion the king had great success; and the nurses seated round the Bodhisatta, thinking: “Let us go to see the king’s glory,” came out from within the curtain, and went away. The future Buddha, looking all round, and seeing no one, got up quickly, seated himself cross-legged, and holding his breath, sank into the first Absorption.

---

118 Khattiya was the warrior caste.
119 Jhāna, a state of religious meditation. A full explanation is given in the translator’s “Buddhism,” pp. 174-176.
The nurses, engaged in preparing various kinds of food, delayed a little. The shadows of the other trees turned round, but that of the Jambu tree remained steady and circular in form. The nurses, remembering their young master was alone, hurriedly raised the curtain and returned inside. Seeing the Bodhisatta sitting cross-legged, and that miracle of the shadow, they went and told the king, saying: “O king! The prince is seated in such and such a manner; and while the shadows of the other trees have turned, that of the Jambu tree is fixed in a circle!”

And the king went hurriedly and saw that miracle, and did homage to his son, saying: “This, Beloved One, is the second homage paid to thee!”

Siddhattha’s Youth

But the Bodhisatta in due course grew to manhood. And the king had three mansions made, suitable for the three seasons, one nine stories high, one seven stories high, and one five stories high; and he provided him with forty thousand dancing girls. So the Bodhisatta, surrounded by well-dressed dancing girls, like a god surrounded by troops of Accharā, and attended by musical instruments which played of themselves, lived, as the seasons changed, in each of these mansions in enjoyment of great majesty. And the mother of Rāhula was his principal queen.

While he was thus in the enjoyment of great prosperity the following talk sprang up in the public assembly of his clansmen, “Siddhattha lives devoted to pleasure; not one thing does he learn; if war should break out, what would he do?”

The king sent for the future Buddha, and said to him, “Your relations, Beloved One, say that you learn nothing, and are given up to pleasure: now what do you think you should do about this?”

“O king! There is no art it is necessary for me to learn. Send the crier round the city, that I may show my skill. Seven days from now I will show my kindred what I can do.”

The king did so. The Bodhisatta assembled those so skilled in archery that they could split even a hair, and shoot as quick as lightning; and then, in the midst of the people, he showed his relatives his twelvefold skill, and how unsurpassed he was by other masters of the bow.\textsuperscript{120} So the assembly of his clansmen doubted no longer.
The Middle Epoch – 78

\textbf{The Four Omens}

Now one day the future Buddha, wanting to go to his pleasure ground, told his charioteer to harness his chariot. The latter accordingly decked the gloriously beautiful chariot with all its trappings, and harnessed to it\textsuperscript{1.59} four state horses of the Sindhi breed, and white as the leaves of the white lotus flower. And he informed the Bodhisatta. So the Bodhisatta ascended the chariot, resplendent like a mansion in the skies, and went towards the garden.

The Devatās thought: “The time for young Siddhattha to attain Awakening is near, let us show him the omens.” And they did so by making a Devaputta represent a man wasted by age, with decayed teeth\textsuperscript{[1.77]} and grey hair, bent and broken down in body, and with a stick in his hand. But he was only visible to the future Buddha and his charioteer.

Then the Bodhisatta asked his charioteer, as is told in the Mahāpadāna,\textsuperscript{121} “What kind of man is this, whose very hair is not as that of other men?” When he heard his servant’s answer, he said: “Shame then be to life! Since the decay of every living being is notorious!” and with agitated heart he turned back at that very spot and re-entered his palace.

The king asked, “Why does my son turn back so hurriedly?”

“He has seen an old man,” they said; “and having seen an old man, he will forsake the world.”

“By this you ruin me,” exclaimed the king; “quickly get ready concerts and plays to be performed before my son. So long as he continues in the enjoyment of pleasure, he will not turn his thoughts to forsaking the world!” Then increasing \textsuperscript{120} A gloss adds, “This should be understood as is related at full in the Sarabhaṅga-jātaka [Ja 522].”

\textsuperscript{121} [DN 14, but there said concerning the prince Vipassī.]
the guards, he placed them at each point of the compass, at intervals of half a league.

Again, one day, when the future Buddha, as he was going to his pleasure ground, saw a sick man represented by the gods, he made the same inquiry as before; and then, with agitated heart, turned back and re-entered his palace. The king also made the same inquiry, and gave the same orders as before; and again increasing the guard, placed them all round at a distance of three-quarters of a league.

Once more, when the future Buddha, as he was going to his pleasure ground, saw a dead man represented by the gods, he made the same inquiry as before; and then, with agitated heart, turned back and re-entered his palace. The king also made the same inquiry, and gave the same orders as before; and again increasing the guard, placed them all round at a distance of a league. [1.78]

Once again, when the future Buddha, as he was going to his pleasure ground, he saw one who had abandoned the world, carefully and decently clad, he asked his charioteer, “Friend, what kind of man is that?” As at that time there was no Buddha at all in the world, the charioteer understood neither what a mendicant was nor what were his distinguishing characteristics; but nevertheless, inspired by the gods, he said: “That is one who has gone forth,” and described the advantages of renouncing the world. And that day the future Buddha, cherishing the thought of renouncing the world, went on to his pleasure ground. The repeaters of the Dīghanikāya, however, say that he saw all four Omens on the same day, and then went to his pleasure ground.

There he enjoyed himself during the day and bathed in the beautiful lake; and at sunset seated himself on the royal resting stone to be robed. Now his attendants brought robes of different colours, and various kinds of ornaments, and garlands, and perfumes, and ointments, and stood around him.

---

122 The members of the Buddhist Saṅgha were in the habit of selecting some book or books of the Buddhist Scriptures, which it was their especial duty to learn by heart, repeat to their pupils, study, expound, and preach from. Thus the Dīghanikāya, or collection of long treatises, had a special school of “repeaters” (bhāṇakā) to itself.
At that moment the throne on which Sakka was seated became warm. And thinking to himself, “Who is it now who wants me to descend from hence?” He perceived that the time for the adornment of the future Buddha had come. And he said to Vissakamma, “Friend Vissakamma, the young noble Siddhattha, today, at midnight, will carry out the Great Renunciation. This is the last time he will be clad in splendour. Go to the pleasure ground and adorn him with heavenly array.”

By the power which Devas have, he accordingly, that very moment, drew near in the likeness of the royal barber; and taking from the barber’s hand the material for the turban, he arranged it round the Bodhisatta’s head. At the touch of his hand the Bodhisatta knew, “This is no man, it is a Devaputta.” When the first round of the turban was put on, there arose, by the appearance of the jewelry on the diadem, a thousand folds; when the turban was wrapped the second time round, a thousand folds arose again; when ten times, ten thousand folds appeared. How so many folds could seem to rise on so small a head is beyond imagination; for in size the largest of them were as the flower of the Black Priyaṅgu creeper, and the rest even as Kutumbaka blossoms. And the head of the future Buddha became like a Kuuyaka flower in full bloom.

And when he was arrayed in all his splendour – the musicians while exhibiting each one his peculiar skill, the brahmins honouring him with words of joy and victory, and the men of lower castes with festive cries and shouts of praise; he ascended his superbly decorated carriage.

At that time Suddhodana the king, who had heard that the mother of Rāhula had brought forth a son, sent a message, saying: “Make known my joy to my son!” The future Buddha, hearing this, said: “An impediment has come into being, a bond has come into being.” When the king asked, “What did my son say?” and heard that saying; he gave command, “From henceforth let Rāhula (impediment) be my 123 At critical moments in the lives of persons of importance in the religious legends of Buddhist India, the seat of the great Deva Sakka becomes warm. Fearful of losing his temporary bliss, he then descends himself, or sends Vissakamma, the Buddhist Vulcan, to act as a deus ex machina, and put things straight.

---

grandson’s name.” But the Bodhisatta, riding in his splendid chariot, entered the town with great magnificence and exceeding glory.

Kisā Gotamī

At that time a noble virgin, Kisā Gotamī by name, had gone to the flat roof of the upper story of her palace, and she beheld the beauty and majesty of the Bodhisatta as he was proceeding through the city. Pleased and delighted at the sight, she burst forth into this exalted utterance: [1.80]

> 271. “Blessed indeed is that mother,
> Blessed indeed is that father,
> Blessed indeed is that wife,
> Who owns this Lord so glorious!” [1.61]

Hearing this, the Bodhisatta thought to himself, “On catching sight of such a one the heart of his mother is made happy, the heart of his father is made happy, the heart of his wife is made happy! This is all she says. But by what can every heart attain to lasting happiness and peace?” And to him whose mind was estranged from defilements the answer came, “When the fire of lust is gone out, then peace is gained; when the fires of hatred and delusion are gone out, then peace is gained; when the troubles of mind, arising from pride, credulity, and all other sins, have ceased, then peace is gained! Sweet is the lesson this singer makes me hear, for the Nibbāna of Peace is that which I have been trying to find out. This very day I will break away from household cares! I will renounce the world! I will follow only after Nibbāna itself!”[124]

---

[124] The force of this passage is due to the fullness of meaning which, to the Buddhist, the words Nibbuta and Nibbāna convey. No words in Western languages cover exactly the same ground, or connote the same ideas. To explain them fully to any one unfamiliar with Indian modes of thought would be difficult anywhere, and impossible in a note; but their meaning is pretty clear from the above sentences. Where in them, in the song, the words blessed, happy, peace, and the words gone out, ceased, occur, Nibbuta stands in the original in one or other of its two meanings; where in them the words Nirvāṇa, Nirvāṇa of Peace occur, Nibbāna stands in the original. Nirvāṇa is a lasting state of happiness and peace, to be reached here on earth by the extinction of the ‘fires’ and ‘troubles’ mentioned in this passage.
Then loosing from his neck a string of pearls worth a hundred thousand, he sent it to Kisā Gotamī as a teacher’s fee. Delighted at this, she thought: “Prince Siddhattha has fallen in love with me, and has sent me a present.” But the Bodhisatta, on entering his palace in great splendour, reclined on a couch of state.

The Great Renunciation

Thereupon women clad in beautiful array, skilful in dance and song, and lovely as Devakaññā, brought their musical instruments, and ranging themselves in order, danced, and sang, and played delightfully. But the Bodhisatta, his heart being estranged from defilements, took no pleasure in the spectacle, and fell asleep.

And the women, saying: “He, for whose sake we were performing, is gone to sleep? Why should we play any longer?” laid aside the instruments they held, and lay down to sleep. The lamps fed with sweet-smelling oil were just burning out. The Bodhisatta, waking up, sat cross-legged on the couch, and saw them with their stage properties laid aside and sleeping – some foaming at the mouth, some grinding their teeth, some yawning, some muttering in their sleep, some gaping, and some with their dress in disorder – plainly revealed as mere horrible sources of mental distress.

Seeing this woeful change in their appearance, he became more and more disgusted with sensual desires. To him that magnificent apartment, as splendid as Sakka’s residence in heaven, began to seem like a charnel-house full of loathsome corpses. Life, whether in the worlds subject to passion, or in the worlds of form, or in the formless worlds, seemed to him like staying in a house that had become the prey of devouring flames. An exalted utterance broke from him, “It all oppresses me! It is intolerable!” and his mind turned ardently to the state of those who have renounced the world. Resolving that very day to accomplish the Great Renunciation, he rose from his couch, went to the door and called out, “Who is there?” Channa, who had been sleeping with his head on the threshold, 125 Literally, “The three bhavas seemed like houses on fire.” The three Bhavas are Existence in the Kāmaloka, and the Rūpaloka and the Arūpaloka respectively: that is, existence in the worlds whose inhabitants are subject to passion, have material forms, and have immaterial forms respectively.

---

answered, “It is I, sir, Channa.” [1.82] Then said he, “I am resolved today to accomplish the Great Renunciation – saddle me a horse.”

So Channa went to the stable-yard, and entering the stables saw by the light of the lamps the mighty steed Kanthaka, standing at a pleasant spot under a canopy of cloth, beautified with a pattern of jasmine flowers. “This is the very one I ought to saddle today,” thought he; and he saddled Kanthaka.

Even while he was being saddled the horse knew, “He is saddling me so tightly, and not as on other days for such rides as those to the pleasure grounds, because my master is today about to carry out the Great Renunciation.” Then, glad at heart, he neighed a mighty neigh; and the sound thereof would have penetrated over all the town, had not the gods stopped the sound, and let no one hear it.

Now after the Bodhisatta had sent Channa on this errand, he thought: “I will just look at my son.” And rising from his couch he went to the apartments of Rāhula’s mother, and opened her chamber door. At that moment a lamp, fed with sweet-smelling oil, was burning dimly in the inner chamber. The mother of Rāhula was asleep on a bed strewn with many jasmine flowers,¹²⁶ and resting her hand on the head of her son. Stopping with his foot on the threshold, the Bodhisatta thought: “If I lift her hand to take my son, she will awake; and that will prevent my going away. I will come back and see him when I have become a Buddha.” And he left the palace.

Now what is said in the Jātaka commentary, “At that time Rāhula was seven days old,” is not found in the other commentaries. Therefore the view given above should be accepted.¹²⁷

And when the Bodhisatta had left the palace, he went to his horse, and said: “My good Kanthaka, do you save me this [1.83] once tonight; so that I, having become

¹²⁶ Literally, “about an ammaṇa (i.e. five or six bushels) of the large jasmine and the Arabian jasmine.”

¹²⁷ The Jātaka Commentary here referred to is, no doubt, the older commentary in Elu, or old Sinhalese, on which the present work is based.
a Buddha by your help, shall save the world of men, and that of Devas too.” Then leaping up, he seated himself on Kanthaka’s back.

Kanthaka was eighteen cubits in length from the nape of his neck, and of proportionate height; he was strong and fleet, and white all over like a clean chank shell. If he should neigh or paw the ground, the sound would penetrate through all the town. Therefore the Devas so muffled the sound of his neighing that none could hear it; and placed, at each step, the palms of their hands under his feet.

The Bodhisatta rode on the mighty back of the mighty steed; told Channa to catch hold of its tail, and arrived at midnight at the great gate of the city.

Now the king thinking: “In that way the Bodhisatta will not be able at any time to open the city gate and get away,” had placed a thousand men at each of the two gates to stop him. The Bodhisatta was mighty and strong according to the measure of elephants as ten thousand million elephants, and according to the measure of men as a million million men. He thought: “If the door does not open, sitting on Kanthaka’s back with Channa holding his tail, I will press Kanthaka with my thighs, and jumping over the city rampart, eighteen cubits high, I will get away!” Channa thought: “If the door is not opened, I will take my master on my neck, and putting my right hand round Kanthaka’s girth, I will hold him close to my waist, and so leap over the rampart and get away!” Kanthaka thought: “If the door is not opened, I will spring up with my master seated as he is on my back, and Channa holding by my tail, and will leap over the rampart and get away!” And if the door had not been opened, verily one or other of those three would have accomplished that whereof he had thought. But the Deva residing at the gate opened it.

At that moment Māra came there with the intention of stopping the Bodhisatta; and standing in the air, he exclaimed, “Depart not, O my lord! In seven days from now the Wheel Jewel will appear, and will make you sovereign over the four continents and the two thousand adjacent isles. Stop, O my lord!”

“Who are you?” said he.

“I am Vasavatti,” was the reply.
“Māra! Well do I know that the Wheel Jewel would appear to me; but it is not sovereignty that I desire. I will become a Buddha, and make the ten thousand world-systems shout for joy.”

Then thought Māra to himself, “Now, from this time forth, whenever a thought of lust or anger or malice shall arise within you, I will get to know of it.” And he followed him, ever watching for some slip, as closely as a shadow which never leaves its object.

But the future Buddha, making light of the kingdom of the world, thus within his reach – casting it away as one would saliva – left the city with great honour on the full-moon day of Āsāḷhi, when the moon was in the Uttarāsāḷha lunar mansion (i.e. on the last day of the lunar month in July). And when he had left the city a desire sprang up within him to gaze upon it; and the instant he did so the broad earth revolved like a potter’s wheel, and was stayed: saying as it were to him, “O Great Being, there is no need for you to stop in order to fulfil your wish.” So the Bodhisatta, with his face towards the city, gazed at it; and he fixed at that place a spot for the Kanthaka-Nivattana Cetiya (that is, The Shrine of Kanthaka’s Staying – a Stūpa afterwards built where this miracle was believed to have happened). And keeping Kanthaka in the direction in which he was going, he went on with great honour and exceeding glory.

For then, they say, Devas in front of him carried sixty thousand torches, and behind him too, and on his right hand, and on his left. And while some deities, undefined on the edge of the horizon, held torches aloft; other deities, and the Nāgas, and Supaṇṇas, and other superhuman beings, bore him company – doing homage with heavenly perfumes, and garlands, and sandal-wood powder, and incense. And the whole sky was full of Paricchātaka flowers from Sakka’s heaven, as with the pouring rain when thick clouds gather. Heavenly songs floated around; and on every side thousands of musical instruments sounded, as when the thunder roars in the midst of the sea, or the great ocean heaves against the boundaries of the world!

---

128 [The full moon is the last day of the lunar month in Buddhist calculations].
Advancing in this pomp and glory, the Bodhisatta, in that one night, passed beyond three kingdoms, and arrived, at the end of thirty leagues, at the bank of the river called Anomā. But why could not the horse go still further? It was not through want of power: for he could go from one edge of the round world to the other, as easily as one could step across the circumference of a wheel lying on its side; and doing this in the forenoon, he could return and eat the food prepared for him. But on this occasion he was constantly delayed by having to drag himself along, and break his way through the mass of garlands and flowers, cast down from heaven in such profusion by the Devas, and the Nāgas, and the Supaṇṇas, that his very flanks were hid. Hence it was that he only got over thirty leagues.

Now the Bodhisatta, stopping at the river side, asked Channa, “What is this river called?”

“Its name, my lord, is Anomā.”

“And so also our renunciation of the world shall be called Anomā (Illustrious),” said he; and signalling to his horse, by pressing it with his heel, the horse sprang over the river, five or six hundred yards in breadth, and stood on the opposite bank.

The Bodhisatta, getting down from the horse's back, stood on the sandy beach, extending there like a sheet of silver, and said to Channa, “Good Channa, do you now go back, taking my ornaments and Kanthaka. I am going to become an ascetic.”

“But I also, my lord, will become an ascetic.”

“You cannot be allowed to renounce the world, you must go back,” he said. Three times he refused this request of Channa's; and he delivered over to him both the ornaments and Kanthaka.

Then he thought: “These locks of mine are not suited for a mendicant. Now it is not right for any one else to cut the hair of a future Buddha, so I will cut them off myself with my sword.” Then, taking his sword in his right hand, and holding the plaited tresses, together with the diadem on them, with his left, he cut them off. So his hair was thus reduced to two inches in length, and curling from the right, it lay close to his head. It remained that length as long as he lived, and the beard the same. There was no need at all to shave either hair or beard any more. {1.65}
The Bodhisatta, saying to himself, “If I am to become a Buddha, let it stand in the air; if not, let it fall to the ground;” threw the hair and diadem together as he held them towards the sky. The plaited hair and the jewelled turban went a league off and stopped in the air. The King of the Devas Sakka caught sight of it with his divine eye, and receiving it into a jewel casket, a league high, he placed it in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven, in the Jewel Cetiya.

272. “Cutting off his hair, with pleasant perfumes sweet,
The foremost person cast it to the sky.
The thousand-eyed one, Sakka, the sky god,
Received it humbly in a golden casket.”

Again the Bodhisatta thought: “This my raiment of Benares muslin is not suitable for a mendicant.” Now the Deva Ghaṭikāra, who had formerly been his friend in the time of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, was led by his friendship, which had not grown old in that long interval, to think, “Today my friend is accomplishing the Great Renunciation, I will go and provide him with the requisites of a mendicant.”

273. “The three robes, and the alms bowl,
Razor, needle, and girdle,
And a water strainer – these eight
Are the wealth of the monk devout.”

Taking these eight requisites of a mendicant, he gave them to him. The Bodhisatta dressed himself in the outward signs of an Arahat, and adopted the sacred garb of Renunciation; and he enjoined upon Channa to go and, in his name, assure his parents of his safety. And Channa did homage to the Bodhisatta reverently, and departed.

Now Kanthaka stood listening to the Bodhisatta as he talked with Channa. And thinking: “From this time forth I shall never see my master more!” he was unable to bear his grief. And going out of their sight, he died of a broken heart; and was reborn in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven as a Devaputta, with the name of Kanthaka. So far the sorrow of Channa had been but single; now torn with the second sorrow of Kanthaka’s death, he returned, weeping and bewailing, to the city.
Meeting King Bimbisāra

But the Bodhisatta, having renounced the world, spent seven days in a mango grove called Anūpiya, nearby that spot, in the joy of going forth. Then he went on foot in one day to Rājagaha, a distance of thirty leagues, and entering the city, begged his food from door to door. The whole city at the sight of his beauty was thrown into commotion, like that other Rājagaha by the entrance of Dhanapālaka, or like heaven itself by the entrance of the Ruler of the Gods.

The guards went to the king and said, describing him, “O king! Such and such a being is begging through the town. We cannot tell whether he is a god, or a man, or a Nāga, or a Supaṇṇa, or what he is.”

The king, watching the Great Being from his palace, became full of wonder, and gave orders to his guards, saying: “Go, my men, and see. If it is an Amanussa, it will disappear as soon as it leaves the city; if a god, it will depart through the air; if a Nāga, it will dive into the earth; if a man, it will eat the food just as it is.”

But the Great Being collected scraps of food. And when he perceived there was enough to support him, he left the city by the gate at which he had entered. And seating himself, facing towards the east, under the shadow of the Paṇḍava rock, he began to eat his meal. His stomach, however, turned, and made as if it would come out of his mouth. Then, though distressed by that revolting food, for in that birth he had never even beheld such food with his eyes, he himself admonished himself, saying: “Siddhattha, it is true you were born in a family where food and 129 The word rendered league is yojana, said by Childers (Dictionary, s.v.) to be twelve miles, but really only between seven and eight miles. See my Ancient Coins and Measures, pp. 16, 17. The thirty yojanas here mentioned, together with the thirty from Kapilavatthu to the river Anomā, make together sixty, or four hundred and fifty miles from Kapilavastu to Rājagaha, which is far too much for the direct distance. There is here, I think, an undesigned coincidence between Northern and Southern accounts; for the Lalitavistara (Chap. xvi. at the commencement) makes the Bodhisatta go to Rājagaha via Vesāli, and this would make the total distance exactly sixty yojanas.

---

130 These are the superhuman Nāgas and Supaṇṇas, who were supposed, like the Devas, to be able to assume the appearance of men.
drink were easily obtainable, into a state of life where your food was perfumed third-season’s rice, with various curries of the finest kinds. But ever since you saw one clad in a mendicant’s garb, you have been thinking, ‘When shall I become like him, and live by begging my food? Would that time were come!’ And now that you have left all for that very purpose, what is this that you are doing?’ And overcoming his feelings, he ate the food. [1.89]

The king’s men saw this, and went and told him what had happened. Hearing what his messengers said, the king quickly left the city, and approaching the Bodhisatta, was so pleased at the mere sight of his dignity and grace, that he offered him all his kingdom.

The Bodhisatta said: “In me, O king, there is no desire after wealth or defilements. It is in the hope of attaining to complete Awakening that I have left all.” And when the king gained not his consent, though he asked it in many ways, he said: “Assuredly you will become a Buddha! Deign at least after thy Buddhahood to come to my kingdom first.”

This is here concisely stated; but the full account, beginning, “I sing the Renunciation, how the Wise One renounced the world,” will be found by referring to the Pabbajjāsutta\(^\text{131}\) and its commentary.

The Great Struggle

And the Bodhisatta, granting the king’s request, went forward on his way. And joining himself to Āḷāra Kāḷāma, and to Uddaka, son of Rāma, he acquired their systems of Absorption. But when he saw that that was not the way to wisdom, he left off applying himself to the realization of that system of Attainment.\(^\text{132}\) And with the intention of carrying out the Great Struggle, and showing his might and resolution to gods and men, he went to Uruvelā. And saying: “Pleasant,

---

\(^{131}\) [Snp 3.1.]

\(^{132}\) Samāpatti.
indeed, is this spot!” he took up his residence there, and devoted himself to the Great Struggle.\footnote{The Great Struggle played a great part in the Buddhist system of moral training; it was the wrestling with the flesh by which a true Buddhist overcame delusion and defilement, and attained to Nibbāna. It is best explained by its fourfold division into 1. Mastery over the passions. 2. Suppression of defiled thoughts. 3. Meditation on the seven kinds of Wisdom (Bodhi-aṅgā, see ‘Buddhism’ p. 173); and 4. Fixed attention, the power of preventing the mind from wandering. It is also called Sammappadhāna, Right Effort, and forms the subject of the Mahāpadhānasutta, in the Dīghanikāya [DN 14]. The system was, of course, not worked out at the time here referred to; but throughout the chronicle the biographer ascribes to Gotama, from the beginning, a knowledge of the whole Buddhist theory as afterwards elaborated. For to our author that theory had no development, it was Eternal and Immutable Truth already revealed by innumerable previous Buddhas.} [1.90]

And those five mendicants, Koṇḍañña and the rest, begging their way through villages, market towns, and royal cities, met with the Bodhisatta there. And for six years they stayed by him and served him, while he was carrying out the Great Struggle, with different kinds of service, such as sweeping out the hermitage, and so on; thinking the while, “Now he will become a Buddha! Now he will become a Buddha!”

Now the Bodhisatta thought: “I will perform the uttermost penance.” And he brought himself to live on one seed of the oil plant, or one grain of rice, and even to fast entirely; but the Devas gathered the sap of life and infused it into him through the pores of his skin. By this fasting, however, he became as thin as a skeleton; the colour of his body, once fair as gold, became dark; and the Thirty-two signs of a Great Being disappeared. And one day, when walking up and down, plunged in intense meditation, he was overcome by severe pain; and he fainted, and fell.

Then certain of the Devas began to say, “The ascetic Gotama is dead.” But others said: “Such is the condition of Arahats (saints).” And those who thought he was dead went and told Suddhodana the king, saying: “Your son is dead.”

“Did he die after becoming a Buddha, or before?”
“He was unable to attain to Buddhahood, and fell down and died in the midst of the Great Struggle.”

When the king heard this, he refused to credit it, saying: “I do not believe it. My son could never die without attaining to Wisdom!”

If you ask, “Why did not the king believe it?” it was because he had seen the miracles at the foot of the Jambu tree, and on the day when Kāḷa Devala had been compelled to do homage to the Bodhisatta.

And the Bodhisatta recovered consciousness again, and stood up. And the Devas went and told the king, “Your [1.91] son, O king, is well.” And the king said: “I knew my son was not dead.”

And the Great Being’s six years’ penance became noised abroad, as when the sound of a great bell is heard in the sky. But he perceived that penance was not the way to Wisdom; and begging through the villages and towns, he collected ordinary material food, and lived upon it. And the Thirty-two signs of a Great Being appeared again upon him, and his body became fair in colour, like unto gold.

Then the five attendant mendicants thought: “This man has not been able, even by six years’ penance, to attain Omniscience; [1.68] how can he do so now, when he goes begging through the villages, and takes material food? He is altogether lost in the Struggle. To think of getting spiritual advantage from him is like a man, who wants to bathe his head, thinking of using a dew-drop. What is to be got from him?” And leaving the Great Being, they took each his robes and begging bowl, and went eighteen leagues away, and entered Isipatana.134

The Lady Sujātā

Now at that time, at Uruvelā, in the village Senāni, there was a girl named Sujātā, born in the house of Senāni the landowner, who, when she had grown up, prayed to a Nigrodha tree, saying: “If I am married into a family of equal rank, and have a son for my firstborn child, then I will spend every year a hundred thousand on an offering to thee.” And this her prayer took effect.

And in order to make her offering, on the full-moon day of the month of May, in the sixth year of the Great Being’s penance, she had driven in front of her a thousand cows into a meadow of rich grass. With their milk she had fed five hundred cows, with theirs two hundred and fifty, and so on down to eight. Thus aspiring after quantity, and sweetness, and strength, she did what is called, “Working the milk in and in.” [1.92]

And early on the full-moon day in the month of May, thinking: “Now I will make the offering,” she rose up in the morning early and milked those eight cows. Of their own accord the calves kept away from the cows’ udders, and as soon as the new vessels were placed ready, streams of milk poured into them. Seeing this miracle, Sujātā, with her own hands, took the milk and poured it into new pans; and with her own hands made the fire and began to cook it. When that rice-milk was boiling, huge bubbles rising, turned to the right and ran round together; not a drop fell or was lost; not the least smoke rose from the fireplace.

At that time the four guardian Devas of the world came from the four points of the compass, and kept watch by the fireplace. The King of the Devas Brahmā held over it a canopy of state. The King of the Devas Sakka put the sticks together and lighted the fire. By their divine power the gods, gathering so much of the sap of life as would suffice for the support of all the men and Devas of the four continents, and their circumjacent two thousand isles – as easily as a man crushing the honey-comb formed round a stick would take the honey – they infused it into the milk-rice. At other times the gods infused the sap of life into each mouthful of rice as he took it; but on the day of his Buddhahood, and on the day of his Death, they infused it into the very vessel-full of rice itself.

Sujātā, [1.69] seeing that so many wonders appeared to her on this one day, said to her slave girl Puṇṇā, “Friend Puṇṇā! Very gracious is our god today! Never before have I seen such a wonder. Go at once and keep watch by the holy place.” “Very good, my lady,” replied she; and ran and hastened to the foot of the tree.

Now the Bodhisatta had seen that night five dreams, and on considering their purport he had drawn the conclusion, “Verily this day I shall become a Buddha.” And at the end of the night he washed and dressed himself, and [1.93] waiting till the time should come to go round begging his food, he went early, and sat at the foot of that tree, lighting it all up with his glory.

And Puṇṇā coming there saw the Bodhisatta sitting at the foot of the tree and lighting up all the region of the east; and she saw the whole tree in colour like gold from the rays issuing from his body. And she thought: “Today our god, descending from the tree, is seated to receive our offering in his own hand.” And excited with joy, she returned quickly, and announced this to Sujātā. Sujātā, delighted at the news, gave her all the ornaments befitting a daughter, saying: “Today, from this time forth, be you to me in the place of an elder daughter!”

And since, on the day of attaining Buddhahood, it is proper to receive a golden vessel worth a hundred thousand, she conceived the idea, “We will put the milk-rice into a vessel of gold.” And sending for a vessel of gold worth a hundred thousand, she poured out the well-cooked food to put it therein. All the milk-rice flowed into the vessel, like water from a lotus leaf, and filled the vessel full. Taking it she covered it with a golden dish, and wrapped it in a cloth. And adorning herself in all her splendour, she put the vessel on her head, and went with great dignity to the Nigrodha tree. Seeing the Bodhisatta, she was filled with exceeding joy, taking him for the tree-god; and advanced, bowing, from the spot where she saw him. Taking the vessel from her head, she uncovered it; and fetching sweet-scented water in a golden vase, she approached the Bodhisatta, and stood by.

The earthenware pot given him by the Deva Ghaṭikāra, which had never till then left him, disappeared at that moment. Not seeing his pot, the Bodhisatta stretched out his right hand, and took the water. Sujātā placed the vessel, with the milk-rice in it, in the hand of the Great Being. The Great Being looked at her. Pointing to the food, she said: “O, my lord! Accept [1.94] what I have offered thee, and depart whithersoever seems good to you.” And adding, “May there arise to you {1.70} as much joy as has come to me!” she went away, valuing her golden vessel, worth a hundred thousand, at no more than a dried leaf.

The Bodhi Tree

But the Bodhisatta rising from his seat, and leaving the tree on the right hand, took the vessel and went to the bank of the Nerañjarā river, down into which on the day of their complete Awakening so many thousand Bodhisattas had gone.
The name of that bathing place is the Supatiṭṭhita ferry. Putting the vessel on the bank, he descended into the river and bathed.

And having dressed himself again in the garb of the Arahats worn by so many thousand Buddhas, he sat down with his face to the east; and dividing the rice into forty-nine balls of the size of so many single-seeded Palmyra fruits, he ate all that sweet milk-rice without any water. Now that was the only food he had for forty-nine days, during the seven times seven days he spent, after he became a Buddha, at the foot of the Bodhi Tree. During all that time he had no other food; he did not bathe; nor wash his teeth; nor feel the cravings of nature. He lived on the joy arising from the Absorptions, on the joy arising from the Path, on the joy arising from the Fruit thereof.

But when he had finished eating that milk-rice, he took the golden vessel, and said: “If I shall be able today to become a Buddha, let this pot go up the stream; if not, let it go down the stream!” and he threw it into the water. And it went, in spite of the stream, eighty cubits up the river in the middle of the stream, all the way as quickly as a fleet horse. And diving into a whirlpool it went to the palace of Kāḷa Nāgarāja (the Black Nāga king); and striking against the bowls from which the three previous Buddhas had eaten, it made them sound ‘click! Click!’ and remained stationary as the lowest of them. Kāḷa, the snake-king, hearing the noise, exclaimed, “Yesterday a Buddha arose, now today another has arisen;” and he continued to praise him in many hundred verses.

But the Bodhisatta spent the heat of the day in a grove of sāla trees in full bloom on the bank of the river. And in the evening, when the flowers droop on the stalks, he proceeded, like a lion when it is roused, towards the Bodhi Tree, along a path five or six hundred yards wide, decked by the gods. The Nāgas, and Yakkhas, and Supaṇṇas, and other superhuman beings, offered him sweet-smelling flowers

---

135 The fruit of the Palmyra (Borassus Flabelliformis) has always three seeds. I do not understand the allusion to a one-seeded Palmyra.

136 The Yakkhas are characterized throughout the Jātaka stories by their cannibalism; the female Yakkhas as sirens luring men on to destruction. They are invisible till they assume human shape; but even then can be recognized by their red eyes. That the from heaven, and sang heavenly songs. The ten thousand world-systems became filled with perfumes and garlands and shouts of approval.

At that time there came from the opposite direction a grass-cutter named Sotthiya, carrying grass; and recognizing the Great Being, he gave him eight bundles of grass. The Bodhisatta took the grass; and ascending the rising ground round the Bodhi tree, he stood at the south of it, looking towards the north. At that moment the southern horizon seemed to descend below the level of the lowest hell, and the northern horizon mounting up seemed to reach above the highest heaven.

The Bodhisatta, saying: “This cannot, I think, be the right place for attaining Buddhahood,” turned round it, keeping it on the right hand; and went to the western side, and stood facing the east. Then the western horizon seemed to descend beneath the lowest hell, and the eastern horizon to ascend above the highest heaven; and to him, where he was standing, the earth seemed to bend up and down like a great cart wheel lying on its axis when its circumference is trodden on.

The Bodhisatta, saying: “This cannot, I think, be the right place for attaining Buddhahood,” turned round it, keeping it on the right hand; and went to the northern side, and stood facing the south. Then the northern horizon seemed to descend beneath the lowest hell, and the southern horizon to ascend above the highest heaven.

The Bodhisatta, saying: “This cannot, I think, be the right place for attaining Buddhahood,” turned round it, keeping it on the right hand; and went to the western side, and stood facing towards the east. Now in the east is the place where all the Buddhas have sat cross-legged; and that place neither trembles nor shakes.

The Great Being, perceiving, “This is the steadfast spot chosen by all the Buddhas, the spot for the throwing down of the defilements,” took hold of the grass by one end, and scattered it there. And immediately there was a seat fourteen cubits long.

Ceylon aborigines are called Yakkhas in the Mahāvamsa probably results from a tradition of their cannibalism. On the others, see above, p. 88.
For those blades of grass arranged themselves in such a form as would be beyond the power of even the ablest painter or carver to design.

The Bodhisatta turning his back upon the trunk of the Bodhi tree, and with his face towards the east, made the firm resolve, “My skin, indeed, and nerves, and bones, may become arid, and the very blood in my body may dry up; but till I attain to complete insight, this seat I will not leave!” And he sat himself down in a cross-legged position, firm and immovable, as if welded with a hundred thunderbolts.

Overcoming Māra

At that time the Devaputta Māra, thinking: “Siddhattha the prince wants to free himself from my dominion. I will not let him get free yet!” went to the hosts of his Devas, and told the news. And sounding the drum, called “Māra’s War-cry,” he led forth the army of Māra.

That army of Māra stretches twelve leagues before him, [1.97] twelve leagues to right and left of him, behind him it reaches to the rocky limits of the world, above him it is nine leagues in height; and the sound of its war-cry is heard, [1.72] twelve leagues away, even as the sound of an earthquake.

Then Māra, the Devaputta, mounted his elephant, two hundred and fifty leagues high, named, Girimekhala. And he created for himself a thousand arms, and seized all kinds of weapons. And of the remainder, too, of the army of Māra, no two took the same weapon; but assuming various colours and various forms, they went on to overwhelm the Great Being.

But the Devas of the ten thousand world-systems continued speaking the praises of the Great Being. Sakka, the king of the Devas, stood there blowing his trumpet Vijayuttara. Now that trumpet is a hundred and twenty cubits long, and can itself cause the wind to enter, and thus itself give forth a sound which will resound for four months, when it becomes still. Mahākāḷa, the king of the Nāgas, stood there uttering his praises in many hundred verses. The King of the Devas Mahābrahmā stood there, holding over him the white canopy of state. But as the army approached and surrounded the seat under the Bodhi tree, not one of the Devas was able to stay, and they fled each one from the spot where the army met them. Kāla, the king of the Nāgas, dived into the earth, and went to Mañjerika, the palace of the Nāgas, five hundred leagues in length, and lay down, covering his face with his hands. Sakka, taking the Vijayuttara trumpet on his back, stopped on the rocky verge of the world. Mahābrahmā, putting the white canopy of state on to the summit of the rocks at the end of the earth, went to the Brahmā Realm. Not a single deity was able to keep his place. The Great Being sat there alone.

But Māra said to his host, “Friends! There is no other man like Siddhattha, the son of Suddhodana. We cannot [1.98] give him battle face to face. Let us attack him from behind!” The Great Being looked round on three sides, and saw that all the gods had fled, and their place was empty. Then beholding the hosts of Māra coming thick upon him from the north, he thought: “Against me alone this mighty host is putting forth all its energy and strength. No father is here, nor mother, nor brother, nor any other relative to help me. But those ten cardinal virtues have long been to me as retainers fed from my store. So, making the virtues my shield, I must strike this host with the sword of virtue, and thus overwhelm it!” And so he sat meditating on the Ten Perfections. 137

Then Māra the Devaputta, saying: “Thus will I drive away Siddhattha,” caused a whirlwind to blow. And immediately such winds rushed together from the four corners of the earth as could have torn down the peaks of mountains half a league, two leagues, {1.73} three leagues high – could have rooted up the shrubs and trees of the forest – and could have made of the towns and villages around one heap of ruins. But through the majesty of the goodness of the Great Being, they reached him with their power gone, and even the hem of his robe they were unable to shake.

Then saying: “I will overwhelm him with water and so slay him,” he caused a mighty rain to fall. And the clouds gathered, overspreading one another by hundreds and by thousands, and poured forth rain; and by the violence of the torrents the earth was saturated; and a great flood, overtopping the trees of the forest, approached the Great Being. But it was not able to wet on his robe even the space where a dew-drop might fall.

137 His acquisition of the Ten Perfections, or Cardinal Virtues, is described above, pp. 54-58.
Then he caused a storm of rocks to fall. And mighty, mighty, mountain peaks came through the air, spitting forth fire and smoke. But as they reached the Great Being, they changed into bouquets of heavenly flowers.

Then he raised a storm of deadly weapons. And they came – one-edged, and two-edged swords, and spears, and arrows – smoking and flaming through the sky. But as they reached the Great Being, they became flowers from heaven.

Then he raised a storm of charcoal. But the embers, though they came through the sky as red as red Kinṣuka flowers, were scattered at the feet of the future Buddha as heavenly flowers.

Then he raised a storm of ashes; and the ashes came through the air exceeding hot, and in colour like fire; but they fell at the feet of the future Buddha as the dust of sandal-wood.

Then he raised a storm of sand; and the sand, exceeding fine, came smoking and flaming through the air; but it fell at the feet of the future Buddha as heavenly flowers.

Then he raised a storm of mud. And the mud came smoking and flaming through the air; but it fell at the feet of the future Buddha as heavenly perfume.

Then saying: “By this I will terrify Siddhattha, and drive him away!” he brought on a thick darkness. And the darkness became fourfold: but when it reached the future Buddha, it disappeared as darkness does before the brightness of the sun.

Thus was Māra unable by these nine – the wind, and the rain, and the rocks, and the weapons, and the charcoal, and the ashes, and the sand, and the mud, and the darkness – to drive away the future Buddha. So he called on his host, and said: “Why stand you still? Seize, or slay, or drive away this prince!” And himself mounted Girimekhala, and seated on his back, he approached the future Buddha, and cried out, “Get up, Siddhattha, from that seat! It does not belong to thee! It is meant for me!” [1.100]

The Great Being listened to his words, and said: “Māra! It is not by you that the Ten Perfections have been fulfilled, nor the lesser Perfections, nor the higher Perfections. It is not you who have sacrificed yourself in the five great Acts of Self-renunciation, who have diligently sought after Knowledge, and the Welfare of the World, and the attainment of Awakening. This seat does not belong to thee, {1.74} it is to me that it belongs.”

Then the enraged Māra, unable to endure the vehemence of his anger, cast at the Great Being that Sceptre-javelin of his, the barb of which was in shape as a wheel. But it became a garland of flowers, and remained as a canopy over him, whose mind was bent upon good.

Now at other times, when that Wicked One throws his Sceptre-javelin, it cleaves asunder a pillar of solid rock as if it were the tender shoot of a bamboo. When, however, it thus turned into a garland-canopy, all the host of Māra shouted, “Now he shall rise from his seat and flee!” and they hurled at him huge masses of rock. But these too fell on the ground as bouquets at the feet of him whose mind was bent upon good!

And the Devas stood on the edge of the rocks that encircle the world; and stretching forwards in amazement, they looked on, saying: “Lost! Lost is Siddhattha the prince, the glorious and beautiful! What can he do to save himself!”

Then the Great Being exclaimed, “I have reached the throne on which sit the Buddhas-to-be when they are perfect in all goodness, on that day when they shall reach Awakening.”

And he said to Māra, standing there before him, “Māra, who is witness that you have given alms?”

And Māra stretched forth his hand to the hosts of his followers, and said: “So many are my witnesses.”

And that moment there arose a shout as the sound of [1.101] an earthquake from the hosts of the Evil One, saying: “I am his witness! I am his witness!”

Then the Tempter addressed the Great Being, and said: “Siddhattha! Who is witness that you have given alms?”

And the Great Being answered, “You have living witnesses that you have given alms: and I have in this place no living witness at all. But not counting the alms I have given in other births, let this great and solid earth, unconscious though it be, be witness of the seven hundredfold great alms I gave when I was born as Vessantara!”

And withdrawing his right hand from beneath his robe, he stretched it forth towards the earth, and said: “Are you, or are you not witness of the seven hundredfold great gift I gave in my birth as Vessantara?”

And the great Earth uttered a voice, saying: “I am witness to thee of that!” overwhelming as it were the hosts of the Evil One as with the shout of hundreds of thousands of foes.

Then the mighty elephant Girimekhala, as he realized what the generosity of Vessantara had been, fell down on his knees before the Great Being. And the army of Māra fled this way and that way, so that not even two were left together: throwing off their clothes and their turbans, they fled, each one straight on before him.

But the heavenly hosts, when they saw that the army of Māra had fled, [1.75] cried out, “Māra is overcome! Siddhattha the prince has prevailed! Come, let us honour the Victor!” And the Nāgas, and the Supaṇṇa, and the Devas, and the Brahmās, each urging his comrades on, went up to the Great Being at the Bodhi tree’s foot, and as they came,

274. “At the Bodhi tree’s foot the Nāga bands
Shouted, for joy that the Sage had won;
‘The Glorious Buddha – he has prevailed!
And Māra the wicked is overthrown!’ [1.102]

275. At the Bodhi tree’s foot the Supaṇṇa
Shouted, for joy that the Sage had won;
‘The Glorious Buddha – he has prevailed!
And Māra the wicked is overthrown’

276. At the Bodhi tree’s foot the Deva hosts
Shouted, for joy that the Sage had won;
‘The Glorious Buddha – he has prevailed!
And Māra the wicked is overthrown!’
277. At the Bodhi tree’s foot the Brahmā Gods
Shouted, for joy that the Sage had won;
‘The Glorious Buddha – he has prevailed!
And Māra the wicked is overthrown!’ ”

The other gods, too, in the ten thousand world-systems, offered garlands and perfumes and uttered his praises aloud.

The Awakening

It was while the sun was still above the horizon, that the Great Being thus put to flight the army of the Evil One. Then, while the Bodhi tree paid him homage, as it were, by its shoots like sprigs of red coral falling over his robe, he acquired in the first watch of the night the Knowledge of the Past Lives, in the middle watch the Divine Eye, and in the third watch the Knowledge of the Chain of Causation which leads out.\(^{138}\)

Now on his thus revolving this way and that way, and tracing backwards and forwards, and thoroughly realizing the twelvefold Chain of Causation, the ten thousand world-systems quaked twelve times even to their ocean boundaries. And again, when the Great Being, making the ten thousand world-systems to shout for joy, attained at break of day to complete Omniscience, \(^{1.76}\) the whole ten thousand world-systems became glorious as on a festive day. The streamers of the flags and banners raised on the edge of the rocky boundary to the east of the world \(^{[1.103]}\) reached to the very west; and so those on the west and north, and south, reached to the east, and south, and north; while in like manner those of flags and banners on the surface of the earth reached to the highest heaven, and those of flags and banners in heaven swept down upon the earth. Throughout the universe flowering trees put forth their blossoms, and fruit-bearing trees were loaded with clusters of fruit; the trunks and branches of trees, and even the creepers, were covered with bloom; lotus wreaths hung from the sky; and lilies by sevens sprang, one above another, even from the very rocks. The ten thousand world-systems as they revolved seemed like a mass of loosened wreaths, or like a nosegay tastefully arranged: and the great voids between them, the hells whose darkness the rays of seven suns had never been able to disperse, became filled with light. The waters of the Great Ocean became sweet, down to its profoundest depths; and the rivers were stayed in their course. The blind from birth received their sight; the deaf from birth heard sound; the lame from birth could use their feet; and chains and bonds were loosed, and fell away.\textsuperscript{139}

\(^{138}\) Pubbenivāsāñāṇa, Dibbacakkhu, and Paṭiccasamuppāda.

It was thus in surpassing glory and honour, and with many wonders happening around, that he attained Omniscience, and uttered this exalted utterance, uttered by all the unvanquished Buddhas.

\textsuperscript{139} Compare the Thirty-two Good Omens at the Buddha’s Birth, above, p. 64.
278. “Long have I wandered Through many births:
Seeking thus long, in vain,
The maker of this house
Hard to bear is birth again and again. [1.104]
Found is the maker of this house.
No longer will you make a house for me:
Broken are all thy beams.
Thy ridge-pole shattered!
Into unmade my mind has now past:
The end of cravings has been reached at last!”[1.105] (7.7)

Thus beginning[1.77] with the Tusita heaven up to the attainment of Omniscience in the circle of the Bodhi tree, that is the extent of what is known as the Middle Epoch.

---

140 The train of thought is explained at length in my “Buddhism,” pp. 100-112. Shortly, it amounts to this. The Unconscious has no pain: without Consciousness, Individuality, there would be no pain. What gives men Consciousness? It is due to a grasping, craving, sinful condition of heart. The absence of these cravings is Nibbāna. Having reached Nibbāna, Consciousness endures but for a time (until the body dies), and it will then no longer be renewed. The beams of sin, the ridge-pole of care, give to the house of individuality its seeming strength: but in the peace of Nibbāna they have passed away.
The Bodisatta is now Buddha: he has reached Nibbāna: he has solved the great mystery;
the jewel of salvation sought through so many ages has been found at last; and the long, long struggle is over. The following is Spence Hardy’s literal translation given in his “Manual of Buddhism,” p. 180, where similar versions by Gogerly and Turnour will be found: but they scarcely seem to me to express the inner meaning of these difficult and beautiful verses: Through many different births I have run (to me not having found), Seeking the architect of the desire resembling house, Painful are repeated births! O house-builder! I have seen (thee). Again a house thou canst not build for me. I have broken thy rafters, Thy central support is destroyed. To Nirvāṇa my mind has gone. I have arrived at the extinction of evil-desire. The figure of the house is found also in Manu (vi. 79-81); in the “Lalitavistara” (p. 107 of Foucaux’s Gya Tcher Rol Pa); and in the Ādi Granth (Trumpp, pp. 215, 216, 471). The last passage is as follows: A storm of divine knowledge has come! The shutters of delusion all are blown away – are there no longer; The posts of double-mindedness are broken down; the ridge-pole of spiritual blindness is shattered; The roof of craving has fallen on the ground; the vessel of folly has burst!

[This final sentence was omitted by Rhys Davids from his translation.]
III The Proximate or Last Epoch

The Seven Weeks

Now while he was still seated there, after he had uttered the exalted utterance, the Fortunate One thought: “It is in order to attain to this throne of triumph that I have undergone successive births for so long a time, that I severed my crowned head from my neck and gave it away, that I tore out my darkened eyes and my heart’s flesh and gave them away, that I gave away to serve others such sons as Jāli the prince, and such daughters as Kaṇhājinā the princess, and such wives as Maddī the queen. This seat is a throne of triumph to me, and a throne of glory; while seated on it my aims have been fulfilled: I will not leave it, yet.” And he sat there absorbed in many thoughts for those seven days referred to in the text, beginning, “And then the Fortunate One sat motionless for seven days, realizing the bliss of Nibbāna.”

Now certain of the Devas began to doubt, thinking: “There must be something more Siddhattha has to do this day, for he still lingers seated there.” The Teacher, knowing their thoughts, and to appease their doubts, rose into the air, and performed the twin miracle.

And the Teacher having thus by this miracle dispelled the Devas’ doubts, stood a little to the north-east of the throne, thinking: “It was on that throne that I attained omniscience.” And he thus spent seven days gazing steadfastly at the spot where he had gained the result of the deeds of virtue fulfilled through such countless years. And that spot became known as the Cetiya of the Steadfast Gaze.

Then he created between the throne and the spot where he had stood a cloistered walk, and he spent seven days walking up and down in that jewelled cloister.

---

142 See above, p. 2. A similar explanation is here repeated in a gloss.
143 Literally for four asaṅkheyyas and a hundred thousand kappas.
144 Anekakoṭisatasahasā samāpattiyo samāpajjanto.
145 [It means producing water and fire simultaneously.] A gloss here adds that the Buddha performed a similar miracle on three other occasions.
which stretched from east to west. And that spot became known as the Cetiya of the Jewelled Cloister.

But for the fourth week the Devas created to the north-west of the Bodhi tree a house of gems; and he spent the week seated there cross-legged, and thinking out the Abhidhamma Piṭaka both book by book and generally in respect of the origin of all things as therein explained.

(But the Abhidhammikas\textsuperscript{146} say that House of Gems here means either a mansion built of the seven kinds of jewels, or the place where the seven books were thought out: and as they give these two explanations of the passage, both should be accepted as correct.)

Having thus spent four weeks close to the Bodhi tree, he went, in the fifth week, to the Shepherd’s Nigrodha tree: and sat there meditating on the Dhamma, and enjoying the sweetness of freedom.\textsuperscript{147}

\textbf{Māra’s Daughters}

Now at that time the Deva Māra thought to himself, “So long a time have I followed this man seeking some fault in him, and find no sin in him; and now, indeed, he is beyond my power.” And overcome with sorrow he sat down on the highway, and as he thought of the following sixteen things he drew sixteen lines on the ground. Thinking: “I did not attain, as he did, to the Perfection of \textsuperscript{107}Generosity; therefore I have not become like him,” he drew one line. Then thinking: “I did not attain, as he did, to the Perfections of Virtue, and Renunciation, and Wisdom, and Effort, and Patience, and Truth, and Determination, and Loving-Kindness, and Equanimity;\textsuperscript{148} therefore I have not become like him,” he drew nine more lines. Then thinking: “I did not attain the Ten Perfections, the conditions precedent to the acquisition of the extraordinary knowledge of objects of sense, and therefore I have not become like him,” he drew the eleventh line. Then thinking: “I did not attain to the Ten Perfections, the conditions precedent to the acquisition of the extraordinary knowledge of inclinations and dispositions, of the attainment of compassion, of the twin miracle, of the removal of hindrances, and of omniscience; therefore I have not become like him,” he drew the five other lines. And so he sat on the highway, drawing sixteen lines for these sixteen thoughts.

\textsuperscript{146} The monks whose duty it is to learn by heart, repeat, and commentate upon the seven books in the Abhidhammapiṭaka.

\textsuperscript{147} \textit{Vimutti}. Perhaps the clause should be rendered: Realizing the sweet sense of salvation gained, and the Dhamma may be used in contradistinction to Abhidharma of the rest of the Scriptures.

\textsuperscript{148} On these Ten Perfections, see above, pp. 15-18, and pp. 54-58.

At that time Craving, Discontent, and Lust, the three daughters of Māra, could not find their father, and were looking for him, wondering where he could be. And when they saw him, sad at heart, writing on the ground, they went up to him, and asked, “Why, dear, are you sad and sorrowful?”

And he answered, “Beloved, this Great Ascetic is escaping from my power. Long have I watched, but in vain, to find some fault in him. Therefore it is that I am sad and sorrowful.”

“Be that as it may,” replied they, “think not so. We will subject him to our influence, and come back bringing him captive with us.”

“Beloved,” said he, “you cannot by any means bring him under your influence; he stands firm in faith, unwavering.”

“But we are women,” was the reply; “this moment we will bring him bound by the allurements of passion. Do you not be so grieved.”

So they approached the Fortunate One, and said: “O, ascetic, upon thee we humbly wait!”

But the Fortunate One neither paid any attention to their words, nor raised his eyes to look at them. He sat plunged in the joy of freedom, with a mind made free by the complete extinction of attachment.

Then the daughters of Māra considered with themselves, “Various are men’s tastes. Some fall in love with virgins, some with young women, some with mature women, some with older women. We will tempt him in various forms.”

\textsuperscript{149} Taṅhā, Aratī, and Ragā.
of them assumed the appearance of a hundred women—virgins, women who had never had a child, or only once, or only twice, middle-aged women, older women—and six times they went up to the Fortunate One, and professed themselves his humble handmaidens; and to that even the Fortunate One paid no attention, since he was made free by the complete extinction of attachment.

Now, some teachers say that when the Fortunate One saw them approaching in the form of elderly women, he commanded, saying: “Let these women remain just as they are, with broken teeth and bald heads.” This should not be believed, for the Teacher does not issue such wrong commands.

But the Fortunate One said: “Depart! Why strive thus? Such things might be done in the presence of men who linger in the paths of attachment; but the Tathāgata has put away lust, have put away ill-will, have put away ignorance.” And he admonished them in those two verses from the Chapter on the Buddha in the Dhamma Verses:

280. “No one can e’er disturb his self-control
   Whose inward victories, once gained, are never lost. [1.109]
   That Buddha, whose range is endless—
   How can you allure him to his fall?

281. He who has no ensnaring, venomous desire;
   No craving wants to lead him aught astray:
   That Buddha, whose range is endless—
   How can you allure him to his fall?”

And thus these women, confessing that he had spoken truth when he had said that the Fortunate One was not by any means to be led away by any unholy desire, returned to their father.

But the Fortunate One, when he had spent a week at that spot, went on to the Mucalinda tree. There he spent a week, Mucalinda, the Nāga king, when a storm arose, shielding him with seven folds of his hood, so that the Fortunate One enjoyed the bliss of salvation as if he had been resting in a pleasant chamber, remote from all disturbance.

---

150 Dhp 179, 180.

Thence he went away to a Rājāyatana tree, and there also sat down enjoying the bliss of salvation.

And so seven weeks passed away, during which he experienced no bodily wants, but fed on the joy of Absorption, the joy of the Paths, and the joy of the Fruit thereof (that is, of Nibbāna).\(^{151}\)

Now, as he sat there on the last day of the seven weeks – the forty-ninth day – he felt a desire to bathe his face. And Sakka, the King of the Devas, brought a fruit of the Myrobalan tree, and gave him to eat. And Sakka, too, provided a tooth-cleanser of the thorns of the snake-creeper, and water to bathe his face. And the Teacher \([1.110]\) used the tooth-cleanser, and bathed his face, and sat him down there at the foot of the tree.

Tapassu and Bhalluka

At that time two merchants, Tapassu and Bhalluka by name, were travelling from Orissa to Central India\(^{152}\) with five hundred carts. And a Deva, a blood relation of theirs, stopped their carts, and moved their hearts to offer food to the Teacher. And they took a rice cake, and a honey cake, and went up to the Teacher, and said: “O, Fortunate One! Have compassion for us, and accept this food.”

Now, on the day when he had received the sweet rice-milk, his bowl had disappeared;\(^{153}\) so the Fortunate One thought: “The Tathāgatas never receive food in their hands. How shall I take it?” Then the four Guardian Devas knew his thought, and, coming from the four corners of heaven, they brought bowls made of sapphire. And the Fortunate One accepted them. Then they brought four other bowls, made of jet; and the Fortunate One, out of kindness to the four Devaputtas, received the four, and, placing them one above another, commanded, saying: “Let them become one.” And the four closed up into one of medium size, becoming visible only as lines round the mouth of it. The Fortunate One received the food into that new-created bowl, and ate it, and gave thanks.

---

\(^{152}\) Ukkala to Majjhimadesa. The latter included all the Buddhist Holy Land from the modern Patnā to Allahabād [Prayog]. See above, p. 61, note.

\(^{153}\) See above, p. 93.

The two brothers took refuge in the Buddha, and the Dhamma, and became professed disciples. Then, when they asked him, saying: “Lord, bestow upon us something to which we may pay reverence,” with his own right hand he tore from his head, and gave to them, the hair-relics. And they built a Cetiya in their own city, and placed the relics within it.

Deciding to Teach

But the Perfectly Enlightened One rose up thence, and returned to the Shepherd’s Nigrodha tree, and sat down at its foot. And no sooner was he seated there, considering the depth of the Dhamma which he had gained, than there arose in his mind a doubt (felt by each of the Buddhas as he became aware of his having arrived at Dhamma) that he had not that kind of ability necessary to explain that Dhamma to others.

Then the great Ruler of the Brahmā Realms, exclaiming, “Alas, the world is lost! Alas, the world will be altogether lost!” brought with him the rulers and great Devas of the heavens in tens of thousands of world-systems, and went up to the Teacher, and said: “O Fortunate One, may you proclaim the Truth! Proclaim the 154 We have here an interesting instance of the growth of legend to authenticate and add glory to local relics, of which other instances will be found in “Buddhism,” p. 195. The ancient form of this legend, as found here, must have arisen when the relics were still in Orissa. Both the Burmese and Ceylonese now claim to possess them. The former say that the two merchants were Burmese, and that the Cetiya above referred to is the celebrated sanctuary of Shooay Dagob [i.e. Shwedagon] (Bigandet, p. 101, 2nd ed.). The latter say that the Cetiya was in Orissa, and that the hair-relics were brought thence to Ceylon in 490 A.D., in the manner related in the Kesadhātuvaṁśa, and referred to in the Mahāvaṁśa. (See verses 43-56 of my edition of the 39th chapter of the Mahāvaṁśa in the JRAS 1875.) The legend in the text is found in an ancient inscription on the great bell at Rangoon (Hough’s version in the Asiatic Researches, vol. xvi.; comp. Hardy, M.B. p. 183; Beal, Romantic Legend) p. 240.

Truth, O Fortunate One!” and in other words of like purport begged from him the preaching of the Dhamma.

Then the Teacher granted his request. And considering to whom he should first reveal the Dhamma, thought at first of Āḷāra, his former teacher, as one who would quickly comprehend it. But, on further reflection, he perceived that Āḷāra had been dead seven days. So he fixed on Uddaka, but perceived that he too had died that very evening. Then he thought of the five mendicants, how faithfully they had served him for a time; and casting about in his mind where they then might be, he perceived they were at the Deer-forest in Benares. And he determined, saying: “There I will go to inaugurate the Wheel [1.112] of Righteousness.” But he delayed a few days, begging his daily food in the neighbourhood of the Bodhi tree, with the intention of going to Benares on the full-moon day of the month of July.

And at dawn of the fourteenth day of the month, when the night had passed away, he took his robe and his bowl; and had gone eighteen leagues, just half way, when he met the Naked Ascetic Upaka. And he announced to him how he had become a Buddha; and on the evening of that day he arrived at the hermitage near Benares.

The five mendicants, seeing already from afar the Tathāgata coming, said one to another, “Friend, here comes the mendicant Gotama. He has turned his back to a free use of the necessities of life, and has recovered roundness of form, acuteness of sense, and beauty of complexion. We ought to pay him no reverence; but as he is, after all, of a good family, he deserves the honour of a seat. So we will simply prepare a seat for him.”

The Fortunate One, casting about in his mind (by the power that he had of knowing what was going on in the thoughts of all beings) as to what they were thinking, knew their thoughts. Then, concentrating [1.82] that feeling of his loving-kindness which was able to pervade generally all beings in earth and heaven, he directed it specially towards them. And the sense of his loving-kindness diffused itself through their hearts; and as he came nearer and nearer, 155 Isipatana, the hermitage in the Deer-forest close to Benares. See above, p. 91. unable any longer to adhere to their resolve, they rose from their seats, and bowed down before him, and welcomed him with every mark of reverence and respect.

---

But, not knowing that he had become a Buddha, they addressed him, in everything they said, either by name, or as “Friend.” Then the Fortunate One announced to them his Buddhahood, saying: “O mendicants, address not a Tathāgata by his name, or as ‘friend.’” [1.113] I, O mendicants, am a Tathāgata, clear in insight, as those who have gone before.”

Then, seated on the place prepared for him, and surrounded by myriads of Devas, he addressed the five attendant elders, just as the moon was passing out of conjunction with the lunar mansion in June, and taught them in that discourse which Set Rolling the Wheel of Righteousness.

Of the five elders, Koṇḍāṅña the Believer gained in knowledge as the discourse went on; and as it concluded, he, with myriads of Devas, had arrived at the Fruit of the First Path. And the Teacher, who remained there for the rainy season, sat in the monastery the next day, when the other four had gone on almsround, talking to Vappa: and Vappa that morning attained to the Fruit of the First Path.
And, in a similar manner, Bhaddiya on the next day, and Mahānāma on the next, and Assajī on the next, attained to the Fruit of the First Path. And, on the fifth day, he called all five to his side, and preached to them the discourse On the Non-existence of the Self; and at the end of that discourse all the five elders attained to Nibbāna.

The Early Dispensation

Then the Teacher perceived that Yasa, a young man of good family, was capable of entering the Paths. And at night-time, as he was going away, having left his home in weariness of the world, the Teacher called him, saying: “Follow me, Yasa!” and on that very night he attained to the Fruit of the First Path, and on the next day to Arahatship. And he received also the other fifty-four, his companions,

---

156 Tathāgato Sāmāsambuddho.
157 So called from his action on this occasion. See above, pp. 72, 73.
158 That is, became free from the delusion of self, from doubt, and from belief in the
into the order, with the formula, “Come bhikkhus!” and caused them to attain to Arahatship.

Now when there were thus in the world sixty-one persons who had become Arahats, the Teacher, after the rainy season [1.114] and the Feast with which it closes were over, sent out the sixty in different directions, with the words, “Go forth, O mendicants, preaching and teaching.” And himself going towards Uruvelā, overcame at the Kappāsiya forest, half way there, the thirty young Bhaddavaggiya nobles. Of these the least advanced entered the First, and the most advanced the Third Path: and he received them all into the Saṅgha with the formula, “Come, monks!” And sending them also forth into the regions round about, he himself went on to Uruvelā.

The Kassapa Brothers

There he overcame, by performing three thousand five hundred miracles, the three brahmin ascetics, brothers – Uruvelā Kassapa and the rest – who had one thousand disciples. And he received them into the Saṅgha with the formula, “Come, monks!” and established them in Arahatship by his discourse, when they were seated on the Gayāsīsa hill, “On the Lessons to be drawn from Fire.” And attended by these thousand Arahats, he went to the grove called the Palm-grove, nearby Rājagaha, with the object of redeeming the promise he had made to Bimbisāra the king.\(^{159}\) [1.83]

When the king heard from the keeper of the grove the saying: “The Teacher is come,” he went to the Teacher, attended by innumerable priests and nobles, and fell down at the feet of the Tathāgata – those sacred feet, which bore on their surface the mystic figure of the sacred wheel, and gave forth a halo of light like a canopy of cloth of gold. Then he and his retinue respectfully took their seats on one side.

Now the question occurred to those priests and nobles, “How is it, then? Has the Great Ascetic entered as a student in the spiritual life under Uruvelā Kassapa, or Uruvelā Kassapa under the Great Ascetic?” And the Fortunate One, becoming aware of their thus doubting within themselves, addressed the elder in the verse –

---

\(^{159}\) See above p. 89.

282. “What have you seen, O dweller in Uruvelā,
That you have abandoned the Fire God, counting thyself poor?
I ask thee, Kassapa, the meaning of this thing:
How is it you have given up the sacrifice of fire?”

And the elder, perceiving what the Fortunate One intended, replied in the verse –

283. “Some men rely on sights, and sounds, and taste,
Others on sensual women, and some on sacrifice;
But this, I see, is dross so long as attachment remains.
Therefore I find no charm in sacrifices great or small.”

And in order to make known his discipleship he bowed his head to the Tathāgata’s feet, saying: “The Fortunate One is my teacher, and I am the disciple!” And seven times he rose into the air up to the height of one, two, three, and so on, up to the height of seven palm trees; and descending again, he saluted the Tathāgata, and respectfully took a seat aside. Seeing that wonder, the multitude praised the Teacher, saying: “Ah! How great is the power of the Buddhas! Even so mighty an infidel as this has thought him worthy! Even Uruvelā Kassapa has broken through the net of delusion, and has yielded to the Tathāgata!”

But the Fortunate One said: “Not only now have I overcome Uruvelā Kassapa; in former ages, too, he was conquered by me.” And he uttered in that connexion the Mahānāradakassapajātaka [Ja 544], and proclaimed the Four Truths. And the king of Magadha, with nearly all his retinue, attained to the Fruit of the First Path, and the rest became lay disciples (without entering the Paths).\footnote{Upāsaka; that is, those who have taken the Three Refuges and the vow to keep the Five Commandments (“Buddhism,” pp. 139, 160).}

The Entry into Rājagaha

And the king still sitting near the Teacher told him of the five wishes he had had; and then, confessing his faith, he invited the Fortunate One for the next day, and rising from his side, departed with respectful salutation.
The next day all the men who dwelt in Rājagaha, eighteen billions in number, both those who had already seen the Tathāgata, and those who had not, came out early from Rājagaha to the Grove of Reeds to see the Tathāgata. The road, six miles long, could not contain them. The whole of the Grove of Reeds became like a basket packed quite full. The multitude, beholding the exceeding beauty of the Tathāgata, could not contain their delight. Vaṇṇabhū was it called (that is, the Place of Praise), for at such spots all the greater and lesser characteristics of a Buddha, and the glorious beauty of his person, are fated to be sung. There was not room for even a single mendicant to get out on the road, or in the grove, so crowded was it with the multitude gazing at the beautiful form of the Being endowed with the Ten Powers.

So that day they say the throne of Sakka felt hot, to warn him that the Fortunate One might be deprived of nourishment, which should not be. And, on consideration, he understood the reason; and he took the form of a young brahmin, and descended in front of the Buddha, and made way for him, singing the praises of the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha. And he walked in front, magnifying the Teacher in these verses:

284. “He whose passions are subdued has come to Rājagaha
Glorious as Siṅgī gold – the Fortunate One;
And with him those who once were mere ascetics,
Now all subdued in heart and freed from sin. [1.117]

285. He who is free from defilements has come to Rājagaha
Glorious as Siṅgī gold – the Fortunate One;
And with him those who once were mere ascetics,
Now freed from sin and saved.

286. He who has crossed the flood\textsuperscript{161} has come to Rājagaha
Glorious as Siṅgī gold – the Fortunate One;
And with him those who once were mere ascetics,
But now crossed o’er the flood and freed from sin.

\textsuperscript{161} Tiṇṇo, crossed the ocean of transmigration.
287. He whose dwelling and whose wisdom are tenfold;
   He who has seen and gained ten precious things;
   Attended by ten hundred as a retinue –
   The Fortunate One – has come to Rājagaha.”

The multitude, seeing the beauty of the young brahmin, thought: “This young brahmin is exceeding fair, and yet we have never yet beheld him.” And they said: “Whence comes the young brahmin, or whose son is he?” And the young brahmin, hearing what they said, answered in the verse,

288. “He who is wise, and all subdued in heart,
   The Buddha, the unequalled among men,
   The Arahat, the most happy upon earth! –
   His servant am I.”

Then the Teacher entered upon the path thus made free by the great Deva, and entered Rājagaha attended by a thousand mendicants. The king gave a great donation to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head; and had water brought, bright as gems, and scented with flowers, in a golden goblet. And he poured the water over the hand of the One with Ten Powers, in token of the presentation of the Bamboo Grove, saying: “I, my lord, cannot live without the Three Jewels (the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha). In season and out of season I would visit the Fortunate One. Now the Grove of Reeds is far away; but this Grove of mine, called the Bamboo Grove, is close by, is easy of resort, and is a fit dwelling-place for a Buddha. Let the Fortunate One accept it from me!”

At the acceptance of this monastery the broad earth shook, as if it said: “Now the dispensation of the Buddha has taken root!” For in all Jambudīpa there is no dwelling-place, save the Bamboo Grove, whose acceptance caused the earth to shake; and in Ceylon there is no dwelling-place, save the Great Vihāra, whose acceptance caused the earth to shake.

And when the Teacher had accepted the Bamboo Grove monastery, and had given thanks for it, he rose from his seat and went, surrounded by the members of the Saṅgha, to the Bamboo Grove.

---

162 That is, the Four Paths, the Four Fruits thereof, Nibbāna, and the Dhamma.
Sāriputta and Moggallāna

Now at that time two ascetics, named Sāriputta and Moggallāna, were living near Rājagaha, seeking after salvation. Of these, Sāriputta, seeing the elder Assaji on his begging round, was pleasurably impressed by him, and waited on him, and heard from him the verse beginning,

“What things soever are produced from causes.\textsuperscript{163}

Their cause the Tathāgata has told,
And also that which is their cessation –
Such is the Great Ascetic’s doctrine.”

And he attained to the blessings which result from conversion; \[1.119\] and repeated that verse to his companion Moggallāna the ascetic. And he, too, attained to the blessings which first result from conversion. And each of them left Sañjaya,\textsuperscript{164} and with his attendants took orders under the Teacher. Of these two, Moggallāna attained Arahatship in seven days, and Sāriputta the elder in half a month. And the Teacher appointed these two to the office of his chief disciples; and on the day on which Sāriputta the elder attained Arahatship, he held the so-called Council of the Disciples.\textsuperscript{165}

The Return to Kapilavatthu

Now while the Tathāgata was dwelling there in the Bamboo Grove, Suddhodana the king heard that his son, who for six years had devoted himself to works of self-mortification, had attained to Complete Awakening, had Set Rolling the noble Dhamma Wheel, and was then dwelling at the Bamboo Grove near \[163\] The celebrated verse here referred to has been found inscribed several times in the ruins of the great Cetiya at Isipatana, and facsimiles are given in Cunningham’s Archeological Reports, plate xxxiv. vol. i. p. 123. The text is given by Burnouf in the Lotus de la Bonne Loi, p. 523; and in the Mahāvagga, pp. 40, 41. [I include here the complete verse.]

\[164\] Their then teacher.

\[165\] Or perhaps, “He formed the Corporation of the Disciples,” that is, the Order of Mendicants. [The word used is Sāvakasannipāta, which is the Assembly of Disciples. This was the First Assembly. For the Assemblies of other Buddhas see above, in the Distant Epoch.]
Rājagaha. So he said to a certain courtier, “Look you, sir; take a thousand men as a retinue, and go to Rājagaha, and say in my name, ‘Your father, Suddhodana the king, desires to see you;’ and bring my son here.”

And he respectfully accepted the king’s command with the reply, “So be it, O king!” and went quickly with a thousand followers the sixty leagues distance, and sat down amongst the disciples of the One with Ten Powers, and at the hour of instruction entered the Vihāra. And thinking: “Let the king’s message stay awhile,” he stood just beyond the disciples and listened to the discourse. And as he so stood [1.86] he attained to Arahatship, with his whole retinue, and asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha. And the Fortunate One stretched forth his hand and said: “Come, monk.” And all of them that moment appeared there, with robes and bowls created by Supernormal Powers, like elders of a hundred years’ standing. [1.120]

Now from the time when they attain Arahatship the Arahats become indifferent to worldly things: so he did not deliver the king’s message to the Sage. The king, seeing that neither did his messenger return, nor was any message received from him, called another courtier in the same manner as before, and sent him. And he went, and in the same manner attained Arahatship with his followers, and remained silent. Then the king in the same manner sent nine courtiers each with a retinue of a thousand men. And they all, neglecting what they had to do, stayed away there in silence.

And when the king found no one who would come and bring even a message, he thought: “Not one of these brings back, for my sake, even a message from the One with Ten Powers: who will then carry out what I say?” And searching among all his people he thought of Kāḷudāyī. For he was in everything serviceable to the king – intimate with him, and trustworthy. He was born on the same day as the future Buddha, and had been his playfellow and companion.

So the king said to him, “Friend Kāḷudāyī, as I wanted to see my son, I sent nine times a thousand men; but there is not one of them who has either come back or sent a message. Now the end of my life is not far off, and I desire to see my son before I die. Can you help me to see my son?”

“I can, O king!” was the reply, “if I am allowed to become a recluse.”
“My friend,” said the king, “become a recluse or not as you will, but help me to see my son!”

And he respectfully received the king’s message, with the words, “So be it, O king!” and went to Rājagaha; and stood at the edge of the disciples at the time of the Teacher’s instruction, and heard the gospel, and attained Arahatship with his followers, and was received into the Saṅgha.

The Teacher spent the first Rains Retreat after he had become [1.121] Buddha at Isipatana; and when it was over went to Uruvelā and stayed there three months and overcame the three brothers who were ascetics. And on the full-moon day of the month of January, he went to Rājagaha with a retinue of a thousand mendicants, and there he dwelt two months. Thus five months had elapsed since he left Benares, the cold season was past, and seven or eight days since the arrival of Udāyī, the elder.

And on the full-moon day of March Udāyī thought: “The cold season is past; the spring has come; men raise their crops and set out on their journeys; the earth is covered with fresh grass; the woods are full of flowers; the roads are fit to walk on; now is the time for the Sage to show favour to his family.” And going to the Fortunate One, he praised travelling in sixty verses, that the One with Ten Powers might revisit his native town. (1.87)

289. “Red are the trees with blossoms bright,
They give no shade to him who seeks for fruit;
Brilliant they seem as glowing fires.
The very season’s full, O Great Hero, of delights.

290. ’Tis not too hot; ’tis not too cold;
There’s plenty now of all good things;
The earth is clad with verdure green,
Fit is the time, O Great Sage!”

Then the Teacher said to him, “But why, Udāyī, do you sing the pleasures of travelling with so sweet a voice?”

“My lord!” was the reply, “your father is anxious to see you once more; will you not show favour to your relations?”
"'Tis well said, Udāyī! I will do so. Tell the Saṅgha that they shall fulfil the duty laid on all its members of journeying from place to place."

Kāḷudāyī accordingly told the brethren. And the Fortunate One, attended by twenty thousand mendicants free from pollutants – ten thousand from the upper classes in Magadha and Aṅga, and ten thousand from the upper classes in Kapilavatthu – started from Rājagaha, and travelled a league a day; going slowly with the intention of reaching Kapilavatthu, sixty leagues from Rājagaha, in two months.

And the elder, thinking: “I will let the king know that the Fortunate One has started,” rose into the air and appeared in the king’s house. The king was glad to see the elder, made him sit down on a splendid couch, filled a bowl with the delicious food made ready for himself, and gave to him. Then the elder rose up, and made as if he would go away.

“Sit down and eat,” said the king.

“I will rejoin the Teacher, and eat then,” said he.

“Where is the Teacher now?” asked the king.

“He has set out on his journey, attended by twenty thousand mendicants, to see you, O king!” said he.

The king, glad at heart, said: “Do you eat this; and until my son has arrived at this town, provide him with food from here.”

The elder agreed; and the king waited on him, and then had the bowl cleansed with perfumed chunam, and filled with the best of food, and placed it in the elder’s hand, saying: “Give it to the Tathāgata.”

And the elder, in the sight of all, threw the bowl into the air, and himself rising up into the sky, took the food again, and placed it in the hand of the Teacher.

The Teacher ate it. Every day the elder brought him food in the same manner. So the Teacher himself was fed, even on the journey, from the king’s table. The elder, day by day, when he had finished his meal, told the king, “Today the Fortunate One has come so far, today so far.” And by talking of the high character of the Buddha, he made all the king’s family delighted with the Teacher, even before they saw him. On that account the Fortunate [1.123] One gave him pre-eminence, saying: “Pre-eminent, O monks, among all those of my disciples who were pleasing to families, was Kāḷudāyi.”

Meeting with the Sākyas

The Sākyas, as they sat talking of the prospect of seeing their distinguished relative, considered what place he could stay in; and deciding that the Nigrodha Grove would be a pleasant residence, they made everything ready there. And with flowers in their hands they went out to meet him; and sending in front the little children, and the boys and girls of the village, and then the young men and maidens of the royal family; they themselves, decked of their own accord with sweet-smelling flowers and chunam, came close behind, conducting the Fortunate One to the Nigrodha Grove. There the Fortunate One sat down on the Buddha’s throne prepared for him, surrounded by twenty thousand Arahats.

The Sākyas are proud by nature, and stubborn in their pride. Thinking: “Siddhattha is younger than we are, standing to us in the relation of younger brother, or nephew, or son, or grandson,” they said to the little children and the young people, “Do you bow down before him, we will seat ourselves behind you.” The Fortunate One, when they had thus taken their seats, perceived what they meant; and thinking: “My relations pay me no reverence; come now, I must force them to do so,” he gained spiritual power based on Absorption, and rising into the air as if shaking off the dust of his feet upon them, he performed a miracle like unto that double miracle at the foot of the Gaṇḍamba tree.166

The king, seeing that miracle, said: “O Fortunate One! When you were presented to Kāḷa Devala to do obeisance to him on the day on which you were born, and I saw your feet turn round and place themselves on the brahmin’s head, I did obeisance to you. That was my first obeisance. When you were seated on your couch in the shade of the Jambu tree on the day of the ploughing festival, I saw how the shadow over you did not turn, and I bowed down at your feet. That was 166 See above, p. 105. Dhp-a, p. 334, has a different account of the miracle performed on this occasion. It says he made a jewelled terrace (ratanacaṅkama) in the sky, and walking up and down in it, preached the Dhamma.

---

my second obeisance. Now, seeing this unprecedented miracle, I bow down at your feet. This is my third obeisance.”

Then, when the king did obeisance to him, there was not a single Sākya who was able to refrain from bowing down before the Fortunate One; and all of them did obeisance.

So the Fortunate One, having compelled his relatives to bow down before him, descended from the sky, and sat down on the seat prepared for him. And when the Fortunate One was seated, the assembly of his relatives yielded him pre-eminence; and all sat there at peace in their hearts.

Then a thunder-cloud poured forth a shower of rain, and the copper-coloured water went away rumbling beneath the earth. He who wished to get wet, did get wet; but not even a drop fell on the body of him who did not wish to get wet. And all seeing it became filled with astonishment, and said one to another, “Lo! What miracle! Lo! What wonder!” {1.89}

But the Teacher said: “Not only now did a shower of rain fall upon me in the assembly of my relations, formerly also this happened.” And in this connexion he pronounced the story of his birth as Vessantara [Ja 547].

When they had heard his discourse they rose up, and paid reverence to him, and went away. Not one of them, either the king or any of his ministers, asked him on leaving, “Tomorrow accept your meal of us.”

The Lineage of the Buddhas

So on the next day the Teacher, attended by twenty thousand mendicants, entered Kapilavatthu to beg. Then also no one came to him or invited him to his house, or took his bowl. The Fortunate One, standing at the gate, [1.125] considered, “How then did the former Buddhas go on their begging rounds in their native town? Did they go direct to the houses of the kings, or did they go for alms from house to house?” Then, not finding that any of the Buddhas had gone direct, he thought: “I, too, must accept this descent and tradition as my own; so shall my disciples in future, learning of me, fulfil the duty of collecting their daily food.” And beginning at the first house, he went for alms from house to house.
At the rumour that the young chief Siddhattha was going for alms from door to door, the windows in the two-storied and three-storied houses were thrown open, and the multitude was transfixed at the sight. And the lady, the mother of Rāhula, thought: “My lord, who used to go to and fro in this very town with gilded palanquin and every sign of royal pomp, now with a potsherd in his hand begs his food from door to door, with shaven hair and beard, and clad in yellow robes. Is this becoming?” And she opened the window, and looked at the Fortunate One; and she beheld him glorious with the unequalled majesty of a Buddha, distinguished with the thirty-two characteristic signs and the eighty lesser marks of a Great Being, and lighting up the street of the city with a halo resplendent with many colours, proceeding to a fathom’s length all round his person.

And she announced it to the king, saying: “Your son is going for alms from door to door;” and she magnified him with the eight verses on, “The lion among Men,” beginning:

291. “Glossy and dark and soft and curly is his hair; Spotless and fair as the sun is his forehead; Well-proportioned and prominent and delicate is his nose; Around him is diffused a network of rays; The lion among Men!” [1.126]

The king was deeply agitated; and he departed instantly, gathering up his robe in his hand, and went quickly and stood before the Fortunate One, and said: “Why, Teacher, do you put us to shame? Why do you go begging for your food? Do you think it impossible to provide a meal for so many monks?” [1.90]

“This is our custom, O king!” was the reply.

“Not so, venerable sir, our descent is from the royal race of the Great Elected; and amongst them all not one chief has ever begged his daily food.”

“This succession of kings is your descent, O king! But mine is the succession of the Buddhas, from Dipaṅkara and Koṇḍañña and the rest down to Kassapa. These, and an uncountable number of thousands of other Buddhas, have begged their 167 Mahāsammata, the first king among men.

---

daily food, and lived on alms.” And standing in the middle of the street he uttered the verse:

292. “Rise up, and loiter not!
Follow after a holy life!
Who follows virtue rests in bliss,
Both in this world and in the next.”

And when the verse was finished the king attained to the Fruit of the First, and then, on hearing the following verse, to the Fruit of the Second Path –

293. “Follow after a holy life!
Follow not after wrong!
Who follows virtue rests in bliss,
Both in this world and in the next.”

And when he heard the story of the birth as Dhammapāla, he attained to the Fruit of the Third Path. And just as he was dying, seated on the royal couch under the white canopy of state, he attained to [1.127] Arahatship. The king never practised in solitude the Great Struggle.

Now as soon as he had realized the fruit of Stream-Entry, he took the Buddha’s bowl, and conducted the Fortunate One and his retinue to the palace, and served them with savoury food, both hard and soft. And when the meal was over, all the women of the household came and did obeisance to the Fortunate One, except only the mother of Rāhula.

Family Members

But she, though she told her attendants to go and salute their lord, stayed behind, saying: “If I am of any value in his eyes, my lord will himself come to me; and when he has come I will pay him reverence.”

And the Fortunate One, giving his bowl to the king to carry, went with his two chief disciples to the apartments of the daughter of the king, saying: “The king’s daughter shall in no wise be rebuked, howsoever she may be pleased to welcome me.” And he sat down on the seat prepared for him.

168 [Ja 447 Dhammapāljātaka.]
169 See above, p. 89.

And she came quickly and held him by his ankles, and laid her head on his feet, and so did obeisance to him, even as she had intended. And the king told of the fullness of her love for the Fortunate One, and of her goodness of heart, saying: “When my daughter heard, O Teacher, that you had put on the yellow robes, [1.91] from that time forth she dressed only in yellow. When she heard of your taking but one meal a day, she adopted the same custom. When she heard that you renounced the use of elevated couches, she slept on a mat spread on the floor. When she heard you had given up the use of garlands and unguents, she also used them no more. And when her relatives sent a message, saying, ‘Let us take care of you,’ she paid them no attention at all. Such is my daughter’s goodness of heart, O Fortunate One!” [1.128]

“’Tis no wonder, O king!” was the reply, “that she should watch over herself now that she has you for a protector, and that her wisdom is mature; formerly, even when wandering among the mountains without a protector, and when her wisdom was not mature, she watched over herself.” And he told the story of the Kinnarijñātaka [Ja 485]; and rose from his seat, and went away.

On the next day the festivals of the coronation, and of the housewarming, and of the marriage of Nanda, the king's son, were being celebrated all together. But the Buddha went to his house, and gave him his bowl to carry; and with the object of making him abandon the world, he wished him true happiness; and then, rising from his seat, departed. And (the bride) Janapada Kalyāṇī, seeing the young man go away, gazed wonderingly at him, and cried out, “My Lord, whither do you so quickly?” But he, not venturing to say to the Fortunate One, “Take your bowl,” followed him even unto the monastery. And the Fortunate One received him, unwilling though he was, into the Saṅgha.

It was on the third day after he reached Kapilapura that the Fortunate One ordained Nanda. On the second day the mother of Rāhula arrayed the boy in his best, and sent him to the Fortunate One, saying: “Look, dear, at that monk, attended by twenty thousand monks, and glorious in appearance as the great Deva Brahmā! That is your father. He had certain great treasures, which we have not seen since he abandoned his home. Go now, and ask for your inheritance, saying, ‘Father, I am your son. When I am crowned, I shall become a king over all the earth. I have need of the treasure. Give me the treasure; for a son is heir to his father’s property.’”

The boy went up to the Fortunate One, and gained the love of his father, and stood there glad and joyful, saying, [1.129] “Happy, O monk, is thy shadow!” and adding many other words befitting his position. When the Fortunate One had ended his meal, and had given thanks, he rose from his seat, and went away. And the child followed the Fortunate One, saying: “O monk! Give me my inheritance! Give me my inheritance!”

And the Fortunate One prevented him not. And the disciples, being with the Fortunate One, ventured not to stop him. And so he went with the Fortunate One even up to the grove. Then the Fortunate One thought: “This wealth, this property of his father’s, which he is asking for, perishes in the using, and brings vexation with it! I will give him the sevenfold wealth of the Arahats which I obtained under the Bodhi tree, and make him the heir of a spiritual inheritance!” And he said to Sāriputta, “Well, then, [1.92] Sāriputta, receive Rāhula into the Saṅgha.”

But when the child had been taken into the Saṅgha the king grieved exceedingly. And he was unable to bear his grief, and made it known to the Fortunate One, and asked of him a boon, saying: “If you so please, O Teacher, let not the Fortunate One receive a son into the Saṅgha without the leave of his father and mother.” And the Fortunate One granted the boon.

And the next day, as he sat in the king’s house after his meal was over, the king, sitting respectfully by him, said: “Teacher! When you were practising austerities, a Deva came to me, and said, ‘Your son is dead!’ And I believed him not, and rejected what he said, answering, ‘My son will not die without attaining Buddhahood!’”

And he replied, saying: “Why should you now have believed? When formerly, though they showed you my bones and said your son was dead, you did not believe them.” And in that connexion he told the story of his birth as the Great Dhammapāla. [Ja 447 Mahādhammapālajātaka]. See above, p. 126. [This is a repetition of what was said before, owing to poor editing by the compiler.]
the [1.130] Third Path. And so the Fortunate One established his father in the Three Fruits; and he returned to Rājagaha attended by the company of the brethren, and resided at the Cool Grove.

Anāthapiṇḍika And Jetavana

At that time the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, bringing merchandise in five hundred carts, went to the house of a trader in Rājagaha, his intimate friend, and there heard that a Fortunate Buddha had arisen. And very early in the morning he went to the Teacher, the door being opened by the power of a Deva, and heard the Dhamma and became converted. And on the next day he gave a great donation to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head, and received a promise from the Teacher that he would come to Sāvatthi.

Then along the road, forty-five leagues in length, he built resting-places at every league, at an expenditure of a hundred thousand for each. And he bought the Grove called Jetavana for eighteen koṭis of gold pieces, laying them side by side over the ground, and erected there a new building. In the midst thereof he made a pleasant room for the One with Ten Powers, and around it separately constructed dwellings for the eighty elders, and other residences with single and double walls, and long halls and open roofs, ornamented with ducks and quails; and ponds also he made, and terraces to walk on by day and by night.

And so having constructed a delightful residence on a pleasant spot, at an expense of eighteen koṭis, he sent a message to the Sage that he should come.

The Teacher, hearing the messenger’s words, left Rājagaha attended by a great multitude of monks, and in due course arrived at the city of Sāvatthi. Then the wealthy merchant decorated the monastery; and on the day on which the Tathāgata should arrive at Jetavana he arrayed his son in splendour, and sent him on with five hundred youths in festival attire. And he and his retinue, holding five hundred flags resplendent with cloth of five different [1.131] colours, {1.93} appeared before the One with Ten Powers. And behind him Mahāsubhaddā and Cullasubhaddā, the two daughters of the merchant, went forth with five hundred damsels carrying waterpots full of water. And behind them, decked with all her ornaments, the merchant’s wife went forth, with five hundred matrons carrying vessels full of food. And behind them all the great merchant himself, clad in new robes, with five hundred traders also dressed in new robes, went out to meet the Fortunate One.

The Fortunate One, sending this retinue of lay disciples in front, and attended by the great multitude of monks, entered Jetavana with the infinite grace and unequalled majesty of a Buddha, making the spaces of the grove bright with the halo from his person, as if they were sprinkled with gold-dust.

Then Anāthapiṇḍika asked him, “How, my Lord, shall I deal with this monastery?”

“O householder,” was the reply, “give it then to the monastic Saṅgha, whether now present or hereafter to arrive.”

And the great merchant, saying: “So be it, my Lord,” brought a golden vessel, and poured water over the hand of the One with Ten Powers, and dedicated the monastery, saying: “I give this Jetavana to the monastic Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head, and to all from every direction now present or hereafter to come.”\[171\]

And the Teacher accepted the Vihāra, and giving thanks, pointed out the advantages of monasteries, saying:

294. “Cold they ward, off, and heat;
So also beasts of prey,
And creeping things, and gnats,
And rains in the cold season.
And when the dreaded heat and winds
Arise, they ward them off. [1.132]

295. To give to monks a dwelling-place,
Wherein in safety and in peace
To think till insight grows clear,
The Buddha calls a worthy deed.

\[171\] This formula has been constantly found in rock inscriptions in India and Ceylon over the ancient cave-dwellings of Buddhist hermits.
296. Let therefore a wise man,
Regarding his own welfare,
Have pleasant monasteries built,
And lodge there learned men.

297. Let him with cheerful gaze
Give food to them, and drink,
And clothes, and dwelling-places
To the upright in mind. {1.94}

298. Then they shall preach to him the Dhamma –
The Dhamma, dispelling every grief –
Which Dhamma, when here a man understands,
He has no more pollutants, and dies away!"

Anāthapiṇḍika began the dedication festival from the second day. The festival held at the dedication of Visākhā's building ended in four months, but Anāthapiṇḍika's dedication festival lasted nine months. At the festival, too, eighteen koṭis were spent; so on that one monastery he spent wealth amounting to fifty-four koṭis.

Long ago, too, in the time of the Blessed Buddha Vipassī, a merchant named Punabbasu Mitta bought that very spot by laying golden bricks over it, and built a monastery there a league in length. And in the time of the Blessed Buddha Sikhī, a merchant named Sirivaḍḍha bought that very spot by standing golden ploughshares over it, and built there a monastery three-quarters of a league in length. And in the time of the Blessed Buddha Vessabhū, a merchant named Sotthiya bought that very spot by laying golden elephant feet along it, and built a monastery there half a league in length. And in the [1.133] time of the Blessed Buddha Kakusandha, a merchant named Accuta also bought that very spot by laying golden bricks over it, and built there a monastery a quarter of a league in length. And in the time of the Blessed Buddha Koṇāgamana, a merchant named Ugga bought that very spot by laying golden turtles over it, and built there a monastery half a league in length. And in the time of the Blessed Buddha Kassapa, a merchant named Sumaṅgala bought that very spot by laying golden bricks over it, and built there a monastery sixty acres in extent.

And in the time of our Fortunate One, Anāthapiṇḍika the merchant bought that very spot by laying golden coins over it, and built there a monastery thirty acres in extent. For that spot is a place which not one of all the Buddhas has deserted. And so the Fortunate One lived in that spot from the attainment of omniscience under the Bodhi tree till his death. This is the Proximate Epoch. And now we will tell the stories of his births.
The Jātaka, Volume I

or, stories of the Buddha’s former births.

translated from the Pāli by various hands

under the editorship of

Professor E. B. Cowell.

Vol. I. translated by

Robert Chalmers, B.A.,

of Oriel College, Oxford.

[1895]

revised by

Ānandajoti Bhikkhu

November 2021
to

Professor T. W. Rhys Davids, LL.D., PH.D., this volume is inscribed by his friend and pupil the translator

Preface

It was an almost [1.vii] isolated incident in Greek literary history, when Pythagoras claimed to remember his previous lives. Heracleides Ponticus relates that he professed to have been once born as Æthalides, the son of Hermes, and to have then obtained as a boon from his father that he asked to retain through life and through death a memory of his experiences. Consequently he remembered the Trojan war, where, as Euphorbus, he was wounded by Menelaus, and, as Pythagoras, he could still recognise the shield which Menelaus had hung up in the temple of Apollo at Branchidæ; and similarly he remembered his subsequent birth as Hermotimus, and then as Pyrrhus, a fisherman of Delos.

But in India this recollection of previous lives is a common feature in the histories of the saints and heroes of sacred tradition; and it is especially mentioned by Manu as the effect of a self-denying and pious life. The doctrine of Metempsychosis, since the later Vedic period, has played such an important part in the history of the national character and religious ideas that we need not be surprised to find that Buddhist literature from the earliest times (although giving a theory of its own to explain the transmigration) has always included the ages of the past as an authentic background to the founder’s historical life as Gautama.

Jātaka legends occur even in the Canonical Piṭakas; thus the Sukhavīhārijātaka [Ja 10] and the Tittirajātaka [Ja 1037, are found in the Cullavagga, vii. 1 and vi. 6, and similarly the Khandhavattajātaka [Ja 203], which will be given in the next volume, is found in the Cullavagga v. 6; and there are several other examples. So too one of the minor books of the Sutta Piṭaka (the Cariyāpiṭaka) consists of 35 Jātakas told in verse; and ten at least [1.viii] of these can be identified in the volumes of our present collection already published; and probably several of the others will be traced when it is all printed. The Sutta and Vinaya Piṭakas are generally accepted as at least older than the Council of Vesāli (380 B.C.); and thus Jātaka legends must have been always recognised in Buddhist literature.

---

172 But compare the account of Aristeas of Proconnesus in Hdt. iv. 14, 15.
173 Diogenes Laert. viii. 1. [Quoted in Greek in the original.]
174 iv. 148.
This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that Jātaka scenes are found sculptured in the carvings on the railings round the relic shrines of Sanchi and Amaravati and especially those of Bharhut, where the titles of several Jātakas are clearly inscribed over some of the carvings. These bas-reliefs prove that the birth-legends were widely known in the third century B.C. and were then considered as part of the sacred history of the religion. Fah-hian [Faxian], when he visited Ceylon, (400 A.D.), saw at Abhayagiri “representations of the 500 bodily forms which the Bodhisatta assumed during his successive births,”\(^{175}\) and he particularly mentions his births as Sou-to-nou, a bright flash of light, the king of the elephants, and an antelope.\(^{176}\) These legends were also continually introduced into the Dhamma discourses\(^{177}\) which were delivered by the various teachers in the course of their wanderings, whether to magnify the glory of the Buddha or to illustrate Buddhist doctrines and precepts by appropriate examples, somewhat in the same way as medieval preachers in Europe used to enliven their sermons by introducing fables and popular tales to rouse the flagging attention of their hearers.\(^{178}\)

It is quite uncertain when these various birth-stories were put together in a systematic form such as we find in our present Jātaka collection. At first they were probably handed down orally, but their growing popularity would ensure that their kernel, at any rate, would before long be committed to some more permanent form. In fact there is a singular parallel to this in the ‘Gesta Romanorum,’ which was compiled by an uncertain author in the 14th century and contains nearly 200 fables and stories told to illustrate various virtues and vices, many of them winding up with a religious application. [1.ix]

Some of the birth-stories are evidently Buddhistic and entirely depend for their point on some custom or idea peculiar to Buddhism; but many are pieces of folklore which have floated about the world for ages as the stray waifs of literature and are liable everywhere to be appropriated by any casual claimant. The same \(^{175}\) Beal’s translation p. 157.

\(^{176}\) [Xuanzang] twice refers to Jātakas, Julien, i. 137, 197.

\(^{177}\) See Prof. M. M. Künté’s paper, JRAS Ceylon, viii. 123.

\(^{178}\) In the curious description of the Buddhist grove in the Harṣacarita, viii., Bāṇa mentions owls “which repeated the Bodhisattva’s Jātakas, having gained illumination by continually hearing them recited.”
stories may thus, in the course of their long wanderings, come to be recognised under widely different aspects, as when they are used by Boccaccio or Poggio merely as merry tales, or by some Welsh bard to embellish king Arthur’s legendary glories, or by some Buddhist ascetic or medieval friar to add point to his discourse. Chaucer unwittingly puts a Jātaka story into the mouth of his Pardonere when he tells his tale of ‘the ryotoures three;’ and another appears in Herodotus as the popular explanation of the sudden rise of the Alcmaeonidæ through Megacles’ marriage with Cleisthenes’ daughter and the rejection of his rival Hippocleides.

The Pāli work, entitled ‘the Jātaka,’ the first volume of which is now presented to the reader in an English form, contains 550 Jātakas or Birth-stories, which are arranged in 22 nipātas or books. This division is roughly founded on the number of verses (gāthās) which are quoted in each story; thus the first book contains 150 stories, each of which only quotes one verse, the second 100, each of which quotes two, the third and fourth 50 each, which respectively quote 3 and 4, and so on to the twenty-first with 5 stories, each of which quotes 80 verses, and the twenty-second with 10 stories, each quoting a still larger number. Each story opens with a preface called the paccuppannavatthu or ‘story of the present,’ which relates the particular circumstances in the Buddha’s life which led him to tell the birth-story and thus reveal some event in the long series of his previous existences as a bodhisatta or a being destined to attain Buddha-ship. At the end there is always given a short summary, where the Buddha identifies the different actors in the story in their present births at the time of his discourse – it being an essential condition of the book that the Buddha possesses the same power as that which Pythagoras claimed but with a far more extensive range, since he could remember all the past events in every being’s previous existences as well as in his own. Every story is also illustrated by one or more gāthās which are uttered by the Buddha while still a Bodhisatta and so playing his part in the narrative; but sometimes the verses are put into his mouth as the Buddha, when they are called abhisambuddhagāthā. [1.x]

Some of these verses are found in the canonical book called the Dhammapada; and many of the Jātaka stories are given in the old Commentary on that book but with varying details, and sometimes associated with verses which are not given in our present Jātaka text. This might seem to imply that there is not necessarily a strict connection between any particular story and the verses which may be quoted as its moral; but in most cases an apposite verse would of course soon assert a prescriptive right to any narrative which it seemed specially to illustrate. The language of the gāthās is much more archaic than that of the stories; and it certainly seems more probable to suppose that they are the older kernel of the work, and that thus in its original form the Jātaka, like the Cariyāpiṭaka, consisted only of these verses. It is quite true that they are generally unintelligible without the story, but such is continually the case with proverbial sayings; the traditional commentary passes by word of mouth in a varying form along with the adage, as in the well-known ‘Hippocleides doesn’t care’ or our own ‘Hobson’s choice,’ until some author writes it down in a crystallised form. Occasionally the same birth-story is repeated elsewhere in a somewhat varied form and with different verses attached to it; and we sometimes find the phrase iti vitthāretabbam, which seems to imply that the narrator is to amplify the details at his discretion.

The native tradition in Ceylon is that the original Jātaka Book consisted of the gāthās alone, and that a commentary on these, containing the stories which they were intended to illustrate, was written in very early times in Sinhalese. This was translated into Pāli about 430 A.D. by Buddhaghosa, who translated so many of the early Sinhalese commentaries into Pāli; and after this the Sinhalese original was lost. The accuracy of this tradition has been discussed by Professor Rhys Davids in the Introduction to the first volume of his ‘Buddhist Birth Stories,’ and we may safely adopt his conclusion, that if the prose commentary was not composed by Buddhaghosa, it was composed not long afterwards; and as in any case it was merely a redaction of materials handed down from very early times in the Buddhist community, it is not a question of much importance except for Pāli literary history. The gāthās are undoubtedly old, and they necessarily

---

179 [Quoted in Greek in the original, it is a proverb spoken by Hippocleides himself.]
180 We have an interesting illustration of the proverbial character of some of the Jātaka stories in the Sāmkhya Aphorisms, iv. 11, “he who is without hope is happy like Piṅgalā,” which finds its explanation in Ja 330 Silavīmaṁsajātaka. It is also referred to in the Mahābhārata xii. 6520.
181 As e.g. Fausböll, iii. p. 495. cf. Divyāvadāna p. 377, 1.
182 See also several papers in the eighth volume of the Journal of the Ceylon Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society.
imply the previous existence of the stories, though not perhaps in the exact words in which we now possess them.

The Jātakas are preceded in the Pāli text by a long Introduction, the Nidānakathā, which gives the Buddha’s previous history both before his last birth, and also during his last existence until he attained the state of a Buddha.183 This has been translated by Professor Rhys Davids, but as it has no direct connection with the rest of the work, we have omitted it in our translation, which commences with the first Jātaka story.184

We have translated the quasi historical introductions which always precede the different birth-stories, as they are an essential part of the plan of the original work – since they link each tale with some special incident in the Buddha’s life, which tradition venerates as the occasion when he is supposed to have recalled the forgotten scene of a long past existence to his contemporaries. But it is an interesting question for future investigation how far they contain any historical data. They appear at first sight to harmonise with the framework of the Piṭakas; but I confess that I have no confidence in their historical credibility – they seem to me rather the laboured invention of a later age, like the legendary history of the early centuries of ancient Rome. But this question will be more easily settled, when we have made further progress in the translation.

The Jātakas themselves are of course interesting as specimens of Buddhist literature; but their foremost interest to us consists in their relation to folk-lore and the light which they often throw on those popular stories which illustrate so vividly the ideas and superstitions of the early times of civilisation. In this respect they possess a special value, as, although much of their matter is peculiar to Buddhism, they contain embedded with it an unrivalled collection of folk-lore. They are also full of interest as giving a vivid picture of the social life and customs of ancient India. Such books as Lieutenant-Colonel Sleeman’s ‘Rambles’ or Mr. Grierson’s ‘Bihār Peasant Life’ illustrate them at every turn. They form in fact an 183 This latter portion partly corresponds to the well-known Lalitavistara of the Northern Buddhists.

184 [In this edition I have included Rhys Davids translation, as being an essential part of the plan of the whole work.]
ever-shifting panorama of the village life such as Fah-hian [Faxian] and Hiouen-thsang [Xuanzang] saw it in the old days before the Muhammadan [1.xii] conquest, when Hindu institutions and native rule prevailed in every province throughout the land. Like all collections of early popular tales they are full of violence and craft, and betray a low opinion of woman; but outbursts of nobler feeling are not wanting, to relieve the darker colours.

Professor Rhys Davids first commenced a translation of the Jātaka in 1880, but other engagements obliged him to discontinue it after one volume had appeared, containing the Nidānakathā and 40 stories. The present translation has been undertaken by a band of friends who hope, by each being responsible for a definite portion, to complete the whole within a reasonable time. We are in fact a guild of Jātaka translators, śreṣṭhi pūrvā vayaṁ śreṇiḥ; but, although we have adopted some common principles of translation and aim at a certain general uniformity in our technical terms and in transliteration, we have agreed to leave each individual translator, within certain limits, a free hand in his own work. The editor only exercises a general superintendence, in consultation with the two resident translators, Mr. Francis and Mr. Neil.

Mr. R. Chalmers of Oriel College, Oxford, has translated in the present volume the first volume of Prof. Fausböll’s edition of the Pāli text (five volumes of which have already appeared). The second volume will be translated by Mr. W. H. D. Rouse, late fellow of Christ’s College, Cambridge, who will also be responsible for the fourth; the third will be translated by Mr. H. T. Francis, Under-Librarian of the University Library at Cambridge, and late fellow of Gonville and Caius College, and Mr. R. A. Neil, fellow and assistant-tutor of Pembroke College, who hope also to undertake the fifth.

E. B. Cowell.
Book I. Ekanipāta
The Section with One Verse

Praised be the Fortunate One, the Arahat, the Perfect Sambuddha\(^\text{185}\)

Ja 1 Apaṇṭakajātaka\(^\text{186}\)
The Story about what is Unquestionable (1s)

In the present 500 friends of Anāthapiṇḍika convert to Buddhism, but later fall away. The Buddha reproves them for failing in their refuge, and tells a story of a wise and a foolish merchant in the past. The foolish one listened to Yakkhas who led him astray, and he lost all his men and merchandise; the wise one safely guided his caravan across the desert.

The Bodhisatta = the wise caravan leader (paṇḍitasatthavāhaputta), the Buddha’s disciples = the wise caravan leader’s followers (paṇḍitasatthavāhaputtaparisa), Devadatta = the foolish caravan leader (bālasatthavāhaputta),
Devadatta’s followers = his followers.

Past Compare: DN 23 Pāyāsisutta (2.342).

Keywords: Caution, Prudence, Devas.

---

\(^\text{185}\) The canonical text of the Jātaka book, which consists exclusively of gāthās or verses, is divided into ‘books,’ or nipātas, according to the number of gāthās [verses]. The present volume contains the 150 stories which illustrate, and form the commentary of, a single gāthā in each case, and compose the first book. The later books contain an increasing number of gāthās and a decreasing number of stories: e.g. the second book contains 100 two-gāthā stories, the third book 50 three-gāthā stories, and so on. The total number of the books or nipātas is 22, 21 of which form the text of the five published volumes of the Pāli text. The nipātas are subdivided into vaggas, or sets of about 10 stories, named as a rule after their first story. It has not been thought desirable to cumber the translation with these subdivisions.

\(^\text{186}\) This Jātaka is quoted in the Milindapañho, p. 289 of Rhys Davids’ translation in Vol. 35 of Sacred Books of the East.
This\textsuperscript{187} discourse [1.1] \{1.95\} regarding Truth was delivered by the Fortunate One, while he was dwelling in the Great Monastery at Jetavana near Sāvatthī. But who, you ask, was it that provoked this tale?

Well, it was the Treasurer’s five hundred friends, disciples of the sectarians.\textsuperscript{188}

For one day Anāthapiṇḍika\textsuperscript{189} the Treasurer took his friends the five hundred disciples of other schools, and went off with them to Jetavana, where also he had a great store brought of garlands, perfumes, and unguents, together with oil, honey, molasses, clothes, and cloaks. After due salutation to the Tathāgata, he made his offering to him of the garlands and the like, and handed over to the Saṅgha of monks the medicinal oil and so forth together with the cloths; and, this done, he took his seat on one side eschewing the six faults in [1.2] sitting down. Likewise, those disciples of other schools saluted the Buddha, and took their seats close by the side of Anāthapiṇḍika – gazing upon the Teacher’s countenance, glorious as the full moon, upon his excellent presence endowed with the signs and marks of Buddhahood and encompassed to a fathom’s length with light, and upon the rich glory that marks a Buddha, a glory which issued as it were in paired garlands, pair upon pair.

Then, though in thunderous tones as of a young lion roaring in the Red Valley or as of a storm-cloud in the rainy season, bringing down as it were the Ganges of the Heavens\textsuperscript{190} \{1.96\} and seeming to weave a chaplet of jewels – yet in a voice of \textsuperscript{188} Literally ‘sectaries’; but usually translated ‘heretics,’ a term which has come to have too theological a connotation to be applicable to philosophers. The six rivals with whom Gotama had chiefly to compete were Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambalī, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, and Nigaṇṭha Nāṭhaputta (see, e.g., the Sāmaññaphala Sutta in the Dīghanikāya, Vol. 1. p. 47).

\textsuperscript{187} The Story of the Present usually begins by quoting, as a catchword, the first words of the subsequent gāthā [this one however, omits to do that.]

\textsuperscript{189} This is a surname [really an epithet], meaning literally ‘feeder of the poor.’ His ordinary name was Sudatta. See the account in the Vinaya (Cullavagga, vi. 4, 9) of how he bought from Prince Jeta the latter’s grove for as much money as would pave the ground, and how he built thereon the Great Monastery for the Buddha.

\textsuperscript{190} \textit{i.e.} the Milky Way.
eightfold perfection, the charm of which ravished the ear, he preached to them the Dhamma in a discourse full of sweetness and bright with varied beauty.

They, after hearing the Teacher’s discourse, rose up with hearts converted, and with due salutation to the One with Ten Powers, burst asunder the other doctrines in which they had taken refuge, and betook themselves to the Buddha as their refuge. Thenceforth without ceasing they used to go with Anāthapiṇḍika, carrying in their hands perfumes and garlands and the like, to hear the Dhamma in the monastery; and they abounded in generosity, kept the Precepts, and kept the weekly Uposatha.

Now the Fortunate One went from Sāvatthi back to Rājagaha again. As soon as the Tathāgata had gone, they burst asunder their new faith, and returning to the other doctrines as their refuge, reverted to their original state.

After some seven or eight months’ stay, the Fortunate One came back to Jetavana. Once again too did Anāthapiṇḍika come with those friends of his to the Teacher, make his salutation and offering of perfumes and the like, and take his seat on one side. And the friends also saluted the Fortunate One and took their seats in like manner. Then did Anāthapiṇḍika tell the Fortunate One how, when the Tathāgata had departed on his alms pilgrimage, his friends had forsaken their refuge for the old doctrines again, and had reverted to their original state.

Opening the lotus of his mouth, as though it were a casket of jewels, scented with scents divine and filled with divers perfumes by virtue of his having ever spoken aright throughout myriad aeons, the Fortunate One made his sweet voice come forth, as he enquired, “Is the report true that you, disciples, have forsaken the Three Refuges for the refuge of other doctrines?”

And when they, unable to conceal the fact, had confessed, saying: “It is true, Fortunate One,” then said the Teacher, “Disciples, not between the bounds of hell below and the highest heaven above, not in all the infinite worlds that

---

191 i.e. the Buddha, the Dhamma he preached, and the Saṅgha he founded. Infra this triad is spoken of as the ‘Three Gems.’

192 Strictly speaking Buddhism knows no hells, only purgatories, which – though places of torment – are temporary and educational.
stretch right and left, is there the equal, much less the superior, of a Buddha in the excellences which spring from obeying the Precepts and from other virtuous conduct.”

Then he declared to them the excellences of the Three Jewels as they are revealed in the sacred texts, the following amongst the number, “Of all creatures, monks, whether footless and so on, of these the Tathāgata is the chief,” “Whatsoever riches there be in this or in other worlds and so on,” and, “Verily the chief of the faithful and so on.” Thence he went on to say, “No disciples, male or female, who seek refuge in the Three Jewels that are endowed with such peerless excellences, are ever reborn into hell and the like states; but, released from all rebirth into states of suffering, they pass to the Realm of Devas and there receive great glory.
Therefore, in forsaking such a refuge for that offered by other doctrines, you have gone astray.” [1.3]

And here the following sacred texts should be cited to make it clear that none who, to find release and the supreme good, have sought refuge in the Three Jewels, shall be reborn into states of suffering: {1.97}

“Those who have refuge in the Buddha found,
Shall not pass hence to states of suffering;
Straightway, when they shall quit their human frame,
A Deva form these faithful ones shall fill.193

Those who have refuge in the Dhamma found194
Shall not pass hence to states of suffering;
Straightway, when they shall quit their human frame,
A Deva form these faithful ones shall fill.

Those who have refuge in the Saṅgha found
Shall not pass hence to states of suffering;

193 The word Deva, which I have retained in its Pāli form, means an ‘angel,’ rather than a ‘god,’ in the godless creed of the Buddhist. See hereon Rhys Davids in his ‘Buddhist Suttas,’ page 162.
194 Dhp v. 188-192. [I have replaced Chalmers’ very partial translation of the next five verses with a complete one by Burlingame from his translation of the Dhp and its commentary.]
Straightway, when they shall quit their human frame,
A Deva form these faithful ones shall fill.

To many a refuge men go, to mountains and to forests,
To shrines and trees and groves, when terrified with fear.
Such is no sure refuge, such is no final refuge;
Not by resorting to such a refuge does a man obtain release from all suffering.

Whoever seeks refuge in the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, Whoever, with clear understanding, beholds the Four Noble Truths,
Suffering, the Origin of Suffering, the Escape from Suffering,
And the Noble Eightfold Path of Escape from Suffering,
To this sure refuge, to this supreme refuge,
By resorting to this refuge, he obtains release from all suffering.”

But the Teacher did not end his teaching to them at this point; for he went on to say, “Disciples, meditation on the thought of the Buddha, meditation on the thought of the Dhamma, meditation on the thought of the Saṅgha, this it is that gives entry to and fruition of the First, the Second, the Third, and the Fourth Paths to Bliss.” And when he had preached the Dhamma to them in these and other ways, he said: “In forsaking such a refuge as this, you have gone astray.”

And here the gift of the several paths to those who meditate on the thought of the Buddha and so forth, should be made clear by such discourses as the following, “One thing there is, monks, which, if practised and developed, conduces to utter loathing of the world’s vanities, to the cessation of passion, to the end of being, to peace, to deep knowledge, to Awakening, to Nibbāna. What is this one thing? The meditation on the thought of the Buddha.”

When he had thus exhorted the disciples, the Fortunate One said: “So too in times past, disciples, the men who jumped to the fatuous conclusion that what was no refuge was a real refuge, fell a prey to Amanussas in a Yakkha-haunted wilderness and were utterly destroyed; while the men who clave to the absolute and indisputable truth, prospered in the self-same wilderness.” And when he had said this, he became silent.

195 See note 2 on p. 8.
Then, rising up from his seat and saluting the Fortunate One, the layman Anāthapiṇḍika burst into praises, and with clasped hands raised in reverence to his forehead, spoke thus, “It is clear to us, sir, that in these present days these disciples were led by error into forsaking the supreme refuge. But the bygone destruction of those opinionated ones in the wilderness haunted by Amanussas, and the prospering of the men who clave to the truth, are hidden from us and known only to you. [1.98] May it please the Fortunate One, as though causing the full moon to rise in the sky, to make this thing clear to us.” [1.4] Then said the Fortunate One, “It was solely to brush away the world’s difficulties that by the display of the Ten Perfections196 through myriad aeons I won omniscience. Give ear and hearken, as closely as if you were filling a tube of gold with lion’s marrow.”

Having thus excited the Treasurer’s attention, he uncovered what rebirth had concealed from them, as though, after cleaving the storehouse of the snows, he were driving the full moon through the space between the worlds.

In the past in the city of Benares in the Kāsi country there was a king named Brahmadatta. In those days the Bodhisatta was born into a merchant’s family, and growing up in due course, used to journey about trading with five hundred carts, travelling now from east to west and now from west to east. There was also at Benares another young merchant, a stupid blockhead, lacking skill in means.

Now at the time of our story the Bodhisatta had loaded five hundred carts with costly wares of Benares and had got them all ready to start. And so had the foolish young merchant too. Thought the Bodhisatta, “If this foolish young merchant keeps me company all along, and the thousand carts travel along together, it will be too much for the road; it will be a hard matter to get wood, water, and so forth for the men, or grass for the oxen. Either he or I must go on first.” So he sent for the other and laid his view before him, saying: “The two of us can’t travel together; would you rather go first or last?” Thought the other, “There will be many advantages if I go on first. I shall have a road which is not yet cut up; my oxen will have the pick of the grass; my men will have the pick of the herbs for curry; the water will be undisturbed; and, lastly, I shall fix my own price for the barter of my goods.” Accordingly he replied, “I will go first, my dear sir.” [1.99]

196 i.e. generosity, virtue, renunciation, wisdom, effort, patience, truth, determination, loving-kindness, and equanimity. (See the Cariyāpiṭaka, pp. 45-7 of the Pāli text edited by Dr Morris for the Pāli Text Society); see also Jātaka No. 35 &c.

The Bodhisatta, on the other hand, saw many advantages in going last, for he argued thus to himself, “Those who go first will level the road where it is rough, while I shall travel along the road they have already travelled; their oxen will have grazed off the coarse old grass, while mine will pasture on the sweet young growth which will spring up in its place; my men will find a fresh growth of sweet herbs for curry where the old ones have been picked; where there is no water, the first caravan will have to dig to supply themselves, and we shall drink at the wells they dug. Haggling over prices is hard work; whereas I, following later, shall barter my wares at the prices they have already fixed.” Accordingly, seeing all these advantages, he said to the other, “Then go you first, my dear sir.” [1.5]

“Very well, I will,” said the foolish merchant. And he yoked his carts and set out. Journeying along, he left human habitations behind him and came to the outskirts of the wilderness.

Now wildnesses are of the five following kinds: robber wildnesses, wild-beast wildnesses, drought wildnesses, Amanussa wildnesses, and famine wildnesses. The first is when the way is beset by robbers; the second is when the way is beset by lions and other wild beasts; the third is when there is no bathing or water to be got; the fourth is when the road is beset by Amanussas; and the fifth is when no roots or other food are to be found. And in this fivefold category the wilderness in question was both a drought, and a Amanussa wilderness.

Accordingly this young merchant took great big water-jars on his carts, and filling them with water, set out to cross the sixty leagues of desert which lay before him. Now when he had reached the middle of the wilderness, the Yakkha who haunted it said to himself, “I will make these men throw away their stock of water, and devour them all when they are faint.” So he [1.100] framed by his magic power a delightful carriage drawn by pure white young bulls. With a retinue of some ten or twelve Amanussas bearing bows and quivers, swords and shields, he rode along to meet them like a mighty lord in this carriage, with blue lotuses and white water-lilies wreathed round his head, with wet hair and wet clothes, and with muddy carriage-wheels. His attendants, too, in front and rear of him went along with their hair and clothes wet, with garlands of blue lotuses and white water-lilies on their heads, and with bunches of white lotuses in their hands, chewing the esculent stalks, and dripping with water and mire.

Now the leaders of caravans have the following custom: whenever the wind blows in their teeth, they ride on in front in their carriage with their attendants round them, in order to escape the dust; but when the wind blows from behind them, then they ride in like fashion in the rear of the column. And, as on this occasion the wind was blowing against them, the young merchant was riding in front.

When the Yakkha became aware of the merchant's approach, he drew his carriage aside from the track and greeted him kindly, asking him whither he was going. The leader of the caravan too caused his carriage to be drawn aside from the track so as to let the carts pass by, while he stayed by the way and thus addressed the Yakkha, “We are just on our way from Benares, sir. But I observe that you have lotuses and water-lilies on your heads and in your hands, and that your people are chewing the esculent stalks, and that you are all muddy and dripping with wet. Pray did it rain while you were on the road, and did you come on pools covered with lotuses and water-lilies?”

Hereon the Yakkha exclaimed, “What did you say? Why, yonder appears the dark-green streak of the forest, and thence onward there is nothing but water all through the forest. It is always raining there; the pools are full; and on every side are lakes covered with lotuses and water-lilies.” Then as the line of carts passed by, he asked where they were bound for. “To such and such a place,” was the reply. “And what wares have you got in this cart and in this?” “So and so.” “And what might you have in this last cart which seems to move as if it were heavily laden?” “Oh, there's water in that.” “You did well to carry water with you from the other side. But there is no need for it now, as water is abundant on ahead. So break the jars and throw the water away, that you may travel easier.” And he added, “Now continue on your way, as we have stopped too long already.” Then he went a little way further on, till he was out of sight, when he made his way back to the Yakkha-city where he dwelt.

Such was the folly of that foolish merchant that he did the Yakkha’s bidding, and had his jars broken and the water all thrown away – without saving so much even as would go in the palm of a man’s hand. Then he ordered the carts to drive on. Not a drop of water did they find on ahead, and thirst exhausted the men. All day long till the sun went down they kept on the march; but at sunset they unyoked their carts and made a coral, tethering the oxen to the wheels. The oxen had no water to drink, and the men none to cook their rice with; and the tired-out band sank to the ground to slumber. But as soon as night fell, the Yakkhas came out from their city, and slew every single one of those men and oxen; and when they had devoured their flesh, leaving only the bare bones, the Yakkhas departed. Thus was the foolish young merchant the sole cause of the destruction of that whole band, whose skeletons were strewn in every conceivable direction, while the five hundred carts stood there with their loads untouched.

Now the Bodhisatta allowed some six weeks to pass by after the starting of the foolish young merchant, before he set out. Then he proceeded from the city with his five hundred carts, and in due course came to the outskirts of the wilderness. Here he had his water-jars filled and laid in an ample stock of water; and by beat of drum he had his men assembled in camp, {1.102} and thus addressed them, “Let not so much as a palmful of water be used without my sanction. There are poison trees in this wilderness; so let no man among you eat any leaf, flower, or fruit which he has not eaten before, without first asking me.” With this exhortation to his men, he pushed on into the wilderness with his 500 carts.

When he had reached the middle of the wilderness, the Yakkha made his appearance on the Bodhisatta’s path as in the former case. But, as soon as he became aware of the Yakkha, the Bodhisatta saw through him; for he thought to himself, “There’s no water here, in this ‘Waterless Desert.’ This person with his red eyes and aggressive bearing, casts no shadow. Very likely he has induced the foolish young merchant who preceded me, to throw away all his water, and then, waiting till they were worn out, has eaten up the merchant with all his men. But he doesn’t know my cleverness and ready wit.” Then he shouted to the Yakkha, “Begone! We’re men of business, and do not throw away what water we have got, before we see where more is to come from. But, when we do see more, we may be trusted to throw this water away and lighten our carts.”

The Yakkha rode on a bit further till he was out of sight, and then betook himself back to his home in the Yakkha city. But when the Yakkha had gone, the Bodhisatta’s men said to him, “Sir, we heard from those men that yonder is the dark-green streak of the forest appearing, where they said it was always raining. They had lotuses on their heads and water-lilies in their hands and were eating the stalks, while their clothes and hair were wringing wet, with water streaming off them. Let us throw away our water and get on a bit quicker with lightened carts.” On hearing these words, the Bodhisatta ordered a halt and had the men gather to him. “Tell me,” said he, “did any man among you ever hear before today that there was a lake or a pool in this wilderness?” “No, sir,” was the answer, “why it’s known as ‘the Waterless Desert.’”

“We have just been told by some people that it is raining just on ahead, in the belt of forest; now how far does a rain-wind carry?” “A league, sir.” “And has this rain-wind reached any one man here?” “No, sir.” “How far off can you see the crest of a storm-cloud?” “A league, sir.” “And has any one man here seen the top of even a single storm-cloud?” “No, sir.” “How far off can you see a flash of lightning?” “Four or five leagues, sir.” “And has any one man here seen a flash of lightning?” “No, sir.” “How far off can a man hear a peal of thunder?” “Two or three leagues, sir.” “And has any man here heard a peal of thunder?” “No, sir.” “These are not men but Yakkhas. They will return in the hope of devouring us when we are weak and faint after throwing away our water at their bidding. As the young merchant who went on before us was not a man having skill in means, most likely he has been fooled into throwing his water away and has been devoured when exhaustion ensued. We may expect to find his five hundred carts standing just as they were loaded for the start; we shall come on them today. Press on with all possible speed, without throwing away a drop of water.”

Urging his men forward with these words, he proceeded on his way till he came upon the 500 carts standing just as they had been loaded and the skeletons of the men and oxen lying strewn in every direction. He had his carts unyoked and ranged in a circle so as to form a strong coral; he saw that his men and oxen had their supper early, and that the oxen were made to lie down in the middle with the men round them; and he himself with the leading men of his band stood on guard, sword in hand, through the three watches of the night, waiting for the day to dawn. On the [1.8] morrow at daybreak when he had had his oxen fed and everything needful done, he discarded his own weak carts for stronger ones, and his own common goods for the most costly of the derelict goods. Then he went on to his destination, where he bartered his stock for wares of twice or three times their value, and came back to his own city without losing a single man out of all his company. [1.104]
This story ended, the Teacher said: “Thus it was, layman, that in times past the fatuous came to utter destruction, while those who clave to the truth, escaping from the Amanussas’ hands, reached their goal in safety and came back to their homes again.” And when he had thus linked the two stories together, he, as the Buddha, spoke the following verse for the purposes of this lesson on the Dhamma:

1. “Then some declared the sole, the peerless truth;
   But otherwise the false logicians spake.
   Let him that’s wise from this a lesson take,
   And firmly grasp the sole, the peerless truth.”  {1.105}

Thus did the Fortunate One teach this lesson respecting Dhamma. And he went on to say, “What is called walking by truth, not only bestows the three happy endowments, the six heavens of the realms of sense, and the endowments of the higher Realm of Brahmā, but finally is the giver of Arahatship {1.106}; while what is called walking by untruth entails rebirth in the four states of punishment or in the lowest families of mankind.” Further, the Teacher went on to expound in sixteen ways the Four Truths, at the close of which all those five hundred disciples were established in the Fruit of the First Path.

---

197 These four cardinal truths of Buddhism are as follows: (i) individual existence entails pain; (ii) cravings cause the continuance of individual existence; (iii) with the disappearance of cravings, individual existence also would disappear; and (iv) cravings disappear by following the Noble Eightfold Path pointed out by the Buddha. (See hereon Rhys Davids’ Hibbert Lecture for 1881.)

198 The normal road to the Buddhist ideal after conversion is divided into four successive stages, called the cattāro maggā or ‘four paths.’ The first of these is that trodden by the sotāpanna (one ‘who has entered the stream’ which flows down to the ocean of Nibbāna), who is assured of ultimately reaching his goal but has first to undergo seven more existences none of which can be in a state of suffering; the second path is that trodden by the sakadāgāmī, the disciple whose imperfections have been, so far eradicated that he has only to ‘return’ to a human-form once more before attaining Nibbāna; the third path is that of the anagāmī, the disciple who will ‘not return’ to earth, but will attain the goal from a Brahma realm; whilst the fourth and last is Arahatship, which is Nibbāna. Each of these four stages is further subdivided into two sub-stages, the lower called ‘the path,’ and the higher ‘the fruit.’ (See
Having delivered his lesson and his teaching, and having told the two stories and established the connection linking them together, the Teacher concluded by identifying the Jātaka as follows, “Devadatta was the foolish young merchant of those days; his followers were the followers of that merchant; the followers of the Buddha were the followers of the wise merchant, who was myself.” [1.9]

Ja 2 Vaṭṭāpathajātaka

The Story about the Sandy Waste (1s)

Alternative Title: Vaṇṇupathajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk gives up easily on his quest for insight. He is brought to the Buddha who points out that in an earlier life he had saved a caravan by his perseverance, and he then told the story of a caravan that became lost during the night, and was saved when a young boy followed his master’s orders and struck water.

The Bodhisatta = the caravan elder (satthavāhajāṭṭhaka), the monk who gave up striving = the serving lad (cullūpaṭṭhāka), the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (avasesaparisa).

Keywords: Perseverance, Effort.

“Untiring, deep they dug.” This discourse was delivered by the Fortunate One while he was dwelling at Śāvatthi.

About whom, you ask? About a monk who gave up persevering.

Tradition says that, while the Tathāgata was dwelling at Śāvatthi, there came to Jetavana a scion of a Śāvatthi family, who, on hearing a discourse by the Teacher, realised that sensual desires breed suffering, and was admitted to the first stage of the Sāṅgha, then the higher ordination, and after five years, when he had learned two summaries and had trained himself in the methods of Insight, he obtained from the Teacher a theme for meditation which commended itself to him. Retiring to a forest, he passed there the rainy season; but for all his striving Mahāparinibbānasutta [DN 16] and the commentary thereon of the Sumanāgalavilāsinī.)

[The translator had a note here, full of misunderstandings, which also influenced his wrong interpretation of the text, which I have corrected above.]
during the three months, he could not develop a glimmer or an inkling of Insight. So the thought came to him, “The Teacher said there were four types of men, and I must belong to the lowest of all; in this birth, I think, there is neither Path nor Fruit for me. What good shall I do by living in the forest? I will go back to the Teacher, and live my life beholding the glories of the Buddha’s presence and listening to his sweet teachings.” And back again to Jetavana he came.

Now his friends and intimates said: “Sir, it was you who obtained from the Teacher a theme for meditation and departed to live the solitary life of a sage. Yet here you are back again, going about enjoying fellowship. Can it be that you have won the crown of the monks’ vocation and that you will never know rebirth?” “Sirs, as I won neither Path nor Fruit, I felt myself doomed to futility, and so gave up persevering and came back.” “You have done wrong, sir, in showing a faint heart when you had devoted yourself to the Dhamma of the dauntless Teacher. [1.107] Come, let us bring you to the Tathāgata’s notice.” And they took him with them to the Teacher. [1.10]

When the Teacher became aware of their coming, he said: “Monks, you bring with you this monk against his will. What has he done?” “Sir, after devoting himself to so absolutely true a Dhamma, this monk has given up persevering in the solitary life of a sage, and has come back.”

Then said the Teacher to him, “Is it true, as they say, that you, monk, have given up persevering?” “It is true, Fortunate One.” “But how comes it that, after devoting yourself to such a Dhamma, you, monk, should be the one to show yourself not a man desiring little, contented, solitary, and determined, but a man lacking perseverance? Was it not you who were so stout-hearted in bygone days? Was it not by you single-handed, thanks to your perseverance, that in a sandy desert the men and the oxen belonging to a caravan of five hundred carts got water and were cheered? And how is it that, now, you are giving in?” These words sufficed to give heart to that monk.

Hearing this talk, the monks asked the Fortunate One, saying: “Sir, the present faintheartedness of this monk is clear to us; but hidden from us is the knowledge of how, by the perseverance of this single man, the men and oxen got water in a sandy desert and were cheered. This is known only to you who are omniscient; pray tell us about it.”
“Hearken, then, monks,” said the Fortunate One; and, having excited their attention, he made clear the thing that rebirth had concealed from them.

In the past when Brahmādatta was king of Benares in Kāsi the Bodhisatta was born into a trader’s family. When he was grown up, he used to travel about trading with 500 carts. On one occasion he came to a sandy wilderness sixty leagues across, the sand of which was so fine that, when grasped, it slipped through the fingers of the closed fist. As soon as the sun got up, it grew as hot as a bed of charcoal-embers and nobody could walk upon it. Accordingly, those traversing it used to take firewood, water, oil, rice and so forth on their carts, and only travelled by night. At dawn they used to range their carts in a circle to form a coral, with an awning spread overhead, and after an early meal used to sit in the shade all the day long. When the sun went down, they had their evening meal; and, so soon as the ground became cool, they used to yoke their carts and move forward. Travelling on this desert was like voyaging over the sea; a ‘desert-pilot,’ as he was called, had to convoy them over by knowledge of the stars. And this was the way in which our merchant was now travelling that wilderness.

When he had only some seven more miles before him, he thought to himself, “Tonight will see us out of this sandy wilderness.” So, after they had had their supper, he ordered the wood and water to be thrown away, and yoking his carts, set out on the road. In the front cart sat the pilot upon a couch looking up to the stars in the heavens and directing the course thereby. But so long had he been without sleep that he was tired out and fell asleep, with the result that he did not mark that the oxen had turned round and were retracing their steps. All night the oxen kept on their way, but at dawn the pilot woke up, and, observing the disposition of the stars overhead, shouted out, “Turn the carts round!” And as they turned the carts round and were forming them into line, the day broke. “Why this is where we camped yesterday,” cried the people of the caravan. “All our wood and water is gone, and we are lost.” So saying, they unyoked their carts and made a coral and spread the awning overhead; then each man flung himself down in despair beneath his own cart.

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “If I give in, every single one will perish.” So he ranged to and fro while it was still early and cool, until he came on a clump of kusa grass. “This grass,” he thought, “can only have grown up here thanks to the presence of water underneath.” So he ordered a spade to be brought and a hole to be dug at that spot. Sixty cubits down they dug, till at that depth the spade struck on a rock, and everybody lost heart. But the Bodhisatta, feeling sure there must be water under that rock, descended into the hole and took his stand upon the rock. Stooping down, he applied his ear to it, and listened. Catching the sound of water flowing beneath, he came out and said to a serving lad, “My boy, if you give in, we shall all perish. So take heart and courage. Go down into the hole with this iron sledge-hammer, and strike the rock.”

Obedient to his master’s bidding, the lad, resolute where all others had lost heart, went down and struck the rock. The rock which had dammed the stream, split asunder and fell in. Up rose the water in the hole till it was as high as a palm tree; and everybody drank and bathed. Then they chopped up their spare axles and yokes and other surplus gear, cooked their rice and ate it, and fed their oxen. And as soon as the sun set, they hoisted a flag by the side of the well and travelled on to their destination. There they bartered away their goods for twice and four times their value. With the proceeds they returned to their own home, where they lived out their term of life and in the end passed away to fare thereafter according to their deeds. The Bodhisatta too after a life spent in generosity and other good works, passed away likewise to fare according to his deeds.

When the Supreme Buddha had delivered this discourse, he, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse:

1. “Untiring, deep they dug that sandy track
   Till, in the trodden way, they water found.
   So let the sage, in perseverance strong,
   Flag not nor tire, until his heart find peace.”

This discourse ended, he preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the fainthearted monk was established in the highest fruit of all, which is Arahatship. Having told these two stories, the Teacher established the connection linking them both together, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This fainthearted monk of today was in those days the serving lad who, persevering, broke the rock and gave water to all the people; the Buddha’s followers were the rest of the people of the caravan; and I myself was their leader.”
In the present a monk is about to give up striving. The Buddha tells a story of two merchants, one of whom attempts to cheat a poor family out of its riches, while the other paid a decent price for their golden bowl.\textsuperscript{200}

The Bodhisatta = the wise merchant (panḍitavāṇija), Devadatta = the foolish merchant (bālavāṇija).

Keywords: Honesty, Integrity.

"If in this faith." [1.12] This lesson too was taught by the Fortunate One while at Sāvatthi, also about a monk who gave up persevering.

For, when the man was brought by the monks exactly as in the foregoing case, the Teacher said: “You, monk, who after devoting yourself to this glorious dispensation which bestows Path and Fruit, \{1.111\} are giving up persevering, will suffer long, like the hawker of Seri who lost a golden bowl worth a hundred thousand pieces.”

The monks asked the Fortunate One to explain this to them. The Fortunate One made clear this thing concealed from them by rebirth.

In the past in the kingdom of Seri, five aeons ago, the Bodhisatta dealt in pots and pans, and was called ‘the Serivā.’ In the company of another dealer in the same wares, a greedy fellow who was also known as ‘the Serivā,’ he came across the river Telavāha and entered the city of Andhapura. Apportioning the streets between the two of them, he set about hawking his wares round the streets of his district, and the other did the same in his district.

Now in that city there was a family who had fallen on hard times. Once they had been rich merchants, but by the time of our story they had lost all the sons and brothers and all their wealth. The sole survivors were a girl and her grandmother, and they got their living by working for hire. Nevertheless, they had got in their house a golden bowl out of which in the old days the great merchant, the head of the family, used to eat; but it had been thrown among the pots and pans, and having been long out of use, was grimed over with dirt, so that the two women did not know that it was gold. To the door of their house came the greedy hawker on his round, crying, “Waterpots to sell! Waterpots to sell!” And the damsel, when she knew he was there, said to her grandmother, “Oh, do buy me a trinket, grandmother.”

\textsuperscript{200} [The moral, it seems, doesn’t quite fit, as the foolish merchant didn’t give up, but was simply too greedy to take immediate advantage of the situation.]
The Section with One Verse – 155

“We’re very poor, dear; what can we offer in exchange for it?” “Why here’s this bowl which is no good to us. Let us change that for it.”

The old woman had the hawker brought in and seated, and gave him the bowl, saying: “Take this, sir, and be so good as to give your sister something or other in exchange.”

The hawker took the bowl in his hand, turned it over, and, suspecting it was gold, scratched a line on the back of it with a needle, whereby he knew for certain that it was real gold. Then, thinking that he would get the pot without giving anything whatsoever for it to the women, he cried, “What’s the value of this, pray? Why it isn’t worth half a farthing!” And therewithal he threw the bowl on the ground, rose up from his seat, and left the house.

Now, as it had been agreed between the two hawkers that the one might try the streets which the other had already been into, the Bodhisatta came into that same street and appeared at the door of the house, crying, “Waterpots to sell!” Once again the damsel made the same request of her grandmother; and the old woman, replied, “My dear, the first hawker threw our bowl on the ground and stormed out of the house. What have we got left to offer now?”

“Oh, but that hawker was a harsh-spoken man, grandmother dear; while this one looks a nice man and speaks kindly. Very likely he would take it.” “Call him in then.” So he came into the house, and they gave him a seat and put the bowl into his hands. Seeing that the bowl was gold, he said: “Mother, this bowl is worth a hundred thousand pieces; I haven’t its value with me.”

“Sir, the first hawker who came here said that it was not worth half a farthing; so he threw it to the ground and went away. It must have been the efficacy of your own goodness which has turned the bowl into gold. Take it; give us something or other for it; and go your way.” At the time the Bodhisatta had 500 pieces of money and a stock worth as much more. The whole of this he gave to them, saying: “Let me retain my scales, my bag, and eight pieces of money.” And with their consent he took these with him, and departed with all speed to the riverside where he gave his eight coins to the boatman and jumped into the boat. Subsequently that greedy hawker had come back to the house, and had asked them to bring out their bowl, saying he would give them something or other for it. But the old woman flew out at him with these words, “You made out that our golden bowl which is worth a hundred thousand pieces was not worth even a half-farthing. But there came an upright hawker – your master, I take it – who gave us a thousand pieces for it and took the bowl away.”

Hereupon he exclaimed, “He has robbed me of a golden bowl worth a full hundred thousand pieces; he has caused me a terrible loss.” And intense sorrow came upon him, so that he lost command over himself and became like one distraught. [1.113] His money and goods he flung away at the door of the house; he threw off his upper and under cloths; and, armed with the beam of his scales as a club, he tracked the Bodhisatta down to the riverside. Finding the latter already crossing, he shouted to the boatman to put back, but the Bodhisatta told him not to do so. As the other stood there gazing and gazing at the retreating Bodhisatta, intense sorrow seized upon him, his heart grew hot; blood gushed from his lips; [1.14] and his heart cracked like the mud at the bottom of a tank, which the sun has dried up. Through the hatred which he had contracted against the Bodhisatta, he perished then and there – this was the first time Devadatta conceived a grudge against the Bodhisatta. The Bodhisatta, after a life spent in generosity and other good works, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When the Supreme Buddha had ended this lesson, he, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse:
1. “If in this faith you prove remiss, and fail
To win the goal whereto its teachings lead,
– Then, like the hawker called ‘the Serivā,’ Full long you’ll rue the prize your folly lost.”

After having thus delivered his discourse in such a way as to lead up to Arahatship, the Teacher expounded the Four Truths, at the close whereof the fainthearted monk was established in that highest fruit of all, which is Arahatship. And, after telling the two stories, the Teacher made the connection linking them both together, and identified the Jātaka by saying in conclusion, “In those days Devadatta was the foolish hawker; and I myself was the wise and good hawker.”

Ja 4 Cullakaseṭṭhijātaka

The Story about the Little Merchant (1s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷakaseṭṭhijātaka (Cst)

In the present the story is told of Mahāpanthaka and his brother, Cullapanthaka. The former, gaining faith, attained easily, while the latter struggled till he was directly guided by the Buddha himself. The Buddha then tells a story showing how, in a previous life, Cullapanthaka had taken his advice and become rich beyond measure.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man Cullaka (Cullakaseṭṭhi), Cullapanthaka = his little pupil (cullantevāsika).

Present Compare: Dhp-a II.3 Cullapanthatthera.

Keywords: Perseverance, Amenability.

201 The commentary here gives the rascal’s name as ‘Serivā,’ not recognising that the gāthā-word ‘Serivāyam’ represents the ‘sandhi’ of Serivo (not Serivā) with ayaṁ, just as dukkhāyam on p. 168 of Vol. i. of the text represents dukkho ayaṁ. [It seems the name really should be interpreted as Serivā.]

202 Compare Chapter xxxv of the Divyāvadāna, edited by Cowell and Neil, 1886. The whole Jātaka, in an abbreviated form, forms the story of ‘The Mouse Merchant’ at pages 33, 34 of the first volume of Tawney’s translation of the Kathāsaritsāgara. See also Kalilah and Dimnah, Chapter xviii. (Knatchbull, page 358).
“With humblest start.” [1.114] This story was told by the Teacher about the elder named Cullapanthaka, while in Jivaka’s Mango-grove near Rājagaha. And here an account of Cullapanthaka’s birth must be given. Tradition tells us that the daughter of a rich merchant’s family in Rājagaha actually stooped to intimacy with a slave. Becoming alarmed lest her misconduct should get known, she said to the slave, “We can’t live on here; for if my mother and father come to know of this wrong of ours, they will tear us limb from limb. Let us go and live afar off.” So with their belongings in their hands they stole together out by the hardly-opened door, and fled away, they cared not whither, to find a shelter beyond the ken of her family. Then they went and lived together in a certain place, with the result that she conceived. And when her full time was nearly come, she told her husband and said: “If I am taken in labour away from kith and kin, that will be a trouble to both of us. So let us go home.”

First he [1.15] agreed to start today, and then he put it off till the morrow; and so he let the days slip by, till she thought to herself, “This fool is so conscious of his great offence that he dares not go. One’s parents are one’s best friends; so whether he goes or stays, I must go.” So, when he went out, she put all her household matters in order and set off home, telling her next-door neighbour where she was going. Returning home, and not finding his wife, but discovering from the neighbours that she had started off from home, he hurried after her and came up with her on the road; and then and there she was taken in labour.

“What’s this, my dear?” said he.

“I have given birth to a son, my husband,” said she.

Accordingly, as the very thing had now happened which was the only reason for the journey, they both agreed that it was no good going on now, and so turned back again. And as their child had been born by the way, they called him ‘Panthaka.’ [1.115]

---

203 Jivaka, a prominent lay-follower of the Buddha, was physician to the Magadha king Seniya Bimbisāra. See, for his history, the account in the Vinaya (Mahāvagga viii. 1).

204 [It was expected that the wife would return to her parents to give birth in those days, as we witness Mahāmāyā trying to do, before the birth of Siddhattha.]
Not long after, she was with child again, and everything fell out as before. And as this second child too was born by the way, they called him ‘Panthaka’ too, distinguishing the elder as Mahāpanthaka and the younger as Cullapanthaka. Then, with both their children, they again went back to their own home.

Now, as they were living there, their way-child heard other boys talking of their uncles and grandfathers and grandmothers; so he asked his mother whether he hadn’t got relations like the other boys. “Oh yes, my dear,” said his mother, “but they don’t live here. Your grandfather is a wealthy merchant in the city of Rājagaha, and you have plenty of relations there.” “Why don’t we go there, mother?” She told the boy the reason why they stayed away; but, as the children kept on speaking about these relations, she said to her husband, “The children are always plaguing me. Are my parents going to eat us at sight? Come, let us show the children their grandfather’s family.” “Well, I don’t mind taking them there; but I really could not face your parents.” “All right, so long as, some way or other, the children come to see their grandfather’s family,” said she.

So those two took their children and coming in due course to Rājagaha put up in a public rest-house by the city gate. Then, taking with them the two children, the woman caused their coming to be made known to her parents. The latter, on hearing the message, returned this answer, “True, it is strange to be without children unless one has renounced the world in quest of Arahatship. Still, so great is the guilt of the pair towards us that they may not stand in our sight. Here is a sum of money for them: let them take this and retire to live where they will. But the children they may send here.” Then the merchant’s daughter took the money so sent her, and dispatched the children by the messengers. So the children grew up in their grandfather’s house – Cullapanthaka being of tender years, while Mahāpanthaka used to go with his grandfather to hear the One with Ten Powers preach the Dhamma. And by constant hearing of the Dhamma from the Teacher’s own lips, the lad’s heart yearned to renounce the world for the life of a monk.

“With your permission,” said he to his grandfather, “I should like to join the Saṅgha.” “What do I hear?” cried the old man. “Why, it would give me greater joy to see you join the Saṅgha than to see the whole world join. Become a monk, if you feel able.” And he took him to the Teacher.

“Well, merchant,” said the Teacher, “have you brought your boy with you?” “Yes sir, this is my grandson, who wishes to join your Saṅgha.” {1.116} Then the Teacher sent for a monk, and told him to admit the lad to the Saṅgha; and the monk repeated the Formula of the Perishable Body and admitted the lad as a novice. When the latter had learned by heart many words of the Buddha, and was old enough, he was admitted as a full monk. He now gave himself up to earnest thought till he became an Arahant; and as he passed his days in the enjoyment of Absorption and the paths, he thought whether he could not impart the like happiness to Cullapanthaka. So he went to his grandfather the merchant, and said: “Great merchant, with your consent, I will admit Cullapanthaka to the Saṅgha.” “Pray do so, venerable sir,” was the reply.

Then the elder admitted the lad Cullapanthaka and established him in the Ten Precepts. But Cullapanthaka proved a dullard: with four months’ study he failed to get by heart this single verse:

“Lo! Like a fragrant lotus at the dawn
Of day, full-blown, with virgin wealth of scent,
Behold the Buddha’s glory shining forth,
As in the vaulted heaven beams the sun!”

For, we are told, in the Buddhahood of Kassapa this Cullapanthaka, having himself attained to knowledge as a monk, laughed to scorn a dull monk who was learning a passage by heart. His scorn so confused the dull monk, that the latter could not learn or recite the passage. And now, in consequence, on joining the Saṅgha he himself proved a dullard. Each new line he learned drove the last out of his memory; and four months slipped away while he was struggling with this single verse. Said his elder brother to him, “Panthaka, you are not equal to receiving this dispensation. In four whole months you have been unable to learn a single verse. How then can you hope to crown your vocation with supreme success? Leave the monastery.” But, though thus expelled by his brother, 205 Buddhism teaches the impermanence of things, and chief of the trains of thought for realising this doctrine is the meditation on the body and its 32 parts (see Suttanipāta 1.11, and the 12th Jātaka infra). At the present day every novice in Ceylon, when invested with the yellow robe of the Saṅgha, repeats the verses which enumerate the 32 impurities.

---

Cullapanthaka was so attached to the Buddha’s dispensation that he did not want to become a layman.

Now at that time Mahāpanthaka was acting as steward. And Jivaka Komārabhacca, going to his mango-grove with a large present of perfumes and flowers for the Teacher, had presented his offering and listened to a discourse; then, rising from his seat and bowing to the One with Ten Powers, he went up to Mahāpanthaka and asked, “How many monks are there, venerable sir, with the Teacher?” “Just 500, sir.” “Will you bring the 500 monks, with the Buddha at their head, to take their meal at my house tomorrow?” “Lay disciple, one of them named Cullapanthaka is a dullard and makes no progress in the Faith,” said the elder, “I accept the invitation for everyone but him.” {1.117}

Hearing this, Cullapanthaka thought to himself, “In accepting the invitation for all these monks, the elder carefully accepts so as to exclude me. This proves that my brother’s affection for me is dead. What have I to do with this dispensation? I will become a layman and live in the exercise of generosity and other good works of a lay person.” And on the morrow early he went forth, avowedly to become a layman again.

Now at the first break of day, as he was surveying the world, the Teacher became aware of this; and going forth even earlier than Cullapanthaka, he paced to and fro by the porch on Cullapanthaka’s road. As the latter came out of the house, he observed the Teacher, and with a salutation went up to him. “Whither away at this hour, Cullapanthaka?” said the Teacher.

“My brother has expelled me from the Saṅgha, sir; and I am going to wander forth.”

“Cullapanthaka, as it was under me that you took the vows, why did you not, when expelled by your brother, come to me? Come, what have you to do with a layman’s life? You shall stay with me.” So saying, he took Cullapanthaka and seated him at the door of his own perfumed chamber. Then giving him a perfectly clean cloth which he had made by his Supernormal Powers, the Teacher said: “Face towards the east, and as you handle this cloth, repeat these words – ‘Removal of Impurity; Removal of Impurity.’ ” Then at the time appointed the Teacher, attended by the Saṅgha, went to Jivaka’s house and sat down on the seat set for him. [1.17]
Now Cullapanthaka, with his gaze fixed on the sun, sat handling the cloth and repeating the words, “Removal of Impurity; Removal of Impurity.” And as he kept handling the piece of cloth, it grew soiled. Then he thought: “Just now this piece of cloth was quite clean; but I have destroyed its original state and made it dirty. Impermanent indeed are all compounded things! And even as he realised Death and Decay, he won the Arahat’s Awakening. Knowing that Cullapanthaka’s mind had won Awakening, the Teacher sent forth an apparition and in this semblance of himself appeared before him, as if seated in front of him and saying: “Heed it not, Cullapanthaka, that this mere piece of cloth has become dirty and stained with impurity; within you are the impurities of lust and other evil things. Remove them.” And the apparition uttered these verses:

“Impurity in lust consists, not dirt;
And lust we term the real impurity.
Yea, monks, whoso drives it from his breast,
They live in the stainless dispensation. [1.118]

Impurity in wrath consists, not dirt;
And wrath we term the real impurity.
Yea, monks, whoso drives it from his breast,
They live in the stainless dispensation.

Delusion is impurity, not dirt;
We term delusion real impurity.
Yea, monks, whoso drives it from his breast,
They live in the stainless dispensation.”

At the close of these verses Cullapanthaka attained to Arahatship with the four analytic knowledges, whereby he straightaway came to have analytic knowledge of all the sacred texts.

[These verses seem to be first quoted in the Mahāniddesa and Cullaniddesa, and then frequently throughout the commentarial system.]

These four branches were (i) understanding of the sense of the sacred books, (ii) understanding of their ethical truth, (iii) ability to justify an interpretation grammatically, logically & so on, and (iv) the power of public exposition.
Tradition has it that, in ages past, when he was a king and was making a solemn procession round his city, he wiped the sweat from his brow with a spotless cloth which he was wearing; and the cloth was stained. He thought: “It is this body of mine which has destroyed the original purity and whiteness of the cloth, and dirtied it. Impermanent indeed are all composite things.” Thus he grasped the idea of impermanence; and hence it came to pass that it was the removal of impurity which worked his emancipation.

Meantime, Jīvaka Komārabhacca offered the Water of Donation; but the One with Ten Powers put his hand over the vessel, saying: “Are there no monks, Jīvaka, in the monastery?”

Said Mahāpanthaka, “There are no monks there, venerable sir.” “Oh yes, there are, Jīvaka,” said the Teacher. “Hi, there!” said Jīvaka to a servant, “just you go and see whether or not there are any monks in the monastery.”

At that moment Cullapanthaka, conscious as he was that his brother was declaring there were no monks in the monastery, determined to show him there were, and so filled the whole mango-grove with nothing but monks. Some were making robes, others dyeing, while others again were repeating the sacred texts: each of a thousand monks he made unlike all the others. Finding this host of monks in the monastery, the man returned and said that the whole mango-grove was full of monks.

But as regards the elder up in the monastery –

“Panthaka, a thousand-fold self-multiplied,
Sat on, till bidden, in that pleasant grove.” [1.18]

“Now go back,” said the Teacher to the man, “and say ‘The Teacher sends for him whose name is Cullapanthaka.’ ”

---

208 When a gift was made, the donor poured water over the hand of the donee. The gift that was here made by Jīvaka was the food bestowed on the monastics, as the Milindapañha explains (p. 118) in its version of this story.
But when the man went and delivered his message, a thousand mouths answered, “I am Cullapanthaka! I am Cullapanthaka!”

Back came the man with the report, “They all say they are ‘Cullapanthaka,’ venerable sir.”

“Well now go back,” said the Teacher, “and take by the hand the first one of them who says he is Cullapanthaka, and the others will all vanish.” The man did as he was bidden, and straightaway the thousand monks vanished from sight. The elder came back with the man.

When the meal was over, the Teacher said: “Jīvaka, take Cullapanthaka’s bowl; he will return thanks.” Jivaka did so. Then like a young lion roaring defiance, the elder ranged over the whole of the sacred texts through in his address of thanks. Lastly, the Teacher rose from his seat and attended by the Saṅgha returned to the monastery, and there, after the assignment of tasks by the Saṅgha, he rose from his seat and, standing in the doorway of his perfumed chamber, delivered a Sugata’s discourse to the Saṅgha. Ending with a theme which he gave out for meditation, and dismissing the Saṅgha, he retired into his perfumed chamber, and lay down lion-like on his right side to rest.

At evening, the orange-robed monks assembled together from all sides in the Dhamma Hall and sang the Teacher’s praises, even as though they were spreading a curtain of orange cloth round him as they sat.

“Monks,” it was said: “Mahāpanthaka failed to recognise the bent of Cullapanthaka, and expelled him from the monastery as a dullard who could not even learn a single verse in four whole months. But the All-Knowing Buddha by his supremacy in the Dhamma bestowed on him Arahatship with all its supernatural knowledge, even while a single meal was in progress. And by that knowledge he grasped the whole of the sacred texts. Oh! How great is a Buddha’s power!”

Now the Fortunate One, knowing full well the talk that was going on in the Dhamma Hall, thought it good to go there. So, rising from his Buddha-couch, he donned his two orange robes, girded himself as with lightning, arrayed himself in his upper robe, the ample robe of a Buddha, and came forth to the Dhamma Hall with the infinite grace of a Buddha, moving with the royal gait of an elephant in the plenitude of his vigour. Ascending the glorious Buddha-throne set in the midst of the resplendent hall, he seated himself upon the middle of the throne emitting those six-coloured rays which mark a Buddha – like the newly-arisen sun, when from the peaks of the Yugandhara Mountains he illumines the depths of the ocean. Immediately the Buddha came into the Hall, the Saṅgha broke off their talk and were silent. Gazing round on the company with gentle loving-kindness, the Teacher thought within himself, “This company is perfect! Not a man is guilty of moving a hand or foot improperly; not a sound, not a cough or sneeze is to be heard! In their reverence and awe of the majesty and glory of the Buddha, not a man would dare to speak before I did, even if I sat here in silence all my life long. But it is my part to begin; and I will open the conversation.” Then in his sweet divine tones he addressed the monks and said, {1.120} “What, pray, is theme of this conclave? And what was the talk which was broken off?”

“Sir,” they said, “it was no profitless theme, but your own praises that we were telling here in a meeting.”

And when they had told him word for word what they had been saying, the Teacher said: “Monks, through me Cullapanthaka has just now risen to great things in the Dhamma; in times past it was to great things in the way of wealth that he rose – but equally through me.”

The monks asked the Teacher to explain this; and the Fortunate One made clear in these words a thing which succeeding existences had hidden from them: [1.19]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares in Kāsi, the Bodhisatta was born into the Treasurer’s family, and growing up, was made Treasurer, being called Cullakaseṭṭhi. A wise and clever man was he, with a keen eye for signs and omens. One day on his way to wait upon the king, he came on a dead mouse lying on the road; and, taking note of the position of the stars at that moment, he said: “Any decent young fellow with his wits about him has only to pick that mouse up, and he might start a business and keep a wife.”

His words were overheard by a young man of good family but reduced circumstances, who said to himself, “That’s a man who has always got a reason for what he says.” And accordingly he picked up the mouse, which he sold for a farthing at a tavern to feed their cat.
With the farthing he got molasses and took drinking water in a waterpot. Coming on flower-gatherers returning from the forest, he gave each a tiny quantity of the molasses and ladled the water out to them. Each of them gave him a handful of flowers, with the proceeds of which, next day, he came back again to the flower grounds provided with more molasses and a pot of water. That day the flower-gatherers, before they went, gave him flowering plants with half the flowers left on them; and thus in a little while he obtained eight pennies.

Later, one rainy and windy day, the wind blew down a quantity of rotten branches and boughs and leaves in the king’s pleasure gardens, and the gardener did not see how to clear them away. (1.121) Then up came the young man with an offer to remove the lot, if the wood and leaves might be his. The gardener closed with the offer on the spot. Then this apt pupil of Cullakaseṭṭhi repaired to the children’s playground and in a very little while had got them by bribes of molasses to collect every stick and leaf in the place into a heap at the entrance to the pleasure gardens. Just then the king’s potter was on the look out for fuel to fire bowls for the palace, and coming on this heap, took the lot off his hands. The sale of his wood brought in sixteen pennies to this pupil of Cullakaseṭṭhi, as well as five bowls and other vessels.

Having now twenty-four pennies in all, a plan occurred to him. He went to the vicinity of the city-gate with a jar full of water and supplied 500 mowers with water to drink. They said: “You’ve done us a good turn, friend. What can we do for you?” “Oh, I’ll tell you when I want your aid,” said he; and as he went about, he struck up an intimacy with a land-trader and a sea-trader. Said the former to him, “Tomorrow there will come to town a horse-dealer with 500 horses to sell.” On hearing this piece of news, he said to the mowers, “I want each of you today to give me a bundle of grass and not to sell your own grass till mine is sold.” “Certainly,” they said, and delivered the 500 bundles of grass at his house. Unable to get grass for his horses elsewhere, the dealer purchased our friend’s grass for a thousand pieces. [1.20]

Only a few days later his sea-trading friend brought him news of the arrival of a large ship in port; and another plan struck him. He hired for eight pence a well appointed carriage which plied for hire by the hour, and went in great style down to the port. Having bought the ship on credit and deposited his signet-ring as security, he had a pavilion pitched nearby and said to his people as he took his seat inside, “When merchants are being shown in, let them be passed on by three successive ushers into my presence.” \{1.122\} Hearing that a ship had arrived in port, about a hundred merchants came down to buy the cargo; only to be told that they could not have it as a great merchant had already made a payment on account. So away they all went to the young man; and the footmen duly announced them by three successive ushers, as had been arranged beforehand. Each man of the hundred severally gave him a thousand pieces to buy a share in the ship and then a further thousand each to buy him out altogether. So it was with 200,000 pieces that this pupil of Cullakaseṭṭhi returned to Benares.
The Section with One Verse – 167

Actuated by a desire to show his gratitude, he went with one hundred thousand pieces to call on Cullakaseṭṭhi. “How did you come by all this wealth?” asked the Treasurer. “In four short months, simply by following your advice,” replied the young man; and he told him the whole story, starting with the dead mouse.

Thought the Lord High Treasurer Cullakaseṭṭhi, on hearing all this, “I must see that a young fellow of these parts does not fall into anybody else’s hands.” So he married him to his own grown-up daughter and settled all the family estates on the young man. And at the Treasurer’s death, he became Treasurer in that city. And the Bodhisatta passed away to fare according to his deeds. \{1.123\}

His lesson ended, the Supreme Buddha, after Fully Awakening, repeated this verse:

1. “With humbliest start and trifling capital
   A shrewd and able man will rise to wealth,
   E’en as his breath can nurse a tiny flame.”

Also the Fortunate One said: “It is through me, monks, that Cullapanthaka has just now risen to great things in the Faith, as in times past to great things in the way of wealth.” His lesson thus finished, the Teacher made the connection between the two stories he had told and identified the Jātaka in these concluding words, “Cullapanthaka was in those days the pupil of Cullakaseṭṭhi, and I myself the Lord High Treasurer.”

Ja 5 Taṇḍulanālijātaka

The Story about the Measure of Rice (1s)

Alternative Title: Taṇḍulanālijātaka (Cst)
In the present a foolish monk manages to become steward for the Saṅgha, but doesn’t understand how to properly value the distribution. The Buddha shows how he was also a fool in the past by telling the story of a valuer who was easily bribed into giving wrong prices.

The Bodhisatta = the wise valuer (paṇḍita-agghāpanika), Lāludāyī = the foolish village valuer (gāmikabāla-agghāpanika).

Keywords: Honesty, Truth.

“Do you ask how much a peck of rice is worth?” [1.21] This was told by the Teacher, while at Jetavana, about the elder Udāyi, called the Dullard.

At that time the venerable Dabba, the Mallian, was steward to the Saṅgha.209 When in the early morning Dabba was allotting the checks for rice, sometimes it was choice rice and sometimes it was an inferior quality which fell to the share of the elder Udāyi. On days when he received the inferior quality, he used to make a commotion in the check-room, by demanding, “Is Dabba the only one who knows how to give out checks? Don’t we know?” One day when he was making a commotion, they handed him the check-basket, saying: “Here! You give the checks out yourself today!” Thenceforth, it was Udāyi who gave out the checks to the Saṅgha. But, in his distribution, he could not tell the best from the inferior rice; nor did he know what seniority210 was entitled to the best rice and what to the inferior. So too, when he was making out the roster, he had not an idea of the seniority of the monks thereon. Consequently, when the monks took up their places, he made a mark on the ground or on the wall to show that one detachment stood here, and another there. Next day there were fewer monks of one grade and more of another in the check-room; where there were fewer, the mark was too low down; where the number was greater, it was too high up. But Udāyi, quite ignorant of detachments, gave out the checks simply according to his old marks.

Hence, the monks said to him, “Friend Udāyi, the mark is too high up or too low down; the best rice is for those of such and such a seniority, and the inferior 209 See Vinaya, Vol. iii. p. 158.

210 Compare Vinaya, Vol. ii. p. 167, and commentary thereon (Sāmantapāsādikā) for the right of seniors, according to the roster, to be served first. The steward was to call out the roster.
quality for such and such others.” But he put them back with the argument, “If this mark is where it is, what are you standing here for? Why am I to trust you? It’s my mark I trust.”

Then, the boys and novices thrust him from the check-room, crying, “Friend Udāyi the Dullard, when you give out the checks, the monks are docked of what they ought to get; you’re not fit to give them out; get you gone from here.” Hereupon, a great uproar arose in the check-room.

Hearing the noise, the Teacher asked the elder Ānanda, saying: “Ānanda, there is a great uproar in the check-room. What is the noise about?”

The elder explained it all to the Tathāgata. “Ānanda,” said he, “this is not the only time when Udāyi by his stupidity has robbed others of their profit; he did just the same thing in bygone times too.”

The elder asked the Fortunate One for an explanation, and the Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed by rebirth.

In the past Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares in Kāsi. In those days our Bodhisatta was his valuer. He used to value horses, elephants, and the like; and jewels, gold, and the like; and he used to pay over to the owners of the goods the proper price, as he fixed it. [1.22]

But the king was greedy and his greed suggested to him this thought: “This valuer with his style of valuing will soon exhaust all the riches in my house; I must get another valuer.” Opening his window and looking out into his courtyard, he espied walking across a stupid, greedy person in whom he saw a likely candidate for the post. So the king had the man sent for, and asked him whether he could do the work. “Oh yes,” said the man; and so, to safeguard the royal treasure, this stupid fellow was appointed valuer. After this the fool, in valuing elephants and horses and the like, used to fix a price dictated by his own fancy, neglecting their true worth; but, as he was valuer, the price was what he said and no other.
At that time there arrived from the north country a horse-dealer with 500 horses. The king sent for his new valuer and bade him value the horses. And the price he set on the whole 500 horses was just one measure of rice, which he ordered to be paid over to the dealer, directing the horses to be led off to the stable. [1.125] Away went the horse-dealer to the old valuer, to whom he told what had happened, and asked what was to be done. “Give him a bribe,” said the ex-valuer, “and put this point to him: ‘Knowing as we do that our horses are worth just a single measure of rice, we are curious to learn from you what the precise value of a measure of rice is; could you state its value in the king’s presence?’ If he says he can, then take him before the king; and I too will be there.”

Readily following the Bodhisatta’s advice, the horse-dealer bribed the man and put the question to him. The other, having expressed his ability to value a measure of rice, was promptly taken to the palace, whither also went the Bodhisatta and many other ministers. With due obeisance the horse-dealer said: “Sire, I do not dispute it that the price of 500 horses is a single measure of rice; but I would ask your majesty to question your valuer as to the value of that measure of rice.” Ignorant of what had passed, the king said to the fellow, “Valuer, what are 500 horses worth?” “A measure of rice, sire,” was the reply. “Very good, my friend; if 500 horses then are worth one measure of rice, what is that measure of rice worth?” “It is worth all Benares and its suburbs,” was the fool’s reply.

(Thus we learn that, having first valued the horses at a measure of hill-paddy to please the king, he was bribed by the horse-dealer to estimate that measure of rice at the worth of all Benares and its suburbs. And that though the walls of Benares were twelve leagues round by themselves, while the city and suburbs together were three hundred leagues round! Yet the fool priced all this vast city and its suburbs at a single measure of rice!) [1.126]

Hereupon the ministers clapped their hands and laughed merrily. “We used to think,” they said in scorn, “that the earth and the realm were beyond price; but

---

211 In the Ceylon R.A.S.J. 1884, p. 127, it is argued from the indefinite use of uttarāpatha for all countries north of Benares that the date of writing must be before the 3rd century B.C., when Buddhistic embassies were sent to Mysore and North Canara and when the Dakṣināpatha was familiar.
now we learn that the kingdom of Benares together with its king is only worth a single measure of rice! What talents the valuer has! How has he retained his post so long? But truly the valuer suits our king admirably.”

Then the Bodhisatta repeated this verse: 212

1. “Do you ask how much a peck of rice is worth?
   Why, all Benares, both within and out.
   Yet, strange to tell, five hundred horses too
   Are worth precisely this same peck of rice!”

Thus put to open shame, the king sent the fool packing, and gave the Bodhisatta the office again. And when his life closed, the Bodhisatta passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended and the two stories told, the Teacher made the connection linking both together, and identified the Jātaka by saying in conclusion, “Udāyi the Dullard was the stupid rustic valuer of those days, and I myself the wise valuer.”

Ja 6 Devadhammajātaka
The Story about Righteousness (1s)

In the present a rich man ordains in the Saṅgha, and makes sure he has all provisions for his life. The Buddha tells a story of three princes who go to the forest together, awaiting their father’s passing. While there a Water Rakkhasa captures two of the brothers when they cannot explain what is truly godlike. The Bodhisatta explains it well though, and the brothers are released.

The Bodhisatta = the elder brother, prince Mahisāsa (jeṭṭhabhātā mahisāsakumāra), Ānanda = prince Suriya (Sūriyakumāra), Sāriputta = prince Canda (Candakumāra), the wealthy monk = Water Rakkhasa (Dakarakkhasa).

212 The text of this verse does not occur in Fausböll’s Pāli text, but is given by Léon Feer at page 520 of the Journal Asiatique for 1876 and is embodied in the ‘Corrections and Additions’ of Fausböll. That the verse originally formed part of the Sinhalese recension is shown by the quotation of the opening words as the ‘catchword’ at the Commencement of the Jātaka. See also Dickson in Ceylon Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1884, p. 185.
Present and Past Compare: Dhp-a X.8 Bahubhanḍikabhikkhu.

Keywords: Faithfulness, Righteousness, Devas.

“Those only godlike call.” This story was told by the Fortunate One while at Jetavana, about a wealthy monk.

Tradition tells us that, on the death of his wife, a householder of Sāvatthi joined the Saṅgha. When he was joining, he caused to be built for himself a chamber to live in, a room for the fire, and a store-room; and not till he had stocked his store-room with ghee, rice, and the like, did he finally join. Even after he had become a monk, he used to send for his servants and make them cook him what he liked to eat. He was richly provided with the requisites, having an entire change of clothing for night and another for day; and he dwelt aloof on the outskirts of the monastery. [1.24]

One day when he had taken out his cloths and bedding and had spread them out to dry in his chamber, a number of monks from the country, who were on a pilgrimage from monastery to monastery, came in their journeying to his cell and found all these belongings.

“Whose are these?” they asked. “Mine, sirs,” he replied. “What, sir?” they cried, “this upper-cloth and that as well; this under-robe as well as that; and that bedding too, is it all yours?” “Yes, nobody’s but mine,” “Sir,” they said, “the Fortunate One has only sanctioned three cloths; and yet, though the Buddha, to whose dispensation you have devoted yourself, is so simple in his wants, you forsooth have amassed all this stock of requisites. Come! We must take you before the One with Ten Powers.” And, so saying, they went off with him to the Teacher.

Becoming aware of their presence, the Teacher said, [1.127] “Wherefore is it, monks, that you have brought this monk against his will?” “Sir, this monk is well-off and has quite a stock of requisites.” “Is it true, monk, as they say, that you are

---

213 i.e. an alms-bowl, three cloths, a girdle, a razor, a needle and a water-strainer.
214 I take this to be the meaning of senāsanacārikā, in contradistinction to the ordinary cārikā in which the destination was uncertain and in which alms were received from the laity.
so well-off?” “Yes, Fortunate One.” “But why, monk, have you amassed these belongings? Do not I extol the virtues of wanting little, contentment, and so forth, solitude, and determined resolve?”

Angered by the Teacher’s words, he cried, “Then I’ll go about like this!” And, flinging off his outer clothing, he stood in their midst clad only in his waist-cloth.

Then, as a moral support to him, the Teacher said: “Was it not you, monk, who in bygone days were a seeker after the shamefacedness that fears wrong, and even when you were a Water Rakkhasa lived for twelve years seeking after that shamefacedness? How then comes it that, after vowing to follow the weighty dispensation of the Buddha, you have flung off your outer robes and stand here devoid of shame?”

At the Teacher’s word, his sense of shame was restored; he donned his robes again, and, saluting the Teacher, seated himself at the side.

The monks having asked the Fortunate One to explain to them the matter he had mentioned, the Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed from them by rebirth.

In the past Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares in Kāsi. The Bodhisatta, having come to birth in those days as the king’s son by the queen, was duly named prince Mahiṁsāsa. By the time he could run about, a second son was born to the king, and the name they gave this child was Candakumāra [prince Moon]; but by the time he could run about, the Bodhisatta’s mother died. Then the king took another queen, who was his joy and delight; and their love was crowned with the birth of yet another prince, whom they named Sūriyakumāra [prince Sun]. In his joy at the birth of the boy, the king promised to grant her any boon she might ask on the child’s behalf. But the queen treasured up the promise to be fulfilled at her own good time hereafter. Later, when her son had grown up, she said to the king, “Sire, when my boy was born, you granted me a boon to ask for him. Let him be king.”

“Nay,” said the king, “two sons have I, radiant as flaming fires; I cannot give the kingdom to your son.” But when he saw that, undaunted by this refusal, the queen kept plaguing him time after time, to grant her request, the king, fearing lest the woman should plot evil against his sons, sent for them and said: “My children, when Sūriyakumāra was born, I granted a boon; and now his mother wants the kingdom for him. I have no wish to give him the kingdom; but women are naturally wicked, and she will be plotting evil against you. You had better retire to the forest, to return at my death to rule in the city which belongs by right to our house.” So saying, with tears and lamentations, the king kissed his two sons on the head and sent them forth.

As the princes were leaving the palace after their adieux to their father, who should see them but Sūriyakumāra himself, who was playing in the courtyard? And no sooner did he learn what was the matter than he made up his mind to go with his brothers. So he too went off in their company.

The three came to the region of the Himālayas; and here the Bodhisatta, who had turned aside from the road and was sitting at the foot of a tree, said to Sūriyakumāra, “Run down to the pool yonder, Sūriya dear; drink and bathere; and then bring us too some water back in a lotus-leaf.”

(Now that pool had been delivered over to a certain Water Rakkhasa by Vessavaṇa, who said to him, “With the exception of such as know what is truly god-like, all that go down into this pool are yours to devour. Over those that do not enter the waters, you have no power granted to you.” And thenceforth the Water Rakkhasa used to ask all who went down into the pool what was truly godlike, devouring everyone who did not know.)

Now it was into this pool that Sūriyakumāra went down, quite unsuspiciously, with the result that he was seized by the Water Rakkhasa, who said to him, “Do you know what is truly godlike?” “O yes,” said he, “the sun and moon.” “You don’t know,” said the monster, and hauling the prince down into the depths of the water, imprisoned him there in his own abode. Finding that his brother was a long time gone, the Bodhisatta sent Candakumāra. He too was seized by the Water Rakkhasa and asked whether he knew what was truly godlike. “Oh yes, I know,”

---

215 This is another name for Kuvera, the Hindu Plutus, half-brother of Rāvaṇa, the demon-king of Ceylon in the Rāmāyana. As appears from Jātaka No. 74, Vessavaṇa had rule over tree devatās as well as water devatās, holding his office from Sakka.
said he, “the four quarters of heaven are.” “You don’t know,” said the Water Rakkhasa as he hauled this second victim off to the same prison-house.

Finding that this second brother too tarried long, the Bodhisatta felt sure that something had happened to them. So away he went after them and tracked their footsteps down into the water. [1.129] Realising at once [1.26] that the pool must be the domain of a Water Rakkhasa, he girded on his sword, and took his bow in his hand, and waited. Now when the Rakkhasa found that the Bodhisatta had no intention of entering the water, he assumed the shape of a forester, and in this guise addressed the Bodhisatta thus, “You’re tired with your journey, mate; why don’t you go in and have a bathe and a drink, and deck yourself with lotuses? You could travel on comfortably afterwards.” Recognising him at once for a Rakkhasa, the Bodhisatta said: “It is you who have seized my brothers.” “Yes, it was,” was the reply. “Why?” Because all who go down into this pool belong to me.” “What, all?” “Not those who know what is truly godlike; all save these are mine.” “And do you want to know the godlike?” “I do.” “If this be so, I will tell you what is truly godlike.” “Do so, and I will listen.”

“I should like to begin,” said the Bodhisatta, “but I am travel-stained with my journey.” Then the Water Rakkhasa bathed the Bodhisatta, and gave him food to eat and water to drink, decked him with flowers, sprinkled him with scents, and laid out a couch for him in the midst of a gorgeous pavilion. Seating himself on this couch, and making the Water Rakkhasa sit at his feet, the Bodhisatta said: “Listen then and you shall hear what the truly godlike is.” And he repeated this verse:

1. “Those only godlike call who shrink from wrong,
The white-souled tranquil votaries of good.” [1.132]

And when the Yakkha heard this, he was pleased, and said to the Bodhisatta, “Man of wisdom, I am pleased with you, and give you up one of your brothers. Which shall I bring?” “The youngest.” “Man of wisdom, though you know so well what the truly godlike is, you don’t act on your knowledge.” “How so?” “Why, you take the younger in preference to the elder, without regard to his seniority.” “I not only know, but practise, the godlike. It was on this boy’s account that we sought refuge in the forest; it was for him that his mother asked the kingdom from our father, and our father, refusing to fulfil her demand, consented to our flight to the refuge of the forest. With us came this boy, nor ever thought of turning back again. Not a soul would believe me if I were to give out that he had been devoured by a Rakkhasa in the forest; and it is the fear of odium that impels me to demand him at your hands.”

“Excellent! Excellent! O man of wisdom,” cried the Rakkhasa in approval, “you not only know, but practise, the godlike.” §1.133 And in token of his pleasure and approval he brought forth the two brothers and gave them both to the Bodhisatta.

Then said the latter to the Water Rakkhasa, “Friend, it is in consequence of your own evil deeds in times past that you have now been born a Rakkhasa subsisting on the flesh and blood of other living creatures; and in this present birth too you are continuing to do evil. This evil conduct §1.27 will for ever bar you from escaping rebirth in hell and the other evil states. Wherefore, from this time forth renounce evil and live virtuously.”

Having worked the Rakkhasa’s conversion, the Bodhisatta continued to dwell at that spot under his protection, until one day he read in the stars that his father was dead. Then taking the Water Rakkhasa with him, he returned to Benares and took possession of the kingdom, making Candakumāra his viceroy and Śūriyakumāra his generalissimo. For the Water Rakkhasa he made a home in a pleasant spot and took measures to ensure his being provided with the choicest garlands, flowers, and food. He himself ruled in righteousness until he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof that monk won the Fruit of the First Path. And the All-knowing Buddha, having told the two stories, made the connection linking the two together, and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “The well-to-do monk was the Water Rakkhasa of those days; Ānanda was Śūriyakumāra, Sāriputta was Candakumāra, and I myself the eldest brother, prince Mahiṁsāsa.”

Ja 7 Kaṭṭhahārijātaka

The Story about the Wood Gatherer (1s)

In the present the king of Kosala, learning of the low birth of his queen, rejected her, and her son. The Buddha convinces him otherwise, and tells a story of the past where he had been born of a king and claimed his rightful place at court.
The Bodhisatta = the king (of Benares) Kaṭṭhavāhana (wooden vehicle) (Kaṭṭhavāhanarājā), the great king Suddhodana = his father (pitā),
Mahāmāyā = his mother (mātā).
Present Source: Ja 7 Kaṭṭhahārijātaka,
Present Compare: Ja 465 Bhaddasālajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 22 Kukkurajātaka, Ja 407 Mahākapijātaka.

Keyword: Worthiness.

“Your son am I.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the story of Vāsabhakhattiyā, which will be found in the Twelfth Book in the Bhaddasālajātaka [Ja 465]. Tradition tells us that she was the daughter of Mahānāma Sakka by a slave girl named Nāgamuṇḍā, and that she afterwards became the consort of the king of Kosala. She conceived a son by the king; but the king, coming to know of her servile origin, degraded her from her rank, and also degraded her son Viḍūḍabha. Mother and son never came outside the palace.

Hearing of this, the Teacher at early dawn came to the palace attended by five hundred monks, and, sitting down on the seat prepared for him, said: “Sire, where is Vāsabhakhattiyā?”

Then the king told him what had happened.

“Sire, whose daughter is Vāsabhakhattiyā?” “Mahānāma’s daughter, sir.” “When she came away, to whom did she come as wife?” “To me, sir.” “Sire, she is a king’s daughter; to a king she is wed; and to a king she bore her son. Wherefore is that son not in authority over the realm which owns his father’s sway? In bygone days, a monarch who had a son by a casual faggot-gatherer gave that son his sovereignty.”

---

216 The word muhuttikāya means, literally, “momentary,” or perhaps may be translated “with whom he consorted but a little while.” Professor Künte (Ceylon Royal Asiatic Society Journal, 1884, p. 128) sees in the word a reference to the Muhūrta (mohotura) form of marriage, which “obtains among the Mahrathas other than the Brahmanas,” and which he compares with the familiar Gāndharva form, i.e. (legal) union by mutual consent, on the spur of the moment, without any preliminary formalities.
The king asked the Fortunate One to explain this. The Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed from him by rebirth.

In the past in Benares Brahmadatta the king, having gone in great state to his pleasure gardens, was roaming about looking for fruits and flowers when he came on a woman who was merrily singing away as she picked up sticks in the grove. Falling in love at first sight, the king became intimate with her, and the Bodhisatta was conceived then and there. Feeling as heavy within as though weighed down with the bolt of Sakka, the woman knew that she would become a mother, and told the king so. He gave her the signet-ring from his finger and dismissed her with these words, “If it be a girl, spend this ring on her nurture; but if it be a boy, bring ring and child to me.”

When the woman’s time was come, she bore the Bodhisatta. And when he could run about and was playing in the playground, a cry would arise, “No-father has hit me!” Hearing this, the Bodhisatta ran away to his mother and asked who his father was.

“You are the son of the king of Benares, my boy.” “What proof of this is there, mother?” “My son, the king on leaving me gave me this signet-ring and said, ‘If it be a girl, spend this ring on her nurture; but if it be a boy, bring ring and child to me.’” “Why then don’t you take me to my father, mother?”

Seeing that the boy’s mind was made up, she took him to the gate of the palace, and bade their coming be announced to the king. Being summoned in, she entered and bowing before his majesty said: “This is your son, sire.”

The king knew well enough that this was the truth, but shame before all his court made him reply, “He is no son of mine.” “But here is your signet-ring, sire; you will recognise that.” “Nor is this my signet-ring.” Then said the woman, “Sire, I have now no witness to prove my words, except to appeal to truth. Wherefore, if you be the father of my child, I pray that he may stay in mid-air; but if not, may he fall to earth and be killed.” So saying, she seized the Bodhisatta by the foot and threw him up into the air.

Seated cross-legged in mid-air, the Bodhisatta in sweet tones repeated this verse to his father, declaring the truth:
1. “Your son am I, great monarch; rear me, sire!
The king rears others, but much more his child.”

Hearing the Bodhisatta thus teach the truth to him from mid-air, the king stretched out his hands and cried, “Come to me, my boy! None, none but me shall rear and nurture you!” A thousand hands were stretched out to receive the Bodhisatta; but it was into the arms of the king and of no other that he descended, seating himself in the king’s lap. The king made him viceroy, and made his mother queen-consort. At the death of the king his father, he came to the throne by the title of king Kaṭṭhavāhana – the faggot-bearer – and after ruling his realm righteously, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson to the king of Kosala ended, and his two stories told, the Teacher made the connection linking them both together, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Mahāmāyā was the mother of those days, king Suddhodana was the father, and I myself king Kaṭṭhavāhana.”

Ja 8 Gāmanijātaka

The Story about (Prince) Gāmani (1s)

Alternative Title: Gāmaṇijātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk goes to the forest and strives, but fails to attain. When brought to the Buddha he is reproved and told about a previous life where, though the youngest of 100 sons of the king of Benares, he won the affections of all and attained precedence through his efforts.

The Bodhisatta = the minister who gave advice (ovādadāyako amacco), the monk (who gave up striving) = the great king Sañvara (Sañvaramahārājā).

Present Source: Ja 462 Sañvarajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 156 Alīnacittajātaka, Past Compare: Ja 462 Sañvarajātaka.

Keywords: Justice, Effort.

“Their heart’s desire.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about a monk who gave up persevering. In this Jātaka both the Story of the Present and the Story of the Past will be given in the Eleventh Book in connection with the Saṁvarajātaka [Ja 462]; the incidents are the same both for that Jātaka and for this, but the verses are different.

This, we learn, was a young man of family, who lived in Sāvatthi. Having heard the Teacher's discoursing, he renounced the world. Fulfilling the tasks imposed by his teachers and preceptors, he learned by heart both the Pātimokkhas.

When five years were past, he said: "When I have been instructed in the mode of attaining Absorption, I will go dwell in the forest." Then he took leave of his teachers and preceptors, and proceeded to a frontier village in the kingdom of Kosala. The people were pleased with his behaviour, and he made a hut of leaves and there was attended to.

Entering upon the rainy season, zealous, eager, striving in strenuous endeavour he strove after Absorption for the space of three months: but of this not a trace could he produce. Then he thought: "Verily I am the most devoted to worldly conditions among the four classes of men taught by the Teacher! What have I to do with living in the forest?" Then he said to himself, "I will return to Jetavana, and there in beholding the beauty of the Tathāgata, and hearing his discourse sweet as honey, I will pass my days." So he relaxed his striving; and setting forth he came in course of time to Jetavana. His preceptors and teachers, his friends and acquaintances asked him the cause of his coming. He informed them, and they reproved him for it, asking him why he had done so.

Then they led him into the Teacher's presence. "Why, monks," said the Teacher, "do you lead here a monk against his will?" They replied, "This monk has come here because he has relaxed his striving." "Is this true, as they tell me?" asked the Teacher. "Yes, sir," said the man. Said the Teacher, "Why have you ceased to strive, monk? For a weak and slothful man there is in this dispensation no high fruition, no becoming an Arahat: they only who make strenuous effort accomplish this. In days long gone by you were full of strength, easy to teach: and in this way, though the youngest of all the hundred sons of the king of Benares, by

---

217 [In that Jātaka the prince is called Saṁvara. Here I include the story but modify the name to match the hero in this story.]
218 [It means the rules for both monks and nuns.]
holding fast to the admonition of wise men you obtained the white umbrella.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the youngest of his hundred sons was named prince Gāmani. The king gave his sons in charge each of a separate courtier, with directions to teach them each what they ought to learn. The courtier who instructed the prince Gāmani was the Bodhisatta, wise, learned, filling a father’s place to the king’s son. As each of the sons was educated, the courtiers brought them for the king to see. The king gave them each a province, and let them go.

When the prince Gāmani had been perfected in all learning, he asked the Bodhisatta, “Dear father, if my father sends me to a province, what am I to do?” He replied, “My son, when a province is offered you, you should refuse it, and say, My lord, I am the youngest of all: if I go too, there will be no one about your feet: I will remain where I am, at your feet.” Then one day, when prince Gāmani had saluted him, and was standing on one side, the king asked him, “Well, my son, have you finished your learning?” “Yes, my lord.” “Choose a province.” “My lord, there will be emptiness about your feet: let me remain here at your feet, and in no other place!” The king was pleased, and consented.

After that he remained there at the king’s feet; and again asked the Bodhisatta, “What else am I to do, father?” “Ask the king,” said he, “for some old park.” The prince complied, and asked for a park: with the fruits and flowers that there grew he made friends with the powerful men in the city. Again he asked what he was to do. “Ask the king’s leave, my son,” said the Bodhisatta, “to distribute the food-money within the city.” So he did, and without the least neglect of any person he distributed the food-money within the city. Again he asked the Bodhisatta’s advice, and after soliciting the king’s consent, distributed food within the palace to the servitors and the horses and to the army, without any omission: to messengers come from foreign countries he assigned their lodging and so forth, for merchants he fixed the taxes, all that had to be arranged he did alone. Thus following the advice of the Great Being, he made friends with everybody, those in the household and those without, all in the city, the subjects of the kingdom, strangers, by his winsomeness binding them to him as it were by a band of iron: to all of them he was dear and beloved.
When in due time the king lay on his deathbed, the courtiers asked him, “When you are dead, my lord, to whom shall we give the white umbrella?” “Friends,” said he, “all my sons have a right to the white umbrella. But you may give it to him that pleases your mind.” So after his death, and when the obsequies had been performed, on the seventh day they gathered together, and said: “Our king bade us give the Umbrella to him that pleases our mind. He that our mind desires is prince Gāmani.” Over him therefore they uplifted the white umbrella with its festoons of gold, escorted by his kinsmen.

The Great king Gāmani cleaving to the advice of the Bodhisatta reigned in righteousness.

The other ninety nine princes heard that their father was dead, and that the Umbrella had been uplifted over Gāmani. “But he is the youngest of all,” said they, “the Umbrella does not belong to him. Let us uplift the Umbrella over the eldest of us all.” They all joined forces, and sent a letter to Gāmani, bidding him resign the Umbrella or fight; then they surrounded the city. The king told this news to the Bodhisatta, and asked what he was to do now. He answered, “Great king, you must not fight with your brothers. Divide the treasure belonging to your father into a hundred portions, and to your brothers send ninety-nine of them, with this message, “Accept this share of your father’s treasure, for fight with you I will not.” So he did.

Then the eldest of all the brothers, prince Upasatha by name, summoned the rest together, and said to them, “Friends, there is no one able to overcome the king; and this our youngest brother, though he has been our enemy, does not remain so: but he sends us his wealth, and refuses to fight with us. Now we cannot all uplift the Umbrella at the same moment; let us uplift it over one only, and let him alone be king; so when we see him, we will hand over the royal treasure to him, and return to our own provinces.” Then all these princes raised the siege of the city, and entered it, foes no longer. And the king told his courtiers to welcome them, and sent them to meet the princes. The princes with a great following entered on foot, and mounting the steps of the palace, and using all humility towards the great king Gāmani, sat down in a lowly place. King Gāmani was seated under the white umbrella upon a throne: great magnificence was his, and great pomp; what place soever he looked upon, trembled and quaked. Prince Upasatha seeing the magnificence of the mighty king Gāmani, thought to himself, “Our father, I think, knew that prince Gāmani would be king after his decease, and therefore gave us provinces and gave him none,” then addressing him, repeated three verses:

Your nature, mighty monarch, sure the lord of men well knew:
The other princes honoured he, but nothing gave to you.

While the king lived was it, or when a god to heaven he went,
That seeing their own benefit, your kinsmen gave consent?

Say by what power, O Gāmani, you stand above your kin:
Why do your brothers not unite from you the place to win?

On hearing this, king Gāmani repeated six verses to explain his own character:

Because, O prince, I never grudge great sages what is meet:
Ready to pay them honour due, I fall before their feet.

Me envying none, and apt to learn all conduct meet and right,
Wise sages each good precept teach in which they take delight.

I listen to the bidding of these sages great and wise:
My heart is bent to good intent, no counsel I despise.

Elephant troops and chariotmen, guard royal, infantry –
I took no toll of daily dole, but paid them all their fee.

Great nobles and wise counsellors waiting on me are found;
With food, wine, water (so they boast) Benares does abound.

Thus merchants prosper, and from many a realm they come and go,
And I protect them. Now the truth, Uposatha, you know.

Prince Uposatha listened to this account of his character, and then repeated two verses:

Then be above your kith and kin, and rule in righteousness,
So wise and prudent, Gāmani, your brothers you shall bless.
Your treasure-heaps your brothers will defend, and you shall be Safe from your foes as Sakka’s self from his arch enemy.²¹⁹

Abiding steadfast in the counsels of the Bodhisatta, prince Gāmāni, finding himself – though the youngest of a hundred brothers – surrounded by those hundred brothers as a retinue and seated beneath the white canopy of kingship, [1.30] contemplated his glory and thought: “All this glory I owe to my teacher.”

And, in his joy, he burst into this exalted utterance:

1. “Their heart’s desire²²⁰ they reap, who hurry not;
Know, Gāmāni, ripe excellence is thine.” {1.137}

Seven or eight days after he had become king, all his brothers departed to their own homes. King Gāmāni, after ruling his kingdom in righteousness, passed away to fare according to his deeds. The Bodhisatta also passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof the faint-hearted monk became an Arahat. Having told the two stories, the Teacher showed the connection linking them both together and identified the Jātaka.

Ja 9 Makhādevajātaka²²¹

The Story about (King) Makhadeva (1s)

Alternative Title: Maghadevajātaka (Cst)

²¹⁹ The king of the Asuras.
²²⁰ As to the alternative of the gloss (“phalāsā ti āsāphalām,” i.e. “‘the desire of the fruit’ means ‘the fruit of the desire’”) Professor Künte (Ceylon R.A.S. J. 1884) says – “the inversion requires a knowledge of metaphysical grammar such as was not cultivated in India before the 6th century A.D.… the gloss was written about the brahminical and Jain revival.”
²²¹ See Majjhima-Nikāya, 83 entitled the Makhādevasutta. See also Cariyāpiṭaka, p. 76, and Plate xlviii (2) of the Stūpa of Bharhut, where the name is carved Maghadeva, a spelling which is retained in modern Burmese manuscripts of the Majjhima Sutta from which this Jātaka was manifestly compiled.
In the present, after the Buddha’s Awakening the monks are discussing his Great Renunciation; the Buddha then tells the story of a previous life where upon the sight of just one grey hair, he renounced the world.

The Bodhisatta = the king (of Videha) Makkhadeva (Makkhadevarājā), Rāhula = the (king’s) son (putta),
Ānanda = the barber (kappaka).

Past Compare: Cp 6 Nimirājacariyā, MN 83 Makkhadevasutta [PTS 2.75].

Keywords: Renunciation, Insight, Devas.

“Lo! These grey hairs.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the Great Renunciation, which has already been related in the Nidānakathā.\(^2\)

...the future Buddha, making light of the kingdom of the world, thus within his reach - casting it away as one would saliva - left the city with great honour on the full-moon day of Āsāḷhi, when the moon was in the Uttarāsāḷha lunar mansion (i.e. on the [last day of the lunar month in] July).

For then, they say, Devas in front of him carried sixty thousand torches, and behind him too, and on his right hand, and on his left.

Advancing in this pomp and glory, the Bodhisatta, in that one night, passed beyond three kingdoms, and arrived, at the end of thirty leagues, at the bank of the river called Anomā.

Now the Bodhisatta, stopping at the river side, asked Channa, “What is this river called?”

“Its name, my lord, is Anomā.”

“And so also our renunciation of the world shall be called Anomā (Illustrious),” said he; and signalling to his horse, by pressing it with his heel, the horse sprang

---

See p. 61 et seq. of Vol. i. of Fausböll’s text for this account of how Prince Siddhattha, the future Buddha, renounced the world for the Truth. [Nidānakathā p. 61-65. I give an abbreviated version of it here.]
over the river, five or six hundred yards in breadth, and stood on the opposite bank.

The Bodhisatta, getting down from the horse’s back, stood on the sandy beach, extending there like a sheet of silver, and said to Channa, “Good Channa, do you now go back, taking my ornaments and Kanthaka. I am going to become an ascetic.”

“But I also, my lord, will become an ascetic.”

“You cannot be allowed to renounce the world, you must go back,” he said. Three times he refused this request of Channa’s; and he delivered over to him both the ornaments and Kanthaka.

Then he thought: “These locks of mine are not suited for a mendicant. Now it is not right for any one else to cut the hair of a future Buddha, so I will cut them off myself with my sword.” Then, taking his sword in his right hand, and holding the plaited tresses, together with the diadem on them, with his left, he cut them off. So his hair was thus reduced to two inches in length, and curling from the right, it lay close to his head. It remained that length as long as he lived, and the beard the same. There was no need at all to shave either hair or beard any more.

The Bodhisatta, saying to himself, “If I am to become a Buddha, let it stand in the air; if not, let it fall to the ground;” threw the hair and diadem together as he held them towards the sky.

Again the Bodhisatta thought: “This my raiment of Benares muslin is not suitable for a mendicant.” Now the Deva Ghaṭikāra, who had formerly been his friend in the time of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, was led by his friendship, which had not grown old in that long interval, to think, “Today my friend is accomplishing the Great Renunciation, I will go and provide him with the requisites of a mendicant.”

273. “The three robes, and the alms bowl,
Razor, needle, and girdle,
And a water strainer – these eight
Are the wealth of the monk devout.”

Taking these eight requisites of a mendicant, he gave them to him. The Bodhisatta dressed himself in the outward signs of an Arahat, and adopted the sacred garb of Renunciation; and he enjoined upon Channa to go and, in his name, assure his parents of his safety. And Channa did homage to the Bodhisatta reverently, and departed.

On this occasion the monks sat praising the Renunciation of the One with Ten Powers. Entering the Dhamma Hall and seating himself on the Buddha-seat, the Teacher thus addressed the monks, “What is your theme, monks, as you sit here in a meeting?” “It is naught else, sir, than the praise of your own Renunciation.” “Monks,” rejoined the Teacher, “not only in these latter days has the Tathāgata made a Renunciation; in bygone days too he similarly renounced the world.” The monks asked the Fortunate One for an explanation of this. The Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed from them by rebirth. [1.31]

In the past in Mithilā in the realm of Videha there was a king named Makhādeva, who was righteous and ruled righteously. For successive periods of eighty-four thousand years he had respectively amused himself as prince, ruled as viceroy, and reigned as king. All these long years had he lived, when one day he said to his barber, “Tell me, friend barber, when you see any grey hairs in my head.” So one day, years and years after, [1.138] the barber did find among the raven locks of the king a single grey hair, and he told the king so. “Pull it out, my friend,” said the king, “and lay it in my palm.” The barber accordingly plucked the hair out with his golden tongs, and laid it in the king’s hand. The king had at that time still eighty-four thousand years more to live; but nevertheless at the sight of that one grey hair he was filled with deep emotion. He seemed to see the king of Death standing over him, or to be cooped within a blazing hut of leaves. “Foolish Makhādeva!” he cried, “grey hairs have come upon you before you have been able to rid yourself of depravities.” And as he thought and thought about the appearance of his grey hair, he grew aflame within; the sweat rolled down from 223 The meaning of this frequently recurring title of the Buddha is far from clear, and the obscurity is deepened by the elaborate gloss of Buddhaghosa at pp. 59-68 of the Sumanāgalavilāsini, where eight different interpretations are given. Perhaps the word may mean ‘He who has trod the path which the earlier Buddhas trod’; but there is much to be said for the view put forward on p. 82 of Vol. xiii. of the Sacred Books of the East, that the meaning is ‘He who has arrived there,’ i.e. at emancipation.

his body; while his raiment oppressed him and seemed intolerable. “This very day,” he thought, “will I renounce the world for the monk’s life.”

To his barber he gave the grant of a village, which yielded a hundred thousand pieces of money. He sent for his eldest son and said to him, “My son, grey hairs are come upon me, and I am become old. I have had my fill of human joys, and fain would taste the joys divine; the time for my renunciation has come. Take the sovereignty upon yourself; as for me, I will take up my abode in the pleasure gardens called Makhādeva’s Mango-grove, and there tread the ascetic’s path.”

As he was thus bent on leading the monk’s life, his ministers drew near and said: “What is the reason, sire, why you adopt the monk’s life?”

Taking the grey hair in his hand, the king repeated this verse to his ministers:

1.  “Lo, these grey hairs that on my head appear
    Are Death’s own messengers that come to rob
    My life. ’Tis time I turned from worldly things,
    And in the ascetic’s path sought saving peace.” {1.139}

And after these words, he renounced his sovereignty that self-same day and became a recluse. Dwelling in that very Mango-grove of Makhādeva, he there during eighty-four thousand years fostered the four Divine Abidings within himself, and, dying with Absorption full and unbroken, was reborn in the Realm of Brahmā. Passing thence, he became a king again in Mithilā, under the name of Nimi, and after uniting his scattered family, once more became an ascetic in that same [1.32] Mango-grove, winning the Four Divine Abidings and passing thence once more to the Realm of Brahmā.

After repeating his statement that he had similarly renounced the world in bygone days, the Teacher at the end of his lesson preached the Four Truths. Some entered the First Path, some the Second, and some the Third. Having told the two stories, the Teacher showed the connection between them and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “In those days Ānanda was the barber, Rāhula the son, and I myself king Makhādeva.”
Ja 10 Sukhavīhārijātaka
The Story about the One who lives Happily (1s)

In the present a monk, who was previously a king, expresses his satisfaction with his way of life. This is taken as boasting by the monks, and he is taken to the Buddha, who explains that in a previous life also he had expressed his happiness with the ascetic life, and tells his story.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of the group (gaṇasatthā), Bhaddiya = his disciple (antevāsika).

Present Compare: Vin Cv 7 (2.182).

Keywords: Renunciation, Contentment.

“The man who guards not.” {1.140} This story was told by the Teacher while in the Anūpiya Mango-grove near the town of Anūpiya, about the elder Bhaddiya (the Happy), who joined the Saṅgha in the company of the six young nobles with whom was Upāli. Of these the elders Bhaddiya, Kimbila, Bhagu, and Upāli attained to Arahatship; the elder Ānanda entered the First Path; the elder Anuruddha gained all-seeing vision; and Devadatta obtained the power of Absorption. The story of the six young nobles, up to the events at Anūpiya, will be related in the Khaṇḍahālajātaka [Ja 542].

The venerable Bhaddiya, who used in the days of his royalty to guard himself as though he were appointed his own tutelary deity, bethought him of the state of fear in which he then lived when he was being guarded by numerous guards and when he used to toss about even on his royal couch in his private apartments high up in the palace; and with this he compared the absence of fear in which, now that he was an Arahat, he roamed here and there in forests and desert places. And at the thought he burst into this exalted utterance, “Oh, happiness! Oh, happiness!” [1.33]

---

This the monks reported to the Fortunate One, saying: “The venerable Bhaddiya is declaring the bliss he has won.”

“Monks,” said the Fortunate One, “this is not the first time that Bhaddiya’s life has been happy; his life was no less happy in bygone days.”

The monks asked the Fortunate One to explain this. The Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed from them by rebirth.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a wealthy northern brahmin. Realising the evil of sensual desire and the blessings that flow from renouncing the world, he abjured sensual desire, and retiring to the Himālayas there became an ascetic and won the eight Attainments. His following waxed great, amounting to five hundred ascetics. Once when the rains set in, he quit the Himālayas and travelling along on an alms pilgrimage with his attendant ascetics through village and town came at last to Benares, where he lived in the royal pleasure gardens supported by the king’s bounty. After dwelling there for the four rainy months, he came to the king to take his leave. But the king said to him, “You are old, venerable sir. Wherefore should you go back to the Himālayas? Send your pupils back there {1.141} and stop here yourself.”

The Bodhisatta entrusted his five hundred ascetics to the care of his oldest disciple, saying: “Go you with these to the Himālayas; I will stop on here.”

Now that oldest disciple had once been a king, but had given up a mighty kingdom to become a monk; by focusing on the Meditation Object he had mastered the eight Attainments. As he dwelt with the ascetics in the Himālayas, one day a longing came upon him to see the master, and he said to his fellows, “Live on contentedly here; I will come back as soon as I have paid my respects to the master.” So away he went to the master, paid his respects to him, and greeted him lovingly. Then he lay down by the side of his master on a mat which he spread there.

At this point appeared the king, who had come to the pleasure gardens to see the ascetic; and with a salutation he took his seat on one side. But though he was aware of the king’s presence, that oldest disciple forbore to rise, but still lay there, uttering this exalted utterance, “Oh, happiness! Oh, happiness!”
Displeased that the ascetic, though he had seen him, had not risen, the king said to the Bodhisatta, “Venerable sir, this ascetic must have had his fill to eat, seeing that he continues to lie there so happily, uttering this exalted utterance.”

“Sire,” said the Bodhisatta, “of old this ascetic was a king as you are. He is thinking how in the old days when he was a layman and lived in regal pomp with many a man-at-arms to guard him, he never knew such happiness as now is his. It is the happiness of the monk’s life, and the happiness that Absorption brings, which move him to this exalted utterance.” And the Bodhisatta further repeated this verse to teach the king the Dhamma:

1. “The man who guards not, nor is guarded, sire, Lives happy, freed from slavery to sensual desire.” \{1.142\}

Appeased by the lesson thus taught him, the king made his salutation and returned to his palace. The disciple also took his leave of his master and returned to the Himālayas. But the Bodhisatta continued to dwell on there, and, dying with Absorption full and unbroken, was reborn in the Realm of Brahmā.

His lesson ended, and the two stories told, the Teacher showed the connection linking them both together, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The elder Bhaddiya was the disciple of those days, and I myself the teacher of the company of ascetics.”

Ja 11 Lakkhaṇajātaka

The Story about (the Deer named) Lakkhaṇa (1s)

Alternative Title: Lakkhaṇamigajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta goes off with 500 disciples, and the Buddha sent Ven. Sāriputta and Moggallāna to bring them back to the fold. He then tells a story where in the past Devadatta, through carelessness, had lost the herd he was in charge of, while Sāriputta had preserved all alive.

The Bodhisatta = the father (deer, pitā),
Rāhulamātā = the mother (deer, mātā),
Sāriputta = (the deer) Lakkhaṇa,
Sāriputta’s followers = Lakkhaṇa’s followers,
Devadatta = (the deer) Kāḷa,
Devadatta’s followers = Kāḷa’s followers,
Buddha’s followers = the cast (parisā).

Keywords: Prudence, Caution, Animals.

“The upright man.” This story was told by the Teacher in the Bamboo Grove near Rājagaha about Devadatta. The story of Devadatta will be related, up to the date of the employment of assassins, in the Khaṇḍahālajātaka [Ja 542]; up to the date of his dismissal from the office of Treasurer, in the Cullahaṃsajātaka [Ja 533]; and, up to the date of his being swallowed up by the earth, in the Sixteenth Book in the Samuddavāṇijajātaka [Ja 466].

For, on the occasion now in question, Devadatta, through failing to carry the Five Points which he had pressed for, had made a schism in the Saṅgha and had gone off with five hundred monks to dwell at Gayāsīsa. Now, these monks came to a riper knowledge; and the Teacher, knowing this, called the [1.35] two chief disciples and said: “Sāriputta, your five hundred pupils who were perverted by Devadatta’s teaching and went off with him, have now come to a riper knowledge. Go there with a number of the monks, preach the Dhamma to them, enlighten these wanderers respecting the Paths and the Fruits, and bring them back with you.”

They went there, preached the Dhamma, enlightened them respecting the Paths and the Fruits, and next day at dawn came back again with those monks to the Bamboo Grove. And while Sāriputta was standing there after saluting the Fortunate One on his return, the monks spoke thus to him in praise of the elder 225 See Cullavagga, vii. 1 – et seq. The “Five Points” of Devadatta are there given (vii. 3. 14) as follows: “The monks shall live all their life long in the forest, subsist solely on doles collected out of doors, dress solely in rags picked out of dust-heaps, dwell under trees and never under a roof, never eat fish or flesh.” These five points were all more rigid in their asceticism than the Buddha’s rule, and were formulated by Devadatta in order to outbid his cousin and master.

---

226 The two chief disciples, of whom only one is named in the text, were Sāriputta (surnamed ‘the Captain of the Dhamma’) and Moggallāna, two brahmin friends, originally followers of a wandering ascetic, whose conversion to Buddhism is related in the Mahāvagga, i. 23. Unlike this Jātaka, the Vinaya account (Cullavagga, vii. 4) of the re-conversion of the backsliders gives a share of the credit to Moggallāna.
Sāriputta, “Sir, very bright was the glory of our elder brother, the Captain of the Dhamma, as he returned with a following of five hundred monks; whereas Devadatta has lost all his following.”

“This is not the only time, monks, when glory has been Sāriputta’s on his return with a following of his kinsfolk; like glory was his too in bygone days. So too this is not the only time when Devadatta has lost his following; he lost it also in bygone days.”

The monks asked the Fortunate One to explain this to them. The Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed by rebirth.

In the past in the city of Rājagaha in the kingdom of Magadha there ruled a certain king of Magadha, in whose days the Bodhisatta came to life as a stag. Growing up, he dwelt in the forest as the leader of a herd of a thousand deer. He had two young ones named Lakkhaṇa [Lucky] and Kāḷa [Unlucky]. When he grew old, he handed his charge over to his two sons, placing five hundred deer under the care of each of them. And so now these two young stags were in charge of the herd.

Towards harvest-time in Magadha, when the crops stand thick in the fields, it is dangerous for the deer in the forests round. Anxious to kill the creatures that devour their crops, the peasants dig pitfalls, fix stakes, set stone-traps, and plant snares and other traps; so that many deer are slain.

Accordingly, when the Bodhisatta marked that it was crop-time, he sent for his two sons and said to them, “My children, it is now the time when crops stand thick in the fields, and many deer meet their death at this season. We who are old will make shift to stay in one spot; but you will retire each with your herd to the mountainous tracts in the forest and come back when the crops have been carried.” “Very good,” said his two sons, and departed with their herds, as their father bade.

Now the men who live along the route, know quite well the times at which deer take to the hills and return thence. And {1.144} lying in wait in hiding-places here and there along the route, they shoot and kill numbers of them. The dullard Kāḷa, ignorant of the times to travel and the [1.36] times to halt, kept his deer on the march early and late, both at dawn and in the evening, approaching the very confines of the villages. And the peasants, in ambush or in the open, destroyed numbers of his herd. Having thus by his crass folly worked the destruction of all these, it was with a very few survivors that he reached the forest.

Lakkhaṇa on the other hand, being wise and astute and having skill in means, never so much as approached the confines of a village. He did not travel by day, or even in the dawn or evening. Only in the dead of night did he move; and the result was that he reached the forest without losing a single head of his deer.

Four months they stayed in the forest, not leaving the hills till the crops were carried. On the homeward way Kāḷa, by repeating his former folly, lost the rest of his herd and returned solitary and alone; whereas Lakkhaṇa had not lost one of his herd, but had brought back the whole five hundred deer, when he appeared before his parents. As he saw his two sons returning, the Bodhisatta framed this verse in concert with the herd of deer:

1. “The upright kindly man hath his reward.
Mark Lakkhaṇa leading his troop of kin,
While here comes Kāḷa shorn of all his herd.” {1.145}

Such was the Bodhisatta’s welcome to his son; and after living to a good old age, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

At the close of his lesson, when the Teacher had repeated that Sāriputta’s glory and Devadatta’s loss had both had a parallel in bygone days, he showed the connection linking the two stories together and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “Devadatta was the Kāḷa of those days; his followers were Kāḷa’s following; Sāriputta was the Lakkhaṇa of those days, and his following the Buddha’s followers; Rāhula’s mother was the mother of those days; and I myself was the father.”
The Story about the Deer (named) Nigrodha (1s)

In the present the Buddha defends a nun who was found to be pregnant as it was from before her ordination. She later has a child, who is brought up by the king, and becomes a famous monk in the dispensation. The Buddha then tells a story of two herds of deer in previous times, and how the king of one condemned a pregnant doe to die for the king’s lunch; while upon appeal to the other king, he stepped in to take her place. The king of Benares, learning of it, and impressed with his compassion, decided to free all animals in his kingdom.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the deer, Nigrodha (Nigrodhamigarājā), Devadatta = Sākha deer (Sākhamiga),
Devadatta’s followers = Sākha deer’s followers (Sākhamigaparisā),
A pregnant nun = the female doe (migadhenu),
Kumārakassapa = the (doe’s) son (putta),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present and Past Compare: Dhp-a XII.4 Kumārakassapamātuttherī.

Keywords: Compassion, Humility, Animals.

“Keep only with the Banyan Deer.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the mother of the elder named prince Kassapa. The daughter, we learn, of a wealthy merchant of Rājagaha was deeply rooted in goodness and scorned all temporal things; she had reached her final existence, and within her breast, like a lamp in a pitcher, glowed her sure hope of winning Arahatship. As soon as she reached knowledge of herself, she took no joy in a worldly life but yearned to renounce the world. With this aim, she said to her mother and father, “My dear parents, my heart takes no joy in a worldly life; fain would I embrace the dispensation which leads to safety of the Buddha. Allow me to take the vows.”

“What, my dear? Ours is a very wealthy family, and you are our only daughter. You cannot take the vows.”

---

227 This Jātaka is referred to in Milindapañho (page 289 of Rhys Davids’ translation), and is figured in Plates xxv (1) and xliii (2) of Cunningham’s Stūpa of Bharhut.
Having failed to win her parents’ consent, though she asked them again and again, she thought to herself, “Be it so then; when I am married into another family, I will gain my husband’s consent and take the vows.” And when, being grown up, she entered another family, she proved a devoted wife and lived a life of goodness and virtue in her new home. Now it came to pass that she conceived, though she knew it not.

There was a festival proclaimed in that city, and everybody kept holiday, the city being decked like a city of the gods. But she, even at the height of the festival, neither anointed herself nor put on any finery, going about in her everyday attire. So her husband said to her, “My dear wife, everybody is holiday-making; but you do not put on your finery.”

“My lord and master,” she replied, “the body is filled with two-and-thirty component parts. Wherefore should it be adorned? This bodily frame is not fashioned after a Deva or a Brahmā; it is not made of gold, jewels, or yellow sandalwood; it takes not its birth from the womb of lotus-flowers, white or red or blue; it is not filled with any immortal balsam. Nay, it is bred of corruption, and born of mortal parents; the qualities that mark it are the wearing and wasting away, the decay and destruction of the merely transient; it is fated to swell a graveyard, and is devoted to sensual desires; it is the source of sorrow, and the occasion of lamentation; it is the abode of all diseases, and the repository of the workings of Karma. Foul within – it is always excreting. Yea, as all the world can see, its end is death, passing to the charnel-house, there to be the dwelling-place of worms.

Connected by bones and sinews, smeared with skin and flesh, the body is covered with the tegument, it is not seen for what it really is.

Filled with intestines, filled with stomach, having liver, bladder, heart, lungs, kidneys, and spleen, mucus, saliva, sweat and fat, blood, sinovial fluid, bile and sweat.

Furthermore, from the nine openings flow excrements on all sides, eye-excrement from the eyes, ear-excrement from the ears, mucus from the nose, and

---

228 Or, perhaps, “was beautiful.”
sometimes one vomits from the mouth, one throws up bile and phlegm, from the body flow sweat and dirt.

Furthermore, the hollow of the head is filled with the brain. The fool regards this as beautiful, being surrounded by ignorance (Snp. 196-201).

There is endless danger in the body, it is like a poisonous tree, the abode of all illnesses, a complete heap of suffering (Tha-ap. 55).

If from this body the inside would be exposed, one would need to take a stick to ward off the crows and dogs.

The impure body smells bad, like a cesspit, a toilet, the body, that fools take delight in, is condemned by those having insight.

Covered with moist flesh, having nine openings, a great wound, it flows with stinking excrements on all sides (Vsm. 1.122).}

What should I achieve, my bridegroom, by tricking out this body? Would not its adornment be like decorating the outside of a bed pan?”

“My dear wife,” rejoined the young merchant, “if you regard this body as so sinful, why don’t you become a nun?”

“If I am accepted, my husband, I will take the vows this very day.” “Very good,” said he, “I will get you admitted to the Saṅgha.” And after he had shown lavish bounty and hospitality to the Saṅgha, he escorted her with a large following to the nunnery and had her admitted a nun – but of the following of Devadatta. Great was her joy at the fulfilment of her desire to become a nun.

As her time drew near, the nuns, noticing the change in her person, the swelling in her hands and feet and her increased size, said: “Lady, you seem about to become a mother; what does it mean?”

“I cannot tell, ladies; I only know I have led a virtuous life.”

So the nuns brought her before Devadatta, saying: “Lord, this young gentlewoman, who was admitted a nun with the reluctant consent of her husband, has now proved to be with child; but whether this dates from before her admission to the Saṅgha or not, we cannot say. What are we to do now?”
Not being a Buddha, and not having any patience, loving-kindness or sympathy, Devadatta thought thus, “It will be a damaging report to get abroad that one of my nuns is with child, and that I condone the offence. My course is clear – I must expel this woman from the Saṅgha.” Without any enquiry, starting forward as if to thrust aside a mass of stone, he said: “Away, and expel this woman!”

Receiving this answer, they arose and with reverent salutation withdrew to their own nunnery. But the girl said to those nuns, “Ladies, Devadatta the elder is not the Buddha. My vows were taken not under Devadatta, but under [1.38] the Buddha, the foremost in the world. Rob me not of the vocation I won so hardly; but take me before the Teacher at Jetavana.” So they set out with her for Jetavana, and journeying over the forty-five leagues there from Rājagaha, came in due course to their destination, where with reverent salutation to the Teacher, they laid the matter before him.

Thought the Teacher, “Albeit the child was conceived while she was still of the laity, yet it will give the heretics an occasion to say that the ascetic Gotama [1.148] has taken a nun expelled by Devadatta. Therefore, to cut short such talk, this case must be heard in the presence of the king and his court.” So on the morrow he sent for Pasenadi king of Kosala, the elder and the younger Anāthapiṇḍika, the lady Visākhā the great lay-disciple, and other well-known personages; and in the evening when the four classes of the faithful were all assembled – monks, nuns, and lay-disciples, both male and female – he said to the elder Upāli, “Go, and clear up this matter of the young nun in the presence of the four classes of my disciples.”

“It shall be done, venerable sir,” said the elder, and forth to the assembly he went and there, seating himself in his place, he called up Visākhā the lay-disciple in sight of the king, and placed the conduct of the enquiry in her hands, saying: “First ascertain the precise day of the precise month on which this girl joined the Saṅgha, Visākhā; and thence compute whether she conceived before or since that date.” Accordingly the lady had a curtain put up as a screen, behind which she retired with the girl. Looking at the hands, the feet, the navel, at the very belly of the damsel229 the lady found, on comparing the days and months, that the conception had taken place before the girl had become a nun. This she reported to the elder, who proclaimed the nun innocent before all the assembly. And she, now that her innocence was established, reverently saluted the Saṅgha and the Teacher, and with the nuns returned to her own nunnery.

229 [For reasons I do not understand this sentence was printed in Latin in the original: Spectatis manibus, pedibus, umbilico, ipso ventre puellæ.]

When her time was come, she bore the son strong in spirit, for whom she had prayed at the feet of the Buddha Padumuttara ages ago. One day, when the king was passing by the nunnery, he heard the cry of an infant and asked his courtiers what it meant. They, knowing the facts, told his majesty that the cry came from the child to which the young nun had given birth. “Sirs,” said the king, “the care of children is a clog on nuns in their ascetic life; let us take charge of him.” So the infant was handed over by the king’s command to the ladies of his family, and brought up as a prince. When the day came for him to be named, he was called Kassapa, but was known as prince Kassapa [Kassapakumāra] because he was brought up like a prince.

At the age of seven he was admitted a novice under the Teacher, and a full monk when he was old enough. As time went on, he waxed famous among the expounders of the Dhamma. So the Teacher gave him precedence, saying: “Monks, the first in eloquence among my disciples is prince Kassapa.” Afterwards, by virtue of the Vammīkasutta,230 he became an Arahat. So too his mother, the nun, grew to clear insight and won the Supreme Fruit. Prince Kassapa the elder shone in the dispensation of the Buddha even as the full-moon in the mid-heaven.

Now one day in the afternoon when the Tathāgata on return from his alms-round had addressed the monks, he passed into his perfumed chamber. At the close of his address the monks spent the daytime either in their night-quarters or in their day-quarters till it was evening, when they assembled in the Dhamma Hall and spoke as follows, “Monks, Devadatta, because he was not a Buddha and because he had no patience, loving-kindness or sympathy, was nigh being the ruin of the elder prince Kassapa and his venerable mother. But the Supreme Buddha, being the Lord of Dhamma and being perfect in patience, loving-kindness and sympathy, has provided their foundation.” And as they sat there telling the praises of the Buddha, he entered the hall with all the grace of a Buddha, and asked, as he took his seat, what they were talking of as they sat together. “Of your own virtues, sir,” they said, and told him all. [1.39]

230 [MN 23.]

“This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that the Tathāgata has proved to be a foundation and refuge of these two: he was the same to them in the past also.”

Then, on the monks asking him to explain this to them, he revealed what rebirth had hidden from them.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a deer. At his birth he was golden of hue; his eyes were like round jewels; the sheen of his horns was as of silver; his mouth was red as a bunch of scarlet cloth; his four hoofs were as though lacquered; his tail was like the yak’s; and he was as big as a young foal. Attended by five hundred deer, he dwelt in the forest under the name of king Nigrodha [Banyan], And nearby him dwelt another deer also with an attendant herd of five hundred deer, who was named Sākha [Branch], and was as golden of hue as the Bodhisatta.

In those days the king of Benares was passionately fond of hunting, and always had meat at every meal. Every day he mustered the whole of his subjects, townsfolk and countryfolk alike, to the detriment of their business, and went hunting. Thought his people, “This king of ours stops all our work. Suppose we were {1.150} to sow food and supply water for the deer in his own pleasure gardens, and, having driven in a number of deer, to fence them in and deliver them over to the king!” So they sowed in the pleasure gardens grass for the deer to eat and supplied water for them to drink, and opened the gate wide. Then they called out the townsfolk and set out into the forest armed with sticks and all manner of weapons to find the deer. They surrounded about a league of forest in order to catch the deer within their circle, and in so doing surrounded the haunt of the Nigrodha and Sākha. As soon as they perceived the deer, they proceeded to beat the trees, bushes and ground with their sticks till they drove the herds out of their lairs; then they rattled their swords and spears and bows with so great a din that they drove all the deer into the pleasure gardens, and shut the gate. Then they went to the king and said: “Sire, you put a stop to our work by always going hunting; so we have driven deer enough from the forest to fill your pleasure gardens. Henceforth feed on them.”
Hereupon the king betook himself to the pleasure gardens, and in looking over the herd saw among them two golden deer, to whom he granted immunity. Sometimes he would go of his own accord and shoot a deer to bring home; sometimes his cook would go and shoot one. At first sight of the bow, the deer would dash off trembling for their lives, but after receiving two or three wounds they grew weary and faint and were slain. The herd of deer told this to the Bodhisatta, who sent for Sākha and said: “Friend, the deer are being destroyed in great numbers; and, though they cannot escape death, at least let them not be needlessly wounded. Let the deer go to the block by turns, one day one from my herd, and next day one from yours – the deer on whom the lot falls to go to the place of execution and lie down with its head on the block. In this wise the deer will escape wounding.” The other agreed; and thenceforth the deer whose turn it was, used to go and lie down with its neck ready on the block. The cook used to go and carry off only the victim which awaited him.

Now one day the lot fell on a pregnant doe of the herd of Sākha, and she went to Sākha and said: “Lord, I am with young. When I have brought forth my little one, there will be two of us to take our turn. Order me to be passed over this turn.” “No, I cannot make your turn another’s,” said he, “you must bear the consequences of your own fortune. Begone!” Finding no favour with him, the doe went on to the Bodhisatta and told him her story. And he answered, “Very well; you go away, and I will see that the turn passes over you.” And therewithal he went himself to the place of execution and lay down with his head on the block. The cook cried out on seeing him, “Why here’s the king of the deer who was granted immunity! What does this mean?” And off he ran to tell the king. The moment he heard of it, the king mounted his chariot and arrived with a large following. “My friend the king of the deer,” he said on beholding the Bodhisatta, “did I not promise you your life? How comes it that you are lying here?”

“Sire, there came to me a doe big with young, who prayed me to let her turn fall on another; and, as I could not pass the doom of one on to another, I, laying down my life for her and taking her doom on myself, have laid me down here. Think not that there is anything behind this, your majesty.”

---

231 For dhammagañḍikā see Jātaka ii. 124; iii. 41.
“My lord the golden king of the deer,” said the king, “never yet saw I, even among men, one so abounding in patience, loving-kindness and sympathy as you. Therefore am I pleased with you. Arise! I spare the lives both of you and of her.”

“Though two be spared, what shall the rest do, O king of men?” “I spare their lives too, my lord.” “Sire, only the deer in your pleasure gardens will thus have gained immunity; what shall all the rest do?” “Their lives too I spare, my lord.” “Sire, deer will thus be safe; but what will the rest of four-footed creatures do?” “I spare their lives too, my lord.” “Sire, four-footed creatures will thus be safe; but what will the flocks of birds do?” “They too shall be spared, my lord.” “Sire, birds will thus be safe; but what will the fishes do, who live in the water?” “I spare their lives also, my lord.”

After thus interceding with the king for the lives of all creatures, the Great Being arose, established the king in the Five Precepts, saying: “Walk in righteousness, great king. Walk in righteousness and justice towards parents, children, townsmen, and countryfolk, so that when this earthly body is dissolved, you may enter the bliss of heaven.” Thus, with the grace and charm that marks a Buddha, did he teach the Dhamma to the king. A few days he tarried in the pleasure gardens for the king’s instruction, and then with his attendant herd he passed into the forest again.

And that doe brought forth a fawn fair as the opening bud of the lotus, who used to play about with Sākha deer. Seeing this his mother said to him, “My child, don’t go about with him, only go about with the herd of the Nigrodha deer.” And by way of exhortation, she repeated this verse:

1. “Keep only with the Nigrodha deer, shun
The Sākha deer’s herd, for more welcome far
Is death, child, in Nigrodha’s company,
Than e’en a long term of life with Sākha.”

Thenceforth, the deer, now in the enjoyment of immunity, used to eat men’s crops, and the men, remembering the immunity granted to them, did not dare to hit the deer or drive them away. So they assembled in the king’s courtyard and laid the matter before the king. Said he, “When the Nigrodha deer won my favour, I promised him a boon. I will forego my kingdom rather than my promise. Begone! Not a man in my kingdom may harm the deer.”
But when this came to the ears of the Nigrodha deer, he called his herd together and said: “Henceforth you shall not eat the crops of others.” And having thus forbidden them, he sent a message to the men, saying: “From this day forward, let no farmer fence his field, but merely indicate it with leaves tied up round it.” And so we hear began a plan of tying up leaves to indicate the fields; and never was a deer known to trespass on a field so marked. For thus they had been instructed by the Bodhisatta.

Thus did the Bodhisatta exhort the deer of his herd, and thus did he act all his life long, and at the close of a long life passed away with them to fare according to his deeds. The king too abode by the Bodhisatta’s teachings, and after a life spent in good works passed away to fare according to his deeds.

At the close of this lesson, when the Teacher had repeated that, as now, so in bygone days also he had been the support of the pair, he preached the Four Truths. He then showed the connection, linking together the two stories he had told, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the deer called Sākha of those days, and his followers were that deer’s herd; the nun was the doe, and prince Kassapa was her offspring; Ānanda was the king; and I myself was the deer king Nigrodha.”

Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka

The Story about the Dart (1s)

Alternative Title: Kaṇḍijātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk, through love of his former wife, is in danger of falling away from the spiritual life. The Buddha tells a story about the same person’s past in which, as a stag attached to his doe, he had been caught, killed and roasted because of his attachment.

The Bodhisatta = the Devatā who taught Dhamma (Dammadesakadevatā), the dissatisfied monk = the hill stag (pabbateyyamiga), his former wife = the young doe (migapotikā).

Present Source: Ja 423 Indriyajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka.

Keywords: Attachment, Devas, Animals.
“Cursed be the dart of love.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the temptation caused to monks by the wives of their mundane life. This will be related in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423] in the Eighth Book.

The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher’s preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery. So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left: she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him: taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food: when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now: we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country: be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life; send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

Said the Fortunate One to the monk, “Monk, it was because of this very woman that in bygone days you met your death and were roasted over glowing embers.” The monks asked the Fortunate One to explain this. The Fortunate One made clear what had been concealed from them by rebirth. {1.154}

(Henceforth we shall omit the words respecting the monk’s request for an explanation and the making clear what had been concealed by rebirth; and we shall only say, “Told this story of the past.” When only this is said, all the rest is to be supplied and repeated as above – the request, the simile of setting free the moon from the clouds, and the making clear what had been concealed by rebirth.)

In the past in the kingdom of Magadha the king was reigning in Rājagaha, and when the crops were grown the deer were exposed to great perils, so that they retired to the forest. Now a certain mountain-stag of the forest, having become attached to a doe who came from near a village, was moved by his love for her to accompany her when the deer returned home from the forest. Said she, “You, sir, are but a simple stag of the forest, and the neighbourhood of villages is beset with peril and danger. So don’t come down with us.” But he, because of his great love for her, would not stay, but came with her. [1.43]

When they knew that it was the time for the deer to come down from the hills, the Magadha folk posted themselves in ambush by the road; and a hunter was lying in wait just by the road along which the pair were travelling. Scenting a man, the young doe suspected that a hunter was in ambush, and let the stag go on first, following herself at some distance. With a single arrow the hunter laid the stag low, and the doe seeing him struck was off like the wind. Then that hunter came forth from his hiding place and skinned the stag and lighting a fire cooked the sweet flesh over the embers. Having eaten and drunk, he took home the remainder of the bleeding carcass on his carrying-pole to regale his children.

Now in those days the Bodhisatta was a Devatā dwelling in that very grove of trees, and he marked what had come to pass. “ ’Twas not father or mother, but passion alone that destroyed this foolish deer. {1.155} The dawn of passion is bliss, but its end is sorrow and suffering – the painful loss of hands, and the misery of the five forms of bonds and blows. To cause another’s death is accounted infamy in this world; infamous too is the land which owns a woman’s sway and rule; and infamous are the men who yield themselves to women’s dominion.” And therewithal, while the other fairies of the wood applauded and offered perfumes and flowers and the like in homage, the Bodhisatta wove the three infamies into a single verse, and made the wood re-echo with his sweet tones as he taught the truth in these lines:

1. “Cursed be the dart of love that works men pain!
   Cursed be the land where women rule supreme!
   And cursed the fool that bows to woman's sway!”

Thus in a single verse were the three infamies comprised by the Bodhisatta, and the woods re-echoed as he taught the Dhamma with all the mastery and grace of a Buddha. [1.156]

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the love-sick monk was established in the Fruit of the First Path. Having told the two stories, the Teacher showed the connection linking the two together, and identified the Jātaka.

(Henceforward, we shall omit the words ‘Having told the two stories,’ and simply say 'showed the connection...’ the words omitted are to be supplied as before.)

“In those days,” said the Teacher, “the love-sick monk was the mountain-stag; his mundane wife was the young doe, and I was myself the Devatā who preached the Dhamma showing the defilement of passion.”

Ja 14 Vātamigajātaka

The Story about the Wind-Deer (1s)

In the present an ascetic, and highly regarded, monk is enticed back to his familial home by the power of taste. When this is told to the Buddha he relates a story in which the most timid of creatures is enticed into the palace by taste.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
the slave girl = (the gardener) Sāñjaya,
Cullapiṇḍapātika = the wind deer (vātamiga).

Present Compare: Dhp-a XXVI.32 Sundarasamuddatthera.
Keywords: Attachment, Sense-Desire, Animals.

“There’s nothing worse.” [1.44] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the elder Tissa, called Cullapiṇḍapātika [the younger alms gatherer]. Tradition says that, while the Teacher was dwelling at the Bamboo Grove near Rājagaha, the scion of a wealthy house, prince Tissa by name, coming one day to the Bamboo Grove and there hearing a discourse from the Teacher, wished to join the Saṅgha, but, being refused because his parents would not give their consent, obtained their consent by following Raṭṭhapāla’s\(^{232}\) example and refusing food for seven days, and finally took the vows with the Teacher.

About a fortnight after admitting this young man, the Teacher went from the Bamboo Grove to Jetavana, where the young nobleman undertook the thirteen ascetic practices\(^{233}\) and passed his time in going his round for alms from house to house, omitting none. Under the name of the elder Cullapiṇḍapātika Tissa, he became as bright and shining a light in the Buddha’s dispensation as the moon in the vault of heaven.

A festival having been proclaimed at this time at Rājagaha, the elder’s mother and father laid in a silver casket the trinkets he used to wear as a layman, and took it to heart, bewailing thus, “At other festivals our son used to wear this or that finery as he kept the festival; and he, our only son, has been taken away by the ascetic Gotama to the town of Sāvatthi. Where is our son sitting now or standing?” Now a slave girl who came to the house, noticed the lady of the house weeping, and asked her why she was weeping; and the lady told her all.

“What, madam, was your son fond of?” “Of such and such a thing,” replied the lady. “Well, if you will give me authority in this house, I’ll fetch your son back.” “Very good,” said the lady in assent, and gave the girl her expenses and dispatched her with a large following, saying: “Go, and manage to fetch my son back.”

---

\(^{232}\) See Raṭṭhapālasutta in the MN (No. 83), translated in the Ceylon R.A.S. Journal, 1847. See also Vinaya, Vol. iii. pages 13 and 148.

\(^{233}\) These are meritorious ascetic practices for quelling the passions, of which the third is an undertaking to eat no food except alms received direct from the giver in the monk’s alms-bowl. Hence “ticket-food” (see Jātaka No. 5) was also inadmissible.
So away the girl rode in a palanquin to Sāvatthi, where she took up her residence in the street which the elder used to frequent for alms. [1.157] Surrounding herself with servants of her own, and never allowing the elder to see his father's people about, she watched the moment when the elder entered the street and at once bestowed on him an alms of food and drink. And when she had bound him in the bonds of the craving to taste, she got him eventually to seat himself in the house, till she knew that her gifts of food as alms had put him in her power. Then she feigned sickness and lay down in an inner chamber.

In the due course of his round for alms at the proper time, the elder came to the door of her house; and her people took the elder's bowl and made him sit down in the house.

When he had seated himself, he said: “Where is the lay-sister?” “She's ill, sir; she would be glad to see you.”

Bound as he was by the bonds of the craving to taste, he broke his vow and obligation, and went to where the woman was lying. [1.45]

Then she told him the reason of her coming, and so wrought on him that, all because of his being hound by the bonds of the craving to taste, she made him forsake the Saṅgha; when he was in her power, she put him in the palanquin and came back with a large following to Rājagaha again. All this was noised abroad.

Sitting in the Dhamma Hall, the monks discussed the matter, saying: “Sirs, it is reported that a slave girl has bound in the bonds of the craving of taste, and has carried off, the elder Tissa Cullapiṇḍapātika.” Entering the Hall the Teacher sat down on his jewelled seat, and said: “What, monks, is the subject of discussion in this conclave?” They told him the incident.

“Monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that, in bondage to the craving of taste, he has fallen into her power; in bygone days too he fell into her power in like manner.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares he had a gardener named Sañjaya. Now there came into the king's pleasure gardens a Wind-Deer, which fled away at the sight of Sañjaya, but the latter let it go without terrifying the timid creature. After several visits the antelope used to roam about in the pleasure gardens. Now the gardener was in the habit of gathering flowers and fruits and taking them day by day to the king. Said the king to him one day, “Have you noticed anything strange, friend gardener, in the pleasure gardens?” “Only, sir, that a Wind-Deer has come about the grounds.” “Could you catch it, do you think?” “Oh, yes; if I had a little honey, I’d bring it right into your majesty’s palace.”

The king ordered the honey to be given to the man and he went off with it to the pleasure gardens, where he first anointed with the honey the grass at the spots frequented by the deer, {1.158} and then hid himself. When the deer came and tasted the honied grass it was so snared by the lust of taste that it would go nowhere else but only to the pleasure gardens. Marking the success of his snare, the gardener began gradually to show himself. The appearance of the man made the deer take to flight for the first day or two, but growing familiar with the sight of him, it gathered confidence and gradually came to eat grass from the man’s hand. He, noting that the creature’s confidence had been won, first strewed the path as thick as a carpet with broken boughs; then tying a gourd full of honey on his shoulder and sticking a bunch of grass in his waist-cloth, he kept dropping wisps of the honied grass in front of the deer till at last he got it right inside the palace. No sooner was the deer inside than they shut the door. At sight of men the deer, in fear and trembling for its life, dashed to and fro about the hall; and the king coming down from his chamber above, and seeing the trembling creature, said: “So timid is the Wind-Deer that for a whole week it will not revisit a spot where it has so much as seen a man; and if it has once been frightened anywhere, it never goes back there again all its life long. Yet, [1.46] ensnared by the lust of taste, this wild thing from the jungle has actually come to a place like this. Truly, my friends, there is nothing viler in the world than this craving for taste.” And he put his teaching into this verse:

   1. “There's nothing worse, men say, than taste to snare,
      At borne or with one’s friends. Lo! Taste it was That unto Sañjaya deliver’d up
      The jungle-haunting deer so wild.”

And with these words he let the antelope go back to its forest again. {1.159}

When the Teacher had ended his lesson, and had repeated what he had said as to that monk’s having fallen into that woman’s power in bygone days as well as in the present time, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka, by saying:
“In those days this slave girl was Sañjaya, Cullapinḍapātika was the wind-antelope, and I myself was the king of Benares.”

Ja 15 Kharādiyajātaka

The Story about the Deer (named) Kharādiyā (1s)

In the present a monk proves to be unteachable and is brought to the Buddha who explains that he was like this in a previous life, and tells how he was once a deer who could not be taught, and so fell to a hunter.

The Bodhisatta = the admonishing deer (ovādamiga), Uppalavaṇṇā = (Kharādiyā,) his sister (bhaginī), the disobedient monk = the nephew deer (bhāgineyya miga).

Keywords: Recalcitrance, Animals.

“For when a deer.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about an unruly monk. Tradition says that this monk was unruly and would not heed admonition. Accordingly, the Teacher asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you are unruly and will not heed admonition?”

“It is true, Fortunate One,” was the reply.

“So too in bygone days,” said the Teacher, “you were unruly and would not heed the admonition of the wise and good – with the result that you were caught in a trap and met your death.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares the Bodhisatta was born a deer and dwelt in the forest at the head of a herd of deer. His sister brought her son to him, saying: “Brother, this is your nephew; teach him the deer’s ruses.” And thus she placed her son under the Bodhisatta’s care. Said the latter to his nephew, “Come at such and such a time and I will give you a lesson.” But the nephew made no appearance at the time appointed. And, as on that day, so on seven days did he skip his lesson and fail to learn the ruses of deer; and at last, as he was roaming about, he was caught in a trap. His mother came and said to the Bodhisatta, “Brother, was not your nephew taught deer’s ruses?” [1.47]

“Take no thought for the unteachable rascal,” said the Bodhisatta; {1.160} “your son failed to learn the ruses of deer.” And so saying, having lost all desire to advise the scapegrace even in his deadly peril, he repeated this verse:
1. “For when a deer has twice four hoofs to run
And branching antlers armed with countless tines,
And when by seven tricks he’s saved himself,
I teach him then, Kharādiyā, no more.”

But the hunter killed the wilful deer that was caught in the snare, and departed with its flesh.

When the Teacher had ended this lesson in support of what he had said as to the unruliness of the monk in bygone days as well as in the present, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “In those days this unruly monk was the nephew-deer, Uppalavaṇṇā was the sister, and I myself the deer who gave the admonition.”

Ja 16 Tipallatthamigajātaka

The Story about the Deer having Three Postures (1s)

Alternative Title: Tipallatthajātaka (Comm)

This story is related to the previous one, but its opposite: in the present the Buddha’s son Rāhula is so keen to keep the rules he even sleeps in the outhouse at night. The Buddha explains that he was also conscientious in the past, and that was what saved his life.

The Bodhisatta = uncle deer (mātulamiga), Uppalavaṇṇā = the mother (mātā).

---

234 In the gāthā I have translated not the meaningless kālāhi of Fausbøll’s text, nor the easy variant kālehi, which is substituted in the gloss, but kalāhi, the more difficult reading which occurs in some Sinhalese MSS, and which is read by Fausbøll in the analogous story No. 16. This reading is also given by Dickson in JRAS Ceylon, 1884, p. 188, from the Jātaka Pela Sanne. If kālehi be read, the translation becomes, “I do not try to teach one who has played truant seven times.” In the JRAS Ceylon, 1884, p. 125, Künte says, “I have little doubt that kalāhi is the original form of the popular sing-song, and kālehi a mistake for it, and that on this mistake the grammarian compiler has built up his silly little story about the deer who would not go to school.”

235 See the interesting Life of this therī in Mrs Bode’s ‘Women Leaders of the Buddhist Reformation’ (Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 1893, pp. 540-552), where it is explained that Uppalavaṇṇā “came by that name because she had a skin like the colour in the heart of the dark-blue lotus.”
Rāhula = the young nephew deer (bhāgineyyamigapotaka).

Present Source: Ja 16 Tipallathamigajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 319 Tittirajātaka,
Present Compare: Vin Pāc 5.

Keywords: Amenable, Concientious, Animals.

“In all three postures.” This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling at the Badarika monastery in Kosambī, about the elder Rāhula whose heart was set on observing the rules of the Saṅgha.

Once when the Teacher was dwelling in the Aggāḷava Temple nearby the town of Āḷavi, many female lay-disciples and nuns used to flock there to hear the Dhamma preached. The preaching was in the daytime, but as time [1.48] wore on, the women did not attend, and there were only monks and men disciples present. Then the preaching took place in the evening; and at the close the elder monks retired each to his own chamber. But the younger ones with the lay-disciples lay down to rest in the Attendance Hall. When they fell asleep, loud was the snoring and snorting and gnashing of teeth as they lay. [1.161] After a short slumber some got up, and reported to the Fortunate One the impropriety which they had witnessed. Said he, “If a monk sleeps in the company of novices, it is a Pācittiya offence (requiring confession).” And after delivering this precept he went away to Kosambī.

Thereon the monks said to the venerable Rāhula, “Sir, the Fortunate One has laid down this precept, and now you will please find quarters of your own.” Now, before this, the monks, out of respect for the father and because of the anxious desire of the son to observe the rules of the Saṅgha, had welcomed the youth as if the place were his; they had fitted up a little bed for him, and had given him a cloth to make a pillow with. But on the day of our story they would not even give him house-room, so fearful were they of transgressing.

The excellent Rāhula went neither to the One with Ten Powers as being his father, nor to Sāriputta, Captain of the Dhamma, as being his preceptor, nor to the Great Moggallāna as being his teacher, nor to the elder Ānanda as being his uncle; but betook himself to the One with Ten Powers’ outhouse and took up his abode there as though in a heavenly mansion. Now in the One with Ten Powers’ outhouse the door is always closely shut: the levelled floor is of perfumed earth; flowers and garlands are festooned round the walls; and all night long a lamp burns there. But it was not this splendour which prompted Rāhula to take up his residence here.
Nay, it was simply because the monks had told him to find quarters for himself, and because he revered instruction and yearned to observe the rules of the Saṅgha. Indeed, from time to time the monks, to test him, when they saw him coming from quite a distance, used to throw down a hand-broom or a little dustsweepings, and then ask who had thrown it down, after Rāhula had come in.
“Well, Rāhula came that way,” would be the remark, but never did the future elder say he knew nothing about it. On the contrary, he used to remove the litter and humbly ask pardon of the monk, nor go away till he was assured that he was pardoned; so anxious was he to observe the rules. And it was solely this anxiety which made him take up his dwelling in the outhouse.

Now, though day had not yet dawned, the Teacher halted at the door of the is there?” said the Buddha. “It is I, Rāhula,” was the reply; and out came the young man and bowed low. “Why have you been sleeping here, Rāhula?” “Because I had nowhere to go to. Up till now, sir, the monks have been very kind to me; but such is their present fear of erring {1.162} that they won’t give me shelter any more.
Consequently, I took up my abode here, because I thought it a spot where I should not come into contact with anybody else.”

Then thought the Teacher to himself, “If they treat even Rāhula like this, what will they not do to other youths whom they admit to the Saṅgha?” And his heart was moved within him for the Dhamma. So, at an early hour he had the monks assembled, and questioned the Captain of the Dhamma thus, “I suppose you at all events, Sāriputta, know where Rāhula is now quartered?”

“No, sir, I do not.”

“Sāriputta, Rāhula was living this day in the outhouse. Sāriputta, if you treat Rāhula like this, what will be your treatment of other youths who go forth in this dispensation? Such treatment will not retain those who join us. In future, keep your novices in your own quarters for a day or two, and only on the third day let them lodge out, taking care to acquaint yourself with their lodging.” With this rider, the Teacher laid down the precept.
Gathering together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks spoke of the goodness of Rāhula. “See, sirs, how anxious was Rāhula to observe the rules. When told to find his own lodging, he did not say, ‘I am the son of the One with Ten Powers; what have you to do with quarters? You turn out!’ No; not a single monk did he oust, but quartered himself in the outhouse.” [1.49] As they were talking thus, the Teacher came to the Hall and took his seat on his throne of state, saying: “What is the subject of your talk, monks?” “Sir,” was the reply, “we were talking of the anxiety of Rāhula to keep the rules, nothing else.” Then said the Teacher, “This anxiety Rāhula has shown not only now, but also in the past, when he had been born an animal.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past a certain king of Magadha was reigning in Rājagaha; and in those days the Bodhisatta, having been born a stag, was living in the forest at the head of a herd of deer. Now his sister brought her son to him, saying: “Monk, teach your nephew here the ruses of deer.” “Certainly,” said the Bodhisatta, “go away now, my boy, and come back at such and such a time to be taught.” Punctually, at the time his uncle mentioned, the young stag was there and received instruction in the ruses of deer.

One day as he was ranging the woods he was caught in a snare and uttered the plaintive cry of a captive. Away fled the herd and told the mother of her son’s capture. She came to her brother and asked him whether his nephew had been taught the ruses of deer. “Fear not; [1.163] your son is not at fault,” said the Bodhisatta. “He has learned thoroughly the deer’s ruses, and will come back straightaway to your great rejoicing.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:
1. “In all three postures – on his back or sides
   Your son is versed; he’s trained to use eight hoofs,\(^{236}\)
   And save at midnight never slakes his thirst;
   As he lies crouched on earth, he lifeless seems,
   And only with his under-nostril breathes.
   Six tricks\(^{237}\) my nephew knows to cheat his foes.” \(\{1.164\}\)

Thus did the Bodhisatta console his sister by showing her how thoroughly her son had mastered the ruses of deer. Meantime the young stag on being caught in the snare did not struggle, but lay down at full length\(^{238}\) on his side, with his legs stretched out taut and rigid. He pawed up the ground round his hoofs so as to shower the grass and earth about; relieved nature; let his head fall; lolled out his tongue; beslavered his body all over; swelled himself out by drawing in the wind; turned up his eyes; breathed only with the lower nostril, holding his breath with the upper one; and made himself generally so rigid and so stiff as to look like a corpse. Even the blue-bottles swarmed round him; and here and there crows settled.

The hunter came up and smacked the stag on the belly with his hand, remarking, “He must have been caught early this morning; he’s going bad already.” So saying, the man loosed the stag from his bonds, saying to himself, “I’ll cut him up here where he lies, and take the flesh home with me.” But as the man guilelessly set to work to gather sticks and leaves (to make a fire with), the young stag rose to his feet, shook himself, stretched out his neck, and, like a little cloud scudding before a mighty wind, sped swiftly back to his mother.

After repeating what he had said as to Rāhula’s having shown no less anxiety in time past to keep rules than in the present, the Teacher made the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Rāhula was the young stag of those days, Uppalavaṇṇā his mother, and I the stag his uncle.”

\(^{236}\) This the commentator explains as having two hoofs on each foot, referring to the cloven hoof of the deer.

\(^{237}\) i.e. the three mentioned in line 1, and the three mentioned in lines 2, 3, and 5, respectively.

\(^{238}\) See infra p. 62, l. 10.
In the present two elders cannot settle a question about which half of the month is cold. They go to the Buddha who explains that he had settled this question for them in a previous life by showing time is not important, the wind is what makes for the cold.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic who answered the question (pañhavissajjanakatāpasa), the elder Juṇha = the lion (sīha), the elder Kāḷa = the tiger (vyaggha).

Keywords: Discrimination, Animals.

“In light or dark.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about two monks who had joined the Saṅgha in their old age. Tradition says {1.165} that they were living in a forest-dwelling in the Kosala country, and that one was named the elder Kāḷa [Dark] and the other the elder Juṇha [Light]. Now one day Juṇha said to Kāḷa, “Sir, at what time does what is called cold appear?” “It appears in the dark half of the month.” And one day Kāḷa said to Juṇha, “Sir, at what time does what is called cold appear?” “It appears in the light half of the month.”

As the pair of them together could not solve the question, they went to the Teacher and with due salutation asked, saying: “Sir, at what time does what is called cold appear?”

After the Teacher had heard what they had to say, he said: “Monks, in bygone days also, I answered for you this very same question; but your previous existences have become confused in your minds.” And so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.51]

---

239 The compound bhavasaṅkhhepagatattā occurs here and in the next Jātaka, and also Vol. i. p. 463 and Vol. ii. p. 137. The meaning of the word appears to be that by rebirth events in previous existences have become jumbled up together so that no distinct memory remains. A Buddha has the power of remembering the whole of his past existences.
In the past at the foot of a certain mountain there were living together in one and the same cave two friends, a lion and a tiger. The Bodhisatta too was living at the foot of the same hill, as an ascetic.

Now one day a dispute arose between the two friends about the cold. The tiger said it was cold in the dark half of the month, while the lion maintained that it was cold in the light half. As the two of them together could not settle the question, they put it to the Bodhisatta. He repeated this verse:

1. “In light or dark half, whensoe'er the wind
   Does blow, 'tis cold. For cold is caused by wind.
   And, therefore, I decide you both are right.”

Thus did the Bodhisatta make peace between those friends. [1.166]

When the Teacher had ended his lesson in support of what he had said as to his having answered the same question in bygone days, he preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof both of the elders won the Fruit of the First Path. The Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “Kāḷa was the tiger of those days, Junha the lion, and I myself the ascetic who answered the question.”

Ja 18 Matakabhattajātaka
The Story about Feasts for the Dead (1s)

In the present the monks hear about a Feast for the Dead which involves animal sacrifice, and ask the Buddha if any good can come of it. The Buddha replies that it cannot, and tells a story of a goat who laughed and cried when being prepared for slaughter: he laughed as this was his final punishment for making a sacrifice, and cried in compassion for those who would suffer a similar fate.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā).

Keywords: Restraint, Compassion, Devas, Animals.

“If folk but knew.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about Feasts for the Dead. For at this time the folk were putting to death goats, sheep, and other animals, and offering them up as what is called a Feast for the Dead, for the sake of their departed kinsmen. Finding them thus engaged, the monks asked the Teacher, saying: “Just now, sir, the folk are taking the lives of many living creatures and offering them up as what is called a Feast for the Dead. Can it be, sir, that there is any good in this?”

“No, monks” replied the Teacher, “not even when life is taken with the object of providing a Feast for the Dead, does any good arise therefrom. In bygone days the wise, preaching the Dhamma from mid-air, and showing the evil consequences of the practice, made the whole continent renounce it. But now, when their previous existences have become confused in their minds, the practice has sprung up afresh.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, a brahmin, who was versed in the Three Vedas and world-famed as a teacher, being minded to offer a Feast for the Dead, had a goat fetched and said to his pupils, “My sons, take this goat down to the river and bathe it; then hang a garland round its neck, give it a basket of grain to eat, groom it a bit, and bring it back.”

“Very good,” they said, and down to the river they took the goat, where they bathed and groomed the creature and set it on the bank. The goat, becoming conscious of the deeds of its past lives, was overjoyed at the thought that on this very day it would be freed from all its misery, and laughed aloud like the smashing of a pot. Then at the thought that the brahmin by slaying it would bear the misery which it had borne, the goat felt a great compassion for the brahmin, and wept with a loud voice. “Friend goat,” said the young brahmins, “your voice has been loud both in laughter and in weeping; what made you laugh and what made you weep?” “Ask me this question before your master.”

So with the goat they came to their master and told him of the matter. After hearing their story, the master asked the goat why it laughed and why it wept. Hereupon the animal, recalling its past deeds by its power of remembering its former existences, spoke thus to the brahmin, “In times past, brahmin, I, like you, was a brahmin versed in the mantras of the Vedas, and I, to offer a Feast for the Dead, killed a goat for my offering. All through killing that single goat, I have had my head cut off five hundred times all but one. This is my five hundredth and last birth; and I laughed aloud when I thought that this very day I should be freed from my misery.

On the other hand, I wept when I thought how, while I, who for killing a goat had been doomed to lose my head five hundred times, was today being freed from my misery, you, as a penalty for killing me, would be doomed to lose your head, like me, five hundred times. Thus it was out of compassion for you that I wept.” “Fear not, goat,” said the brahmin, “I will not kill you.” “What is this you say, brahmin?” said the goat. “Whether you kill me or not, I cannot escape death today.” “Fear not, goat; I will go about with you to guard you.” “Weak is your protection, brahmin, and strong is the force of my evil-doing.”

Setting the goat at liberty, the brahmin said to his disciples, “Let us not allow anyone to kill this goat,” and, accompanied by the young men, he followed the animal closely about. The moment the goat was set free, it reached out its neck to browse on the leaves of a bush growing near the top of a rock. And at that very instant a thunderbolt struck the rock, rending off a mass which hit the goat on the outstretched neck and tore off its head. And people came crowding round. [1.168]

In those days the Bodhisatta had been born a Tree Devatā in that self-same spot. By his supernatural powers he now seated himself cross-legged in mid-air while all the crowd looked on. Thinking to himself. ‘If [1.53] these creatures only knew the fruit of evil-doing, perhaps they would desist from killing,’ in his sweet voice he taught them the Dhamma in this verse:

1. “If folk but knew the penalty would be Birth unto sorrow, living things would cease
   From taking life. Stern is the slayer’s doom.”

Thus did the Great Being preach the Dhamma, scaring his hearers with the fear of hell; and the people, hearing him, were so terrified at the fear of hell that they left off taking life. And the Bodhisatta after establishing the multitude in the Precepts by preaching the Dhamma to them, passed away to fare according to his deeds. The people, too, remained steadfast in the teaching of the Bodhisatta and spent their lives in generosity and other good works, so that in the end they thronged the City of the Devas.

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “In those days I was the Tree Devatā.”
The Section with One Verse – 220

Ja 19 Āyācitabhattajātaka
The Story about the Feasts following a Vow (1s)

In the present the monks hear about a tradition of making a sacrifice following a journey, after making a vow to the gods, and ask the Buddha if any good can come of it. The Buddha replies that it cannot, and tells a story of someone who wanted to make a sacrifice to a Tree Devatā, only to be reproved by that very same god.

The Bodhisatta = Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā).

Keywords: Restraint, Delusion, Devas.

“Take thought of life hereafter.” 1.169 This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the offering of a sacrifice under vow to gods. Tradition says that in those days folk when going a journey on business, used to slay living creatures and offer them as a sacrifice to gods, and set out on their way, after making this vow, “If we come safely back with a profit, we will give you another sacrifice.” And when they did come safely back with a profit, the idea that this was all due to gods made them slay a number of living creatures and offer them up as a sacrifice to obtain a release from their vow.

When the monks became aware of this, they asked the Fortunate One, saying: “Can there be any good in this, sir?”

The Fortunate One told this story of the past.

In the past in the Kāsi country the householder of a certain little village had promised a sacrifice to the Devatā of a banyan tree which stood at the entrance to the village. Afterwards when he returned, he slew a number [1.54] of creatures and betook himself to the tree to get released from his vow. But the Tree Devatā, standing in the fork of its tree, repeated this verse:

1. “Take thought of life hereafter when you seek ‘Release;’ for this release is bondage strict. Not thus the wise and good release themselves; For this, the fool’s release, in bondage ends.”

Thenceforth, men refrained from such taking of life, and by walking in righteousness thronged thereafter the city of the Devas.
His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “I was the Tree Devatā of those days.”

Ja 20 Naḷapānajātaka

The Story about Cane Juice (1s)

In the present the monks find that the cane sticks their novices collect are useless, as they are hollow throughout. The Buddha tells how this came about in a previous life when through the power of the truth he determined it should be so.

The Bodhisatta = king of the monkeys (kapirājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the 80,000 monkeys (asītisahassavānara), Devadatta = Water Rakkhasa (Dakarakhasa).

Past Compare: Mvu iii p 38 Vānara (I).

Keywords: Determination, Truth, Animals, Devas.

“I found the footprints.” {1.170} This story was told by the Teacher while journeying on an alms pilgrimage through Kosala, when he had come to the village of Naḷakapāṇa (Cane-drink) and was dwelling at Ketakavana near the Pool of Naḷakapāṇa, about cane-sticks. In those days the monks, after bathing in the Pool of Naḷakapāṇa, made the novices get them cane-sticks for needle-cases, but, finding them hollow throughout, went to the Teacher and said: “Sir, we had cane-sticks got in order to provide needle-cases; and from top to bottom they are quite hollow. Now how can that be?”

“Monks,” said the Teacher, “such was my ordinance in times gone by.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In past times, we are told, there was a thick forest on this spot. And in the lake here dwelt a Water Rakkhasa who used to devour everyone who went down into the water. In those days the Bodhisatta had come to life as the king of the monkeys, and was as big as the fawn of a red deer; he lived in that forest at the head of a troop of no less than eighty thousand monkeys [1.55] whom he shielded

---

240 In the Vinaya, (Cullavagga v. 11), the Buddha is made to allow “the use of a needle-case made of bamboo.”
from harm. Thus did he counsel his subjects, “My friends, in this forest there are trees that are poisonous and lakes that are haunted by Amanussas. Mind to ask me first before you either eat any fruit which you have not eaten before, or drink of any water where you have not drunk before.” “Certainly,” said they readily.

One day they came to a spot they had never visited before. As, they were searching for water to drink after their day’s wanderings, they came on this lake. But they did not drink; on the contrary they sat down watching for the coming of the Bodhisatta.

When he came up, he said: “Well, my friends, why don’t you drink?”

“We waited for you to come.”

“Quite right, my friends,” said the Bodhisatta. Then he made a circuit of the lake, and scrutinized the footprints round, with the result that he found that all the footsteps led down into the water and none came up again. “Without doubt,” thought he to himself, “this is the haunt of Amanussas.” So he said to his followers, “You are quite right, my friends, in not drinking of this water; for the lake is haunted by Amanussas.”

When the Water Rakkhasa realised that they were not entering his domain, {1.171} he assumed the shape of a horrible monster with a blue belly, a white face, and bright-red hands and feet; in this shape he came out from the water, and said:
“Why are you seated here? Go down into the lake and drink.” But the Bodhisatta said to him, “Are not you the Water Rakkhasa who dwells here?” “Yes, I am,” was the answer. “Do you take as your prey all those who go down into this water?”
“Yes, I do; from small birds upwards, I never let anything go which comes down into my water. I will eat the lot of you too.” “But we shall not let you eat us.” “Just drink the water.” “Yes, we will drink the water, and yet not fall into your power.” “How do you propose to drink the water, then?” “Ah, you think we shall have to go down into the water to drink; whereas we shall not enter the water at all, but the whole eighty thousand of us will take a cane each and drink therewith from your lake as easily as we could through the hollow stalk of a lotus. And so you will not be able to eat us.” And he repeated the latter half of the following verse (the first half being added by the Teacher when, as Buddha, he recalled the incident):
1. “I found the footprints all lead down, none back. With canes we’ll drink; you shall not take my life.”

So saying, the Bodhisatta had a cane brought to him. Then, calling to mind the Ten Perfections displayed by him, he recited them in a solemn Assertion of Truth. Straightaway the cane became hollow throughout, without a single knot being left in all its length. In this fashion he had another and another brought and blew down them. (But if this were so, he could never have finished; and accordingly the foregoing sentence must not be understood in its literal sense.) Next the Bodhisatta made the tour of the lake, and commanded, saying: “Let all canes growing here become hollow throughout.” Now, thanks to the great virtues of the saving goodness of Bodhisattas, their commands are always fulfilled. And thenceforth every single cane that grew round that lake became hollow throughout.

(In this Kappa, or Era, there are four miracles which endure through the whole Era. What are the four? Well, they are first, the sign of the hare in the moon, which will last through the whole Era; secondly, the spot where the fire was put out as told in the Vaṭṭakajātaka [Ja 35], which shall remain untouched by fire throughout the Era; thirdly, on the site of Ghaṭīkāra’s house no rain shall ever fall while this Era lasts; and lastly, the canes that grow round this lake shall be hollow throughout during the whole of the Era. Such are the four Era-miracles [Kappaṭṭhiyapāṭṭhīriya], as they are called.)

After giving this command, the Bodhisatta seated himself with a cane in his hands. All the other eighty thousand monkeys too seated themselves round the lake, each with a cane in his hands. And at the same moment when the Bodhisatta sucked the water up through his cane, they all drank too in the same manner, as they sat on the bank. This was the way they drank, and not one of them could the Water 241 Literally “made a truth-act.” If this is done with intention, a miracle instantly follows. cf. No. 35 &c.

242 See Jātaka No. 316, and Tawney’s Kathāsaritsāgara, Vol. ii. p. 66, where a number of passages bearing on this symbol are referred to, and Benfey’s Pañcatantra, i. 349. See also Cariyāpiṭṭaka, p. 82.

243 See the Ghaṭīkāra Sutta [MN 81], Dhp p. 349, and Milindapañha, p. 222.
Rakkhasa get; so he went off in a rage to his own habitation. The Bodhisatta, too, with his following went back into the forest.

When the Teacher had ended his lesson and had repeated what he had said as to the hollowness of the canes being the result of a former ordinance of his own, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the Water Rakkhasa of those days; my disciples were the eighty thousand monkeys; and I was the monkey-king, having skill in means.”

Ja 21 Kuruṅgamigajātaka

The Story about the Antelope (1s)

In the present the monks discuss Devadatta and his attacks on the Buddha. The Buddha explains to them he did this in previous lives too, and tells a story of a wise antelope who evaded destruction at the hands of a hunter by reading the signs.

The Bodhisatta = the antelope (kuruṅgamiga),
Devadatta = the hunter on the platform (aṭṭakaluddaka).

Present Source: Ja 21 Kuruṅgajātaka, Quoted at: Ja 342 Vānarajātaka.

Keywords: Caution, Discernment, Animals.

“The antelope knows well.” [1.57] {1.173} This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove about Devadatta.

For once when the monks were gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, they sat talking reproachfully of Devadatta, saying: “Sirs, with a view to destroy the Tathāgata, Devadatta hired bowmen, hurled down a rock, and let loose the elephant Dhanapālaka; in every way he goes about to slay the One with Ten Powers.”

Entering and seating himself on the seat prepared for him, the Teacher asked, saying: “Sirs, what is theme you are discussing here in a meeting?” “Sir,” was the reply, “we were discussing the wickedness of Devadatta, saying that he was always going about to slay you.” Said the Teacher, “It is not only in these 244 See Vinaya, Cullavagga, vii. 3, for details of Devadatta’s attempt to kill Gotama. In the Vinaya, the elephant is named Nālāgiri.

---

present days, monks, that Devadatta goes about seeking to slay me; he went about with the like intent in bygone days also – but was unable to slay me.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatatta came to life as an antelope, and used to live on fruits in his haunts in the forest.

At one period he was subsisting on the fruit of a Sepaṇṇi tree. And there was a village hunter, whose method was to build a platform in trees at the foot of which he found the track of deer, and to watch aloft for their coming to eat the fruits of the trees. When the deer came, he brought them down with a javelin, and sold the flesh for a living. This hunter one day marked the tracks of the Bodhisatatta at the foot of the tree, and made himself a platform up in the boughs. Having breakfasted early, he went with his javelin into the forest and seated himself on his platform. The Bodhisatatta, too, came abroad early to eat the fruit of that tree; but he was not in too great a hurry to approach it. “For,” thought he to himself, “sometimes these platform-building hunters build themselves platforms in the boughs. Can it be that this can have happened here?” And he halted some way off to reconnoitre.

Finding that the Bodhisatatta did not approach, the hunter, still seated aloft on his platform, threw fruit down in front of the antelope. Said the latter to himself, “Here’s the fruit coming to meet me; I wonder if there is a hunter up there.” So he looked, and looked, till he caught sight of the hunter in the tree; but, feigning not to have seen the man, he shouted, “My worthy tree, hitherto you have been in the habit of letting your fruit fall straight to the ground like a pendant creeper; but today you have ceased to act like a tree. And therefore, as you have ceased to behave as becomes a tree, I too must change, and look for food beneath another tree.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

---

245 [This is Gmelina Arborea, a kind of beechwood.]
1. “The antelope knows well the fruit you drop.
I like it not; some other tree I'll seek.”

Then the hunter from his platform hurled his javelin at the Bodhisatta, crying, “Begone! I’ve missed you this time.” Wheeling round, the Bodhisatta halted and said: “You may have missed me, my good man; but depend upon it, you have not missed the reward of your conduct, namely, the eight Large and the sixteen Lesser hells and all the five forms of bondage and torture.” With these words the antelope bounded off on its way; and the hunter, too, climbed down and went his way.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse and had repeated what he had said about Devadatta’s going about to slay him in bygone days also, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “Devadatta was the platform-hunter of those days, and I myself the antelope.”

Ja 22 Kukkurajātaka
The Story about the Dog (1s)

In the present the Buddha reconciles the king of Kosala to his queen, and then tells this story about a king who condemned all dogs to die for destroying the straps of his carriages. The Bodhisatta, as a leader of the dogs, showed the king that not all dogs were guilty, and thereby earned them a reprieve.

The Bodhisatta = the wise dog (kukkurapaṇḍita),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (avasesā parisā).

Present Source: Ja 465 Bhaddasāla,
Compare: Ja 7 Kaṭṭhahārijātaka, Dhp-a IV.3 Viḍūḍabha,
Quoted at: Ja 22 Kukkurajātaka, Ja 407 Mahākapijātaka.

Keywords: Discernment, Justice, Animals.

246 See Dhp pp. 147, 331.
“The dogs that in the royal palace grow.” {1.175} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about acting for the good of kinsfolk, as will be related in the Twelfth Book in the Bhaddasāla jātaka [Ja 465].

Tradition tells us that she was the daughter of Mahānāma Sakka by a slave girl named Nāgamunḍā, and that she afterwards became the consort of the king of Kosala. She conceived a son by the king; but the king, coming to know of her servile origin, degraded her from her rank, and also degraded her son Viḍūḍabha. Mother and son never came outside the palace.

Hearing of this, the Teacher at early dawn came to the palace attended by five hundred monks, and, sitting down on the seat prepared for him, said: “Sire, where is Vāsabhakhattiyā?”

Then the king told him what had happened.

“Sire, whose daughter is Vāsabhakhattiyā? “Mahānāma’s daughter, sir.” “When she came away, to whom did she come as wife?” “To me, sir.” “Sire, she is a king’s daughter; to a king she is wed; and to a king she bore her son. Wherefore is that son not in authority over the realm which owns his father’s sway? In bygone days, a monarch who had a son by a casual faggot-gatherer gave that son his sovereignty.”

It was to drive home that lesson that he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the result of a past act of the Bodhisatta was that he came to life as a dog, and dwelt in a great cemetery at the head of several hundred dogs.

Now one day, the king set out for his pleasure gardens in his chariot of state drawn by milk-white horses, and after amusing himself all the day in the grounds came back to the city after sunset. The carriage-harness [1.59] they left in the courtyard, still hitched on to the chariot. In the night it rained and the harness got wet. Moreover, the king’s dogs came down from the upper chambers and gnawed the leather work and straps.

Next day they told the king, saying: “Sire, dogs have got in through the mouth of the sewer and have gnawed the leather work and straps of your majesty’s carriage.” Enraged at the dogs, the king said: “Kill every dog you see.” Then began a great slaughter of dogs; and the creatures, finding that they were being slain whenever they were seen, repaired to the cemetery to the Bodhisatta. “What is the meaning,” asked he, “of your assembling in such numbers?” They said: “The king is so enraged at the report that the leather work and straps of his carriage have been gnawed by dogs within the royal precincts, that he has ordered all dogs to be killed. Dogs are being destroyed wholesale, and great peril has arisen.”

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “No dogs from without can get into a place so closely watched; it must be the thoroughbred dogs inside the palace who have done it. At present nothing happens to the real culprits, while the guiltless are being put to death. What if I were to discover the culprits to the king and so save the lives of my kith and kin?” He comforted his kinsfolk by saying: “Have no fear; I will save you. {1.176} Only wait here till I see the king.”

Then, guided by the thoughts of love, and calling to mind the Ten Perfections, he made his way alone and unattended into the city, commanding thus, “Let no hand be lifted to throw stick or stone at me.” Accordingly, when he made his appearance, not a man grew angry at the sight of him.

The king meantime, after ordering the dogs’ destruction, had taken his seat in the hall of justice. And straight to him ran the Bodhisatta, leaping under the king’s throne. The king’s servants tried to get him out; but his majesty stopped them. Taking heart a little, the Bodhisatta came forth from under the throne, and bowing to the king, said: “Is it you who are having the dogs destroyed?” “Yes, it is I.” “What is their offence, king of men?” “They have been gnawing the straps and the leather covering my carriage.” “Do you know the dogs who actually did the mischief?” “No, I do not.” “But, your majesty, if you do not know for certain the real culprits, it is not right to order the destruction of every dog that is seen.” “It was because dogs had gnawed the leather of my carriage that I ordered them all to be killed.” “Do your people kill all dogs without exception; or are there some dogs who are spared?” “Some are spared – the thoroughbred dogs of my own palace.” “Sire, just now you were saying that you had ordered the universal slaughter of all dogs wherever found, because dogs had gnawed the leather of your carriage; whereas, now, you say that the thoroughbred dogs of your own palace escape death. Therefore you are following [1.60] the four Evil Courses of partiality, dislike, ignorance and fear. Such courses are wrong, and not kinglike. For kings in trying cases should be as unbiassed as the beam of a balance. But in this instance, since the royal dogs go scot-free, while poor dogs are killed, this is not the impartial doom of all dogs alike, but only the slaughter of poor dogs,” And moreover, the Great Being, lifting up his sweet voice, said: “Sire, it is not justice that you are performing,” and he taught the Dhamma to the king in this verse: {1.177}

1. “The dogs that in the royal palace grow,
The well-bred dogs, so strong and fair of form,
Not these, but only we, are doomed to die.
Here’s no impartial sentence meted out
To all alike; ’tis slaughter of the poor.”

After listening to the Bodhisatta’s words, the king said: “Do you in your wisdom know who it actually was that gnawed the leather of my carriage?” “Yes, sire.” “Who was it?” “The thoroughbred dogs that live in your own palace.” “How can it be shown that it was they who gnawed the leather?” “I will prove it to you.” “Do so, sage.” “Then send for your dogs, and have a little buttermilk and kusa grass brought in.” The king did so.

Then said the Great Being, “Let this grass be mashed up in the buttermilk, and make the dogs drink it.”

The king did so; with the result that each of the dogs, as he drank, vomited. And they all brought up bits of leather! “Why it is like a judgment of a Perfect Buddha himself,” cried the king overjoyed, and he did homage to the Bodhisatta by offering him the royal umbrella. But the Bodhisatta taught the Dhamma in the ten verses on righteousness in the Tesakunajataka [Ja 521], beginning with the words:

To friends and courtiers,247 warrior king, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

In war and travel, warrior king, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

247 [These verses were omitted here, but written out in Ja 501 and 521. I include them in this edition.]
In town and village, warrior king, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

In every land and realm, O king, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

To brahmins and ascetics all, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

To beasts and birds, O warrior king, do righteously; and so
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

Do righteously, O warrior king; from this all blessings flow:
By living according to Dhamma to heaven the king shall go.

With watchful vigilance, O king, on paths of goodness go:
The brahmins, Sakka, and the gods have won their godhead so.

*These are the maxims told of old: and following wisdom’s ways
The goddess of all happiness herself to heaven did raise."

Then having established the king in the Five Precepts, and having exhorted his majesty to be steadfast, the Bodhisatta handed back to the king the white umbrella of kingship.

At the close of the Great Being’s words, \[1.178\] the king commanded that the lives of all creatures should be safe from harm. He ordered that all dogs from the Bodhisatta downwards, should have a constant supply of food such as he himself ate; and, abiding by the teachings of the Bodhisatta, he spent his life long in generosity and other good deeds, so that when he died he was reborn in the Deva Heaven. The ‘Dog’s Teaching’ endured for ten thousand years. The Bodhisatta also lived to a ripe old age, and then passed away to fare according to his deeds. \[1.61\]

When the Teacher had ended this lesson, and had said: “Not only now, monks, does the Tathāgata do what profits his kindred; in former times also he did the like,” he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days, the Buddha’s followers were the others, and I myself was the dog.”
Ja 23 Bhojājānīyajātaka
The Story about the Well-Bred (Horse) (1s)

Alternative Title: Gojānīyajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk easily gives up striving, to encourage him the Buddha tells a story of a warhorse who strove on and helped capture seven enemy kings for his own king, even though it eventually cost him his life. He also ensured justice for the captors.

The Bodhisatta = the well bred Sindh horse (Bhojājānīyasindhava), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā), Sāriputta = the horseman (assāroha).

Keywords: Perserverence, Justice, Animals.

“Though prostrate now.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about a monk who gave up persevering. For it was then that the Teacher addressed that monk and said: “Monks, in bygone days the wise and good persevered even amid hostile surroundings, and, even when they were wounded, still did not give in.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a thoroughbred Sindh horse and was made the king's warhorse, surrounded by all pomp and state. He was fed on exquisite three-year old rice, which was always served up to him in a golden dish worth a hundred thousand pieces of money; and the ground of his stall was perfumed with the four odours. Round his stall were hung crimson curtains, while overhead was a canopy studded with stars of gold. On the walls were festooned wreaths and garlands of fragrant flowers; and a lamp fed with scented oil was always burning there.

Now all the kings round coveted the kingdom of Benares. Once seven kings encompassed Benares, and sent a missive to the king, saying: “Either yield up your kingdom to us or give battle.” Assembling his ministers, the king of Benares laid the matter before them, and asked them what he was to do. They said: “You ought not to go out to do battle in person, sire, in the first instance. (1.179) Dispatch such and such a knight out first to fight them; and later on, if he fails, we will decide what to do.”
Then the king sent for that knight and said to him, “Can you fight the seven kings, my dear knight?” Said he, “Give me but your noble warhorse, and then I could fight not seven kings only, but all the kings in Jambudīpa.” “My dear knight, take my warhorse or any other horse you please, and do battle.” “Very good, my sovereign lord,” said the knight; and with a bow he passed down from the upper chambers of the palace.

Then he had the noble warhorse led out and sheathed in mail, arming himself too from head to foot, and girding on his sword. Mounted on his noble steed he passed out of the city-gate, and with a lightning charge broke down the first camp, taking one king alive and bringing him back a prisoner to the soldiers’ custody. Returning to the field, he broke down the second and the third camps, and so on until he captured alive five kings. The sixth camp he had just broken down, and had captured the sixth king, when his warhorse received a wound, which streamed with blood and caused the noble animal sharp pain. Perceiving that the horse was wounded, the knight made it lie down at the king’s gate, loosened its mail, and set about arming another horse.

As the Bodhisatta lay at full length on his side, he opened his eyes, and gathered what the knight was doing. “My rider,” thought he to himself, “is arming another horse. That other horse will never be able to break down the seventh camp and capture the seventh king; he will lose all that I have accomplished. This peerless knight will be slain; and the king, too, will fall into the hands of the foe. I alone, and no other horse, can break down that seventh camp and capture the seventh king.” So, as he lay there, he called to the knight, and said: “Sir knight, there is no horse but I who can break down the seventh camp and capture the seventh king. I will not throw away what I have already done; only have me set upon my feet and clad again in my armour.” And so saying, he repeated this verse: {1.180}

1. “Though prostrate now, and pierced with darts, I lie,
Yet still no hack can match this warhorse.
So harness none but me, O charioteer.”

The knight had the Bodhisatta set upon his feet, bound up his wound, and armed him again in proof. Mounted on the warhorse, he broke down the seventh camp, and brought back alive the seventh king, whom he handed over to the custody of the soldiers. They led the Bodhisatta too up to the king’s gate, and the king came out to look upon him. Then said the Great Being to the king, “Great king, slay not these seven kings; bind them by an oath, and let them go. Let the knight enjoy all the honour due to us both, for it is not right that a warrior who has presented you with seven captive kings should be brought low. And as for yourself, exercise generosity, keep the Precepts, and rule your kingdom in righteousness and justice.” When the Bodhisatta had thus exhorted the king, they took off his mail; but when they were taking it off piecemeal, he passed away.

The king had the body burned with all respect, and bestowed great honour on the knight, and sent the seven kings to their homes after exacting from each an oath never to war against him any more. And he ruled his kingdom in righteousness and justice, passing away when his life closed to fare thereafter according to his deeds. [1.63]

Then the Teacher said: “Thus, monks, in bygone days the wise and good persevered even amid hostile surroundings, and, even when wounded so grievously, still did not give in. Whereas you who have devoted yourself to so saving a dispensation – how comes it that you give up persevering?” After which, he preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the faint-hearted monk became an Arahant. His lesson ended, the Teacher (1.181) showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days, Sāriputta the knight, and I myself the thoroughbred Sindh horse.”

Ja 24 Ājaññajātaka

The Story about the (Horse) that was Bred Well (1s)

A similar story to the previous one, but this time involving a pair of warhorses. In the present a monk easily gives up striving, to encourage him the Buddha tells a story of a pair of warhorses who strove on and helped capture seven enemy kings for their own king, even though it eventually cost one of them his life. Before dying he also ensured justice for the captors.

The Bodhisatta = the horse (assa),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Perserverence, Justice, Animals.

“No matter when or where.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about another monk who gave up persevering. But, in this case, he addressed that monk and said: “Monks, in bygone days the wise and good still persevered even when wounded.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there were seven kings who encompassed the city, just as in the foregoing story.

So a warrior who fought from a chariot harnessed two Sindh horses (a pair of brothers), and, sallying from the city, broke down six camps and captured six kings. Just at this juncture the elder horse was wounded. On drove the charioteer till he reached the king’s gate, where he took the elder brother out of the chariot, and, after unfastening the horse’s mail as he lay upon one side, set to work to arm another horse. Realising the warrior’s intent, the Bodhisatta had the same thoughts pass through his head as in the foregoing story, and sending for the charioteer, repeated this verse, as he lay:

1. “No matter when or where, in weal or woe,
   The thoroughbred fights on; the hack gives in.”

The charioteer had the Bodhisatta set on his feet and harnessed. Then he broke down the seventh camp and took prisoner the seventh king, with whom he drove away [1.182] to the king’s gate, and there took out the noble horse. As he lay upon one side, the Bodhisatta gave the same counsels to the king as in the foregoing story, and then expired. The king had the body burned with all respect, lavished honours on the charioteer, and [1.64] after ruling his kingdom in righteousness passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof that monk became an Arahant; and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The elder Ānanda was the king, and the Perfect Buddha was the horse of those days.”

Ja 25 Titthajātaka

The Story about the Ford (1s)

In the present Ven. Sāriputta has a co-resident monk whom he has difficulty teaching, so he takes him to the Buddha, who, understanding the monk’s disposition, gives him a suitable subject, so that he easily attains. The Buddha then tells a story of a horse who wouldn’t allow himself to be washed. The Bodhisatta realised that the horse needed both clean water and variety, and he had him washed elsewhere.
The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañdiffimacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
a certain monk = the auspicious horse (maṅgala-assa).

Keywords: Pride, Insight, Animals.

“Change you the spot.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about an ex-goldsmith, who had become a monk and was co-resident with (Sāriputta) the Captain of the Dhamma.

Now, it is only a Buddha who has knowledge of the hearts and can read the thoughts of men; and therefore through lack of this power, the Captain of the Dhamma had so little knowledge of the heart and thoughts of his co-resident, as to prescribe impurity as theme for meditation. This was no good to that monk. The reason why it was no good to him was that, according to tradition, he had invariably been born, throughout five hundred successive births, as a goldsmith; and, consequently, the cumulative effect of seeing absolutely pure gold for so long a time had made theme of impurity useless. He spent four months without being able to get so much as the first inkling of the idea. Finding himself unable to confer Arahatship on his co-resident, the Captain of the Dhamma thought to himself, “This must certainly be one whom none but a Buddha can convert; I will take him to the Tathāgata.” So at early dawn he came with the monk to the Teacher.

“What can it be, Sāriputta,” said the Teacher, “that has brought you here with this monk?” “Sir, I gave him a theme for meditation, and after four months he has not attained to so much as the first inkling of the idea; so I brought him to you, thinking that here was one whom none but a Buddha can convert.” “What meditation, Sāriputta, did you prescribe for him?” “The meditation on impurity, Fortunate One.” “Sāriputta, it is not yours to have knowledge of the hearts and to read the thoughts of men. Depart now alone, and in the evening come back to fetch your co-resident.”

After thus dismissing the elder, the Teacher had that monk clad in a nice underrobe and a robe, kept him constantly at his side when he went into town for alms, and saw that he received choice food of all kinds. Returning to the monastery once more, surrounded by the monks, the Teacher retired during the daytime {1.183} to his perfumed chamber, and at evening, as he walked about the monastery with that monk by his side, he made a pond appear and in it a great clump of lotuses out of which grew a great lotus-flower. “Sit here, monk,” he said, “and gaze at this flower.” And, leaving the monk seated thus, he retired to his perfumed chamber.

That monk gazed and gazed at that flower. The Fortunate One made it decay. As the monk looked at it, the flower in its decay faded; the Petals [1.65] fell off, beginning at the rim, till in a little while all were gone; then the stamens fell away, and only the pericarp was left. As he looked, that monk thought within himself, “Even now, this lotus-flower was lovely and fair; yet its colour is departed, and only the pericarp is left standing. Decay has come upon this beautiful lotus; what may not befall my body? Transitory are all compounded things!” And with the thought he won Insight.

Knowing that the monk’s mind had risen to Insight, the Teacher, seated as he was in his perfumed chamber, emitted a radiant semblance of himself, and uttered this verse:

“Pluck out self-love, as with the hand you pluck
The autumn water-lily. Set your heart
On naught but this, the perfect Path of Peace,
And that Nibbāna which the Buddha taught.”

At the close of this verse, that monk became an Arahat. At the thought that he would never be born again, never be troubled with existence in any shape hereafter, he burst into an exalted utterance beginning with these verses:

“He who has lived his life, whose thought is ripe;
He who, from all defilements purged and free,
Wears his last body; he whose life is pure,
Whose subject senses own him sovereign lord;

He, like the moon that wins her way at last
From Rāhu’s jaws, 248 has won supreme release.

248 Rāhu was a kind of Asura who was thought to cause eclipses by temporarily swallowing the sun and moon.
The foulness which enveloped me, which wrought
Delusion’s utter darkness, I dispelled;
– As, tricked with thousand rays, the beaming sun Illumines heaven with a flood of light.”

After this and renewed exalted utterance, he went to the Fortunate One and saluted him. The elder, too, came, and after due salutation to the Teacher, went away with his co-resident.

When news of all this spread among the monks, {1.184} they gathered together in the Dhamma Hall and there sat praising the virtues of the One with Ten Powers, and saying: “Sirs, through not knowing the hearts and thoughts of men, the elder Sāriputta was ignorant of his co-resident’s disposition. But the Teacher knew, and in a single day bestowed on him Arahatship together with analytic knowledges. Oh, how great are the marvellous powers of a Buddha!” Entering and taking the seat set ready for him, the Teacher asked, saying: “What is theme of your discourse here in a meeting, monks?” “Naught else, Fortunate One, than this – that you alone had knowledge of the heart, and could read the thoughts, of the co-resident of the Captain of the Dhamma.” “This is no marvel, monks; that I, as Buddha, should now know that monk’s disposition. Even in bygone days I knew it equally well.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares. In those days the Bodhisatta used to be the king’s director in things temporal and spiritual. [1.66]

At this time folk had washed another horse, a sorry beast, at the bathing-place of the king’s state-charger. And when the groom was for leading the state-charger down into the same water, the animal was so affronted that he would not go in. So the groom went off to the king and said: “Please your Majesty, your state-charger won’t take his bath.”

Then the king sent the Bodhisatta, saying: “Do you go, sage, and find out why the animal will not go into the water when they lead him down.” “Very good, sire,” said the Bodhisatta, and went his way to the waterside. Here he examined the horse; and, finding it was not ailing in any way, he tried to divine what the reason could be. At last he came to the conclusion that some other horse must have been washed at that place, and that the charger had taken such umbrage thereat that he would not go into the water. So he asked the grooms what animal they had washed first in the water. “Another horse, my lord – an ordinary animal.” “Ah, it’s his self-love that has been offended so deeply that he will not go into the water,” said the Bodhisatta to himself, “the thing to do is to wash him elsewhere.” So he said to the groom, “A man will tire, my friend, of even the daintiest fare, if he has it always. And that’s how it is with this horse. He has been washed here times without number. Take him to other waters, \{1.185\} and there bathe and water him.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Change you the spot, and let the charger drink
Now here, now there, with constant change of scene.
For even milk-rice cloys a man at last.”

After listening to his words, they led the horse off elsewhere, and there watered and bathed him all-right. And while they were washing the animal down after watering him, the Bodhisatta went back to the king. “Well,” said the king, “has my horse taken his drink and bath, my friend?” “He has, sire.” “Why would he not do so at first?” “For the following reason,” said the Bodhisatta, and told the king the whole story. “What a clever fellow he is,” said the king, “he can read the mind even of an animal like this.” And he gave great honour to the Bodhisatta, and when his life closed passed away to fare according to his deeds. The Bodhisatta also passed away to fare likewise according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended his lesson and had repeated what he had said as to his knowledge, in the past as well as the present, of that monk’s disposition, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was the state-charger of those days; Ānanda was the king and I myself the wise minister.”

Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka

The Story about Mahilāmukha (the Mad Elephant) (1s)

Alternative Title: Mahilāmukhajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk ordained under the Buddha is easily persuaded to partake of Devadatta’s good food, rather than go on almsround. He is brought to the Buddha who tells a story about an elephant who was easily led astray by bad company, and reformed by good company.

The Bodhisatta = the minister (amacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the treacherous monk = Mahilāmukha (the mad elephant).

Present Source: Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 141 Godhajātaka, Ja 184 Giridantajātaka, Ja 186 Dadhivāhanajātaka, Ja 397 Manojajātaka.

Keywords: Instruction, Association, Animals.

“Through hearing first.” [1.67] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta, who, having secured the adherence of prince Ajātasattu, had attained both gain and honour. Prince Ajātasattu had a monastery built for Devadatta at Gayāsīsa, and every day brought to him five hundred pots of perfumed three-year-old rice flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. All this gain and honour brought Devadatta a great following, with whom Devadatta lived on, without ever stirring out of his monastery.

At that time there were living in Rājagaha two friends, of whom one had taken the vows under the Teacher, while the other had taken them under Devadatta. And these continued to see one another, either casually or by visiting the monasteries. Now one day the disciple of Devadatta said to the other, “Sir, why do you daily go round for alms with the sweat streaming off you? Devadatta sits quietly at Gayāsīsa and feeds on the best of fare, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. There’s no way like his. Why create misery for yourself? Why should it not be a good thing for you to come the first thing in the morning to the monastery at Gayāsīsa and there drink our rice-gruel with a relish after it, try our eighteen kinds of solid victuals, and enjoy our excellent soft food, flavoured with all the choicest flavours?”

Being pressed time after time to accept the invitation, the other began to want to go, and thenceforth used to go to Gayāsīsa and there eat and eat, not forgetting however to return to the Bamboo Grove at the proper hour. Nevertheless he could not keep it secret always; and in a little while it came out that he used to go off to Gayāsīsa and there regale himself with the food provided for Devadatta. Accordingly, his friends asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you regale yourself on the food provided for Devadatta?” “Who said that?” said he. “So-and-so said it.” “It is true, sirs, that I go to Gayāsīsa and eat there. But it is not Devadatta who gives me food; others do that.” “Sir, Devadatta is the foe of the Buddhas; in his wickedness, he has secured the adherence of Ajātasattu and by unrighteousness got gain and honour for himself. Yet you who have taken the vows according to this dispensation which leads to safety, eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness. Come, let us bring you before the Teacher.”

And, taking with them the monk, they went to the Dhamma Hall. When the Teacher became aware of their presence, he said: “Monks, are you bringing this monk here against his will?” “Yes, sir, this monk, after taking the vows under you, eats the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness.” “Is it true, as they say, that you eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness?” “It was not Devadatta, sir, that gave it me, but others.” “Raise no quibbles here, monk,” said the Teacher. “Devadatta is a man of bad conduct and bad principle. Oh, how could you, who have taken the vows in the Buddha’s dispensation, eat Devadatta’s food, while living in the Teacher’s presence? But you have always been prone to being led away, and have followed in turn every one you meet.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.68]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his minister. In those days the king had a state elephant, [1.187] named Mahilāmukha [Damsel-face], who was virtuous and good, and never hurt anybody.

Now one day some burglars came close up to the elephant’s stall by night and sat down to discuss their plans in these words, “This is the way to tunnel into a house; this is the way to break in through the walls; before carrying off the plunder, the tunnel or breach in the walls ought to be made as clear and open as a road or a ford. In lifting the goods, you shouldn’t stick at murder; for thus there will be none able to resist. A burglar should get rid of all goodness and virtue, and be quite pitiless, a man of cruelty and violence.”

After having schooled one another in these counsels, the burglars took themselves off. The next day too they came, and many other days besides, and held like converse together, till the elephant came to the conclusion that they came expressly to instruct him, and that he must turn pitiless, cruel, and violent. And such indeed he became. No sooner did his mahout appear in the early morning than the elephant took the man in his trunk and dashed him to death on the ground. And in the same way he treated a second, and a third, and every person in turn who came near him.
The news was brought to the king that Mahilāmukha had gone mad and was killing everybody that he caught sight of. So the king sent the Bodhisatta, saying: “Go, sage, and find out what has perverted him.”

Away went the Bodhisatta, and soon satisfied himself that the elephant showed no signs of bodily ailment. As he thought over the possible causes of the change, he came to the conclusion that the elephant must have heard persons talking near him, and have imagined that they were giving him a lesson, and that this was what had perverted the animal. Accordingly, he asked the elephant-keepers whether any persons had been talking together recently near the stall by night. “Yes, my lord,” was the answer, “some burglars came and talked.”

Then the Bodhisatta went and told the king, saying: “There is nothing wrong, sire, with the elephant bodily; he has been perverted by overhearing some burglars talk.” “Well, what is to be done now?” “Order good men, sages and brahmins, to sit in his stall and to talk of goodness.” “Do so, my friend,” said the king. Then the Bodhisatta set good men, sages and brahmins, in the stall, and bade them talk of goodness. And they, taking their seats nearby the elephant, spoke as follows, “Neither maltreat nor kill. The good should be long-suffering, loving, and merciful.” Hearing this the elephant thought they must mean this as a lesson for him, and resolved thenceforth to become good. And good he became.

“Well, my friend,” said the king to the Bodhisatta, “is he good now?” “Yes, your majesty,” said the Bodhisatta, “thanks to wise and good men the elephant who was so perverted has become himself again.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Through hearing first the burglars’ wicked talk
   Mahiḷā ranged abroad to wound and kill;
   Through hearing, later, wise men’s lofty words
   The noble elephant turned good once more.”

Said the king, “He can read the mind even of an animal!” And he conferred great honour on the Bodhisatta. After living to a good old age, he, with the Bodhisatta, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

Said the Teacher, “In the past, too, you followed everyone you met, monk; hearing burglars talk, you followed what they said; and hearing the wise and good talk, you followed what they said.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “The traitorous monk was Mahilāmukha of those days, Ānanda the king, and I myself the minister.”

Ja 27 Abhiṇhajātaka

The Story about Habituation (1s)

In the present a monk and lay disciple are the best of friends, and always associate together. When this is brought to the attention of the Buddha he tells a story of a past life in which a state elephant was best friends with a dog, and when the latter went missing wouldn’t eat, until he was brought back.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (amaccapaṇḍita), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā), the old monk = the elephant (hatthī), the layman = the dog (sunakha).

Keywords: Friends, Association, Animals.

“No morsel can he eat.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay-disciple and an aged elder. {1.189}

Tradition says that there were in Sāvatthi two friends, of whom one joined the Saṅgha but used to go every day to the other’s house, where his friend used to give him alms food and make a meal himself, and then accompany him back to the monastery, where he sat talking all the livelong day till the sun went down, when he went back to town. And his friend the monk used to escort him on his homeward way, going as far as the city-gates before turning back.

The intimacy of these two became known among the monks, who were sitting one day in the Dhamma Hall, talking about the intimacy which existed between the pair, when the Teacher, entering the Hall, asked what was the subject of their talk; and the monks told him. “Not only now, monks, are these two intimate with one another,” said the Teacher, “they were intimate in bygone days as well.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his minister. In those days there was a dog which used to go to the stall of the elephant of state, and eat the gobbets of rice which fell where the elephant fed. Haunting the place for the food’s sake, [1.70] the dog grew very friendly with the elephant, and at last would never eat except with him. And neither could get on without the
The dog used to disport himself by swinging backwards and forwards on the elephant’s trunk. Now one day a villager bought the dog of the mahout and took the dog home with him. Thenceforward the elephant, missing the dog, refused either to eat or drink or take his bath; and the king was told of it. His majesty dispatched the Bodhisatta to find out why the elephant behaved like this. Proceeding to the elephant-house, the Bodhisatta, seeing how sad the elephant was, said to himself, “He has got no bodily ailment; he must have formed an ardent friendship, and is sorrowing at the loss of his friend.” So he asked whether the elephant had become friends with anyone.

“Yes, my lord,” was the answer, “there’s a very warm friendship between him and a dog.” “Where is that dog now?” “A man took it off.” “Do you happen to know where that man lives?” “No, my lord.” The Bodhisatta went to the king and said: “There is nothing the matter with the elephant, sire; but he was very friendly with a dog, \[1.190\] and it is missing his friend which has made him refuse to eat, I imagine.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “No morsel can he eat, no rice or grass;
And in the bath he takes no pleasure now.
I think, the dog had so familiar grown,
That elephant and dog were closest friends.”

“Well,” said the king on hearing this, “what is to be done now, sage?” “Let proclamation be made by beat of drum, your majesty, to the effect that a man is reported to have carried off a dog of which the elephant of state was fond, and that the man in whose house that dog shall be found, shall pay such and such a penalty.” The king acted on this advice; and the man, when he came to hear of it, promptly let the dog loose. Away ran the dog at once, and made his way to the elephant. The elephant took the dog up in his trunk, and placed it on his head, and wept and cried, and, again setting the dog on the ground, saw the dog eat first and then took his own food.

“Even the minds of animals are known to him,” said the king, and he loaded the Bodhisatta with honours.

Thus the Teacher ended his lesson to show that the two were intimate in bygone days as well as at that date. This done, he unfolded the Four Truths. (This unfolding of the Four Truths forms part of all the other Jātakas; but we shall only mention it where it is expressly mentioned that it was blessed unto fruit.) Then he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The lay-disciple was the dog of those days, the aged elder was the elephant, and I myself the wise minister.”

Ja 28 Nandivisālagātaka
The Story about (the Bull) Nandivisāla (1s)

In the present the Group of Six make disparaging remarks about the monks. The Buddha reproves them and tells a story about a bull, who, spoken to harshly, lost his master a thousand, and spoken to kindly gained him two thousand, by pulling a hundred carts all by himself.

The Bodhisatta = Nandivisāla, the bull,
Ānanda = the brahmin.

Past Compare: Ja 88 Sārambha, Vin Pāc 2.

Keywords: Kindly speech, Animals.

“Speak only words of kindness.” [1.71] [1.191] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the bitter words spoken by the group of six. For, in those days the group of six, when they disagreed with respectable monks, used to taunt, revile and jeer them, and load them with the ten kinds of abuse. This the monks reported to the Fortunate One, who sent for the group of six and asked whether this charge was true. On their admitting its truth, he rebuked them, saying: “Monks, hard words gall even animals: in bygone days an animal made a man who had used harsh language to him lose a thousand pieces.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past at Taxila in the land of Gandhāra there was a king reigning there, and the Bodhisatta came to life as a bull. When he was quite a tiny calf, he was presented by his owners to a brahmin who came in – they being known to give away presents of oxen to such-like holy men. The brahmin called it Nandivisāla

249 The ‘six’ were notorious monks who are always mentioned as defying the rules of the Sāṅgha.
(Great-Joy), and treated it like his own child, feeding the young creature on rice-gruel and rice. When the Bodhisatta grew up, he thought thus to himself, “I have been brought up by this brahmin with great pains, and all Jambudīpa cannot show the bull which can draw what I can. How if I were to repay the brahmin the cost of my nurture by making proof of my strength?” Accordingly, one day he said to the brahmin, “Go, brahmin, to some merchant rich in herds, and wager him a thousand pieces that your bull can draw a hundred loaded carts.”

The brahmin went his way to a merchant and got into a discussion with him as to whose oxen in the town were the strongest. “Oh, so-and-so’s, or so-and-so’s,” said the merchant. “But,” added he, “there are no oxen in the town which can compare with mine for real strength.” Said the brahmin, “I have a bull who can pull a hundred loaded carts.” “Where’s such a bull to be found?” laughed the merchant. “I’ve got him at home,” said the brahmin. “Make it a wager.” “Certainly,” said the brahmin, and staked a thousand pieces. Then he loaded a hundred carts with sand, gravel, and stones, and tied the lot together, one behind the other, by cords from the axle tree of the one in front to the trace-bar of its successor. This done, he bathed Nandivisāla, gave him a measure of perfumed rice to eat, hung a garland round his neck, and harnessed him all alone to the leading cart. The brahmin in person took his seat upon the pole, and flourish the goad in the air, shouting, “Now then, you rascal! Pull them along, you rascal!”

“I’m not the rascal he calls me,” thought the Bodhisatta to himself; and so he planted his four feet like so many posts, and budged not an inch.

Straightaway, the merchant made the brahmin pay over the thousand pieces. His money gone, the brahmin took his bull out of the cart and went home, where he lay down on his bed in an agony of grief. When Nandivisāla strolled in and found the brahmin a prey to such grief, he went up to him and enquired if the brahmin were taking a nap. “How should I be taking a nap, when I have lost a thousand pieces?” “Brahmin, all the time I have lived in your house, have I ever broken a pot, or squeezed up against anybody, or made messes about?” “Never, my child.” “Then, why did you call me a rascal? It’s you who are to blame, not I. Go and bet him two thousand this time. Only remember not to call me rascal again.”

When he heard this, the brahmin went off to the merchant, and laid a wager of two thousand. Just as before, he tied the hundred carts to one another and harnessed Nandivisāla, very spruce and fine, to the leading cart. If you ask how he harnessed him, well, he did it in this way: first, he fastened the cross-yoke on to the pole; then he put the bull in on one side, and made the other fast by fastening a smooth piece of wood from the cross-yoke on to the axletree, so that the yoke was taut and could not skew round either way. Thus a single bull could draw a cart made to be drawn by two. So now seated on the pole, the brahmin stroked Nandivisāla on the back, and urged on him in this style, “Now then, my fine fellow! Pull them along, my fine fellow!” With a single pull the Bodhisatta tugged along the whole string of the hundred carts \{1.193\} till the hindernost stood where the foremost had started. The merchant, rich in herds, paid up the two thousand pieces he had lost to the brahmin. Other folks, too, gave large sums to the Bodhisatta, and the whole passed into the hands of the brahmin. Thus did he gain greatly by reason of the Bodhisatta.

Thus laying down, by way of rebuke to the Six, the rule\(^{250}\) that hard words please no one, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse:

1. “Speak only words of kindness, never words Unkind. For him who spoke him fair, he moved A heavy load, and brought him wealth, for love.”

When he had thus ended his lesson as to speaking only words of kindness, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the brahmin of those days, and I myself Nandivisāla.”

Ja 29 Kaṇṭhajātaka

The Story about (the Bull) Blackie (1s)

In the present the Buddha, having bettered all his competitors, is praised by the monks. He then tells a story of how he was once a bull who earned his owner a fortune by pulling carts no one else could pull, and taking the reward to his poor owner.

The Bodhisatta = the bull, Grandmother’s Blackie (ayyikākāḷaka), Uppalavaṇṇā = the old woman (his ‘grandmother’) (mahallikā).

Present Compare: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga.

\(^{250}\) [Now recorded as Pācittiya 2 in the Bhikkhupātimokkha.]
“With heavy loads.” [1.73] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the Double Miracle, which, together with the Descent from Heaven, will be related in the Thirteenth Book, in the Sarabhamigajātaka [Ja 483].

The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha’s seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha’s seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the season of rains under the great Coral Tree, seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.

After he had performed the Double Miracle and had made a stay in Heaven, the All-knowing Buddha descended at the city of Saṅkassa on the day of the Great Pavāraṇā Festival, and thence passed with a large following to Jetavana.

Gathering together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks sat praising the virtues of the Teacher, saying: “Sirs, peerless is the Tathāgata; none may bear the yoke borne by the Tathāgata. The six teachers, though they protested so often that they, and they only, would perform miracles, yet not a single miracle did they work. O! How peerless is the Teacher!” Entering the Hall and asking theme which the monks were discussing in a meeting, {1.194} the Teacher was informed that their theme was none other than his own virtues. “Monks,” said the Teacher, “who shall now bear the yoke borne by me? Even in bygone days, when I came to life as an animal, I was unmatched.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a bull. And while he was still a young calf, his owners, who had been lodging with an old woman, made him over to her in settlement of their reckoning. She reared him like her own child, feeding him on rice-gruel and rice and on other good cheer. The name he became known by was, “Ayyikā Kāḷaka [Granny’s Blackie].” Growing up, he used to range about with the other cattle of the village, and was as black as jet. The village urchins used to catch hold of his horns and ears and dewlaps, and have a ride; or they would hold on to his tail in play, and mount on his back.

---

251 The festival at the end of the rainy season (Mahāvagga iv. 1).

One day he thought to himself, “My mother is very poor; she has painfully reared me, as if I were her own child. What if I were to earn some money to ease her hard lot?” Thenceforth he was always looking out for a job. Now, one day a young merchant at the head of a caravan came with five hundred wagons to a ford the bottom of which was so rough that his oxen could not pull the wagons through. And even when he took out the five hundred pairs of oxen and yoked the lot together to form one team, they could not get a single cart by itself across the river. Close [1.74] by that ford the Bodhisatta was about with the other cattle of the village, and the young merchant, being a judge of cattle, ran his eye over the herd to see whether among them there was a thoroughbred bull who could pull the wagons across. When his eye fell on the Bodhisatta, he felt sure he would do; and, to find out the Bodhisatta’s owner, he said to the herdsmen, “Who owns this animal? If I could yoke him on and get my wagons across, I would pay for his services.” They said: “Take him and harness him, then; he has got no master hereabouts.”

But when the young merchant slipped a cord [1.195] through the Bodhisatta’s nose and tried to lead him off, the bull would not budge. For, we are told, the Bodhisatta would not go till his pay was fixed. Understanding his meaning, the merchant said: “Master, if you will pull these five hundred wagons across, I will pay you two coins per cart, or a thousand coins in all.”

It now required no force to get the Bodhisatta to come. Away he went, and the men harnessed him to the carts. The first he dragged over with a single pull, and landed it high and dry; and in like manner he dealt with the whole string of wagons.

The young merchant tied round the Bodhisatta’s neck a bundle containing five hundred coins, or at the rate of only one for each cart. Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “This fellow is not paying me according to contract! I won’t let him move on!” So he stood across the path of the foremost wagon and blocked the way. And try as they would, they could not get him out of the way. “I suppose he knows I’ve paid him short,” thought the merchant; and he wrapped up a thousand coins in a bundle, which he tied round the Bodhisatta’s neck, saying: “Here’s your pay for pulling the wagons across.” And away went the Bodhisatta with the thousand pieces of money to his ‘mother.’

“What’s that round the neck of Kāḷaka?” cried the children of the village, running up to him. But the Bodhisatta made at them from afar and made them scamper off, so that he reached his ‘mother’ all right. Not but what he appeared fagged out, with his eyes bloodshot, from dragging all those five hundred wagons over the river. The pious woman, finding a thousand pieces of money round his neck, cried out, “Where did you get this, my child?” Learning from the herdsmen what had happened, she exclaimed, “Have I any wish to live on your earnings, my child? Why did you go through all this fatigue?” So saying, she washed the Bodhisatta with warm water and rubbed him all over with oil; she gave him drink and regaled him with due victuals. And when her life closed, she passed away, with the Bodhisatta, to fare according to her deeds. [1.75]

When he had ended this lesson to show that the Buddha was unmatched in the past as then, he showed the connection by uttering, after Fully Awakening, this verse: {1.196}

1. “With heavy loads to carry, with bad roads,
   They harness Kāṇha; he soon draws the load.”

After his lesson to show that only Kāḷaka could draw the load, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Uppalavaṇṇā was the old woman of those days, and I myself Ayyakā Kāḷaka.”

Ja 30 Muṇikajātaka

The Story about (the Pig) Muṇika (1s)

Alternative Title: Munikajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk is in danger of being seduced from his monastic life by a sensual girl. The Buddha tells how in a previous life a pig was fattened up and sent to his death by 252 See hereon Benfey’s Pañcatantra, page 228, where the migrations of this popular story are traced.

---

the same girl, and his life, though it looked like he was prospering, was nothing to be envious of.

The Bodhisatta = (the ox) Mahālohitā, Ānanda = (his brother) Cullalohita,
the young woman = the sensual girl (thullakumārika),
the lustful monk = the pig, Muṇika (Muṇikasūkara).

Present Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 30 Muṇika, Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 286 Sālūka, Ja 348 Arañña, Ja 435 Haliddirāga, Present Compare: Vin Mv 1 (1.35).

Keywords: Lust, Contentment, Animals.

“Then envy not poor Muṇika.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about being seduced by a sensuous young woman, as will be related in the Thirteenth Book in the Cullanāradakassapajātaka [Ja 477].

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.”

At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.”

Then the Teacher asked that monk, saying: “Is it true, monk, as they say, that you are overcome by passion?” “It is true, sir,” was the reply. “Monk,” said the Teacher, “she is your bane; even in bygone days, you met your end and were made into a relish for the company on her marriage-day.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as an ox, named Mahālohita [Big Red], on the householder’s estate in a certain hamlet. And he had a younger brother who was known as Cullalohita [Little Red].
There were only these two brothers to do all the draught-work of the family. Also, the householder had an only daughter, whose hand was asked in marriage for his son by a gentleman of the town. And the parents of the girl, with a view to furnishing dainty fare {1.197} for the wedding guests, began to fatten up a pig named Muṇika.

Observing this, Cullalohita said to his brother, “All the loads that have to be drawn for this household are drawn by you and me, my brother; but all they give us for our pains is sorry grass and straw to eat. Yet here is the pig being victualled on rice! What can be the reason why he should be treated to such fare?” [1.76]
The Section with One Verse – 252

Said his brother, “My dear Cullalohita, envy him not; for the pig eats the food of death. It is but to furnish a relish for the guests at their daughter’s wedding, that the family are feeding up the pig. Wait but a little time and the guests will be coming. Then will you see that pig lugged out of his quarters by the legs, killed, and in process of conversion into curry.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Then envy not poor Muṇīka; ’tis death
   He eats. Contented munch your frugal chaff –
   The pledge and guarantee of length of days.”

Not long afterwards the guests did arrive; and Muṇīka was killed and cooked into all manner of dishes. Said the Bodhisatta to Cullalohita, “Did you see Muṇīka, dear brother?” “I have indeed seen, brother, the outcome of Muṇīka’s feasting. Better a hundred, nay a thousand, times than such food is ours, though it be but grass, straw, and chaff; for our fare harms us not, and is a pledge that our lives will not be cut short.”

When he had ended his lesson to the effect that the monk had thus in bygone days been brought to his doom by that young woman and had been made into a relish for the company, [1.198] he preached the Truths, at the close whereof the monk overcome by passion reached the First Path. Also the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The monk overcome by passion was the pig Muṇīka of those days, the young woman is the same in both cases, Ānanda was Cullalohita, and I myself Mahālohiṭa.”

Ja 31 Kulāvakajātaka
The Story about the Nest (1s)

In the present one monk, driven by necessity kills living beings by drinking unfiltered water, against the rules of the order. When the Buddha hears of this he tells a story of how Sakka, King of the Devas, had avoided hurting living beings, and had thereby won the day in the war between the gods and the Asuras.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, Ānanda = Mātali, his charioteer (Mātalisaṅgāhaka).
The Section with One Verse – 253

Present Compare: Vin Cv 5 (2.118),
Past Compare: Dhp-a II.7, Jm 11 Śakrajātakam.

Keywords: Restraint, Compassion, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Let all the forest’s nestlings.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who drank water without straining it.253

Tradition says that two young monks who were friends went from Sāvatthi into the country, and took up their abode in a pleasant spot. After staying there as long as they wanted, they departed and set out for Jetavana in order to see the Perfect Buddha. [1.77]

One of them carried a strainer; the other had none; so both of them used the same strainer before drinking. One day they fell out. The owner of the strainer did not lend it to his companion, but strained and drank alone by himself.

As the other was not allowed the strainer, and as he could not endure his thirst, he drank water without straining it. In due course both reached Jetavana and with respectful salutation to the Teacher took their seats. After friendly words of greeting, he asked whence they had come.

“Sir,” they said, “we have been living in a hamlet in the Kosala country, whence we have come in order to see you.” “I trust you have arrived as good friends, as you started?” Said the monk without a strainer, “Sir, he fell out with me on the road and would not lend me his strainer.” Said the other, “Sir, he didn’t strain his water, but – wittingly – drank it down with all the living things it contained.” “Is this report true, monk, that you wittingly drank off water with all the living things it contained?” “Yes, sir, I did drink unstrained water,” was the reply. “Monk, the wise and good of bygone days, when flying on their route along the deep in the days of their sovereignty over the City of the Devas, thought scorn to slay living-creatures in order to secure power for themselves. Rather, they turned their

253 As to the rules for filtering water, see Vinaya Cullavagga v. 13.
chariot back, sacrificing great glory in order to save the lives of the young of the Garuḷas.⁵²⁵⁴ And, so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.199]

How Sakka gained his Position

In the past there was a king of Magadha reigning at Rājagaha in the land of Magadha. And just as he who is now Sakka came to life in his preceding birth in the hamlet of Macala in the land of Magadha, even so was it in the self-same hamlet that the Bodhisatta came to life in those days as a young noble. When the day for his naming came, he was named ‘Prince Magha [Maghamāṇava],’ but when he grew up, it was as ‘Magha the young brahmin [Maghamāṇava]’ that he was known. His parents took a wife for him from a family of equal rank with their own; and he, with a family of sons and daughters growing up round him, excelled in generosity, and kept the Five Precepts.

In that village there were just thirty families, and one day the men were standing in the middle of the village transacting the affairs of the village. The Bodhisatta had kicked aside the dust from where he was standing, and was standing there in comfort, when up came another and took his stand there. Then the Bodhisatta made himself another comfortable standing-place – only to have it taken from him like the first. Again and again the Bodhisatta began afresh until he had made comfortable standing-places for every man there.

Another time he put up a pavilion – which later on he pulled down, building a hall with benches and a jar of water inside. Another time these thirty men were led by the Bodhisatta to [1.78] become like-minded with himself; he established them in the Five Precepts, and thenceforth used to go about with them doing good works. And they too doing good works, always in the Bodhisatta’s company, used to get up early and sally forth, with razors and axes and clubs in their hands. With their clubs they used to roll out of the way all stones that lay on the four highways and other roads of the village; the trees that would strike against the axles of chariots, they cut down; rough places they made smooth; causeways they built, dug water-tanks, and built a hall; they showed generosity and kept the Precepts. In this wise

---

²⁵⁴ Garuḷas were winged creatures of a supernatural order, the inveterate foes of the Nāgas, whose domain was the water. cf. (e.g.) Jātaka No. 154.
The body of the villagers generally abide by the Bodhisatta’s teachings and keep the Precepts.

Thought the village headman to himself, “When these men used to get drunk and commit murders and so forth, I used to make a lot of money out of them not only on the price of their drinks but also by the fines and dues they paid. But now here’s this young brahmin Magha bent on making them keep the Precepts; he is putting a stop to murders and other crime.” And in his rage he cried, “I’ll make them keep the Five Precepts!” And he repaired to the king, saying: “Sire, there is a band of robbers going about sacking villages and committing other villainies.” When the king heard this, he bade the headman go and bring the men before him. And away went the man and hauled up as prisoners before the king every one of those thirty men, representing them to be the rascals. Without enquiry into their doings, the king commanded offhand that they should be trampled to death by the elephant. Forthwith they made them lie down in the king’s courtyard and sent for the elephant. The Bodhisatta exhorted them, saying: “Bear in mind the Precepts; love the slanderer, the king and the elephant as yourselves.” And they did so.

Then the elephant was brought in to trample them to death. Yet lead him as they might, he would not approach them, but fled away trumpeting loudly. Elephant after elephant was brought up; but they all fled away like the first. Thinking that the men must have some drug about their persons, the king ordered them to be searched. Search was made accordingly, but nothing was found; and so they told the king. “Then they must be muttering some spell,” said the king, “ask them whether they have got a spell to mutter.”

The question being put to them, the Bodhisatta said they had got a spell. And this the king’s people told his majesty. So the king had them all summoned to his presence and said: “Tell me your spell.”

The Bodhisatta made answer, “Sire, we have no other spell than this, that not a man among the whole thirty of us destroys life, or takes what is not given, or misconducts himself, or lies; we drink no strong drink; we abound in loving-kindness; we show generosity; we level the roads, dig tanks, and build a public hall; this is our spell, our safeguard, and our strength.”

Well-pleased with them, the king gave them all the wealth in the slanderer’s house and made him their slave; and he gave them the elephant and the village to boot.
Thenceforward, doing good works to their hearts’ content, they sent for a carpenter and caused him to put up a large hall at the meeting of the four highways; but [1.201] as they had lost all desire for womankind, they would not let any woman share in the good work.

Now in those days there were four women in the Bodhisatta’s house, whose names were Sudhammā [Goodness], Cittā [Thoughtful], Nandā [Joy], and Sujātī [Highborn]. Of these Sudhammā, finding herself alone with the carpenter, gave him a bribe, saying: “Brother, contrive to make me the principal person in connection with this hall.”

“Very good,” said he. And before doing any other work on the building, he had some pinnacle-wood dried, which he fashioned and bored and made into a finished pinnacle. This he wrapped up in a cloth and laid aside. When the hall was finished, and it was time to put on the pinnacle, he exclaimed, “Alas, my masters, there’s one thing we have not made.” “What’s that?” “Why, we ought to have a pinnacle.” “All right, let one be got.” “But it can’t be made out of green wood; we ought to have a pinnacle which had been cut some time ago, and fashioned, and bored, and laid by.” “Well, what is to be done now?” “Why, have a look round to see if anybody has got such a thing in his house as a ready-made pinnacle for sale.”

As they looked round accordingly, they found one in the house of Sudhammā, but could not buy it of her for any money. “If you will make me a partner in the good work,” said she, “I will give it you for nothing.” “No,” was the reply, “we do not let women have a share in the good work.”

Then said the carpenter to them, “My masters, what is this you say? Save the Realm of Brahmā, there is no place from which women are excluded. Take the pinnacle, and our work will be complete.”

Consenting, they took the pinnacle and completed their hall. They had benches put up, and jars of water set inside, providing also a constant supply of boiled rice. Round the hall they built a wall with a gate, strewing the space inside the wall with sand and planting a row of fan-palms outside. Cittā too caused a pleasure garden to be laid out at this spot, and not a flowering or fruit-bearing tree could be named which did not grow there. Nandā, too, caused a water-tank to be dug in the same place, covered over with the five kinds of lotuses, beautiful to behold. Sujātī did nothing at all. [1.80]
The Bodhisatta fulfilled these seven injunctions – to cherish one’s mother, to cherish one’s father, to honour one’s elders, to speak truth, to avoid harsh speech, to eschew slander, and to shun niggardliness:

“Whoso supports his parents, honours age,
Is gentle, friendly-spoken, slandering not,
Unchurlish, truthful, lord – not slave – of wrath,
– Him e’en the Thirty Three shall hail as good.”

Such was the praiseworthy state to which he grew, and at his life’s close he passed away to be reborn in the Realm of the Thirty-Three as Sakka, King of Devas; and there too were his friends reborn.

The War between the Devas and Asuras

In those days there were Asuras dwelling in the Realm of the Thirty-Three. Said Sakka, King of Devas, “What good to us is a kingdom which others share?” So he made the Asuras drink the liquor of the Devas, and when they were drunken, he had them hurled by the feet on to the steeps of Mount Sineru. They tumbled right down to ‘The Asura Realm,’ as it is called – a region on the lowest level of Mount Sineru, equal in extent to the Realm of the Thirty-Three. Here grows a tree, resembling the Coral Tree of the Devas, which lasts for an aeon and is called the Pied Trumpet-flower. The blossoms of this tree showed them at once that this was not the Realm of Devas, for there the Coral Tree blooms. So they cried, “Old Sakka has made us drunk and cast us into the great deep, seizing on our heavenly city.” “Come,” they shouted, “let us win back our own realm from him by force of arms.” And up the sides of Sineru they climbed, like ants up a pillar.

Hearing the alarm given that the Asuras were up, Sakka went out into the great deep to give them battle, but being worsted in the fight turned and fled away along crest after crest of the southern deep in his ‘Chariot of Victory,’ which was a hundred and fifty leagues long.

---

One of the devalokas, or angelic realms, of Buddhist cosmogony, was the Tāvatiṃsabhavana, or ‘Realm of the Thirty-three,’ so called because its denizens were subject to thirty-three Devas headed by Sakka, the Indra of the pre-Buddhist faith. Every world-system, it may here be added, had a Sakka of its own, as is indicated infra.
Now as his chariot sped along the deep, it came to the Forest of the Silk-Cotton Trees. Along the track of the chariot these mighty trees were mowed down like so many palms, and fell into the deep. And as the young of the Garuḷas hurtled through the deep, loud were their shrieks. Said Sakka to Mātali, his charioteer, “Mātali, my friend, what manner of noise is this? How heartrending it sounds.” “Sire, it is the united cry of the young Garuḷas in the agony of their fear, as their forest is uprooted by the rush of your chariot.” Said the Great Being, “Let them not be troubled because of me, friend Mātali. Let us not, for empire’s sake, so act as to destroy life. Rather will I, for their sake, give my life as a sacrifice to the Asuras. Turn the carriage back.” And so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Let all the forest’s nestlings, Mātali,
   Escape our all-devouring chariot.
   I offer up, a willing sacrifice,
   My life to yonder Asuras; these poor birds
   Shall not, through me, from out their nests be torn.”

At the word, Mātali, the charioteer, turned the chariot round, and made for the Realm of Devas by another route. But the moment the Asuras saw him begin to turn his chariot round, they cried out that the Sakkas of other worlds were surely coming up, “It must be his reinforcements which make him turn his chariot back again.” Trembling for their lives, they all ran away and never stopped till they came to the Asura Realm. And Sakka entering heaven, stood in the midst of his city, girt round by two hosts of Devas. And at that moment through the riven earth there rose up the ‘Palace of Victory,’ some thousand leagues high – so-called because it arose in the hour of victory. Then, to prevent the Asuras from coming back again, Sakka had guards set in five places – concerning which it has been said:

“Impregnable both cities stand! Between,
   In fivefold guard, watch Nāgas, Garuḷas, Kumbhaṇḍas, Yakkhas, and the Four Great Kings!”

The Rebirth of his Wives

But when Sakka was enjoying as king of the Devas the glory of heaven, safely warded by his sentinels at these five posts, Sudhammā died and was reborn as a handmaiden of Sakka once more. And the effect of her gift of the pinnacle was that there arose for her a mansion—named ‘Sudhammā’—studded with heavenly jewels, five hundred leagues high, where, under a white heavenly canopy of royal state, sat Sakka, King of Devas, ruling men and Devas.

Cittā, too, died, and was once more born as a handmaiden of Sakka; and the effect of her action in respect of the pleasure gardens was such that there arose a pleasure garden called ‘Cittā’s Creeper-Grove.’

Nandā, too, died and was reborn once more as one of Sakka’s handmaidens; and the fruit of her tank was that there arose a tank called ‘Nandā’ after her.

But Sujātī, having performed no act of merit, was reborn as a crane in a grotto in the forest.

“There’s no sign of Sujātī,” said Sakka to himself, “I wonder where she has been reborn.” And as he considered the matter, he discovered her whereabouts. So he paid her a visit, and bringing her back with him to heaven showed her the delightful city of the Devas, the Hall of Sudhammā, Cittā’s Creeper-Grove, and the Tank called Nandā. “These three,” said Sakka, “have been reborn as my handmaidens by reason of the good works they did; but you, having done no good work, have been reborn in the brute creation. Henceforth keep the Precepts.” And having exhorted her thus, and confirmed her in the Five Precepts, he took her back and let her go free. And thenceforth she did keep the Precepts.

A short time afterwards, being curious to know whether she really was able to keep the Precepts, Sakka went and lay down before her in the shape of a fish. Thinking the fish was dead, the crane seized it by the head. The fish wagged its tail. “Why, I do believe it’s alive,” said the crane, and let the fish go. “Very good, very good,” said Sakka, “you will be able to keep the Precepts.” And so saying he went away.

Dying as a crane, Sujātī was reborn into the family of a potter in Benares. Wondering where she had got to, and at last discovering her whereabouts, Sakka, disguised as an old man, filled a cart with cucumbers of solid gold and sat in the middle of the village, crying, “Buy my cucumbers! Buy my cucumbers!” Folk came to him and asked for them. “I only part with them to such as keep the Precepts,” said he, “do you keep them?” “We don’t know what you mean by ‘Precepts;’ sell us the cucumbers.” “No; I don’t want money for my cucumbers. I give them away – but only to those that keep the Precepts.” “Who is this fool?” said the folk as they turned away. Hearing of this, Sujātī thought to herself that the cucumbers must have been brought for her, and accordingly went and asked for some. “Do you keep the Precepts, madam?” said he. “Yes, I do,” was the reply. “It was for you alone that I brought these here,” said he, and leaving cucumbers, cart and all at her door he departed.

Continuing all her life long to keep the Precepts, Sujātī after her death was reborn the daughter of the Asura king Vepacitti, and for her goodness was rewarded with the gift of great beauty. When she grew up, her father mustered the Asuras together to give his daughter her pick of them for a husband. And Sakka, who had searched and found out her whereabouts, donned the shape of an Asura, and came down, saying to himself, “If Sujātī chooses a husband really after her own heart, I shall be he.”

Sujātī was arrayed and brought forth to the place of assembly, where she was bidden to select a husband after her own heart. Looking round and observing Sakka, she was moved by her love for him in a bygone existence to choose him for her husband. Sakka carried her off to the city of the Devas and made her the chief of twenty-five millions of dancing girls. And when his term of life ended, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher rebuked that monk in these words, “Thus, monks, the wise and good of bygone days when they were rulers of the Devas, forbore, even at the sacrifice of their own lives, to be guilty of slaughter. And can you, who have devoted yourself to so saving a dispensation, drink unstrained water with all the living creatures it contains?” And he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “Ānanda was then Mātali the charioteer, and I was Sakka.”
Ja 32 Naccajātaka

The Story about the Dance (1s)

In the present a rich man ordains in the Saṅgha, and makes sure he has all provisions for his life. When taken to the Buddha he flings off his clothes in protest, and later disrobes. The Buddha tells a story of how the king of the birds allowed his daughter to choose a suitor. She chose a peacock, but when he danced for her, he exposed himself, and the king reprimanded him, and gave her to another.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the geese (haṁsarājā), the monk with many belongings = the peacock (mora).

Keywords: Restraint, Modesty, Animals, Birds.

“A pleasing note.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk with many belongings. The incident is just the same as in the Devadhammajātaka [Ja 6] above.

Tradition tells us that, on the death of his wife, a householder of Sāvatthi joined the Saṅgha. When he was joining, he caused to be built for himself a chamber to live in, a room for the fire, and a store-room; and not till he had stocked his store-room with ghee, rice, and the like, did he finally join. Even after he had become a monk, he used to send for his servants and make them cook him what he liked to eat. He was richly provided with the requisites - having an entire change of clothing for night and another for day; and he dwelt aloof on the outskirts of the monastery.

One day when he had taken out his cloths and bedding and had spread them out to dry in his chamber, a number of monks from the country, who were on a pilgrimage from monastery to monastery, came in their journeying to his cell and found all these belongings.

“Whose are these?” they asked. “Mine, sirs,” he replied. “What, sir?” they cried, “this upper-cloth and that as well; this under-robe as well as that; and that

---

256 See Plate xxvii (11) of the Stūpa of Bharhut (where a fragment of a carving of this story is figured), Benfey’s Pañcatantra i. p. 280, and Hahn’s Sagewiss. Studien, p. 69. cf. also Herodotus, vi. 129.
bedding too, is it all yours?” “Yes, nobody’s but mine.” “Sir,” they said, “the Fortunate One has only sanctioned three cloths; and yet, though the Buddha, to whose dispensation you have devoted yourself, is so simple in his wants, you forsooth have amassed all this stock of requisites. Come! We must take you before the One with Ten Powers.” And, so saying, they went off with him to the Teacher.

Becoming aware of their presence, the Teacher said: “Wherefore is it, monks, that you have brought the monk against his will?” “Sir, this monk is well-off and has quite a stock of requisites.”

“Is this report true, monk,” said the Teacher, “that you have many belongings?” “Yes, sir.” “Why have you come to own so many belongings?” Without listening beyond this point, the monk tore off the whole of his raiment, and stood stark naked before the Teacher, crying, “I’ll go about like this!” “Oh, fie!” exclaimed every one. The man ran away, and reverted to the lower state of a layman.

Gathering together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks talked of his impropriety in behaving in that manner right before the Teacher. In came the Teacher and asked what was theme of discussion in the conclave. “Sir,” was the answer, “we were discussing the impropriety of that monk, and saying that in your presence and right before all the four classes of your followers257 he had so far lost all sense of shame as to stand there stark naked as a village-urchin, and that, finding himself loathed by everyone, he relapsed to the lower state and lost the faith.” Said the Teacher, “Monks, this is not the only loss his shamelessness has caused him; for in bygone days he lost a jewel of a wife just as now he has lost the jewel of the dispensation.” And so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.207]

In the past, in the first cycle of the world’s history, the quadrupeds chose the lion as their king, the fishes the monster-fish Ānanda, and the birds the Golden Mallard [Ja 270]. Now the king Golden Mallard had a lovely young daughter, and her royal father granted her any boon she might ask. The boon she asked for was to be allowed to choose a husband for herself; and the king in fulfilment of his promise mustered all the birds together in the country of the 257 i.e. Monks, nuns, lay-brothers, and lay-sisters.

Himālayas. All manner of birds came, swans and peacocks and all other birds; and they flocked together on a great plateau of bare rock. Then the king sent for his daughter and bade her go and choose a husband after her own heart. As she reviewed the crowd of birds, her eye lighted on the peacock with his neck of jewelled sheen and tail of varied hue; and she chose him, saying: “Let this be my husband.” Then the assembly of the birds went up to the peacock and said: “Friend peacock, this princess, in choosing her husband from among all these birds, has fixed her choice on you.”

Carried away by his extreme joy, the peacock exclaimed, “Until this day you have never seen how active I am,” and in defiance of all decency he spread his wings and began to dance; and in dancing he exposed himself.

Filled with shame, king Golden Mallard said: “This fellow has neither modesty within his heart nor decency in his outward behaviour; I certainly will not give my daughter to one so shameless.” And there in the midst of all that assembly of the birds, he repeated this verse:

1. “A pleasing note is yours, a lovely back,
   A neck in hue like lapis lazuli;
   A fathom’s length your outstretched feathers reach.
   But still, your dancing loses you my child.”

Right in the face of the whole gathering king Royal Mallard gave his daughter to a young mallard, a nephew of his. Covered with shame at the loss of the mallard princess, [1.208] the peacock rose straight up from the place and fled away. And king Golden Mallard too went back to his dwelling-place.

“Thus, monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the only time his breach of modesty has caused him loss; just as it has now caused him to lose the jewel of the dispensation, so in bygone days it lost him a jewel of a wife.” When he had ended this lesson, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The monk with the many belongings was the peacock of those days, and I myself the Royal Mallard.”
The Story about being in Agreement (1s)

Alternative Title: Vaṭṭakajātaka (Comm)

In the present the Sākiyas and the Koliyas fall into a dispute over water. The Buddha reconciles them and then tells a story of the past showing how when quails were united they lifted the net and flew away safely from their hunter; but as soon as he managed to sew discord, they fell to him as prey.

The Bodhisatta = the wise quail (paṇḍitavaṭṭaka), Devadatta = the unwise quail (apaṇḍitavaṭṭaka).

Keywords: Concord, Cooperation, Animals, Birds.

“While concord reigns.” [1.85] This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling in the Banyan-grove near Kapilavatthu, about a squabble over a porter’s head-pad, as will be related in the Kuṇālajātaka [Ja 536].

This was a story told by the Teacher, while dwelling beside lake Kuṇāla, concerning five hundred monks who were overwhelmed with discontent. Here follows the story in due order. The Sākiya and Koliya tribes had the river Rohinī which flows between the cities of Kapilavatthu and Koliya confined by a single dam and by means of it cultivated their crops. In the month Jeṭṭhamūla when the crops began to flag and droop, the labourers from amongst the dwellers of both cities assembled together. Then the people of Koliya said: “Should this water be drawn off on both sides, it will not prove sufficient for both us and you. But our crops will thrive with a single watering; give us then the water.” The people of Kapilavatthu said: “When you have filled your garners with corn, we shall hardly have the courage to come with ruddy gold, emeralds and copper coins, and with baskets and sacks in our hands, to hang about your doors. Our crops too will thrive with a single watering; give us the water.” “We will not give it,” they said. “Neither will we,” said the others.

---

See for the migrations of this story Benfey’s Pañcatantra 1. 304, and Fausböll in JRAS, 1870. See also Julien’s Avadānas, Vol. 1. page 155.
As words thus ran high, one of them rose up and struck another a blow, and he in turn struck a third and thus it was that what with interchanging of blows and spitefully touching on the origin of their princely families they increased the tumult. The Koliya labourers said: “Be off with your people of Kapilavatthu, men who like dogs, jackals, and such like beasts, cohabited with their own sisters. What will their elephants and horses, their shields and spears avail against us?” The Sākiya labourers replied, “Nay, do you, wretched lepers, be off with your children, destitute and ill-conditioned fellows, who like brute beasts had their dwelling in a hollow jujube tree (koli). What shall their elephants and horses, their spears and shields avail against us?”

So they went and told the councillors appointed to such services and they reported it to the princes of their tribes. Then the Sākiyas said: “We will show them how strong and mighty are the men who cohabited with their sisters,” and they sallied forth, ready for the fray. And the Koliyas said: “We will show them how strong and mighty are they who dwelt in the hollow of a jujube tree,” and they too sallied forth ready for the fight.

But other teachers tell the story thus, “When the female slaves of the Sākiyas and Koliyas came to the river to fetch water, and throwing the coils of cloth that they carried on their heads upon the ground were seated and pleasantly conversing, a certain woman took another’s cloth, thinking it was her own; and when owing to this a quarrel arose, each claiming the coil of cloth as hers, gradually the people of the two cities, the serfs and the labourers, the attendants, headmen, councillors and viceroys, all of them sallied forth ready for battle.”

On this occasion, however, the Teacher spoke thus to his kinsfolk, “My lords, strife among kinsfolk is unseemly. Yes, in bygone times, animals, who had defeated their enemies when they lived in concord, came to utter destruction when they fell out.” And at the request of his royal kinsfolk, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a quail, and lived in the forest at the head of many thousands of quails. In those days a fowler who caught quails came to that place; and he used to imitate the note of a quail till he saw that the birds had been drawn together, when he flung his net over them, and whipped the sides of the net together, so as to get them all huddled up in a heap. Then he crammed them into his basket, and going home sold his prey for a living.

Now one day the Bodhisatta said to those quails, “This fowler is making havoc among our kinsfolk. I have a device whereby he will be unable to catch us. Henceforth, the very moment he throws the net over you, let each one put his head through a mesh and then all of you together must fly away with the net to such place as you please, and there let it down on a thorn-brake; this done, we will all escape from our several meshes.” “Very good,” said they all in ready agreement.

On the morrow, when the net was cast over them, they did just as the Bodhisatta had told them: they lifted up the net, and let it down on a thorn-brake, escaping themselves from underneath. While the fowler was still disentangling his net, evening came on; and he went away empty-handed. On the morrow and following days the quails played the same trick. So that it became the regular thing for the fowler to be engaged till sunset disentangling his net, and then to betake himself home empty-handed. Accordingly his wife grew angry and said: “Day by day you return empty-handed; I suppose you’ve got a second establishment to keep up elsewhere.” [1.86]

“No, my dear,” said the fowler, “I’ve no second establishment to keep up. The fact is those quails have come to work together now. The moment my net is over them, off they fly with it and escape, leaving it on a thorn-brake. Still, they won’t live in unity always. Don’t you bother yourself; as soon as they start bickering among themselves, I shall bag the lot, and that will bring a smile to your face to see.” And so saying, he repeated this verse to his wife:

1. “While concord reigns, the birds bear off the net.
   When quarrels rise, they’ll fall a prey to me.”

Not long after this, one of the quails, in alighting on their feeding ground, trod by accident on another’s head. “Who trod on my head?” angrily cried this latter. “I did; but I didn’t mean to. Don’t be angry,” said the first quail. But notwithstanding this answer, the other remained as angry as before. Continuing to answer one another, they began to swap taunts, saying: “I suppose it is you single-handed who lift up the net.” As they wrangled thus with one another, the Bodhisatta thought to himself, “There’s no safety with one who is quarrelsome. The time has come when they will no longer lift up the net, and thereby they will come to great destruction. The fowler will get his opportunity. I can stay here no longer.” And thereupon he with his following went elsewhere.

Sure enough the fowler \{1.210\} came back again a few days later, and first collecting them together by imitating the note of a quail, flung his net over them. Then said one quail, “They say when you were at work lifting the net, the hair of your head fell off. Now’s your time; lift away.” The other rejoined, “When you were lifting the net, they say both your wings moulted. Now’s your time; lift away.”

But while they were each inviting the other to lift the net, the fowler himself lifted the net for them and crammed them in a heap into his basket and bore them off home, so that his wife’s face was wreathed with smiles.

“Thus, sire,” said the Teacher, “such a thing as a quarrel among kinsfolk is unseemly; quarrelling leads only to destruction.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “Devadatta was the foolish quail of those days, and I myself the wise and good quail.”

Ja 34 Macchajātaka

The Story about the Fish (1s)

In the present a monk is overcome by passion thinking about his former wife. When the Buddha hears about this he tells a story of the past in which, blinded by passion, a fish had almost lost his life, and grieved that his wife may think him unfaithful, while she herself had escaped capture. The Bodhisatta saved him from his fate.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
the lustful monk = the male fish (maccha),
his former wife = the female fish (macchi).

Past Compare: Ja 297 Kāmavilāpa.

Keywords: Regret, Lust, Animals, Fish.

“ ’Tis not the cold.” [1.87] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about being seduced by the wife of one's mundane life before joining the Saṅgha. Said the Teacher on this occasion, “Is it true, as I hear, monk, that you are overcome by passion?” “Yes, Fortunate One.” “Because of whom?” “My former wife, sir, is sweet to touch; I cannot give her up!” Then said the Teacher, “Monk, this woman is hurtful to you. It was through her that in bygone times too you were meeting your end, when you were saved by me.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta became his family priest.

In those days some fishermen had cast their net into the river. And a great big fish came along amorously toying with his wife. She, scenting the net as she swam ahead of him, made a circuit round it and escaped. But her amorous spouse, blinded by passion, sailed right into the meshes of the net. As soon as the fishermen felt him in their net, they hauled it in and took the fish out; they did not kill him at once, but flung him alive on the sands. “We’ll cook him in the embers for our meal,” said they; and accordingly they set to work to light a fire and whittle a spit to roast him on. The fish lamented, saying to himself, “It’s not the torture of the embers or the anguish of the spit or any other pain that grieves me; but only the distressing thought that my wife should be unhappy in the belief that I have gone off with another.” And he repeated this verse:

1. "‘Tis not the cold, the heat, or wounding net;
‘Tis but the fear my darling wife should think Another’s love has lured her spouse away."

Just then the priest came to the riverside with his attendant servants to bathe. Now he understood the language of all animals. Therefore, when he heard the fish’s lamentation, he thought to himself, “This fish is lamenting the lament of passion. If he should die in this unhealthy state of mind, he cannot escape rebirth in hell. I will save him.” So he went to the fishermen and said: “My men, don’t you supply us with a fish every day for our curry?” “What do you say, sir?” said the fishermen, “pray take away with you any fish you may take a fancy to.” “We don’t need any but this one; only give us this one.” “He’s yours, sir.” [1.88]

Taking the fish in his two hands, the Bodhisatta seated himself on the bank and said: “Friend fish, if I had not seen you today, you would have met your death.

259 [For a similar, but less complete story, see Ja 216 Macchajātaka.]
Cease for the future to be the slave of passion.” And with this exhortation he threw the fish into the water, and went into the city. (1.212)

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof the monk overcome by passion won the First Path. Also, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The former wife was the female fish of those days, the monk overcome by passion was the male fish, and I myself the family priest.”

Ja 35 Vaṭṭakajātaka

The Story about the (Young) Quail (1s)

In the present the Buddha and the monks, when traveling through a forest, were surrounded by fire, but in the exact spot they stood it did not burn. The monks think this is due to the Buddha's current excellence; but he tells how, when he was a baby quail, he had made an asservation of truth in the past, which had stayed the fire in those parts for an aeon.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the quails (vaṭṭakarājā), Suddhodana and Mahāmāyā = his father and mother (mātāpitaro).

Past Source: Ja 35 Vaṭṭaka,
Quoted: Ja 536 Kuṇāla (Present),
Past Compare: Cp 29 Vaṭṭapotakacariyā, Jm 16 Vartakāpītaka.

Keywords: Truth, Miracle, Animals, Birds.

“With wings that fly not.” This story was told by the Teacher, while on an alms pilgrimage through Magadha, about the going-out of a jungle fire. Once the Teacher, while on an alms pilgrimage through Magadha, went on his morning round for alms through a certain hamlet in that country; on his return, after his meal, he went out again followed by the company of the monks. Just then a great fire broke out. There were numbers of monks both in front of the Teacher and behind him. On came the fire, spreading far and wide, till all was one sheet of smoke and flame. Hereupon, some unconverted monks were seized with the fear of death. “Let us make a counter fire,” they cried, “and then the big fire will not sweep over the ground we have fired.” And, with this view, they set about kindling a fire with their tinder-sticks.

--

See reference to this story under Jātaka No. 20, above.

But others said: “What is this you do, monks? You are like such as mark not the moon in mid-heaven, or the sun’s orb rising with myriad rays from the east, or the sea on whose shores they stand, or Mount Sineru towering before their very eyes – when, as you journey along in the company of him who is peerless among Devas and men alike, you give not a thought to the Supreme Buddha, but cry out, ‘Let us make a fire!’ You know not the might of a Buddha! Come, let us go to the Teacher.” Then, gathering together from front and rear alike, the monks in a body flocked round the One with Ten Powers. At a certain spot the Teacher halted, with this mighty assembly of the monks surrounding him. On rolled the flames, roaring as though to devour them. But when they approached the spot where the Tathāgata had taken his stand, they came no nearer than sixteen lengths, but there and then went out – even as a torch plunged into water. It had no power to spread over a space thirty-two lengths in diameter. [1.89]

The monks burst into praises of the Teacher, saying: “Oh! How great are the virtues of a Buddha! For, even this fire, though lacking sense, could not sweep over the spot where a Buddha stood, but went out like a torch in water. Oh! How marvellous are the powers of a Buddha!” {1.213}

Hearing their words, the Teacher said: “It is no present power of mine, monks, that makes this fire go out on reaching this spot of ground. It is the power of a former ‘Assertion of Truth’ of mine. For in this spot no fire will burn throughout the whole of this aeon, the miracle being one which endures for an aeon.” 261

Then the elder Ānanda folded a robe into four and spread it for the Teacher to sit on. The Teacher took his seat. Bowing to the Tathāgata as he sat cross-legged there, the monks too seated themselves around him. Then they asked him, saying: “Only the present is known to us, sir; the past is hidden from us. Make it known to us.” And, at their request, he told this story of the past.

In the past in this selfsame spot in Magadha, it was as a quail that the Bodhisatta came to life once more. Breaking his way out of the shell of the egg in which he was born, he became a young quail, about as big as a large ball. And his parents kept him lying in the nest, while they fed him with food which they brought in their beaks. In himself, he had not the strength either to spread his wings and fly through the air, or to lift his feet and walk upon the ground.

261 [See Ja 20 Naḷapānajātaka, in which this Jātaka and wonder is mentioned.]

Year after year that spot was always ravaged by a jungle-fire; and it was just at this time that the flames swept down on it with a mighty roaring. The flocks of birds, darting from their several nests, were seized with the fear of death, and flew shrieking away. The father and mother of the Bodhisatta were as frightened as the others and flew away, forsaking the Bodhisatta. Lying there in the nest, the Bodhisatta stretched forth his neck, and seeing the flames spreading towards him, he thought to himself, “Had I the power to put forth my wings and fly, I would wing my way hence to safety; or, if I could move my legs and walk, I could escape elsewhere afoot. Moreover, my parents, seized with the fear of death, are fled away to save themselves, leaving me here quite alone in the world. I am without protector or helper. What, then, shall I do this day?”

Then this thought came to him, “In this world there exists what is termed the Efficacy of Goodness, and what is termed the Efficacy of Truth. There are those who, through their having realised the Perfections in past ages, have attained beneath the Bodhi tree to be Fully Awakened; who, having won Release by goodness, tranquillity and wisdom, possess also discernment of the knowledge of such Release; [1.214] who are filled with truth, compassion, mercy, and patience; whose love embraces all creatures alike; whom men call omniscient Buddhas. There is an efficacy in the attributes they have won. And I too grasp one truth; I hold and believe in a single [1.90] principle in Nature. Therefore, it behoves me to call to mind the Buddhas of the past, and the Efficacy they have won, and to lay hold of the true belief that is in me touching the principle of Nature; and by an Assertion of Truth to make the flames go back, to the saving both of myself and of the rest of the birds.”

Therefore it has been said:

262 See Morris, JPTS 1884, p. 90.
“There’s saving grace in Goodness in this world;
There’s truth, compassion, purity of life.
Thereby, I’ll make an Assertion of Truth.
Remembering Faith’s might, and taking thought
On those who triumphed in the days gone by,
I truly made an Assertion of Truth.”

Accordingly, the Bodhisatta, calling to mind the efficacy of the Buddhas long since passed away, performed an Assertion of Truth in the name of the true faith that was in him, repeating this verse:

1. “With wings that fly not, feet that walk not yet,
   Forsaken by my parents, here I lie!
   Wherefore I conjure you, dread Lord of Fire,
   Primeval Jātaveda, turn! Go back!”

Even as he performed his Assertion of Truth, the fire went back a space of sixteen lengths; and in going back the flames did not pass away to the forest devouring everything in their path. No, they went out there and then, like a torch plunged in water. Therefore it has been said: [1.215]

   “I wrought many Assertions of Truth, and then
   The sheet of blazing fire left sixteen lengths
   Unscathed – like flames by water met and quenched.”

And as that spot escaped being wasted by fire throughout a whole aeon, the miracle is called an ‘aeon-miracle.’ When his life closed, the Bodhisatta, who had performed this Assertion of Truth, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

“Thus, monks,” said the Teacher, “it is not my present power but the power of truth made when a young quail, that has made the flames pass over this spot in the jungle.” His lesson ended, he preached the Truths, at the close whereof some won the First, some the Second, some the Third Path, while others again became Arahats. Also, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “My present parents were the parents of those days, and I myself the king of the quails.”
The Story about the Bird (1s)

In the present a monk is given a subject for meditation and goes to practice with it. Shortly thereafter his hut becomes unliveable, and the villagers do not repair it. At the end of his retreat he meets the Buddha who tells him a story of a warning he once gave when he was king of the birds. Some listened to him, and their lives were saved. Others perished.

The Bodhisatta = the wise bird (paññitasakuṇa), the Buddha’s disciples = the birds who listened (to him) (bodhisattassa vacanakarā sakuṇā).

Keywords: Amenability, Animals, Birds.

“You denizens of air.” [1.91] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk whose cell burnt down.

Tradition says that a monk, having been given a theme for meditation by the Teacher, went from Jetavana to the land of Kosala and there lived in a dwelling in a forest nearby a border-village. Now, during the very first month of his dwelling there, his cell burnt down. This he reported to the villagers, saying: “My cell has been burnt down; I live in discomfort.” They said: “The land is suffering from drought just now; we'll see to it when we have irrigated the fields.” When the irrigation was over, they said they must do their sowing first; when the sowing was done, they had the fences to put up; when the fences were put up; they had first to do the weeding and the reaping, and the threshing; till, what with one job and another which they kept mentioning, three whole months passed by.

After three months spent in the open air in discomfort, that monk had developed his theme for meditation, but could get no further. So, after the Pavāraṇā festival which ends the Rainy Season, he went back again to the Teacher, and, with due salutation, took his seat aside. After kindly words of greeting, the Teacher said: “Well, monk, have you lived happily through the Rainy Season? Did your theme

---

[There seems to be a mismatch between the story in the present, and the moral in the past. The monk was surely not to blame for his discomfort during their retreat, and it wouldn’t have been changed by listening to good advice.]
for meditation end in success?” The monk told him all that had happened, adding, “As I had no lodging to suit me, my theme did not end in success.”

Said the Teacher, “In bygone times, monk, even animals knew what suited them and what did not. How is it that you did not know?” And so saying, he told this story of the past. {1.216}

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a bird and lived round a giant tree with branching boughs, at the head of a company of birds. Now one day, as the boughs of this tree were grinding one against the other, dust began to fall, soon followed by smoke. When the Bodhisatta became aware of this, he thought to himself, “If these two boughs go on grinding against one another like this, they will produce fire; and the fire will fall and catch hold of the old leaves, and so come to set fire to this tree as well. We cannot live on here; the proper thing to do is to hasten off elsewhere.” And he repeated this verse to the company of birds:

1. “You denizens of air, that in these boughs
   Have sought a lodging, mark the seeds of fire
   This earthborn tree is breeding! Safety seek
   In flight! Our trusted stronghold harbours death!”

The wiser birds who followed the Bodhisatta’s counsels, at once rose up in the air and went elsewhere in his company. But the foolish ones said, [1.92] “It is always like this with him; he’s always seeing crocodiles in a drop of water.” And they, heeding not the Bodhisatta’s words, stopped where they were. In a very short time, just as the Bodhisatta had foreseen, flames really did break out, and the tree caught fire. When the smoke and flame arose, the birds, blinded by the smoke, were unable to get away; one by one they dropped into the flames and were destroyed.

“This, monks,” said the Teacher, “in bygone times even animals who were dwelling in the tree-top, knew what suited them and what did not. How is it that you did not know?” {1.217} His lesson ended, he preached the Truths, at the close whereof that monk won the Fruit of the First Path. Also, the Teacher showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s disciples were then the birds who hearkened to the Bodhisatta, and I myself was the wise and good bird.”
Ja 37 Tittirajātaka

The Story about the (Elder) Partridge (1s)

In the present Ven. Sāriputta fails to get lodging when the Group of Six take all that is available. When the Buddha discovers this affront in the morning he tells a story of an elephant, a monkey and a partridge, how they decided to live respecting elders, and how they subsequently found out which one was eldest.

The Bodhisatta = the wise partridge (tittirapaṇḍita), Sāriputta = the monkey (makkata),
Moggallāna = the elephant (hatthinaga).

Past Compare: Vin Cv 6 (2.161).

Keywords: Respect, Animals, Birds.

“For they who honour age.” This story was told by the Teacher while on his way to Sāvatthi, about the way in which the elder Sāriputta was kept out of a night’s lodging.

For, when Anāthapiṇḍika had built his monastery, and had sent word that it was finished, the Teacher left Rājagaha and came to Vesālī, setting out again on his journey after stopping at the latter place during his pleasure. It was now that the disciples of the Six hurried on ahead, and, before quarters could be taken for the elders, monopolized the whole of the available lodgings, which they distributed among their superiors, their teachers, and themselves. When the elders came up later, they could find no quarters at all for the night. Even Sāriputta’s disciples, for all their searching, could not find lodgings for the elder. Being without a lodging, the elder passed the night at the foot of a tree near the Teacher’s quarters, either walking up and down or sitting at the foot of a tree.

At early dawn the Teacher coughed as he came out. The elder coughed too. “Who is that?” asked the Teacher. “It is I, Sāriputta, sir.” “What are you doing here at this hour, Sāriputta?” Then the elder told his story, at the close of which the Teacher thought: “Even now, while I am still alive, the monks lack courtesy and subordination; what will they not do when I am dead and gone?” And the thought filled him with anxiety for the Dhamma. As soon as day had come, he had the assembly of the monks called together, and asked them, saying: “Is it true, monks, as I hear, that the adherents of the Six went on ahead and kept the elders among the monks out of lodgings for the night?” “That is so, Fortunate One,” was the reply. Thereupon, with a reproof to the adherents of the Six and as a lesson to all, he addressed the monks, and said: “Tell me, who deserves the best lodging, the best water, and the best rice, monks?” [1.93]

Some answered, “He who was a nobleman before he became a monk.” Others said: “He who was originally a brahmin, or a man of means.” Others severally said: “The man versed in the Regulations of the Saṅgha; the man who can expound the Dhamma; the men who have won the first, second, third, or fourth stage of Absorption.” While others again said: “The man in the First, Second, or Third path, or an Arahat; one who knows the Three Understandings; one who has the Six Higher Super Knowledges.”

After the monks had stated whom they severally thought worthiest of precedence in the matter of lodging and the like, the Teacher said, {1.218} “In the dispensation which I teach, the standard by which precedence in the matter of lodging and the like is to be settled, is not noble birth, or having been a brahmin, or having been wealthy before entry into the Saṅgha; the standard is not familiarity with the Regulations of the Saṅgha, with the Suttas, or with the Abhidhamma Books; nor is it either the attainment of any of the four stages of Absorption, or the walking in any of the four paths of emancipation. Monks, in my dispensation it is seniority which claims respect of word and deed, salutation, and all due service; it is seniors who should enjoy the best lodging, the best water, and the best rice. This is the true standard, and therefore the senior monk ought to have these things. Yet, monks, here is Sāriputta, who is my chief disciple, who has set rolling the Wheel in line with Dhamma, and who deserves to have a lodging next after myself. And Sāriputta has spent this night without a lodging at the foot of a tree! If you lack respect and subordination even now, what will be your behaviour as time goes by?”

---

264 [I.e. one who can remember his former lives, has the divine eye, and understands the pollutants are destroyed. These three the Buddha gained on the night of his Awakening.]

265 i.e. the three divisions, or ‘three baskets,’ of the Buddhist scriptures.
And for their further instruction he said: “In times past, monks, even animals came to the conclusion that it was not proper for them to live without respect and subordination one to another, or without the ordering of their common life; even these animals decided to find out which among them was the senior, and then to show him all forms of reverence. So they looked into the matter, and having found out which of them was the senior, they showed him all forms of reverence, whereby they passed away at that life’s close to people heaven.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past, nearby a great banyan tree on the slopes of the Himālayas, there dwelt three friends – a partridge, a monkey, and an elephant. And they came to lack respect and subordination one to another, and had no ordering of their common life. And the thought came to them that it was not seemly for them to live in this way, and that they ought to find out which of their number was the senior and to honour him.

As they were engaged thinking which was the oldest, one day an idea struck them. Said the partridge and the monkey to the elephant as they all three sat together at the foot of that banyan tree, “Friend elephant, how big was this banyan when you remember it first?” Said the elephant, “When I was a baby, this banyan was a mere bush, over which I used to walk; and as I stood astride of it, its topmost branches used just to reach up to my belly. I’ve known the tree since it was a mere bush.” [1.94]

Next the monkey was asked the same question by the other two; and he replied, “My friends, when I was a younger, [1.219] I had only to stretch out my neck as I sat on the ground, and I could eat the topmost sprouts of this banyan. So I’ve known this banyan since it was very tiny.”

Then the partridge was asked the same question by the two others; and he said: “Friends, of old there was a great banyan tree at such and such a spot; I ate its seeds, and voided them here; that was the origin of this tree. Therefore, I have knowledge of this tree from before it was born, and am older than the pair of you.”

Hereupon the monkey and the elephant said to the sage partridge, “Friend, you are the oldest. Henceforth you shall have from us acts of honour and veneration, marks of obeisance and homage, respect of word and deed, salutation, and all due homage; and we will follow your counsels. You for your part henceforth will please impart such counsel as we need.”

Thenceforth the partridge gave them counsel, and established them in the Precepts, which he also undertook himself to keep. Being thus established in the Precepts, and becoming respectful and subordinate among themselves, with proper ordering of their common life, these three made themselves sure of rebirth in heaven at this life’s close.

“The aims of these three” continued the Teacher, “came to be known as the ‘Holiness of the Partridge,’ and if these three animals, monks, lived together in respect and subordination, how can you, who have embraced a Faith the Regulations of which are so well-taught, live together without due respect and subordination? Henceforth I ordain, monks, that to seniority shall be paid respect of word and deed, salutation, and all due service; that seniority shall be the title to the best lodging, the best water, and the best rice; and nevermore let a senior be kept out of a lodging by a junior. Whosoever so keeps out his senior commits an offence.”

It was at the close of this lesson that the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, repeated this verse:

1. “For they who honour age, in Dhamma versed;
Praise now, and bliss hereafter, is their meed.” (1.220)

When the Teacher had finished speaking of the virtue of reverencing age, he made the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Moggallāna was the elephant of those days, Sāriputta the monkey, and I myself the sage partridge.” [1.95]

Ja 38 Bakajātaka

The Story about the Crane (1s)

In the present one monk, who was good at tailoring, deceived his fellow monks with his work, and made a good profit, until he himself was deceived in return. When this is told to the Buddha he tells a story of a crane who deceived the fish and ate them all up, until a crab deceived him and nipped his head off.

266 See Benfey’s Pañcatantra (I. 175), Tawney’s Kathāsaritsāgara (II. 31), and Rhys Davids’ Birth Stories (page 321), for the migrations of this popular story.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the country robe maker = the crab (kakkaṭaka),
the Jetavana robe maker = the crane (baka).

Keywords: Deception, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Guile profits not.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a tailoring monk.

Tradition says that at Jetavana dwelt a monk who was exceedingly skilful in all operations to be performed with a robe, such as cutting, joining, arranging, and stitching. Because of this skill, he used to fashion robes and so got the name of Cīvaravaḍḍhaka [The Robe-tailor]. What, you ask, did he do? Well, he exercised his craft on old bits of cloth and turned out a nice soft robe, which, after the dyeing was done, he would enhance in colour with a wash containing flour to make a dressing, and rub it with a shell, till he had made it quite smart and attractive. Then he would lay his handiwork aside.

Being ignorant of robe-making, monks used to come to him with brand-new cloth, saying: “We don’t know how to make robes; you make them for us.”

“So,” he would reply, “a robe takes a long time to make; but I have one which is just finished. You can take that, if you will leave these cloths in exchange.” And, so saying, he would take his out and show it them. And they, marking only its fine colour, and knowing nothing of what it was made of, thought it was a good strong one, and so handed over their brand-new cloth to the Cīvaravaḍḍhaka and went off with the robe he gave them. When it got dirty and was being washed in hot water, it revealed its real character, and the worn patches were visible here and there. Then the owners regretted their bargain. Everywhere that monk became well-known for deceiving in this way all who came to him.

Now, there was a robe-maker in a hamlet who used to deceive everybody just as the monk did at Jetavana. {1.221} This man’s friends among the monks said to him, “Sirs, they say that at Jetavana there is a robe-maker who deceives everybody just like you.” Then the thought struck him, “Come now, let me deceive that city man!” So he made out of rags a very fine robe, which he dyed a beautiful orange.
This he put on and went to Jetavana. The moment the other saw it, he coveted it, and said to its owner, “Sir, did you make that robe?” “Yes, I did, sir,” was the reply. “Let me have that robe, sir; you'll get another in its place.” “But, sir, we village monks find it hard to get the Requisites; if I give you this, what shall I have to wear myself?” “Sir, I have some brand-new cloth at my lodging; take it and make yourself a robe.” “Venerable sir, herein have I shown my own handiwork; but, if you speak thus, what can I do? Take it.” And having deceived the other by exchanging the rag-robe for the new cloth, he went his way.

After wearing the botched robe in his turn, the Jetavana man was washing it not long afterwards in warm water, when he became aware that it was made out of rags; and he was put to shame. The whole of the Saṅgha heard the news that the Jetavana man had been deceived by a robe-tailor from the country. [1.96]

Now, one day the monks were seated in the Dhamma Hall, discussing the news, when the Teacher entered and asked what they were discussing; and they told him all about it. Said the Teacher, “Monks, this is not the only occasion of the Jetavana robe-maker's deceiving tricks; in bygone times also he did just the same, and, as he has been deceived now by the man from the country, so was he too in bygone times.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta came to life in a certain forest-haunt as the Tree Devatā of a tree which stood near a certain lotus-pond. In those days the water used every summer to fall very low in a certain pond, not very big – which was plentifully stocked with fish. Catching sight of these fish, a certain crane said to himself, “I must find a way to cajole and eat these fish.” So he went and sat down in deep thought by the side of the water.

Now when the fishes caught sight of him, they said: “Of what are you thinking, my lord, as you sit there?” “I am thinking about you,” was the reply. “And what is your lordship thinking about us?” “The water in this pool being low, food scarce, and, the heat intense – I was wondering to myself, as I sat here, what in the world you fishes would do.” “And what are we to do, my lord?” “Well, if you'll take my advice, [1.222] I will take you up one by one in my beak, and carry you all off to a fine large pool covered with the five varieties of lotuses, and there put you down.” “My lord,” they said, no crane ever took the slightest thought for fishes since the world began. Your desire is to eat us one by one.” “No; I will not eat you while you trust me,” said the crane. “If you don't take my word that there is such a pond, send one of your number to go with me and see for himself.” Believing the crane, the fish presented to him a great big fish (blind of one eye, by the way), who they thought would be a match for the crane whether afloat or ashore; and they said: “Here’s the one to go with you.”

The crane took the fish off and put him in the pool, and after showing him the whole extent of it, brought him back again and put him in along with the other fish in his old pond. And he held forth to them on the charms of the new pool. After hearing this report, they grew eager to go there, and said to the crane, “Very good, my lord; please take us across.”

First of all, the crane took that big one-eyed fish again and carried him off to the edge of the pool, so that he could see the water, but actually alighted in a Varana tree which grew on the bank. Dashing the fish down in a fork of the tree, he pecked it to death – after which he picked him clean and let the bones fall at the foot of the tree. Then back he went and said: “I’ve thrown him in; who’s the next?” And so he took the fish one by one, and ate them all, till at last when he came back, he [1.97] could not find another left. But there was still a crab remaining in the pond; so the crane, who wanted to eat him up too, said: “Mister crab, I’ve taken all those fishes away and turned them into a fine large pool covered all over with lotuses. Come along; I’ll take you too.” “How will you carry me across?” said the crab. “Why, in my beak, to be sure,” said the crane. “Ah, but you might drop me like that,” said the crab, “I won’t go with you.” “Don’t be frightened; I’ll keep tight hold of you all the way.” Thought the crab to himself, “He hasn’t put the fish in the pool. But, if he would really put me in, that would be capital. If he does not – why, I’ll nip his head off and kill him.” So he spoke thus to the crane, “You’d never be able to hold me tight enough, friend crane; whereas we crabs have got an astonishingly tight grip. [1.223] If I might take hold of your neck with my claws, I could hold it tight and then would go along with you.”

Not suspecting that the crab wanted to trick him, the crane gave his assent. With his claws the crab gripped hold of the crane’s neck as with the pincers of a smith,

---

267 [Cartaeva Roxburghii, the so-called Temple Tree, known since Vedic times.]
and said: “Now you can start.” The crane took him and showed him the pool first, and then started off for the tree.

“The pool lies this way, Uncle,” said the crab, “but you’re taking me the other way.” “Very much your Uncle dear am I!” said the crane, “and very much my nephew are you! I suppose you thought me your slave to lift you up and carry you about! Just you cast your eye on that heap of bones at the foot of the tree; as I ate up all those fish, so I will eat you too.” Said the crab, “It was through their own folly that those fish were eaten by you; but I shan’t give you the chance of eating me. No; what I shall do, is to kill you. For you, fool that you were, did not see that I was tricking you. If we die, we will both die together; I’ll chop your head clean off.” And so saying he gripped the crane’s windpipe with his claws, as with pincers. With his mouth wide open, and tears streaming from his eyes, the crane, trembling for his life, said: “Lord, indeed I will not eat you! Spare my life!”

“Well, then, just step down to the pool and put me in,” said the crab. Then the crane turned back and stepped down as directed to the pool, and placed the crab on the mud, at the water-edge. But the crab, before entering the water, nipped off the crane’s head as deftly as if he were cutting a lotus stalk with a knife.

The Tree Devatā who dwelt in the tree, marking this wonderful thing, made the whole forest ring with applause repeating this verse in sweet tones:

1. “Guile profits not your very guileful folk.
Mark what the guileful crane got from the crab!” [1.98] {1.224}

“Monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time this fellow has been deceived by the robe-maker from the country; in the past he was deceived in just the same manner.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka, by saying: “The Jetavana robe-maker was [the crane] of those days, the robe-maker from the country was the crab, and I myself the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 39 Nandajātaka

The Story about (the Slave) Nanda (1s)

In the present a pupil of Ven. Sāriputta’s becomes puffed up when he goes into the countryside with him, but is docile again when back in Jetavana. When the Buddha hears of this he tells a story about a slave in olden times who was entrusted with the secret location of a treasure, and would become conceited when he was close to the spot. The treasure’s rightful heir regained his fortune by following the Bodhisatta’s advice.

The Bodhisatta = the wise landlord (paññitakūṭumbika), Sāriputta’s disciple = (the slave) Nanda.

Keyword: Conceit.

“I think the gold.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a co-resident pupil of Sāriputta.

Tradition says that this monk was meek and docile, and was zealous in ministering to the elder. Now, on one occasion the elder departed with the leave of the Teacher, on an alms pilgrimage, and came to south Magadha. When he got there, that monk grew so proud that he would not do what the elder told him. Moreover, if he was addressed with, “Sir, do this,” he quarrelled with the elder. The elder could not make out what possessed him.

After making his pilgrimage in those parts, he came back again to Jetavana. The moment he got back to the monastery at Jetavana, the monk became again what he had always been.

The elder told this to the Tathāgata, saying: “Sir, a co-resident of mine is in one place like a slave bought for a hundred pieces, and in another so proud-stomached that an order to do anything makes him quarrel.”

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, Sāriputta, that he has shown this disposition; in the past too, if he went to one place, he was like a slave bought for a hundred pieces, while, if he went to another place, he would become quarrelsome and contentious.” And, so saying, by request of the elder, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as a householder. Another householder, a friend of his, was an old man himself, but had a young wife who had borne him a son and heir. Said the old man to himself, “As soon as I am dead, this girl, being so young as she is, will marry heaven knows whom, and spend all my money, instead of handing it over to my son. Wouldn’t it be my best course to bury my money safely in the ground?”
So, in the company of a household slave of his named Nanda, he went to the forest and buried his riches at a certain spot, saying to the slave, [1.99] “My good Nanda, reveal this treasure to my son after I am gone, and don’t let the wood be sold.”

After giving this injunction to his slave, the old man died. In due course the son grew up, and his mother said to him, “My son, your father, in the company of Nanda, buried his money. Get it back and look after the property of the family.” So one day he said to Nanda, “Uncle, is there any treasure which my father buried?” “Yes, my lord.” “Where is it buried?” “In the forest, my lord.” “Well, then, let us go there.” And he took a spade and a basket, and going to the scene, said to Nanda, “Well, Uncle, where’s the money?” But by the time Nanda had got up to the treasure and was standing right over it, he was so puffed up by the money that he abused his master, saying: “You servant of a slave-wench’s son! How should you have any money here?”

The young gentleman, pretending not to have heard this insolence, simply said: “Let us be going then,” and took the slave back home with him. Two or three days later, he returned to the place; but again Nanda abused him, as before. Without any abusive rejoinder, the young gentleman came back and turned the matter over in his mind. Thought he to himself, “At starting, this slave always means to reveal where the money is; but no sooner does he get there, than he falls to abusing me. The reason of this I do not see; but I could find out, if I were to ask my father’s old friend, the householder.” So he went to the Bodhisatta, and laying the whole business before him, asked his friend what was the real reason of such behaviour.

Said the Bodhisatta, “The spot at which Nanda stands to abuse you, my friend, is the place where your father’s money is buried. Therefore, as soon as he starts abusing you again, say to him, ‘Whom are you talking to, you slave?’ Pull him from his perch, take the spade, dig down, remove your family treasure, and make the slave carry it home for you.” And so saying, he repeated this verse: {1.226}

1. “I think the gold and jewels buried lie
   Where Nanda, low-born slave, so loudly bawls!”

Taking a respectful leave of the Bodhisatta, the young gentleman went home, and taking Nanda went to the spot where the money was buried. Faithfully following the advice he had received, he brought the money away and looked after the family property. He remained steadfast in the Bodhisatta’s counsels, and after a life spent in generosity and other good works he passed away to fare according to his deeds.
The Section with One Verse – 285

Said the Teacher, “In the past too this man was similarly disposed.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka, by saying, Sāriputta’s co-resident was the Nanda of those days, and I the wise and good householder,”

Ja 40 Khadiraṅgārajātaka

The Story about the Embers (1s)

In the present a Devatā works to dissuade her landlord, Anāthapiṇḍika, from his allegiance to the Buddha, and is expelled from her home for the trouble. When the Buddha hears of this he tells a story of how Māra, in a previous life, had tried to dissuade him from giving to a Paccekabuddha by making a fiery abyss appear between them. The Bodhisatta crossed over and made his gift anyway.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasīseṭṭhi).

Present Source: Ja 40 Khadiraṅgāra,
Quoted at: Ja 284 Siri, Ja 340 Visayha,
Past Compare: Jm 4 Śreṣṭhi.

Keywords: Determination, Giving, Devas.

“Far rather will I headlong plunge.” [1.100] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about Anāthapiṇḍika.

For Anāthapiṇḍika, who had lavished fifty-four crores on the dispensation of the Buddha over the monastery alone, and who valued naught else save only the Three Jewels, used to go every day while the Teacher was at Jetavana to attend the Great Services – once at daybreak, once after breakfast, and once in the evening. There were intermediate services too; but he never went empty-handed, for fear the novices and lads should look to see what he had brought with him. When he went in the early morning, {1.227} he used to have rice-gruel taken up; after breakfast, ghee, butter, honey, molasses, and the like; and in the evening, he brought perfumes, garlands and cloths. So much did he expend day after day, that his expense knew no bounds. Moreover, many traders borrowed money from him on their bonds – to the amount of eighteen crores; and the great merchant never called the money in. Furthermore, another eighteen crores of the family property, which were buried in the riverbank, were washed out to sea, when the bank was swept away by a storm; and down rolled the brazen pots, with fastenings and seals unbroken, to the bottom of the ocean. In his house, too, there was always rice standing ready for 500 monks – so that the merchant’s house was to the Saṅgha like a pool dug where four roads meet, yes, like mother and father was he to them. Therefore, even the Supreme Buddha used to go to his house, and the Eighty Chief Elders too; and the number of other monks passing in and out was beyond measure.
The Section with One Verse – 286

Now his house was seven stories high and had seven portals; and over the fourth gateway dwelt a Devatā who was a heretic. When the Supreme Buddha came into the house, she could not stay in her abode on high, but came down with her children to the ground-floor; and she had to do the same whenever the Eighty Chief Elders or the other elders came in and out. Thought she, “So long as the ascetic Gotama and his disciples keep coming into this house I can have no peace here; I can’t be eternally coming downstairs to the ground floor. I must contrive to stop them from coming any more to this house.” So one day, when the business manager had retired to rest, she appeared before him in visible shape.

“Who is that?” said he. “It is I,” was the reply, “the Devatā who lives over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “You don’t see what the merchant is doing. Heedless of his own future, he is drawing upon his resources, only to enrich the ascetic Gotama. He engages in no commerce; he undertakes no business. Advise the merchant to attend to his business, and arrange that the ascetic Gotama with his disciples shall come no more into the house.”

Then said he, “Foolish Devatā, if the merchant does spend his money, he spends it on the dispensation of the Buddha, which leads to safety. Even if he were to seize me by the hair and sell me for a slave, I will say nothing. Begone!”

Another day, she went to the merchant’s eldest son and gave him the same advice. And he flouted her in just the same manner. But to the merchant himself she did not so much as dare to speak on the matter.

Now by dint of unending munificence {1.228} and of doing no business, the merchant’s incomings diminished and his estate grew less and less; so that he sank by degrees into poverty, and his table, his dress, and his bed and food were no longer what they had once been. Yet, in spite of his altered circumstances, [1.101]
he continued to entertain the Sāṅgha, though he was no longer able to feast them. So one day when he had made his bow and taken his seat, the Teacher said to him, “Householder, are gifts being given at your house?” “Yes, sir,” said he, “but there’s only a little sour husk-porridge, left over from yesterday.” “Be not distressed, householder, at the thought that you can only offer what is unpalatable. If the heart be good, the food given to Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and their disciples, cannot but be good too. And why? Because of the greatness of the fruit thereof. For he who can make his heart acceptable cannot give an unacceptable gift – as is to be testified by the following passage:

“For, if the heart have faith, no gift is small
To Buddhas or to their disciples true.

’Tis said no service can be reckoned small
That’s paid to Buddhas, lords of great renown.

Mark well what fruit rewarded that poor gift
Of pottage – dried-up, sour, and lacking salt.”

Also, he said this further thing, “Householder, in giving this unpalatable gift, you are giving it to those who have entered on the Noble Eightfold Path. Whereas I, when in Velāma’s time I stirred up all Jambudīpa by giving the seven things of price, and in my largesse poured them forth as though I had made into one mighty stream the five great rivers – I yet found none who had reached the Three Refuges or kept the Five Precepts; for rare are those who are worthy of offerings. Therefore, let not your heart be troubled by the thought that your gift is unpalatable.” And so saying, he repeated the Velāmakasutta [AN 9.20].

Now that Devatā who had not dared to speak to the merchant in the days of his magnificence, thought that now he was poor he would hearken to her, and so, entering his chamber at dead of night she appeared before him in visible shape,

---

268 All Buddhas have attained to complete illumination; but a Paccekabuddha keeps his knowledge to himself and, unlike a ‘Perfect Buddha,’ does not preach the saving truth to his fellowmen.

269 The first two lines are from the Vimānavatthu, page 44.

270 [Otherwise known as Velāmasutta, AN 9.20, it is one of the suttas that record a Jātaka unknown to this collection.]
standing in mid-air. “Who’s that?” said the merchant, when he became aware of her presence. “I am the Devatā, great merchant, who dwells over the fourth gateway.” “What brings you here?” “To give you counsel.” “Proceed, then.” “Great merchant, you take no thought for your own future or for your own children. You have expended vast sums on the dispensation of the ascetic Gotama; in fact, by long-continued expenditure and by not undertaking new business you have been brought by the ascetic Gotama to poverty. But even in your poverty you do not shake off the ascetic Gotama! The ascetics are in and out of your house this very day just the same! What they have had of you cannot be recovered. That may be taken for certain. But henceforth don’t you go yourself to the ascetic Gotama and don’t let his disciples set foot inside your house. Do not even turn to look at the ascetic Gotama but attend to your trade and traffic in order to restore the family estate.” Then he said to her, “Was this the counsel you wanted to give me?” “Yes, it was.”

Said the merchant, “The One with Ten Powers has made me proof against a hundred, a thousand, yes against a hundred thousand Devatās such as you are! My faith is strong and steadfast as Mount Sineru! My substance has been expended on the dispensation that leads to safety. Wicked are your words; it is a blow aimed at the dispensation of the Buddhas by you, you wicked and impudent wretch. I cannot live under the same roof with you; be off at once from my house and seek shelter elsewhere!”

Hearing these words of that converted man and elect disciple, she could not stay, but repairing to her dwelling, took her children by the hand and went forth. But though she went, she was minded, if she could not find herself a lodging elsewhere, to appease the merchant and return to dwell in his house; and in this mind she went to the tutelary Devaputta of the city and with due salutation stood before him. Being asked what had brought her there, she said: “My lord, I have been speaking imprudently to Anāthapiṇḍika, and he in his anger has turned me out of my home. Take me to him and make it up between us, so that he may let me live there again.” “But what was it you said to the merchant?” “I told him for the future not to support the Buddha and the Saṅgha, and not to let the ascetic Gotama set foot again in his house. This is what I said, my lord.” “Wicked were your words; it was a blow aimed at the dispensation. I cannot take you with me to the merchant.” Meeting with no support from him, she went to the Four Great Kings of the world. And being repulsed by them in the same manner, she went on. to Sakka, King of Devas, and told him her story, beseeching him still more earnestly, as follows, “Deva, finding no shelter, I wander about homeless, leading my children by the hand. Grant me of your majesty some place wherein to dwell.”

And he too said to her, “You have done wickedly; it was a blow aimed at the Conqueror’s dispensation. I cannot speak to the merchant on your behalf. But I can tell you one way {1.230} whereby the merchant may be led to pardon you.” “Pray tell me, Devā.” “Men have had eighteen crores of the merchant on bonds. Take the semblance of his agent, and without telling anybody repair to their houses with the bonds, in the company of some young Yakkhas. Stand in the middle of their houses with the bond in one hand and a receipt in the other, and terrify them with your Yakkha power, saying, ‘Here’s your acknowledgment of the debt. Our merchant did not move in the matter while he was affluent; but now he is poor, and you must pay up the money you owe.’ By your Yakkha power obtain all those eighteen crores of gold and fill the merchant’s empty treasuries. He had another treasure buried in the banks of the river Aciravatī, but when the bank was washed away, the treasure was swept into the sea. Get that back also by your supernatural power and store it in his treasuries. Further, there is another sum of eighteen crores lying unowned in such and such a place. Bring that too and pour the money into his empty treasuries. When you have atoned by the recovery of these fifty-four crores, ask the merchant to forgive you.” “Very good, Devā,” said she. And she set to work obediently, and did just as she had been bidden. When she had recovered all the money, she went into the merchant’s chamber at dead of night and appeared before him in visible shape standing in the air.

The merchant asking who was there, she replied, “It is I, great merchant, the blind and foolish Devatā who lived over your fourth gateway. In the greatness of my infatuate folly I knew not the virtues of a Buddha, and so came to say what I said to you some days ago. Pardon me my fault! At the instance of Sakka, King of Devas, I have made atonement by recovering the eighteen crores owing to you, the eighteen crores which had been washed down into the sea, and another eighteen crores which were lying unowned in such and such a place – making fifty-four crores in all, which I have poured into your empty treasure-chambers. The sum you expended on the monastery at Jetavana is now made up again. While I have nowhere to dwell, I am in misery. Bear not in mind what I did in my ignorant folly, great merchant, but pardon me.”
Anāthapiṇḍika, hearing what she said, thought to himself, “She is a Devatā, and she says she has atoned, and confesses her fault. The Teacher shall consider this and make his virtues known to her. I will take her before the Supreme Buddha.” So he said: “My good Devatā, if you want me to pardon you, ask me in the presence of the master.” “Very good,” said she, “I will. Take me along with you to the Teacher.” “Certainly,” said he. And early in the morning, when night was just passing away, he took her with him to the Teacher, and told the Tathāgata all that she had done.

Hearing this, the Teacher said: “You see, householder, how the defiled man regards defilement as excellent before it ripens to its fruit. But when it has ripened, then he sees defilements to be defiled. Likewise the good man looks on his goodness as wrong before it ripens to its fruit; but when it ripens, he sees it to be goodness.” And so saying, he repeated these two verses from the Dhammapada:

“The defiled man thinks his deed is good,
So long as wrong has ripened not to fruit.
But when his wrong at last to ripeness grows,
The defiled man sees ‘It was wrong I wrought.’

The good man thinks his goodness is but wrong,
So long as it has ripened not to fruit.
But when his goodness unto ripeness grows,
The good man sees that ‘It was good I wrought.’”

At the close of these verses that Devatā was established in the Fruit of the First Path. She fell at the wheel-marked feet of the Teacher, crying, “Stained as I was with passion, depraved by defilements, misled by delusion, and blinded by ignorance, I spoke wickedly because I knew not your virtues. Pardon me!” Then she received pardon from the Teacher and from the great merchant.

At this time Anāthapiṇḍika sang his own praises in the Teacher’s presence, saying: “Sir, though this Devatā did her best to stop me from giving support to the Buddha and his following, she could not succeed; and though she tried to stop me from giving gifts, yet I gave them still! Was not this goodness on my part?”

Said the Teacher, “You, householder, are a converted man and an elect disciple; your faith is firm and your vision is purified. No marvel then that you were not stopped by this impotent Devatā. The marvel was that the wise and good of a bygone day, when a Buddha had not appeared, and when knowledge had not ripened to its full fruit, should from the heart of a lotus-flower have given gifts, although Māra, lord of the Sensual Worlds, appeared in mid-heaven, shouting, ‘If you give gifts, you shall be roasted in this hell,’ and showing them therewithal a pit eighty cubits deep, filled with red-hot embers.” And so saying, at the request of Anāthapiṇḍika, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life in the family of the Lord High Treasurer of Benares, and was brought up in the lap of all luxury like a royal prince. By the time he was come to years of discretion, being barely sixteen years old, he had made himself perfect in all accomplishments. At his father’s death he filled the office of Lord High Treasurer, and built six alms halls, one at each of the four gates of the city, one in the centre of the city, and one at the gate of his own mansion. Very bountiful was he, {1.232} and he kept the Precepts, and observed the Uposatha duties.

Now one day at breakfast-time when dainty fare of exquisite taste and variety was being brought in for the Bodhisatta, a Paccekabuddha rising from a seven days’ trance of Absorption, and noticing that it was time to go his rounds, bethought him that it would be well to visit the Treasurer of Benares that morning. So he cleaned his teeth with a tooth-stick made from the betel-vine, washed his mouth with water from Lake Anotatta, put on his under-robe as he stood on the tableland of Manosilā, fastened on his girdle, donned his outer-robe; and, equipped with a bowl [1.104] which he called into being by his Supernormal Powers, he passed through the air and arrived at the gate of the mansion just as the Bodhisatta’s breakfast was taken in.

As soon as the Bodhisatta became aware of his presence there, he rose at once from his seat and looked at the attendant, indicating that a service was required. “What am I to do, my lord?” “Bring his reverence’s bowl,” said the Bodhisatta.

At that very instant Māra the Wicked rose up in a state of great excitement, saying: “It is seven days since the Paccekabuddha had food given him; if he gets none today, he will perish. I will destroy him and stop the Treasurer from giving also.” And that very instant he went and called into being within the mansion a pit of red-hot embers, eighty cubits deep, filled with Acacia-charcoal, all ablaze and aflame like the great hell of Avīci. When he had created this pit, Māra himself took his stand in mid-air.

When the man who was on his way to fetch the bowl became aware of this, he was terrified and started back. “What makes you start back, my man?” asked the Bodhisatta. “My lord,” was the answer, “there’s a great pit of red-hot embers blazing and flaming in the middle of the house.” And as man after man got to the spot, they all were panic-stricken, and ran away as fast as their legs would carry them.

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “Māra, the Enthraller, must have been exerting himself today to stop me from alms-giving. I have yet to learn, however, that I am to be shaken by a hundred, or by a thousand, Māras. We will see this day whose strength is the stronger, whose might is the mightier, mine or Māra’s.” So taking in his own hand the bowl which stood ready, he passed out from the house, and, standing on the brink of the fiery pit, looked up to the heavens. Seeing Māra, he said: “Who are you?” “I am Māra,” was the answer.

“Did you call into being this pit of red-hot embers?” “Yes, I did.” “Why?” “To stop you from alms-giving and to destroy the life of that Paccekabuddha.” “I will not permit you either to stop me from my alms-giving or to destroy the life of the Paccekabuddha. I am going to see today whether your strength or mine is the greater.” And still standing on the brink of that fiery pit, he cried, “Venerable Paccekabuddha, even though I fall headlong into this pit of red-hot embers, I will not turn back. Only vouchsafe to take the food I bring.” And so saying he repeated this verse:

1. “Far rather will I headlong plunge amain
   Full in this gulf of hell, than stoop to shame!
   Vouchsafe, sir, at my hands to take this alms!”

With these words the Bodhisatta, grasping the bowl of food, strode on with undaunted resolution right on to the surface of the pit of fire. But even as he did so, there rose up to the surface through all the eighty cubits of the pit’s depth a large and peerless lotus-flower, which received the feet of the Bodhisatta! And from it there came a measure of pollen which fell on the head of the Great Being, so that his whole body was as it were sprinkled from head to foot with dust of gold! Standing right in the heart of the lotus, he poured the dainty food into the bowl of the Paccekabuddha.

And when the latter had taken the food and returned thanks, he flung his bowl aloft into the heavens, and right in the sight of all the people he himself rose bodily into the air likewise, and passed away to the Himālayas again, seeming to tread a track formed of clouds fantastically shaped.

And Māra, too, defeated and dejected, passed away back to his own abode.

But the Bodhisatta, still standing in the lotus, preached \{1.234\} the Dhamma to the people, extolling alms-giving and the Precepts; after which, girt round by the escorting multitude, he passed into his own mansion once more. And all his life long he showed generosity and did other good works, till in the end he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

Said the Teacher, “It was no marvel, layman, that you, with your discernment of the truth, were not overcome now by the Devatā; the real marvel was what the wise and good did in bygone days.” His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Paccekabuddha of those days passed away, never to be born again. I was myself the Treasurer of Benares who, defeating Māra, and standing in the heart of the lotus, placed alms in the bowl of the Paccekabuddha.”

Ja 41 Losakajātaka
The Story about (the Unfortunate Monk) Losaka (1s)

In the present Ven. Sāriputta comes across a poor boy and ordains him, but, as in his lay life, he is very unfortunate and can hardly get enough alms to eat, but yet he does become an Arahat. The Buddha tells a story of the past, during which a man had become jealous of an Arahat, and prevented him from receiving food in an attempt to drive him away.
Everywhere he was born from there on he was unfortunate. And when in his last life he meditated on the three characteristics, he won release. This story includes a telling of the Mindavindaka story, which occurs several times in these Jātakas.

The Bodhisatta = the world famous teacher (disāpamokkhācariya), the elder Losakatissa = Mittavindaka.
"The wilful man." This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the elder Losakatissa.

‘Who,’ you ask, ‘was this elder Losakatissa?’ Well; his father was a fisherman in Kosala, and he was the bane of his family; and, when a monk, never had anything given to him. His previous existence ended, he had been conceived by a certain fisherman’s wife in a fishing-village of a thousand families in Kosala. And on the day he was conceived all those thousand families, net in hand, went fishing in river and pool but failed to catch one single fish; and the like bad fortune dogged them from that day forward. Also, before his birth, the village was destroyed seven times by fire, and visited seven times by the king’s vengeance. So in time it came to pass that the people fell into a wretched plight.

Reflecting that such had not been their lot in former days, but that now they were going to rack and ruin, they concluded that there must be some breeder of misfortune among them, and resolved to divide into two bands. This they did; and there were then two bands of five hundred families each. Thence-forward, ruin dogged the band which included the parents of the future Losaka, while the other five hundred families throve apace. So the former resolved to go on halving their numbers, and did so, until this one family was parted from all the rest. Then they knew that the breeder of misfortune was in that family, and with blows drove them away.

With difficulty could his mother get a livelihood; but, when her time was come, she gave birth to her son in a certain place. (He that is born into his last existence cannot be killed. For like a lamp within a jar, even so securely within his breast burns the flame of his destiny to become an Arahant.) The mother took care of the child till he could run about, and when he could run about then she put a potsherd in his hands, and, bidding him go into a house to beg, ran away. Thenceforward, the solitary child used to beg his food thereabouts and sleep where he could. He was unwashed and unkempt, and made a living after the fashion of a mud-eating Yakkha. When he was seven years old, he was picking up and eating, like a crow, lump by lump, any rice he could find outside a house door where they flung away the rinsings of the rice-pots.

Sāriputta, Captain of the Dhamma, going into Sāvatthī on his round for alms, noticed the child, and, wondering what village the hapless creature came from, was filled with love for him and called out, “Come here.” The child came, bowed to the elder, and stood before him. Then said Sāriputta, “What village do you belong to, and where are your parents?”

“I am destitute, sir,” said the child, “for my parents said they were tired out, and so forsook me, and went away.”

“Would you like to become a monk?” “Indeed I should, sir; but who would receive a poor wretch like me into the Saṅgha?” “I will.” “Then, pray let me become a monk.”

The elder gave the child a meal and took him to the monastery, washed him with his own hands, and admitted him a novice first and a full monk afterwards, when he was old enough. In his old age he was known as elder Losakatissa; he was always unlucky, and but little was given to him. The story goes that, no matter how lavish the generosity, he never got enough to eat, but only just enough to keep himself alive. A single ladle of rice seemed to fill his alms-bowl to the brim, so that the charitable thought his bowl was full and bestowed the rest of their rice on the next. When rice was being put into his bowl, it is said that the rice in the giver’s dish used to vanish away. And so with every kind of food. Even when, as time went by, he had developed Discernment and so won the highest fruit which is Arahatship, he still got but little.

On the authority of Ven. Subhūti, paṁsupisācakā are said to form the fourth class of Petas (pretas) or ‘ghosts’ (who were cursed at once with cavernous maws and with mouths no bigger than a needle’s eye, so that their voracity was never satisfied even in their customary coprophagic state). But neither Hardy’s Manual of Buddhism (p. 58) nor the Milinda (p. 294) mentions paṁsupisācakā as one of the four classes of Petas.

Reading nippuñño instead of nippañño. See Ceylon JRAS 1884, p. 158; and compare apuñño on p. 236, line 20 of the Pāli original.
In the fullness of time, when the materials which determined his separate existence were outworn, the day came for him to pass away. And the captain of the Dhamma, as he meditated, had knowledge of this, and thought to himself, ‘Losakatissa will pass away today; and today at any rate I will see that he has enough to eat.’ So he took the elder and came to Sāvatthī for alms. But, because Losaka was with him, it was all in vain that Sāriputta held out his hand for alms in populous Sāvatthī; not so much as a reverential bow was vouchsafed him. So he bade the elder go back and seat himself in the sitting-hall of the monastery, and collected food which he sent with a message that it was to be given to Losaka. Those to whom he gave it took the food and went their way, but, forgetting all about Losaka, ate it themselves. So when Sāriputta rose up, and was entering the monastery, Losaka came to him and saluted him. Sāriputta stopped, and turning round said: “Well, did you get the food, monk?”

“I shall, no doubt, get it in good time,” said the elder. Sāriputta was greatly troubled, and looked to see what hour it was. But noon was passed. “Stay here, monk,” said Sāriputta, “and do not move,” and he made Losakatissa sit down in the sitting-hall, and set out for the palace of the king of Kosala. The king bade his bowl be taken, and saying that it was past noon and therefore not the time to eat rice, ordered his bowl to be filled with the four sweet kinds of food. With this he returned, and stood before him, bowl in hand, bidding the sage eat. But the elder was ashamed, because of the reverence he had towards Ven. Sāriputta, and would not eat. “Come, monk Tissa,” said Sāriputta, “tis I must stand with the bowl; sit you down and eat. If the bowl left my hand, everything in it would vanish away.”

So the venerable elder Losakatissa ate the sweets, while the exalted Captain of the Dhamma stood holding the bowl; and thanks to the latter’s merits and efficacy the food did not vanish. So the elder Losakatissa ate as much as he wanted and was 273 As protoplasm is ‘the physical basis of life,’ so āyusaṅkhārā are its moral basis according to Buddhist ideas. This Lebensstoff it is the aim of Buddhism to uproot, so that there may be no rebirth.

---

274 i.e. no more rice could be eaten that day. If a shadow of a finger’s breadth is cast by an upright stick, a strict monk will not eat rice and like foods.

275 Honey, ghee, butter, and sugar.
satisfied, and that selfsame day passed away by that death whereby existence ceases for ever.

The Supreme Buddha stood by, and saw the body burned; and they built a shrine for the collected ashes.

Seated in a meeting in the Dhamma Hall, the monks said: “Monks, Losaka was unlucky, and little was given to him. How came he with his unluck and his neediness to win the glory of Arahatship?” Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked what they were talking about; and they told him. “Monks,” said he, “this monk’s own actions were the cause both of his receiving so little, and of his becoming an Arahat. In bygone days he had prevented others from receiving, and that is why he received so little himself. But it was by his meditating on suffering, impermanence, and the absence of an abiding self in things, that he became an Arahat for himself.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past, in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, there was a monk who lived the village life and was maintained by a country householder. He was regular in his conduct as a monk, virtuous in his life, and was filled to overflowing with insight. There was also an elder, an Arahat, who lived with his fellows on terms of equality, and at the time of the story paid a first visit to the village where lived the householder who supported this monk. So pleased was the householder with the very demeanour of the elder that, taking his bowl, he led him into the house and with every mark of respect invited him to eat. Then he listened to a short discourse by the elder, and at its close said, with a bow, “Sir, pray do not journey further than our monastery close by; in the evening I will come and call upon you there.” So the elder went to the monastery, saluting the resident monk on his entrance; and, first courteously asking leave, took a seat by his side. The monk received him with all friendliness, and asked whether any food had been given him as alms.

---

276 Pakatatto is explained by Rhys Davids and Oldenberg in the note to page 340 of Vol. xvi. of the Sacred Books of the East as meaning a monk “who has not made himself liable to any disciplinary proceeding, has committed no irregularity.”
“Oh yes,” replied the elder. “Where, pray?” “Why, in your village close by, at the householder’s house.” And so saying, the elder asked to be shown his cell and made it ready. Then laying aside his bowl and robe, and seating himself, he became absorbed in blissful Insight and enjoyed the bliss of the Fruits of the Paths.

In the evening came the householder, with servants carrying flowers and perfumes and lamps and oil. Saluting the resident monk, he asked whether a guest had appeared, an elder. Being told that he had, the householder asked where he was and learned which cell had been given him. Then the householder went to the elder and, first bowing courteously, seated himself by the elder’s side and listened to a discourse. In the cool of the evening the householder made his offerings at the Stūpa and Bodhi tree, lit his lamp, and departed with an invitation to both elder and monk to come up to his house next day for their meal.

“I’m losing my hold on the householder,” thought the monk. “If this elder stays, I shall count for nothing with him.” So he was discontented and fell to scheming how to make the elder see that he must not settle down there for good. Accordingly, when the elder came to pay his respects in the early morning, the monk did not open his lips. The Arahat read the other’s thoughts and said to himself, “This monk knows not that I shall never stand in his light either with the family that supports him or with his Saṅgha.” And going back to his cell, he became absorbed in the bliss of Absorption, and in the bliss of the fruits.

Next day, the resident monk, having first knocked gingerly on the gong, and having tapped on the gong with the back of his nail, went off alone to the householder’s house. Taking from him his alms-bowl, the householder bade him be seated and asked where the stranger was.

“I know no news of your friend,” said the monk. “Though I knocked on the gong and tapped at his door, I couldn’t wake him. I can only presume that his

---

277 For gaṇḍi meaning ‘a gong,’ cf. Jātaka iv. 306; but see note p. 213 of Vol. xx. of Sacred Books of the East. It is doubtful what kapiṭṭhena can mean. Can the true reading be (punadivase) nakhapiṭṭhena, i.e. ‘with the back of his nail’? The resident monk’s object was to go through the form of waking the guest without disturbing his slumbers.
dainty fare \^1.238\ here yesterday has disagreed with him and that he is still in bed in consequence. Possibly such doings may commend themselves to you.”

(Meantime the Arahat, who had waited till the time came to go his round for alms, had washed and dressed and risen with bowl and robe in the air and gone elsewhere.)

The householder gave the monk rice and milk to eat, with ghee and sugar and honey in it. Then he had his bowl scoured with perfumed chunam powder and filled afresh, saying: “Sir, the elder must be fatigued with his journey; take him this.” Without demur the monk took the food and went his way, thinking to himself, “If our friend once gets a taste of this, taking him by the throat and kicking him out of doors won’t get rid of him. But how can I get rid of it? If I give it away to a human being, it will be known. If I throw it into the water, the ghee will float on top. And as for throwing it away on the ground, that will only bring all the crows of the district flocking to the spot.” In his perplexity his eye fell on a field that had been fired, and, scraping out the embers, he flung the contents of his bowl into the hole, filled in the embers on the top, and went off home. Not finding the elder there, he thought that the Arahat had understood his jealousy and departed. “Woe is me,” he cried, “for my greed has made me to wrong.”

And thenceforth sore affliction befell him and he became like a living ghost. Dying soon after, he was reborn in hell and there was tormented for hundreds of thousands of years. By reason of his ripening defilements, in five hundred successive births he was a Yakka and never had enough to eat, except one day when he enjoyed a surfeit of offal. Next, for five hundred more existences he was a dog, and here too, only on one single day had his fill – of a vomit of rice; on no other occasion did he have enough to eat.

Even when he ceased to be a dog, he was only born into a beggar family in a Kāsi village. From the hour of his birth, that family became still more beggared, and he never got half as much water-gruel as he wanted. And he was called Mittavindaka. \^1.239\ Unable at last to endure the pangs of hunger\(^278\) that now \(^{278}\) Reading chātakadukkhaṁ for Fausböll’s Jātakadukkhaṁ.

beset them, his father and mother beat him and drove him away, crying, “Begone, you curse!”

In the course of his wanderings, the little outcaste came to Benares, where in those days the Bodhisatta was a teacher of world-wide fame with five hundred young brahmins to teach. In those times the Benares folk used to give day by day commons of food to poor lads and had them taught free, and so this Mittavindaka also became a scholar supported by the Bodhisatta. But he was fierce and intractable, always fighting with his fellows and heedless of his master’s reproofs; and so the Bodhisatta’s fees fell off. And as he quarrelled so, and would not brook reproof, the youth ended by running away, and came to a border-village where he hired himself out for a living, and married a miserably poor woman by whom he had two children. Later, the villagers paid him to teach them what was the true teaching and what was false, and gave him a hut to live in at the entrance to their village. But, all because of Mittavindaka’s coming to live among them, the king’s vengeance fell seven times on those villagers, and seven times were their homes burned to the ground; seven times too did their water-tank dry up.

Then they considered the matter and agreed that it was not so with them before Mittavindaka’s coming, but that ever since he came they had been going from bad to worse. So with blows they drove him from their village; and forth he went with his family, and came to a haunted forest. And there the Amanussas killed and ate his wife and children. Fleeing thence, he came after many wanderings to a village on the coast called Gambhīra, arriving on a day when a ship was putting to sea; and he hired himself for service aboard. For a week the ship held on her way, but on the seventh day she came to a complete standstill in mid-ocean, as though she had run upon a rock. Then they cast lots, in order to rid them of their bane; and seven times the lot fell on Mittavindaka. So they gave him a raft of bamboos, and laying hold of him, cast him overboard. And forthwith the ship made way again.

Mittavindaka clambered on to his bamboos and floated on the waves. Thanks to his having obeyed the Precepts in the times of the Buddha Kassapa, he found in mid-ocean four Devadhītā dwelling in a palace of crystal, with whom he dwelt happily for seven days. Now palace-ghosts enjoy happiness only for seven days at a time; and so, when the seventh day came and they had to depart to their punishment, they left him with an injunction to await their return. But no sooner were they departed, than Mittavindaka put off on his raft again and came to where eight Devadhītā dwelt in a palace of silver. Leaving them in turn, he came to where sixteen Devadhītā dwelt in a palace of jewels, and thereafter to where thirty-two dwelt in a palace of gold. Paying no regard to their words, again he sailed away and came to a city of Yakkhas, set among islands. And there a Yakkhini was ranging about in the shape of a goat. Not knowing that she was a Yakkhini, Mittavindaka thought to make a meal of the goat, and seized hold of the creature by the leg. Straightaway, by virtue of her Yakkha-nature, she hurled him up and away over the ocean, and down he fell in a thorn-brake on the slopes of the dry moat of Benares, and from there rolled to earth.

Now it chanced that at that time thieves used to frequent that moat and kill the king’s goats; and the goatherds had bidden themselves nearby to catch the rascals.

Mittavindaka picked himself up and saw the goats. Thought he to himself, “Well, it was a goat in an island in the ocean that, being seized by the leg, hurled me here over seas. Perhaps, if I do the same by one of these goats, I may get hurled back again to where the Devadhītā dwell in their ocean palaces.” So, without thinking, he seized one of the goats by the leg. At once the goat began to bleat, and the goatherds came running up from every side. They laid hold of him at once, crying, “This is the thief that has so long lived on the king’s goats.” And they, beat him and began to haul him away in bonds to the king.

Just at that time the Bodhisatta, with his five hundred young brahmans round him, was coming out of the city to bathe. Seeing and recognising Mittavindaka, he said to the goatherds, “Why, this is a pupil of mine, my good men; what have you seized him for?” “Teacher,” they said, “we caught this thief in the act of seizing a goat by the leg, and that’s why we’ve got hold of him.” “Well,” said the Bodhisatta, “suppose you hand him over to us to live with us as our slave.” “All right, sir,” replied the men, and letting their prisoner go, they went their way. Then the Bodhisatta asked Mittavindaka where he had been all that long time; and Mittavindaka told him all that he had done.

“’Tis through not hearkening to those who wished him well,” said the Bodhisatta, “that he has suffered all these misfortunes.” And he recited this verse:
1. “The wilful man who, when exhorted, pays
   No heed to friends who kindly counsel give,
   Shall come to certain harm – like Mittaka,
   When by the leg he seized the grazing goat.”

And in those times both that Teacher and Mittavindaka passed away, and their lot thereafter was according to their deeds.

Said the Teacher, “This Losaka was himself the cause both of his getting little and of his getting Arahatship.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The elder Losakatissa was the Mittavindaka of those days, and I the Teacher of world-wide fame.”279

Ja 42 Kapotajātaka

The Story about the Pigeon (1s)

In the present one monk is very greedy and goes from supporter to supporter collecting food. The Buddha tells how this monk was also greedy in a previous life when, as a crow, he deceived his friend the pigeon in order to get access to a kitchen, which he stole from. But there the cook caught and plucked him and left him to die.

The Bodhisatta = the pigeon (pārāvata), the greedy monk = the crow (kāka).

Present Source: Ja 434 Cakkavāka,
Quoted at: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 260 Dūta, Ja 395 Kāka, Past Compare: Ja 42 Kapota, Ja 274 Lola, Ja 275 Rucira, Ja 375 Kapota.

Keywords: Greed, Deception, Animals, Birds.

“The wilful man.” [1.112] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain greedy monk. His greediness will be related in the Ninth Book in the Kākajātaka [Ja 434].280

279 Compare Petavatthu No. 43, Avadānaśataka No. 50, J.As. 1878, and Indian Antiquities x. 293.
280 [The story referred to is known as the Ja 434 Cakkavākajātaka, a part of which I include here.]
He was, it was said, greedy after the Buddhist requisites and casting off all duties of master and pastor, entered Sāvatthi quite early, and after drinking excellent rice-gruel served with many a kind of solid food in the house of Visākhā, and after eating in the daytime various dainties, paddy, meat and boiled rice, not satisfied with this he went about thence to the house of Culla Anāthapiṇḍika, and the king of Kosala, and various others.

But on this occasion the monks told the Teacher, saying: “Sir, this monk is greedy.” Said the Teacher, “Is it true as they say, monk, that you are greedy?” “Yes, sir,” was the reply. “So too in bygone days, monk, you were greedy, and by reason of your greediness lost your life; also you caused the wise and good to lose their home.” And so saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a pigeon. Now the Benares folk of those days, as an act of goodness, used to hang up straw-baskets in divers places for the shelter and comfort of the birds; and the cook of the Lord High Treasurer of Benares hung up one of these baskets in his kitchen. In this basket the Bodhisatta took up his abode, sallying out at daybreak in quest of food, and returning home in the evening; and so he lived his life.

But one day a crow, flying over the kitchen, sniffed the goodly savour from the salt and fresh fish and meat there, and was filled with longing to taste it. Casting about how to have his will, he perched nearby, and at evening saw the Bodhisatta come home and go into the kitchen. “Ah!” he thought: “I can manage it through the pigeon.”

So back he came next day at dawn, and, when the Bodhisatta sallied out in quest of food, kept following him about from place to place like his shadow. So the Bodhisatta said: “Why do you keep with me, friend?”

“My lord,” answered the crow, “your demeanour has won my admiration; and henceforth it is my wish to follow you.” “But your kind of food and mine, friend, is not the same,” said the Bodhisatta, “you will be hard put to it if you attach yourself to me.” “My lord,” said the crow, “when you are seeking your food, I will feed too, by your side.” “So be it, then,” said the Bodhisatta, “only you must be earnest.” And with this admonition to the crow, the Bodhisatta ranged about pecking up grass-seeds; while the other went about turning over cowdung and picking out the insects underneath till he had got his fill. Then back he came to the Bodhisatta and remarked, “My lord, you give too much time to eating; excess therein should be shunned.”

And when the Bodhisatta had fed and reached home again at evening, in flew the crow with him into the kitchen. {1.243}

“Why, our bird has brought another home with him,” exclaimed the cook, and hung up a second basket for the crow. And from that time onward the two birds dwelt together in the kitchen.

Now one day the Lord High Treasurer had in a store of fish which the cook hung up about the kitchen. Filled with greedy longing at the sight, the crow made up his mind to stay at home next day and treat himself to this excellent fare.

So all the night long he lay groaning away; and next day, when the Bodhisatta was starting in search of food, and cried, “Come along, friend crow,” the crow replied, “Go without me, my lord; for I have a pain in my stomach.” “Friend,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I never heard of crows having pains in their stomachs before. True, crows feel faint in each of the three night-watches; but if they eat a lamp-wick, their hunger is appeased for the moment. You must be hankering after the fish in the kitchen here. Come now, man’s food will not agree with you. Do not give way like this, but come and seek your food with me.” “Indeed, I am not able, my lord,” said the crow. “Well, your own conduct will show,” said the Bodhisatta. “Only fall not a prey to greed, but stand steadfast.” And with this exhortation, away he flew to find his daily food.

The cook took several kinds of fish, and dressed some one way, some another. Then lifting the lids off his saucepans a little to let the steam out, he put a colander on the top of one and went outside the door, where he stood wiping the sweat from his brow. Just at that moment out popped the crow’s head from the basket. A glance told him that the cook was away, and, “Now or never,” he thought, “is my time. The only question is shall I choose minced meat or a big lump?” Arguing that it takes a long time to make a full meal of minced meat, he resolved to take a large piece of fish and sit and eat it in his basket. So out he flew and alighted on the colander. “Click” went the colander.

“What can that be?” said the cook, running in on hearing the noise. Seeing the crow, he cried, “Oh, there’s that rascally crow wanting to eat my master’s dinner.
I have to work for my master, not for that rascal! What’s he to me, I should like to know?” So, first shutting the door, he caught the crow and plucked every feather \([1.244]\) off his body. Then, he pounded up ginger with salt and cumin, and mixed in sour buttermilk – finally southing the crow in the pickle and flinging him back into his \([1.114]\) basket. And there the crow lay groaning, overcome by the agony of his pain.

At evening the Bodhisatta came back, and saw the wretched plight of the crow. “Ah! Greedy crow,” he exclaimed, “you would not heed my words, and now your own greed has worked you woe.” So saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “The wilful man who, when exhorted, pays
   No heed to friends who kindly counsel give,
   Shall surely perish, like the greedy crow,
   Who laughed to scorn the pigeon’s warning words.”

Then, exclaiming, “I too can no longer dwell here,” the Bodhisatta flew away. But the crow died there and then, and the cook flung him, basket and all, on the dust-heap.

Said the Teacher, “You were greedy, monk, in bygone times, just as you are now; and all because of your greediness the wise and good of those days had to abandon their homes.” Having ended this lesson, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof that monk won the Fruit of the Second Path. Then the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka as follows, “The greedy monk was the crow of those times, and I the pigeon.”

Ja 43 Veḷukajātaka

The Story about (the Viper) Veḷuka (1s)

In the present one monk is disobedient and wilful. The Buddha tells a story about a previous life in which he had kept a viper as a pet, and even when advised against it, kept him on anyway. One day the viper turned on him and killed him.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā), the disobedient monk = the disciple with the viper as son (veḷukapitā), the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (sesaparisā).

Keywords: Disobedience, Willfulness, Animals.
“The wilful man.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain wilful monk. For the Fortunate One asked him whether the report was true that he was wilful, and the monk admitted that it was. “Monk,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time you have been wilful: you were just so in former days also, (1.245) and, as the result of your refusal to follow the advice of the wise and good, you met your end by the bite of a snake.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a wealthy family in the kingdom of Kāsi. Having come to years of discretion, he saw how from passion springs pain and how true bliss comes by the abandonment of passion. So he threw off sensual desires, and going forth to the Himālayas became an ascetic, winning by focusing on the Meditation Object the five [1.115] Super Knowledges and the eight Attainments. And as he lived his life in the bliss of Absorption, he came in after times to have a large following of five hundred ascetics, whose teacher he was.

Now one day a young poisonous viper, wandering about as vipers do, came to the hut of one of the ascetics; and that monk grew as fond of the creature as if it were his own child, housing it in a joint of bamboo and showing kindness to it. And because it was lodged in a joint of bamboo, the viper was known by the name of “Veḷuka [Bamboo].” Moreover, because the ascetic was as fond of the viper as if it were his own child, they called him “Veḷuka's Father.”

Hearing that one of the monks was keeping a viper, the Bodhisatta sent for that monk and asked whether the report was true. When told that it was true, the Bodhisatta said: “A viper can never be trusted; keep it no longer.”

“But,” urged the monk, “my viper is as dear to me as a pupil to a teacher; I could not live without him.” “Well then,” answered the Bodhisatta, “know that this very snake will lose you your life.” But heedless of the master’s warning, that monk still kept the pet he could not bear to part with. Only a very few days later all the monks went out to gather fruits, and coming to a spot where all kinds grew in plenty, they stayed there two or three days. With them went Veḷuka’s father, leaving his viper behind in its bamboo prison. Two or three days afterwards, when he came back, he bethought him of feeding the creature, and, opening the cane, stretched out his hand, saying: “Come, my son; you must be hungry.” But angry with his long fast, the viper bit his outstretched hand, killing him on the spot, and made its escape into the forest.

Seeing him lying there dead, the monks came and told the Bodhisatta, \{1.246\} who bade the body be burned. Then, seated in their midst, he exhorted the monks by repeating this verse:

1. “The wilful man, who, when exhorted, pays
   No heed to friends who kindly counsel give –
   Just like Vejuka, shall be brought to nought.”

Thus did the Bodhisatta exhort his followers; and he developed within himself the four Divine Abidings, and at his death was reborn into the Brahmā Realm.

Said the Teacher, “Monk, this is not the first time you have shown yourself wilful; you were no less so in times gone by, and thereby met your death from a viper’s bite.” Having ended his lesson, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “In those days, this wilful monk was Vejuka’s father, my disciples were the band of disciples, and I myself their teacher.”

Ja 44 Makasajātaka
The Story about the Mosquito (1s)

In the present some foolish villagers the Buddha came across on his walking tour, aiming to clear the thickets of mosquitos manage to shoot themselves instead. The Buddha tells of a previous life in which a son, aiming to save his father from a mosquito, had, through his recklessness, killed him with an axe instead.

The Bodhisatta = the wise merchant (pañcitavāṇija).

Keywords: Foolishness, Recklessness, Animals, Insects.

“Sense-lacking friends.” [1.116] This story was told by the Teacher while on an alms pilgrimage in Magadha, about some stupid villagers in a certain hamlet. Tradition says that, after travelling from Sāvatthi to the kingdom of Magadha, the Tathāgata was on his rounds in that kingdom when he arrived at a certain hamlet, which was thronged with fools. In this hamlet these fools met together one day, and debated together, saying: “Friends, when we are at work in the jungle, the mosquitos devour us; and that hinders our work. Let us, arming ourselves with bows and weapons, go to war with the mosquitos and shoot them all to death.” So off to the jungle they went, and shouting, “Shoot down the mosquitos,” shot and struck one another, till they were in a sad state and returned only to sink on the ground in or within the village or at its entrance.

Surrounded by the Saṅgha of monks, the Teacher came in quest of alms to that village. The sensible minority among the inhabitants no sooner than they saw the Fortunate One, than they erected a pavilion at the entrance to their village and, after bestowing large alms on the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, bowed to the Teacher and seated themselves. Observing wounded men lying around on this side and on that, the Teacher asked those lay brothers, saying: “There are numbers of handicapped men about; what has happened to them?” “Sir,” was the reply, “they went forth to war with the mosquitos, but only shot one another and so handicapped themselves.” Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time that these foolish people have dealt out blows to themselves instead of to the mosquitos they meant to kill; in former times, also, there were those who, meaning to hit a mosquito, hit a fellow-creature instead.” And so saying, at those villagers’ request he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta gained his livelihood as a trader. In those days in a border-village in Kāsi there dwelt a number of carpenters. And it chanced that one of them, a bald grey-haired man, was planing away at some wood, with his head glistening like a copper bowl, when a mosquito settled on his scalp and stung him with its dart-like sting.

Said the carpenter to his son, who was seated nearby, “My boy, there’s a mosquito stinging me on the head; do drive it away.” “Hold still then, father,” said the son, “one blow will settle it.”

(At that very time the Bodhisatta had reached that village in the way of trade, and was sitting in the carpenter’s shop.)

“Rid me of it,” cried the father. “All right, father,” answered the son, who was behind the old man’s back, and, raising a sharp axe on high with intent to kill only the mosquito, he cleft his father’s head in twain. So the old man fell dead on the spot.
Thought the Bodhisatta, who had been an eye-witness of the whole scene, “Better than such a friend is an enemy with sense, whom fear of men's vengeance will deter from killing a man.” And he recited these lines:

1. “Sense-lacking friends are worse than foes with sense;
Witness the son that sought the gnat to slay,
But cleft, poor fool, his father's skull in twain.” [1.248]

So saying, the Bodhisatta rose up and departed, passing away in after days to fare according to his deeds. And as for the carpenter, his body was burned by his kinsfolk.

“Thus, lay brethren,” said the Teacher, “in bygone times also there were those who, seeking to hit a mosquito, struck down a fellow-creature.” This lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “In those days I was myself the wise and good trader who departed after repeating the verse.”

Ja 45 Rohiṇījātaka

The Story about (the Slave) Rohiṇī (1s)

Alternative Title: Rohiṇījātaka (Cst)

In the present a maid kills her mother while trying to swat mosquitos who had landed on her. The Buddha tells a story of the exact same circumstances happening in the past to the same people in their previous incarnations.

The Bodhisatta = the great wealthy man (mahāseṭṭhi),
the mother = the same in the past (mātā),
the daughter = the same in the past (dhītā).

Keywords: Foolishness, Recklessness, Animals, Insects.

“Sense-lacking friends.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a maid servant of the Lord High Treasurer, Anāthapiṇḍika. For he is said to have had a maid-servant named Rohiṇī, whose aged mother came to where the girl was pounding rice, and lay down. The flies came round the old woman and stung her as with a needle, so she cried to her daughter, “The flies are stinging me, my dear; do drive them away.” “Oh! I'll drive them away, mother,” said the girl, lifting her pestle to the flies which had settled on her mother. Then, crying, “I'll kill them!” she smote her mother such a blow as to kill the old woman.
outright. Seeing what she had done the girl began to weep and cry, “Oh! Mother, mother!”

The news was brought to the Lord High Treasurer, who, after having the body burnt, went his way to the monastery, and told the Teacher what had happened. “This is not the first time, layman,” said the Teacher, “that in Rohiṇī’s anxiety to kill the flies on her mother, she has struck her mother dead with a pestle; she did precisely the same in times past.” Then at Anāthapindika’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born the son of the Lord High Treasurer, and came to be Lord High Treasurer himself at his father’s death. And he, too, had a maid-servant whose name was Rohiṇī. And her mother, in like manner, went to where the daughter was pounding rice, and lay down, and called [1.118] out, ‘Do drive these flies off me, my dear,’ and in just the same way she struck her mother with a pestle, and killed her, and began to weep.

Hearing of what had happened, {1.249} the Bodhisatta reflected: ‘Here, in this world, even an enemy, with sense, would be preferable,’ and recited these lines:

1. “Sense-lacking friends are worse than foes with sense,
Witness the girl whose reckless hand laid low
Her mother, whom she now laments in vain.”

In these lines in praise of the wise, did the Bodhisatta preach the Dhamma.

“This is not the first time, layman,” said the Teacher, “that in Rohiṇī’s anxiety to kill flies she has killed her own mother instead.” This lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The mother and daughter of today were also mother and daughter of those bygone times, and I myself the Lord High Treasurer.”
The Story about Spoiling the Park (1s)

In the present while on walking tour the monks come to a certain village and notice that there is an area of barren land. Upon enquiry it turns out a village lad had dug up the trees to water the roots by size. The Buddha tells a story of how the boy was a monkey in the past who ordered his troop to do the same, thereby ruining the king’s gardens.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (paṇḍītapurisa), the village boy = the elder monkey (vānaraṇaṭṭhaka).

Past Compare: Ja 46 Āramadūsaka, Ja 268 Āramadūsa.

Keywords: Foolishness, Inconsideration, Animals.

“'Tis knowledge.” This story was told by the Teacher in a certain hamlet of Kosala about one who spoiled a pleasure garden.

Tradition says that, in the course of an alms-journey among the people of Kosala, the Teacher came to a certain hamlet. A householder of the place invited the Tathāgata to take the midday meal at his house, and had his guest seated in the pleasure gardens, where he showed hospitality to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, and courteously gave them leave to stroll at will about his grounds. So the monks rose up and walked about the grounds with the gardener. Observing in their walk a bare space, they said to the gardener, “Lay-disciple, elsewhere in the pleasure gardens there is abundant shade; but here there’s neither tree nor shrub. How comes this?”

“Sirs,” replied the man, “when these grounds were being laid out, a village lad, who was doing the watering, pulled up all the young trees hereabouts and then gave them much or little {1.250} water according to the size of their roots. So the young trees withered and died off; and that is why this space is bare.”

281 See the scene sculptured in the Stūpa of Bharhut, Plate xlv, 5.
Drawing near to the Teacher, the monks told him this. “Yes, monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that village lad has spoiled a pleasure garden; he did precisely the same in bygone times also.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a festival was proclaimed in the city; and at the first summoning notes of the festal drum out poured the townsfolk to keep holiday. [1.119]

Now in those days, a tribe of monkeys was living in the king’s pleasure gardens; and the king’s gardener thought to himself, “They’re holiday-making up in the city. I’ll get the monkeys to do the watering for me, and be off to enjoy myself with the rest.” So saying, he went to the king of the monkeys, and, first dwelling on the benefits his majesty and his subjects enjoyed from residence in the pleasure gardens in the way of flowers and fruit and young shoots to eat, ended by saying: “Today there’s holiday-making up in the city, and I’m off to enjoy myself. Couldn’t you water the young trees while I’m away?”

“Oh! Yes,” said the monkey.

“Only mind you do,” said the gardener; and off he went, giving the monkeys the water-skins and wooden watering-pots to do the work with.

Then the monkeys took the water-skins and watering pots, and fell to watering the young trees. “But we must be careful not to waste the water,” observed their king, “as you water, first pull each young tree up and look at the size of its roots. Then give plenty of water to those whose roots strike deep, but only a little to those with tiny roots. When this water is all gone, we shall be hard put to it to get more.”

“To be sure,” said the other monkeys, and did as he bade them.

At this juncture a certain wise man, seeing the monkeys thus engaged, asked them why they pulled up tree after tree and watered them according to the size of their roots. “Because such are our king’s commands,” answered the monkeys.

Their reply moved the wise man to reflect how, with every desire to do good, the ignorant and foolish only succeed in doing harm. And he recited this verse: [1.251]
1. "'Tis knowledge crowns endeavour with success,
   For fools are thwarted by their foolishness,
   See the foolish monkey who killed the trees."

With this rebuke to the king of the monkeys, the wise man departed with his followers from the pleasure gardens.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that this village lad has spoiled pleasure gardens; he was just the same in bygone times also.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The village lad who spoiled this pleasure gardens was the king of the monkeys in those days, and I was myself the wise and good man.”

Ja 47 Vāruṇijātaka
The Story about Spoiling the Drinks (1s)

Alternative Title: Vāruṇidūsakajātaka (Cst)

In the present an apprentice at a tavern notices his clients taking salt for an appetizer, and decides to salt the liquor, thereby driving them away. The Buddha tells how he did the exact same thing in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi), the apprentice = the one spoiled by drink (vāruṇidūsaka).

Keywords: Foolishness, Spoilation.

“'Tis knowledge.” [1.120] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about one who spoiled spirits. Tradition says that Anāthapiṇḍika had a friend who kept a tavern. This friend got ready a supply of strong spirits which he sold for gold and for silver, and his tavern was crowded. He gave orders to his apprentice to sell for cash only, and went off himself to bathe.

This apprentice, while serving out the grog to his customers, observed them sending out for salt and jaggery and eating it as an appetizer. Thought he to himself, “There can’t be any salt in our liquor; I’ll put some in.” So he put a pound of salt in a bowl of grog, and served it out to the customers. And they no sooner 282 Apparently regarded as a cheating proceeding, as opposed to normal barter.

---

took a mouthful, than they spat it out again, saying: “What have you been up to?” “I saw you sending for salt after drinking our liquor, so I mixed some salt in.” “And that’s how you’ve spoilt good liquor, you fool,” cried the customers, and with abuse they got up one after another and flung out of the tavern.

When the keeper of the tavern came home, and did not see a single customer about, he asked where they had all got to. So the apprentice told him what had happened. Berating him for his folly, the man went off and told Anāthapiṇḍika. And the latter, thinking the story a good one to tell, repaired to Jetavana, where after due obeisance he told the Teacher all about it.

“This is not the first time, layman,” said the Teacher, “that this apprentice has spoiled spirits. He did just the same once before.” Then at Anāthapiṇḍika’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was the Treasurer of Benares, and had a tavern-keeper who lived under his protection. This man having got ready a supply of strong spirits, which he left his apprentice to sell while he himself went off to bathe, during his absence his apprentice mixed salt with the liquor, and spoiled it just in the same way. When on his return the young man’s guide and master came to know what had been done, he told the story to the Treasurer. ‘Truly,’ said the latter, the ignorant and foolish, with every desire to do good, only succeed in doing harm.’ And he recited this verse:

| 1. “ Tis knowledge crowns endeavour with success;  |
| For fools are thwarted by their foolishness,  |
| Witness Koṇḍañña’s salted bowl of grog.” |

In these lines the Bodhisatta taught the Dhamma. [1.121]

Said the Teacher, “Layman, this same person spoiled spirits in the past as now.” Then he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “He who spoiled the spirits now was also the spoiler of the spirits in those bygone days, and I myself was then the Treasurer of Benares.”

Ja 48 Vedabbhajātaka\(^{284}\)

The Story about the Vedabbha (Brahmin) (1s)

Alternative Title: Vedabbajātaka (Cst)

In the present the Buddha hears of an undisciplined monk, and tells a story of how in a past life, despite being warned against it, he had exercised his powers to gain treasure, which fell from the sky, and how this had led to his own destruction, and the destruction of 1,000 more.

The Bodhisatta = the pupil (antevāsika),
the wilful monk = the Vedabbha brahmin.

Keywords: Disobedience, Wilfullness, Devas.

“Misguided effort.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a wilful monk. Said the Teacher to that monk, “This is not the first time, monk, that you have been wilful; you were of just the same disposition in bygone times also; \(^{1.253}\) and therefore it was that, as you would not follow the advice of the wise and good, you came to be cut in two by a sharp sword and were flung on the highway; and you were the sole cause why a thousand men met their end.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there was a brahmin in a village who knew the charm called Vedabbha. Now this charm, so they say, was precious beyond all price. For, if at a certain conjunction of the planets the charm was repeated and the gaze bent upwards to the skies, straightaway from the heavens there rained the Seven Things of Price – gold, silver, pearl, coral, catseye, ruby, and diamond.

---

\(^{284}\) Dr. Richard Morris was the first to trace in this Jātaka an early form of Chaucer’s Pardoner’s Tale (see Contemporary Review for May, 1881); Mr. H. T. Francis and Mr. C. H. Tawney independently traced the same connection in The Academy, Dec. 22, 1883 (subsequently reprinted in an enlarged form), and in the Cambridge Journal of Philology, Vol. xii. 1883.
In those days the Bodhisatta was a pupil of this brahmin; and one day his master left the village on some business or other, and came with the Bodhisatta to the country of Ceti.

In a forest by the way dwelt five hundred robbers – known as “the Dispatchers” who made the way impassable. And these caught the Bodhisatta and the Vedabbha brahmin.

(Why, you ask, were they called the Dispatchers? Well, the story goes that of every two prisoners they made they used to dispatch one to fetch the ransom; and that’s why they were called the Dispatchers. If they captured a father and a son, they told the father to go for the ransom to free his son; if they caught a mother and her daughter, they sent the mother for the money; if they caught two brothers, they let the elder go; and so too, if they caught a teacher and his pupil, it was the pupil they set free. In this case, therefore, they kept the Vedabbha brahmin, and sent the Bodhisatta for the ransom.)

And the Bodhisatta said with a bow to his master, “In a day or two I shall surely come back; have no fear; only fail not to do as I shall say. Today will come to pass the conjunction of the planets which brings about the rain of the Things of Price. Take heed lest, yielding to this mishap, you repeat the charm and call down the precious shower. For, if you do, calamity will certainly befall both you, and this band of robbers.” With this warning to his master, the Bodhisatta went his way in quest of the ransom.

At sunset the robbers bound the brahmin and laid him by the heels. Just at this moment the full moon rose over the eastern horizon, and the brahmin, studying the heavens, knew that the great conjunction was taking place. “Why,” he thought, “should I suffer this misery? By repeating the charm I will call down the precious rain, pay the robbers the ransom, and go free.” So he called out to the robbers, “Friends, why do you take me a prisoner?” “To get a ransom, venerable sir,” said they. “Well, if that is all you want,” said the brahmin, “make haste and untie me; have my head bathed, and new clothes put on me; and let me be perfumed and decked with flowers. Then leave me to myself.” The robbers did as he bade them.

The brahmin, marking the conjunction of the planets, repeated his charm with eyes uplifted to the heavens. Forthwith the Things of Price poured down from the skies! The robbers picked them all up, wrapping their booty into bundles with their cloaks. Then with their brothers they marched away; and the brahmin followed in the rear. But, as luck would have it, the party was captured by a second band of five hundred robbers! “Why do you seize us?” said the first to the second band. “For booty,” was the answer. “If booty is what you want, seize on that brahmin, who by simply gazing up at the skies brought down riches as rain. It was he who gave us all that we have got.” So the second band of robbers let the first band go, and seized on the brahmin, crying, “Give us riches too!” “It would give me great pleasure,” said the brahmin, “but it will be a year before the requisite conjunction of the planets takes place again. If you will only be so good as to wait till then, I will invoke the precious shower for you.”

“Rascally brahmin!” cried the angry robbers, “you made the other band rich off-hand, but want us to wait a whole year!” And they cut him in two with a sharp sword, and flung his body in the middle of the road. Then hurrying after the first band of robbers, they killed every man of them too in hand-to-hand combat, and seized the booty. Next, they divided into two companies and fought among themselves, company against company, till two hundred and fifty men were slain. And so they went on killing one another, till only two were left alive. Thus did those thousand men come to destruction. [1.123]

Now, when the two survivors had managed to carry off the treasure they hid it in the jungle near a village; and one of them sat there, sword in hand, [1.255] to guard it, while the other went into the village to get rice and have it cooked for supper.

“Covetousness is the root of ruin!” mused he²⁸⁵ that stopped by the treasure. “When my mate comes back, he’ll want half of this. Suppose I kill him the moment he gets back.” So he drew his sword and sat waiting for his comrade’s return.

Meanwhile, the other had equally reflected that the booty had to be halved, and thought to himself, “Suppose I poison the rice, and give it to him to eat and so kill him, and have the whole of the treasure to myself.” Accordingly, when the rice

²⁸⁵ Or perhaps a full stop should be inserted after eva ti, the words “Covetousness... ruin” being treated as a maxim quoted parenthetically by the author.” was boiled, he first ate his own share, and then put poison in the rest, which he carried back with him to the jungle. But scarce had he set it down, when the other robber cut him in two with his sword, and hid the body away in a secluded spot.
Then he ate the poisoned rice, and died then and there. Thus, by reason of the treasure, not only the brahmin but all the robbers came to destruction.

Howbeit, after a day or two the Bodhisatta came back with the ransom. Not finding his master where he had left him, but seeing treasure strewn all round about, his heart misgave him that, in spite of his advice, his master must have called down a shower of treasure from the skies, and that all must have perished in consequence; and he proceeded along the road.

On his way he came to where his master’s body lay cloven in twain upon the way.
“Alas,” he cried, “he is dead through not heeding my warning.” Then with gathered sticks he made a pyre and burnt his master’s body, making an offering of wild flowers. Further along the road, he came upon the five hundred “Dispatchers,” and further still upon the two hundred and fifty, and so on by degrees until at last he came to where lay only two corpses. Marking how of the thousand all but two had perished, and feeling sure that there must be two survivors, and that these could not refrain from strife, he pressed on to see where they had gone. So on he went till he found the path by which with the treasure they had turned into the jungle; and there he found the heap of bundles of treasure, and one robber lying dead with his rice-bowl overturned at his side.

Realising the whole story at a glance, the Bodhisatta set himself to search for the missing man, and at last found his body in the secret spot where it had been flung.
{1.256} “And thus,” mused the Bodhisatta, “through not following my counsel my master in his wilfulness has been the means of destroying not himself only but a thousand others also. Truly, they that [1.124] seek their own gain by mistaken and misguided means shall reap ruin, even as my master did.” And he repeated this verse:

1. “Misguided effort leads to loss, not gain;
Thieves killed Vedabbha and themselves were slain.”

Thus spake the Bodhisatta, and he went on to say, “Even as my master’s misguided and misplaced effort in causing the rain of treasure to fall from heaven wrought both his own death and the destruction of others with him, even so shall every other man who by mistaken means seeks to compass his own advantage, utterly perish and involve others in his destruction.” With these words did the Bodhisatta make the forest ring; and in this verse did he preach the Dhamma, while the Tree Devatās shouted applause. The treasure he contrived to carry off to his own home, where he lived out his term of life in the exercise of generosity and other good works. And when his life closed, he departed to the heaven he had won.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monk, you were wilful; you were wilful in bygone times as well; and by your wilfulness you came to utter destruction.” His lesson ended, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The wilful monk was the Vedabbha brahmin of those days, and I myself his pupil.”

Ja 49 Nakkhattajātaka
The Story about the Constellations (1s)

In the present a family agrees to marry their son off and picks a day, then asks their family ascetic if it is auspicious. Peeved that they didn’t consult him before setting the day, he tells them it is inauspicious. The other family, disappointed on the day, marry her off to another. The Buddha hearing of it, tells how the same thing had happened to the same people in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (paṇḍitapurisa), the ascetic = the same in the past (ājīvaka),
the families = the same in the past (kulāni).

Keywords: Foolishness, Bad advice.

“The fool may watch.” (1.257) This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about a certain naked ascetic. Tradition says that a gentleman of the country near Sāvatthi asked in marriage for his son a young Sāvatthi lady of equal rank. Having fixed a day to come and fetch the bride, he subsequently consulted a naked ascetic who was intimate with his family, as to whether the stars were favourable for holding the festivities that day.

“He didn’t ask me in the first instance,” thought the indignant ascetic, “but having already fixed the day, without consulting me, just makes an empty reference to me now. Very good; I'll teach him a lesson.” So he made answer that the stars were not favourable for that day; that the nuptials ought not to be celebrated that day; and that, if they were, great misfortune would come of it.
And the country family in their faith in their ascetic did not go for the bride that day. Now the bride’s friends in the town had made all their preparations for celebrating the nuptials, and when they saw that the other side did not come, they said: “It was they who fixed today, and yet they have not come; and we have gone to great expense about it all. Who are these people, forsooth? Let us marry the girl to someone else.” So they found another bridegroom and gave the girl to him in marriage with all the festivities they had already prepared.

Next day the country party came to fetch the bride. But the Sāvatthi people rated them as follows, “You country folk are a bad lot; you fixed the day yourselves, and then insulted us by not coming. We have given the maiden to another.” The country party started a quarrel, but in the end went home the way they came.

Now the monks came to know how that naked ascetic had thwarted the festivity, and they began to talk the matter over in the Dhamma Hall. Entering the Hall, and learning on enquiry the subject of their conversation, the Teacher said: “Monks, this is not the first time that this same ascetic has thwarted the festivities of that family; out of pique with them, he did just the same thing once before.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, some townsfolk had asked a country-girl in marriage and had named the day. Having already made the arrangement, they asked their family ascetic whether the stars were propitious for the ceremony on that day. Piqued at their having fixed the day to suit themselves without first taking counsel with him, the ascetic made up his mind to thwart their marriage festivities for that day; and accordingly he made answer that the stars were not favourable for that day, and that, if they persisted, grave misfortune would be the result. So, in their faith in the ascetic, they stayed at home! When the country folk found that the town party did not come, they said among themselves, “It was they who fixed the marriage for today, and now they have not come. Who are they, forsooth?” And they married the girl to someone else.

Next day the townsfolk came and asked for the girl; but they of the country made this answer, “You townsfolk lack common decency. You yourselves named the day and yet did not come to fetch the bride. As you stayed away, we married her to someone else.” “But we asked our ascetic, and he told us the stars were unfavourable. That’s why we did not come, yesterday. Give us the girl.” “You didn’t come at the proper time, and now she’s another’s. How can we marry her twice over?” While they wrangled thus with one another, a wise man from the town came into the country on business. Hearing the townsfolk explain that they had consulted their ascetic and that their absence was due to the unfavourable disposition of the stars, he exclaimed, “What, forsooth, do [1.126] the stars matter? Is not the lucky thing to get the girl?” And, so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “The fool may watch for ‘lucky days,’
   Yet luck shall always miss;
   ’Tis luck itself is luck’s own star.
   What can mere stars achieve?”

As for the townsfolk, as they did not get the girl for all their wrangling, they had to go off home again!

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that this naked ascetic has thwarted that family’s festivities; he did just the same thing in bygone times also.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This ascetic {1.259} was also the ascetic of those days, and the families too were the same; I myself was the wise and good man who uttered the verse.”

---

Ja 50 Dummedhajātaka

The Story about the Unintelligent (1s)

In the present the monks talk about the effort the Buddha makes to help and save others. The Buddha tells a story of how, when he was once proclaimed king, he had frightened a dissolute people into obedience by threatening to offer them up to the gods in sacrifice if they broke the precepts.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇaśirājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Present Source: Ja 469 Mahākaṇṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 50 Dummedha, Ja 347 Ayakūṭa, Ja 391 Dhajaviheṭha.

Keywords: Sacrifice, Fear of wrongdoing, Devas.

“A thousand evil-doers.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about actions done for the world’s good, as will be explained in the Twelfth Book in the Mahākaṇṭhajātaka [Ja 469].
One day, they say, the monks as they sat in the Dhamma Hall, were talking together. “Sirs,” one would say, “the Teacher, ever practising friendship towards the multitudes of the people, has forsaken an agreeable abode, and lives just for the good of the world. He has attained supreme wisdom, yet of his own accord takes bowl and robe, and goes on a journey of eighteen leagues or more. For the five elders he set rolling the Wheel of the Dhamma; on the fifth day of the half-month he recited the Anattalakkhaṇa discourse, and made them Arahats; he went to Uruvela, and to the ascetics with matted hair he showed three and a half thousand miracles, and persuaded them to join the Saṅgha; at Gayāsīsa he taught the Discourse upon Fire, and made a thousand of these ascetics Arahats; to Mahākassapa, when he had gone forward three miles to meet him, after three discourses he gave the higher ordination; all alone, after the noon-day meal, he went a journey of forty-five leagues, and then established in the Fruit of the Third Path Puṇṇaṇa (a youth of very good birth); to meet Mahākapphāna he went forward a space of two thousand leagues, and made him an Arahat; alone, in the afternoon he went a journey of thirty leagues, and made that cruel and harsh man Aṇgilimāla an Arahat; thirty leagues also he traversed, and established Āḷavaka in the Fruit of the First Path, and saved the prince; in the Heaven of the Thirty-Three he dwelt three months, and taught Abhidhamma to eight hundred millions of deities; to the Brahmā Realm he went, and destroyed the false Dhamma of Baka Brahmā, and made ten thousand Brahmās Arahats; every year he goes on pilgrimage in three districts, and to such men as are capable of receiving, he gives the Refuges, the Precepts, and the Fruits of the different stages; he even acts for the good of Nāgas and Garuḷas and the like, in many ways.”

In such words they praised the goodness and worth of the One with Ten Powers’ life for the good of the world. The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about as they sat there? They told him. “And no wonder, monks,” said he. “I who now in my perfect wisdom would live for the world’s good, even I in the past, in the days of passion, lived for the good of the world.” So saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisattva was reborn in the womb of the queen consort. When he was born, he was named prince Brahmadatta on his name-day. By sixteen years of age he had been well educated at Taxila, had learned the Three Vedas by heart, and was versed in the Eighteen Branches of Understanding. And his father made him a viceroy.
Now in those days the Benares folk were much given to festivals to the Devatā, and used to show honour to them. It was their wont to massacre numbers of sheep, goats, poultry, swine, and other living creatures, and perform their rites not merely with flowers and perfumes but with gory [1.127] carcasses.

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “Led astray by superstition, men now wantonly sacrifice life; the multitude are for the most part given up to irreligion: but when at my father’s death I succeed to my inheritance, I will find means to end such destruction of life. I will devise some clever stratagem whereby the evil shall be stopped without harming a single human being.”

In this mood the prince one day mounted his chariot and drove out of the city. On the way he saw a crowd gathered together at a holy banyan tree, praying to the Devatā who had been reborn in that tree, to grant them sons and daughters, honour and wealth, each according to his heart’s desire. Alighting from his chariot the Bodhisatta drew near to the tree and behaved as a worshipper so far as to make offerings of perfumes and flowers, sprinkling the tree with water, and pacing reverently round its trunk. Then mounting his chariot again, he went his way back into the city.

Thenceforth the prince made like journeys from time to time to the tree, {1.260} and worshipped it like a true believer in the Devatās.

In due course, when his father died, the Bodhisatta ruled in his stead. Shunning the four evil courses, and practising the ten royal virtues, he ruled his people in righteousness. And now that his desire had come to pass and he was king, the Bodhisatta set himself to fulfil his former resolve. So he called together his ministers, the brahmins, the gentry, and the other orders of the people, and asked the assembly whether they knew how he had made himself king. But no man could tell.

“Have you ever seen me reverently worshipping a banyan tree with perfumes and the like, and bowing down before it?”

“Sire, we have,” said they.

“Well, I was making a vow; and the vow was that, if ever I became king, I would offer a sacrifice to that tree. And now that by help of the Devatā I have come to be king, I will offer my promised sacrifice. So prepare it with all speed.”
“But what are we to make it of?”

“My vow,” said the king, “was this: All such as are addicted to the Five Defilements, to wit the slaughter of living creatures and so forth, and all such as walk in the Ten Paths of Unrighteousness, them will I slay, and with their flesh and their blood, with their entrails and their vitals, I will make my offering. So proclaim by beat of drum that our lord the king in the days of his viceroyalty vowed that if ever he became king he would slay, and offer up in a sacrifice, all such of his subjects as break the Precepts. And now the king wills to slay one thousand of such as are addicted to the Five Defilements or walk in the Ten Paths of Unrighteousness; with the hearts and the flesh of the thousand shall a sacrifice be made in the god’s honour. Proclaim this that all may know throughout the city. Of those that transgress after this date,” added the king, “will I slay a thousand, and offer them as a sacrifice to the god in discharge of my vow.” And to make his meaning clear the king uttered this verse:

1. “A thousand evil-doers once I vowed
   In pious gratitude to kill;
   And evil-doers form so huge a crowd,
   That I will now my vow fulfil.”

Obedient to the king’s commands, the ministers had proclamation made by beat of drum accordingly throughout the length and breadth of Benares. Such was the effect of the proclamation on the townsfolk that not a soul persisted in the old wickedness. And throughout the Bodhisatta’s reign not a man was convicted of transgressing. Thus, without harming a single one of his subjects, the Bodhisatta made them observe the Precepts. And at the close of a life of generosity and other good works he passed away with his followers to throng the city of the Devas.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that the Tathāgata has acted for the world’s good; he acted in like manner in bygone times as well.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s disciples were the ministers of those days, and I myself was the king of Benares.”
Ja 51 Mahāsīlavajātaka
The Story about One with Great Virtue (1s)

In the present a monk gives up striving. To encourage him the Buddha tells a story of a king of old who persevered in mercy even when threatened with death; how he escaped being buried in the charnel ground, settled a dispute for two Yakkhas, and won back his kingdom and the lives of his subjects by his righteousness.

The Bodhisatta = the virtuous great king (sīlavamahārājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the thousand ministers (amaccasahassaṁ), Devadatta = the corrupt minster (paduṭṭhāmacca).

Keywords: Mercy, Perseverance, Devas.

“Toil on, my brother.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who had given up all earnest effort. Being asked by the Teacher whether the report was true that he was discontent, the monk said it was true. “How can you, monk,” said the Teacher, “grow cold in so saving a dispensation? Even when the wise and good of bygone days had lost their kingdom, yet so undaunted was their resolution that in the end they won back their sovereignty.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as the child of the queen; and on his name-day they gave him the name of prince Śīlava [Virtuous]. At the age of sixteen his education was complete; and later he came at his father’s death to be king, and ruled his people righteously under the title of the great king Śīlava. At each of the four city-gates he built an alms house, another in the heart of the city, and yet another at his own palace-gates – six in all; and at each he distributed alms to poor travellers and the needy. He kept the Precepts and observed the Uposatha precepts; he abounded in patience, loving-kindness, and mercy; and in righteousness he ruled the land, cherishing all creatures alike with the fond love of a father for his baby boy.

Now one of the king’s ministers had dealt treacherously in the king’s harem, and this became matter of common talk. The ministers reported it to the king. Examining into the matter himself, the king found the minister’s guilt to be clear. So he sent for the culprit, and said: “O blinded by folly! You have sinned, and are not worthy to dwell in my kingdom; take your substance and your wife and family, and go hence.” Driven thus from the realm, that minister left the Kāsi country, and, entering the service of the king of Kosala, gradually rose to be that monarch’s confidential adviser. One day he said to the king of Kosala, “Sire, the kingdom of Benares is like a goodly honeycomb untainted by flies; its king is feebleness itself; and a trifling force would suffice to conquer the whole country.”

Hereon, the king of Kosala reflected that the kingdom of Benares was large, and, considering this in connection with the advice that a trifling force could conquer it, he grew suspicious that his adviser was a hireling instigated to lead him into a trap. “Traitor,” he cried, “you are paid to say this!”

“Indeed I am not,” answered the other, “I do but speak the truth. If you doubt me, send men to massacre a village over his border, and see whether, when they are caught and brought before him, the king does not let them off scot-free and even load them with gifts.”

“He shows a very bold front in making his assertion,” thought the king, “I will test his counsel [1.263] without delay.” And accordingly he sent some of his creatures to harry a village across the Benares border. The ruffians were captured and brought before the king of Benares, who asked them, saying: “My children, why have you killed my villagers?”

“Because we could not make a living,” said they.

“Then why did you not come to me?” said the king. “See that you do not do the like again.”

And he gave them presents and sent them away. Back they went and told this to the king of Kosala. But this evidence was not enough to nerve him to the expedition; and a second band was sent to massacre another village, this time in the heart of the kingdom. These too were likewise sent away with presents by the king of Benares. But even this evidence was not deemed strong enough; and a third party was sent to plunder the very streets of Benares! And these, like their forerunners, [1.130] were sent away with presents! Satisfied at last that the king of Benares was an entirely good king, the king of Kosala resolved to seize on his kingdom, and set out against him with troops and elephants.

Now in these days the king of Benares had a thousand gallant warriors, who would face the charge even of a rut elephant – whom the launched thunderbolt of Sakka could not terrify – a matchless band of invincible heroes ready at the king’s command to reduce all Jambudīpa to his sway! These, hearing the king of Kosala was coming to take Benares, came to their sovereign with the news, and prayed that they might be dispatched against the invader. “We will defeat and capture him, sire,” they said, “before he can set foot over the border.”

“Not so, my children,” said the king. “None shall suffer because of me. Let those who covet kingdoms seize mine, if they will.” And he refused to allow them march against the invader.

Then the king of Kosala crossed the border and came to the middle-country; and again the ministers went to the king with renewed entreaty. But still the king refused. And now the king of Kosala appeared outside the city, and sent a message to the king bidding him either yield up the kingdom or give battle. “I fight not,” was the message of the king of Benares in reply, “let him seize my kingdom.”

Yet a third time the king’s ministers came to him and besought him not to allow the king of Kosala to enter, but to permit them to overthrow and capture him before the city. Still refusing, the king bade the city-gates be opened, and seated himself in state aloft upon his royal throne with his thousand ministers round him.

Entering the city and finding none to bar his way, the king of Kosala passed with his army to the royal palace. The doors stood open wide; and there on his gorgeous throne with his thousand ministers around him sat the great king Sīlava in state. “Seize them all,” cried the king of Kosala, “tie their hands tightly behind their backs, and away with them to the cemetery! There dig holes and bury them alive up to the neck, so that they cannot move hand or foot. The jackals will come at night and give them sepulchre!”

At the bidding of the ruffianly king, his followers bound the king of Benares and his ministers, and hauled them off. But even in this hour not so much as an angry thought did the great king Sīlava harbour against the ruffians; and not a man among his ministers, even when they were being marched off in bonds, could disobey the king – so perfect is said to have been the discipline among his followers.

So king Sīlava and his ministers were led off and buried up to the neck in pits in the cemetery, the king in the middle and the others on either side of him. The ground was trampled in upon them, and there they were left. Still meek and free from anger against his oppressor, king [1.131] Silava exhorted his companions, saying: “Let your hearts be filled with naught but love and generosity, my children.”

Now at midnight the jackals came trooping to the banquet of human flesh; and at sight of the beasts the king and his companions raised a mighty shout all together, frightening the jackals away. Halting, the pack looked back, and, seeing no one pursuing, again came forward. A second shout drove them away again, but only to return as before. But the third time, seeing that not a man amongst them all pursued, the jackals thought to themselves, “These must be men who are doomed to death.” They came on boldly; even when the shout was again being raised, they did not turn tail. On they came, each singling out his prey – the chief jackal making for the king, and the other jackals for his companions. {1.265} Having skill in means, the king marked the beast’s approach, and, raising his throat as if to receive the bite, fastened his teeth in the jackal’s throat with a grip like a vice!
Unable to free its throat from the mighty grip of the king’s jaws, and fearing death, the jackal raised a great howl. At his cry of distress the pack conceived that their leader must have been caught by a man. With no heart left to approach their own destined prey, away they all scampered for their lives.

Seeking to free itself from the king’s teeth, the trapped jackal plunged madly to and fro, and thereby loosened the earth around the king. Hereupon the latter, letting the jackal go, put forth his mighty strength, and by plunging from side to side got his hands free! Then, clutching the brink of the pit, he drew himself up, and came forth like a cloud scudding before the wind. Bidding his companions be of good cheer, he now set to work to loosen the earth round them and to get them out, till with all his ministers he stood free once more in the cemetery.

Now it chanced that a corpse had been exposed in that part of the cemetery which lay between the respective domains of two Yakkhas; and the Yakkhas were disputing over the division of the spoil.

“We can’t divide it ourselves,” said they, “but this king Silava is righteous; he will divide it for us. Let us go to him.” So they dragged the corpse by the foot to the king, and said: “Sire, divide this corpse and give us each our share.” “Certainly I will, my friends,” said the king. “But, as I am dirty, I must bathe first.”
Straightaway, by their magic power, the Yakkhas brought to the king the scented water prepared for the usurper’s bath. And when the king had bathed, they brought him the robes which had been laid out for the usurper to wear. When he had put these on, they brought his majesty a box containing the four kinds of scent. When he had perfumed himself, they brought flowers of divers kinds laid out upon jewelled fans, in a casket of gold. When he had decked himself with the flowers, the Yakkhas asked whether they could be of any further service. And the king gave them to understand that he was hungry. So away went the Yakkhas, and returned with rice flavoured with all the choicest flavours, which had been prepared for the usurper’s table.

The king, now bathed and scented, dressed and arrayed, ate of the dainty fare. Thereupon the Yakkhas brought the usurper’s perfumed water for him to drink, in the usurper’s own golden bowl, not forgetting to bring the golden cup too. When the king had drunk and had washed his mouth and was washing his hands, they brought him fragrant betel to chew, and asked whether his majesty had any further commands. “Fetch me,” said he, “by your magic power the sword of state which lies by the usurper’s pillow.” And straightaway the sword was brought to the king. Then the king took the corpse, and setting it upright, cut it in two down the backbone, giving one-half to each Yakkha. This done, the king washed the blade, and girded it on his side.

Having eaten their fill, the Yakkhas were glad of heart, and in their gratitude asked the king what more they could do for him. “Set me by your magic power,” said he, “in the usurper’s chamber, and set each of my ministers back in his own house.” “Certainly, sire,” said the Yakkhas; and forthwith it was done. Now in that hour the usurper was lying asleep on the royal bed in his chamber of state. And as he slept in all tranquillity, the good king struck him with the flat of the sword upon the belly. Waking up in a fright, the usurper saw by the lamp-light that it was the great king Silava. Summoning up all his courage, he rose from his couch and said: “Sire, it is night; a guard is set; the doors are barred; and none may enter. How then came you to my bedside, sword in hand and clad in robes of splendour?” Then the king told him in detail all the story of his escape. Then the usurper’s heart was moved within him, and he cried, “O king, I, though blessed with human nature, knew not your goodness; but knowledge thereof was given to the fierce and cruel Yakkhas, whose food is flesh and blood. Henceforth, I, sire, will not plot against such signal virtue as you possess.” So saying, he swore an oath of friendship upon his sword and begged the king’s forgiveness. And he made the king lie down upon the bed of state, while he stretched himself upon a little couch.

On the morrow at daybreak, when the sun had risen, his whole host of every rank and degree was mustered by beat of drum at the usurper’s command; in their presence he extolled king Śīlava, as if raising the full-moon on high in the heavens; and right before them all, he again asked the king’s forgiveness and gave him back his kingdom, saying: “Henceforth, let it be my charge to deal with rebels; rule you your kingdom, with me to keep watch and ward.” And so saying, he passed sentence on the slanderous traitor, and with his troops and elephants went back to his own kingdom.

Seated in majesty and splendour beneath a white canopy of sovereignty [1.133] upon a throne of gold with legs as of a gazelle, the great king Śīlava contemplated his own glory and thought thus within himself, “Had I not persevered, I should not be in the enjoyment of this magnificence, nor would my thousand ministers be still numbered among the living. It was by perseverance that I recovered the royal state I had lost, and saved the lives of my thousand ministers. Verily, we should strive on unremittingly with dauntless hearts, seeing that the fruit of perseverance is so excellent.” And therewithal the king broke into this exalted utterance:

1. “Toil on, my brother; still in hope stand fast;
   Nor let your courage flag and tire.
   Myself I see, who, all my woes o’erpast,
   Am master of my heart’s desire.”

Thus spoke the Bodhisatta in this exalted utterance, declaring how sure it is that the earnest effort of the good will come to maturity. After a life spent in doing right he passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds. [1.268]

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the discontented monk became an Arahat. The Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the traitorous minister of those days, the Buddha’s disciples were the thousand ministers, and I myself the great king Goodness.”
The Short Story about (King) Janaka (1s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷajanakajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk has given up his efforts. The Buddha tells the story of how when he was lost at sea, he persevered and eventually was rescued by a Devatā and made it to land.

The Bodhisatta = king Janaka (Janakarājā).

Past Compare: Ja 52 Cullajanakajātaka, Ja 539 Mahājanaka.

Keyword: Perseverance.

“Toil on, my brother.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about another discontented monk. All the incidents that are to be related here, will be given in the Mahājanakajātaka [Ja 539].

In the early days of his reign, king Mahājanaka, the son of Ariṭṭhajanaka, ruled over all the kingdoms of Videha. “The king, they say, is a wise man, having skill in means, we will see him,” so the whole city was in a stir to see him, and they came from different parts with presents; they prepared a great festival in the city, covered the walls of the palace with plastered impressions of their hands, hung perfumes and flower-wreaths, darkened the air as they threw fried grain, flowers, perfumes and incense, and got ready all sorts of food to eat and drink.

In order to present offerings to the king they gathered round and stood, bringing food hard and soft, and all kinds of drinks and fruits, while the crowd of the king’s ministers sat on one side, on another a host of brahmins, on another the wealthy merchants and the like, on another the most beautiful dancing girls; brahmin panegyrists, skilled in festive songs, sang their cheerful odes with loud voices, hundreds of musical instruments were played, the king’s palace was filled with one vast sound as if it were in the centre of the Yugandhara ocean; every place which he looked upon trembled.

The Bodhisatta as he sat under the white umbrella, beheld the great pomp of glory like Sakka’s magnificence, and he remembered his own struggles in the great ocean, “Courage is the right thing to put forth, if I had not shown courage in the great ocean, should I ever have attained this glory?” and joy arose in his mind as he remembered it.

The king, seated beneath the white canopy of sovereignty, recited this verse:
1. “Toil on, my brother; still in hope stand fast;
Faint not, nor tire, though harassed sore.
Myself I see, who, all my woes o’erpast,
Have fought my stubborn way ashore.”

Here too the discontented monk became an Arahant. The Supreme Buddha was king Janaka.

Ja 53 Puṇṇapātiṣṭaka
The Story about the Liquor Dish (1s)

In the present some poor drunks try to fool Anāthapiṇḍika into taking a drugged drink, so they could rob him. When they don’t drink the liquor themselves he understands their trickery and scolds them. When the Buddha hears of this, he tells of a similar happening in a past life, when the same people tried to trick him in a similar way.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi), the scoundrels = the same in the past (dhuṭta).

Keywords: Sobriety, Trickery.

“What? Leave untasted.” [1.134] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about some drugged liquor.

In the past the drunkards of Sāvatthi met to take counsel, saying: “We’ve not got the price of a drink left; how are we to get it?” “Cheer up!” said one ruffian, “I’ve a little plan.” “What may that be?” cried the others.

“It’s Anāthapiṇḍika’s custom,” said the fellow, “to wear his rings and richest attire, when going to wait upon the king. Let us doctor some liquor with a stupefying drug and fit up a drinking-booth, in which we will all be sitting when Anāthapiṇḍika passes by. ‘Come and join us, Lord High Treasurer,’ we’ll cry, and ply him with our liquor till he loses his senses. Then let us relieve him of his rings and clothes, and get the price of a drink.”

His plan mightily pleased the other rogues, and was duly carried out. As Anāthapiṇḍika was returning, they went out to meet him and invited him [1.269] to come along with them; for they had got some rare liquor, and he must taste it before he went.
“What?” he thought, “shall a believer, who has found emancipation, touch strong drink? Howbeit, though I have no craving for it, yet will I expose these rogues.” So into their booth he went, where their proceedings soon showed him that their liquor was drugged; and he resolved to make the rascals take to their heels. So he roundly charged them with doctoring their liquor with a view to drugging strangers first and robbing then afterwards. “You sit in the booth you have opened, and you praise up the liquor,” said he, “but as for drinking it, not one of you ventures on that. If it is really undrugged, drink away at it yourselves.” This summary exposure made the gang take to their heels, and Anāthapiṇḍika went off home. Thinking he might as well tell the incident to the Tathāgata, he went to Jetavana and related the story.

“This time, layman,” said the Teacher, “it is you whom these rogues have tried to trick; so too in the past they tried to trick the good and wise of those days.” So saying, at his hearer’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was Treasurer of that city. And then too did the same gang of drunkards, conspiring together in like manner, drug liquor, and go forth to meet him in just the same way, and made just the same overtures. The Treasurer did not want to drink at all, but nevertheless went with them, solely to expose them. Marking their proceedings and detecting their scheme, he was anxious to scare them away and so represented that it would be a gross thing for him to drink spirits just before going to the king’s palace. “Sit you here,” said he, “till I’ve seen the king and am on my way back; then I'll think about it.”

On his return, the rascals called to him, but the Treasurer, fixing his eye on the drugged bowls, confounded them by saying: “I like not your [1.135] ways. Here stand the bowls as full now as when I left you; loudly as you vaunt the praises of the liquor, yet not a drop passes your own lips. Why, if it had been good liquor, you’d have taken your own share as well. This liquor is drugged!” And he repeated this verse:

1. “What? Leave untasted drink you vaunt so rare?
   Nay, this is proof no honest liquor’s there.” [1.270]

After a life of good deeds, the Bodhisatta passed away to fare according to his deeds.
His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The rascals of today were also the rascals of those bygone days; and I myself was then Treasurer of Benares.”

Ja 54 Phalajātaka
The Story about the Fruit (1s)

Alternative Title: Kiṁphalajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks come across a clever gardener, who knows all the fruits and their various stages. When the Buddha hears of this, he tells of how in a past life his knowledge of fruits had saved the lives of the men of his caravan, when he had correctly identified a poisonous fruit that looked like a mango.

The Bodhisatta = the caravan leader (satthavāha),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Ja 54 Phala, Ja 85 Kimpakka, Ja 366 Gumbiya.

Keywords: Skill, Discrimination.

“When near a village.” This was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay brother who was skilled in the knowledge of fruits. It appears that a certain householder of Sāvatthi had invited the Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head, and had seated them in his pleasure gardens, where they were regaled with rice-gruel and cakes. Afterwards he bade his gardener go round with the monks and give mangoes and other kinds of fruits to the venerables. In obedience to orders, the man walked about the grounds with the monks, and could tell by a single glance up at the tree what fruit was green, what nearly ripe, and what quite ripe, and so on. And what he said was always found true. So the monks came to the Tathāgata and mentioned how expert the gardener was, and how, while himself standing on the ground, he could accurately tell the condition of the hanging fruit.

“Monks,” said the Teacher, “this gardener is not the only one who has had knowledge of fruits. A like knowledge was shown by the wise and good of former days also.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a merchant. When he grew up, and was trading with five hundred wagons, he came one day to where the road led through a great forest. {[1.271] Halting at the outskirts, he mustered the caravan and addressed them thus, “Poison trees grow in this forest. Take heed that you taste no unfamiliar leaf, flower, or fruit without first consulting me.” All promised to take every care; and the journey into the forest began. Now just within the forest-border stands a village, and just outside that village grows a Kimphala tree. The Kimphala tree exactly resembles a mango alike in trunk, branch, leaf, flower, and fruit. And not only in outward semblance, but also in taste and smell, the fruit – ripe or unripe – mimics the mango. If eaten, it is a deadly poison, and causes instant death.

Now some greedy fellows, who went on ahead of the caravan, came to this tree and, taking it to be a mango, ate of its fruit. But others said: “Let us ask our leader before we eat,” and they accordingly halted by the tree, fruit in hand, till he came up. Perceiving that it was no mango, he said: “This ‘mango’ is a Kimphala tree; don’t touch its fruit.”

Having stopped them from eating, the Bodhisatta turned his attention to those who had already eaten. First he dosed them with an emetic, and then he gave them the four sweet foods to eat; so that in the end they recovered.

Now on former occasions caravans had halted beneath this same tree, and had died from eating the poisonous fruit which they mistook for mangoes. On the morrow the villagers would come, and seeing them lying there dead, would fling them by the heels into a secret place, departing with all the belongings of the caravan, wagons and all.

And on the day too of our story these villagers did not fail to hurry at daybreak to the tree for their expected spoils. “The oxen must be ours,” said some. “And we’ll have the wagons,” said others; while others again claimed the wares as their share. But when they came breathless to the tree, there was the whole caravan alive and well!

“How came you to know this was not a mango tree?” demanded the disappointed villagers. “We didn’t know,” said they of the caravan, “it was our leader who knew.”

So the villagers came to the Bodhisatta and said: “Man of wisdom, what did you do to find out this tree was not a mango?”

“Two things told me,” replied the Bodhisatta, and he repeated this verse: {1.272}
1. “When near a village grows a tree
   Not hard to climb, ’tis plain to me,
   Nor need I further proof to know,
   No wholesome fruit thereon can grow!”

And having taught the Dhamma to the assembled multitude, he finished his journey in safety.

“Thus, monks,” said the Teacher, “in bygone days the wise and good were experts in fruit.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha's followers were then the people of the caravan, and I myself was the caravan leader.”

Ja 55 Pañcāvudhajātaka
The Story about (Prince) Pañcāvudha (1s)

In the present a monk gives up the struggle easily. The Buddha tells him a story about a past life in which he refused to give up the fight even though ensnared by a Yakkha and threatened with death. The Yakkha, recognising his courage, lets him go.

The Bodhisatta = prince Pañcāvudha (Pañcāvudhakumāra), Aṅgulimāla = the Yakkha (Silesaloma).

Keywords: Courage, Perseverance, Devas.

“When no Attachment.” [1.137] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who had given up all earnest effort. Said the Teacher to him, “Is the report true, monk, that you are discontent?” “Yes, Fortunate One.”

“In bygone days, monk,” said the Teacher, “the wise and good won a throne by their dauntless perseverance in the hour of need.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, it was as his queen’s child that the Bodhisatta came to life once more. On the day when he was to be named, the parents enquired as to their child’s destiny from eight hundred brahmmins, to whom they gave their hearts’ desire in all pleasures of sense. Marking the promise which he showed of a glorious destiny, these clever soothsaying brahmmins foretold that, coming to the throne at the king’s death, the child should be a mighty king endowed with every virtue; famed and renowned for his exploits with five weapons, he should stand peerless in all Jambudīpa.\textsuperscript{286} \textsuperscript{1.273} And because of this prophecy of the brahmins, the parents named their son prince Pañcāvudha [Five-Weapons].
The Section with One Verse – 337

Now, when the prince was come to years of discretion, and was sixteen years old, the king bade him go away and study.

“With whom, sire, am I to study?” asked the prince.

“With the world-famed teacher in the town of Taxila in the Gandhāra country. Here is his fee,” said the king, handing his son a thousand pieces.

So the prince went to Taxila and was taught there. When he was leaving, his master gave him a set of five weapons, armed with which, after bidding adieu to his old master, the prince set out from Taxila for Benares.

On his way he came to a forest haunted by a Yakkha named Silesaloma [Hairy-grip]; and, at the entrance to the forest, men who met him tried to stop him, saying: “Young brahmin, do not go through that forest; it is the haunt \textsuperscript{[1.138]} of the Yakkha Silesaloma, and he kills every one he meets.” But, bold as a lion, the self-reliant Bodhisatta pressed on, till in the heart of the forest he came on the Yakkha. The monster made himself appear in stature as tall as a palm tree, with a head as big as an arbour and huge eyes like bowls, with two tusks like turnips and the beak of a hawk; his belly was blotched with purple; and the palms of his hands and the soles of his feet were blue-black!

“Whither away?” cried the monster. “Halt! You are my prey.” “Yakkha,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I knew what I was doing when entering this forest. You will be ill-advised to come near me. For with a poisoned arrow I will slay you where you stand.” And with this defiance, he fitted to his bow an arrow dipped in deadliest poison and shot it at the Yakkha. But it only stuck on to the monster’s shaggy coat. Then he shot another and another, till fifty were spent, all of which merely stuck on to the Yakkha’s shaggy coat. Hereon the Yakkha, shaking the arrows off so that they fell at his feet, came at the Bodhisatta; and the latter, again shouting defiance, drew his sword and struck at the Yakkha. But, like the arrows, his sword, which was thirty-three inches long, merely stuck fast in the shaggy hair. Next the Bodhisatta hurled his spear, and that stuck fast also. Seeing this, he smote the Yakkha with his club; but, like his other weapons, that too stuck fast. And thereupon the Bodhisatta shouted, “Yakkha, you never heard yet of me, prince Pañcāvudha. When I ventured into this forest, I put my trust not in my bow and other weapons, but in myself! Now will I strike you a blow which shall crush you into dust.” So saying, the Bodhisatta smote the Yakkha with his right hand; but the hand stuck fast upon the hair. Then, in turn, with his left hand and with his right and left feet, he struck at the monster, but hand and feet alike clave to the hide. Again shouting, “I will crush you into dust!” he butted the Yakkha with his head, and that too stuck fast.

\textsuperscript{286} This was one of the four islands, or dipā, of which the earth was supposed to consist; it included India, and represented the inhabited world to the Indian mind.

Yet even when thus caught and snared in fivefold wise, the Bodhisatta, as he hung upon the Yakkha, was still fearless, still undaunted. And the monster thought to himself, “This is a very lion among men, a hero without a peer, and no mere man. Though he is caught in the clutches of a Yakkha like me, yet not so much as a tremor does he exhibit. Never, since I first took to slaying travellers upon this road, have I seen a man to equal him. How comes it that he is not frightened?” Not daring to devour the Bodhisatta offhand, he said: “How is it, young brahmin, that you have no fear of death?”

“Why should I?” answered the Bodhisatta. “Each life must surely have its destined death. Moreover, within my body is a sword of adamant, which you will never digest, if you eat me. It will chop your inwards into mincemeat, and my death will involve yours too. Therefore it is that I have no fear.” (By this, it is said, the Bodhisatta meant the Sword of Knowledge, which was within him.)

Hereon, the Yakkha fell to thinking. “This young brahmin is speaking the truth and nothing but the truth,” thought he. “Not a morsel so big as a pea could I digest of such a hero. I’ll let him go.” And, so, in fear of his life, he let the Bodhisatta go free, saying: “Young brahmin, you are a lion among men; I will not eat you. Go forth from my hand, even as the moon from the jaws of Rāhu, and return to gladden the hearts of your kinsfolk, your friends, and your country.”

“As for myself; Yakkha,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I will go. As for you, it was your defilements in bygone days that caused you to be reborn a ravening, murderous, flesh-eating Yakkha; and, if you continue in defilements in this existence, you will go on from darkness to darkness. But, having seen me, you will be unable thenceforth to do wrong any more. Know that to destroy life is to ensure rebirth either in hell or as a brute or as a ghost or among the fallen spirits. Or, if the rebirth be into the world of men, then such wrong cuts short the days of a man’s life.”

In this and other ways the Bodhisatta showed the evil consequences of the five bad courses, and the blessing that comes of the five good courses; and so wrought in divers ways upon that Yakkha’s fears that by his teaching he converted the monster, imbuing him with self-denial and establishing him in the Five Precepts. Then making the Yakkha the Devatā of that forest, with a right to levy dues, and charging him to remain steadfast, the Bodhisatta went his way, making known the change in the Yakkha’s mood as he issued from the forest. And in the end he came, armed with the five weapons, to the city of Benares, and presented himself before his parents. In later days, when king, he was a righteous ruler; and after a life spent in generosity and other good works he passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

This lesson ended, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, recited this verse:

1. “When no attachment hampers heart or mind,
   When righteousness is practised peace to win,
   He who so walks, shall gain the victory
   And all the fetters utterly destroy.”

When he had thus led his teaching up to Arahatship as its crowning point, the Teacher went on to preach the Four Truths, at the close whereof that monk became an Arahat. Also, the Teacher showed the connection, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Aṅgulimāla was the Yakkha of those days, and I myself prince Pañcāvudha.”

---

287 Or, perhaps, “to whom sacrifices should be offered.” The translation in the text suggests a popular theory of the evolution of the tax-collector. See also No. 155.
288 See Ja 56 and 156.
289 Aṅgulimāla, a bandit who wore a necklace of his victims’ fingers, was converted by the Buddha and became an Arahat. cf. MN No. 86.
In the present a newly ordained monk is finding the many rules burdensome and is about to disrobe. The monks take him to the Buddha who asks him to follow just three rules, related to mind, voice and body. He does so and becomes an Arahant. The Buddha tells a story of a farmer who found a huge block of gold that he couldn’t carry away, until he decided to cut it into four, at which point it was easy to move.

The Bodhisatta = the man who found the block of gold (kañcanakkhandhaladdhapurisa).

Keywords: Simplification, Analysis.

“When gladness.” [1.140] {1.276} This story was told by the Teacher while at Sāvatthi, about a certain monk. Tradition says that through hearing the Teacher preach, a young gentleman of Sāvatthi gave his heart to the jewel of a dispensation and became a monk. His teachers and masters proceeded to instruct him in the whole of the Ten Precepts of Morality, one after the other, expounded to him the Short, the Medium, and the Long Moralities, set forth the morality which rests on self-restraint according to the Pātimokkha, the morality which rests on self-restraint as to the Senses, the morality which rests on a blameless walk of life, the morality which relates to the way a monk may use the Requisites. Thought the young beginner, “There is a tremendous lot of this morality; and I shall undoubtedly fail to fulfil all I have vowed. Yet what is the good of being a monk at all, if one cannot keep the rules of morality? My best course is to go back to the world, take a wife and rear children, living a life of generosity and other good works.” So he told his superiors what he thought, saying that he proposed to return to the lower state of a layman, and wished to hand back his bowl and robes. “Well, if it be so with you,” they said, “at least take leave of

---

290 Or perhaps ratanasāsanāṁ means ‘the creed connected with the (Three) Gems,’ viz. the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha.

291 These are translated in Rhys Davids’ Buddhist Suttas, pp. 189-200.

292 The Pātimokkha is translated and discussed in Pt. i. of the translation of the Vinaya by Rhys Davids and Oldenberg (Sacred Books of the East Vol. 13).
the One with Ten Powers before you go,” and they brought the young man before the Teacher in the Dhamma Hall.

“Why, monks,” said the Teacher, “are you bringing this monk to me against his will?”

“Sir, he said that morality was more than he could observe, and wanted to give back his robes and bowl. So we took him and brought him to you.”

“But why, monks,” asked the Teacher, “did you burden him with so much? He can do what he can, but no more. Do not make this mistake again, and leave me to decide what should be done in the case.”

Then, turning to the young monk, the Teacher said: “Come, monk; what concern have you with morality in the mass? Do you think you could obey just three moral rules?”

“Oh, yes, sir.”

“Well now, watch and guard the three avenues of the voice, the mind, and the body; do no evil whether in word, or thought, or act. Cease not to be a monk, but go hence and obey just these three rules.”

“Yes, indeed, sir, I will keep them,” here exclaimed the glad young man, and back he went with his teachers again. And as he was keeping his three rules, he thought within himself, “I had the whole of morality told me by my instructors; but because they were not the Buddha, they could not make me grasp even this much. Whereas {1.277} the Fully Awakened One, by reason of his Buddhahood, and of his being the Lord of Dhamma, has expressed so much morality in only three rules concerning the avenues, and has made me understand it clearly. Verily, a very present help has the Teacher been to me.” And [1.141] he won Insight and in a few days attained Arahatship.

When this came to the ears of the monks, they spoke of it when met together in the Dhamma Hall, telling how the monk, who was going back to the world because he could not hope to fulfil morality, had been furnished by the Teacher with three rules embodying the whole of morality, and had been made to grasp those three rules, and so had been enabled by the Teacher to win Arahatship. How marvellous, they cried, was the Buddha. Entering the Hall at this point, and learning on enquiry the subject of their talk, the Teacher said: “Monks, even a heavy burden becomes light, if taken piecemeal; and thus the wise and good of past times, on finding a huge mass of gold too heavy to lift, first broke it up and then were enabled to bear their treasure away piece by piece.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a farmer in a village, and was ploughing one day in a field where once stood a village. Now, in bygone days, a wealthy merchant had died leaving buried in this field a huge bar of gold, as thick round as a man’s thigh, and four whole cubits in length. And full on this bar struck the Bodhisatta’s plough, and there stuck fast. Taking it to be a spreading root of a tree, he dug it out; but discovering its real nature, he set to work to clean the dirt off the gold. The day’s work done, at sunset he laid aside his plough and gear, and attempted to shoulder his treasure-trove and walk off with it. But, as he could not so much as lift it, he sat down before it and fell to thinking what uses he would put it to. “I’ll have so much to live on, so much to bury as a treasure, so much to trade with, and so much for generosity and good works,” thought he to himself, and accordingly cut the gold into four. Division made his burden easy to carry; and he bore home the lumps of gold. After a life of generosity and other good works, he passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, recited this verse:

1. “When gladness fills the heart and fills the mind,
   When righteousness is practised peace to win,
   He who so walks shall gain the victory
   And all the fetters utterly destroy.”

And when the Teacher had thus led his teaching up to Arahatship as its crowning point, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “In those days I myself was the man who got the nugget of gold.”
Ja 57 Vānarindajātaka

The Story about the Lord of the Monkeys (1s)

In the present Devadatta sets out to kill the Buddha, who replies that he did this in the past also, and tells a story of how, when he was a monkey, he outwitted a crocodile and escaped being eaten.

The Bodhisatta = the lord of the monkeys (vānarinda),
Devadatta = the crocodile (kumbhīla),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = the (crocodile’s) wife (bhariyā).

Present Source: Ja 57 Vānarinda,
Quoted at: Ja 224 Kumbhīla,
Past Compare: Ja 57 Vānarinda, Ja 208 Suśīsumāra, Ja 224 Kumbhīla, Ja 342 Vānara, Cp 27 Kapirājacariyā, Mvu iii p 40 Vānara (II).

Keywords: Trickery, Animals.

“Whoso, O monkey-king.” [1.142] This story was told by the Teacher, while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta’s going about to kill him. Being informed of Devadatta’s murderous intent, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has gone about seeking to kill me; he did just the same in bygone days, but failed to get his wicked way.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as a monkey. When full-grown, he was as big as a mare’s foal and enormously strong. He lived alone on the banks of a river, in the middle of which was an island whereon grew mangoes and breadfruits, and other fruit trees. And in mid-stream, halfway between the island and the riverbank, a solitary rock rose out of the water. Being as strong as an elephant, the Bodhisatta used to leap from the bank on to this rock and thence on to the island. Here he would eat his fill of the fruits that grew on the island, returning at evening by the way he came. And such was his life from day to day.

Now there lived in those days in that river a crocodile and his mate; and she, being with young, was led by the sight of the Bodhisatta journeying to and fro to conceive [1.279] a longing for the monkey’s heart to eat. So she begged her lord to catch the monkey for her. Promising that she should have her fancy, the crocodile went off and took his stand on the rock, meaning to catch the monkey on his evening journey home.
The Section with One Verse – 344

After ranging about the island all day, the Bodhisatta looked out at evening towards the rock and wondered why the rock stood so high out of the water. For the story goes that the Bodhisatta always marked the exact height of the water in the river, and of the rock in the water. So, when he saw that, though the water stood at the same level, the rock seemed to stand higher out of the water, he suspected that a crocodile might be lurking there to catch him. And, in order to find out the facts of the case, he shouted, as though addressing the rock, “Hi! Rock!” And, as no reply came back, he shouted three times, “Hi! Rock!” And as the rock still kept silence, the monkey called out, “How comes it, friend rock, that you won’t answer me today?”

“Oh!” thought the crocodile, “so the rock’s in the habit of answering the monkey. I must answer for the rock today.” Accordingly, he shouted, “Yes, monkey; what is it?” “Who are you?” said the Bodhisatta. “I’m a crocodile.” “What are you sitting on that rock for? To catch you and eat your heart.” As there was no other way back, the only thing to be done was to outwit the crocodile. So the Bodhisatta cried out, “There’s no help for it then but to give myself up to you. Open your mouth and catch me when I jump.”

Now you must know that when crocodiles open their mouths, their eyes shut. So, when this crocodile unsuspiciously opened his mouth, his eyes shut. And there he waited with closed eyes and open jaws! Seeing this, the wily monkey made a jump on to the crocodile’s head, and thence, with a spring like lightning, gained the bank. When the cleverness of this feat dawned on the crocodile, he said: “Monkey, he that in this world possesses the four virtues overcomes his foes. And you, I think, possess all four.” And, so saying, he repeated this verse:

---

293 This assertion is not in accord with the facts of natural history.
1. “Whose, O monkey-king, like you, combines
   Truth, foresight, fixed resolve, and fearlessness,
   Shall see his routed foemen turn and flee.”

And with this praise of the Bodhisatta, the crocodile betook himself to his own dwelling-place.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time then, monks, that Devadatta has gone about seeking to kill me; he did just the same in bygone days too.” And, having ended his lesson, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the crocodile of those days, the brahmin-girl Ciñcā was the crocodile’s wife, and I myself the monkey-king.”

Ja 58 Tayodhammajātaka
The Story about the Three Things (1s)

In the present Devadatta sets out to kill the Buddha, who replies that he did this in the past also, and tells a story of how, when he was a monkey, he outwitted his father; and the Rakkhasa who was meant to kill him became his handiman. Terrified by this, his father passed away and he became the new king.

Devadatta = the leader of the monkeys (yūthapati), the Bodhisatta = his virtuous (monkey) son (yūthapatiputta).

Keyword: Resourcefulness, Cleverness, Animals, Devas.

“Whoso, like you.” [1.144] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove also upon the subject of [Devadatta] going about to kill.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, Devadatta came to life again as a monkey, and dwelt near the Himālayas as the lord of a tribe of monkeys all of his own begetting. Filled with forebodings that his male offspring might grow up to oust him from his lordship, he used to geld them all with his teeth. Now the Bodhisatta had been begotten by this same monkey; and his mother, in order to save her unborn progeny, stole away to a forest at the foot of the mountain, where in due season she gave birth to the Bodhisatta. And when he was full-grown and had come to years of understanding, he was gifted with marvellous strength.

294 Her identification here as the crocodile’s wicked wife is due to the fact that Ciñcā, who was a “female ascetic of rare beauty,” was suborned by Gotama’s enemies to simulate pregnancy and charge him with the paternity. How the deceit was exposed, is told in Dhp-a XIII.9.

“Where is my father?” said he one day to his mother. “He dwells at the foot of a certain mountain, my son,” she replied, “and is king of a tribe of monkeys.” “Take me to see him, mother.” “Not so, my son; for your father is so afraid of being supplanted by his sons that he gelds them all with his teeth.” “Never mind; take me there, mother,” said the Bodhisatta, “I shall know what to do.” So she took him with her to the old monkey. At sight of his son, the old monkey, feeling sure that the Bodhisatta would grow up to depose him, resolved by a feigned embrace to crush the life out of the Bodhisatta. “Ah! My boy!” he cried, “where have you been all this long time?” And, making a show of embracing the Bodhisatta, he hugged him like a vice. But the Bodhisatta, who was as strong as an elephant, returned the hug so mightily that his father’s ribs were like to break.

Then thought the old monkey, “This son of mine, if he grows up, will certainly kill me.” Casting about how to kill the Bodhisatta first, he bethought him of a certain lake nearby, where a Rakshasa lived who might eat him. So he said to the Bodhisatta, “I’m old now, my boy, and should like to hand over the tribe to you; today you shall be made king. In a lake nearby grow two kinds of water-lily, three kinds of blue-lotus, and five kinds of white-lotus. Go and pick me some.” “Yes, father,” answered the Bodhisatta; and off he started. Approaching the lake with caution, he studied the footprints on its banks and marked how all of them led down to the water, but none ever came back. Realising that the lake was haunted by a Rakshasa, he divined that his father, being unable himself to kill him, wished to get him killed by the Rakshasa. “But I’ll get the lotuses,” said he, “without going into the water at all.”

So he went to a dry spot, and taking a run leaped from the bank. In his jump, as he was clearing the water, he plucked two flowers which grew up above the surface of the water, and alighted with them on the opposite bank. On his way back, he plucked two more in like manner, as he jumped; and so made a heap on both sides of the lake – but always keeping out of the Rakshasa’s watery domain. When he had picked as many as he thought he could carry across, and was gathering together those on one bank, the astonished Rakshasa exclaimed, “I’ve lived a long time in this lake, but I never saw even a human being so wonderfully clever! Here is this monkey who has picked all the flowers he wants, and yet has kept safely out of range of my power.” And, parting the waters asunder, the Rakkhasa came up out of the lake to where the Bodhisatta stood, and addressed him thus, “O king of the monkeys, he that has three qualities shall have the mastery over his enemies; and you, I think, have all three.” And, so saying, he repeated this verse in the Bodhisatta’s praise:

1. “Whose, like you, O monkey-king, combines Dexterity and Valour and Resource,
Shall see his routed foe men turn and flee.”

His praises ended, the Rakkhasa asked the Bodhisatta why he was gathering the flowers.

“My father is minded to make me king of his tribe,” said the Bodhisatta, “and that is why I am gathering them.”

“But one so peerless as you ought not to carry flowers,” exclaimed the Rakkhasa, “I will carry them for you.” And so saying, he picked up the flowers and followed with them in the rear of the Bodhisatta.

Seeing this from afar, the Bodhisatta’s father knew that his plot had failed. “I sent my son to fall a prey to the Rakkhasa, and here he is returning safe and sound, with the Rakkhasa humbly carrying his flowers for him! I am undone!” cried the old monkey, and his heart burst asunder into seven pieces, so that he died then and there. And all the other monkeys met together and chose the Bodhisatta to be their king.

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was then the king of the monkeys, and I his son.”

Ja 59 Bherivādajātaka
The Story about the Drummer (1s)

In the present the Buddha meets with a disobedient monk and tells him a story of how, through disobedience, he had drummed continuously, and lost all their earnings to thieves in a past life when they were drummers.

The Bodhisatta = the father (pitā),
The wilful monk = his son (putta).

Keyword: Disobedience.

“Go not too far.” [1.146] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain wilful monk. Asked by the Teacher whether the report was true that he was wilful, the monk said it was true. “This is not the first time, monk,” said the Teacher, “that you have shown yourself wilful; you were just the same in bygone times as well.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a drummer, and dwelt in a village. Hearing that there was to be a festival at Benares, and hoping to make money by playing his drum to the crowds of holiday-makers, he made his way to the city, with his son. And there he played, and made a great deal of money. On his way home with his earnings he had to pass through a forest which was infested by robbers; and as the boy kept beating away at the drum without ever stopping, the Bodhisatta tried to stop him by saying: “Don’t behave like that, beat only now and again – as if some great lord were passing by.”

But in defiance of his father’s bidding, the boy thought the best way to frighten the robbers away was to keep steadily on beating away at the drum.

At the first notes of the drum, away scampered the robbers, thinking some great lord was passing by. But hearing the noise keep on, they saw their mistake and came back to find out who it really was. Finding only two persons, they beat and robbed them. “Alas,” cried the Bodhisatta, “by your ceaseless drumming you have lost all our hard-earned takings!” And, so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Go not too far, but learn excess to shun; For over-drumming lost what drumming won.” [1.284]

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This wilful monk was the son of those days, and I myself the father.”

Ja 60 Saṅkhadhamanajātaka
The Story about the Conch Blower (1s)

Alternative Title: Saṅkhadhamajātaka (Cst)
An analogue to the previous story, in this one after meeting with a disobedient monk, the Buddha tells him of how, when they were conch blowers in a past life, his father hadn’t listened to his good advice, but had attracted the attention of thieves, and lost all their earnings.

The Bodhisatta = the son (putta),
the wilful monk = his father (pitā).

Keyword: Disobedience, Wilfulness.

“Go not too far.” [1.147] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about another wilful person.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a conch-blower, and went up to Benares with his father to a public festival. There he earned a great deal of money by his conch-blowing, and started for home again. On his way through a forest which was infested by robbers, he warned his father not to keep on blowing his conch; but the old man thought he knew better how to keep the robbers off, and blew away hard without a moment’s pause. Accordingly, just as in the preceding story, the robbers returned and plundered the pair. And, as above, the Bodhisatta repeated this verse:

1. “Go not too far, but learn excess to shun;
For over-blowing lost what blowing won.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This wilful monk was the father of those days, and I myself his son.”

Ja 61 Asātamantajātaka
The Story about the Disagreeable Charms (1s)

In the present a young monk, being driven by his desire for a young woman, is on the verge of quitting the monastic life. The Buddha tells a story of the past as an example of the wickedness of women in which an old hag was even willing to kill her dutiful son in order to gain her sensual desires.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
Ānanda = his pupil (antevāsika),
Mahākassapa = the father (pitā),
Bhaddakāpilānī = the mother (mātā).
The story tells that one day, as he was going his rounds in Sāvatthi for alms, he saw a woman of surpassing beauty, magnificently attired, and fell in love with her, and on returning home to his monastery he was unable to divert his thoughts from her. From that time, as it were, pierced with love's shafts and sick with desire he became as lean as a wild deer, with his veins standing out on his body, and as sallow as sallow could be. He no longer took delight in any one of the Four Postures, or found pleasure in his own thoughts, but giving up all the services due to a teacher he abandoned the use of instruction, inquiry and meditation.

His fellow-monks said: “Sir, once you were calm in mind and serene of countenance, but now it is not so. What can be the cause?” they asked. “Sirs,” he answered, “I have no pleasure in anything.” Then they bade him be happy, saying: “To be born [in the time of] a Buddha is a hard matter: so also is the hearing of the True Dhamma, and the attaining to birth as a human being. But you have attained to this, and, yearning to put an end to sorrow, you left your weeping kinsfolk and becoming a believer adopted the ascetic life. Why then do you now fall under the sway of passion? These evil passions are common to all ignorant creatures, from live worms upwards, and such of these passions as are material in their origin, they too are insipid. Desires are full of sorrow and despair: misery in this case ever increases more and more. Desire is like a skeleton or a piece of meat. Desire is like a torch made of a wisp of hay or a light from embers. Desire vanishes like a dream or a loan, or the fruit of a tree. Desire is as biting as a sharp-pointed spear, or as a serpent’s head. But you, verily, after embracing such a Buddha’s dispensation as this and becoming an ascetic, have now fallen under the sway of such harmful passions.” When by their admonitions they failed to make him grasp their teaching, they brought him before the Teacher in the Dhamma Hall. And when he said: “Why, monks, have you brought this monk here against his will?” they answered, “They tell us, he is discontent.”
But to this monk the Teacher said: “Women, monk, are lustful, profligate, vile, and degraded. Why be overcome by passion for a vile woman?” And so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.148]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a brahmin in the city of Taxila in the Gandhāra country; and by the time he had grown up, such was his proficiency in the Three Vedas and all accomplishments, that his fame as a teacher spread through all the world.

In those days there was a brahmin family in Benares, unto whom a son was born; and on the day of his birth they took fire and kept it always burning, until the boy was sixteen. Then his parents told him how the fire, kindled on the day of his birth, had never been allowed to go out; and they bade their son make his choice. If his heart was set on winning entrance hereafter into the Realm of Brahmā, then let him take the fire and retire with it to the forest, there to work out his desire by ceaseless worship of the Lord of Fire. But, if he preferred the joys of a home, they bade their son go to Taxila and there study under the world-famed teacher with a view to settling down to manage the property. “I should surely fail in the worship of the Fire-God,” said the young brahmin, “I’ll be a householder.” So he bade farewell to his father and mother, and, with a thousand pieces of money for the teacher’s fee, set out for Taxila. There he studied till his education was complete, and then betook himself home again.

Now his parents grew to wish him to forsake the world and to worship the Fire-God in the forest. Accordingly his mother, in her desire to dispatch him to the forest by bringing home to him the wickedness of women, was confident that his wise and learned teacher would be able to lay bare the wickedness of the sex to her son, and so she asked whether he had quite finished his education. “Oh yes,” said the youth. [1.286]

“Then of course you have not omitted the Disagreeable Charms?” “I have not learned those, mother.” “How then can you say your education is finished? Go back at once, my son, to your master, and return to us when you have learned them,” said his mother. “Very good,” said the youth, and off he started for Taxila once more.

Now his master too had a mother – an old woman of a hundred and twenty years of age – whom with his own hands he used to bathe, feed and tend. And for so doing he was scorned by his neighbours – so much so indeed that he resolved to depart to the forest and there dwell with his mother. Accordingly, in the solitude of a forest he had a hut built in a delightful spot, where water was plentiful, and after laying in a stock of ghee and rice and other provisions, he carried his mother to her new home, and there lived cherishing her old age.
The Section with One Verse – 352

Not finding his master at Taxila, the young brahmin made enquiries, and finding out what had happened, set out for the forest, and presented himself respectfully before his master. “What brings you [1.149] back so soon, my boy?” said the latter.
“I do not think, sir, I learned the Disagreeable Charms when I was with you,” said the youth. “But who told you that you had to learn the Disagreeable Charms?”
“My mother, master,” was the reply. Hereon the Bodhisatta reflected that there were no such texts as those, and concluded that his pupil’s mother must have wanted her son to learn how wicked women were. So he said to the youth that it was all right, and that he should in due course be taught the Charms in question.

“From today,” said he, “you shall take my place about my mother, and with your own hands wash, feed and look after her. As you rub her hands, feet, head and back, be careful to exclaim, ‘Ah, Madam! If you are so lovely now you are so old, what must you not have been in the heyday of your youth!’ And as you wash and perfume her hands and feet, burst into praise of their beauty. Further, tell me without shame or reserve every single word my mother says to you. Obey me in this, and you shall master the Disagreeable Charms; disobey me, and you shall remain ignorant of them for ever.”

Obedient to his master’s commands, the youth did all he was bidden, and so persistently praised the old woman’s beauty that she thought he had fallen in love with her; and, blind and decrepit though she was, passion was kindled within her.

{1.287} So one day she broke in on his compliments by asking, “Is your desire towards me?” “It is indeed, madam,” answered the youth, “but my master is so strict.” “If you desire me,” said she, “kill my son!” “But how shall I, that have learned so much from him, how shall I, for passion’s sake, kill my master?” “Well then, if you will be faithful to me, I will kill him myself.”

(So lustful, vile, and degraded are women that, giving the rein to lust, a hag like this, and old as she was, actually thirsted for the blood of so dutiful a son!)
Now the young brahmin told all this to the Bodhisatta, who, commending him for reporting the matter, studied how much longer his mother was destined to live. Finding that her destiny was to die that very day, he said: “Come, young brahmin; I will put her to the test.” So he cut down a fig tree and hewed out of it a wooden figure about his own size, which he wrapped up, head and all, in a robe and laid upon his own bed – with a string tied to it. “Now go with an axe to my mother,” said he, “and give her this string as a clue to guide her steps.”

So away went the youth to the old woman, and said: “Madam, the master is lying down indoors on his bed; I have tied this string as a clue to guide you; take this axe and kill him, if you can.” “But you won’t forsake me, will you?” said she. “Why should I?” was his reply. So she took the axe, and, rising up with trembling limbs, groped her way along by the string, till she thought she felt her son. Then she bared the head of the figure, and – thinking to kill her son at a single blow – brought down the axe right on the figure’s throat – only to learn by the thud that it was wood! “What are you doing, mother?” said the Bodhisatta. With a shriek that she was betrayed, the old woman fell dead to the ground. For, says tradition, it was fated that she should die at that very moment and under her own roof.

Seeing that she was dead, her son burnt her body, and, when the flames of the pile were quenched, graced her ashes with wild-flowers. Then with the young brahmin he sat at the door of the hut and said: “My son, there is no such separate passage as the ‘Disagreeable Charms.’ It is women who are depravity incarnate. And when your mother sent you back to me to learn the Disagreeable Charms, her object was that you should learn how wicked women are. You have now witnessed with your own eyes my mother’s wickedness, and therefrom you will see how lustful and vile women are.” And with this lesson, he bade the youth depart.

Bidding farewell to his master, the young brahmin went home to his parents. Said his mother to him, “Have you now learned the Disagreeable Charms?”

“Yes, mother.”

“And what,” she asked, “is your final choice? Will you leave the world to worship the Lord of Fire, or will you choose a family life?” “Nay,” answered the young brahmin, “with my own eyes have I seen the wickedness of womankind; I will have nothing to do with family life. I will renounce the world.” And his convictions found vent in this verse:

1. “In lust unbridled, like devouring fire,
   Are women – frantic in their rage.
   The sex renouncing, fain would I retire
   To find peace in a hermitage.” {1.289}

With this invective against womankind, the young brahmin took leave of his parents, and renounced the world for the ascetic’s life – wherein winning the peace he desired, he assured himself of admittance after that life into the Realm of Brahmā.

“So you see, monk,” said the Teacher, “how lustful, vile, and how much woe women bring.” And after declaring the wickedness of women, he preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof that monk won the Fruit of the First Path. Lastly, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Kāpiḷānī was the mother of those days, Mahākassapa was the father, Ānanda the pupil, and I myself the teacher.”

Ja 62 Aṇḍabhūtajātaka

The Story about being (Raised from) Birth (1s)

In the present a monk is driven by lust to renounce the celibate life. To deter him the Buddha tells a story of a past life in which a young girl, even though brought up in seclusion from birth, still managed to trick her husband and take a lover.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Keywords: Lust, Innate wickedness, Devas, Women.

“Blindfold, luting.” [1.151] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about another monk overcome by passion.

---

295 Her history is given in JRAS 1893, page 786. [As Kāpiḷānī was well-known for her celibacy and renunciation, it seems odd indeed that she should have been cast as the mother here.]
Said the Teacher, “Is the report true that you are overcome by passion, monk?” “Quite true,” was the reply.

“Monk, women cannot be guarded; in days gone by the wise who kept watch over a woman from the moment she was born, failed nevertheless to keep her safe.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the child of the queen-consort. When he grew up, he mastered every accomplishment; and when, at his father’s death, he came to be king, he proved a righteous king. Now he used to play at dice with his family priest, and, as he flung the golden dice upon the silver table, he would sing this catch for luck:

'Tis nature’s law that rivers wind;
Trees grow of wood by law of kind;
And, given opportunity,
All women work iniquity. {1.290}

As these lines always made the king win the game, the family priest was in a fair way to lose every penny he had in the world. And, in order to save himself from utter ruin, he resolved to seek out a little maid that had never seen another man, and then to keep her under lock and key in his own house. “For,” he thought: “I couldn’t manage to look after a girl who has seen another man. So I must take a new-born baby girl, and keep her under my thumb as she grows up, with a close guard over her, so that none may come near her and that she may be true to one man. Then I shall win of the king, and grow rich.” Now he was skilled in signs; and seeing a poor woman who was about to become a mother, and knowing that her child would be a girl, he paid the woman to come and be confined in his house, and sent her away after her confinement with a present. The infant was brought up entirely by women, and no men – other than himself – were ever allowed to set eyes on her. When the girl grew up, she was subject to him and he was her master.

Now, while the girl was growing up, the family priest forbore to play with the king; but when she was grown up and under his own control, [1.152] he challenged the king to a game. The king accepted, and play began. But, when in throwing the dice the king sang his lucky catch, the family priest added, “always excepting my girl.” And then luck changed, and it was now the family priest who won, while the king lost.

Thinking the matter over, the Bodhisatta suspected the family priest had a virtuous girl shut up in his house; and enquiry proved his suspicions true. Then, in order to work her fall, he sent for a clever fellow, and asked whether he thought he could seduce the girl. “Certainly, sire,” said the fellow. So the king gave him money, and sent him away with orders to lose no time.

With the king’s money the fellow bought perfumes and incense and aromatics of all sorts, and opened a perfumery shop close to the family priest’s house. Now the family priest’s house was seven stories high, and had seven gateways, at each of which a guard was set—a guard of women only—and no man but the brahmin himself was ever allowed to enter. The very baskets that contained the dust and sweepings were examined before they were passed in. Only the family priest was allowed to see the girl, and she had only a single waiting-woman. This woman had money given her to buy flowers and perfumes for her mistress, and on her way she used to pass near the shop which the fellow had opened. And he, knowing very well that she was the girl’s attendant, watched one day for her coming, and, rushing out of his shop, fell at her feet, clasping her knees tightly with both hands and blubbering out, “O my mother! Where have you been all this long time?”

And his confederates, who stood by his side, cried, “What a likeness! Hand and foot, face and figure, even in style of dress, they are identical!” As one and all kept dwelling on the marvellous likeness, the poor woman lost her head. Crying out that it must be her boy, she too burst into tears. And with weeping and tears the two fell to embracing one another. Then said the man, “Where are you living, mother?”

“Oh at the family priest’s, my son. He has a young wife of peerless beauty, a very Kinnari for grace; and I’m her waiting-woman.” “And whither away now, mother?” “To buy her perfumes and flowers.” “Why go elsewhere for them? Come to me for them in future,” said the fellow. And he gave the woman betel, bdellium, and so forth, and all kinds of flowers, refusing all payment. Struck with the quantity of flowers and perfumes which the waiting-woman brought home, the girl asked why the brahmin was so pleased with her that day. “Why do you say that, my dear?” asked the old woman. “Because of the quantity of things you have brought home.” “No, it isn’t that the brahmin was free with his money,” said the old woman, “for I got them at my son’s.” And from that day forth she kept the money the brahmin gave her, and got her flowers and other things free of charge at the man’s shop. [1.153]

And he, a few days later, made out to be ill, and took to his bed. So when the old woman came to the shop and asked for her son, she was told he had been taken ill. Hastening to his side, she fondly stroked his shoulders, as she asked what ailed him. But he made no reply. “Why don’t you tell me, my son?” “Not even if I were dying, could I tell you, mother.” “But, if you don’t tell me, whom are you to tell?” “Well then, mother, my malady lies solely in this that, hearing the praises of your young mistress’s beauty, I have fallen in love with her. If I win her, I shall live; if not, this will be my death-bed.” “Leave that to me, my boy,” said the old woman cheerily, “and don’t worry yourself on this account.” Then, with a heavy load of perfumes and flowers to take with her, she went home, and said to the brahmin’s young wife, “Alas, here’s my son in love with you, merely because I told him how beautiful you are! What is to be done?” “If you can smuggle him in here,” replied the girl, “you have my leave.”

Hereupon the old woman set to work sweeping together all the dust she could find in the house from top to bottom; this dust she put into a huge flower-basket, and tried to pass out with it. When the usual search was made, she emptied dust over the woman on guard, who fled away under such ill-treatment. In like manner she dealt with all the other watchers, smothering in dust each one in turn that said anything to her. And so it came to pass from that time forward that, no matter what the old woman took in or out of the house, there was nobody bold enough to search her. Now was the time!

The old woman smuggled the fellow into the house in a flower-basket, and brought him to her young mistress. He succeeded in wrecking the girl’s virtue, and actually stayed a day or two in the upper rooms – hiding when the family priest was at home, and enjoying the society of his mistress when the family priest was off the premises. A day or two passed and the girl said to her lover, “Sweetheart, you must be going now.” “Very well; only I must cuff the brahmin first.” “Certainly,” said she, and hid the fellow. Then, when the brahmin came in again, she exclaimed, “Oh, my dear husband, I should so like to dance, if you would play the lute for me.” “Dance away, my dear,” said the family priest, and struck up forthwith. “But I shall be too ashamed, if you’re looking. Let me hide your handsome face first with a cloth; and then I will dance.” “All right,” said he, “if you’re too modest to dance otherwise.” So she took a thick cloth and tied it over the brahmin’s face so as to blindfold him. And, blindfolded as he was, the brahmin began to play the lute.

After dancing awhile, she cried, “My dear, I should so like to hit you once on the head.” “Hit away,” said the unsuspecting dotard. Then the girl made a sign to her lover; and he softly stole up behind the brahmin and smote him on the head. Such was the force of the blow, that the brahmin’s eyes were like to start out of his head, and a bump rose up on the spot. Smarting with pain, he called to the girl to give him her hand; and she placed it in his. “Ah! It’s a soft hand,” said he, “but it hits hard!”

Now, as soon as the fellow had struck the brahmin, he hid; and when he was hidden, the girl took the bandage off the family priest’s eyes and rubbed his bruised head with oil. The moment the brahmin went out, the fellow was stowed away in his basket again by the old woman, and so carried out of the house. Making his way at once to the king, he told him the whole adventure.

Accordingly, when the brahmin was next in attendance, the king proposed a game with the dice; the brahmin was willing; and the dicing-table was brought out. As the king made his throw, he sang his old catch, and the brahmin—ignorant of the girl’s naughtiness—added his, “Always excepting my girl,” and nevertheless lost!

Then the king, who knew what had passed, said to his family priest, “Why except her? Her virtue has given way. Ah, you dreamed that by taking a girl in the hour of her birth and by placing a sevenfold guard round her, you could be certain of her. Why, you couldn’t be certain of a woman, even if you had her inside you and always walked about with her. No woman is ever faithful to one man alone. As for that girl of yours, she told you she should like to dance, and having first blindfolded you as you played the lute to her, she let her lover strike you on the head, and then smuggled him out of the house. Where then is your exception?” And so saying, the king repeated this verse:

---

296 The cuffing of the brahmin is the subject of a Bharhut sculpture, Plate 26, 8.
1. “Blindfold, luting, by his wife beguiled,
The brahmin sits – who tried to rear
A paragon of virtue undefiled!
Learn hence to hold the sex in fear.” [1.294]

In such wise did the Bodhisatta expound the Dhamma to the brahmin. And the brahmin went home and taxed the girl with the wickedness of which she was accused. “My dear husband, who can have said such a thing about me?” said she. “Indeed I am innocent; indeed it was my own hand, and nobody else’s, that struck you; and, if you do not believe me, I will brave the ordeal of fire to prove that no man’s hand has touched me but yours; and so I will make you believe me.” “So be it,” said the brahmin. And he had a quantity of wood brought and set light to it. Then the girl was summoned. “Now,” said he, “if you believe your own story, brave these flames!”

Now before this the girl had instructed her attendant as follows, “Tell your son, mother, to be there and to seize my hand just as I am about to go into the fire.” And the old woman did as she was bidden; and the fellow came and took his stand among the crowd. Then, to [1.155] delude the brahmin, the girl, standing there before all the people, exclaimed with fervour, “No man’s hand but thine, brahmin, has ever touched me; and, by the truth of my asseveration I call on this fire to harm me not.” So saying, she advanced to the burning pile – when up dashed her lover, who seized her by the hand, crying shame on the brahmin who could force so fair a maid to enter the flames! Shaking her hand free, the girl exclaimed to the brahmin that what she had asserted was now undone, and that she could not now brave the ordeal of fire. “Why not?” said the brahmin. “Because,” she replied, “my asseveration was that no man’s hand but thine had ever touched me; [1.295] and now here is a man who has seized hold of my hand!” But the brahmin, knowing that he was tricked, drove her from him with blows.

Such, we learn, is the wickedness of women. What crime will they not commit; and then, to deceive their husbands, what oaths will they not take – aye, in the light of day – that they did it not! So false-hearted are they! Therefore has it been said:
“A sex composed of wickedness and guile,
Unknowable; uncertain as the path
Of fishes in the water – womankind
Hold truth for falsehood, falsehood for the truth!

As greedily as cows seek pastures new,
Women, unsated, yearn for mate on mate.
As sand unstable, cruel as the snake,
Women know all things; naught from them is hid!”

“Even so it is impossible to guard women,” said the Teacher. His lesson ended, he preached the Truths, at the close whereof the passionate monk won the Fruit of the First Path. Also the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “In these days I was the king of Benares.”

Ja 63 Takkajātaka

The Story about the Buttermilk Salesman (1s)

Alternative Title: Takkapaṇḍitajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk was besieged by lust. The Buddha told a past life story in which a woman brought down an ascetic from his high estate, and later sought to have him killed so that her life with a thief might be secured. When her treachery was discovered it led to her death.

The Bodhisatta = the wise buttermilk salesman (takkapaṇḍita), Ānanda = the elder thief (corajēṭṭhaka).

Keywords: Treachery, Lust, Women.

“Wrathful are women.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about another monk overcome by passion. When on being questioned the monk confessed that he was overcome by passion, the Teacher said: “Women are ingrates and treacherous; why are you overcome by passion because of them?” And he told this story of the past. [1.156]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta, who had chosen an ascetic’s life, built himself a hermitage by the banks of the Ganges, and there won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and so dwelt in the bliss and delight of Absorption.
In those days the Lord High Treasurer of Benares had a fierce and cruel daughter, known as lady Caṇḍā [Wicked], who used to revile and beat her servants and slaves. And one day they took their young mistress [1.296] to disport herself in the Ganges; and the girls were playing about in the water, when the sun set and a great storm burst upon them. Hereon folks scampered away, and the girl’s attendants, exclaiming, “Now is the time to see the last of this creature!” threw her right into the river and hurried off. Down poured the rain in torrents, the sun set, and darkness came on. And when the attendants reached home without their young mistress, and were asked where she was, they replied that she had got out of the Ganges but that they did not know where she had gone. Search was made by her family, but not a trace of the missing girl could be found.

Meantime she, screaming loudly, was swept down by the swollen stream, and at midnight approached where the Bodhisatta dwelt in his hermitage. Hearing her cries, he thought to himself, “That’s a woman’s voice. I must rescue her from the water.” So he took a torch of grass and by its light descried her in the stream. “Don’t be afraid; don’t be afraid!” he shouted cheerily, and waded in, and, thanks to his vast strength, as of an elephant, brought her safe to land. Then he made a fire for her in his hermitage and set luscious fruits of divers kinds before her. Not till she had eaten did he ask, “Where is your home, and how came you to fall in the river?” And the girl told him all that had befallen her. “Dwell here for the present,” said he, and installed her in his hermitage, while for the next two or three days he himself lived in the open air. At the end of that time he bade her depart, but she was set on waiting till she had made the ascetic fall in love with her; and would not go. And as time went by, she so wrought on him by her womanly grace and wiles that he lost his Absorption. With her he continued to dwell in the forest. But she did not like living in that solitude and wanted to be taken among people. So yielding to her importunities he took her away with him to a border village, where he supported her by selling dates, and so was called the Date Sage.297 And the villagers paid [1.157] him to teach them what were lucky and unlucky seasons, and gave him a hut to live in at the entrance to their village.

297 There is a play here upon the word takka, which cannot well be rendered in English. The word takkapāṇḍito, which I have rendered ‘Date Sage,’ would – by itself – mean
Now the border was harried by robbers from the mountains; and they made a raid one day \(1.297\) on the village where the pair lived, and looted it. They made the poor villagers pack up their belongings, and off they went – with the Treasurer’s daughter among the rest – to their own abodes. After arriving there, they let everybody else go free; but the girl, because of her beauty, was taken to wife by the robber chieftain.

And when the Bodhisatta learned this, he thought to himself, “She will not endure to live away from me. She will escape and come back to me.” And so he lived on, waiting for her to return. She meantime was very happy with the robbers, and only feared that the Date Sage would come to carry her away again. “I should feel more secure,” thought she, “if he were dead. I must send a message to him feigning love and so entice him here to his death.” So she sent a messenger to him with the message that she was unhappy, and that she wanted him to take her away.

And he, in his faith in her, set out forthwith, and came to the entrance of the robbers’ village, whence be sent a message to her. “To fly now, my husband,” said she, “would only be to fall into the robber chieftain’s hands who would kill us both. Let us put off our flight till night.” So she took him and hid him in a room; and when the robber came home at night and was inflamed with strong drink, she said to him, “Tell me, love, what would you do if your rival were in your power?”

And he said he would do this and that to him.

“Perhaps he is not so far away as you think,” said she. “He is in the next room.”

Seizing a torch, the robber rushed in and seized the Bodhisatta and beat him about the head and body to his heart’s content. Amid the blows the Bodhisatta made no cry, only murmuring, “Cruel ingrates! Slanderous traitors!” And this was all he said. And when he had thus beaten, bound, and laid by the heels the Bodhisatta, the robber finished his supper, and lay down to sleep. In the morning, when he had slept off his night’s debauch, he fell anew to beating the Bodhisatta, who still made no cry but kept repeating the same four words. And the robber was struck with this and asked why, even when beaten, he kept saying that. \{1.298\}

‘Logic Sage,’ whilst his living was got takkaṁ vikkīṇītvā ‘by selling dates.’ There is the further difficulty that the latter phrase may equally well mean ‘by selling buttermilk.’

“Listen,” said the Date Sage, “and you shall hear. Once I was an ascetic dwelling in the solitude of the forest, and there I won Insight. And I rescued this woman from the Ganges and helped her in her need, and by her allurements fell from my high estate. Then I quit the forest and supported her in a village, whence she was carried off by robbers. And she sent me a message that she was unhappy, entreat ing [1.158] me to come and take her away. Now she has made me fall into your hands. That is why I thus exclaim.”

This set the robber to thinking again, and he thought: “If she can feel so little for one who is so good and has done so much for her, what injury would she not do to me? She must die.” So having reassured the Bodhisatta and having awakened the woman, he set out sword in hand, pretending to her that he was about to kill him outside the village. Then bidding her hold the Date Sage he drew his sword, and, making as though to kill the sage, clove the woman in twain. Then he bathed the Date Sage from head to foot and for several days fed him with dainties to his heart’s content.

“Where do you purpose to go now?” said the robber at last.

“The world,” answered the sage, “has no pleasures for me. I will become an ascetic once more and dwell in my former habitation in the forest.”

“And I too will become an ascetic,” exclaimed the robber. So both became ascetics together, and dwelt in the hermitage in the forest, where they won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and qualified themselves when life ended to enter the Realm of Brahmā.

After telling these two stories, the Teacher showed the connection, by reciting, after Fully Awakening, this verse:

1. “Wrathful are women, slanderers, ingrates,
The sowers of dissension and fell strife!
Then, monk, tread you the path of holiness,
And bliss therein you shall not fail to find.” \{1.299\}

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof the monk overcome by passion won the Fruit of the First Path. Also, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the robber-chief of those days, and I myself the Date Sage.”

Ja 64 Durājānajātaka

The Story about what is Difficult to Know (1s)

In the present a lay brother cannot make out the moods of his wife, who is meek on some days and haughty on others. The Buddha explains this is part of women’s nature and tells a past life story in which the same characters appear.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

Keywords: Unpredictability, Women.

“Think you.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay brother. Tradition says that there dwelt at Sāvatthi a lay brother, who was established in the Three Jewels and the Five Precepts, a devout lover of the Buddha, the Dhamma and the Saṅgha. But his wife was a sinful and wicked woman. On days when she did wrong, she was as meek as a slave girl bought for a hundred pieces; while on days when she did not do [1.159] wrong, she played the lady, passionate and tyrannical. The husband could not make her out. She worried him so much that he did not go to wait on the Buddha.

One day he went with perfumes and flowers, and had taken his seat after due salutation, when the Teacher said to him, “Pray how comes it, lay brother, that seven or eight days have gone by without your coming to wait upon the Buddha?”

“My wife, sir, is one day like a slave girl bought for a hundred pieces, while another day finds her like a passionate and tyrannical mistress. I cannot make her out; and it is because she has worried me so that I have not been to wait upon the Buddha.”

Now, when he heard these words, the Teacher said: “Why, lay brother, you have already been told by the wise and good of bygone days that it is hard to understand the nature of women.” And he went on to add, “But his previous existences have come to be confused in his mind, so that he cannot remember.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to be a teacher of world-wide fame, with five hundred young brahmins studying under him. One of these pupils was a young brahmin from a foreign land, who fell in love with a woman and made her his wife. Though he continued to live on in Benares, he failed two or three times in his attendance on the master. For, you should know, his wife was a sinful and wicked woman, who was as meek as a slave on days when she had done wrong, but on days when she had not done wrong, played the lady, passionate and tyrannical. Her husband could not make her out at all; and so worried and harassed by her was he that he absented himself from waiting on the Teacher. Now, some seven or eight days later he renewed his attendances, and was asked by the Bodhisatta why he had not been seen of late.

“Teacher, my wife is the cause,” said he. And he told the Bodhisatta how she was meek one day like a slave girl, and tyrannical the next; how he could not make her out at all, and how he had been so worried and harassed by her shifting moods that he had stayed away.

“Precisely so, young brahmin,” said the Bodhisatta, “on days when they have done wrong, women humble themselves before their husbands and become as meek and submissive as a slave girl; but on days when they have not done wrong, then they become stiff-necked and insubordinate to their lords. After this manner are women sinful and wicked; and their nature is hard to know. No heed should be paid either to their likes or to their dislikes.” And so saying, the Bodhisatta repeated for the edification of his pupil this Stanza:

   Think you she loves you not? Forbear to grieve.
   Unknowable, uncertain as the path
   Of fishes in the water, women prove.” [1.160] [1.301]

Such was the Bodhisatta’s instruction to his pupil, who thenceforward paid no heed to his wife’s caprices. And she, hearing that her misconduct had come to the ears of the Bodhisatta, ceased from that time forward from her naughtiness.

So too this lay brother’s wife said to herself, “The Perfect Buddha himself knows, they tell me, of my misconduct,” and thenceforth she sinned no more.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof the lay brother won the Fruit of the First Path. Then the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This husband and wife were also the husband and wife of those days, and I myself the teacher.”

Ja 65 Anabhiratijātaka

The Story about Discontent (1s)

In the present a lay brother is absent from attendance on the Buddha for a while after finding his wife is unfaithful. The Buddha explains that this is the nature of women, and shows how the same thing happened to the pair of them in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin teacher (ācariyabrāhmaṇa),
the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

Keywords: Faithfulness, Women.

“Like highways.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about just such another lay brother as the last. This man, when on enquiry he assured himself of his wife’s misconduct, came to words with her, with the result that he was so upset that for seven or eight days he failed in his attendance. One day he came to the monastery, made his bow to the Tathāgata and took his seat. Being asked why he had been absent for seven or eight days, he replied, “Sir, my wife has committed adultery, and I have been so upset about her that I did not come.”

“Lay brother,” said the Teacher, “long ago the wise and good told you not to be angered at the naughtiness found in women, but to preserve your equanimity this, however, you have forgotten, because a multitude of rebirths has hidden it from you.” And so saying, he told – at that lay brother’s request – this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a teacher of world-wide reputation, as in the foregoing story. And a pupil of his, finding his wife unfaithful, was so affected by the discovery that he stayed away for some days, but being asked one day by his teacher what was the reason of his absence, he made a clean breast of it. Then said his teacher, “My son, there is no private property in women: they are common to all. And therefore wise men knowing [1.161] their frailty, are not excited to anger against them.” And so saying, he repeated this verse for his pupil’s edification:
1. “Like highways, rivers, courtyards, hostellies,
   Or taverns, which to all alike extend
   One universal hospitality,
   Is womankind; and wise men never stoop
   To wrath at frailty in a sex so frail.”

Such was the instruction which the Bodhisatta imparted to his pupil, who thenceforward grew indifferent to what women did. And as for his wife, she was so changed by hearing that the teacher knew what she was, that she gave up her naughtiness thenceforth.

So too that lay brother’s wife, when she heard that the Teacher knew what she was, gave up her naughtiness thenceforth.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof the lay brother won the Fruit of the First Path. Also the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This husband and wife were also the husband and wife of those days, and I myself the brahmin teacher.”

Ja 66 Mudulakkaṇājātaka
The Story about (Queen) Mudulakkaṇā (1s)

In the present a meditating monk is overwhelmed with lust when he sees a naked woman. The Buddha explains that this had happened even to himself in the past, and tells how, when an ascetic with higher knowledges, he had seen the queen naked he was overcome with lust. And how she cured him, so that he returned to the higher life.

The Bodhisatta = the sage (isi),
Ānanda = the king (rājā),
Uppalavaṇṇā = (his queen) Mudulakkaṇā.

Keywords: Lust, Women.

“Till queen Mudu was mine.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about sensual desire. Tradition says that a young gentleman of Sāvatthi, on hearing the Dhamma preached by the Teacher, gave his heart to the dispensation. Renouncing the world for the monk’s life, he rose to walk in the Paths, to practise meditation, and never to slacken in his pondering over the meditation subject he had chosen. One day, while he was on his round for alms through Sāvatthi, he espied a woman in revealing clothes, and, for pleasure’s sake, broke through the higher morality and gazed upon her! Passion was stirred within him, he became even as a fig tree felled by the axe. From that day forth, under the sway of passion, the palate of his mind, as of his body, lost all its gust; like a brute beast, he took no joy in the dispensation, and suffered his nails and hair to grow long and his robes to grow foul.

When his friends among the monks became aware of his troubled state of mind, they said: “Why, sir, is your moral state otherwise than it was?” “My joy has gone,” said he. Then they took him to the Teacher, who asked them why they had brought that monk there against his will. “Because, sir, his joy is gone,” “Is that true, monk?” “It is, Fortunate One.” “Who has troubled you?” “Sir, I was on my round for alms when, violating the higher morality, I gazed on a woman; and passion was stirred within me. Therefore am I 1.162 troubled.” Then said the Teacher, “It is little marvel, monk, that when, violating morality, you were gazing for pleasure’s sake on an exceptional object, you were stirred by passion. Why, in bygone times, even those who had won the five Super Knowledges and the eight Attainments, those who by the power of Absorption had quelled their passions, whose hearts were purified and whose feet could walk the skies, yes even Bodhisattas, through gazing in violation of morality on an exceptional object, lost their Absorption, were stirred by passion, and came to great sorrow. Little recks the wind which could overturn Mount Sineru, of a bare hillock no bigger than an elephant; little recks a wind which could uproot a mighty Jambu tree, of a bush on the face of a cliff; and little recks a wind which could dry up a vast ocean, of a tiny pond. If passion could breed folly in the supremely-intelligent and pure-minded Bodhisattas, shall passion be abashed before you? Why, even purified beings are led astray by passion, and those advanced to the highest honour, come to shame.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a rich brahmin family in the Kāsi country. When he was grown up and had finished his education, he renounced all sensual desires, and, forsaking the world for the ascetic’s life, went to live in the solitudes of the Himālayas. There by focusing on the Meditation Object, he won the Super Knowledges and Attainments; and so lived his life in the bliss of Absorption. {1.304}

Lack of salt and vinegar brought him one day to Benares, where he took up his quarters in the king’s pleasure gardens. Next day, after seeing to his bodily needs, he folded up the red suit of bark which he commonly wore, threw over one shoulder a black antelope’s skin, knotted his tangled locks in a coil on the top of his head, and with a yoke on his back from which hung two baskets, set out on his round in quest of alms. Coming to the palace-gates on his way, his demeanour so commended him to the king that his majesty had him brought in. So the ascetic was seated on a couch of great splendour and fed with abundance of the daintiest food. And when he thanked the king, he was invited to take up his dwelling in the pleasure gardens. The ascetic accepted the offer, and for sixteen years lived in the pleasure gardens, exhorting the king’s household and eating of the king’s meat.

Now there came a day when the king must go to the borders to put down a rising. But, before he started, he charged his queen, whose name was Mudulakkhana [Gentleness], to minister to the wants of the holy man. So, after the king’s departure, the Bodhisatta continued to go when he pleased to the palace.

One day queen Mudulakkhana got ready a meal for the Bodhisatta; but as he was late in coming, she betook herself to her own toilette. After bathing in perfumed water, she dressed herself in all her splendour, [1.163] and lay down, awaiting his coming, on a little couch in the spacious chamber.

Waking from the bliss of Absorption, and seeing how late it was, the Bodhisatta transported himself through the air to the palace. Hearing the rustling of his bark-robe, the queen started up hurriedly to receive him. In her hurry to rise, her tunic slipped down, so that her beauty was revealed to the ascetic as he entered the window; and at the sight, in violation of Morality he gazed for pleasure’s sake on the marvellous beauty of the queen. Defilements were kindled within him; he was as a tree felled by the axe. At once all the Absorptions deserted him, and he became as a crow with its wings clipped. Clutching his food, still standing, he ate not, but took his way, all atremble with desire, from the palace to his hut in the pleasure gardens, set it down beneath his wooden couch and thereon lay for seven whole days a prey to hunger and thirst, enslaved by the queen’s loveliness, his heart aflame with lust.

On the seventh day, the king came back from pacifying the border. After passing in solemn procession round the city, he entered his palace. [1.305] Then, wishing to see the ascetic, he took his way to the pleasure gardens, and there in the cell found the Bodhisatta lying on his couch. Thinking the holy man had been taken ill, the king, after first having the cell cleaned out, asked, as he stoked the sufferer’s feet, what ailed him. “Sire, my heart is fettered by lust; that is my sole ailment.” “Lust for whom?” “For Mudulakkhaṇā, sire.” “Then she is yours; I give her to you,” said the king. Then he passed with the ascetic to the palace, and bidding the queen array herself in all her splendour, gave her to the Bodhisatta. But, as he was giving her away, the king privily charged the queen to put forth her utmost endeavour to save the holy man.

“Fear not, sire,” said the queen, “I will save him.” So with the queen the ascetic went out from the palace. But when he had passed through the great gate, the queen cried out that they must have a house to live in; and back he must go to the king to ask for one. So back he went to ask the king for a house to live in, and the king gave them a tumble-down dwelling which passers-by used as an outhouse. To this dwelling the ascetic took the queen; but she flatly refused to enter it, because of its filthy state.

“What am I to do?” he cried. “Why, clean it out,” she said. And she sent him to the king for a spade and a basket, and made him remove all the filth and dirt, and plaster the walls with cowdung, which he also had to fetch. This done, she made him get a bed, and a stool, and a rug, and a waterpot, and a cup, sending him for only one thing at a time. Next, she sent him packing to fetch water and a thousand other things. So off he started for the water, and filled up the waterpot, and set out the water for the bath, and made the bed. And, as he sat with her upon the [1.164] bed, she took him by the whiskers and drew him towards her till they were face to face, saying: “Have you forgotten that you are a holy man and a brahmin?”

Hereon he came to himself after his interval of witless folly.

(And here should be repeated the text beginning, “Thus the defilement of the hindrance of sensual desire lead to ignorance, monks; {1.306} that which leads to ignorance creates blindness.”)

So when he had come to himself, he bethought him how, waxing stronger and stronger, this fatal craving would condemn him hereafter to the Four States of Punishment.”

“Thus the defilement of the hindrance of sensual desire lead to ignorance, monks; {1.306} that which leads to ignorance creates blindness.”

298 [SN. 5.221.]
299 Hell, the animal world, the departed, the Asuras.
king and fly to the mountains!” So he stood with the queen before the king and said: “Sire, I want your queen no longer; and it was only for her that cravings were awakened within me.” And so saying, he repeated this Stanza:

1. “Till queen Mudu was mine, one sole desire
   I had – to win her. When her beauty owned Me lord, desire came crowding on desire.”

Forthwith his lost power of Absorption came back to him. Rising from the earth and seating himself in the air, he preached the Dhamma to the king; and without touching earth he passed through the air to the Himālayas. He never came back to the paths of men; but grew in the Divine Abidings till, with Absorption unbroken, he passed to a new birth in the Realm of Brahmā.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Truths, at the close whereof that monk became an Arahat itself. Also the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days, Uppalavāṇṇā was Mudulakkhaṇṇā, and I the ascetic.”

Ja 67 Ucchaṅgajātaka
The Story about what is Easy (1s)

In the present three men are picked up suspected of robbery. They are the husband, son and brother of the same woman. When before the king she chooses to save her brother because a husband and a son can be easily replaced, and in this way she manages to save all three. The Buddha then tells how a similar thing happened in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the king (rājā), the four (a woman and three males) = the same in the past (cattāro).

Keywords: Clever pleading, Women.

“A son’s an easy find.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain country-woman.

For it fell out once in Kosala that three men were ploughing on the outskirts of a certain forest, and that robbers plundered folk in that forest and made their escape. [1.307] The victims came, in the course of a fruitless search for the rascals, to where the three men were ploughing. “Here are the forest robbers, [1.165] disguised as husbandmen,” they cried, and hauled the trio off as prisoners to the king of Kosala. Now time after time there came to the king’s palace a woman who with loud lamentations begged for “wherewith to be covered.” Hearing her cry, the king ordered a shift to be given her; but she refused it, saying this was not what she meant. So the king’s servants came back to his majesty and said that what the woman wanted was not clothes but a husband.

“Yes, sire,” she answered, “for a husband is a woman’s real covering, and she that lacks a husband – even though she be clad in garments costing a thousand pieces – goes bare and naked indeed.”

(And to enforce this truth, the following discourse should be recited here:

“I like kingless kingdoms, like a stream run dry,
So bare and naked is a woman seen,
Who, having brothers ten, yet lacks a mate.”)

Pleased with the woman’s answer, the king asked what relation the three prisoners were to her. And she said that one was her husband, one her brother, and one her son. “Well, to mark my favour,” said the king, “I give you one of the three. Which will you take?” “Sire,” was her answer, “if I live, I can get another husband and another son; but as my parents are dead, I can never get another brother. So give me my brother, sire.” Pleased with the woman, the king set all three men at liberty; and thus this one woman was the means of saving three persons from peril.

When the matter came to the knowledge of the Saṅgha, they were lauding the woman in the Dhamma Hall, when the Teacher entered. Learning on enquiry what was the subject of their talk, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that this woman has saved those three from peril; she did the same in days gone by.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, three men were ploughing on the outskirts of a forest, and everything came to pass as above.

\[300\] cf. ‘femme couverte.’

\[301\] [JA. 547, vs. 190.]
Being asked by the king which of the three she would take, the woman said: “Cannot your majesty give me all three?” “No,” said the king, “I cannot.”

“Well, if I cannot have all three, give me my brother.” “Take your husband or your son,” said the king. “What matters a brother?” “The two former I can readily replace,” answered the woman, “but a brother never.” And so saying, she repeated this verse:

1. “A son’s an easy find; of husbands too
   An ample choice throngs public ways. But where Will all my pains another brother find?”

“She is quite right,” said the king, well-pleased. And he bade all three men be fetched from the prison and given over to the woman. She took them all three and went her way.

“So you see, monks,” said the Teacher, “that this same woman once before saved these same three men from peril.” His lesson ended, he made the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The woman and the three men of today were also the woman and men of those bygone days; and I was then the king.”

Ja 68 Sāketajātaka

The Story about (the City of) Sāketa (1s)

In the present an old brahmin greets the Buddha as his son, and calling his wife she too talks about him as her son. The Buddha tells how he had indeed been related in various ways to these two in many previous existences.

The Bodhisatta = the son (putta),
the brahmin and his wife = the same in the past (brāhmaṇo ca brāhmaṇī ca).

Present and Past Source: Ja 68 Sāketa,
Quoted at: Ja 237 Sāketa,
Present and Past Compare: Dhp-a XVII.5 Sāketabrāhmaṇa.

Keywords: Rebirth, Relatives.

“The man your mind rests on.” This story was told by the Teacher, while at Añjanavana, about a certain brahmin. Tradition says that when the Fortunate One with his disciples was entering the city of Sāketa, an old brahmin of that place, who was going out, met him in the gateway. Falling at the One with Ten Powers’ feet, and clasping him by the ankles, the old man cried, “Son, is it not the duty of children to cherish the old age of their parents? {1.309} Why have you not let us see you all this long time? At last I have seen you; come, let your mother see you too.” So saying, he took the Teacher with him to his house; and there the Teacher sat upon the seat prepared for him, with his disciples around him. Then came the brahmin’s wife, and she too fell at the feet of the Fortunate One, crying, “My son, where have you been all this time? Is it not the duty of children to comfort their parents in their old age?” Hereon, she called to her sons and daughters that their brother was come, and made them salute the Buddha. And in their joy the aged pair showed great hospitality to their guests. After his meal, the Teacher recited to the old people the Sutta concerning old-age;{302} and, when he had ended, both husband and wife won fruition of the Second Path. Then rising up from his seat, the Teacher went back to Añjanavana.

Meeting together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks fell to talking about this thing. It was urged that the brahmin must have been well aware that Suddhodana was the father, and Mahāmāyā the mother, of the Buddha; yet none the less, he and his wife had claimed the Tathāgata as their own son – and that with the Teacher’s assent. What could it all mean? Hearing their talk, the Teacher said: “Monks, the aged pair were right in claiming me as their son.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

Monks, in ages past this brahmin was my father in 500 successive births, my uncle in a like number, and in 500 more my grandfather. And [1.167] in 1500 successive births his wife was respectively my mother, my aunt, and my grandmother. So I was brought up in 1500 births by this brahmin, and in 1500 by his wife.

And therewithal, having told of these 3000 births, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, recited this Stanza:

1. “The man your mind rests on, with whom your heart
   Is pleased at first sight – place your trust in him.” {1.310}

{302} [Snp 4.6 Jarāsutta].
His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This brahmin and his wife were the husband and wife in all those existences, and I the child.”

Ja 69 Visavantajātaka

The Story about the Poisonous Snake (1s)

In the present Ven. Sāriputta decides to give up meal-cakes and this gets voiced abroad, and the monks ask the Buddha to dissuade him. The Buddha explains that once Sāriputta has decided on an action nothing can deter him, and tells how he was once a snake who refused to take back the poison he had released, even though it might cost him his life.

The Bodhisatta = the doctor (vejja),
Sāriputta = the snake (sappa).

Keywords: Blame, Tenacity, Animals.

“May shame.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma. Tradition says that in the days when the elder used to eat meal-cakes, folks came to the monastery with a quantity of such cakes for the Saṅgha. After the monks had all eaten their fill, much remained over; and the givers said: “Sirs, take some for those too who are away in the village.”

Just then a youth who was the elder's co-resident, was away in the village. For him a portion was taken; but, as he did not return, and it was felt that it was getting very late, this portion was given to the elder. When this portion had been eaten by the elder, the youth came in. Accordingly, the elder explained the case to him, saying: “Sir, I have eaten the cakes set apart for you.” “Ah!” was the rejoinder, “we have all of us got a sweet tooth.” The great elder was much troubled.

“From this day forward,” he exclaimed, “I vow never to eat meal-cakes again.” And from that day forward, so tradition says, the elder Sāriputta never touched meal-cakes again! This abstention became matter of common knowledge in the Saṅgha, and the monks sat talking of it in the Dhamma Hall. Said the Teacher,

---

303 i.e. close on to mid-day, after which the food could not properly be eaten. See note, page 107.
“What are you talking of, monks, as you sit here?” When they had told him, he said: “Monks, when Sāriputta has once given anything up, he never goes back to it again, even though his life be at stake.” And so saying, he told this story of the past. [1.168]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a family of doctors skilled in the cure of snake-bites, and when he grew up, he practised for a livelihood.

Now it fell out that a countryman was bitten by a snake; and without delay his relatives quickly fetched the doctor. Said the Bodhisatta, “Shall I extract the venom with the usual antidotes, or have the snake caught and make it suck its own poison out of the wound?” “Have the snake caught and make it suck the poison out.” So, he had the snake caught, and asked the creature, saying: “Did you bite this man?” “Yes, I did,” was the answer. [1.311] “Well then, suck your own poison out of the wound again.” “What? Take back the poison I have once shed!” cried the snake, “I never did, and I never will.” Then the doctor made a fire with wood, and said to the snake, “Either you suck the poison out, or into the fire you go.”

“Even though the flames be my doom, I will not take back the poison I have once shed,” said the snake, and repeated the following verse:

1. “May shame be on the poison which, once shed,
To save my life, I swallow down again!
More welcome death than life by weakness bought!”

With these words, the snake moved towards the fire! But the doctor barred its way, and drew out the poison with medicines and charms, so that the man was whole again. Then he unfolded the Precepts to the snake, and set it free, saying: “Henceforth do harm to none.”

And the Teacher went on to say, “Monks, when Sāriputta has once parted with anything, he never takes it back again, even though his life be at stake.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Sāriputta was the snake of those days, and I the doctor.”
Ja 70 Kuddālajātaka
The Story about (the Wise) Kuddāla (1s)

In the present one monk ordains and disrobes six times before finally becoming an Arahat at the seventh attempt. The Buddha tells how in a previous life he too had renounced the ascetic life six times before eventually attaining his goal.

The Bodhisatta = wise Kuddāla (Kuddālapaṇḍito),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Keywords: Wisdom, Attachment, Perseverance.

“The conquest.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the elder named Cittahatthasāriputta. He is said to have been a youth of a good family in Sāvatthi; and one day, on his way home from ploughing, he turned in to the monastery. Here he received from the bowl of a certain elder some dainty fare, rich and sweet, which made him think to himself, “Day and night I am toiling away with my hands at divers tasks, yet never do I taste food so sweet. I must become a monk myself!” So he joined the Saṅgha, but after six weeks’ improper attention, fell under the dominion of sensual desires and off he went.

His belly again proving too much for him, back he came to join the Saṅgha once more, and studied the Abhidhamma. In this way, six times he left and came back again; but when for the seventh time he became a monk, he mastered the whole seven books of the Abhidhamma, and by much chanting of the Dhamma he won insight and attained to Arahatship. Now his friends among the monks scoffed at him, saying: “Can it be, sir, that sensual desires have ceased to spring up within your heart?”

“Sirs,” was the reply, “I have now got beyond mundane life henceforth.”

He having thus became an Arahat, talk thereof arose in the Dhamma Hall, as follows, “Sirs, though all the while he was destined to all the glories of Arahatship, 304 The third, and latest, of the Piṭakas – a systemisation the Nikāyas of the Suttapiṭaka.

yet six times did Cittahatthasāriputta renounce the Saṅgha; truly, very wrong is the unconverted state.”

Returning to the Hall, the Teacher asked what they were talking about. Being told, he said: “Monks, the worldling’s heart is light and hard to curb; material things attract and hold it fast; when once it is so held fast, it cannot be released in a trice. Excellent is the mastery of such a heart; once mastered, it brings joy and happiness:

“
'Tis good to tame a wilful heart and frail,
   By passion swayed. Once tamed, the heart brings bliss.”

It was by reason of this wilful quality of the heart, however, that, for the sake of a pretty spade which they could not bring themselves to throw away, the wise and good of bygone days six times reverted to the world out of sheer cupidity; but on the seventh occasion they won Absorption and subdued their greed.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as a gardener, and grew up. ‘Kuddālapaṇḍita [Spade Sage]’ was his name. With his spade he cleared a patch of ground, and grew pot-herbs, pumpkins, gourds, cucumbers, and other vegetables, by the sale of which he made a sorry living. For, save only that one spade, he had nothing in the world! Resolving one day to forsake the world for the ascetic life, he hid his spade away, and became a recluse. But thoughts of that spade rose in his heart and the passion of greed overcame him, so that for the sake of his blunt spade he reverted to the world. {1.313} Again and again this happened; six times did he hide the spade and become a recluse – only to renounce his vows again. But the seventh time he bethought him how that blunt spade had caused him again and again to fall back; and he made up his mind to throw it into a great river before he became a recluse again. So he carried the spade to the riverside, and, fearing lest if he saw where it fell, he should come back and fish it out again, he whirled the spade thrice round his head by the handle and flung [1.170] it with the strength of an elephant right into mid-stream, shutting his eyes tight as he did so. Then loud rang his shout of exultation, a shout like a lion’s roar, “I have conquered! I have conquered!”

[Dhp 35.]

Now just at that moment the king of Benares, on his way home from quelling disorder on the border, had been bathing in that very river, and was riding along in all his splendour on the back of his elephant, when he heard the Bodhisatta’s shout of triumph. “Here’s a man,” said the king, “who is proclaiming that he has conquered. I wonder whom he has conquered. Go, bring him before me.”

So the Bodhisatta was brought before the king, who said to him, “My good man, I am a conqueror myself; I have just won a battle and am on my way home victorious. Tell me whom you have conquered.” “Sire,” said the Bodhisatta, “a thousand, yes, a hundred thousand, such victories as yours are vain, if you have not the victory over the sensual desires within yourself. It is by conquering greed within myself that I have conquered my sensual desires.” And as he spoke, he gazed upon the great river, and by duly focusing on the water Meditation Object, won Absorption. Then by virtue of his newly-won transcendental powers, he rose in the air, and, seated there, instructed the king in the Dhamma in this verse:

1. “The conquest that by further victories
   Must be upheld, or own defeat at last,
   Is vain! True conquest lasts for evermore!” \(1.314\)

Even as he listened to the Dhamma, light shone in on the king’s darkness, and the sensual desires of his heart were quenched; his heart was bent on renouncing the world; then and there the lust for royal dominion passed away from him. “And where will you go now?” said the king to the Bodhisatta. “To the Himālayas, sire; there to live the ascetic’s life.” “Then I, too, will become an ascetic,” said the king; and he departed with the Bodhisatta. And with the king there departed also the whole army, all the brahminds and householders and all the common folk – in a word, all the host that was gathered there.

Tidings came to Benares that their king, on hearing the Dhamma preached by Kuddāla, was fain to live the ascetic’s life and had gone forth with all his host. “And what shall we do here?” cried the folk of Benares. And thereupon, from out that city which was twelve leagues about, all the inhabitants went forth, a train twelve leagues long, with whom the Bodhisatta passed to the Himālayas.
Then the throne of Sakka, King of Devas, became hot beneath him. Looking out, he saw that Kuddāla was engaged upon a Great Renunciation. Marking the numbers of his following, Sakka took thought how to house them all. And he sent for Vissakamma, the architect of the Devas, and spoke thus, “Kuddāla is engaged upon a Great Renunciation, and quarters must be found for him. Go you to the Himālayas, and there on level ground fashion by divine power an ascetic’s living place thirty leagues long and fifteen broad.”

“It shall be done, sire,” said Vissakamma. And away he went, and did what he was bidden.

(What follows is only a summary; the full details will be given in the Hatthipālajātaka [Ja 509], which forms one narrative with this.)

Vissakamma caused a hermitage to arise on the ascetic’s lands; drove away all the noisy beasts and birds and Amanussas; and made in each cardinal direction a path just broad enough for one person to pass along it at a time. This done, he betook himself to his own abode. Kuddāla with his host of people came to the Himālayas and entered the lands which Sakka had given and took possession of the house and furniture which Vissakamma had created for the ascetics. First of all, he renounced the world himself, and afterwards made the people renounce it. Then he portioned out the land among them. They abandoned their sovereignty, which rivalled that of Sakka himself; and the whole thirty leagues of the land were filled. By focusing on all the other Meditation Objects, Kuddāla developed the Divine Abidings within himself, and he taught the people how to meditate. Hereby they all won the Attainments, and assured their entry thereafter into the Brahmā Realm, while all who ministered to them qualified for entry thereafter into the Realm of the Devas.

---

306 Only the merits of a good man struggling with adversity could thus appeal to the mercy-seat of the Lord of the Gods.
307 It is only when a future Buddha renounces the world for the religious life, that his ‘going forth’ is termed a Great Renunciation. cf. p. 61 of Vol. i. of Fausböll’s text as to Gotama’s ‘going forth.’
308 [However, no further details are vouchsafed there.]
309 As shewn above, he had already arrived at Insight through the idea of water.
“Thus, monks,” said the Teacher, “the heart, when passion holds it fast, is hard to release. When the attributes of greed spring up within it, they are hard to chase away, and even persons so wise and good as the above are thereby rendered witless.”

His lesson ended, he preached the Truths, at the close whereof some won the First, some the Second, and some the Third Path, while others again attained to Arahatship. Further, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days, the Buddha’s followers were the followers, and I myself was Kuddāla.”

Ja 71 Varaṇajātaka
The Story about the Temple Tree (1s)

Alternative Title: Varuṇajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk, who should have been striving, fell asleep and broke his thigh after falling. The Buddha tells a story of a past life in which the same person had slept his way through his work time, and on arising had hurt his eye, and brought green wood back, which hindered his companions from receiving their meal.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin teacher (ācariyabrāhmaṇa), the Buddha’s disciples = the brahmin’s students (sesamāṇavā), the monk with a broken thigh = the brahmin pupil who hurt his eye (akkhihedamatto māṇavo).

Keyword: Sloth.

“Learn you from him.” [1.172] {1.316} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the elder named Tissa the householder’s son. Tradition says that one day thirty young gentlemen of Sāvatthi, who were all friends of one another, took perfumes and flowers and robes, and set out with a large retinue to Jetavana, in order to hear the Teacher preach.

After arriving at Jetavana, they sat awhile in the several enclosures – in the enclosure of the Ironwood trees, in the enclosure of the Sāl trees, and so forth – till at evening the Teacher passed from his fragrant sweet-smelling perfumed chamber to the Dhamma Hall and took his seat on the gorgeous Buddha-seat. Then, with their following, these young men went to the Dhamma Hall, made an offering of perfumes and flowers, bowed down at his feet – those blessed feet that were glorious as full-blown lotus-flowers, and bore imprinted on the sole the Wheel – and, taking their seats, listened to the Dhamma. Then the thought came into their minds, “Let us take the vows, so far as we understand the Dhamma preached by the Teacher.” Accordingly, when the Fortunate One left the Hall, they approached him and with due obeisance asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha; and the Teacher admitted them to the Saṅgha.

Winning the favour of their teachers and preceptors they received full ordination, and after five years’ residence with their teachers and preceptors, by which time they had got by heart the two Abstracts, had come to know what was proper and what was improper, had learned the three modes of expressing thanks, and had stitched and dyed robes.

At this stage, wishing to embrace the ascetic life, they obtained the consent of their teachers and preceptors, and approached the Tathāgata. Bowing before him they took their seats, saying: “Sir, we are troubled by the round of existence, dismayed by birth, decay, disease, and death; give us a meditation theme, by thinking on which we may get free from the elements which occasion existence.” The Teacher turned over in his mind the thirty-eight themes of meditation, and therefrom selected a suitable one, which he expounded to them. And then, after getting their meditation from the Teacher, they bowed and with a ceremonious farewell passed from his presence to their cells, and after gazing on their teachers and preceptors went forth with bowl and robe to embrace the ascetic life.

Now amongst them was a monk named the elder Kuṭumbikaputtatissa [Tissa the householder’s son], a weak and irresolute man, a slave to the pleasures of taste. Thought he to himself, “I shall never be able to live in the forest, to strive with strenuous effort, and subsist on doles of food. What is the good of my going? I will turn back.” And so he gave up, and after accompanying those monks some way he turned back.

As to the other monks, they came in the course of their alms pilgrimage through Kosala to a certain border-village, nearby which in a wooded spot they kept the Rainy-season, and by three months’ striving and wrestling got the germ

---

310 [i.e both Pātimokkhas, or regulations for monks and nuns.]
of Discernment and became an Arahat, making the earth shout for joy. At the end of the Rainy-season, after celebrating the Invitation festival, they set out thence to announce to the Teacher the Attainments they had won, and, coming in due course to Jetavana, laid aside their bowls and robes, paid a visit to their teachers and preceptors, and, being anxious to see the Tathāgata, went to him and with due obeisance took their seats. The Teacher greeted them kindly and they announced to the Fortunate One the Attainments they had won, receiving praise from him. Hearing the Teacher speaking in their praise, the elder Tissa the householder’s son was filled with a desire to live the life of a recluse all by himself. Likewise, those other monks asked and received the Teacher’s permission to return to dwell in that self-same spot in the forest. And with due obeisance they went to their cells. [1.173]

Now the elder Tissa the householder's son that very night was inflated with a yearning to begin his austerities at once, and while practising with excessive zeal and ardour the methods of a recluse and sleeping in an upright posture by the side of his plank-bed, soon after the middle watch of the night, round he turned and down he fell, breaking his thigh-bone; and severe pains set in, so that the other monks had to nurse him and were debarred from leaving.

Accordingly, when they appeared at the hour for waiting on the Buddha, he asked them whether they had not yesterday asked his leave to start today.

“Yes, sir, we did; but our friend the elder Tissa the Householder’s Son, while rehearsing the methods of a recluse with great vigour but out of season, dropped off to sleep and fell over, breaking his thigh; and that is why our departure has been thwarted.” “This is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that this man’s discontent has caused him to strive with unseasonable zeal, and thereby to delay your departure; he delayed your departure in the past also.” And hereupon, at their request, he told this story of the past.

In the past at Taxila in the kingdom of Gandhāra the Bodhisatta was a teacher of world-wide fame, with 500 young brahmins as pupils. One day these pupils set out for the forest to gather firewood for their master, and busied themselves in gathering sticks. Amongst them was a lazy fellow who came on a huge forest tree, which he imagined to be dry and rotten. So he thought that he could safely indulge in a nap first, and at the last moment climb up and break some branches off to carry home. Accordingly, he spread out his outer robe and fell asleep, snoring loudly. All the other young brahmins were on their way home with their wood tied up in faggots, when they came upon the sleeper. Having kicked him in the back till he awoke, they left him and went their way. He sprang to his feet, and rubbed his eyes for a time. Then, still half asleep, he began to climb the tree. But one branch, which he was tugging at, snapped off short; and, as it sprang up, the end struck him in the eye. Clapping one hand over his wounded eye, he gathered green boughs with the other. Then climbing down, he corded his faggot, and after hurrying away home with it, flung his green wood on the top of the others’ faggots.

That same day it chanced that a country family invited the master to visit them on the morrow, in order that they might give him a brahmin-feast. And so the master called his pupils together, and, telling them of the journey they would have to make to the village on the morrow, said they could not go fasting. “So have some rice-gruel made early in the morning,” said he, “and eat it before starting. There you will have food given you for yourselves and a portion for me. Bring it all home with you.”

So they got up early next morning and roused a maid to get them their breakfast ready betimes. And off she went for wood to light the fire. The green wood lay on the top of the stack, and she laid her fire with it. And she blew and blew, but could not get her fire to burn, and at last the sun got up. “It’s broad daylight now,” they said, “and it’s too late to start.” And they went off to their master.

“What, not yet on your way, my sons?” said he. “No, sir; we have not started.” “Why, pray?” “Because that lazy so-and-so, when he went wood-gathering with us, lay down to sleep under a forest tree; and, to make up for lost time, he climbed up the tree in such a hurry that he hurt his eye and brought home a lot of green wood, which he threw on the top of our faggots. So, when the maid who was to cook our rice-gruel went to the stack, she took his wood, thinking it would be dry; and no fire could she light before the sun was up. And this is what stopped our going.”

Hearing what the young brahmin had done, the master exclaimed that a fool’s doings had caused all the mischief, and repeated this verse: {1.319}
1. “Learn you from him who tore green branches down,
That tasks deferred are wrought in tears at last.”

Such was the Bodhisatta’s comment on the matter to his pupils; and at the close of a life of generosity and other good works he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that this man has thwarted you; he did the like in the past also.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The monk who has broken his thigh was the young brahmin of those days who hurt his eye; the Buddha’s followers were the rest of the young brahmins; and I myself was the brahmin their master.”

Ja 72 Sīlavanāgajātaka

The Story about the Virtuous Elephant (1s)

Alternative Title: Sīlavanāgajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta is noticed as an ingrate. The Buddha says he was like that in the past also, and tells a story of how when he was a marvellous elephant he had once saved a forester, who later returned and begged him over and again for his tusks, which he readily gave. The earth though opened up and swallowed him for his wickedness.

The Bodhisatta = the virtuous elephant king (sīlavanāgarājā), Sāriputta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), Devadatta = the treacherous man (mittadubbhi puggalo).

Keyword: Virtue, Ingratitude, Treachery, Devas, Animals.

“Ingratitude lacks more.” This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove about Devadatta. The monks sat in the Dhamma Hall, saying: “Sirs, Devadatta is an ingrate and does not recognise the virtues of the Tathāgata.” Returning to the Hall, the Teacher asked what topic they were discussing, and was told. “This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that Devadatta has proved an ingrate; he was just the same in bygone days also, and he has never known my virtues.” And so saying, at their request he told this story of the past. [1.175]

---

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived by an elephant in the Himālayas. When born, he was white all over, like a mighty mass of silver. Like diamond balls were his eyes, like a manifestation of the five brightnesses; \(^{312}\) red was his mouth, like scarlet cloth; like silver flecked with red gold was his trunk; and his four feet were as if polished with lac. Thus his person, adorned with the Ten Perfections, was of consummate beauty. When he grew up, all the elephants of the Himālayas in a body \(^{1.320}\) followed him as their leader. While he was dwelling in the Himālayas with a following of 80,000 elephants, he became aware that there was bad in the herd. So, detaching himself from the rest, he dwelt in solitude in the forest, and the goodness of his life won him the name of king Sīlava elephant.

Now a forester of Benares came to the Himālayas, and made his way into that forest in quest of the implements of his craft. Losing his bearings and his way, he roamed to and fro, stretching out his arms in despair and weeping, with the fear of death before his eyes. Hearing the man’s cries, the Bodhisatta was moved with compassion and resolved to help him in his need. So he approached the man. But at sight of the elephant, off ran the forester in great terror. \(^{313}\) Seeing him run away, the Bodhisatta stood still, and this brought the man to a standstill too. Then the Bodhisatta again advanced, and again the forester ran away, halting once more when the Bodhisatta halted. Hereupon the truth dawned on the man that the elephant stood still when he himself ran, and only advanced when he himself was standing still. Consequently he concluded that the creature could not mean to hurt, but to help him. So he valiantly stood his ground this time. And the Bodhisatta drew near and said: “Why, friend man, are you wandering about here lamenting?”

“My lord,” replied the forester, “I have lost my bearings and my way, and fear to perish.”

Then the elephant brought the man to his own dwelling, and there entertained him for some days, regaling him with fruits of every kind. Then, saying: “Fear not, friend man, I will bring you back to the haunts of men,” the elephant seated the forester on his back and brought him to where men dwelt. But the ingrate

---

\(^{312}\) This is applied to a Bodhisatta’s eyes in Ja 344:9.

\(^{313}\) A solitary elephant, or ‘rogue,’ being dangerous to meet.
thought to himself, that, if questioned, he ought to be able to reveal everything. So, as he travelled along on the elephant’s back, he noted the landmarks of tree and hill. At last the elephant brought him out of the forest and set him down on the high road to Benares, saying: “There lies your road, friend man: tell no man, whether you are questioned or not, of the place of my abode.” And with this leave-taking, the Bodhisattva made his way back to his own abode.

After arriving at Benares, the man came, in the course of his walks through the city, to the ivory-workers’ bazaar, where he saw ivory being worked into divers forms and shapes. And he asked the craftsmen whether they would give anything for the tusk of a living elephant.

“What makes you ask such a question?” was the reply. “A living elephant’s tusk is worth a great deal more than a dead one’s.”

“Oh, then, I’ll bring you some ivory,” said be, and off he set for the Bodhisattva’s dwelling, with provisions for the journey, and with a sharp saw. Being asked what had brought him back, he whined out that he was in so sorry and wretched a plight that he could not make a living anyhow. Wherefore, he had come to ask for a bit of the kind elephant’s tusk to sell for a living! “Certainly; I will give you a whole tusk,” said the Bodhisatta, “if you have a bit of a saw to cut it off with.” “Oh, I brought a saw with me, sir.” “Then saw my tusks off, and take them away with you,” said the Bodhisatta. And he bowed his knees till he was crouched upon the earth like an ox. Then the forester sawed off both of the Bodhisatta’s chief tusks! When they were off, the Bodhisatta took them in his trunk and thus addressed the man, “Think not, friend man, that it is because I value not nor prize these tusks that I give them to you. But a thousand times, a hundred-thousand times, dearer to me are the tusks of omniscience which can comprehend all things. And therefore may my gift of these to you bring me omniscience.” With these words, he gave the pair of tusks to the forester as the price of omniscience.

And the man took them off, and sold them. And when he had spent the money, back he came to the Bodhisatta, saying that the two tusks had only brought him enough to pay his old debts, and begging for the rest of the Bodhisatta’s ivory. The Bodhisatta consented, and gave up the rest of his ivory after having it cut as before. And the forester went away and sold this also. Returning again, he said: “It’s no use, my lord; I can’t make a living anyhow. So give me the stumps of your tusks.”
“So be it,” answered the Bodhisatta; and he lay down as before. Then that vile wretch, trampling upon the trunk of the Bodhisatta, that sacred trunk which was like corded silver, and clambering upon the future Buddha’s temples, which were as the snowy crest of Mount Kelāsa – kicked at the roots of the tusks till he had cleared the flesh away. Then he sawed out the stumps and went his way. But scarce had the wretch passed out of the sight of the Bodhisatta, when the solid earth, inconceivable in its vast extent, which can support the mighty weight of Mount Sineru and its encircling peaks, with all the world’s unsavoury filth and ordure, now burst asunder in a yawning chasm – as though unable to bear the burden of all that wickedness! And straightaway flames from the nethermost hell enveloped the ingrate, wrapping him round as in a shroud of doom, and bore him away.

As the wretch was swallowed up in the bowels of the earth, the Tree Devatā that dwelt in that forest made the region echo with these words, “Not even the gift of worldwide empire can satisfy the thankless and ungrateful!” And in the following verse the Devatā taught the Dhamma:

1. “Ingratitude lacks more, the more it gets;
Not all the world can glut its appetite.”

With such teachings did the Tree Devatā make that forest re-echo. As for the Bodhisatta, he lived out his life, passing away at last to fare according to his deeds.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has proved an ingrate; he was just the same in the past also.” His lesson ended, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the ungrateful man of those days, Sāriputta the Tree Devatā, and I myself Sīlava the elephant king.”

Ja 73Saccaṅkirajātaka
The Story about the Assertion of Truth (1s)

In the present Devadatta seeks to kill the Buddha, who tells a story of how he did the same in the past, when, as a wicked king, he had sought to pay back the Bodhisatta having saved his life by having him killed. When the citizens found out, they killed the wicked king instead, and elected the Bodhisatta as the new king.

The Bodhisatta = the righteous man who became king (rajjappatto dhammarājā), Ānanda = the parrot (suva), Moggallāna = the rat (undūra),
Sāriputta = the snake (sappa),
Devadatta = the corrupt king (duṭṭharājā).

Keywords: Ingratitude, Gratitude, Devas.

“They knew the world.” This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about going about to kill. For, seated in the Dhamma Hall, the Saṅgha was talking of Devadatta’s wickedness, saying: “Sirs, Devadatta has no knowledge of the Teacher’s excellence; he actually goes about to kill him!” Here the Teacher entered the Hall and asked what they were discussing. {1.323} Being told, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has gone about to kill me; he did just the same in bygone days also.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares. He had a son named Duṭṭhakumāra [prince Wicked]. Fierce and cruel was he, like a scotched snake; he spoke to nobody without abuse or blows. Like grit in the eye was this prince to all folk both within and without the palace, or like a ravening Yakkha – so dreaded and fell was he.

One day, wishing to disport himself in the river, he went with a large retinue to the water side. And a great storm came on, and utter darkness set in. “Hi there!” cried he to his servants, “take me into mid-stream, [1.178] bathe me there, and then bring me back again.” So they took him into mid-stream and there took counsel together, saying: “What will the king do to us? Let us kill this wicked wretch here and now! So in you go, you pest!” they cried, as they flung him into the water. When they made their way ashore, they were asked where the prince was, and replied, “We don’t see him; finding the storm come on, he must have come out of the river and gone home ahead of us.”

The courtiers went into the king’s presence, and the king asked where his son was. “We do not know, sire,” they said, “a storm came on, and we came away in the belief that he must have gone on ahead.” At once the king had the gates thrown open; down to the riverside he went and bade diligent search be made up and down for the missing prince. But no trace of him could be found. For, in the darkness of the storm, he had been swept away by the current, and, coming across a tree-trunk, had climbed on to it, and so floated down stream, crying lustily in the agony of his fear of drowning.
Now there had been a rich merchant living in those days at Benares, who had died, leaving forty crores buried in the banks of that same river. And because of his craving for riches, he was reborn as a snake at the spot under which lay his dear treasure. And also in the self-same spot another man had hidden thirty crores, and because of his craving for riches was reborn as a rat at the same spot. In rushed the water into their dwelling-place; and the two creatures, escaping by the way by which the water rushed in, were making their way across the stream, when they chanced upon the tree-trunk to which the prince was clinging. The snake climbed up at one end, and the rat at the other; and so both got a footing with the prince on the trunk.

Also there grew on the river’s bank a Silk-cotton tree, in which lived a young parrot; and this tree, being uprooted by the swollen waters, fell into the river. The heavy rain beat down the parrot when it tried to fly, and it alighted in its fall upon this same tree-trunk. And so there were now these four floating down, stream together upon the tree.

Now the Bodhisatta had been reborn in those days as a brahmin in the north-west country. Renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life on reaching manhood, he had built himself a hermitage by a bend of the river; and there he was now living. As he was pacing to and fro, at midnight, he heard the loud cries of the prince, and thought thus within himself, “This fellow-creature must not perish thus before the eyes of so merciful and compassionate an ascetic as I am. I will rescue him from the water, and save his life.” So he shouted cheerily, “Be not afraid! Be not afraid!” and plunging across stream, seized hold of the tree by one end, and, being as strong as an elephant, drew it in to the bank with one long pull, and set the prince safe and sound upon the shore. Then becoming aware of the snake and the rat and the parrot, he carried them to his hermitage, and there lighting a fire, warmed the animals first, as being the weaker, and afterwards the prince. This done, he brought fruits of various kinds and set them before his guests, looking after the animals first and the prince afterwards. This enraged the young prince, who said within himself, “This rascally ascetic pays no respect to my royal birth, but actually gives brute beasts precedence over me.” And he conceived hatred against the Bodhisatta!

A few days later, when all four had recovered their strength and the waters had subsided, the snake bade farewell to the ascetic with these words, “Father, you have done me a great service. I am not poor, for I have forty crores of gold hidden at a certain spot. Should you ever want money, all my hoard shall be yours. You have only to come to the spot and call ‘Snake.’ Next the rat took his leave with a like promise to the ascetic as to his treasure, biding the ascetic come and call out ‘Rat.’ {1.325} Then the parrot bade farewell, saying: “Father, silver and gold have I none; but should you ever want for choice rice, come to where I dwell and call out ‘Parrot;’ and I with the aid of my kinsfolk will give you many wagon-loads of rice.” Last came the prince. His heart was filled with base ingratitude and with a determination to put his benefactor to death, if the Bodhisatta should come to visit him. But, concealing his intent, he said: “Come, father, to me when I am king, and I will bestow on you the Four Requisites.” So saying, he took his departure, and not long after succeeded to the throne.

The desire came on the Bodhisatta to put their professions to the test; and first of all he went to the snake and standing nearby its abode, called out ‘Snake.’ At the word the snake darted forth and with every mark of respect said: “Father, in this place there are forty crones in gold. Dig them up and take them all.” “It is well,” said the Bodhisatta, “when I need them, I will not forget.” Then bidding adieu to the snake, he went on to where the rat lived, and called out ‘Rat.’ And the rat did as the snake had done. Going next to the parrot, and calling out ‘Parrot,’ the bird at once flew down at his call from the tree-top, and respectfully asked whether it was the Bodhisatta’s wish that he with the aid of his kinsfolk should gather paddy for the Bodhisatta from the region round the Himālayas. The Bodhisatta dismissed the parrot also with a promise that, if need arose, he would not forget the bird’s offer.

Last of all, being minded to test the king in his turn, the Bodhisatta came to the royal pleasure gardens, and on the day after his arrival made his way, carefully dressed, into the city on his round for alms. Just at that moment, the ungrateful king, seated in all his royal splendour on his elephant of state, was passing in solemn procession round the city followed by a vast retinue. Seeing the Bodhisatta from afar, he thought to himself, “Here’s that rascally ascetic come [1.180] to quarter himself and his appetite on me. I must have his head off before he can publish to the world the service he rendered me.” With this intent, he signed to his attendants, and, on their asking what was his pleasure, said: “I think yonder rascally ascetic is here to importune me. See that the pest does not come near my person, but seize and bind him; {1.326} flog him at every street-corner; and then march him out of the city, chop off his head at the place of execution, and impale his body on a stake.”

Obedient to their king’s command, the attendants laid the innocent Great Being in bonds and flogged him at every street-corner on the way to the place of execution. But all their floggings failed to move the Bodhisatta or to wring from him any cry of, “Oh, my mother and father!” All he did was to repeat this Stanza:

1. “They knew the world, who framed this proverb true—
   ‘A log pays better return than some men.’”

These lines he repeated wherever he was flogged, till at last the wise among the bystanders asked the ascetic what service he had rendered to their king. Then the Bodhisatta told the whole story, ending with the words, “So it comes to pass that by rescuing him from the torrent I brought all this woe upon myself. And when I bethink me how I have left unheeded the words of the wise of old, I exclaim as you have heard.”

Filled with indignation at the recital, the nobles and brahmins and all classes with one accord cried out, “This ungrateful king does not recognise even the goodness of this good man who saved his majesty’s life. How can we have any profit from this king? Seize the tyrant!” And in their anger they rushed upon the king from every side, and slew him there and then, as he rode on his elephant, with arrows and javelins and stones and clubs and any weapons that came to hand. The corpse they dragged by the heels to a ditch and flung it in. Then they anointed the Bodhisatta king and set him to rule over them.

As he was ruling in righteousness, one day the desire came on him again to try the snake and the rat and the parrot; and followed by a large retinue, he came to where the snake dwelt. At the call of ‘Snake,’ out came the snake from his hole and with every mark of respect said: “Here, my lord, is your treasure; take it.” Then the king delivered the forty crores of gold to his attendants, and proceeding to where the rat dwelt, called, ‘Rat.’ Out came the rat, and saluted the king, and gave up its thirty crores. Placing this treasure too in the hands of his attendants, the king went on to where the parrot dwelt, and called ‘Parrot.’ And in like manner the bird came, and bowing down at the king’s feet asked whether it should collect rice for his majesty. “We will not trouble you,” said the king, “till rice is needed. Now let us be going.”
So with the [1.181] seventy crores of gold, and with the rat, the snake, and the parrot as well, the king journeyed back to the city. Here, in a noble palace, to the top-floor of which he mounted, he caused the treasure to be lodged and guarded; he had a golden tube made for the snake to dwell in, a crystal casket to house the rat, and a cage of gold for the parrot. Every day too by the king’s command food was served to the three creatures in vessels of gold – sweet parched-corn for the parrot and snake, and scented rice for the rat. And the king abounded in generosity and all good works. Thus in harmony and goodwill one with another, these four lived their lives; and when their end came, they passed away to fare according to their deeds.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has gone about to kill me; he did the like in the past also.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the corrupt king in those days, Sāriputta the snake, Moggallāna the rat, Ānanda the parrot, and I myself the righteous king who won a kingdom.”

Ja 74 Rukkhadhammajātaka
The Story about the Way of Trees (1s)

In the present two kin tribes argue over the distribution of water. The Buddha tells a story of the past showing how, when trees stand together, they are strong and can withstand the winds, and when they are solitary, they are easily overthrown.

The Bodhisatta = the wise (Tree) Devatā (Paṇḍitadevatā), the Buddha’s disciples = the other Devatās (Devatā).

Past Source: Ja 35 Vaṭṭaka,
Quoted: Ja 536 Kuṇāla (Present).

Keywords: Concord, Unity, Devas.

“United, forest-like.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a quarrel concerning water which had brought woe upon his kinsfolk. Knowing of this, he passed through the air, sat cross-legged above the river Rohinī, and emitted rays of darkness, startling his kinsfolk. Then descending from mid-air, he seated himself on the riverbank and told this story with reference to that quarrel. (Only a summary is given here; the full details will be related in the Kuṇālajātaka [Ja 536].) But on this occasion the Teacher addressed his kinsfolk, {1.328} saying:
“It is meet, sire, that kinsfolk should dwell together in concord and unity. For, when kinsfolk are at one, enemies find no opportunity. Not to speak of human beings, even sense-lacking trees ought to stand together. For in bygone days in the Himālayas a tempest struck a Sāl-forest; yet, because the trees, shrubs, bushes, and creepers of that forest were interlaced one with another, the tempest could not overthrow even a single tree but passed harmlessly over their heads. But alone in a courtyard stood a mighty tree; and though it had many stems and branches, yet, because it was not united with other trees, the tempest uprooted it and laid it low. Wherefore, it is meet that you too should dwell together in concord and unity.” And so saying, at their request he told this story of the past. [1.182]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the first king Vessavaṇa died, and Sakka sent a new king to reign in his stead. After the change, the new king Vessavaṇa sent word to all trees and shrubs and bushes and plants, bidding the Tree Devatās each choose out the abode that they liked best. In those days the Bodhisatta had come to life as a Tree Devatā in a Sāl-forest in the Himālayas. His advice to his kinsfolk in choosing their habitations was to shun trees that stood alone in the open, and to take up their abodes all round the abode which he had chosen in that Sāl-forest. Hereon the wise Tree Devatās, following the Bodhisatta’s advice, took up their quarters round his tree. But the foolish ones said: “Why should we dwell in the forest? Let us rather seek out the haunts of men, and take up our abodes outside villages, towns, or capital cities. For Devatās who dwell in such places receive the richest offerings and the greatest worship.” So they departed to the haunts of men, and took up their abode in certain giant trees which grew in an open space.

Now it fell out upon a day that a mighty tempest swept over the country. Naught did it avail the solitary trees that years had rooted them deep in the soil and that they were the mightiest trees that grew. Their branches snapped; their stems were broken; and they themselves were uprooted and flung to earth by the tempest. But when it broke on the Sāl-forest of interlacing trees, its fury was in vain; for, attack where it might, not a tree could it overthrow.

[^314]: A name of Kuvera.
The forlorn Devatās whose dwellings were destroyed, took their children in their arms and journeyed to the Himālayas. There they told their sorrows to the Devatās of the Sāl-forest, [1.329] who in turn told the Bodhisatta of their sad return. “It was because they hearkened not to the words of wisdom, that they have been brought to this,” said he; and he unfolded the truth in this verse:

1. “United, forest-like, should kinsfolk stand;
The storm o'erthrows the solitary tree.”

So spake the Bodhisatta; and when his life was spent, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

And the Teacher went on to say, “Thus, sire, reflect how meet it is that kinsfolk at any rate should be united, and lovingly dwell together in concord and unity.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s followers were the fairies of those days, and I myself the wise Devatā.”

Ja 75 Macchājātaka
The Story about the Fish (1s)

In the present the whole country is suffering from a drought and all the waterways have dried up. The Buddha, however, wants to bathe so goes and stands on the edge of a dry pond. Sakka, seeing him there, orders the rain god to do his duty. The Buddha explains that in a past life he had also made it rain, when as a fish, he had made an asseration of the truth about his maintaining of the precepts.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the fish (maccharājā), Ānanda = the (rain) god Pajjunna (Pajjunnadevarājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the shoal of fish (macchagaṇa).

Past Compare: Cp 30 Maccharājacariyā, Jm 15 Matsya.

Keywords: Sakka, Pajjuna, Assertion, Animals, Fish.

“Pajjunna, thunder!” [1.183] This story the Teacher told while at Jetavana, about the rain he caused to fall. For in those days, so it is said, there fell no rain in Kosala; the crops withered; and everywhere the ponds, tanks, and lakes dried up. Even the pool of Jetavana by the embattled gateway of Jetavana gave out; and the fish and turtles buried themselves in the mud. Then came the crows and hawks with their lance-like beaks, and busily picked them out writhing and wriggling, and devoured them.

As he marked how the fishes and the turtles were being destroyed, the Teacher’s heart was moved with compassion, and he exclaimed, “This day \(1.330\) must I cause rain to fall.” So, when the night grew day, after attending to his bodily needs, he waited till it was the proper hour to go the round in quest of alms, and then, girt round by a host of the monks, and perfect with the perfection of a Buddha, he went into Sāvatthi for alms. On his way back to the monastery in the afternoon from his round for alms in Sāvatthi, he stopped upon the steps leading down to the tank of Jetavana, and thus addressed the elder Ānanda, “Bring me a bathing-dress, Ānanda; for I would bathe in the tank of Jetavana.” “But surely, sir,” replied the elder, “the water is all dried up, and only mud is left.” “Great is a Buddha’s power, Ānanda. Go, bring me the bathing-dress,” said the Teacher. So the elder went and brought the bathing-dress, which the Teacher donned, using one end to go round his waist, and covering his body up with the other. So clad, he took his stand upon the tank-steps, and exclaimed, “I would willingly bathe in the tank of Jetavana.”

That instant the yellow-stone throne of Sakka grew hot beneath him, and he sought to discover the cause. Realising what was the matter, he summoned the king of the Storm-Clouds, and said: “The Teacher is standing on the steps of the tank of Jetavana, and wishes to bathe. Make haste and pour down rain in a single torrent over all the kingdom of Kosala.” Obedient to Sakka’s command, the king of the Storm-Clouds clad himself in one cloud as an under garment, and another cloud as an outer garment, and chanting the rain-song, he darted forth eastward. And lo! he appeared in the east as a cloud of the size of a threshing-floor, which grew and grew till it was as big as a hundred, as a thousand, threshing-floors; and he thundered and lightened, and bending down his face and mouth deluged all Kosala with torrents of rain. Unbroken was the downpour, quickly filling the tank of Jetavana, and stopping only when the water was level with the topmost step. Then the Teacher bathed in the tank, and coming up out of the water donned his two orange-coloured cloths and his girdle, adjusting his Buddha-robe around him so as to leave one shoulder bare. In this guise he set forth, surrounded by the monks, and passed into his Perfumed Chamber, fragrant with sweet-smelling flowers. Here on the Buddha-seat he sat, and when the monks had performed their duties, he rose and exhorted the Saṅgha from the jewelled steps of his throne, and dismissed them from his presence. Passing now within his own sweet-smelling chamber, he stretched himself, lion-like, upon his right side.

At even, the monks gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, and dwelt on the forbearance and loving-kindness of the Teacher. “When the crops were withering, when the pools were drying up, and the fishes and turtles were in grievous plight, then did he in his compassion come forth as a saviour. Donning a bathing-dress, he stood on the steps of the tank of Jetavana, and in a little space made the rain to pour down from the heavens till it seemed like to overwhelm all Kosala with its torrents. And by the time he returned to the monastery, he had freed all alike from their tribulations both of mind and body.”

So ran their talk when the Teacher came forth from his Perfumed Chamber into the Dhamma Hall, and asked what was their theme of conversation; and they told him. “This is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that the Tathāgata has made the rain to fall in the hour of general need. He did the like when born into the brute-creation, in the days when he was king of the fish.” And so saying, he told this story of the past:

In the past, in this selfsame kingdom of Kosala and at Sāvatthi too, there was a pond where the tank of Jetavana now is—a pond fenced in by a tangle of climbing plants. Therein dwelt the Bodhisatta, who had come to life as a fish in those days. And, then as now, there was a drought in the land; the crops withered; water gave out in tank and pool; and the fishes and turtles buried themselves in the mud. Likewise, when the fishes and turtles of this pond had hidden themselves in its mud, the crows and other birds, flocking to the spot, picked them out with their beaks and devoured them. Seeing the fate of his kinsfolk, and knowing that none but he could save them in their hour of need, the Bodhisatta resolved to make a solemn Assertion of Truth, and by its efficacy to make rain fall from the heavens so as to save his kinsfolk from certain death. So, parting asunder the black mud, he came forth—a mighty fish, blackened with mud as a casket of the finest sandalwood which has been smeared with collyrium. Opening his eyes which were as washen rubies, and looking up to the heavens he thus bespoke Pajjunna, King of Devas, “My heart is heavy within me for my kinsfolk’s sake, my good Pajjunna. How comes it, pray, that, when I who am righteous am distressed for my kinsfolk, you send no rain from heaven? For I, though born where it is customary to prey on one’s kinsfolk, have never from my youth up devoured any fish, even of the size of a grain of rice; nor have I ever robbed a single living creature of its life. By the truth of this my Assertion, I call upon you to send rain and succour my kinsfolk.” Therewithal, he called to Pajjunna, King of Devas, as a master might call to a servant, in this verse: {1.332}

1. “Pajjunna, thunder! Baffle, thwart, the crow!
Breed sorrow’s pangs in him; ease me of woe!”

In such wise, as a master might call to a servant, did the Bodhisatta call to Pajjunna, thereby causing heavy rains to fall and relieving numbers from the fear of death. And when his life closed, he passed away to fare according to his deeds. [1.185]

“So this is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that the Tathāgata has caused the rain to fall. He did the like in bygone days, when he was a fish.” His lesson ended, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s disciples were the fishes of those days, Ānanda was Pajjunna, King of Devas, and I myself the king of the fish.”

Ja 76 Asaṅkiyajātaka
The Story about the Doubtless (1s)

In the present a faithful lay brother who is traveling with a caravan spends the night in walking meditation. Thieves, who think he is a watchman, miss their opportunity. When the Buddha hears of it he tells of something similar that happened in one of his own past lives as an ascetic.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tapasa),
the Buddha’s disciples = the caravan followers (satthavāsino).

Keywords: Mindfulness, Wakefulness.

“The village breeds no fear in me.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay brother who lived at Sāvatthi. Tradition says that this man, who had entered the Paths and was an earnest believer, was once journeying along on some business or other in the company of a leader of a caravan; in the jungle the carts were unyoked and a coral was constructed; and the good man began to pace up and down at the foot of a certain tree nearby the leader.
Now five hundred robbers, who had watched their time, had surrounded the spot, armed with bows, clubs, and other weapons, with the object of looting the encampment. [1.333] Still unceasingly that lay brother paced to and fro. “Surely that must be their sentry,” said the robbers when they noticed him, “we will wait till he is asleep and then loot them.” So, being unable to surprise the camp, they stopped where they were. Still that lay brother kept pacing to and fro – all through the first watch, all through the middle watch, and all through the last watch of the night. When day dawned, the robbers, who had never had their chance, threw down the stones and clubs which they had brought, and bolted.

His business done, that lay brother came back to Sāvatthi, and, approaching the Teacher, asked him this question, “In guarding themselves, sir, do men prove guardians of others?”

“Yes, lay brother. In guarding himself a man guards others; in guarding others, he guards himself.”

“Oh, how well-said, sir, is this utterance of the Fortunate One! When I was journeying with a caravan-leader, I resolved to guard myself by pacing to and fro at the foot of a tree, and by so doing I guarded the whole caravan.”

Said the Teacher, “Lay brother, in bygone days too the wise and good guarded others while guarding themselves.” And, so saying, at the lay brother’s request he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a brahmin. Arriving at years of discretion, he became aware of the evils that spring from sensual desires, and so forsook the [1.186] world to live as a recluse in the country round the Himālayas.

Need of salt and vinegar having led him to make a pilgrimage for alms through the countryside, he travelled in the course of his wanderings with a merchant’s caravan. When the caravan halted at a certain spot in the forest, he paced to and fro at the foot of a tree, nearby the caravan, enjoying the bliss of Absorption.

Now after supper five hundred robbers surrounded the coral to plunder it; but, noticing the ascetic, they halted, saying: “If he sees us, he’ll give the alarm; wait till he drops off to sleep, and then we’ll plunder them.” But all through the livelong night the ascetic continued to pace up and down; and never a chance did the robbers get! So they flung away their sticks and stones and shouted to the caravan-folk; “Hi, there! You of the caravan! If it hadn’t been for that ascetic walking about under the tree, we’d have plundered the lot of you. Mind and fête him tomorrow!” And so saying, they made off. When the night gave place to light, the people saw the clubs and stones which the robbers had cast away, and came in fear and trembling to ask the Bodhisatta with respectful salutation whether he had seen the robbers. “Oh, yes, I did, sirs,” he replied. “And were you not alarmed or afraid at the sight of so many robbers?” “No,” said the Bodhisatta, “the sight of robbers causes what is known as fear only to the rich. As for me – I am penniless; why should I be afraid? Whether I dwell in village or in forest, I never have any fear or dread.” And therewithal, to teach them the Dhamma, he repeated this verse:
The Section with One Verse – 400

1. “The village breeds no fear in me;
No forests me dismay.
I’ve won by love and generosity
Emancipation’s perfect way.”

When the Bodhisatta had thus taught the Dhamma in this verse to the people of the caravan, peace filled their hearts, and they showed him honour and veneration. All his life long he developed the four Divine Abidings, and then was reborn into the Brahmā Realm.

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s followers were the caravan-folk of those days, and I the ascetic.”

Ja 77 Mahāsupinajātaka315

The Story about the Great Dreams (1s)

In the present king Pasenadi had 16 dreams which leave him fearful. He asks his brahminical advisors and they suggest the dreams are inauspicious, and he should perform a great sacrifice to ward off the danger. The Buddha, however, assures him these are prophetic dreams about the bad times to come, and will not affect the good king himself.

315 cf. Sacy’s Kalilah and Dimnah, chapter 14; Benfey’s Pañcatantra § 225; JRAS. for 1893 page 509.
He then tells how these dreams were dreamt in a past life, and interpreted in a similar way.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tapasa),
Sāriputta = the brahmin student (māṇava),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Sacrifice, Fear, Pretexts.

“Bulls first, and trees.” [1.187] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about sixteen wonderful dreams. For in the last watch of one night (so tradition says) the king of Kosala, who had been asleep all the night, dreamed sixteen great dreams, {1.335} and woke up in great fright and alarm as to what they might portend for him. So strong was the fear of death upon him that he could not stir, but lay there huddled up on his bed. Now, when the night grew light, his brahmins and family priests came to him and with due obeisance asked whether his majesty had slept well.

“How could I sleep well, my teachers?” answered the king. “For just at daybreak I dreamed sixteen wonderful dreams, and I have been in terror ever since! Tell me, what it all means.”

“We shall be able to judge, on hearing them.”

Then the king told them his dreams, and asked what those visions would entail upon him.

The brahmins fell wringing their hands! “Why wring your hands, brahmins?” asked the king. “Because, sire, these are evil dreams.” “What will come of them?” said the king. “One of three calamities – harm to your kingdom, to your life, or to your riches.” “Is there a remedy, or is there not?” “Undoubtedly these dreams in themselves are so threatening as to be without remedy; but none the less we will find a remedy for them. Otherwise, what boots our much study and learning?” “What then do you propose to do to avert the evil?” “Wherever four roads meet, we would offer sacrifice, sire.” “My teachers,” cried the king in his terror, “my life is in your hands; make haste and work my safety.” “Large sums of money, and large supplies of food of every kind will be ours,” thought the exultant brahmins; and, bidding the king have no fear, they departed from the palace. Outside the town they dug a sacrificial pit and collected a host of fourfooted creatures, perfect and without blemish, and a multitude of birds. But still they discovered something lacking, and back they kept coming to the king to ask for this that and the other. Now their doings were watched by queen Mallikā, who came to the king and asked what made these brahmins keep coming to him.

“I envy you,” said the king, “a snake in your ear, and you not to know of it!”
“What does your majesty mean?” “I have dreamed, oh such unlucky dreams! The brahmins tell me they point to one of three calamities; and they are anxious to offer sacrifices to avert the evil. And this is what brings them here so often.” “But has your majesty consulted the chief brahmin both of this world and of the world of Devas?” “Who, pray, may he be, my dear?” asked the king. “Know you not that chief personage of all the world, the all-knowing and pure, the spotless master-brahmin? Surely, he, the Fortunate One, will understand your dreams. Go, ask him.” “And so I will, my queen,” said the king. And away he went to the monastery, saluted the Teacher, and sat down. “What, pray, brings your majesty here so early in the morning?” asked the Teacher in his sweet tones. “Sir,” said the king, “just before daybreak I dreamed sixteen wonderful dreams, which so terrified me that I told them to the brahmins. They told me that my dreams boded evil, and that to avert the threatened calamity they must offer sacrifice wherever four roads met. And so they are busy with their preparations, and many living creatures have the fear of death before their eyes. But I pray you, who are the chief personage in the world of men and Devas, you into whose ken comes all possible knowledge of things past and present and to be – I pray you tell me what will come of my dreams, O Fortunate One.” [1.188] “True it is, sire, that there is none other save me, who can tell what your dreams signify or what will come of them. I will tell you. Only first of all relate to me your dreams as they appeared to you.”

“I will, sir,” said the king, and at once began this list, following the order of the dREAMS’ APPEARANCE:

“Bulls first, and trees, and cows, and calves,
Horse, dish, female jackal, waterpot,
A pond, raw rice, and sandalwood,
And gourds that sank, and stones that swam, 316
With frogs that gobbled up black snakes,
A crow with colourful retinue,
And wolves in panic-fear of goats!”

1. “How was it, sir, that I had the following one of my dreams? I thought, four black bulls, like collyrium in hue, came from the four cardinal directions to the royal courtyard with avowed intent to fight; and people flocked together to see the bull-fight, till a great crowd had gathered. But the bulls only made a show of fighting, roared and bellowed, and finally went off without fighting at all. This was my first dream. What will come of it?”

“How was it, sir, that I had the following one of my dreams? I thought, four black bulls, like collyrium in hue, came from the four cardinal directions to the royal courtyard with avowed intent to fight; and people flocked together to see the bull-fight, till a great crowd had gathered. But the bulls only made a show of fighting, roared and bellowed, and finally went off without fighting at all. This was my first dream. What will come of it?”

“How was it, sir, that I had the following one of my dreams? I thought, four black bulls, like collyrium in hue, came from the four cardinal directions to the royal courtyard with avowed intent to fight; and people flocked together to see the bull-fight, till a great crowd had gathered. But the bulls only made a show of fighting, roared and bellowed, and finally went off without fighting at all. This was my first dream. What will come of it?”

“How was it, sir, that I had the following one of my dreams? I thought, four black bulls, like collyrium in hue, came from the four cardinal directions to the royal courtyard with avowed intent to fight; and people flocked together to see the bull-fight, till a great crowd had gathered. But the bulls only made a show of fighting, roared and bellowed, and finally went off without fighting at all. This was my first dream. What will come of it?”

“Sire, that dream shall have no issue in your days or in mine. But hereafter, when kings shall be stingy and unrighteous, and when folk shall be unrighteous, in days when the world is perverted, when good is waning and evil waxing apace – in those days of the world’s discontent there shall fall no rain from the heavens, the feet of the storm shall be lamed, the crops shall wither, and famine shall be on the land. Then shall the clouds gather as if for rain from the four quarters of the heavens; there shall be haste first to carry indoors the rice and crops that the women have spread in the sun to dry, for fear the harvest should get wet; and then with spade and basket in hand the men shall go forth to bank up the dykes. As though in sign of coming rain, the thunder shall bellow, the lightning shall flash from the clouds – but even as the bulls in your dream that fought not, so the clouds shall flee away without raining. This is what shall come of this dream. But no harm shall come therefrom to you; {1.337} for it was with regard to the future that you dreamed this dream. What the brahmins told you, was said only to get themselves a livelihood.” And when the Teacher had thus told the fulfilment of this dream, he said: “Tell me your second dream, sire.”

2. “Sir,” said the king, “my second dream was after this manner: I thought little tiny trees and shrubs burst through the soil, and when they had grown scarce a span or two high, they flowered and bore fruit! This was my second dream; what shall come of it?”

---

316 See Mahāvīracarita, p. 13, Mahābhārata, ii. 2196.
“Sire,” said the Teacher, “this dream shall have its fulfilment in days when the world has fallen into decay and when men are shortlived. In times to come the passions shall be strong; quite young girls shall go to live with men, and it shall be with them after the manner of women, they shall conceive and bear children. The flowers typify their issues, and the fruit their offspring. But you, sire, have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your third dream, O great king.”

3. “I thought, sir, I saw cows sucking the milk of calves which they had borne that self-same day. This was my third dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall have its fulfilment only in days to come, when respect shall cease to be paid to age. For in the future men, showing no reverence for parents or parents-in-law, shall themselves administer the family estate, and, if such be their good pleasure, shall bestow food and clothing on the old folks, but shall withhold their gifts, if it be not their pleasure to give. Then shall the old folks, destitute and dependent, exist by favour of their own children, like big cows suckled by calves a day old. But you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your fourth dream.” [1.189]

4. “I thought, sir, I saw men unyoking a team of draught-oxen, sturdy and strong, and setting young steers to draw the load; and the steers, proving unequal to the task laid on them, refused and stood stock-still, so that wagons moved not on their way. This was my fourth dream. What shall come of it?”

“Here again the dream shall not have its fulfilment until the future, in the days of unrighteous kings. For in days to come, unrighteous and stingy kings shall show no honour to wise lords skilled in precedent, fertile in expedient, and able to get through business; nor shall appoint to the courts of law and justice aged councillors of wisdom and of learning in the Dhamma. Nay, they shall honour the very young and foolish, and appoint such to preside in the courts. And these latter, ignorant alike of state-craft and of practical knowledge, shall not be able to bear the burden of their honours or to govern, but because of their incompetence shall throw off the yoke of office. Whereon the aged and wise lords, albeit right able to cope with all difficulties, shall keep in mind how they were passed over, and shall decline to aid, saying: ‘It is no business of ours; we are outsiders; let the boys of the inner circle see to it.’ [1.338] Hence they shall stand aloof, and ruin shall assail those kings on every hand. It shall be even as when the yoke was laid on the young steers, who were not strong enough for the burden, and not upon the team of sturdy and strong draught-oxen, who alone were able to do the work. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your fifth dream.”

5. “I thought, sir, I saw a horse with a mouth on either side, to which fodder was given on both sides, and it ate with both its mouths. This was my fifth dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall have its fulfilment only in the future, in the days of unrighteous and foolish kings, who shall appoint unrighteous and covetous men to be judges. These base ones, fools, despising the good, shall take bribes from both sides as they sit in the seat of judgment, and shall be filled with this two-fold corruption, even as the horse that ate fodder with two mouths at once. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your sixth dream.”

6. “I thought, sir, I saw people holding out a well-scoured golden bowl worth a hundred thousand pieces, and begging an old jackal to stale therein. And I saw the beast do so. This was my sixth dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall only have its fulfilment in the future. For in the days to come, unrighteous kings, though sprung of a race of kings, mistrusting the scions of their old nobility, shall not honour them, but exalt in their stead the low-born; whereby the nobles shall be brought low and the low-born raised to lordship. Then shall the great families be brought by very need to seek to live by dependence on the upstarts, and shall offer them their daughters in marriage. And the union of the noble maidens with the low-born shall be like unto the urinating of the old jackal in the golden bowl. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your seventh dream.”

7. “A man was weaving rope, sir, and as he wove, he threw it down at his feet. Under his bench lay a hungry female jackal, which kept eating the rope as he wove, but without the man knowing it. This is what I saw. This was my seventh dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future. For in days to come, women shall lust after men and strong drink and finery and gadding abroad and 317 cf. the story of Ocnus in Pausanias x. 29.

The joys of this world. In their wickedness and profligacy these women shall drink strong drink with their lovers; they shall flaunt in garlands and perfumes and unguents; and heedless of even the most pressing of their household duties, they shall keep watching for their lovers, even at crevices high up in the outer wall; aye, they shall pound up the very seed-corn that should be sown on the morrow so as to provide good cheer; in all these ways shall they plunder the store won by the hard work of their husbands in field and byre, devouring the poor men’s substance even as the hungry jackal under the bench ate up the rope of the rope-maker as he wove it. [1.339] Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom.
Tell me your eighth dream.” [1.190]

8. “I thought, sir, I saw at a palace gate a big pitcher which was full to the brim and stood amid a number of empty ones. And from the four cardinal points, and from the four intermediate points as well, there kept coming a constant stream of people of all the four castes, carrying water in pots and pouring it into the full pitcher. And the water overflowed and ran away. But none the less they still kept on pouring more and more water into the over-flowing vessel, without a single man giving so much as a glance at the empty pitchers. This was my eighth dream.
What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment until the future. For in days to come the world shall decay; the kingdom shall grow weak, its kings shall grow poor and stingy; the foremost among them shall have no more than 100,000 pieces of money in his treasury. Then shall these kings in their need set the whole of the country-folk to work for them; for the kings’ sake shall the toiling folk, leaving their own work, sow grain and pulse, and keep watch and reap and thresh and garner; for the kings’ sake shall they plant sugar-canes, make and drive sugar-mills, and boil down the molasses; for the kings’ sake shall they lay out flower-gardens and orchards, and gather in the fruits. And as they gather in all the divers kinds of produce they shall fill the royal garners to overflowing, not giving so much as a glance at their own empty barns at home. Thus it shall be like filling up the full pitcher, heedless of the quite-empty ones. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your ninth dream.”

9. “I thought, sir, I saw a deep pool with shelving banks all round and over-grown with the five kinds of lotuses. From every side two-footed creatures and four-footed creatures flocked there to drink of its waters. The depths in the middle were muddy, but the water was clear and sparkling at the margin where the various creatures went down into the pool. This was my ninth dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future. For in days to come kings shall grow unrighteous; they shall rule after their own will and pleasure, and shall not execute judgment according to righteousness. These kings shall hunger after riches and wax fat on bribes; they shall not show mercy, love and compassion toward their people, but be fierce and cruel, amassing wealth by crushing their subjects like sugar-canes in a mill and by taxing them even to the uttermost farthing. Unable to pay the oppressive tax, the people shall fly from village and town and the like, and take refuge upon the borders of the realm; the heart of the land shall be a wilderness, while the borders shall teem with people – even as the water was muddy in the middle of the pool and clear at the margin. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. {1.340} Tell me your tenth dream.”

10. “I thought, sir, I saw rice boiling in a pot without getting done. By not getting done, I mean that it looked as though it were sharply marked off and kept apart, so that the cooking went on in three distinct stages. For part was sodden, part hard and raw, and part just cooked to a nicety. This was my tenth dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future. For in days to come kings shall grow unrighteous; the people surrounding the kings shall grow unrighteous too, as also shall brahmins and householders, townsmen, and countryfolk; yes, all people alike shall grow unrighteous, not excepting even sages and brahmins. Next, their very tutelary deities – the spirits to whom they offer sacrifice, the spirits of the trees, and the spirits of the air – shall become unrighteous also. The very winds that blow over the realms of these unrighteous kings shall grow cruel and lawless; they shall shake the mansions of the skies and thereby kindle the anger of the spirits that dwell there, so that they will not suffer rain to fall – or, if it does rain, it shall not fall on all the kingdom at once, nor shall the kindly shower fall on all tilled or sown lands alike to help them in their need. And, as in the kingdom at large, so in each several district and village and over each separate pool or lake, the rain shall not fall at one and the same time on its whole expanse; if it rain on the upper part, it shall not rain upon the lower; here the crops shall be spoiled by a heavy downpour, [1.191] there wither for very drought, and here again thrive apace with kindly showers to water them. So the crops sown within the confines of a single kingdom – like the rice in the one pot – shall have no uniform character. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your eleventh dream.”

11. “I thought, sir, I saw sour buttermilk bartered for precious sandalwood, worth 100,000 pieces of money. This was my eleventh dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future – in the days when my dispensation is waning. For in days to come many greedy and shameless monks shall arise, who for their belly’s sake shall preach the very words in which I inveighed against greed! Because they have deserted by reason of their belly and have taken their stand on the side of the sectaries, they shall fail to make their preaching lead up to Nibbāna. Nay, their only thought, as they preach, shall be by fine words and sweet voices to induce men to give them costly raiment and the like, and to be minded to give such gifts. Others again seated in the highways, at the street-corners, at the doors of kings’ palaces, and so forth, shall stoop to preach for money, yes for mere coined kahāpanas, half-kahāpanas, pādas, or māsakas! And as they thus barter away for food or raiment or for kahāpanas and half-kahāpanas my Dhamma the worth whereof is Nibbāna, they shall be even as those who bartered away for sour buttermilk precious sandalwood worth 100,000 pieces. {1.341} Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your twelfth dream.”

12. “I thought, sir, I saw empty pumpkins sinking in the water. What shall come of it?”

“This dream also shall not have its fulfilment till the future, in the days of unrighteous kings, when the world is perverted. For in those days shall kings show favour not to the scions of the nobility, but to the low-born only; and these latter shall become great lords, while the nobles sink into poverty. Alike in the royal presence, in the palace gates, in the council chamber, and in the courts of justice,

---

318 Reading titthakarāṇaṁ pakkhe, as conjectured by Fausböll.
319 See Vinaya ii. 294 for the same list; and see page 6 of Rhys Davids’ “Ancient Coins and Measures of Ceylon” in Numismata Orientalia (Trübner).
the words of the low-born alone (whom the empty pumpkins typify) shall be established, as though they had sunk down till they rested on the bottom. So too in the assemblies of the Saṅgha, in the greater and lesser conclaves, and in enquiries regarding bowls, robes, lodging, and the like – the counsel only of the wicked and the vile shall be considered to have saving power, not that of the modest monks. Thus everywhere it shall be as when the empty pumpkins sank. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your thirteenth dream.”

13. Hereupon the king said: “I thought, sir, I saw huge blocks of solid rock, as big as houses, floating like ships upon the waters. What shall come of it?”

“This dream also shall not have its fulfilment before such times as those of which I have spoken. For in those days unrighteous kings shall show honour to the low-born, who shall become great lords, while the nobles sink into poverty. Not to the nobles, but to the upstarts alone shall respect be paid. In the royal presence, in the council chamber, or in the courts of justice, the words of the nobles learned in the Dhamma (and it is they whom the solid rocks typify) shall drift idly by, and not sink deep into the hearts of men; when they speak, the upstarts shall merely laugh them to scorn, saying, ‘What is this these fellows are saying?’ So too in the assemblies of the monks, as aforesaid, men shall not deem worthy of respect the excellent among the monks; the words of such shall not sink deep, but drift idly by – even as when the rocks floated upon the waters. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your fourteenth dream.”

14. “I thought, sir, I saw tiny frogs, no bigger than minute flowerets, swiftly pursuing huge black snakes, chopping them up like so many lotus-stalks and gobbling them up. What shall come of this?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till those days to come such as those of which I have spoken, when the world is decaying. For then shall men’s passions be so strong, and their sensual desires so hot, that they shall be the thralls of the very youngest of their wives for the time being, at whose sole disposal shall be slaves and hired servants, oxen, buffaloes and all cattle, gold and silver, and everything that is in the house. Should the poor husband ask where the money (say) or a robe is, at once he shall be told that it is where it is, that he should mind his own business, and not be so inquisitive as to what is, or is not, in her house. And therewithal in divers ways the wives with abuse and goading taunts shall establish their dominion over their husbands, as over slaves and bond-servants.
1.342} Thus shall it be like as when the tiny frogs, no bigger than minute flowerets, gobbled up the big black snakes. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your fifteenth dream.”

15. “I thought, sir, I saw a village crow, in which dwelt the whole of the Ten Vices, escorted by a retinue of those birds which, because of their golden sheen, are called Royal Golden Mallards. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future, till the reign of weakling kings. In days to come kings shall arise who shall know nothing about elephants or other arts, and shall be cowards in the field. Fearing to be deposed and cast from their royal estate, they shall raise to power not their peers but their footmen, bath-attendants, barbers, and such like. Thus, shut out from royal favour and unable to support themselves, the nobles shall be reduced to dancing attendance on the upstarts – as when the crow had Royal Golden Mallards for a retinue. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. Tell me your sixteenth dream.”

16. “Heretofore, sir, it always used to be panthers that preyed on goats; but I thought I saw goats chasing panthers and devouring them – munch, munch, munch! – while at bare sight of the goats afar off, terror-stricken wolves fled quaking with fear and hid themselves in their fastnesses in the thicket. Such was my dream. What shall come of it?”

“This dream too shall not have its fulfilment till the future, till the reign of unrighteous kings. In those days the low-born shall be raised to lordship and be made royal favourites, while the nobles shall sink into obscurity and distress. Gaining influence in the courts of law because of their favour with the king, these upstarts shall claim perforce the ancestral estates, the raiment, and all the property of the old nobility. And when these latter plead their rights before the courts, then shall the king’s minions have them cudgelled and bastinadoed and taken by the throat and cast out with words of scorn, such as: ‘Know your place, fools! What? Do you dispute with us? The king shall know of your insolence, and we will have your hands and feet chopped off and other correctives applied!’ Hereupon the terrified nobles shall affirm that their own belongings really belong to the overbearing upstarts, and will tell the favourites to accept them. And they shall get them home and there cower in an agony of fear. Likewise, evil monks shall harry at pleasure good and worthy monks, till these latter, finding none to help them, shall flee to the jungle. And this oppression of the nobles and of the good monks by the low-born and by the evil monks, shall be like the scaring of wolves by goats. Howbeit, you have nothing to fear therefrom. For this dream too has reference to future times only. \{1.343\} It was not truth, it was not love for you, that prompted the brahmins to prophesy as they did. No, it was greed of gain, and the insight that is bred of covetousness, that shaped all their self-seeking utterances.”

Thus did the Teacher expound the import of these sixteen great dreams, adding, “You, sire, are not the first to have these dreams; they were dreamed by kings of bygone days also; and, then as now, the brahmins found in them a pretext for sacrifices; whereupon, at the instance of the wise and good, the Bodhisatta was consulted, and the dreams were expounded by them of old time \[1.193\] in just the same manner as they have now been expounded.” And so saying, at the king’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in the north country. When he came to years of discretion he renounced the world for an ascetic’s life; he won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and dwelt in the Himālayas in the bliss that comes from Absorption.

In those days, in just the same manner, Brahmadatta dreamed these dreams at Benares, and enquired of the brahmins concerning them. And the brahmins, then as now, set to work at sacrifices. Amongst them was a young brahmin of learning and wisdom, a pupil of the king’s family priest, who addressed his master thus, “Teacher, you have taught me the Three Vedas. Is there not therein a text that says ‘The slaying of one creature gives not life to another’?” “My son, this means money to us, a great deal of money. You only seem anxious to spare the king’s treasury!” “Do as you will, master,” said the young brahmin, “as for me, to what end shall I tarry longer here with you?” And so saying, he left him, and betook himself to the royal pleasure gardens.

That self-same day the Bodhisatta, knowing all this, thought to himself, “If I visit today the haunts of men, I shall work the deliverance of a great multitude from their bondage.” So, passing through the air, he alighted in the royal pleasure gardens and seated himself, radiant as a statue of gold, upon the Ceremonial Stone. The young brahmin drew near and with due obeisance seated himself by the Bodhisatta in all friendliness. Sweet converse passed; and the Bodhisatta asked whether the young brahmin thought the king ruled righteously. “Sir,” answered the young man, “the king is righteous himself; but the brahmins make him side with evil. Being consulted by the king as to sixteen dreams which he had dreamed, the brahmins clutched at the opportunity for sacrifices and set to work thereby. Oh, sir, would it not be a good thing that you should offer to make known to the king the real import of his dreams and so deliver great numbers of creatures from their dread?” “But, my son, I do not know the king, nor he me. Still, if he should come here and ask me, I will tell him.” “I will bring the king, sir,” said the young brahmin, “if you will only be so good as to wait here a minute till I come back.” And having gained the Bodhisatta’s consent, he went before the king, and said that there had alighted in the royal pleasure gardens an air-travelling ascetic, who said he would expound the king’s dreams; would not his majesty relate them to this ascetic?

When the king heard this, he repaired at once to the pleasure gardens with a large retinue. Saluting the ascetic, he sat down by the holy man’s side, and asked whether it was true that he knew what would come of his dreams. “Certainly, sire,” said the Bodhisatta, “but first let me hear the dreams as you dreamed them.” “Readily, sir,” answered the king; and he began as follows:

1. “Bulls first, and trees, and cows, and calves,
   Horse, dish, female jackal, waterpot,
   A pond, raw rice, and sandalwood,
   And gourds that sank, and stones that swam,
   With frogs that gobbled up black snakes,
   A crow with colourful retinue,
   And wolves in panic-fear of goats.”

And his majesty went on to tell his dreams in just the same manner as that in which king Pasenadi had described them.

“And enough,” said the Great Being, “you have nothing to fear or dread from all this.” Having thus reassured the king, and having freed a great multitude from bondage, the Bodhisatta again took up his position in mid-air, whence he exhorted the king and established him in the Five Precepts, ending with these words, “Henceforth, O king, join not with the brahmins in slaughtering animals for sacrifice.” His teaching ended, the Bodhisatta passed straight through the air to his own abode.
And the king, remaining steadfast in the teaching he had heard, passed away after a life of alms-giving and other good works to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher said: “You have nothing to fear from these dreams; away with the sacrifice!” Having had the sacrifice removed, and having saved the lives of a multitude of creatures, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days, Sāriputta the young brahmin, and I the ascetic.”

(Pāli note. But after the passing of the Fortunate One, the editors of the Great Redaction put the three first lines into the Commentary, and making the lines from 'And gourds that sank' into one verse (therewith), put the whole story into the First Book.)

Ja 78 Illīsajātaka

The Story about (the Selfish Wealthy Man) Illīsa (1s)

Alternative Title: Illisajātaka (Cst)

In the present a miser is converted by Ven. Moggallāna and becomes a generous man. The Buddha tells how something similar happened in a past life when a renowned miser was converted by Sakka, his former father, who had attained the position of King of the Devas by his generosity.

The Bodhisatta = the barber (kappaka),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Moggallāna = (the King of the Devas) Sakka, the selfish wealthy man = Illīsa, the selfish wealthy man (Illiso macchariyaseṭṭhi).

Past Compare: Ja 78 Illīsa, Ja 535 Sudhābhojana, Dhp-a IV.5 Macchariyakosiya, Quoted at: Ja 470 Kosiya.

Keywords: Generosity, Selfishness, Devas.

“Both squint.” [1.195] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a miserly Lord High Treasurer. Hard by the city of Rājagaha, as we are told, was

---

320 [The Commentator appears to be trying to explain why the one verse is 7 lines long, which is unusual indeed.]
a town named Jagghery, and here dwelt a certain Lord High Treasurer, known as the Millionaire Miser, who was worth eighty crores! Not so much as the tiniest drop of oil that a blade of grass will take up, did he either give away or consume for his own enjoyment. So he made no use of all his wealth either for his family or for sages and brahmins: it remained unenjoyed – like a pool haunted by Rakkhasas. Now, it fell out on a day that the Teacher arose at dawn moved with a great compassion, and as he reviewed those ripe for conversion throughout the universe, he became aware that this Treasurer with his wife some four hundred miles away were destined to tread the paths of emancipation.

Now the day before, the Lord High Treasurer had gone his way to the palace to wait upon the king, and was on his homeward way when he saw a country-bumpkin, who was quite empty within, eating a cake stuffed with gruel. The sight awoke a craving within him! But, after arriving at his own house, be thought to himself, “If I say I should like a stuffed cake, a whole host of people will want to share my meal; and that means getting through ever so much of my rice and ghee and sugar. I mustn’t say a word to a soul.” So he walked about, wrestling with his craving. As hour after hour passed, he grew yellower and yellower, and the veins stood out like cords on his emaciated frame. Unable at last to bear it any longer, he went to his own room and lay down hugging his bed. But still not a word would he say to a soul for fear of wasting his substance! Well, his wife came to him, and, stroking his back, said: “What is the matter, my husband?”

“Nothing,” said he. “Perhaps the king has been cross to you?” “No, he has not.” “Have your children or servants done anything to annoy you?” “Nothing of that kind, either.” “Well, then, have you a craving for anything?” But still not a word would he say – all because of his preposterous fear that he might waste his substance; but lay there speechless on his bed. “Speak, husband,” said the wife, “tell me what you have a craving for.” “Yes,” said he with a gulp, “I have got a craving for one thing.” “And what is that, my husband?” “I should like a stuffed cake to eat!” “Now why not have said so at once? You’re rich enough! I’ll cook cakes enough to feast the whole town of Jagghery.” “Why trouble about them? They must work to earn their own meal.” “Well then, I’ll cook only enough for our street.” “How rich you are!” “Then, I’ll cook just enough for our own household.” “How extravagant you are!” “Very good, I’ll cook only enough for our children.” “Why bother about them?” “Very good then, I’ll only provide for our two selves.” “Why should you be in it?” “Then, I'll cook just enough for you alone,” said the wife.

“Softly,” said the Lord High Treasurer, “there are a lot of people on the watch for signs of cooking in this place. Pick out broken rice – being careful to leave the whole grain – and take a brazier and cooking-pots and just a very little milk and ghee and honey and molasses; then up with you to the seventh story of the house and do the cooking up there. There I will sit alone and undisturbed to eat.”

Obedient to his wishes, the wife had all the necessary things carried up, climbed all the way up herself, sent the servants away, and dispatched word to the Treasurer to come. Up he climbed, shutting and bolting door after door as he ascended, till at last he came to the seventh floor, the door of which he also shut fast. Then he sat down. His wife lit the fire in the brazier, put her pot on, and set about cooking the cakes. [1.196]

Now in the early morning, the Teacher had said to the elder Great Moggallāna, “Moggallāna, this Miser Millionaire {1.347} in the town of Jagghery near Rājagaha, wanting to eat cakes himself, is so afraid of letting others know, that he is having them cooked for him right up on the seventh story. Go there; convert the man to self-denial, and by transcendental power transport husband and wife, cakes, milk, ghee and all, here to Jetavana. This day I and the five hundred monks will stay at home, and I will make the cakes furnish them with a meal.”

Obedient to the Teacher’s bidding, the elder by his Supernormal Powers passed to the town of Jagghery, and rested in mid-air before the chamber-window, duly clad in his under and outer cloths, bright as a jewelled image. The unexpected sight of the elder made the Lord High Treasurer quake with fear. Thought he to himself, “It was to escape such visitors that I climbed up here: and now there’s one of them at the window!” And, failing to realise the comprehension of that which he must needs comprehend, he sputtered with rage, like sugar and salt thrown on the fire, as he burst out with, “What will you get, sage, by your simply standing in mid-air? Why, you may pace up and down till you’ve made a path in the pathless air – and yet you’ll still get nothing.”

The elder began to pace to and fro in his place in the air! “What will you get by pacing to and fro?” said the Treasurer! “You may sit cross-legged in meditation in the air – but still you’ll get nothing.” The elder sat down with legs crossed! Then said the Treasurer, “What will you get by sitting there? You may come and stand on the window-sill; but even that won’t get you anything!” The elder took his stand on the window-sill. “What will you get by standing on the window-sill? Why, you may belch smoke, and yet you’ll still get nothing!” said the Treasurer. Then the elder belched forth smoke till the whole palace was filled with it. The Treasurer’s eyes began to smart as though pricked with needles; and, for fear at last that his house might be set on fire, he checked himself from adding, “You won’t get anything even if you burst into flames.” Thought he to himself, “This elder is most persistent! He simply won’t go away empty-handed! I must have just one cake given him.” So he said to his wife, “My dear, cook one little cake and give it to the sage to get rid of him.”

So she mixed quite a little dough in a crock. But the dough swelled and swelled till it filled the whole crock, and grew to be a great big cake! “What a lot you must have used!” exclaimed the Treasurer at the sight. And he himself with the tip of a spoon took a very little of the dough, and put that in the oven to bake. But that tiny piece of dough grew larger than the first lump; and, one after another, every piece of dough he took became ever so big! Then he lost heart and said to his wife, “You give him a cake, dear.” But, as soon as she took one cake from the basket, at once all the other cakes stuck fast to it. So she cried out to her husband that all the cakes had stuck together, and that she could not part them.

“Oh, I’ll soon part them,” said he – but found he could not!

Then husband and wife both took hold of the mass of cakes at the corner and tried to get them apart. But tug as they might, they could make no more impression together on the mass than they did singly. Now as the Treasurer was pulling away at the cakes, he burst into a perspiration, and his craving left him. Then said he to his wife, “I don’t want the cakes; give them, basket and all, to this ascetic.” And she approached the elder with the basket in her hand. Then the elder preached the Dhamma to the pair, and proclaimed the excellence of the Three Jewels. And, teaching that giving was true sacrifice, he made the fruits of generosity and other good works to shine forth even as the full-moon in the heavens. Won by the elder’s words, the Treasurer said: “Sir, come here and sit on this couch to eat your cakes.”

“Lord High Treasurer,” said the elder, “the Supreme Buddha with five hundred monks sits in the monastery waiting for a meal of cakes. If such be your good pleasure, I would ask you to bring your wife and the cakes with you, and let us be going to the Teacher.” “But where, sir, is the Teacher at the present [1.197] time?” “Five and forty leagues away, in the monastery at Jetavana.” “How are we to get all that way, sir, without losing a long time on the road?” “If it be your pleasure, Lord High Treasurer, I will transport you there by my Supernormal Powers. The head of the staircase in your house shall remain where it is, but the bottom shall be at the main-gate of Jetavana. In this wise will I transport you to the Teacher in the time which it takes to go downstairs.” “So be it, sir,” said the Treasurer.

Then the elder, keeping the top of the staircase where it was, commanded, saying: “Let the foot of the staircase be at the main-gate of Jetavana.” And so it came to pass! In this way did the elder transport the Treasurer and his wife to Jetavana quicker than they could get down the stairs.

Then husband and wife came before the Teacher and said meal-time had come. And the Teacher, passing into the Refectory, sat down on the Buddha-seat prepared for him, with the Saṅgha gathered round. Then the Lord High Treasurer poured the Water of Donation over the hands of the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, while his wife placed a cake in the alms-bowl of the Tathāgata. Of this he took what sufficed to support life, as also did the five hundred monks. Next the Treasurer went round offering milk mixed with ghee and honey and jagghery; and the Teacher and the Saṅgha brought their meal to a close. Lastly the Treasurer and his wife ate their fill, but still there seemed no end to the cakes. Even when all the monks and the scrap-eaters throughout the monastery had all had a share, still there was no sign of the end approaching. So they told the Teacher, saying: “Sir, the supply of cakes grows no smaller.”

“So then throw them down by the great gate of the monastery.”

So they threw them away in a cave not far from the gateway; and to this day a spot called ‘The Pancake,’ is shown at the extremity of that cave.

The Lord High Treasurer and his wife approached and stood before the Fortunate One, who returned thanks; and at the close of his words of thanks, the pair attained Fruition of the First Path. Then, taking their leave of the Teacher, the two mounted the stairs at the great gate and found themselves in their own home once more. (1.349) Afterwards, the Lord High Treasurer lavished eighty crores of money solely on the dispensation the Buddha taught.
Next day the Perfect Buddha, returning to Jetavana after a round for alms in Sāvatthi, delivered a Sugata’s discourse to the monks before retiring to the seclusion of the Perfumed Chamber. At evening, the monks gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, and exclaimed, “How great is the power of the elder Moggallāna! In a moment he converted a miser to generosity, brought him with the cakes to Jetavana, set him before the Teacher, and established him in safety. How great is the power of the elder!” As they sat talking thus of the goodness of the elder, the Teacher entered, and, on enquiry, was told of the subject of their talk. “Monks,” said he, “a monk who is the converter of a household, should approach that household without causing it annoyance or vexation – even as the bee when it sucks the nectar from the flower; in such wise should he draw nigh to declare the excellence of the Buddha.” And in praise of the elder Moggallāna, he recited this verse [Dhp 49]:

Like bees, that harm no flower’s scent or hue
But, laden with its honey, fly away,
So, sage, within your village walk your way.

Then, to set forth still more the elder’s goodness, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that the miserly Treasurer has been converted by Moggallāna. In other days too the elder converted him, and taught him how deeds and their effects are linked together.” So saying, he told this story of the past. [1.198]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there was a Treasurer, Illīsa by name, who was worth eighty crores, and had all the defects which fall to the lot of man. He was lame and crook-backed and had a squint; he was an unconverted infidel, and a miser, never giving of his store to others, nor enjoying it himself; his house was like a pool haunted by Rakkhasas. Yet, for seven generations, his ancestors had been bountiful, giving freely of their best; but, when he became Treasurer, he broke through the traditions of his house. Burning down the alms house and driving the poor with blows from his gates, he hoarded his wealth.

One day, when he was returning from attendance on the king, he saw a yokel, who had journeyed far and was weary, seated on a bench, and filling a mug from a jar of rank spirits, and drinking it off, with a dainty morsel of stinking dried-fish as a relish. The sight made the Treasurer feel a thirst for spirits, but he thought to himself, {1.350} “If I drink, others will want to drink with me, and that means a ruinous expense.” So he walked about, keeping his thirst under control. But, as time wore on, he could do so no longer; he grew as yellow as old cotton; and the veins stood out on his sunken frame. On a day, retiring to his chamber, he lay down hugging his bed. His wife came to him, and rubbed his back, as she asked, “What has gone amiss with my lord?”

(What follows is to be told in the words of the former story.)

But, when she in her turn said: “Then I’ll only brew liquor enough for you,” he said: “If you make the brew in the house, there will be many on the watch; and to send out for the spirits and sit and drink it here, is out of the question.” So he produced one single penny, and sent a slave to fetch him a jar of spirits from the tavern. When the slave came back, he made him go from the town to the riverside and put the jar down in a remote thicket. “Now be off!” said he, and made the slave wait some distance off, while he filled his cup and fell to.

Now the Treasurer’s father, who for his generosity and other good works had been reborn as Sakka in the Realm of Devas, was at that moment wondering whether his bounty was still kept up or not, and became aware of the stopping of his bounty, and of his son’s behaviour. He saw how his son, breaking through the traditions of his house, had burnt the alms house to the ground, had driven the poor with blows from his gates, and how, in his miserliness, fearing to share with others, that son had stolen away to a thicket to drink by himself. Moved by the sight, Sakka cried, “I will go to him and make my son see that deeds must have their consequences; I will work his conversion, and make him charitable and worthy of rebirth in the Realm of Devas.” So he came down to earth, and once more trod the ways of men, putting on the semblance of the Treasurer Illīsa, with the latter’s lameness, and crookback, and squint. In this guise, he entered the city of Rājagaha and made his way to the [1.199] palace-gate, where he bade his coming be announced to the king. “Let him approach,” said the king; and he entered and stood with due obeisance before his majesty.

“What brings you here at this unusual hour, Lord High Treasurer?” said the king. “I am come, sire, because I have in my house eighty crores of treasure. Deign to have them carried to fill the royal treasury.” “Nay, my Lord Treasurer; the treasure within my palace is greater than this.” “If you, sire, will not have it, I shall give it away to whom I will.” “Do so by all means, Treasurer,” said the king. “So be it, sire,” said the pretended Illīsa, as with due obeisance he departed from the presence to the Treasurer's house. The servants all gathered round him, but not one could tell that it was not their real master. Entering, he stood on the threshold and sent for the porter, to whom he gave orders that if anybody resembling himself should appear and claim to be master of the house they should soundly cudgel such a one and throw him out. Then, mounting the stairs to the upper story, he sat down on a gorgeous couch and sent for Illīsa’s wife. When she came he said with a smile, “My dear, let us be bountiful.”

At these words, wife, children, and servants all thought: “It's a long time since he was this way minded. He must have been drinking to be so good-natured and generous today.” And his wife said to him, “Be as bountiful as you please, my husband.” “Send for the crier,” said he, “and bid him proclaim by beat of drum all through the city that everyone who wants gold, silver, diamonds, pearls, and the like, is to come to the house of Illīsa the Treasurer.” His wife did as he bade, and a large crowd soon assembled at the door carrying baskets and sacks. Then Sakka bade the treasure-chambers be thrown open, and cried, “This is my gift to you; take what you will and go your ways.” And the crowd seized on the riches there stored, and piled them in heaps on the floor and filled the bags and vessels they had brought, and went off laden with the spoils. Among them was a countryman who yoked Illīsa's oxen to Illīsa's carriage, filled it with the seven things of price, and journeyed out of the city along the highroad. As he went along, he drew near the thicket, and sang the Treasurer's praises in these words, “May you live to be a hundred, my good lord Illīsa! What you have done for me this day will enable me to live without doing another stroke of work. Whose were these oxen? Yours. Whose was this carriage? Yours. Whose the wealth in the carriage? Yours again. It was no father or mother who gave me all this; no, it came solely from you, my lord.”

These words filled the Lord High Treasurer with fear and trembling. “Why, the fellow is mentioning my name in his talk,” said he to himself. “Can the king have been distributing my wealth to the people?” At the bare thought he bounded from the bush, and, recognizing his own oxen and cart, seized the oxen by the cord, crying, “Stop, fellow; these oxen and this cart belong to me.” Down leaped the man from the cart, angrily exclaiming, “You rascal! Illīsa, the Lord High Treasurer, is giving away his wealth to all the city. What has come to you?” And he sprang at the Treasurer and struck him on the back like a falling thunder-bolt, and went off with the cart. Illīsa picked himself up, trembling in every limb, wiped off the mud, and hurrying after his cart, seized hold of it. Again the countryman got down, and seizing Illīsa by the hair, doubled him up and thumped him about the head for some time; then taking him by the throat, he flung him back the way he had come, and drove off. Sobered by this rough usage, Illīsa hurried off home. There, seeing folk making off with the treasure, he fell to laying hands on here a man and there a man, shrieking, “Hi! What’s this? Is the king despoiling me?” And every man he laid hands on knocked him down. Bruised and smarting, he sought to take refuge in his own house, when the porters stopped him with, “Hello, you rascal! Where might you be going?” And first thrashing him soundly with bamboos, they took their master by the throat and threw him out of doors. “There is none but the king left to see me righted,” groaned Illīsa, and betook himself to the palace. “Why, oh why, sire,” he cried, “have you plundered me like this?”

“Nay, it was not I, my Lord Treasurer,” said the king. “Did you not yourself come and declare your intention of giving your wealth away, if I would not accept it? And did you not then send the crier round and carry out your threat?” “Oh sire, indeed it was not I that came to you on such an errand. Your majesty knows how near and close I am, and how I never give away so much as the tiniest drop of oil which a blade of grass will take up. May it please your majesty to send for him who has given my substance away, and to question him on the matter.”

Then the king sent for Sakka. And so exactly alike were the two that neither the king nor his court could tell which was the real Lord High Treasurer. Said the miser Illīsa, “Who, and what, sire, is this Treasurer? I am the Treasurer.”

“Well, really I can’t say which is the real Illīsa,” said the king. “Is there anybody who can distinguish them for certain?” “Yes, sire, my wife.” So the wife was sent for and asked which of the two was her husband. And she said Sakka was her husband and went to his side. {1.353} Then in turn Illīsa’s children and servants were brought in and asked the same question; and all with one accord declared Sakka was the real Lord High Treasurer. Here it flashed across Illīsa’s mind that he had a wart on his head, hidden among his hair, the existence of which was known only to his barber. So, as a last resource, he asked that his barber might be sent for to identify him. Now at this time the Bodhisatta was his barber. Accordingly, the barber was sent for and asked if he could [1.201] distinguish the real from the false Illīsa. “I could tell, sire,” said he, “if I might examine their heads.” “Then look at both their heads,” said the king. On the instant Sakka caused a wart to rise on his head! After examining the two, the Bodhisatta reported that, as both alike had got warts on their heads, he couldn’t for the life of him say which was the real man. And therewithal he uttered this verse:

1. “Both squint; both halt; both men are hunchbacks too;
And both have warts alike! I cannot tell Which of the two the real Illīsa is.”

Hearing his last hope thus fail him, the Lord High Treasurer fell into a tremble; and such was his intolerable anguish at the loss of his beloved riches, that down he fell in a swoon. Thereupon Sakka put forth his transcendental powers, and, rising in the air, addressed the king thence in these words, “Not Illīsa am I, O king, but Sakka.” Then those around wiped Illīsa’s face and dashed water over him. Recovering, he rose to his feet and bowed to the ground before Sakka, King of Devas. Then said Sakka, “Illīsa, mine was the wealth, not thine; I am your father, and you are my son. In my lifetime I was bountiful toward the poor and rejoiced in doing good; wherefore, I am advanced to this high estate and am become Sakka. But you, walking not in my footsteps, are grown a niggard and a very miser; you have burnt my alms house to the ground, driven the poor from the gate, and hoarded your riches. You have no enjoyment thereof thyself, nor has any other human being; {1.354} but your store is become like a pool haunted by Rakkhasas, whereat no man may slake his thirst. Albeit, if you will rebuild my alms house and show bounty to the poor, it shall be accounted to you for righteousness. But, if you will not, then will I strip you of all that you have, and cleave your head with the thunderbolt of Sakka, and you shall die.”

At this threat Illīsa, quaking for his life, cried out, “Henceforth I will be bountiful.” And Sakka accepted his promise, and, still seated in mid-air, established his son in the Precepts and preached the Dhamma to him, departing thereafter to his own abode. And Illīsa was diligent in generosity and other good works, and so assured his rebirth thereafter in heaven.

“Monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time that Moggallāna has converted the miserly Treasurer; in bygone days too the same man was converted by him.” His lesson ended, he showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This miserly Treasurer was the Illīsa of those days, Moggallāna was Sakka, King of Devas, Ānanda was the king, and I myself the barber.”
The Section with One Verse – 423

Ja 79 Kharassarajātaka
The Story about the Beating (Drum) (1s)

In the present a minister makes an agreement with thieves and withdraws his men from protecting a village, which is then plundered. The Buddha tells how he did the same thing in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man who recited (the verse) (udāhārakapaṇḍitamanussa), the minister = the same in the past life (amacca).

Keywords: Treachery, Greed.

“He gave the robbers time.” [1.202] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain Minister. He, ’tis said, ingratiated himself with the king, and, after collecting the royal revenue in a border-village, privily arranged with a band of robbers that he would march his men off into the jungle, leaving the village for the rascals to plunder – on condition that they gave him half the booty. Accordingly, at daybreak when the place was left unprotected, down came the robbers, who slew and ate the cattle, looted the village, and were off with their booty before he came back at evening with his followers. But it was a very short time before his cheating leaked out and came to the ears of the king. And the king sent for him, and, as his guilt was manifest, he was degraded and another headman put in his place. Then the king went to the Teacher at Jetavana and told him what had happened. “Sire,” said the Fortunate One, “the man has only shown the same disposition now which he showed in bygone days.” Then at the king’s request he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, he appointed a certain minister to be headman of a border-village; and everything came to pass as in the above case. Now in those days the Bodhisatta was making the round of the border-villages in the way of trade, [1.355] and had taken up his abode in that very village. And when the headman was marching his men back at evening with drums beating, he exclaimed, “This scoundrel, who privily egged on the robbers to loot the village, has waited till they had made off to the jungle again, and now back he comes with drums beating – feigning a happy ignorance of anything wrong having happened.” And, so saying, he uttered this verse:
1. “He gave the robbers time to drive and slay
   The cattle, burn the houses, capture folk;
   And then with drums beating, home he marched,
   A son no more, for such a son is dead.”

In such wise did the Bodhisatta condemn the headman. Not long after, the villany was detected, and the rascal was punished by the king as his wickedness deserved.

[1.203]

“This is not the first time, sire,” said the king, “that he has been of this disposition; he was just the same in bygone days also.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The headman of today was also the headman of those days, and I myself the wise and good man who recited the verse.”

Ja 80 Bhīmasenajātaka

The Story about (the Useless Giant) Bhīmasena (1s)

In the present a monk lies about his family, fortune and fame, until he is discovered. The Buddha tells a story of a past life, in which the same person sought to fool people into thinking he was a great hero, when in fact it was the Bodhisatta, who had been born in that life as a dwarf, who had really saved the people.

The Bodhisatta = the wise dwarf archer (culladhanuggahapaṇḍita), the bragging monk = (the useless giant) Bhīmasena.

Present Source: Ja 80 Bhīmasena,
Quoted at: Ja 125 Kaṭāhaka, Ja 127 Kalaṇḍuka.

Keywords: Boasting, Cleverness.

“You vaunted your prowess.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain braggart among the monks. Tradition says that he used to gather round him monks of all ages, and go about deluding everyone with lying 321 The commentator’s explanation is, that a son who is so lost to all decency and shame, ceases ipso facto to be a son, and that his mother is sonless even while her son is still alive.

---

boasts about his noble descent. “Ah, monks,” he would say, “there’s no family so noble as mine, no lineage so peerless. I am a scion of the highest of princely lines; no man is my equal in birth or ancestral estate; there is absolutely no end to the gold and silver and other treasures we possess. Our very slaves and menials are fed on rice and meat-stews, and are clad in the best Benares cloth, with the choicest Benares perfumes to perfume themselves withal; while I, because I have joined the Saṅgha, [1.356] have to content myself with this vile fare and this vile garb.” But another monk, after enquiring into his family estate, exposed to the monks the emptiness of this pretension.

So the monks met in the Dhamma Hall, and talk began as to how that monk, in spite of his vows to leave worldly things and cleave only to the dispensation which leads to safety, was going about deluding the monks with his lying boasts. While the fellow’s sinfulness was being discussed, the Teacher entered and enquired what their topic was. And they told him. “This is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that he has gone about boasting; in bygone days too he went about boasting and deluding people.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in a market-town in the north country, and when he was grown up he studied under a teacher of world-wide fame at Taxila. There he learned the Three Vedas and the Eighteen Branches of knowledge, and completed his education. And he became known as the wise Culladhanuggaha (Little Archer). Leaving Taxila, he came to the Andhra country in search of practical experience.

Now, it happened that in this birth the Bodhisatta was somewhat of a crooked little dwarf, and he thought to himself, “If I make my appearance before any king, he’s sure to ask what a dwarf like me is good for; why should I not use a tall broad fellow as my stalking-horse and earn my living in the shadow of his more imposing [1.204] personality?” So he betook himself to the weavers’ quarter, and there espying a huge weaver named Bhīmasena, saluted him, asking the man’s name. “Bhīmasena [322] is my name,” said the weaver. “And what makes a fine big man like you work at so sorry a trade?” “Because I can’t get a living any other way.” “Weave no more, friend. The whole continent can show no such archer as I am; but kings would scorn me because I am a dwarf. And so you, friend, must be the man to vaunt your prowess with the bow, and the king will take you into his pay {1.357} and make you ply your calling regularly. Meantime I shall be behind you to perform the duties that are laid upon you, and so shall earn my living in your shadow. In this manner we shall both of us thrive and prosper. Only do as I tell you.” “Agreed,” said the other.

[322] The name means “one who has or leads a terrible army;” it is the name of the second Pāṇḍava [in the Mahābhārata].

Accordingly, the Bodhisatta took the weaver with him to Benares, acting as a little page of the bow, and putting the other in the front; and when they were at the gates of the palace, he made him send word of his coming to the king. Being summoned into the royal presence, the pair entered together and bowing stood before the king. “What brings you here?” said the king. “I am a mighty archer,” said Bhīmasena, “there is no archer like me in the whole continent.” “What pay would you want to enter my service?” “A thousand pieces a fortnight, sire.” “What is this man of yours?” “He’s my little page, sire.” “Very well, enter my service.”

So Bhīmasena entered the king’s service; but it was the Bodhisatta who did all his work for him. Now in those days there was a tiger in a forest in Kāsi which blocked a frequented high-road and had devoured many victims. When this was reported to the king, he sent for Bhīmasena and asked whether he could catch the tiger.

“How could I call myself an archer, sire, if I couldn’t catch a tiger?” The king gave him largesse and sent him on the errand. And home to the Bodhisatta came Bhīmasena with the news. “All right,” said the Bodhisatta, “away you go, my friend.” “But are you not coming too?” “No, I won’t go; but I’ll tell you a little plan.” “Please do, my friend.” “Well don’t you be rash and approach the tiger’s lair alone. What you will do is to muster a strong band of countryfolk to march to the spot with a thousand or two thousand bows; when you know that the tiger is aroused, you bolt into the thicket and lie down flat on your face. The countryfolk will beat the tiger to death; and as soon as he is quite dead, you bite off a creeper with your teeth, and draw near to the dead tiger, trailing the creeper in your hand. At the sight of the dead body of the brute, you will burst out with: ‘Who has killed the tiger? I meant to lead it {1.358} by a creeper, like an ox, to the king, and with this intent had [1.205] just stepped into the thicket to get a creeper. I must know who killed the tiger before I could get back with my creeper.’ Then the countryfolk will be very frightened and bribe you heavily not to report them to the king; you will be credited with slaying the tiger; and the king too will give you lots of money.”

“Very good,” said Bhīmasena; and off he went and slew the tiger just as the Bodhisatta had told him. Having thus made the road safe for travellers, back he came with a large following to Benares, and said to the king, “I have killed the tiger, sire; the forest is safe for travellers now.” Well-pleased, the king loaded him with gifts.

Another day, tidings came that a certain road was infested with a buffalo, and the king sent Bhīmasena to kill it. Following the Bodhisatta’s directions, he killed the buffalo in the same way as the tiger, and returned to the king, who once more gave him lots of money. He was a great lord now. Intoxicated by his new honours, he treated the Bodhisatta with contempt, and scorned to follow his advice, saying: “I can get on without you. Do you think there’s no man but yourself?” This and many other harsh things did he say to the Bodhisatta.

Now, a few days later, a hostile king marched upon Benares and beleaguered it, sending a message to the king summoning him either to surrender his kingdom or to do battle. And the king of Benares ordered Bhīmasena out to fight him. So Bhīmasena was armed from head to foot in soldierly fashion and mounted on a war-elephant sheathed in complete armour. And the Bodhisatta, who was seriously alarmed that Bhīmasena might get killed, armed himself from head to foot also and seated himself modestly behind Bhīmasena. Surrounded by a host, the elephant passed out of the gates of the city and arrived in the forefront of the battle. At the first notes of the martial drum Bhīmasena fell quaking with fear. “If you fall off now, you’ll get killed,” said the Bodhisatta, and accordingly fastened a cord round him, which he held tight, to prevent him from falling off the elephant. But the sight of the field of battle proved too much for Bhīmasena, and the fear of death was so strong on him that he fouled the elephant’s back. “Ah,” said the Bodhisatta, “the present does not tally with the past. Then you affected the warrior; now your prowess is confined to befouling the elephant you ride on.” And so saying, he uttered this verse: {1.359}
1. “You vaunted your prowess, and loud was your boast;
   You swore you would vanquish the foe!
   But is it consistent, when faced with their host,
   To vent your emotion, sir, so?”

When the Bodhisatta had ended these taunts, he said: “But don’t you be afraid, my friend. Am not I here to protect you?” Then he made Bhīmasena get off the elephant and bade him wash himself and go home. “And now to win renown this day,” said the Bodhisatta, raising his battle-cry as he dashed into the fight. Breaking through the king’s camp, he dragged the king out and took him alive to Benares. In great joy at his prowess, his royal master loaded him with honours, and from that day forward all Jambudīpa was loud with the fame of the wise Culladhanuggaha. To Bhīmasena he gave largesse, and sent him back to his own home; while he himself excelled in generosity and all good works, and at his death passed away to fare according to his deeds.

“Thus, monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time that this monk has been a braggart; he was just the same in bygone days too.” His lesson ended, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This braggart monk was the Bhīmasena of those days, and I myself the wise Culladhanuggaha.”

Ja 81 Surāpānajātaka
The Story about Liquor (1s)

In the present one monk, though having great powers was brought low by strong liquor. The Buddha tells how a whole group of worthy ascetics in the past had similarly lost their powers through drink.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s followers (isigaṇa).

Keywords: Intoxication, Disobedience, Devas.

“We drank, we danced.” [1.360] This story was told by the Teacher about the elder Sāgata, while he was dwelling in the Ghosita-park near Kosambi.

For, after spending the rainy season at Sāvatthī, the Teacher had come on an alms pilgrimage to a market-town named Bhaddavatikā, where cowherds and goatherds and farmers and wayfarers respectfully besought him not to go down to the Mango Ferry, “For,” they said, “in the Mango Ferry, in the locality of the naked ascetics, dwells a poisonous and deadly Nāga, known as the Nāga of the Mango Ferry, who might harm the Fortunate One.” Feigning not to hear them, though they repeated their warning thrice, the Fortunate One kept on his way.

While the Fortunate One was dwelling near Bhaddavatikā in a certain grove there, the elder Sāgata, a servant of the Buddha, who had won such Supernormal Powers as a worldling can possess, went to the locality, piled a couch of leaves at the spot where the Nāga king dwelt, and sat himself down cross-legged thereon. Being unable to conceal his evil nature, the Nāga raised a great smoke. So did the elder. Then the Nāga sent forth flames. So too did the elder. But, while the Nāga’s flames did no harm to the elder, the elder’s flames did do harm to the Nāga, and so in a short time he mastered the Nāga king and established him in the Refuges and the Precepts, after which he repaired back to the Teacher. And the Teacher, after dwelling as long as it pleased him at Bhaddavatikā, went on to Kosambī.

Now the story of the Nāga’s conversion by Sāgata, had got noised abroad all over the countryside, and the townsfolk of Kosambī went forth to meet the Fortunate One and saluted him, after which they passed to the elder Sāgata and saluting him, said: “Tell us, sir, what you lack and we will furnish it.” The elder himself remained silent; but the followers of the Group of Six made answer as follows, “Sirs, to those who have renounced the world, white spirits are as rare as they are acceptable. Do you think you could get the elder some clear white spirit?” “To be sure we can,” said the townsfolk, and invited the Teacher to take his meal with them next day. Then they went back to their own town and arranged that each in his own house should offer clear white spirit to the elder, and accordingly they all laid in a store and invited the elder in and plied him with the liquor, house by house. So deep were his potations that, on his way out of town, the elder fell prostrate in the gateway and there lay hiccoughing nonsense.

On his way back from his meal in the town, the Teacher came on the elder lying in this state, and bidding the monks carry Sāgata home, [1.361] passed on his way to the park. The monks laid the elder down with his head at the Tathāgata’s feet, but he turned round so that he came to lie with his feet towards the Tathāgata. Then the Teacher asked his question, “Monks, does Sāgata show that respect towards me now that he formerly did?” “No, sir.” “Tell me, monks, who it was that mastered the Nāga king of the Mango Ferry?” “It was Sāgata, sir.” “Think you that in his present state Sāgata could master even a harmless water-snake?” “That he could not, sir.” “Well now, monks, is it proper to drink that which, when drunk, steals away a man’s senses?” “It is improper, sir.” Now, after discursing with the monks in dispraise of the elder, the Fortunate One laid it down as a precept that the drinking of intoxicants was an offence requiring confession and absolution; after which he rose up and passed into his perfumed chamber.

323 [The ‘Six’ were notorious monks who are always mentioned as defying the rules of the Saṅgha.]

Assembling together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks discussed the defilement of spirit-drinking, saying: “What a great defilement is the drinking of spirits, sirs, seeing that it has blinded to the Buddha’s excellence even one known as wise and having Supernormal Powers.” Entering the Dhamma Hall at this point, the Teacher asked what topic they were discussing; and they told him. “Monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that they who had renounced the world have lost their senses through drinking spirits; the very same thing took place in bygone days.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisattva was born into a northern brahmin family in Kāsi; and when he grew up, he renounced the world for the ascetic’s life. He won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and dwelt in the enjoyment of the bliss of Absorption in the Himālayas, with five hundred pupils around him.

Once, when the rainy season had come, his pupils said to him, “Teacher, may we go to the haunts of men and bring back salt and vinegar?” “For my own part, sirs, I shall remain here; but you may go for your health’s sake, and come back when the rainy season is over.” “Very good,” they said, and taking a respectful leave of their master, came to Benares, where they took up their abode in the royal pleasure gardens.

On the morrow they went in quest of alms to a village just outside the city gates, where they had plenty to eat; and next day they made their way into the city itself. The kindly citizens gave alms to them, and the king was soon informed that five hundred ascetics from the Himālayas had [1.208] taken up their abode in the royal pleasure gardens, and that they were ascetics of great austerity, subduing the flesh, and of great virtue. Hearing this good character of them, the king went to the pleasure gardens and graciously made them welcome [1.362] to stay there for four months. They promised that they would, and thenceforth were fed in the royal palace and lodged in the pleasure gardens.

One day a drinking festival was held in the city, and the king gave the five hundred ascetics a large supply of the best spirits, knowing that such things rarely come in the way of those who renounce the world and its vanities. The ascetics drank the liquor and went back to the pleasure gardens. There, in drunken hilarity, some danced, some sang, while others, wearied of dancing and singing, kicked about their rice-hampers and other belongings – after which they lay down to sleep. When they had slept off their drunkenness and awoke to see the traces of their revelry, they wept and lamented, saying: “We have done that which we ought not to have done. We have done this evil because we are away from our master.” Forthwith, they quit the pleasure gardens and returned to the Himālayas. Laying aside their bowls and other belongings, they saluted their master and took their seats. “Well, my sons,” said he, “were you comfortable amid the haunts of men, and were you spared weary journeyings in quest of alms? Did you dwell in unity one with another?”

“Yes, master, we were comfortable; but we drank forbidden drink, so that, losing our senses and forgetting ourselves, we both danced and sang.” And by way of setting the matter forth, they composed and repeated this verse:

1. “We drank, we danced, we sang, we wept; ’twas well
   That, when we drank the drink that steals away
   The senses, we were not transformed to apes.”

“This is what is sure to happen to those who are not living under a master’s care,” said the Bodhisatta, rebuking those ascetics; and he exhorted them saying: “Henceforth, never do such a thing again.” Living on with Absorption unbroken, he became destined to rebirth thereafter in the Brahmā Realm. [1.363]

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka – (and henceforth we shall omit the words ‘showed the connection’) – by saying: “My disciples were the band of ascetics of those days, and I their teacher.”
The Story about (the Merchant) Mittavindaka (1s)

Alternative Title: Mittavindakajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk, though taught the way of a monastic, refuses to listen, and wants to live according to his own ideas. The Buddha tells how in a previous life the same person had been disobedient to his mother, and had suffered greatly as a result.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the Devas (devarājā), the disobedient monk = Mittavindaka.

Past Compare: Ja 41 Losaka, Ja 82 Mittavinda, Ja 104 Mittavinda, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Wilfulness, Greed, Retribution.

“No more to dwell.” [1.209] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a wilful monk. The incidents of this Jātaka, which took place in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, will be related in the Tenth Book in the Mahāmittavindakajātaka [Ja 439].

In the past, in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, there dwelt in Benares a merchant, whose wealth was eighty crores of money, having a son named Mittavindaka. The mother and father of this lad had entered upon the First Path, but he was wicked, an unbeliever.

When by and by the father was dead and gone, the mother, who in his stead managed their property, thus said to her son, “My son, the state of man is one hard to attain; give alms, practise virtue, keep the holy day, give ear to the Dhamma.” Then said he, “Mother, no almsgiving or such like for me; never name them to me; as I live, so shall I fare hereafter.” On a certain full-moon holy day, as he spoke in this fashion, his mother answered, “Son, this day is set apart as a high holy day. Today take upon you the holy day vows; visit the cloister, and all

---

324 See also No. 41, and Divyāvadāna, p. 603, &c. [I include the story here, which actually comes from Ja 427 Gijjhajātaka.]
night long listen to the Dhamma, and when you come back I will give you a thousand pieces of money."

For desire of this money the son consented. As soon as he had broken his fast he went to the monastery, and there he spent the day; but at night, to ensure that not one word of the Dhamma should reach his ear, he lay down in a certain place, and fell asleep. On the next day, very early in the morning, he washed his face, and went to his own house and sat down.

Now the mother thought within herself, “Today my son after hearing the Dhamma will come back early in the morning, bringing with him the elder who has preached the Dhamma.” So she made ready gruel, and food hard and soft, and prepared a seat, and awaited his coming. When she saw her son coming all alone, “Son,” said she, “why have you not brought the preacher with you?” “No preacher for me, mother!” says he. “Here then,” said the woman, “you drink this gruel.” “You promised me a thousand pieces, mother,” he says, “first give this to me, and afterward I will drink.” “Drink first, my son, and then you shall have the money.” Said he, “No, I will not drink till I get the money.” Then his mother laid before him a purse of a thousand pieces. And he drank the gruel, took the purse with a thousand pieces, and went about his business; and so thereafter, until in no long time he had gained two million.

Then it came into his mind that he would equip a ship, and do business with it. So he equipped a ship, and said to his mother, “Mother, I mean to do business in this ship.” Said she, “You are my only son, and in this house there is plenty of wealth; the sea is full of dangers. Do not go!” But he said: “Go I will, and you cannot prevent me.” “Yes, I will prevent you,” she answered, and took hold of his hand; but he thrust her hand away, and struck her down, and in a moment he was gone, and under way.

On the seventh day, because of Mittavindaka, the ship stood immovable upon the deep. Lots were cast, and thrice was the lot found in the hand of Mittavindaka. Then they gave him a raft; and saying: “Let not many perish for the sole sake of this one,” they cast him adrift upon the deep. In an instant the ship sprang forth with speed over the deep.

And he upon his raft came to a certain island. There in a crystal palace he espied four female spirits of the dead. They used to be in woe seven days and seven days in happiness. In their company he experienced bliss divine. Then, when the time came for them to undergo their penance, they said: “Master, we are going to leave you for seven days; while we are gone, bide here, and be not distressed.” So saying they departed.

But he, full of longing, again embarked upon his raft, and passing over the ocean came to another isle; there in a palace of silver he saw eight other spirits. In the same way, he saw upon another island, sixteen in a palace all of jewels, and on yet another, thirty-two that were in a golden hall. With these, as before, he dwelt in divine blessedness, and when they went away to their penance, sailed away once more over the ocean; till at last he beheld a city with four gates, surrounded by a wall. That, they say, is the Ussada hell, the place where many beings, condemned to hell, endure their own deeds: but to Mittavindaka it appeared as though a beautiful city. He thought: “I will visit that city, and be its king.”

So he entered, and there he saw a being in torment, supporting a wheel sharp as a razor; but to Mittavindaka it seemed as though that razor-wheel upon his head were a lotus bloom; the five-fold fetters upon his breast seemed as it were a splendid and rich vesture; the blood dripping from his head seemed to be the perfumed powder of red sandalwood; the sound of groaning was as the sound of sweetest song. So approaching he said: “Hey, man! Long enough you have been carrying that lotus flower; now give it to me!” He replied, “My lord, no lotus it is, but a razor-wheel.” “Ah,” said the first, “so you say because you do not wish to give it.” Thought the condemned wretch, “My past deeds must be exhausted. No doubt this fellow, like me, is here for smiting his mother. Well, I will give him the razor-wheel.” Then he said: “Here then, take the lotus,” and with those words he cast the razor-wheel upon his head; and on his head it fell, crushing it in. In an instant Mittavindaka knew then that it was a razor-wheel, and he said: “Take your wheel, take back your wheel!” groaning aloud in his pain; but the other had disappeared.

Then the Bodhisatta uttered this Stanza:
1. “No more to dwell in island palaces
Of crystal, silver, or of sparkling gems –
With flinty headgear you are invested;
Nor shall its gridding torture ever cease
Till defilements be purged and life shall end.”

So saying, the Bodhisatta passed to his own abode among the Devas. And Mittavindaka, having donned that headgear, suffered grievous torment till his defilements had been spent and he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, by saying: “This wilful monk was the Mittavindaka of those days, and I myself the king of the Devas.”

Ja 83 Kālakaṇṇijātaka
The Story about (the Unlucky Man) Wretch (1s)

In the present Anāthapiṇḍika has a childhood friend with an unfortunate name. He is urged to dismiss him, but refuses to, saying it is only a name. Later the friend does a great service protecting his property. The Buddha tells how the same things played out in a previous life also.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man from Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi), Ānanda = Kāḷakaṇṇī (a man fallen on hard times).

Present Source: Ja 83 Kālakaṇṇi, Quoted at: Ja 121 Kusanāli.

Keywords: Trust, Friendship, Designations, Devas.

“A friend is he.” [1.364] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a friend of Anāthapiṇḍika’s. Tradition says that the two had made mud-pies together, and had gone to the same school; but, as years went by, the friend, whose name was Wretch [Kāḷakaṇṇī], sank into great distress and could not make a living anyhow. So he came to the rich man, who was kind to him, and paid him to look after all his property; and the poor friend was employed under Anāthapiṇḍika and did all his business for him. After he had gone up to the rich man’s it was a common thing to hear in the house, “Stand up, Wretch,” or, “Sit down, Wretch,” or, “Have your dinner, Wretch.” [1.210]
One day the Treasurer’s friends and acquaintances called on him and said: “Lord Treasurer, don’t let this sort of thing go on in your house. It’s enough to scare a Yakkha to hear such ill-omened observations as – ‘Stand up, Wretch,’ or ‘Sit down, Wretch,’ or ‘Have your dinner, Wretch.’ The man is not your social equal; he’s a miserable wretch, dogged by misfortune. Why have anything to do with him?”

“Not so,” replied Anāthapiṇḍika, “a name only serves to denote a man, and the wise do not measure a man by his name; nor is it proper to wax superstitious about mere sounds. Never will I throw over, for his mere name’s sake, the friend with whom I made mud-pies as a child.” And he rejected their advice.

One day the great man departed to visit a village of which he was headman, leaving the other in charge of the house. Hearing of his departure certain robbers made up their mind to break into the house; and, arming themselves to the teeth, they surrounded it in the night-time. But Wretch had a suspicion that burglars might be expected, and was sitting up for them. And when he knew that they had come, he ran about as if to rouse his people, bidding one sound the conch, another beat the drum, till he had the whole house full of noise, as though he were rousing a whole army of servants. Said the robbers, “The house is not so empty as we were told; the master must be at home.” Flinging away their stones, clubs and other weapons, away they bolted for their lives.

Next day great alarm was caused by the sight of all the discarded weapons lying round the house; and Wretch was lauded to the skies by such praises as this, “If the house had not been patrolled by one so wise as this man, the robbers would have simply walked in at their own pleasure and have plundered the house. The Treasurer owes this stroke of good luck to his staunch friend.” And the moment the merchant came back from his village they hastened to tell him the whole story.

“Ah,” said he, “this is the trusty guardian of my house whom you wanted me to get rid of. If I had taken your advice and got rid of him; I should be a beggar today. It’s not the name but the heart within that makes the man.” So saying he raised his wages. And thinking that here was a good story to tell, off he went to the Teacher and gave him a complete account of it all, right through. “This is not the first time, sir,” said the Teacher, “that a friend named Wretch has saved his friend’s wealth from robbers; the like happened in bygone days as well.” Then, at Anāthapiṇḍika’s request, he told this story of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Treasurer of great renown; and he had a friend whose name was Wretch, and so on as in the foregoing story. When on his return from his village headman the Bodhisatta heard what had happened he said to his friends, “If I had taken your advice and got rid of my trusty friend, I should have been a beggar today.” And he repeated this verse:

1. “A friend is he that seven steps will go
   To help us;\(^{325}\) twelve attest the comrade true.
   A fortnight or a month’s tried loyalty
   Makes kindred, longer time a second self.
   Then how shall I, who all these years have known
   My friend, be wise in driving Wretch away?”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the Wretch of those days, and I myself the Treasurer of Benares.”

Ja 84 Atthassadvārajātaka

The Story about the Doors to Welfare (1s)

In the present a precocious youth seeks his spiritual welfare. The Buddha tells how he did the same in a previous life, and what advice the Bodhisatta had given him then, as now.

The Bodhisatta = the great wealthy man (mahāseṭṭhi),
the son = the same in the past (putta).

Keywords: Skill, Wisdom, Youth.

“Seek health.” [1.211] {1.366} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a boy who was sage in matters relating to spiritual welfare. When he was only seven years old, the boy, who was the son of a very wealthy Treasurer, manifested great intelligence and anxiety for his spiritual welfare; and one day came to his father to ask what were the Paths leading to spiritual welfare. The father could not answer, but he thought to himself, “This is a very difficult question; from highest heaven to nethermost hell there is none that can answer it, save only the All-knowing Buddha.” So he took the child with him to Jetavana,

---

\(^{325}\) See Griffith’s “Old Indian Poetry,” p. 27; and Pāṇini’s rule, v. 2. 22. with a quantity of perfumes and flowers and unguents. After arriving there, he did reverence to the Teacher, bowed down before him, and seating himself on one side, spoke as follows to the Fortunate One, “Sir, this boy of mine, who is intelligent and anxious for his spiritual welfare, has asked me what are the Paths leading to spiritual welfare; and, as I did not know, I came to you. Vouchsafe, O Fortunate One, to resolve this question.” “Lay brother,” said the Teacher, “this self-same question was asked me by this very child in former times, and I answered it for him. He knew the answer in bygone days, but now he has forgotten because of a multitude of rebirths.” Then, at the father’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a very wealthy Treasurer; and he had a son who, when only seven years old, manifested great intelligence and anxiety for his spiritual welfare. One day the child came to his father to ask what were the Paths leading to spiritual welfare. And his father answered him by repeating this verse:

1. “Seek health, the supreme good; be virtuous;
Hearken to elders; from the scriptures learn;
Conform to truth; and burst attachment’s bonds.
For chiefly these six paths to welfare lead.” {1.367}

In this wise did the Bodhisatta answer his son’s question as to the Paths that lead to spiritual welfare; and the boy from that time forward followed those six rules.
After a life spent in generosity and other good works, the Bodhisatta passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This child was also the child of those days, and I myself the Lord Treasurer.”

Ja 85 Kimpakkajātaka
The Story about the Kimpakka (1s)

In the present a monk is overcome by lust for a woman. The Buddha advises him, that though indulgence is enjoyed at the time, it leads to destruction in the future. He then tells a story of how in a past life he saved his caravan by warding off the consumption of a poisonous fruit.

The Bodhisatta = the caravan leader (satthavāha),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (parisā).

Past Compare: Ja 54 Phala, Ja 85 Kimpakka, Ja 366 Gumiya.

Keywords: Lust, Restraint.

“As they who ate.” [1.212] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lustful monk. Tradition says there was a scion of a good family who gave his heart to the Buddha’s dispensation and went forth. But one day as he was going his round for alms in Śāvatthī, he was there stirred to sensual desire by the sight of a beautifully dressed woman. Being brought by his teachers and preceptors before the Teacher, he admitted in answer to the enquiries of the Fortunate One that sensual desire had entered into him. Then said the Teacher, “Verily the five sensual desires of the senses are sweet in the hour of actual enjoyment, monk; but this enjoyment of them (in that it entails the miseries of rebirth in hell and the other evil states) is like the eating of the fruit of the Kimpakka tree. Very fair to view is the Kimpakka, very fragrant and sweet; but when eaten, it racks the inwards and brings death. In other days, through ignorance of its evil nature, a multitude of men, seduced by the beauty, fragrance and sweetness of the fruit, ate thereof so that they died.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as the leader of a caravan. Once when journeying with five hundred carts from east to west, he came to the outskirts of a forest. Assembling his men, he said to them, “In this forest grow trees that bear poisonous fruit. Let no man eat any unfamiliar fruit without first asking me.” When they had traversed the forest, they came at the other border on a Kimpakka tree with its boughs bending low with their burden of fruit. In form, smell and taste, its trunk, boughs, leaves and fruit resembled a mango. Taking the tree, from its misleading appearance and so forth, to be a mango, some plucked the fruit and ate; but others said: “Let us speak to our leader before we eat.” And these latter, plucking the fruit, waited for him to come up. When he came, he ordered them to fling away the fruit they had plucked, and had an emetic administered to those who had already eaten. Of these latter, some recovered; but such as had been the first to eat, died. The Bodhisatta reached his destination in safety, and sold his wares at a profit, after which he travelled home again. After a life spent in generosity and other good works, he passed away to fare according to his deeds. [1.213]
It was when he had told this story, that the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse:

1. “As they who ate the Kimpakka died, so sensual desires, When ripe, slay him who knowing not the woe They breed hereafter, stoops to lustful deeds.”

Having thus shown that the sensual desires, which are so sweet in the hour of fruition, end by slaying their votaries, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the lustful monk was converted and won the Fruit of the First Path. Of the rest of the Buddha’s following some won the First, some the Second, and some the Third Path, while others again became Arahats. His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “My disciples were the people of the caravan in those days, and I their leader.”

Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsanajātaka
The Story about the Enquiry into Virtue (1s)

Alternative Title: Sīlavīmaṁsakajātaka (Cst)

In the present a brahmin seeks to find out if the king favours him for his birth, or for his virtue, so he starts stealing a penny a day from the king. When the king finds out he decides to punish him, until the brahmin explains his actions. The Buddha tells a story of similar happenings in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
the Buddha’s disciples = the king’s followers (rājaparīsa),
Ānanda = king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsa,
Quoted at: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Past Compare: Ja 86 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 290 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 330 Sīlavīmaṁsa, Ja 362 Sīlavīmaṁsa.

Keywords: Birth, Virtue.

“Naught can compare.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a brahmin who put to the test his reputation for virtue. This brahmin, who was maintained by the king of Kosala, had sought the Three Refuges; he kept the Five Precepts, and was versed in the Three Vedas. “This is a virtuous man,” thought the king, and showed him great honour. But that brahmin thought to himself, “The king shows honour to me beyond other brahmins, and has manifested his great regard by making me his spiritual director. But is his favour due to my virtue or only to my birth, lineage, family, country and accomplishments? I must clear this up without delay.”

Accordingly, one day when he was leaving the palace, he took without permission a coin from a treasurer’s counter, and went his way. Such was the treasurer’s veneration for the brahmin that he sat perfectly still and said not a word. Next day the brahmin took two coins; but still the official made no remonstrance. The third day the brahmin took a whole handful of coins. “This is the third day,” cried the treasurer, “that you have robbed his majesty,” and he shouted out three times, “I have caught the thief who robs the treasury.” In rushed a crowd of people from every side, crying, “Ah, you’ve long been posing as a model of virtue.” And dealing him two or three blows, they led him before the king. In great sorrow the king said to him, “What led you, brahmin, to do so wicked a thing?” And he gave orders, saying: “Off with him to punishment.” “I am no thief, sire,” said the brahmin. “Then why did you take money from the treasury?” “Because you showed me such great honour, sire, and because I made up my mind to find out whether that honour was paid to my birth and the like or only to my virtue. That was my motive, and now I know for certain (inasmuch as you order me off to punishment) that it was my virtue and not my birth and other advantages, that won me your majesty’s favour.

Virtue I know to be the chief and supreme good; I know too that to virtue I can never attain in this life, while I remain a layman, living in the midst of sensual pleasures. Wherefore, this very day I would willingly go to the Teacher at Jetavana and renounce the world for the Saṅgha. Grant me your leave, sire.” The king consenting, the brahmin set out for Jetavana. His friends and relations in a body tried to turn him from his purpose, but, finding their efforts of no avail, left him alone.

He came to the Teacher and asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha. After admission to the lower and higher ordination, he won by application insight and became an Arahat, whereon he drew near to the Teacher, saying: “Sir, my joining the Saṅgha has borne the Supreme Fruit,” thereby signifying that he had became an Arahat.
Hearing of this, the monks, assembling in the Dhamma Hall, spoke with one another of the virtues of the king’s family priest who tested his own reputation for virtue and who, leaving the king, had now risen to be an Arahat. Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked what the monks were discussing, and they told him. “Not without a precedent, monks,” said he, “is the action of this brahmin in putting to the test his reputation for virtue and in working out his safety after renouncing the world. The like was done by the wise and good of bygone days as well.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his family priest – a man given to generosity and other good works, whose mind was set on righteousness, always keeping unbroken the Five Precepts. And the king honoured him beyond the other brahmans; and everything came to pass as above.

But, as the Bodhisatta was being brought in bonds before the king, he came where some snake-charmers were exhibiting a snake, which they laid hold of by the tail and the throat, and tied round their necks. Seeing this, the Bodhisatta begged the men to desist, for the snake might bite them and cut their lives short. “Brahmin,” replied the snake-charmers, “this is a virtuous and well-behaved cobra; he’s not wicked like you, who for your wickedness and misconduct are being hauled off in custody.”

Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “Even cobras, if they do not bite or wound, are called ‘virtuous.’ How much more must this be the case with those who have come to be human beings! Verily it is just this virtue which is the most excellent thing in all the world, nor {1.371} does anything surpass it.” Then he was brought before the king. “What is this, my friends?” said the king. “Here’s a thief who has been robbing your majesty’s treasury.” “Away with him to execution.” “Sire,” said the brahmin, “I am no thief.” “Then how came you to take the money?” Hereon the Bodhisatta made answer precisely as above, ending as follows, “This then is why I have come to the conclusion that it is virtue which is the highest and most excellent thing in all the world. But be that as it may, yet, seeing that the cobra, when it does not bite or wound, must simply be called ‘virtuous’ and nothing more, for this reason too it is [1.215] goodness alone which is the highest and most excellent of all things.” Then in praise of goodness he uttered this verse:
1. “Naught can compare with virtue; all the world
Can not its equal show. The cobra true,
If counted virtuous, is saved from death.”

After preaching the truth to the king in this verse, the Bodhisatta, abjuring all sensual desires, and renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life, repaired to the Himālayas, where he attained to the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, earning for himself the sure hope of rebirth thereafter in the Brahmā Realm.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “My disciples were the king’s following in those days, and I myself the king’s family priest.”

Ja 87 Maṅgalajātaka
The Story about the Omens (1s)

In the present a brahmin is bound by superstition and believes an old gnawed piece of cloth will bring bad luck, so he seeks to have it thrown away. As the cloth is being taken away for disposal, the Buddha intercepts it and takes it for himself, declaring that superstitions are not efficacious. He then tells a similar story about a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tapasa),
father and son = the same in the past (pitāputtā).

Keywords: Omens, Superstition, Renunciation.

“Whoso renounces.” This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove about a brahmin who was skilled in the signs \(1.372\) which can be drawn from pieces of cloth.\(^{326}\) Tradition says that at Rājagaha dwelt a brahmin who was superstitious and held false views, not believing in the Three Jewels. This brahmin was very rich and wealthy, abounding in substance; and a female mouse gnawed a suit of clothes of his, which was lying by in a chest.

One day after bathing himself all over, he called for this suit, and then was told of the mischief which the mouse had done. “If these clothes stop in the house,” thought he to himself, “they’ll bring ill-luck; such an ill-omened thing is sure to bring a curse. It is out of the question to give them to any of my children or servants; for whosoever has them will bring misfortune on all around him. I must have them thrown away in a charnel ground; \(^{327}\) but how? I cannot hand them to servants; for they might covet and keep them, to the ruin of my house. My son must take them.” So he called his son, and telling him the whole matter bade him take his charge on a stick, without touching the clothes with his hand, and fling them away in a charnel ground. Then the son was to bathe himself all over and return.

Now that morning at dawn of day the Teacher looking \[^{1.216}\] round to see what persons could be led to the truth, became aware that the father and son were predestined to attain emancipation. So he betook himself in the guise of a hunter on his way to hunt, to the charnel ground, and sat down at the entrance, emitting the six-coloured rays that mark a Buddha. Soon there came to the spot the young brahmin, carefully carrying the clothes as his father had bidden him, on the end of his stick, just as though he had a house-snake to carry.

“What are you doing, young brahmin?” asked the Teacher.

“My good Gotama,” \(^{328}\) was the reply, “this suit of clothes, having been gnawed by mice, is like ill-luck personified, and as deadly as though steeped in venom; wherefore my father, fearing that a servant might covet and retain the clothes, has sent me with them. I promised that I would throw them away and bathe afterwards; and that’s the errand that has brought me here.” “Throw the suit away, then,” said the Teacher; and the young brahmin did so. “They will just suit me,” said the Teacher, as he picked up the fateful clothes before the young man’s very eyes, regardless of the latter’s earnest warnings and repeated entreaties to him not to take them; and he departed in the direction of the Bamboo Grove.

Home in all haste ran the young brahmin, to tell his father how the ascetic Gotama had declared that the clothes would just suit him, and had persisted, in spite of all

---

\(^{327}\) An āmakasusāna was an open space or grove in which corpses were exposed for wild-beasts to eat, in order that the earth might not be defiled. cf. the Parsee ‘Towers of Silence.’

\(^{328}\) In Pāli bho Gotama, – a form of familiar address. Brahmins are always represented as presuming to say bho to the Buddha.
warnings to the contrary, in taking the suit away with him to the Bamboo Grove. “Those clothes,” thought the brahmin to himself, “are bewitched and accursed. Even the ascetic Gotama cannot wear them without destruction befalling him; and that would bring me into disrepute. I will give the sage abundance of other garments and get him to throw that suit away.” So with a large number of robes he started in company of his son for the Bamboo Grove.

When he came upon the Teacher he stood respectfully on one side and spoke thus, “Is it indeed true, as I hear, that you, my good Gotama, picked up a suit of clothes in the charnel ground?” “Quite true, brahmin.” “My good Gotama, that suit is accursed; if you make use of them, they will destroy you. If you stand in need of clothes, take these and throw away that suit.” “Brahmin,” replied the Teacher, “by open profession I have renounced the world, and am content with the rags that lie by the roadside or bathing-places, or are thrown away on dustheaps or in charnel grounds. Whereas you have held your superstitions in bygone days, as well as at the present time.” So saying, at the brahmin’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past there reigned in the city of Rājagaha, in the kingdom of Magadha, a righteous king of Magadha. In those days the Bodhisatta came to life again as a brahmin of the north-west. Growing up, he renounced the world for the ascetic’s life, won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and went to dwell in the Himālayas.

On one occasion, returning from the Himālayas, and taking up his abode in the king’s pleasure gardens, he went on the second day into the city to collect alms. Seeing him, the king had him summoned into the palace and there provided with a seat and with food – exacting a promise from him that he would take up his abode in the pleasure gardens. So the Bodhisatta used to receive his food at the palace and dwell in the grounds. [1.217]

Now in those days there dwelt in that city a brahmin known as Dussalakkhaṇa [Cloth-sign]. And he had in a chest a suit of clothes which were gnawed by mice, and everything came to pass just as in the foregoing story. But when the son was on his way to the charnel ground the Bodhisatta got there first and took his seat at the gate; and, picking up the suit which the young brahmin threw away, he returned to the pleasure gardens.
When the son told this to the old brahmin, the latter exclaimed, “It will be the death of the king’s ascetic,” and entreated the Bodhisatta to throw that suit away, lest he should perish. But the ascetic replied, “Good enough for us are the rags that are flung away in charnel grounds. We have no belief in superstitions about luck, which are not approved by Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, or Bodhisattas; and therefore no wise man ought to be a believer in luck.” Hearing the truth thus expounded, the brahmin forsook his errors and took refuge in the Bodhisatta. And the Bodhisatta, preserving his Absorption unbroken, earned rebirth thereafter in the Brahmā Realm. {1.374}

Having told this story, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, taught the Dhamma to the brahmin in this verse:

1. “Whose renounces omens, dreams and signs,
   That man, from superstition’s errors freed,
   Shall triumph o’er the paired depravities
   And o’er attachments to the end of time.”

When the Teacher had thus preached the Dhamma to the brahmin in the form of this verse, he proceeded further to preach the Four Truths, at the close whereof that brahmin, with his son, attained to the First Path. The Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The father and son of today were also the father and son of those days, and I myself the ascetic.”

Ja 88 Sārambhajātaka

The Story about (the Ox) Sārambha (1s)

In the present the Group of Six make disparaging remarks about the monks. The Buddha reproves them and tells a story about a bull, who, spoken to harshly, lost his master a thousand, and spoken to kindly gained him two thousand, by pulling a hundred carts all by himself.

The Bodhisatta = (the ox) Sārambha,
Ānanda = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Uppalavaṇṇā = his wife (brāhmaṇī).

Present and Past Compare: Ja 28 Nandivisāḷa, Vin Pāc 2 (4.5).

Keywords: Kindly speech, Animals.
“Speak kindly.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Sāvatthi, about the precept touching on abusive language. The introductory story and the story of the past are the same as in the Nandivasālajātaka above [Ja 28]. But in this case there is the difference that the Bodhisatta was an ox named Sārambha, and belonged to a brahmin of Taxila in the kingdom of Gandhāra.

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the bitter words spoken by the group of six. For, in those days the group of six, when they disagreed with respectable monks, used to taunt, revile and jeer them, and load them with the ten kinds of abuse. This the monks reported to the Fortunate One, who sent for the group of six and asked whether this charge was true. On their admitting its truth, he rebuked them, saying: “Monks, hard words gall even animals: in bygone days an animal made a man who had used harsh language to him lose a thousand pieces.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past at Taxila in the land of Gandhāra there was a king reigning there, and the Bodhisatta came to life as an ox. When he was quite a tiny calf, he was presented by his owners to a brahmin who came in – they being known to give away presents of oxen to such-like holy men. The brahmin called it Sārambha (Anger), and treated it like his own child, feeding the young creature on rice-gruel and rice. When the Bodhisatta grew up, he thought thus to himself, “I have been brought up by this brahmin with great pains, and all Jambudīpa cannot show the ox which can draw what I can. How if I were to repay the brahmin the cost of my nurture by making proof of my strength?” Accordingly, one day he said to the brahmin, “Go, brahmin, to some merchant rich in herds, and wager him a thousand pieces that your ox can draw a hundred loaded carts.”

The brahmin went his way to a merchant and got into a discussion with him as to whose oxen in the town were the strongest. “Oh, so-and-so’s, or so-and-so’s,” said the merchant. “But,” added he, “there are no oxen in the town which can compare with mine for real strength.” Said the brahmin, “I have an ox who can pull a hundred loaded carts.” “Where’s such an ox to be found?” laughed the merchant. “I’ve got him at home,” said the brahmin. “Make it a wager.” “Certainly,” said the brahmin, and staked a thousand pieces. Then he loaded a hundred carts with sand, gravel, and stones, and tied the lot together, one behind the other, by cords from the axle tree of the one in front to the trace-bar of its successor. This done, he bathed Sārambha, gave him a measure of perfumed rice to eat, hung a garland round his neck, and harnessed him all [1.72] alone to the leading cart. The brahmin in person took his seat upon the pole, and flourished his goad in the air, shouting, “Now then, you rascal! Pull them along, you rascal!”

329 [I include the story here, with suitable changes.]

“I’m not the rascal he calls me,” thought the Bodhisatta to himself; and so he planted his four feet like so many posts, and budged not an inch.

Straightaway, the merchant made the brahmin pay over the thousand pieces. His money gone, the brahmin took his ox out of the cart and went home, where he lay down on his bed in an agony of grief. When Sārambha strolled in and found the brahmin a prey to such grief, he went up to him and enquired if the brahmin were taking a nap. “How should I be taking a nap, when I have had a thousand pieces won of me?” “Brahmin, all the time I have lived in your house, have I ever broken a pot, or squeezed up against anybody, or made messes about?” “Never, my child.” “Then, why did you call me a rascal? It’s you who are to blame, not I. Go and bet him two thousand this time. Only remember not to call me rascal again.”

When he heard this, the brahmin went off to the merchant, and laid a wager of two thousand. Just as before, he tied the hundred carts to one another and harnessed Sārambha, very spruce and fine, to the leading cart. If you ask how he harnessed him, well, he did it in this way: first, he fastened the cross-yoke on to the pole; then he put the ox in on one side, and made the other fast by fastening a smooth piece of wood from the cross-yoke on to the axletree, so that the yoke was taut and could not skew round either way. Thus a single ox could draw a cart made to be drawn by two. So now seated on the pole, the brahmin stroked Sārambha on the back, and urged on him in this style, “Now then, my fine fellow! Pull them along, my fine fellow!” With a single pull the Bodhisatta tugged along the whole string of the hundred carts till the hindmost stood where the foremost had started. The merchant, rich in herds, paid up the two thousand pieces he had lost to the brahmin. Other folks, too, gave large sums to the Bodhisatta, and the whole passed into the hands of the brahmin. Thus did he gain greatly by reason of the Bodhisatta.
After telling the story of the past, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse:

1. “Speak kindly, revile not your fellow; Love kindness; reviling breeds sorrow.”

When the Teacher had ended his lesson he identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the brahmin of those days, Uppalavaṇṇā his wife, and I Sārāmbha.”

Ja 89 Kuhakajātaka

The Story about the Cheat (1s)

In the present one monk gets his living in dishonest ways. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of an ascetic in the past who tried to steal his supporter’s savings, all the while appearing as more than virtuous.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (paṇḍitapurisa), the cheating monk = the cheating ascetic (kūṭatāpasa).

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla, Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādiccupaṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Cheating, Dishonesty.

“How plausible.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about a cheat. The details of his cheating will be related in the Uddālajātaka [Ja 487].

This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there lived nearby a certain little village a shifty rascal of an ascetic, of the class which wears long, matted hair. The householder of the place had a hermitage built in the forest for him to dwell in, and used to provide excellent fare for him in his own house. Taking the matted-haired rascal to be a model of goodness, and living as he did in fear of robbers, the householder brought a hundred pieces of gold to the hermitage and there buried them, bidding the ascetic keep watch over them. “No need to say that, sir, to a man who has renounced the world; we ascetics never covet other folks’ goods.” “It is well, sir,” said the householder, who went off with full confidence in the other’s protestations.

Then the rascally ascetic thought to himself, “there's enough here \(1.376\) to keep a man all his life long.” Allowing a few days to elapse first, he removed the gold and buried it by the wayside, returning to dwell as before in his hermitage. Next day, after a meal of rice at the householder's house, the ascetic said: “It is now a long time, sir, since I began to be supported by you; and to live long in one place is like living in the world – which is forbidden to professed ascetics. Wherefore I must needs depart.” And though the householder pressed him to stay, nothing could overcome this determination. \[1.219\]

“Well, then, if it must be so, go your way, sir,” said the householder; and he escorted the ascetic to the outskirts before he left him. After going a little way the ascetic thought that it would be a good thing to cajole the householder; so, putting a straw in his matted hair, back he turned again. “What brings you back?” asked the householder. “A straw from your roof, sir, had stuck in my hair; and, as we ascetics may not take anything which is not bestowed upon us, I have brought it back to you.” “Throw it down, sir, and go your way,” said the householder, who thought, to himself, “Why, he won’t take so much as a straw which does not belong to him! What a sensitive nature!” Highly delighted with the ascetic, the householder bade him farewell.

Now at that time it chanced that the Bodhisatta, who was on his way to the border-district for trading purposes, had halted for the night at that village. Hearing what the ascetic said, the suspicion was aroused in his mind that the rascally ascetic must have robbed the householder of something; and he asked the latter whether he had deposited anything in the ascetic’s care.

“Yes – a hundred pieces of gold.”

“Well, just go and see if it’s all safe.”
Away went the householder to the hermitage, and looked, and found his money gone. Running back to the Bodhisatta, he cried, “It’s not there.” “The thief is none other than that long-haired rascal of an ascetic,” said the Bodhisatta, “let us pursue and catch him.” So away they hastened in hot pursuit. When they caught the rascal they kicked and cuffed him, till he discovered to them where he had hidden the money. When he procured the gold, the Bodhisatta, looking at it, scornfully remarked to the ascetic, “So a hundred pieces of gold didn’t trouble your conscience so much as a straw!” And he rebuked him in this verse:

1. “How plausible the story that the rascal told!
   How heedful of the straw! How heedless of the gold!” (1.377)

When the Bodhisatta had rebuked the fellow in this wise, he added, “And now take care, you deceitful person, that you don’t play such a trick again.” When his life ended, the Bodhisatta passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher said: “Thus you see, monks, that this monk was as cheating in the past as he is today.” And he identified the Jātaka by saying: “This cheating monk was the cheating ascetic of those days, and I the wise and good man.”

Ja 90 Akataññujātaka

The Story about Ingratitude (1s)

In the present a wealthy man from the border lands sends merchandise to Sāvatthi, asking his correspondent Anāthapiṇḍika to help exchange it, which he did. When the good man sends his produce to the border lands, however, his entourage is despised. Later, when another caravan arrives from the border it is pillaged and destroyed in revenge. The Buddha explains similar events that happened in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man from Benares (Bārāṇasīṣṭṭhi), the border dweller = the same in the past (paccantavāsi).

Present Source: Ja 90 Akataññu, Quoted at: Ja 363 Hiri.

Keywords: Ingratitude, Reciprocity.

“The man ungrateful.” [1.220] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about Anāthapiṇḍika.
On the borders, so the tale goes, there lived a merchant, who was a correspondent and a friend of Anāthapiṇḍika’s, but they had never met. There came a time when this merchant loaded five hundred carts with local produce and gave orders to the men in charge to go to the great merchant Anāthapiṇḍika, and barter the wares in his correspondent’s shop for their value, and bring back the goods received in exchange. So they came to Sāvatthi, and found Anāthapiṇḍika. First making him a present, they told him their business. “You are welcome,” said the great man, and ordered them to be lodged there and provided with money for their needs. After kindly enquiries after their master’s health, he bartered their merchandise and gave them the goods in exchange. Then they went back to their own district, and reported what had happened.

Shortly afterwards, Anāthapiṇḍika similarly dispatched five hundred carts with merchandise to the very district in which they dwelt; and his people, when they had got there, went, present in hand, to call upon the border merchant. “Where do you come from?” said he. “From Sāvatthi,” replied they, “from your correspondent, Anāthapiṇḍika.” “Anyone can call himself Anāthapiṇḍika,” said he with a sneer; and taking their present, he bade them begone, giving them neither lodging nor a gift. So they bartered their goods for themselves and brought back the wares in exchange to Sāvatthi, with the story of the reception they had had.

Now it chanced [1.378] that this border merchant dispatched another caravan of five hundred carts to Sāvatthi; and his people came with a present in their hands to wait upon Anāthapiṇḍika. But, as soon as Anāthapiṇḍika’s people caught sight of them, they said: “Oh, we’ll see, sir, that they are properly lodged, fed, and supplied with money for their needs.” And they took the strangers outside the city and bade them unyoke their carts at a suitable spot, adding that rice and a gift would come from Anāthapiṇḍika’s house. About the middle watch of the night, having collected a band of serving-men and slaves, they looted the whole caravan, carried off every garment the men had got, drove away their oxen, and took the wheels off the carts, leaving the latter but removing the wheels. Without so much as a shirt among the lot of them, the terrified strangers sped away and managed to reach their home on the border. Then Anāthapiṇḍika’s people told him the whole story. “This capital story,” said he, “shall be my gift to the Teacher today,” and away he went and told it to the Teacher.
“This is not the first time, sir,” said the Teacher, “that this border merchant has shown this disposition; he was just the same in days gone by.” Then, at Anāthapindika’s request, he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a very wealthy merchant in that city. And he too had as a correspondent a border merchant whom he had never seen and all came to pass as above. [1.221]

Being told by his people what they had done, he said: “This trouble is the result of their ingratitude for kindness shown them.” And he went on to instruct the assembled crowd in this verse:

1. “The man ungrateful for a kindly deed,
   Thenceforth shall find no helper in his need.”

After this wise did the Bodhisatta teach the truth in this verse. After a life spent in generosity and other good works, he passed away to fare according to his deeds. {1.379}

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The border merchant of today was the border merchant of those days also; and I was the merchant of Benares.”

Ja 91 Littajātaka

The Story about what is Smeared (with Poison) (1s)

In the present the monks are not thoughtful about the use of their requisites, which the Buddha compares to taking poison. The Buddha then tells a story about a gambler in the past who would hide dice in his mouth, until one of the dice was covered with poison, which cured him of his deceit.

The Bodhisatta = the wise gambler (paṇḍitadhutta).

Past Compare: DN 23 Pāyāsisutta (2.348).

Keywords: Thoughtlessness, Gambling.

“He bolts the die.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about using things thoughtlessly.
Tradition says that most of the monks of that day were in the habit of using robes and so forth, which were given them, in a thoughtless manner. And their thoughtless use of the Four Requisites as a rule barred their escape from the doom of rebirth in hell and the animal world. Knowing this, the Teacher set forth the lessons of virtue and showed the danger of such thoughtless use of things, exhorting them to be careful in the use of the Four Requisites, and laying down this rule, “The thoughtful monk has a definite object in view when he wears a robe, namely, to keep off the cold.” After laying down similar rules for the other Requisites, he concluded by saying: “Such is the thoughtful use which should be made of the Four Requisites. Thoughtlessly to use them is like taking deadly poison; and there were those in bygone days who through their thoughtlessness did inadvertently take poison, to their exceeding hurt in due season.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a well-to-do family, and when he grew up, he became a dice-player. With him used to play a sharper, who kept on playing while he was winning, but, when luck turned, broke up the game by putting one of the dice in his mouth and pretending it was lost – after which he would take himself off. \[1.380\] “Very good,” said the Bodhisatta \[1.222\] when he realised what was being done, “we'll look into this.” So he took some dice, anointed them at home with poison, dried them carefully, and then carried them with him to the sharper, whom he challenged to a game. The other was willing, the dice-board was got ready, and play began. No sooner did the sharper begin to lose than he popped one of the dice into his mouth. Observing him in the act, the Bodhisatta remarked, “Swallow away; you will not fail to find out what it really is in a little time.” And he uttered this verse of rebuke:

1. “He bolts the die quite boldly – knowing not
What burning poison thereon lurks unseen.
Aye, bolt it, sharper! Soon you'll burn within.”

But while the Bodhisatta was talking away, the poison began to work on the sharper; he grew faint, rolled his eyes, and bending double with pain fell to the ground. “Now,” said the Bodhisatta, “I must save the rascal's life.” So he mixed some medicines and administered an emetic until vomiting ensued. Then he administered a draught of ghee with honey and sugar and other ingredients, and by this means made the fellow all right again. Then he exhorted him not to do such a thing again. After a life spent in generosity and other good works, the Bodhisatta passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher said: “Monks, the thoughtless use of things is like the thoughtless taking of deadly poison.” So saying, he identified the Jātaka in these words, “I was myself the wise and good gambler of those days.”

(Pāli Note. No mention is made of the sharper – the reason being that, here as elsewhere, no mention is made of persons who are not clearly known about at this time.)

Ja 92 Mahāsārajātaka

The Story about the Rich Man (1s)

In the present the king of Kosala has one of his crown jewels go missing, and worries his whole household while searching for it. Ven. Ānanda, by a ruse, has the thief return the jewel anonymously. The Buddha tells a story of how in a previous life he had found a string of pearls a monkey had stolen, and retrieved them for the king.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 92 Mahāsāra,
Quoted at: a 157 Guṇa, Ja 259 Tirīṭavaccha, Ja 302 Mahā-assāroha.

Keywords: Theft, Wisdom, Animals.

“For war men crave.” (1.381) This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the venerable Ānanda.

Once the wives of the king of Kosala thought among themselves, as follows, “Very rare is the coming of a Buddha; and very rare is birth in a human form with all one’s faculties in perfection. Yet, though we have happened on a human form in a Buddha’s lifetime, we cannot go at will to the monastery to hear the [1.223] truth from his own lips, to do obeisance, and to make offerings to him. We live here as in a box. Let us ask the king to send for a fitting monk to come here and teach us the truth. Let us learn what we can from him, and be charitable and do good works, to the end that we may profit by our having been born at this happy juncture.” So they all went in a body to the king, and told him what was in their minds; and the king gave his consent.
“The Section with One Verse – 456

Now it fell out on a day that the king was minded to take his pleasure in the royal pleasure gardens, and gave orders that the grounds should be made ready for his coming. As the gardener was working away, he espied the Teacher seated at the foot of a tree. So he went to the king and said: “The pleasure gardens is made ready, sire; but the Fortunate One is sitting there at the foot of a tree.” “Very good,” said the king, “we will go and hear the Teacher.” Mounting his chariot of state, he went to the Teacher in the pleasure gardens.

Now there was then seated at the Teacher’s feet, listening to his teaching, a lay brother named Chattapāṇi [Parasol Holder], who had entered the Third Path. On catching sight of this lay brother, the king hesitated; but, on reflection that this must be a virtuous man, or he would not be sitting by the Teacher for instruction, he approached and with a bow seated himself on one side of the Teacher. Out of reverence for the supreme Buddha, the lay brother neither rose in the king’s honour nor saluted his majesty; and this made the king very angry. Noticing the king’s displeasure, the Teacher proceeded to extol the merits of that lay brother, saying: “Sire, this lay brother is master of all tradition; he knows by heart the discourses that have been handed down; and he has set himself free from the bondage of passion.” “Surely,” thought the king, “he whose praises the Teacher is telling can be no ordinary person.” And he said to him, “Let me know, lay brother, if you are in need of anything.” “Thank you,” said the man. Then the king listened to the Teacher’s teaching, and at its close rose up and ceremoniously withdrew.

Another day, meeting that same lay brother going after breakfast umbrella in hand to Jetavana, the king had him summoned to his presence and said: “I hear, lay brother, that you are a man of great learning. Now my wives are very anxious to hear and learn the truth; I should be glad if you would teach them.” “It is not meet, sire, that a layman should expound or teach the truth in the king’s harem; that is the prerogative of the monks.”

Recognising the force of this remark, the king, after dismissing the layman, called his wives together and announced to them his intention of sending to the Teacher for one of the monks to come as their instructor in the Dhamma. Which of the eighty chief disciples would they have? After talking it over together, the ladies with one accord chose Ānanda the elder, surnamed the Treasurer of the Dhamma [Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika]. So the king went to the Teacher and with a courteous greeting sat down by his side, after which he proceeded to state his wives’ wish, and his own hope, that Ānanda might be their teacher. The Teacher, having consented to send Ānanda, the king’s wives now began to be regularly taught by the elder and to learn from him.

One day the jewel out of the king’s turban was missing. When the king heard of the loss he sent for his ministers and bade them seize everyone who had access to the precincts and find the jewel. So the Ministers searched everybody, women and all, for the missing jewel, till they had worried everybody almost out of their lives; but no trace of it could they find. That day Ānanda came to the palace, only to find the king’s wives as dejected as they had hitherto been delighted when he taught them. “What has made you like this today?” asked the elder. “Oh, sir,” they said, “the king has lost the jewel out of his turban; and by his orders the ministers are worrying everybody, women and all, out of their lives, in order to find it. We can’t say what may not happen to any one of us; and that is why we are so sad.” “Don’t think [1.224] any more about it,” said the elder cheerily, as he went to find the king.

Taking the seat set for him, the elder asked whether it was true that his majesty had lost his jewel. “Quite true, sir,” said the king. “And can it not be found?” “I have had all the inmates of the palaces worried out of their lives, and yet I can’t find it.” “There is one way, sire, to find it, without worrying people out of their lives.” “What way is that, sir?” “By wisp-giving, sire.” “Wisp-giving? What may that be, pray?” “Call together, sire, all the persons you suspect, and privately give each one of them separately a wisp of straw, or a lump of clay will do, saying, ‘Take this and put it in such and such a place tomorrow at daybreak.’ The man that took the jewel will put it in the straw or clay, and so bring it back. If it be brought back the very first day, well and good. If not, the same thing must be done 330 Ānanda held ‘advanced views on the woman question.’ It was he who persuaded the reluctant Buddha into admitting women to the Saṅgha, as recorded in the Vinaya (Sacred Books of the East xx, 320 et seq.).

---

on the second and third days. In this way, a large number of persons will escape worry, and you will get your jewel back.” With these words the elder departed.

Following the above counsel, the king caused the straw and clay to be dealt out for three successive days; but yet the jewel was not recovered. {1.383} On the third day the elder came again, and asked whether the jewel had been brought back. “No, sir,” said the king. “Then, sire, you must have a large waterpot set in a retired corner of your courtyard, and you must have the pot filled with water and a screen put up before it. Then give orders that all who frequent the precincts, men and women alike, are to put off their outer-garments, and one by one wash their hands behind the screen and then come back.” With this advice the elder departed. And the king did as he bade.

Thought the thief, “Ānanda has seriously taken the matter in hand; and, if he does not find the jewel, he’ll not let things rest here. The time has really come to give the jewel up without more ado.” So he secreted the jewel about his person, and going behind the screen, dropped it in the water before he went away. When everyone had gone, the pot was emptied, and the jewel found. “It’s all owing to the elder,” exclaimed the king in his joy, “that I have got my jewel back, and that without worrying a host of people out of their lives.” And all the persons about the precincts were equally grateful to Ānanda for the trouble he had saved them from.

The story how Ānanda’s marvellous powers had found the jewel, spread through all the city, till it reached the Saṅgha. Said the monks, “The great knowledge, learning, and the skill in means of the elder Ānanda have been the means at once of recovering the lost jewel and of saving many persons from being worried out of their lives.”

And as they sat together in the Dhamma Hall, singing the praises of Ānanda, the Teacher entered and asked the subject of their conversation. Being told, he said: “Monks, this is not the first time that what had been stolen has been found, nor is Ānanda the only one who has brought about such a discovery. In bygone days too the wise and good discovered what had been stolen away, and also saved a host of people from trouble, showing that the lost property had fallen into the hands of animals.” So saying, he told this story of the past.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta, having completed his education, became one of the king’s ministers. One day the king with a large following went into his pleasure gardens, and, after walking about the woods, felt a desire to disport himself in the water. So he went down into the royal tank and sent for his harem. The women of the harem, removing the jewels from their heads and necks and so forth, laid them aside with their upper garments in boxes under the charge of female slaves, and then went down into the water.

Now, as the queen was taking off her jewels and ornaments, and laying them with her upper robe on a box, she was watched by a female monkey, which was hidden in the branches of a tree nearby. Conceiving a longing to wear the queen’s pearl necklace, this monkey watched for the slave in charge to be off her guard. At first the girl kept looking all about her in order to keep the jewels safe; but as time wore on, she began to nod. As soon as the monkey saw this, quick as the wind she jumped down, and quick as the wind she was up the tree again, with the pearls round her own neck. Then, for fear the other monkeys should see it, she hid the string of pearls in a hole in the tree and sat on guard over her spoils as demurely as though nothing had happened.

By and by the slave awoke, and, terrified at finding the jewels gone, saw nothing else to do but to scream out, “A man has run off with the queen’s pearl necklace.” Up ran the guards from every side, and hearing this story told it to the king. “Catch the thief,” said his majesty; and away went the guards searching high and low for the thief in the pleasure gardens. Hearing the din, a poor superstitious rustic took to his heels in alarm. “There he goes,” cried the guards, catching sight of the runaway; and they followed him up till they caught him, and with blows demanded what he meant by stealing such precious jewels.

He thought: “If I deny the charge, I shall die with the beating I shall get from these ruffians. I’d better say I took it.” So he confessed to theft and was hauled off a prisoner to the king. “Did you take those precious jewels?” asked the king. “Yes, your majesty.” “Where are they now?” “Please your majesty, I’m a poor man; I’ve never in my life owned anything, even a bed or a chair, of any value – much less a jewel. It was the Treasurer who made me take that valuable necklace; and I took it and gave it to him. He knows all about it.”

331 Or perhaps “a taxpaying peasant.”

Then the king sent for the Treasurer, and asked whether the rustic had passed the necklace on to him. “Yes, sire,” was the answer. “Where is it then?” “I gave it to your majesty's family priest.” Then the family priest was sent for, and interrogated in the same way. And he said he had given it to the chief musician, who in his turn said he had given it to a courtesan as a present. But she, being brought before the king, utterly denied ever having received it.

While the five were thus being questioned, the sun set. “It’s too late now,” said the king, “we will look into this tomorrow.” So he handed the five over to his ministers and went back into the city.

Hereupon the Bodhisatta fell thinking. “These jewels,” he thought, “were lost inside the grounds, while the rustic was outside. There was a strong guard at the gates, and it was impossible for anyone inside to get away with the necklace. I do not see how anyone, whether inside or out, could have managed to secure it. The truth is this poor wretched fellow must have said he gave it to the Treasurer merely in order to save his own skin; and the Treasurer must have said he gave it to the family priest, in the hope that he would get off if he could mix the family priest up in the matter. Further, the family priest must have said he gave it to the chief musician, because he thought the latter would make the time pass merrily in prison; while the chief musician’s object in implicating the courtesan, was simply to solace himself with her company during imprisonment. Not one of the whole five has anything to do with theft. On the other hand, the grounds swarm with monkeys, and the necklace must have got into the hands of one of the female monkeys.”

When he had arrived at this conclusion, the Bodhisatta went to the king with the request that the suspects might be handed over to him and that he might be allowed to examine personally into the matter. “By all means, my wise friend,” said the king, “examine into it.”

Then the Bodhisatta sent for his servants and told them where to lodge the five prisoners, saying: “Keep strict watch over them; listen to everything they say, and report it all to me,” And his servants did as he bade them. As the prisoners sat together, the Treasurer said to the rustic, “Tell me, you wretch, where you and I ever met before this day; tell me when you gave me that necklace.” “Worshipful sir,” said the other, “it has never been mine to own anything so valuable even as a stool or bedstead that wasn’t rickety. I thought that with your help I should get out of this trouble, and that’s why I said what I did. Be not angry with me, my lord.”

Said the family priest in his turn to the Treasurer, “How then came you to pass on to me what this fellow had never given to you?” “I only said so because I thought that if you and I, both high officers of state, stand together, we can soon put the matter right.” “Brahmin,” now said the chief musician to the family priest, “when, pray, did you give the jewel to me?” “I only said I did,” answered the family priest, “because I thought you would help to make the time pass more agreeably.” Lastly the courtesan said: “Oh, you wretch of a musician, you know you never visited me, nor I you. So when could you have given me the necklace, as you say?” “Why be angry, my dear?” said the musician, “we five have got to keep house together for a bit; so let us put a cheerful face on it and be happy together.”

This conversation being reported to the Bodhisatta by his agents, he felt convinced the five were all innocent of the robbery, and that a female monkey had taken the necklace. “And I must find a means to make her drop it,” said he to himself. So he had a number of bead necklaces made. Next he had a number of monkeys caught and turned loose again, with strings of beads on their necks, wrists and ankles. Meantime, the guilty monkey kept sitting in the trees watching her treasure. Then the Bodhisatta ordered a number of men to carefully observe every monkey in the grounds, till they saw one wearing the missing pearl necklace, and then frighten her into dropping it.

Tricked out in their new splendour, the other monkeys strutted about till they came to the real thief, before whom they flaunted their finery. Jealousy overcoming her prudence, she exclaimed, “They’re only beads!” and put on her own necklace of real pearls. This was at once seen by the watchers, who promptly made her drop the necklace, which they picked up and brought to the Bodhisatta. He took it to the king, saying: “Here, sire, is the necklace. The five prisoners are innocent; it was a female monkey in the pleasure gardens that took it.” “How came you to find that out?” asked the king, “and how did you manage to get possession of it again?” Then the Bodhisatta told the whole story, and the king thanked
The Bodhisatta, saying: “You are the right man in the right place.” And he uttered this verse in praise of the Bodhisatta:

1. “For war men crave the hero’s might,
   For counsel sage sobriety,
   Boon comrades for their jollity,
   But judgment when in parlous plight.”

Over and above these words of praise and gratitude, the king showered treasures upon the Bodhisatta like a storm-cloud pouring rain from the heavens. After following the Bodhisatta’s counsels through a long life spent in generosity and good works, the king passed away to fare thereafter according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher, after extolling the elder’s merits, identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was the king of those days and I his wise counsellor.”

Ja 93 Vissāśabhojanajātaka

The Story about Using Things on Trust (1s)

In the present the monks use requisites given by their relatives without circumspection, which the Buddha says is wrong and is like taking poison. He then tells a story of the past when a lion was tricked into licking a doe that had had poison spread over it, and so died.

The Bodhisatta = the great wealthy man (mahāsēṭṭhi).

Keyword: The dangers of trust, Devas, Animals.

“Trust not the trusted.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about taking things on trust.

 Tradition tells us that in those days the monks, for the most part, used to rest content if anything was given them by their mothers or fathers, brothers or sisters, or uncles or aunts, or other kinsfolk. Arguing that in their lay state they had as a matter of course received things from the same hands, they, as monks, [1.228] likewise showed no circumspection or caution before using food, clothing and other requisites which their relations gave them. Observing this the Teacher felt that he must read the monks a lesson. So he called them together, and said: “Monks, no matter whether {1.388} the giver be a relation or not, let circumspection accompany use. The monk who without circumspection uses the requisites which are given to him, may entail on himself a subsequent existence as a Yakkha or as a ghost. Use without circumspection is like unto taking poison; and poison kills just the same, whether it be given by a relative or by a stranger. There were those who in bygone days actually did take poison because it was offered by those near and dear to them, and thereby they met their end.” So saying, he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a very wealthy merchant. He had a herdsman who, when the corn was growing thick, drove his cows to the forest and kept them there at a small hut, bringing the produce from time to time to the merchant. Now nearby the hut in the forest there dwelt a lion; and so afraid of the lion were the cows that they gave but little milk. So when the herdsman brought in his ghee one day, the merchant asked why there was so little of it. Then the herdsman told him the reason. “Well, has the lion formed an attachment to anything?” “Yes, master; he's fond of a doe.” “Could you catch that doe?” “Yes, master.” “Well, catch her, and rub her all over with poison and sugar, and let her dry. Keep her a day or two, and then turn her loose. Because of his affection for her, the lion will lick her all over with his tongue, and die. Take his hide with the claws and teeth and fat, and bring them back to me.” So saying, he gave deadly poison to the herdsman and sent him off. With the aid of a net which he made, the herdsman caught the doe and carried out the Bodhisatta’s orders.

As soon as he saw the doe again, the lion, in his great love for her, licked her with his tongue so that he died. And the herdsman took the lion’s hide and the rest, and brought them to the Bodhisatta, who said: “Affection for others should be eschewed. Mark how, for all his strength, the king of beasts, the lion, was led by his love for a doe to poison himself by licking her and so to die.” So saying, he uttered this verse for the instruction of those gathered around: {1.389}

1. “Trust not the trusted, nor th' untrusted trust; Trust kills; through trust the lion bit the dust.”

Such was the lesson which the Bodhisatta taught to those around him. After a life spent in generosity and other good works, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.
His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the merchant of those days.”

Ja 94 Lomahamsajātaka

The Story about the Bristling Hair (1s)

In the present one monk leaves the Saṅgha in order to follow a false ascetic and goes round blaming the Buddha. The Buddha declares his own worthiness and tells how, in a past life, he had personally enquired into the heretic’s false doctrines and lived them to the full, before rejecting them.

The Bodhisatta = an ascetic (ājīvaka).

Present Compare: MN 12, Mahāsīhanādasuttaṁ.

Keywords: Equanimity, Asceticism, Apostasy.

“Now scorched.” [1.229] This story the Teacher told while at Pāṭikārāma near Vesāli, about Sunakkhatta.

For at that time Sunakkhatta, having become an adherent of the Teacher, was travelling about the country as a monk with bowl and robes, when he was perverted to the tenets of Kora the Noble [Korakhattiya]. So he returned to the One with Ten Powers his bowl and robes and reverted to a lay life by reason of Kora the Noble, about the time when this latter had been reborn as the offspring of the Kālakañjaka Asura. And he went about within the three walls of Vesāli defaming the Teacher by affirming that there was nothing superhuman about the ascetic Gotama, who was not distinguished from other men by preaching a dispensation which leads to safety; that the ascetic Gotama had simply worked out a system which was the outcome of his own individual thought and study; and that the ideal for the attainment of which his Dhamma was preached, did not lead to the destruction of sorrow in those who followed it.332

Now the venerable Sāriputta was on his round for alms when he heard Sunakkhatta’s blasphemies; and on his return from his round he reported this to the Fortunate One. Said the Teacher, “Sunakkhatta is a hot-headed person,

---

332 This is a quotation from the MN i. 68 [MN 11 Cūḷasīhanādasutta].
Sāriputta, and speaks idle words. His hot-headedness has led him to talk like this and to deny the saving grace of my Dhamma. Unwittingly, this foolish person is extolling me; I say unwittingly, for he has no knowledge \{1.390\} of my efficacy. In me, Sāriputta, dwell the Six Super Knowledges, and herein am I more than human; the Ten Powers are within me, and the Four Grounds of Confidence. I know the limits of the four types of earthly existence and the five states of possible rebirth after earthly death. This too is a superhuman quality in me; and whoso denies it must retract his words, change his belief, and renounce his heresy, or he will without ado be cast into hell.”

Having thus magnified the superhuman nature and power which existed within him, the Teacher went on to say, “Sunakkhatta, I hear, Sāriputta, took delight in the misguided self-mortifications of the asceticism of Kora the Noble; and therefore it was that he could take no pleasure in me. Ninety-one aeons ago I lived the higher life in all its four forms,³³³ examining into that false asceticism to discover whether the truth abode therein. An ascetic was I, the chief of ascetics; worn and emaciated was I, beyond all others; loathing of comfort had I, a loathing surpassing that of all others; I dwelt apart, and unapproachable was my passion for solitude.” Then, at the elder’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past, ninety-one aeons ago, the Bodhisatta set himself to examine into false asceticism. So he became a recluse, according to the Naked Ascetics (Ājīvikas) – uncloth ed and covered with dust, solitary and lonely, fleeing like a deer from the face of men; his food was small \[1.230\] fish, cowdung, and other refuse; and in order that his vigil might not be disturbed, he took up his abode in a dread thicket in the jungle.

In the snows of winter, he came forth by night from the sheltering thicket to the open air, returning with the sunrise to his thicket again; and, as he was wet with the driving snows by night, so in the day time he was drenched by the drizzle from the branches of the thicket. Thus day and night alike he endured the extremity of cold. In summer, he abode by day in the open air, and by night in the forest – scorched by the blazing sun by day, and fanned by no cooling breezes by night, so that the sweat streamed from him. And there presented itself to his mind this verse, which was new and never uttered before:

³³³ \textit{i.e.} as a learner, householder, \textit{réligieux}, and recluse.

1. “Now scorched, now froz’n, lone in the lonesome woods,
   Beside no fire, but all afire within,
   Naked, the ascetic wrestles for the truth.” {1.391}

But when after a life spent in the rigours of this asceticism, the vision of hell rose before the Bodhisatta as he lay dying, he realised the worthlessness of all his austerities, and in that supreme moment broke away from his delusions, laid hold of the real truth, and was reborn in the Heaven of Devas.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the naked ascetic of those days.”

Ja 95 Mahāsudassanajātaka

The Story about (King) Mahāsudassana (1s)

In the present the Buddha is coming to the end of his life, and chooses to pass away in Kusinārā, a small town that had been great in the past, but was now in decline. He tells the story of a past life when he was a great king who also choose to pass away in the very same town.

The Bodhisatta = (king) Mahāsudassana,
Rāhulamātā = queen Subhaddā (Subhaddādevī),
Rāhula = the leader’s jewel (of a son) (parināyakaratana),
the Buddha’s disciples = the rest of the cast (sesaparisā).

Past Compare: DN 17 Mahāsudassanasutta, Cp 4 Mahāsudassanacariyā.

Keywords: Impermanence, Emancipation.

---

334 For the evolution of this Jātaka, see DN 16 Mahāparinibbānasutta and DN 17 Mahāsudassanasutta, translated by Prof. Rhys Davids in his volume of “Buddhist Suttas.”
“How transient.” This story was told by the Teacher as he lay on his death-bed, concerning Ānanda’s words, “O Fortunate One, suffer not your end to be in this sorry little town.”

“When the Tathāgata was dwelling at Jetavana,” thought the Teacher, “the elder Sāriputta, who was born in Nāla village, died at Varaka in the month of Kattikā, when the moon was at the full; and in the self-same month, when the [1.231] moon was on the wane, the great Moggallāna died. My two chief disciples being dead, I too will pass away, in Kusinārā.” So thought the Fortunate One; and coming in his alms pilgrimage to Kusinārā, there upon the northward bench between the twin Sāl trees he lay down never to rise again. Then said the elder Ānanda, “O Fortunate One, suffer not your end to be in this sorry little town, this rough little town in the jungle, this little suburban town. Shall not Rājagaha or some other large city be the death-place of the Buddha?”

“Nay, Ānanda,” said the Teacher, “call not this a sorry little town, a rough little town in the jungle, a little suburban town. In bygone days, in the days of Sudassana’s Universal Monarchy, it was in this town that I had my dwelling. It was then a mighty city encompassed by jewelled walls [1.392] twelve leagues round.” Therewithal, at the elder’s request, he told this story of the past and uttered the Mahāsūdassanasutta.

Then it was that Sudassana’s queen Subhaddā marked how, after coming down from the Palace of Dhamma, her lord was lying nearby on his right side on the couch prepared for him in the reed-grove which was all of gold and jewels – that couch from which he was not to rise again. And she said: “Eighty-four thousand cities, chief of which is the royal-city of Kusāvatī, own your sovereignty, sire. Set your heart on them.”

“Say not so, my queen,” said Sudassana, “rather exhort me, saying, ‘Keep your heart set on this town, and yearn not after those others.’ ” “Why so, my lord?” “Because I shall die today,” answered the king.

---

335 For the death of Moggallāna, see Fausböll’s Dhp p. 298, and Bigandet, op. cit.
336 [DN 17], translated by Rhys Davids in Vol. xi. of the Sacred Books of the East.
337 See pp. 267 and 277 of Vol. xi. of the Sacred Books of the East for this reed-grove.
In tears, wiping her streaming eyes, the queen managed to sob out the words the king bade her say. Then she broke into weeping and lamentation; and the other women of the harem, to the number of eighty-four thousand, also wept and wailed; nor could any of the courtiers forbear, but all alike joined in one universal lament.

“Peace!” said the Bodhisatta; and at his word their lamentation was stilled. Then, turning to the queen, he said: “Weep not, my queen, nor wail. For, even down to a tiny seed of sesamum, there is no such thing as a compounded thing which is permanent; all are transient, all must break up.” Then, for the queen’s behoof, he uttered this verse:

1. “How transient are all component things!
   Growth is their nature, and decay:
   They are produced, they are dissolved again:
   And that is best – when they have sunk to rest.”

Thus did the great Sudassana lead his discourse up to ambrosial Nibbāna as its goal. Moreover, to the rest of the multitude he gave the exhortation to be charitable, to obey the Precepts, and to keep hallowed the fast days. The destiny he won was to be reborn thereafter in the Realm of Devas.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The mother of Rāhula was the queen Subhaddā of those days; Rāhula was the king’s eldest son; the disciples of the Buddha were his courtiers; and I myself the great Sudassana.”

---

338 This translation is borrowed from the Hibbert Lectures of Prof. Rhys Davids (2nd edition, p. 212), where a translation is given of the commentary on these “perhaps the most frequently quoted and most popular verses in Pāli Buddhist books.”

339 This is the general style in the canon of the wife of Gotama the Buddha. Cf. Oldenberg’s Vinaya, Vol. i. page 82, and the translation in Sacred Books of the East, Vol. xiii. p. 208. It is not however correct to say that the Vinaya passage is “the only passage in the Pāli Piṭakas which mentions this lady.” For she is mentioned in the Buddhavaṁsa (PTS edition, page 65), and her name is there given as Bhaddakaccā.
Ja 96 Telapattajātaka
The Story about the bowl of Oil (1s)

Alternative Title: Takkasilājātaka (Comm)

In the present the Buddha gives a teaching on how mindfulness would be established in one threatened by death, and exhorts the monks to do likewise. He then tells a story of how he once guarded himself even from heavenly charms and gained a kingdom, while others, lacking mindfulness perished.

The Bodhisatta = the prince who gained a kingdom (rajjappattakumāra), the Buddha’s disciples = the king’s followers (rājaparisā).

Present Source: Ja 96 Telapatta,
Quoted at: Ja 132 Pañcagaru.

Keywords: Mindfulness, Sense-control, Devas.

“As one with care.” This story was told by the Teacher while dwelling in a forest near the town of Desaka in the Sumbha country, concerning the Janapadakalyāṇisutta. For on that occasion the Fortunate One said: “Just as if, monks, a great crowd were to gather together, crying ‘Hail to the Belle of the Land! Hail to the Belle of the Land!’ and just as if in like manner a greater crowd were to gather together, crying ‘The Belle of the Land is singing and dancing;’ and then suppose there came a man fond of life, fearful of death, fond of pleasure, and averse to pain, and suppose such a one were addressed as follows – ‘Hi, there! You are to carry this pot of oil, which is full to the brim, between the crowd and the Belle of the Land; a man with a drawn sword will follow in your footsteps; and if you spill a single drop, he will cut off your head;’ what think you, monks? Would that man, under these circumstances, be careless, and take no pains in carrying that pot of oil?” “By no manner of means, sir.” “This is an allegory, which I framed to make my meaning clear, monks; and here is its meaning: The brimming pot of oil typifies a collected state of mind as regards things concerning the body, and the lesson to be learned is that such mindfulness should be practised and perfected. Fail not in this, monks.” So saying, the Teacher gave forth the Sutta concerning the Belle of the Land, with both text and interpretation. {1.395} Then, by way of application, the Fortunate One went on to say, “A monk desirous of practising right mindfulness concerning the body, should be as careful not to let his mindfulness drop, as the man in the allegory was not to let drop the pot of oil.”

340 [SN 47.20.] A Pāli summary of it has been left untranslated, as adding little or nothing to the above ‘Story of the Present.’

When they had heard the Sutta and its meaning, the monks said: “It was a hard task, sir, for the man to pass by with the pot of oil without gazing on the charms of the Belle of the Land.” “Not hard at all, monks; it was quite an easy task – easy for the very good reason that he was escorted along by one who threatened him with a drawn sword. But it was a truly hard task for the wise and good of bygone days to preserve right mindfulness and to curb their passions so as not to look at celestial beauty in all its perfection. Still they triumphed, and passing on won a kingdom.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was the youngest of the king’s hundred sons, and grew up to manhood. Now in those days there were Paccekabuddhas who used to come to take their meals at the palace, and the Bodhisatta ministered to them.

Thinking one day of the great number of brothers he had, the Bodhisatta asked himself whether there was any likelihood of his coming to the his father’s throne in that city, and determined to ask the Paccekabuddhas to tell him what should come to pass. Next day the Buddhas came, took the waterpot that was consecrated to holy uses, filtered the water, washed and dried their feet, and sat down to their meal. And as they sat, the Bodhisatta came and seating himself by them with a courteous salutation, put his question. And they answered and said: “Prince, you will never come to be king in this city. But in Gandhāra, two thousand leagues away, there stands the city of Taxila. If you can reach that city, in seven days you will become king there. But there is peril on the road there, in journeying through a great forest. It is double the distance round the forest than it is to pass through it. Amanussas have their dwelling therein, and Yakkhinis make villages and houses arise by the wayside. Beneath a goodly canopy embroidered with stars overhead, their magic sets a costly couch shut in by fair curtains of wondrous dye. Arranged in celestial splendour the Yakkhinis sit within their abodes, seducing wayfarers {1.396} with honied words. ‘Weary you seem,’ they say, ‘come here, and eat and drink before you journey further on your way.’ Those that come at their bidding are given seats and fired to lust by the charm of their wanton beauty. But scarce have they sinned, before the Yakkhinis slay them and eat them while the warm blood is still flowing. And they ensnare men’s senses; captivating the sense of beauty with utter loveliness, the ear with sweet minstrelsy, the nostrils with heavenly odours, the taste with heavenly dainties of exquisite savour, and the touch with red-cushioned couches divinely soft. But if you can subdue your senses, and be strong in your resolve not to look upon them, then on the seventh day you will become king of the city of Taxila.”

“Oh, sirs; how could I look upon the Yakkhinis after your advice to me?” So saying, the Bodhisatta besought the Pacceka-buddhas to give him something to keep him safe on his journey. Receiving from them a charmed thread and some charmed sand, he first bade farewell to the Pacceka-buddhas and to his father and mother; and then, going to his own abode, he addressed his household as follows, “I am going to Taxila to make myself king there. You will stop behind here.” But five of them answered, “Let us go too.”

“You may not come with me,” answered the Bodhisatta, “for I am told that the way is beset by Yakkhinis who captivate men’s senses, and destroy those who succumb to their charms. Great is the danger, but I will rely on myself and go.”

“If we go with you, prince, we should not gaze upon their baleful charms. We too will go to Taxila.” “Then show yourselves steadfast,” said the Bodhisatta, and took those five with him on his journey.

The Yakkhinis sat waiting by the way in their villages. And one of the five, the lover of beauty, looked upon the Yakkhinis, and being ensnared by their beauty, lagged behind the rest. “Why are you dropping behind?” asked the Bodhisatta. “My feet hurt me, prince. I’ll just sit down for a bit in one of these pavilions, and then catch you up.” “My good man, these are Yakkhinis; don’t hanker after them.” “Be that as it may, prince, I can’t go any further.” “Well, you will soon be shown in your real colours,” said the Bodhisatta, as he went on with the other four.

Yielding to his senses, the lover of beauty drew near to the Yakkhinis, who tempted him to wrong, and killed him then and there. Thereon they departed, and further along the road raised by magic arts a new pavilion, in which they sat singing to the music of divers instruments. And now the lover of music dropped behind and was eaten. Then the Yakkhinis went on further and sat waiting in a bazaar stocked with all sweet scents and perfumes. And here the lover of sweet-smelling things fell behind. And when they had eaten him, they went on further and sat in a provision-booth where a profusion of heavenly viands of exquisite savour was offered for sale. And here the gourmet fell behind. And when they had eaten him, they went on further, and sat on heavenly couches wrought by their magic arts. And here the lover of comfort fell behind. And him too they ate.

Only the Bodhisatta was left now. And one of the Yakkhinis followed him, promising herself that for all his stern resolution she would succeed in devouring him before she turned back. Further on in the forest, woodmen and others, seeing the Yakkhini, asked her who the man was that walked on ahead.

“He is my husband, good gentlemen.”

“Hi, there!” said they to the Bodhisatta, “when you have got a sweet young wife, fair as the flowers, to leave her home and put her trust in you, why don’t you walk with her instead of letting her trudge wearily behind you?” “She is no wife of mine, but a Yakkhini. She has eaten my five companions.” “Alas, good gentlemen,” said she, “anger will drive men to say their very wives are Yakkhinis and Petas.”

Next, she simulated pregnancy and then the look of a woman who has borne one child; and child on hip, she followed after the Bodhisatta. Everyone they met asked just the same questions about the pair, and the Bodhisatta gave just the same answer as he journeyed on.

At last he came to Taxila, where the Yakkhini made the child disappear, and followed alone. At the gates of the city the Bodhisatta entered a rest house and sat down. Because of the Bodhisatta’s efficacy and power, she could not enter too; so she arrayed herself in divine beauty and stood on the threshold.

The king of Taxila was at that moment passing by on his way to his pleasure gardens, and was snared by her loveliness. “Go, find out,” said he to an attendant, “whether she has a husband with her or not.” And when the messenger came and asked whether she had a husband with her, she said: “Yes, sir; my husband is sitting within in the chamber.”
“She is no wife of mine,” said the Bodhisatta. “She is a Yakkhini and has eaten my five companions.”

And, as before, she said: “Alas, good gentlemen, anger will drive men to say anything that comes into their heads.”

Then the man went back to the king and told him what each had said. “Treasure-trove is a royal perquisite,” said the king. And he sent for the Yakkhini and had her seated on the back of his elephant. After a solemn procession round the city, the king came back to his palace and had the Yakkhini lodged in the apartments reserved for a queen-consort. After bathing and perfuming himself, the king ate his evening meal and then lay down on his royal bed. The Yakkhini too prepared herself a meal, and donned all her splendour. And as she lay by the side of the delighted king, she turned on to her side and burst into tears. Being asked why she wept, she said: “Sire, you found me by the wayside, and the women of the harem are many. Dwelling here among enemies I shall feel crushed when they say ‘Who knows who your father and mother are, or anything about your family? You were picked up by the wayside.’ But if your majesty would give me power and authority over the whole kingdom, nobody would dare to annoy me with such taunts.”

“Sweetheart, I have no power over those that dwell throughout my kingdom; I am not their lord and master. I have only jurisdiction over those who revolt or do iniquity. So I cannot give you power and authority over the whole kingdom.”

“Then, sire, if you cannot give me authority over the kingdom or over the city, at least give me authority within the palace, that I may have rule here over those that dwell in the palace.”

Too deeply smitten with her charms to refuse, the king gave her authority over all within the palace and bade her have rule over them. \(1.399\) Contented, she waited till the king was asleep, and then making her way to the city of the Yakkhas returned with the whole crew of Yakkhas to the palace. And she herself slew the king and devoured him, skin, tendons and flesh, leaving only the bare bones. And the rest of the Yakkhas entering the gate devoured everything as it came in their way, not leaving even a fowl or a dog alive. Next day when people came and found the gate shut, they beat on it with impatient cries, and effected an entrance – only to find the whole palace strewn with bones. And they exclaimed, “So the man was right in saying she was not his wife but a Yakkhini. Lacking wisdom the king brought her home to be his wife, and doubtless she has assembled the other Yakkhas, devoured everybody, and then made off.”

---

\(^{341}\) cf. Milindapañha 359 for an exposition of the limited prerogative of kings.

Now on that day the Bodhisatta, with the charmed sand on his head and the charmed thread twisted round his brow, was standing in the rest house, sword in hand, waiting for the dawn. Those others, meantime, cleansed the palace, garnished the floors afresh, sprinkled perfumes on them, scattered flowers, hanging nosegays from the roof and festooning the walls with garlands, and burning incense in the place.

Then they took counsel together, as follows, “The man that could so master his senses as not so much as to look at the Yakkhini as she followed him in her divine beauty, is a noble and steadfast man, filled with wisdom. With such a one as king, it would be well with the whole kingdom. Let us make him our king.”

And all the courtiers and all the citizens of the kingdom were one-minded in the matter. So the Bodhisatta, being chosen king, was escorted into the capital and there decked in jewels and anointed king of Taxila. Shunning the four evil paths, and following the ten paths of kingly duty, he ruled his kingdom in righteousness, and after a life spent in generosity and other good works passed away to fare according to his deeds. [1.237]

His story told, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered this verse: [1.400]

I. “As one with care a pot of oil will bear,
   Full to the brim, that none may overflow,
   So he who forth to foreign lands does fare
   O’er his own heart like governance should show.” [1.401]

When the Teacher had thus led up to the highest point of instruction, which is Arahatship, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Buddha’s disciples were in those days the king’s courtiers, and I the prince that won a kingdom.”
Ja 97 Nāmasiddhiṇaṁtaka

The Story about the Lucky Name (1s)

In the present one monk is worried that his name brings bad luck. The Buddha tells a story showing how he had the same name in the past, and his teacher had sent him out to find a new, more pleasing name. During his journey he realised that names are not so important and became content with his own.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the Buddha’s disciples = the teacher’s disciples (ācariyaparisā), the monk who believed in the power of names = the same in the past (nāmasiddhika).

Keywords: Names, Luck.

“Seeing Quick dead.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who thought luck went by names. For we hear that a young man of good family, named ‘Wicked [Pāpaka],’ had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. (1.402) And the monks used to call to him, “Here, brother Wicked!” and, “Stay, brother Wicked,” till he resolved that, as ‘Wicked’ gave the idea of incarnate wrongdoing and ill-luck, he would change his name to one of better omen. Accordingly he asked his teachers and preceptors to give him a new name. But they said that a name only served to denote, and did not impute qualities; and they bade him rest content with the name he had. Time after time he renewed his request, till the whole Sāṅgha knew what importance he attached to a mere name. And as they sat discussing the matter in the Dhamma Hall, the Teacher entered and asked what it was they were speaking about. Being told, he said: “This is not the first time this monk has believed luck went by names; he was equally dissatisfied with the name he bore in a former age.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past the Bodhisatta was a teacher of world-wide fame at Taxila, and five hundred young brahmins learned the Vedas from his lips. One of these young men was named Wicked [Pāpaka]. And from continually hearing his fellows say, “Go, Wicked” and, “Come, Wicked,” he longed to get rid of his name and to take one that had a less ill-omened ring about it. So he went to his master and asked that a new name of a respectable character might be given him. Said his master, “Go, my son, and travel through the land till you have found a name you fancy. Then come back and I will change your name for you.”
The young man did as he was bidden, and taking provisions for the journey wandered from village to village till he came to a certain town. Here a man named Life [Jīvaka] had died, and the young brahmin seeing him borne to the cemetery asked what his name was.

“Life,” was the reply. “What, can Life be dead?” “Yes, Life is dead; both Life and Dead die just the same. A name only serves to mark who’s who. You seem a fool.” Hearing this he went on into the city, feeling neither satisfied nor dissatisfied with his own name.

Now a slave girl had been thrown down at the door of a house, while her master and mistress beat her with rope-ends because she had not brought home her wages. And the girl's name was Rich [Dhanapālī]. Seeing the girl being beaten, as he walked along the street, he asked the reason, and was told in reply that it was because she had no wages to show. “And what is the girl’s name?” “Rich,” said they. “And cannot Rich make good a paltry day’s pay?” “Be she called Rich or Poor, the money’s not forthcoming any the more. A name only serves to mark who’s who. You seem a fool.”

More reconciled to his own name, the young brahmin left the city and on the road found a man who had lost his way. Having learned that he had lost his way, the young man asked what his name was. “Guide [Panthaka],” was the reply. “And has Guide lost his way?” “Guide or Lost, you can lose your way just the same. A name only serves to mark who’s who. You seem a fool.”

Quite reconciled now to his name, the young brahmin came back to his master. “Well, what name have you chosen?” asked the Bodhisatta. “Teacher,” said he, “I find that death comes to ‘Life’ and ‘Dead’ alike, that ‘Rich’ and ‘Poor’ may be poor together, and that ‘Guide’ and ‘Lost’ alike miss their way. I know now that a name serves only to tell who is who, and does not govern its owner’s destiny. So I am satisfied with my own name, and do not want to change it for any other.”

Then the Bodhisatta uttered this verse, combining what the young brahmin had done with the sights he had seen:
1. “Seeing Life was dead, Guide lost, and Rich poor, Wicked learned content and travelled no more.”

His story told, the Teacher said: “So you see, monks, that in former days as now this monk imagined there was a great deal in a name.” And he identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk who is discontent with his name was the discontented young brahmin of those days; the Buddha’s disciples were the pupils; and I myself their master.”

Ja 98 Kūṭavāṇijajātaka

The Story about the Cheating Merchant (1s)

In the present one merchant tries to cheat his partner out of the proceeds of their joint partnership. When the Buddha hears of it he shows how the same thing happened in a past life, and how the honest merchant prevailed.

The Bodhisatta = the wise merchant (pañḍitavāṇija),
the cheating merchant = the same in the past (kūṭavāṇija).

Present Source: Ja 98 Kūṭavāṇija, Quoted at: Ja 288 Macchuddāna.

Keywords: Names, Cheating, Wisdom, Devas.

“Wise rightly, Wisest wrongly.” [1.239] {1.404} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a cheating merchant. There were two merchants in partnership at Sāvatthi, we are told, who travelled with their merchandise and came back with the proceeds. And the cheating merchant thought to himself, “My partner has been badly fed and badly lodged for so many days past that he will die of indigestion now he has got home again and can feast to his heart’s content on dainties manifold. My plan is to divide what we have made into three portions, giving one to his orphans and keeping two for myself.” And with this object he made some excuse day by day for putting off the division of the profits.

Finding that it was in vain to press for a division, the honest partner went to the Teacher at the monastery, made his salutation, and was received kindly. “It is a very long time,” said the Buddha, “since you last came to see me.” And hereupon the merchant told the Teacher what had befallen him.
“This is not the first time, lay-follower,” said the Teacher, “that this man has been a cheating merchant; he was no less a cheat in times past. As he tries to defraud you now, so did he try to defraud the wise and good of other days.” So saying, at the merchant’s request, the Teacher told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a merchant’s family and on name-day was named ‘Wise [Paṇḍita].’ When he grew up he entered into partnership with another merchant named ‘Wiser [Atipāṇḍita],’ and traded with him. And these two took five hundred wagens of merchandise from Benares to the country-districts, where they disposed of their wares, returning afterwards with the proceeds to the city. When the time for dividing came, Wiser said: “I must have a double share.” “Why so?” asked Wise. “Because while you are only Wise, I am Wiser. And Wise ought to have only one share to Wiser’s two.” “But we both had an equal interest in the stock-in-trade and in the oxen and wagons. Why should you have two shares?” “Because I am Wiser.” And so they talked away till they fell to quarrelling.

“Ah!” thought Wiser, “I have a plan.” And he made his father hide in a hollow tree, enjoining the old man to say, when the two came, “Wiser should have a double portion.” This arranged, he went to the Bodhisatta and proposed to him to refer the claim for a double share to the competent decision of the Tree Devatā. Then he made his appeal in these words, “Lord Tree Devatā, decide our cause!” Hereupon the father, who was hidden in the tree, in a changed voice asked them to state the case. The cheat addressed the tree as follows, “Lord, here stands Wise, and here stand I, Wiser. We have been partners in trade. Declare what share each should receive.” “Wise should receive one share, and Wiser two,” was the response.

Hearing this decision, the Bodhisatta resolved to find out whether it was indeed a Tree Devatā or not. So he filled the hollow trunk with straw and set it on fire. And Wiser’s father was half roasted by the rising flames and clambered up by clutching hold of a bough. Falling to the ground, he uttered this verse:

1. “Wise rightly, Wiser wrongly got his name;
   Through Wiser, I’m nigh roasted in the flame.”

Then the two merchants made an equal division and each took half, and at their deaths passed away to fare according to their deeds.
“Thus you see,” said the Teacher, “that your partner was as great a cheat in past times as now.” Having ended his story, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The cheating merchant of today was the cheating merchant in the story, and I the honest merchant named Wise.”

Ja 99 Parosahassajātaka

The Story about More than a Thousand (Fools) (1s)

In the present the monks are wondering at how Ven. Sāriputta can answer a question put by the Buddha that is beyond everyone else. The Buddha says that he could do this also in the past, and shows how his last words in that life had been correctly interpreted by his chief disciple.

The Bodhisattva = the great Brahmā (Mahābrahmā),

Sāriputta = the elder disciple (jeṭṭhantevāsika).

Present Source: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga,

Quoted at: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha, Present Compare: Dhp-a VII.10 Aññatara-ithī,

Past Compare: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Meditation, Interpretation, Devas.

“Far better than a thousand fools.” This story was told by the Teacher when at Jetavana, concerning the question of the unconverted. {1.406} (The incidents will be related in the Sarabhamigajātaka [Ja 483.])

At that time the Teacher put a question concisely to that elder. This is the full story, put briefly, of the descent from the world of gods. When the venerable Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja had by his Supernormal Powers gained the sandalwood bowl in the presence of the great merchant of Rājagaha, the Teacher forbade the monks to use their miraculous Supernormal Powers.

Then the schismatics thought: “The ascetic Gotama has forbidden the use of miraculous Supernormal Powers: now he will do no miracle himself.” Their disciples were disturbed, and said to the schismatics, “Why didn’t you take the bowl by your Supernormal Powers?” They replied, “This is no hard thing for us, friend. But we think, ‘Who will display before the laity his own fine and subtle powers for the sake of a paltry wooden bowl?’ and so we did not take it. The ascetics of the Sakya class took it, and showed their Supernormal Powers for sheer foolish greed. Do not imagine it is any trouble to us to work miracles. Suppose we leave out of consideration the disciples of Gotama the ascetic; if we like, we too will show our Supernormal Powers with the ascetic Gotama himself: if the ascetic Gotama works one miracle, we will work one twice as good.”

The monks who heard this told the Fortunate One of it, “Sir, the schismatics say they will work a miracle.” Said the Teacher, “Let them do it, monks; I will do the like.” Bimbisāra, hearing this, went and asked the Fortunate One, “Will you work a miracle, sir?” “Yes, O king.” “Was there not a command given on this matter, sir?” “The command, O king, was given to my disciples; there is no command which can rule the Buddhas. When the flowers and fruit in your park are forbidden to others, the same rule does not apply to you.” “Then where will you work this miracle, sir?” “At Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” “What have I to do, then?” “Nothing, sire.”

Next day, after breaking his fast, the Teacher went to seek alms. “Whither goes the Teacher?” asked the people. The monks answered to them, “At the gate of the city of Sāvatthi, beneath Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, he is to work a twofold miracle to the confounding of the schismatics.” The crowd said: “This miracle will be what they call a masterpiece; we will go see it,” leaving the doors of their houses, they went along with the Teacher. Some of the schismatics also followed the Teacher, with their disciples, “We too,” they said, “will work a miracle, in the place where the ascetic Gotama shall work his.”

By and by the Teacher arrived at Sāvatthi. The king asked him, “Is it true, sir, you are about to work a miracle, as they say?” “Yes, it is true,” he said. “When?” asked the king. “On the seventh day from now, at the full moon of the month of July.” “Shall I set up a pavilion, sir?” “Peace, great king: in the place where I shall work my miracle Sakka will set up a pavilion of jewels twelve leagues in compass.” “Shall I proclaim this thing through the city, sir?” “Proclaim it, O king.” The king sent forth the announcer of the Dhamma on an elephant richly caparisoned, to proclaim thus, “News! The Teacher is about to perform a miracle, for the confounding of the schismatics, at the Gate of Sāvatthi, under Gaṅḍa’s mango tree, seven days from now!” Each day was this proclamation made. When the schismatics heard this news, that the miracle will be done under Gaṅḍa’s mango tree, they had all the mango trees near to Sāvatthi cut down, paying the owners for them.

On the night of the full moon the announcer of the Dhamma made proclamation, “This day in the morning the miracle will take place.” By the power of the gods it was as though all Jambudīpa was at the door and heard the proclamation; whosoever had it in his heart to go, they all betook themselves to Sāvatthi: for twelve leagues the crowd extended.

Early in the morning the Teacher went on his rounds seeking alms. The king’s gardener, Gaṅḍa by name, was just taking to the king a fine ripe mango fruit; thoroughly ripe, big as a bushel, when he espied the Teacher at the city gate. “This fruit is worthy of the Tathāgata,” said he, and gave it to him. The Teacher took it, and sitting down then and there on one side, ate the fruit. When it was eaten, he said: “Ānanda, give the gardener this stone to plant here on the spot; this shall be Gaṅḍa’s mango tree.” The elder did so.

The gardener dug a hole in the earth, and planted it. On the instant the stone burst, roots sprouted forth, up sprang a red shoot tall as a plough-pole; even as the crowd stared it grew into a mango tree of a hundred cubits, with a trunk fifty cubits and branches of fifty cubits in height; at the same time flowers bloomed, fruit ripened; the tree stood filling the sky, covered with bees, laden with golden fruit; when the wind blew on it, sweet fruits fell; then the monks came up and ate of the fruit, and retired.

In the evening time the King of the Devas, reflecting, perceived that it was a task laid on him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things. So he sent the Devaputta Vissakamma, and caused him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things, twelve leagues in compass, covered all over with blue lotus. Thus the gods of ten thousand spheres were gathered together. The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha’s seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha’s seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the Rains Retreat under the great Coral Tree, seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.

The people knew not the place whither the Teacher had gone; they looked, and said: “Let us go home,” and lived in that place during the rainy season. When the rainy season was near to its end, and the feast was at hand, the great elder Moggallāna went and announced it to the Fortunate One. Thereupon the Teacher asked him, “Where is Sāriputta now?” “He, sir, after the miracle which delighted him, remained with five hundred monks in the city of Saṅkassa, and is there still.”
“Moggallāna, on the seventh day from now I shall descend by the gate of Saṅkassa. Let those who desire to behold the Tathāgata assemble in the city of Saṅkassa.” The elder assented, went and told the people: the whole company he transported from Sāvatthi to Saṅkassa, a distance of thirty leagues, in the twinkling of an eye.

The Rains Retreat over, and the Invitation celebrated, the Teacher told king Sakka that he was about to return to the world of men. Then Sakka sent for Vissakamma, and said to him, “Make a stairway for the One with Ten Powers to descend into the world of men.” He placed the head of the stairway upon the peak of Sineru, and the foot of it by the gate of Saṅkassa, and between he made three stairways side by side: one of gems, one of silver, and one of gold: the balustrade and cornice were of the seven things of price. The Teacher, having performed a miracle for the world’s emancipation, descended by the midmost stair made out of gems. Sakka carried the bowl and robe, Suyāma a yak’s-tail fan, Brahmā Lord of all beings bore a sunshade, and the deities of the ten thousand spheres worshipped with divine garlands and perfumes. When the Teacher stood at the foot of the staircase, first elder Sāriputta gave him greeting, afterwards the rest of the company.

Amidst this assembly the Teacher thought: “Moggallāna has been shown to possess supernatural power, Upāli as one who is versed in the sacred law, but the quality of high wisdom possessed by Sāriputta has not been shown. Save and except me, no other possesses wisdom so full and complete as his; I will make known the quality of his wisdom.” First of all he asked a question which is put to ordinary persons, and the ordinary persons answered it. Then he asked a question within the scope of those of the First Path, and this they of the First Path answered, but the ordinary folk knew nought of it. In the same way he asked questions in turn within the scope of those of the Second and Third Paths, of the Arahats, of the chief disciples; and in each case those who were below each grade in turn were unable to answer, but they who were above could answer. Then he put a question within the power of Sāriputta, and this the elder could answer, but the others not so. The people asked, “Who is this elder who answered the Teacher?” They were told, it was the Captain of the Dhamma, and Sāriputta was his name. “Ah, great is his wisdom!” they said. Ever afterwards the quality of the elder’s great wisdom was known to men and to gods. Then the Teacher said to him,

“Some have probations yet to pass, and some have reached the goal: Their different behaviours say, for you do know the whole.”

Having thus asked a question which comes within a Buddha’s scope, he added, “Here is a point put with brevity, Sāriputta; what is the meaning of the matter in all its bearings?” The elder considered the problem. He thought: “The Teacher asks of the proper behaviour with which the monks attain progress, both those who are in the lower Paths and those who are Arahats?” As to the general question, he had no doubt. But then he considered, “The proper manner of behaviour may be described in many ways of speaking according to the essential elements of being, and so forth from that beginning; now in what fashion can I hit the Teacher’s meaning?” He was doubtful about the meaning. The Teacher thought: “Sāriputta has no doubt of the general question, but doubts what particular side of it I have in view. If I give no clue, he will never be able to answer, so a clue I will give him.” This clue he gave by saying: “See here, Sāriputta: you grant this to be true?” (mentioning some point). Sāriputta granted the point.

The hint thus given, he knew that Sāriputta had taken his meaning, and would answer fully, starting from the very elements of being. Then the question stood out clear before the elder, as with a hundred hints, nay, a thousand; and he, at the Teacher’s hint given, answered the question which belonged to a Buddha’s scope.
On a certain occasion the monks met in the Dhamma Hall and praised the wisdom of Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, who had expounded the meaning of the One with Ten Powers’ pithy saying. Entering the hall, the Teacher asked and was told what the monks were talking about. “This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that the meaning of a pithy saying of mine has been brought out by Sāriputta. He did the like in times gone by.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a northern brahmin and completed his education at Taxila. Putting sensual desires from him and renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life, he [1.241] won the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, and dwelt in the Himālayas, where five hundred ascetics gathered round him. One rainy season, his chief disciple went with half the ascetics to the haunts of men to get salt and vinegar. And that was the time when the Bodhisatta should die. And his disciples, wishing to know his spiritual attainment, said to him, “What excellence have you won?”

“Won?” said he, “I have won Nothing [Natthi kiñci].” So saying, he died, but was reborn in the Brahmā Realm of Radiant Gods. (For Bodhisattas even though they may have attained to the highest state are never reborn in the Formless World, because they are incapable of passing beyond the Realm of Form.) Mistaking his meaning, his disciples concluded that he had failed to win any spiritual attainment. So they did not pay the customary honours at cremation.

On his return the chief disciple learned that the master was dead, and asked whether they had asked what he had won. “He said he had won nothing,” said they. “So we did not pay him the usual honours at cremation.”

“You understood not his meaning,” said that chief disciple. “Our master meant that he had attained to the Absorption called the Absorption into the Nothingness of Things [Ākiñcaññayatana].” But though he explained this again and again to the disciples, they believed him not.

Knowing their unbelief, the Bodhisatta cried, “Fools! They do not believe my chief disciple. I will make this thing plain unto them.” And he came from the Brahmā Realm and by virtue of his mighty powers rested in mid-air above the 343 One of the highest attainments was the insight into the nothingness of things.

The Section with One Verse – 485

hermitage and uttered this verse in praise of the wisdom of the chief disciple:

{1.407}

1. “Far better than a thousand fools, though they Cry out a hundred years unceasingly,
Is one who, hearing, straightway understands.”

Thus did the Great Being from mid-air proclaim the Dhamma and rebuke the band of ascetics. Then he passed back to the Brahmā Realm, and all those ascetics too qualified themselves for rebirth in the same Realm.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Sāriputta was the chief disciple of those days, and I Mahābrahma.”

Ja 100 Asātarūpajātaka

The Story about the Form of the Disagreeable (1s)

In the present one lay-sister is pregnant for seven years, and was seven days in labour. When the monks asked the Buddha why this had happened, he told a story about a prince who had blockaded a city at the behest of his mother, and that this was their repayment in kind.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
Suppavāsā = his mother (mātā),
Sīvali = the prince who gained a kingdom (rajjappattakumāra).

Keywords: Sanctions, Retribution.

“In guise of joy.” [1.242] This story was told by the Teacher while at Kuṇḍadhanavana near the city of Kuṇḍiya about Suppavāsā, a lay-sister, who was daughter to king Koliya. For at that time, she, who had carried a child seven years in her womb, was in the seventh day of her throes, and her pains were grievous.

In spite of all her agony, she thought as follows, “Fully Awakened is the Fortunate One who preaches the Dhamma to the end that such suffering may cease; righteous are the disciples of the Fortunate One who so walk that such suffering may cease; blessed is Nibbāna wherein such suffering does cease.” These three thoughts were her consolation in her pangs. And she sent her husband to the Buddha to tell her state and bear a greeting for her.
Her message was given to the Fortunate One, who said, \(1.408\) “May Suppavāsā, daughter of the king of the Koliyas, grow strong and well again, and bear a healthy child.” And at the word of the Fortunate One, Suppavāsā, daughter of the king of the Koliyas, became well and strong, and bore a healthy child. Finding on his return that his wife had been safely delivered, the husband marvelled greatly at the exalted powers of the Buddha.

Now that her child was born, Suppavāsā was eager to show bounty for seven days to the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head, and sent her husband back to invite them. Now it chanced that at that time the Saṅgha with the Buddha at its head had received an invitation from the layman who supported the elder Moggallāna the Great; but the Teacher, wishing to gratify Suppavāsā’s charitable desires, sent to the elder to explain the matter, and with the Saṅgha accepted for seven days the hospitality of Suppavāsā. On the seventh day she dressed up her little boy, whose name was Sīvali, and made him bow before the Buddha and the Saṅgha. And when he was brought in due course to Sāriputta, the elder in all kindness greeted the infant, saying: “Well, Sīvali, is all well with you?” “How could it be, sir?” said the infant. “Seven long years have I had to wallow in blood.”

Then in joy Suppavāsā exclaimed, “My child, only seven days old, is actually discoursing on the dispensation with the apostle Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma!”

“Would you like another such a child?” asked the Teacher. “Yes, sir,” said Suppavāsā, “seven more, if I could have them like him.” With an exalted utterance the Teacher gave thanks for Suppavāsā’s hospitality and departed.

At seven years of age the child Sīvali gave his heart to the dispensation and forsook the world to join the Saṅgha; at twenty he was admitted a full monk. He was righteous and won the crown of righteousness which is Arahatship, and the earth shouted aloud for joy.

So one day the assembled monks talked with one another in the Dhamma Hall respecting the matter, saying: “The elder Sīvali, who is now so shining a light, was the child of many prayers; seven long years was he in the womb and seven days in birth. How great must have been the pains of mother and child! Of what deeds were their pains the fruit?”
Entering the hall, the Teacher asked the subject of their discourse. “Monks,” said he, “the righteous Sivali (1.409) was seven years in the womb and seven days in birth all because of his own past deeds. And similarly Suppavāsā’s seven years’ pregnancy and seven days’ travail resulted from her own past deeds.” So saying, he told this story of the past. [1.243]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was the child of the queen-consort, and grew up and was educated at Taxila, and at his father’s death became king and ruled righteously. Now in those days the king of Kosala came up with a great force against Benares and slew the king and bore off his queen to be his own wife.

When the old king was slain, his son made his escape through the sewer. Afterwards he collected a mighty force and came to Benares. Encamping nearby, he sent a message to the king to either surrender the kingdom or give battle. And the king sent back the answer that he would give battle. But the mother of the young prince, hearing of this, sent a message to her son, saying: “There is no need to do battle. Let every approach to the city on every side be invested and barred, till lack of firewood and water and food wears out the people. Then the city will fall into your hands without any fighting.” Following his mother’s advice, the prince for seven days invested the city with so close a blockade that the citizens on the seventh day cut off their king’s head and brought it to the prince. Then he entered the city and made himself king, and when his life ended he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

The result and consequence of his acts in blockading the city for those seven days was that for seven years he lived in the womb and was seven days in birth. But, inasmuch as he had fallen at the feet of the Buddha Padumuttara and had prayed with many gifts that the crown of Arahatship might be his; and, inasmuch as, in the days of the Buddha Vipassī, he had offered up the same prayer, he and his townsfolk, with gifts of great price; (1.410) therefore, by his merit, he won the crown of Arahatship. And because Suppavāsā sent the message bidding her son take the city by blockade, she was doomed to a seven years’ pregnancy and to a seven days’ travail.

His story ended, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, repeated these verses:

1. “In guise of joy and blessings, sorrow comes
And trouble, sluggards’ hearts to overwhelm.”

And when he had taught this lesson, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Siivali was the prince who in those days blockaded the city, and became king; Suppavāsā was his mother, and I his father, the king of Benares.”

Ja 101 Parosatajātaka

The Story about More than a Hundred (Fools) (1s)

In the present the monks are wondering at how Ven. Sāriputta can bring out the hidden meaning of the teachings. The Buddha says that he could do this also in the past, and shows how he had correctly interpreted the last words of one of his disciples in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the great Brahmā (Mahābrahmā), Sāriputta = the elder disciple (jeṭṭhattevāsika).

Present Source: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga,
Quoted at: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha,
Present Compare: Dhp-a VII.10 Aññatara-ittī,
Past Compare: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Meditation, Interpretation, Devas.

This story is in all respects analogous to the Parosahassajātaka [Ja 99], with the sole difference that ‘think hard’ is read here.344

At that time the Teacher put a question concisely to that elder. This is the full story, put briefly, of the descent from the world of gods. When the venerable Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja had by his Supernormal Powers gained the sandalwood bowl in the presence of the great merchant of Rājagaha, the Teacher forbade the monks to use their miraculous Supernormal Powers.

Then the schismatics thought: “The ascetic Gotama has forbidden the use of miraculous Supernormal Powers: now he will do no miracle himself.” Their disciples were disturbed, and said to the schismatics, “Why didn’t you take the bowl by your Supernormal Powers?” They replied, “This is no hard thing for us,

---

344 [Everything down to the verse is reproduced from Ja 99.]
friend. But we think, ‘Who will display before the laity his own fine and subtle powers for the sake of a paltry wooden bowl?’ and so we did not take it. The ascetics of the Sakya class took it, and showed their Supernormal Powers for sheer foolish greed. Do not imagine it is any trouble to us to work miracles. Suppose we leave out of consideration the disciples of Gotama the ascetic: if we like, we too will show our Supernormal Powers with the ascetic Gotama himself: if the ascetic Gotama works one miracle, we will work one twice as good.”

The monks who heard this told the Fortunate One of it, “Sir, the schismatics say they will work a miracle.” Said the Teacher, “Let them do it, monks; I will do the like.” Bimbisāra, hearing this, went and asked the Fortunate One, “Will you work a miracle, sir?” “Yes, O king.” “Was there not a command given on this matter, sir?” “The command, O king, was given to my disciples; there is no command which can rule the Buddhas. When the flowers and fruit in your park are forbidden to others, the same rule does not apply to you.” “Then where will you work this miracle, sir?” “At Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” “What have I to do, then?” “Nothing, sire.”

Next day, after breaking his fast, the Teacher went to seek alms. “Whither goes the Teacher?” asked the people. The monks answered to them, “At the gate of the city of Sāvatthi, beneath Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, he is to work a twofold miracle to the confounding of the schismatics.” The crowd said: “This miracle will be what they call a masterpiece; we will go see it,” leaving the doors of their houses, they went along with the Teacher. Some of the schismatics also followed the Teacher, with their disciples, “We too,” they said, “will work a miracle, in the place where the ascetic Gotama shall work his.”

By and by the Teacher arrived at Sāvatthi. The king asked him, “Is it true, sir, you are about to work a miracle, as they say?” “Yes, it is true,” he said. “When?” asked the king. “On the seventh day from now, at the full moon of the month of July.” “Shall I set up a pavilion, sir?” “Peace, great king: in the place where I shall work my miracle Sakka will set up a pavilion of jewels twelve leagues in compass.” “Shall I proclaim this thing through the city, sir?” “Proclaim it, O king.” The king sent forth the announcer of the Dhamma on an elephant richly caparisoned, to proclaim thus, “News! The Teacher is about to perform a miracle, for the confounding of the schismatics, at the Gate of Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, seven days from now!” Each day was this proclamation made. When the schismatics heard this news, that the miracle will be done under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, they had all the mango trees near to Sāvatthi cut down, paying the owners for them.

On the night of the full moon the announcer of the Dhamma made proclamation, “This day in the morning the miracle will take place.” By the power of the gods it was as though all Jambudīpa was at the door and heard the proclamation; whosoever had it in his heart to go, they all betook themselves to Sāvatthi: for twelve leagues the crowd extended.

Early in the morning the Teacher went on his rounds seeking alms. The king’s gardener, Gaṇḍa by name, was just taking to the king a fine ripe mango fruit; thoroughly ripe, big as a bushel, when he espied the Teacher at the city gate. “This fruit is worthy of the Tathāgata,” said he, and gave it to him. The Teacher took it, and sitting down then and there on one side, ate the fruit. When it was eaten, he said: “Ānanda, give the gardener this stone to plant here on the spot; this shall be Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” The elder did so.

The gardener dug a hole in the earth, and planted it. On the instant the stone burst, roots sprouted forth, up sprang a red shoot tall as a plough-pole; even as the crowd stared it grew into a mango tree of a hundred cubits, with a trunk fifty cubits and branches of fifty cubits in height; at the same time flowers bloomed, fruit ripened; the tree stood filling the sky, covered with bees, laden with golden fruit; when the wind blew on it, sweet fruits fell; then the monks came up and ate of the fruit, and retired.

In the evening time the King of the Devas, reflecting, perceived that it was a task laid on him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things. So he sent the Devaputta Vissakamma, and caused him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things, twelve leagues in compass, covered all over with blue lotus. Thus the gods of ten thousand spheres were gathered together. The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha’s seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha’s seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the Rains Retreat under the great Coral Tree, seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.

The people knew not the place whither the Teacher had gone; they looked, and said: “Let us go home,” and lived in that place during the rainy season. When the rainy season was near to its end, and the feast was at hand, the great elder Moggallāna went and announced it to the Fortunate One. Thereupon the Teacher asked him, “Where is Sāriputta now?” “He, sir, after the miracle which delighted him, remained with five hundred monks in the city of Sāṅkassa, and is there still.” “Moggallāna, on the seventh day from now I shall descend by the gate of Saṅkassa. Let those who desire to behold the Tathāgata assemble in the city of Saṅkassa.” The elder assented, went and told the people: the whole company he transported from Sāvatthī to Saṅkassa, a distance of thirty leagues, in the twinkling of an eye.

The Rains Retreat over, and the Invitation celebrated, the Teacher told king Sakka that he was about to return to the world of men. Then Sakka sent for Vissakamma, and said to him, “Make a stairway for the One with Ten Powers to descend into the world of men.” He placed the head of the stairway upon the peak of Sineru, and the foot of it by the gate of Saṅkassa, and between he made three stairways side by side: one of gems, one of silver, and one of gold: the balustrade and cornice were of the seven things of price. The Teacher, having performed a miracle for the world’s emancipation, descended by the midmost stair made out of gems. Sakka carried the bowl and robe, Suyāma a yak’s-tail fan, Brahmā Lord of all beings bore a sunshade, and the deities of the ten thousand spheres worshipped with divine garlands and perfumes. When the Teacher stood at the foot of the staircase, first elder Sāriputta gave him greeting, afterwards the rest of the company.

Amidst this assembly the Teacher thought: “Moggallāna has been shown to possess supernatural power, Upāli as one who is versed in the sacred law, but the quality of high wisdom possessed by Sāriputta has not been shown. Save and except me, no other possesses wisdom so full and complete as his; I will make known the quality of his wisdom.” First of all he asked a question which is put to ordinary persons, and the ordinary persons answered it. Then he asked a question within the scope of those of the First Path, and this they of the First Path answered, but the ordinary folk knew nought of it. In the same way he asked questions in turn within the scope of those of the Second and Third Paths, of the Arahats, of the chief disciples; and in each case those who were below each grade in turn were unable to answer, but they who were above could answer. Then he put a question within the power of Sāriputta, and this the elder could answer, but the others not so. The people asked, “Who is this elder who answered the Teacher?” They were told, it was the Captain of the Dhamma, and Sāriputta was his name. “Ah, great is his wisdom!” they said. Ever afterwards the quality of the elder’s great wisdom was known to men and to gods. Then the Teacher said to him,

“Some have probations yet to pass, and some have reached the goal:
Their different behaviours say, for you do know the whole.”

Having thus asked a question which comes within a Buddha’s scope, he added, “Here is a point put with brevity, Sāriputta; what is the meaning of the matter in all its bearings?” The elder considered the problem. He thought: “The Teacher asks of the proper behaviour with which the monks attain progress, both those who are in the lower Paths and those who are Arahats?” As to the general question, he had no doubt. But then he considered, “The proper manner of behaviour may be described in many ways of speaking according to the essential elements of being, and so forth from that beginning; now in what fashion can I hit the Teacher’s meaning?” He was doubtful about the meaning. The Teacher thought: “Sāriputta has no doubt of the general question, but doubts what particular side of it I have in view. If I give no clue, he will never be able to answer, so a clue I will give him.” This clue he gave by saying: “See here, Sāriputta: you grant this to be true?” (mentioning some point). Sāriputta granted the point.

The hint thus given, he knew that Sāriputta had taken his meaning, and would answer fully, starting from the very elements of being. Then the question stood out clear before the elder, as with a hundred hints, nay, a thousand; and he, at the Teacher’s hint given, answered the question which belonged to a Buddha’s scope.

On a certain occasion the monks met in the Dhamma Hall and praised the wisdom of Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, who had expounded the meaning of the
One with Ten Powers’ pithy saying. Entering the hall, the Teacher asked and was told what the monks were talking about. “This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that the meaning of a pithy saying of mine has been brought out by Sāriputta. He did the like in times gone by.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a northern brahmin and completed his education at Taxila. Putting sensual desires from him and renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life, he won the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, and dwelt in the Himālayas, where five hundred ascetics gathered around him. One rainy season, his chief disciple went with half the ascetics to the haunts of men to get salt and vinegar. And that was the time when the Bodhisatta should die. And his disciples, wishing to know his spiritual attainment, said to him, “What excellence have you won?”

“Won?” said he, “I have won Nothing [Natthi kiñci].” So saying, he died, but was reborn in the Brahmā Realm of Radiant Gods. Mistaking his meaning, his disciples concluded that he had failed to win any spiritual attainment. So they did not pay the customary honours at cremation.

On his return the chief disciple learned that the master was dead, and asked whether they had asked what he had won. “He said he had won nothing,” said they. “So we did not pay him the usual honours at cremation.”

“You understood not his meaning,” said that chief disciple. “Our master meant that he had attained to the Absorption called the Absorption into the Nothingness of Things [Ākiñcaññāyatana].” But though he explained this again and again to the disciples, they believed him not.

Knowing their unbelief, the Bodhisatta cried, “Fools! They do not believe my chief disciple. I will make this thing plain unto them.” And he came from the Brahmā Realm and by virtue of his mighty powers rested in mid-air above the hermitage and uttered this verse in praise of the wisdom of the chief disciple:

1. “Far better than a hundred fools, though they Think hard a hundred years unceasingly,
Is one who, hearing, straightway understands.”
Ja 102 Paṇṇikajātaka
The Story about the Greengrocer (1s)

In the present a grocer wants to give his daughter away in marriage, but first needs to confirm her virtue, so he takes her to the forest to test her. Convinced by her conduct, he gave her in marriage. The Buddha explains that the same events had taken place in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā who saw the scene (diṭṭharukkhadevatā), the father and daughter = the same in past (pitā dhītā).

Present Source: Ja 102 Paṇṇika,
Quoted at: Ja 216 Maccha.

Keywords: Virtue, Devas, Women.

“He that should prove.” [1.244] {1.411} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay brother who was a greengrocer in Sāvatthi and made a living by the sale of various roots and vegetables, and pumpkins and the like. Now he had a pretty daughter who was as good and virtuous as she was pretty, but was always laughing. And when she was asked in marriage by a family of his own station in life, he thought: “She ought to be married, but she’s always laughing; and a bad girl married into a strange family is her parents’ shame. I must find out for certain whether she is a good girl or not.”

So one day he made his daughter take a basket and come with him to the forest to gather herbs. Then to try her, he took her by the hand with whispered words of love. Straightaway the girl burst into tears and began to cry out that such a thing would be as monstrous as fire rising out of water, and she besought him to forbear. Then he told her that his only intent was to try her, and asked whether she was virtuous. And she declared that she was and that she had never looked on any man with eyes of love. Calming her fears and taking her back home, he made a feast and gave her in marriage. Then feeling that he ought to go and pay his respects to the Teacher, he took perfumes and garlands in his hand and went to Jetavana. His salutations done and offerings made, he seated himself near the Teacher, who observed that it was a long time since his last coming. Then the man told the Fortunate One the whole story.
“She has always been a good girl,” said the Teacher. “You have put her to the test now just as you did in days gone by.” Then at the greengrocer’s request he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā in a forest. And a lay-follower who was a greengrocer of Benares had just the same doubts of his daughter, and all fell out as in the introductory story. And as her father took hold of her hand the weeping girl repeated these verses:

1. “He that should prove my buckler strong,
   My father, worketh me this wrong.
   Forlorn in thickest wood I cry;
   My helper proves my enemy.”

Then her father calmed her fears, and asked whether she was a virgin. And when she declared that she was, he brought her home and made a feast and gave the girl in marriage.

His story ended, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof the greengrocer was established in the First Path. Then the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The father and daughter of today were the father and daughter in the story, and I the Tree Devatā who witnessed the scene.”

Ja 103 Verijātaka
The Story about Enemies (1s)

In the present when Anāthapiṇḍika is returning from a village he sees robbers lurking by the wayside, and determines to hasten to his destination. The Buddha tells a story of how he did the same thing in a past life himself.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi).

Keywords: Enemies, Urgency.

“If wise, you’ll loiter not.” This story was told by the Teacher at Jetavana about Anāthapiṇḍika. For we hear that Anāthapiṇḍika was returning from the village of which he was headman, when he saw robbers on the road. “It won’t do to loiter by the way,” thought he, “I must hurry on to Sāvatthi.” So he urged his oxen to speed and got safely into Sāvatthi. Next day he went to the monastery and told the Teacher what had befallen him. “Sir,” said the Teacher, “in other times too the wise and good espied robbers on the road and hastened without delay to their homes.” Then at the merchant’s request he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a rich merchant, who had been to a village to collect his dues and was on his homeward way when he saw robbers on the road. At once he urged his oxen to their topmost speed and reached home in safety. And as he sat on his couch of state after a rich repast, he exclaimed, “I have escaped from the robbers’ hand to mine own house, where fear dwells not.” And in his thankfulness he uttered this exalted utterance:

1. “If wise, you’ll loiter not 'mid enemies;
   A night or two with such brings miseries.”

So the Bodhisatta spoke this exalted utterance, and after a life of generosity and other good deeds he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His story ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the merchant of Benares of those days.”

Ja 104 Mittavindajātaka

The Story about (the Merchant) Mittavindaka (1s)

Alternative Title: Mittavindakajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monk Losaka is very unfortunate but still becomes an Arahat. The Buddha tells a story of his good and bad deeds in the past, which ended up with him suffering torture.

The Bodhisatta = the Devaputta (Devaputta),
the disobedient monk = Mittavindaka.

Past Compare: Ja 41 Losaka, Ja 82 Mittavinda, Ja 104 Mittavinda, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Greed, Insatiety, Devas.

“From four to eight.” [1.246] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, concerning an unruly monk. The incidents are the same as those in the previous story of Mittavindaka, but belong to the days of the Buddha Kassapa.

In the past, in the days of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers, there dwelt in Benares a merchant, whose wealth was eighty crores of money, having a son named Mittavindaka. The mother and father of this lad had entered upon the First Path, but he was wicked, an unbeliever.

When by and by the father was dead and gone, the mother, who in his stead managed their property, thus said to her son, “My son, the state of man is one hard to attain; give alms, practise virtue, keep the holy day, give ear to the Dhamma.” Then said he, “Mother, no almsgiving or such like for me; never name them to me; as I live, so shall I fare hereafter.” On a certain full-moon holy day, as he spoke in this fashion, his mother answered, “Son, this day is set apart as a high holy day. Today take upon you the holy day vows; visit the cloister, and all night long listen to the Dhamma, and when you come back I will give you a thousand pieces of money.”

For desire of this money the son consented. As soon as he had broken his fast he went to the monastery, and there he spent the day; but at night, to ensure that not one word of the Dhamma should reach his ear, he lay down in a certain place, and fell asleep. On the next day, very early in the morning, he washed his face, and went to his own house and sat down.

Now the mother thought within herself, “Today my son after hearing the Dhamma will come back early in the morning, bringing with him the elder who has preached the Dhamma.” So she made ready gruel, and food hard and soft, and prepared a seat, and awaited his coming. When she saw her son coming all alone, “Son,” said she, “why have you not brought the preacher with you?” “No preacher for me, mother!” says he. “Here then,” said the woman, “you drink this gruel.” “You promised me a thousand pieces, mother,” he says, “first give this to me, and afterward I will drink.” “Drink first, my son, and then you shall have the money.” Said he, “No, I will not drink till I get the money.” Then his mother laid before him a purse of a thousand pieces. And he drank the gruel, took the purse with a thousand pieces, and went about his business; and so thereafter, until in no long time he had gained two million.

345 [The past life story about the churning of his head, which is essential to the story here, is told in Ja 439 below. I include the story here.]

Then it came into his mind that he would equip a ship, and do business with it. So he equipped a ship, and said to his mother, “Mother, I mean to do business in this ship.” Said she, “You are my only son, and in this house there is plenty of wealth; the sea is full of dangers. Do not go!” But he said: “Go I will, and you cannot prevent me.” “Yes, I will prevent you,” she answered, and took hold of his hand; but he thrust her hand away, and struck her down, and in a moment he was gone, and under way.

On the seventh day, because of Mittavindaka, the ship stood immovable upon the deep. Lots were cast, and thrice was the lot found in the hand of Mittavindaka. Then they gave him a raft; and saying: “Let not many perish for the sole sake of this one,” they cast him adrift upon the deep. In an instant the ship sprang forth with speed over the deep.

And he upon his raft came to a certain island. There in a crystal palace he espied four female spirits of the dead. They used to be in woe seven days and seven in happiness. In their company he experienced bliss divine. Then, when the time came for them to undergo their penance, they said: “Master, we are going to leave you for seven days; while we are gone, bide here, and be not distressed.” So saying they departed.

But he, full of longing, again embarked upon his raft, and passing over the ocean came to another isle; there in a palace of silver he saw eight other spirits. In the same way, he saw upon another island, sixteen in a palace all of jewels, and on yet another, thirty-two that were in a golden hall. With these, as before, he dwelt in divine blessedness, and when they went away to their penance, sailed away once more over the ocean; till at last he beheld a city with four gates, surrounded by a wall. That, they say, is the Ussada hell, the place where many beings, condemned to hell, endure their own deeds: but to Mittavindaka it appeared as though a beautiful city. He thought: “I will visit that city, and be its king.”

So he entered, and there he saw a being in torment, supporting a wheel sharp as a razor; but to Mittavindaka it seemed as though that razor-wheel upon his head were a lotus bloom; the five-fold fetters upon his breast seemed as it were a splendid and rich vesture; the blood dripping from his head seemed to be the perfumed powder of red sandalwood; the sound of groaning was as the sound of sweetest song. So approaching he said: “Hey, man! Long enough you have been carrying that lotus flower; now give it to me!” He replied, “My lord, no lotus it is, but a razor-wheel.” “Ah,” said the first, “so you say because you do not wish to give it.” Thought the condemned wretch, “My past deeds must be exhausted. No doubt this fellow, like me, is here for smiting his mother. Well, I will give him the razor-wheel.” Then he said: “Here then, take the lotus,” and with those words he cast the razor-wheel upon his head; and on his head it fell, crushing it in. In an instant Mittavindaka knew then that it was a razor-wheel, and he said: “Take your wheel, take back your wheel!” groaning aloud in his pain; but the other had disappeared.

Now at that time one of the damned who had put on the circlet and was suffering the tortures of hell, asked the Bodhisatta, “Lord, what defilements have I committed?” The Bodhisatta detailed the man’s evil deeds to him and uttered this verse:

1. “From four to eight, to sixteen thence, and so
   To thirty-two insatiate greed does go,
   Still pressing on till insatiety
   Does win the circlet’s grinding misery.”

So saying he went back to the Realm of Devas, but the other lived in hell till his defilements had been purged from him. Then he passed thence to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This unruly monk was then Mittavindaka and I the Devaputta.”

---

346 Part of these lines occur in the Pañcatantra 98.
The Section with One Verse – 500

Ja 105 Dubbalakaṭṭhajātaka
The Story about the Rotten Wood (1s)

In the present one monk lives in constant fear of dying. The Buddha tells how, in a previous life as an elephant, he had been sent for training and had been so mistreated, that even when he escaped, he was still constantly in fear for his life.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the monk = the elephant (nāga).

Keywords: Fear, Trepidation, Devas, Animals.

“Fear you the wind.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who lived in a perpetual state of nervous alarm. We learn that he came of a good family in Sāvatthi, and was led to give up the world by hearing the Dhamma preached, and that he was always in fear of his life \[1.247\] both by night and by day. The sound of the wind, the rustle of a fan, or the cry of bird or beast would inspire him with such abject terror that he would shriek and dash away. He never reflected that death was sure to come upon him; though, had he practised meditation on the certainty of death, he would not have feared it. \{1.415\} For only they that do not so meditate fear death.

Now his constant fear of dying became known to the monks, and one day they met in the Dhamma Hall and fell to discussing his fearfulness and the propriety of every monk’s taking death as a theme for meditation. Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked, and was told, what they were discussing. So he sent for that monk and asked him whether it was true he lived in fear of death. The monk confessed that he did. “Be not angry, monks,” said the Teacher, “with this monk. The fear of death that fills his breast, now was no less strong in bygone times.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā near the Himālayas. And in those days the king put his state elephant in the elephant-trainers’ hands to be broken in to stand firm. And they tied the elephant up fast to a post, and with goads in their hands set about training the animal. Unable to bear the pain while he was being made to do their bidding, the elephant broke the post down, put the trainers to flight, and made off to the Himālayas. And the men, being unable to catch it, had to come back empty-handed. The elephant lived in the Himālayas in constant fear of death. A breath of wind sufficed to fill him with fear and to start him off at full speed, shaking his trunk to and fro. And it was with him as though he was still tied to the post to be trained. All happiness of mind and body gone, he wandered up and down in constant dread. Seeing this, the Tree Devatā stood in the fork of his tree and uttered this verse:

1. “Fear you the wind that ceaselessly
   The rotten boughs does rend alway?
   Such fear will waste you quite away!” {1.416}

Such were the Tree Devatā’s cheering words. And the elephant thenceforth feared no more.

His lesson ended, the Teacher taught the Four Truths, at the close whereof the monk entered the Paths, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was the elephant of those days and I the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 106 Udañcanijātaka
The Story about the Bucket (1s)

Alternative Title: Udañcanijātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk is seduced by a sensual young woman. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of how the same person in a previous life had been seduced by a young woman, but had become dissatisfied with the lay life and had returned to his ascetic state.

The Bodhisatta = the (ascetic) father (pitā),
the errant monk = his young ascetic (cullatāpasa),
the sensual girl = the same in the past (thullakumārikā).

Present Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Quoted at: Ja 30 Muṇika, Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 286 Sālūka, Ja 348 Arañña, Ja 435 Haliddirága, Present Compare: Vin Mv 1 (1.35).
Past Source: Ja 477 Cullanāradakassapa,
Past Quoted at: Ja 106 Udañcani, Ja 435 Haliddirága.

Keywords: Seduction, Dissatisfaction, Women.
“A happy life was mine.” [1.248] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a temptation by a sensual girl. The incident will be related in the Cullanāradakassapajātaka [Ja 477] in the Thirteenth Book.

There was then, we learn, a girl of about sixteen, daughter of a citizen of Sāvatthi, such as might bring good luck to a man, yet no man chose her. So her mother thought to herself, “This my daughter is of full age, yet no one chooses her. I will use her as bait for a fish, and make one of those Sākiyan ascetics come back to the world, and live upon him.” At the time there was a young man of good birth living in Sāvatthi, who had given his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But from the time when he had received full ordination he had lost all desire for learning, and lived devoted to the adornment of his person.

The lay sister used to prepare in her house rice gruel, and other food hard or soft, and standing at the door, as the monks walked along the streets, looked out for someone who could be tempted by the craving for delicacies. Streaming by went a crowd of monks who upheld the Three Baskets, including the Abhidhamma and the Vinaya; but among them she saw none ready to rise to her bait. Among the figures with bowl and robe, preachers of the Dhamma with honey-sweet voice, moving like fleecy scud before the wind, she saw not one.

But at last she perceived a man approaching, the outer corners of his eyes anointed, hair hanging down, wearing an under-robe of fine cloth, and an outer robe shaken and cleansed, bearing a bowl coloured like some precious gem, and a sunshade after his own heart, a man who let his senses have their own way, his body much bronzed. “Here is a man I can catch!” thought she; and greeting him, she took his bowl, and invited him into the house. She found him a seat, and provided rice gruel and all the rest; then after the meal, begged him to make that house his resort in future. So he used to visit the house after that, and in course of time became intimate.

One day, the lay sister said in his hearing, “In this household we are happy enough, only I have no son or son-in-law capable of keeping it up.” The man heard it, and wondering what reason she could have for so saying, in a little while he was as it were pierced to the heart. She said to her daughter, “Tempt this man, and get him into your power.” So the girl after that time decked herself and adorned herself, and tempted him with all women’s tricks and wiles. Then the man, being young and under the power of passion, thought in his heart, “I cannot now hold on to the Buddha’s dispensation,” and he went to the monastery, and laying down bowl and robe, said to his spiritual teachers, “I am discontented.”

---

[The relevant portion is included here.]

Then they conducted him to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, this monk is discontented.”

On asking the monk, the Teacher was told that it was true he was in love, and in love with the sensual girl. “Monk,” said the Teacher, “she is leading you astray. So too in times gone by she led you into evil, and you were only restored to happiness by the wise and good of those days.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, those things came to pass which will be told in the Cullanāradakassapajātaka [Ja 477].

The Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family of great wealth, and after his education was finished managed the estate. Then his wife brought forth a son, and died. He thought: “As with my beloved wife, so with me death shall not be ashamed; what is a home to me? I will become an ascetic.” So forsaking his sensual desires, he went with his son to the Himālayas; and there with him entered upon the ascetic life, developed the Absorptions and Super Knowledges, and dwelt in the woods, supporting life on fruits and roots.

At that time the borderers raided the countryside; and having assailed a town, and taken prisoners, laden with spoil they returned to the border. Amongst them was a maiden, beautiful, but endowed with all a deceitful person’s cunning. This girl thought to herself, “These men, when they have carried us off home, will use us as slaves; I must find some way to escape.” So she said: “My lord, I wish to retire; let me go and stay away for a moment.” Thus she deceived the robbers, and fled.

Now the Bodhisatta had gone out to fetch fruits and the like, leaving his son in the hut. While he was away, this girl, as she wandered about in the forest, came to the hut, in the morning; and tempting the son of the ascetic with desire of love, destroyed his virtue, and got him under her power. She said to him, “Why dwell here in the forest? Come, let us go to a village and make a home for ourselves. There it is easy to enjoy all the pleasures and passions of sense.” He consented, and said: “My father is now out in the woods looking for wild fruits. When we have seen him, we will both go away together.” Then the girl thought: “This young innocent knows nothing; but his father must have become an ascetic in his old age. When he comes in, he will want to know what I do here, and beat me, and drag me out by the feet, and throw me into the forest. I will get clear away before he comes.” So she said to the lad, “I will go first, and you may follow,” then pointing out the landmarks, she departed. After she had gone, the lad became sorrowful, and did none of his duties as he was used; but wrapped himself up head and all, and lay down within the hut, fretting.

But on this occasion the Bodhisatta at evening came with fruits to the hermitage, and, opening the door, said to his son, “Every other day you brought wood and victuals, and lit a fire. Why have you not done any of these things today, but sit sadly here pining away?”

“Father,” said the young man, “while you were away gathering fruits, there came a woman who tried to lure me away with blandishments. But I would not go with her till I had your leave, and so left her sitting waiting for me. And now my wish is to depart.”

Finding that the young man was too much in love to be able to give her up, the Bodhisatta bade him go, saying: “But when she wants meat or fish or ghee or salt or rice or any such thing to eat, and sends you hurrying to and fro on her errands, then remember this hermitage and flee away back to me.”

So the other went off with the woman to the haunts of men; and when he was come to her house, she made him run about to fetch every single thing she wanted.

“I might just as well be her slave as this,” he thought, and promptly ran away back to his father, and saluting him, stood and repeated this verse:
1. “A happy life was mine till that woman,
   That worrying, tiresome pitcher styled my wife –
   Set me to run the errands of her whims.”

And the Bodhisatta commended the young man, and exhorted him to kindliness and mercy, setting forth the four Divine Abidings towards [1.249] men and the ways to focus on the Meditation Object. Nor was it long before the young man won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and attained to the Divine Abidings towards his fellow-creatures, and with his father was reborn into the Brahmā Realm.

His lesson ended, and the Four Truths preached, at the close whereof that monk entered the First Path, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The sensual girl of today was also the sensual girl of those days; this yoking monk was the son; and I the father of those days.”

Ja 107 Sālittakajātaka
The Story about the Sling (1s)

In the present one monk is very skilful in throwing stones and manages to bring down a goose as it flies through the air. He is brought to the Buddha and reprimanded. Then the Buddha tells how he was skilful in a similar manner in a previous life, when every time a family priest had opened his mouth he had shot goat dung pellets into it, until he had learned the error of his ways.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the monk = the handicapped man (pīṭhasappī).

Present Compare: Ja 107 Sālittaka, Ja 276 Kurudhamma, Dhp-a XXV.2
  Ḥaṅsaghātakabhikkhu.
Past Compare: Dhp-a V.13 Saṭṭhikūṭapeta.

Keyword: Worldly skill.

“Prize skill.” [1.418] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who threw and hit a swan. We are told that this monk, who came of a good family in Sāvatthi, had acquired great skill in hitting things with stones; and that hearing the Dhamma preached one day he gave his heart to the dispensation and went forth. But neither in study nor practice did he excel as a monk.
One day, with a youthful monk, he went to the river Aciravati, and was standing on the bank after bathing, when he saw two white swans flying by. Said he to the younger monk, “I'll hit the following swan in the eye and bring it down.” “Bring it down indeed!” said the other, “you can’t hit it.” “Just you wait a moment. I'll hit it on the eye this side through the eye on the other.” “Oh, nonsense.” “Very well; you wait and see.” Then he took a three-cornered stone in his hand and flung it after the swan. ‘Whiz’ went the stone through the air and the swan, suspecting danger, stopped to listen. At once the monk seized a smooth round stone and as the resting swan was looking in another direction hit it full in the eye, so that the stone went in at one eye and came out at the other. And with a loud scream the swan fell to the ground at their feet.

“That is a highly improper action,” said the other monk, and brought him before the Teacher, with an account of what had happened. After rebuking the monk, the Teacher said: “The same skill was his, monks, in past times as now.” And he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was one of the king’s courtiers. And the royal family priest of those days was so talkative and longwinded that, when he once started, no one else could get a word in. So the king cast about for someone to cut the family priest short, and looked high and low for such a one.

Now at that time there was a handicapped man in Benares who was a wonderful marksman with stones, and the boys used to put him on a little cart and draw him to the gates of Benares, where there is a large branching banyan tree covered with leaves. There they would gather round and give him half-pence, saying ‘Make an elephant,’ or ‘Make a horse.’ And the handicapped man would throw stone after stone till he had cut the foliage into the shapes asked for. And the ground was covered with fallen leaves.

On his way to his pleasure gardens the king came to the spot, and all the boys scampered off in fear of the king, leaving the handicapped man there helpless. At the sight of the litter of leaves the king asked, as he rode by in his chariot, who had cut the leaves off. And he was told that the handicapped man had done it. Thinking that here might be a way to stop the family priest’s mouth, the king asked where the handicapped man was, and was shown him sitting at the foot of the tree. Then the king had him brought to him and, motioning his retinue to stand apart, said to the handicapped man, “I have a very talkative family priest. Do you think you could stop his talking?”

348 The modern Rāpti, in Oudh.

“Yes, sire – if I had a peashooter full of dry goat’s dung,” said the handicapped man. Then the king had him taken to the palace and set with a pea-shooter full of dry goat’s dung behind a curtain with a slit in it, facing the family priest’s seat. When the brahmin came to wait upon the king and was seated on the seat prepared for him, his majesty started a conversation. And the family priest forthwith monopolized the conversation, and no one else could get a word in. Hereon the handicapped man shot the pellets of goat’s dung one by one, like flies, through the slit in the curtain right into the family priest’s gullet. And the brahmin swallowed the pellets down as they came, like so much oil, till all had disappeared. When the whole peashooter-full of pellets was lodged in the family priest’s stomach, they swelled to the size of half a peck; and the king, knowing they were all gone, addressed the brahmin in these words, “Venerable sir, so talkative are you, that you have swallowed down a peashooter-full of goat’s dung without noticing it. That’s about as much as you will be able to take at a sitting. Now go home and take a dose of panic seed and water by way of emetic, and put yourself right again.”

From that day [1.420] the family priest kept his mouth shut and sat as silent during conversation as though his lips were sealed.

“Well, my ears are indebted to the handicapped man for this relief,” said the king, and bestowed on him four villages, one in the north, one in the south, one in the west, and one in the east, producing a hundred thousand a year.

The Bodhisatta drew near to the king and said: “In this world, sire, [1.251] skill should be cultivated by the wise. Mere skill in aiming has brought this handicapped man all this prosperity.” So saying he uttered this verse:
1. “Prize skill, and note the marksman lame;
Four villages reward his aim.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was the handicapped man of those days, Ānanda the king, and I the wise courtier.”

Ja 108 Bāhiyajātaka
The Story about the Foreigner (1s)

In the present a prince has a fat and dishevelled wife. When the monks report this to the Buddha he tells how in a past life a king had taken to wife a country woman who had behaved modestly when relieving herself in the town.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañḍitāmacca),
the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

Keywords: Modesty, Women.

“Learn you betimes.” This story was told by the Teacher, while he was dwelling in the Gabled Chamber at the Great Grove near Vesāli, about a Licchavi, a pious prince who had embraced the dispensation. He had invited the Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head to his house, and there had shown great bounty towards them. Now his wife was a very fat woman, almost bloated in appearance, and she was badly dressed.

Thanking the king for his hospitality, the Teacher returned to the monastery and, after a discourse to the monks, retired to his perfumed chamber.

Assembled in the Dhamma Hall, the monks expressed their surprise that a man like this Licchavi prince should have such a fat, badly-dressed woman for his wife, and be so fond of her. Entering the Hall and hearing what they were discussing, the Teacher said: “Monks, as now, so in former times he was fond of a fat woman.” Then, at their request, he told this story of the past. {1.421}

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was one of his courtiers. And a fat and badly-dressed country woman, who worked for hire, was passing near the courtyard of the palace, when pressing need for an occasion came upon her. Bending down with her raiment decently gathered round her, she accomplished her purpose, and was erect again in a trice.
The king chanced to be looking out on to the courtyard through a window at the time and saw this. He thought: “A woman who could manage this with so much decency must enjoy good health. She would be sure to be cleanly in her house; and a son born into a cleanly house would be sure to grow up cleanly and virtuous. I will make her my queen-consort.” And accordingly the king, first assuring himself that she [1.252] was not another’s, sent for her and made her his queen. And she became very near and dear to him. Not long afterwards a son was born, and this son became a Universal Monarch.

Observing her fortunes, the Bodhisatta took occasion to say to the king, “Sire, why should not care be taken duly to fulfil all proper observances, when this excellent woman by her modesty and decency in relieving nature won your majesty’s favour and rose to such fortune?” And he went on to utter this verse:

1. “Learn you betimes, though wilful folk there be;
The rustic pleased the king by modesty.”

Thus did the Great Being commend the virtues of those who devoted themselves to the study of proper observances. [1.422]

His story ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The husband and wife of today were also the husband and wife of those times, and I the wise courtier.”

Ja 109 Kuṇḍakapūvajātaka

The Story about the Rice-Cake (1s)

Alternative Title: Kuṇḍapūvajātaka (Cst)

In the present a poor man makes an offering of a coarse cake to the Buddha as his only meal of the day, and others offer him riches to share in his merit. The Buddha tells how a poor man had offered a coarse cake to a Tree Devatā, and had been richly rewarded by the king.

The Bodhisatta = the castor oil Tree Devatā (eraṇḍarukkhadevatā), the poor man = the same in the past (duggata).

Keywords: Good deeds, Devotion, Devas.
“As fares his worshipper.” This story was told by the Teacher when at Sāvatthi, about a very poor man.

Now at Sāvatthi the Saṅgha with the Buddha at their head used to be entertained now by a single family, now by three or four families together. Or a body of people or a whole street would club together, or sometimes the whole city entertained them. But on the occasion now in question it was a street that was offering the hospitality. And the inhabitants had arranged to provide rice-gruel followed by cakes.

Now in that street there lived a very poor man, a hired labourer, who could not see how he could give the gruel, but resolved to give cakes. And he scraped out the red powder from empty husks and kneaded it with water into a round cake. This cake he wrapped in a leaf of swallow-wort, and baked it in the embers. When it was done, he made up his mind that none but the Buddha should have it, and accordingly took his stand immediately by the Teacher. No sooner had the word been given to offer cakes, than he stepped forward quicker than anyone else and put his cake in the Teacher’s alms-bowl. And the Teacher declined all other cakes offered him and ate the poor man’s cake. Forthwith the whole city talked of nothing but how the Fully Awakened One had not disdained to eat the poor man’s bran-cake. And from porters to nobles and king, all classes flocked to the spot, saluted the Teacher, and crowded round the poor man, [1.253] offering him food, or two to five hundred pieces of money if he would make over to them the merit of his act.

Thinking he had better ask the Teacher first, he went to him and stated his case. “Take what they offer,” said the Teacher, “and impute your righteousness to all living creatures.” So the man set to work to collect the offerings. Some gave twice as much as others, some four times as much, others eight times as much, and so on, till nine crores of gold were contributed.

Returning thanks for the hospitality, the Teacher went back to the monastery and after instructing the monks and imparting his standard teaching to them, retired to his perfumed chamber.

In the evening the king sent for the poor man, and created him Lord Treasurer.
Assembling in the Dhamma Hall the monks spoke together of how the Teacher, not disdaining the poor man’s bran-cake, had eaten it as though it were ambrosia, and how the poor man had been enriched \{1.423\} and made Lord Treasurer to his great good fortune. And when the Teacher entered the Hall and heard what they were talking of, he said: “Monks, this is not the first time that I have not disdained to eat that poor man’s cake of bran. I did the same when I was a Tree Devatā, and then too was the means of his being made Lord Treasurer.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā dwelling in a castor-oil plant. And the villagers of those days were superstitious about gods. A festival came round and the villagers offered sacrifices to their respective Tree Devatās. Seeing this, a poor man showed worship to the castor-oil tree. All the others had come with garlands, odours, perfumes, and cakes; but the poor man had only a cake of husk-powder and water in a coconut shell for his tree. Standing before it, he thought within himself, “Tree Devatās are used to heavenly food, and my Tree Devatā will not eat this cake of husk-powder. Why then should I lose it outright? I will eat it myself.” And he turned to go away, when the Bodhisatta from the fork of his tree exclaimed, “My good man, if you were a great lord you would bring me dainty yeast bread; but as you are a poor man, what shall I have to eat if not that cake? Rob me not of my portion.” And he uttered this verse:

1. “As his man, so a Devatā must fare.
   Bring me the cake, nor rob me of my share.”

Then the man turned again, and, seeing the Bodhisatta, offered up his sacrifice. The Bodhisatta fed on the savour and said: “Why do you worship me?” “I am a poor man, my lord, and I worship you to be eased of my poverty.” \{1.424\} “Have no more care for that. You have sacrificed to one who is grateful and mindful of kindly deeds. Round this tree, neck to neck, are buried pots of treasure. Go tell the king, and take the treasure away in wagons to the king’s courtyard. There pile it in a heap, and the king shall be so well-pleased that he will make you Lord Treasurer.” So saying, the Bodhisatta vanished from sight. The \[1.254\] man did as he was bidden, and the king made him Lord Treasurer. Thus did the poor man by aid of the Bodhisatta come to great fortune; and when he died, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.
His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The poor man of today was also the poor man of those times, and I the Tree Devatā who dwelt in the castor-oil tree.”

Ja 110 Sabbasaṁhārakapañha
The Compilation of Questions (1s)

There is no story of the present. In the past a woman steals a necklace from a village woman, claiming it is her own. A wise man asks what perfumes they use when they wear it. The thief tells of an expensive one, the woman of a cheap one. The wise man calls a perfumer, who correctly identifies the perfume.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (pañḍita),
(No present day);
The poor woman (duggatā),
The female thief (corī).

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 110 Sabbasaṁhārakapañha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Honesty.

“There is no All-embracing.” This All-embracing Question will be set out at length in the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

A certain poor woman had tied together several threads of different colours and made them into a necklace, which she took off from her neck and placed on her clothes as she went down to bathe in a tank which the wise man had caused to be made. A young woman who saw this conceived a longing for it, took it up and said to her, “Mother, this is a very beautiful necklace, how much did it cost to make? I will make such a one for myself. May I put it on my own neck and ascertain its size?” The other gave her leave, and she put it on her neck and ran off. The elder woman seeing it came quickly out of the water, and putting on her clothes ran after her and seized hold of her dress, crying, “You are running away with a necklace which I made.” The other replied, “I am not taking anything of yours, it is the necklace which I wear on my neck,” and a great crowd collected as they heard this.
The sage, while he played with the boys, heard them quarrelling as they passed by the door of the hall and asked what the noise was about. When he heard the cause of the quarrel he sent for them both, and having known at once by her countenance which was the thief, he asked them whether they would abide by his decision. On their both agreeing to do so, he asked the thief, “What scent do you use for this necklace?” She replied, “I always use sabbasaṁhhāraka to scent it with.” Then he asked the other, who replied, “How shall a poor woman like me get sabbasaṁhhāraka? I always scent it with perfume made of piyaṅgu flowers.” Then the sage had a vessel of water brought and put the necklace in it. Then he sent for a perfume-seller and told him to smell the vessel and find out what it smelt of. He directly recognised the smell of the piyaṅgu flower, and quoted the verse which has already been given in the first book:

1. “No perfume collection it is; only the poor piyaṅgu smells;
   That wicked woman told a lie; the truth the village woman tells.”

The Great Being told the bystanders all the circumstances and asked each of them respectively, “Are you the thief? Are you not the thief?” and made the guilty one confess, and from that time his wisdom became known to the people.

Ja 111 Gadrabhapañha
The Question about the Ass (1s)

Alternative Title: Gadrabhapañha jātaka (Cst)

There is no story of the present. In the past Mahosadha has proven his wisdom in being able to solve many problems, and the king decides to send for him to come and be his advisor. His chief advisor Senaka sets one more problem for Mahosadha to solve concerning an ass.

The Bodhisatta = (pañḍita) Mahosadha.

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-um magga,
Quoted at: Ja 111 Gadrabhapañha.

Keywords: Riddles, Wisdom, Animals.

“You think yourself a swan.” This Question as to the Ass will also be set out at length in the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].
With a great following the king set out for the village, mounted upon his royal horse. But as he went the horse put his foot into a hole and broke his leg; so the king turned back from that place to the town. Then Senaka entered the presence and said: "Sire, did you go to the east market town to bring the sage back?" "Yes, sir," said the king. "Sire," said Senaka, "you make me as one of no account. I begged you to wait awhile; but off you went in a hurry, and at the outset your royal horse broke his leg." The king had nothing to say to this.

Again on a day he asked Senaka, "Shall we send for the sage, Senaka?" "If so, your majesty, don't go yourself but send a messenger, saying, O sage! As I was on my way to fetch you my horse broke his leg: send us a better horse and a more excellent one. If he takes the first alternative he will come himself, if the second he will send his father. Then will be a problem to test him." The king sent a messenger with this message. The sage on hearing it recognised that the king wished to see himself and his father. So he went to his father, and greeting him said: "Father, the king wishes to see you and me. You go first with a thousand merchants in attendance; and when you go, go not empty-handed, but take a sandalwood casket filled with fresh ghee. The king will speak kindly to you, and offer you a householder's seat; take it and sit down. When you are seated, I will come; the king will speak kindly to me and offer me such another seat. Then I will look at you; take the cue and say, rising from your seat, say, 'Son Mahosadha the wise, take this seat.' Then the question will be ripe for solution." He did so.

On arriving at the palace door he caused his arrival to be made known to the king, and on the king's invitation, he entered, and greeted the king, and stood on one side. The king spoke to him kindly, and asked where was his son the wise Mahosadha. "Coming after me, my lord." The king was pleased to hear of his coming, and bade the father sit in a suitable place. He found a place and sat there. Meanwhile the Great Being dressed himself in all his splendour, and attended by the thousand youths he came seated in a magnificent chariot. As he entered the town he beheld an ass by the side of a ditch, and he directed some stout fellows to fasten up the mouth of the ass so that it should make no noise, to put him in a bag and carry him on their shoulders. They did so; the Bodhisatta entered the city with his great company. The people could not praise him enough. "This," they cried, "is the wise Mahosadha, the merchant Sirivañdhaka's son; this they say is he, who was born holding a herb of virtue in his hand; he it is who knew the answers to so many problems set to test him."
On arriving before the palace he sent in word of his coming. The king was pleased to hear it and said: “Let my son the wise Mahosadha make haste to come in.” So with his attendants he entered the palace and saluted the king and stood on one side. The king was delighted to see him and spoke to him very sweetly, and bade him find a fit seat and sit down. He looked at his father, and his father at this cue rose up from his seat and invited him to sit there, which he did.

Thereupon the foolish men who were there, Senaka, Pukkusa, Kāvinda, Devinda, and others, seeing him sit there, clapped their hands and laughed loudly and cried, “This is the blind fool they call wise! He has made his father rise from his seat, and sits there himself! Wise he should not be called surely.” The king also was crestfallen. Then the Great Being said: “Why, my lord! Are you sad?” “Yes, wise sir, I am sad. I was glad to hear of you, but to see you I am not glad.” “Why so?” “Because you have made your father rise from his seat, and sit there yourself.” “What, my lord! Do you think that in all cases the sire is better than the sons?” “Yes, sir.” “Did you not send word to me to bring you the better horse or the more excellent horse?” So saying he rose up and looking towards the young fellows, said: “Bring in the ass you have brought.” Placing this ass before the king he went on, “Sire, what is the price of this ass?” The king said: “If it be serviceable, it is worth eight rupees.” “But if he get a mule colt out of a thoroughbred Sindh mare, what will the price of it be?” “It will be priceless.” “Why do you say that, my lord? Have you not just said that in all cases the sire is better than the sons? By your own saying the ass is worth more than the mule colt. Now have not your wise men clapped their hands and laughed at me because they did not know that? What wisdom is this of your wise men! Where did you get them?” And in contempt for all four of them he addressed the king in this verse of the First Book:

I. “Think you that the sire is always better than the son, O excellent king? Then is that creature better than the mule; the ass is the mule’s sire.”

After this was said, he went on, “My lord, if the sire is better than the son, take my sire into your service; if the son is better than the sire, take me.” The king was delighted; and all the company cried out applauding and praising a thousand times, “Well indeed has the wise man solved the question.” There was a snapping of fingers and waving of a thousand scarves: the four were crestfallen.

349 The metre shows corruption; I do not understand haṁsi.

Now no one knows better than the Bodhisatta the value of parents. If one ask then, why he did so: it was not to throw contempt on his father, but when the king sent the message, “Send the better horse or the more excellent horse,” he did thus in order to solve that problem, and to make his wisdom to be recognised, and to take the shine out of the four sages.

This is the end of the Question as to the Ass.

Ja 112 Amarādevīpañha
The Question of Lady Amarā (1s)

Alternative Titles: Amarādevīpañhajātaka (Cst); Channapathapañhā (Comm)

There is no story of the present. When Mahosadha reaches the age of sixteen he sets about finding a wife for himself. He comes across a beautiful young maiden, and through riddling discovers her as wise as he is, and a suitable person to take to wife.

The Bodhisatta = (paṇḍita) Mahosadha.

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 112 Amarādevīpañha,
Compare: Mvu ii p 115 Amarā.

Keywords: Riddles, Wisdom, Women.

“Cakes and gruel.” This question too will be found in the same Jātaka [Ja 546].

From that day the Bodhisatta’s glory was great, and queen Udumbarā managed it all. When he was sixteen she thought: “My young brother has grown up, and great is his glory; we must find a wife for him.” This she said to the king, and the king was well pleased. “Very good,” said he, “tell him.” She told him, and he agreed, and she said: “Then let us find you a bride, my son.” The Great Being thought: “I should never be satisfied if they choose me a wife; I will find one for myself.” And he said: “Madam, do not tell the king for a few days, and I will go seek a wife to suit my taste, and then I will tell you.” “Do so, my son,” she replied.
He took leave of the queen, and went to his house, and informed his companions. Then he got by some means the outfit of a tailor, and alone went out by the northern gate into north town. Now in that place was an ancient and decayed merchant family, and in this family was a daughter, the lady Amarā, a beautiful girl, wise, and with all the marks of good luck. That morning early, this girl had set out to the place where her father was plowing, to bring him rice-gruel which she had cooked, and it so happened that she went by the same road.

When the Great Being saw her coming he thought: “A woman with all lucky marks! If she is unwed she must be my wife.” When she beheld him she also thought: “If I could live in the house of such a man, I might restore my family.” The Great Being thought: “Whether she be wed or not I do not know: I will ask her by hand-gesture, and if she be wise she will understand.” So standing afar off he clenched his fist. She understood that he was asking whether she had a husband, and spread out her hand. Then he went up to her, and asked her name. She said: “My name is that which neither is, nor was, nor ever shall be.” “Madam, there is nothing in the world immortal, and your name must be Amarā [Immortal].” “Even so, master.” “For whom, madam, do you carry that gruel?” “For the god of old time.” “Gods of old time are one’s parents, and no doubt you mean your father.” “So it must be, master.” “What does your father do?” “He makes two out of one.” Now the making of two out of one is plowing. “He is plowing, madam.” “Even so, master.” “And where is your father plowing?” “Where those who go come not again.” “The place whence those who go come not again is the cemetery: he is plowing then near a cemetery.” “Even so, master.” “Will you come again today, madam?” “If it comes I will not come, if it comes not I will come.” “Your father, I think, madam, is plowing by a riverside, and if the flood comes you will not come, if it comes not you will.”

After this interchange of talk, the lady Amarā offered him a drink of the gruel. The Great Being, thinking it ungracious to refuse, said he would like some. Then she put down the jar of gruel; and the Great Being thought: “If she offer it to me without first washing the pot and giving me water to wash my hands, I will leave her and go.” But she took up water in the pot and offered him water for washing, placed the pot empty upon the ground not in his hands, stirred up the gruel in the jar, filled the pot with it. But there was not much rice in it, and the Great Being said: “Why, madam, there is very little rice here!” “We got no water, master.” “You mean when your field was in growth, you got no water upon it.” “Even so, master.” So she kept some gruel for her father, and gave some to the Bodhisatta. He drank, and gargled his mouth, and said: “Madam, I will go to your house; kindly show me the way.” She did so by reciting a verse which is given in the First Book:

1. “By the way of the cakes and gruel, and the double-leaf tree in flower, by the hand wherewith I eat I bid you go, not by that wherewith I eat not: that is the way to the market-town, that secret path you must find.”

He reached the house by the way indicated; and Amarā’s mother saw him and gave him a seat. “May I offer you some gruel, master?” she asked. “Thank you, mother – sister Amarā gave me a little.” She at once recognized that he must have come on her daughter’s account.

The Great Being, when he saw their poverty, said: “Mother, I am a tailor: have you anything to mend?” “Yes, master, but nothing to pay.” “There is no need to pay, mother; bring the things and I will mend them.” She brought him some old clothes, and each as she brought it he mended. The wise man’s business always goes well, you know. He said then, “Go tell the people in the street.” She published it abroad in the village; and in one day by his tailoring the Great Being earned a thousand pieces of money. The old dame cooked him a midday meal, and in the evening asked how much she should cook. “Enough, mother, for all those who live in this house.” She cooked a quantity of rice with some curry and condiments.

Now Amarā in the evening came back from the forest, bearing a faggot of wood upon her head and leaves on her hip. She threw down the wood before the front door and came in by the back door. Her father returned later. The Great Being ate of a tasty meal; the girl served her parents before herself eating, washed their feet and the Bodhisatta’s feet. For several days he lived there watching her. Then one day to test her, he said: “My dear Amarā, take half a measure of rice and with it make me gruel, a cake, and boiled rice.” She agreed at once; and husked the rice; with the big grains she made gruel, the middling grains she

---

350 The commentator explains thus: “Entering the village you will see a cake-shop and then a gruel-shop, further on an ebony tree in flower (kovilāro, Bauhinia Variegate): take a path to the right (south).”
boiled, and made a cake with the little ones, adding the suitable condiments. She gave the gruel with its condiments to the Great Being; he no sooner took a mouthful of it than he felt its choice flavour thrill through him: nevertheless to test her he said: “Madam, if you don’t know how to cook why did you spoil my rice?” and spat it out on the ground. But she was not angry; only gave him the cake, saying: “If the gruel is not good eat the cake.” He did the same with that, and again rejecting the boiled rice, said: “If you don’t know how to cook why did you waste my property?” As though angry he mixed all three together and smeared them all over her body from the head downwards, and told her to sit at the door. “Very good, master,” she said, not angry at all, and did so. Finding that there was no pride in her he said: “Come here, madam.” At the first word she came.

When the Great Being came, he had brought with him a thousand rupees and a dress in his betel-nut bag. Now he took out this dress and placed it in her hands, saying: “Madam, bathe with your companions and put on this dress and come to me.” She did so. The sage gave her parents all the money he had brought or earned, and comforted them, and took her back to the town with him. There to test her he made her sit down in the gatekeeper’s house, and telling the gatekeeper’s wife of his plans, went to his own house. Then he sent for some of his men, and said: “I have left a woman in such and such a house; take a thousand pieces of money with you and test her.” He gave them the money and sent them away. They did as they were bid. She refused, saying: “That is not worth the dust on my master’s feet.” The men came back and told the result. He sent them again, and a third time; and the fourth time he bade them drag her away by force. They did so, and when she saw the Great Being in all his glory she did not know him, but smiled and wept at the same time as she looked at him. He asked her why she did this. She replied, “Teacher, I smiled when I beheld your magnificence, and thought that this magnificence was not given you without cause, but for some good deed in a former life: see the fruit of goodness! I thought, and I smiled. But I wept to think that now you would wrong against the property which another watched and tended, and would go to hell: in pity for that I wept.” After this test he knew her chastity, and sent her back to the same place. Putting on his tailor’s disguise, he went back to her and there spent the night.

Next morning he repaired to the palace and told queen Udumbarā all about it;
she informed the king, and adorning Amarā with all kinds of ornaments, and seated her in a great chariot, and with great honour brought her to the Great Being's house, and made a gala day. The king sent the Bodhisatta a gift worth a thousand pieces of money: all the people of the town sent gifts from the doorkeepers onwards. Lady Amarā divided the gifts sent by the king into halves, and sent one portion back to the king; in the same way she divided all the gifts sent to her by the citizens, and returned half, thus winning the hearts of the people. From that time the Great Being lived with her in happiness, and instructed the king in things temporal and spiritual.

This is the end of the Question of lady Amarā.351

Ja 113 Sigālajātaka

The Story about the (Deceitful) Jackal (1s)

Alternative Title: Siṅgālajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta boasts that the truth lies only with himself, and not with the Buddha. The latter tells how, in a past life, Devadatta had fooled and humiliated a brahmin who gave him help.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Greed, Lying, Devas, Animals.

“The drunken jackal.” [1.255] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. The monks had assembled (1.425) in the Dhamma Hall and were telling how Devadatta had gone to Gayāsīsa with five hundred followers, whom he was leading into error by declaring that the Dhamma was manifest in him, “And not in the ascetic Gotama,” and how by his lies he was breaking up the Saṅgha; and how he kept two fast-days a week. And as they sat there talking of the wickedness of Devadatta, the Teacher entered and was told the subject of their conversation. “Monks,” said he, “Devadatta was as great a liar in past times as he is now.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

351 Amarā was the wife of king Mahosadha; cf. Milindapañha, page 205. The Bodhisatta was Mahosadha, cf. Jātaka (text) i. p. 53. [At the point in the story reflected by this Jātaka, however, Amarā was simply a lady, and not yet a queen.]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a Tree Devatā in a cemetery grove. In those days a festival was proclaimed in Benares, and the people resolved to sacrifice to the Yakkhas. So they strewed fish and meat about courtyards, and streets, and other places, and set out great pots of strong drink. At midnight a jackal came into the town by the sewer, and regaled himself on the meat and liquor. Crawling into some bushes, he was fast asleep when morning dawned. Waking up and seeing it was broad daylight, he knew that he could not make his way back at that hour with safety. So he lay down quietly near the roadside where he could not be seen, till at last he saw a solitary brahmin on his way to rinse his mouth in the tank. Then the jackal thought to himself, “Brahmins are a greedy lot. I must so play on his greediness as to get him to carry me out of the city in his waist-cloth under his outer robe.” So, with a human voice, he cried, “Brahmin.”

“What place is this, brahmin?” said he. “Oh, it’s such and such a place,” said the brahmin. “Go on a bit further,” said the jackal and kept urging the brahmin on always a little further, till at last the cremation-park was reached. {1.426} “Put me down here,” said the jackal; and the brahmin did so. “Spread your robe out on the ground, brahmin.” And the greedy brahmin did so. [1.256]

“And now dig up this tree by the roots,” said he, and while the brahmin was at work he walked on to the robe, and dunned and staled on it in five places – the four corners and the middle. This done, he made off into the wood.

Hereon the Bodhisatta, standing in the fork of the tree, uttered this verse:
1. “The drunken jackal, brahmin, cheats your trust!
   You'll find not here a hundred cowry-shells,
   Far less your quest, two hundred coins of gold.”

And when he had repeated these verses, the Bodhisatta said to the brahmin, “Go now and wash your robe and bathe, and go about your business.” So saying, he vanished from sight, and the brahmin did as he was bidden, and departed very mortified at having been so tricked.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the jackal of those days, and I the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 114 Mitacintijātaka

The Story about the Thoughtful (Fish) (1s)

In the present two old monks procrastinate about going to see the Buddha. When he hears about it, the Buddha tells how a thoughtful fish saved his friends from certain death with his wisdom.

The Bodhisatta = the thoughtful (fish) (mitacintī), the two monks = the over thoughtful and the thoughtless (fish) (bahucintī ca appacintī ca).

Keywords: Indolence, Wisdom, Animals, Fish.

“They twain in fisher’s net.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about two aged elders. After a rainy-season spent in a forest in the country they resolved to seek out the Teacher, and got together provisions for their journey. But they kept putting off their departure day by day, till a month flew by. Then they provided a fresh supply of provisions, and procrastinated till a second month was gone, and a third. When their indolence and sluggishness had lost them three months, they set out and came to Jetavana. Laying aside their bowls and robes in the common-room, they came into the Teacher’s presence. The monks remarked on the length of the time since the two had visited the Teacher, and asked the reason. Then (1.427) they told their story and all the Saṅgha came to know of the laziness of these indolent monks.

Assembling in the Dhamma Hall the monks talked together of this thing. And the Teacher entered and was told what they were discussing. Being asked whether they were really so indolent, those monks admitted their short-coming. “Monks,” said he, “in former times, no less than now, they were indolent and reluctant to leave their abode.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, there lived in the river of Benares three fishes, named Over-thoughtful [Bahucintī], Thoughtful [Mitacintī], and Thoughtless [Appacintī]. And they came down-stream from the wild country to where men dwelt. Hereupon Thoughtful said to the other two, “This is a dangerous and perilous neighbourhood, where fishermen catch fish with nets, basket-traps, and such like tackle. Let us be off to the wild country again.” But so lazy were the other two fishes, and so greedy, that they kept putting off their going from day to day, until they had let three months slip by. Now fishermen cast their nets into the river; and Over-thoughtful and Thoughtless were swimming on ahead in quest of food when in their folly they blindly rushed into the net. Thoughtful, who was behind, observed the net, and saw the fate of the other two.

“I must save these lazy fools from death,” thought he. So first he dodged round the net, and splashed in the water in front of it like a fish that has broken through and gone up stream; and then doubling back, he splashed about behind it, like a fish that has broken through and gone down stream. Seeing this, the fishermen thought the fish had broken the net and all got away; so they pulled it in by one corner and the two fishes escaped from the net into the open water again. In this way they owed their lives to Thoughtful.

His story told, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, recited this verse: {1.428}

1. “The two in fisher's nets are caught;
   Them Thoughtful saves and frees again.”

His lesson ended, and the Four Truths expounded, at the close whereof the aged monks gained fruition of the First Path, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “These two monks were then Over-thoughtful and Thoughtless, and I Thoughtful.”

Ja 115 Anusāsikajātaka
The Story about One who gave Warnings (1s)

In the present one greedy nun receives dainties from a certain quarter of town, and warns the other nuns off from that area, telling them how dangerous it is. One day a ram breaks her leg on the alms round. The Buddha tells how she used to be a bird in the past who employed a similar tactic, and was cut in two.

The Bodhisatta = the elder bird (sakuṇajeṭṭhaka), the nun who warned others off = the bird who warned others off (anusāsikā sakuṇikā).

Keywords: Greed, Dissimulation, Animals, Birds.

“The greed-denouncing bird.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a nun who gave a warning to others. For we are told that she came of a good Sāvatthi family, but that from the day of her entrance into the Saṅgha she failed of her duty and was filled with a gluttonous spirit; she used to seek alms in quarters of the city unvisited by other nuns. And dainty food was given her there. Now her gluttony made her afraid that other nuns might go there too and take away from her part of the food. Casting about for a device to stop them from going and to keep everything to herself, she warned [1.258] the other nuns that it was a dangerous quarter, troubled by a fierce elephant, a fierce horse, and a fierce dog. And she besought them not to go there for alms. Accordingly not a single nun gave so much as a look in that direction.

Now one day on her way through this district for alms, as she was hurrying into a house there, a fierce ram butted her with such violence as to break her leg. Up ran the people and set her leg and brought her on a litter to the convent of nuns. And all the nuns tauntingly said her broken leg came of her going where she had warned them not to go.

Not long after the Saṅgha came to hear of this; and one day in the Dhamma Hall {1.429} the monks spoke of how this nun had got her leg broken by a fierce ram in a quarter of the city against which she had warned the other nuns; and they condemned her conduct. Entering the Hall at this moment, the Teacher asked, and was told, what they were discussing. “As now, monks,” said he, “so too in a past time she gave warnings which she did not follow herself; and then as now she came to harm.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a bird, and growing up became king of the birds and came to the Himālayas with thousands of birds in his train. During their stay in that place, a certain fierce bird used to go in quest of food along a highway where she found rice, beans, and other grain dropped by passing wagons. Casting about how best to keep the others from coming there too, she addressed them as follows, “The highway is full of peril. Along it go elephants and horses, wagons drawn by fierce oxen, and such like dangerous things. And as it is impossible to take wing on the instant, don’t go there at all.” And because of her warning, the other birds dubbed her Anusāsikā [Warner].

Now one day when she was feeding along the highway she heard the sound of a carriage coming swiftly along the road, and turned her head to look at it. “Oh it’s quite a long way off,” thought she and went on as before. Up swift as the wind came the carriage, and before she could rise, the wheel had crushed her and whirled on its way. At the muster, the king marked her absence and ordered search to be made for her. And at last she was found cut in two on the highway and the news was brought to the king. “Through not following her own caution to the other birds she has been cut in two,” said he, and uttered this verse:

1. “The greed-denouncing bird, to greed a prey,
The chariot wheels leave mangled on the way”. {1.430}

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The warning nun was the bird Anusāsikā of those times, and I the king of the birds.”

Ja 116 Dubbacajātaka

The Story about the Disobedient One (1s)

In the present one newly ordained monk doesn’t like to carry out his duties and wants to go his own way. The Buddha tells the story of an acrobat in the past who tried to juggle with five javelins and died through not listening to the wise council of his betters.

The Bodhisatta = the pupil (antevāsika),
the disobedient monk = the (acrobat) teacher (ācariya).

Present Source: Ja 427 Gijjha,
Quoted at: Ja 116 Dubbaca, Ja 161 Indasamānagotta, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Disobedience, Wilfulness.

“Too much.” [1.259] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about an unruly monk whose own story will be given in the Ninth Book in the Gijjhajātaka [Ja 427].
This story the Teacher told at Jetavana concerning a disobedient monk. He was, they say, of gentle birth, and though ordained in the dispensation that leads to safety, was admonished by his well-wishers, masters, teachers, and fellow-students to this effect, “Thus must you advance and thus retreat; thus look at or away from objects; thus must the arm be stretched out or drawn back; thus are the inner and outer garment to be worn; thus is the bowl to be held, and when you have received sufficient food to sustain life, after self-examination, thus are you to partake of it, keeping guard over the door of the senses; in eating you are to be moderate and exercise watchfulness; you are to recognize such and such duties towards monks who come to or go from the monastery; these are the fourteen sets of monastic duties, and the eighty great duties to be duly performed; these are the thirteen ascetic practices; all these are to be scrupulously performed.” Yet was he disobedient and impatient, and did not receive instruction respectfully, but refused to listen to them, saying: “I do not find fault with you. Why do you speak thus to me? I shall know what is for my good, and what is not.”

Then the monks, hearing of his disobedience, sat in the Dhamma Hall, telling of his faults. The Teacher came and asked them what it was they were discussing, and sent for the monk and said: “Is it true, monk, that you are disobedient?” And he confessed that it was so.

The Teacher rebuked him in these words, “As now, so in former days were you unruly, monk, disregarding the counsels of the wise and good. Wherefore, by a javelin you did die.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into an acrobat’s family. When he grew up, he was a very wise fellow, having skill in means. From another acrobat he learned the javelin dance, and with his master used to travel about exhibiting his skill. Now this master of his knew the four javelin dance but not the five; but one day when performing in a certain village, he, being in liquor, had five javelins set up in a row and gave out that he would dance through the lot.

Said the Bodhisatta, “You can’t manage all five javelins, master. Have one taken away. If you try the five, you will be run through by the fifth and die.”
“Then you don’t know what I can do when I try,” said the drunken fellow; and paying no heed to the Bodhisatta’s words, he danced through four of the javelins only to impale himself on the fifth like the Bassia flower on its stalk. And there he lay groaning. Said the Bodhisatta, “This calamity comes of your disregarding the counsels of the wise and good,” and he uttered this verse: [1.431]

1. “Too much – though sore against my will – you tried;
   Clearing the four, upon the fifth you died.”

So saying, he lifted his master from off the javelin point and duly performed the last offices to his body.

His story done, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This unruly monk was the master of those days, and I the pupil.”

Ja 117 Tittirajāṭaka

The Story about the (Noisy) Partridge (1s)

In the present Kokālika blames the two chief disciples, and because of what he says, falls into hell. The Buddha tells a story of a monk who irritated another monk with his bickering and was killed on the spot with an axe.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s followers (isigaṇa),
Kokālika = the talkative ascetic (mukharatāpasa).

Present Source: Ja 481 Takkāriya,
Quoted at: Ja 117 Tittira, Ja 215 Kacchapa, Ja 272 Vyaggha, Ja 331 Kokālika.

Keywords: Slander, Talkativeness, Devas, Animals.

“As died the partridge.” [1.260] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about Kokālika, whose story will be found in the Thirteenth Book in the Takkāriyajāṭaka [Ja 481].352

During one rainy season the two chief disciples, desiring to leave the multitude and to dwell apart, took leave of the Teacher, and went into the kingdom where

352 Kokālika was one of Devadatta’s schismatics. [I include the story here.]
Kokālika was. They repaired to the residence of Kokālika, and said this to him, “Monk Kokālika, since for us it is delightful to dwell with you, and for you to dwell with us, we would abide here three months.” “How,” said the other, “will it be delightful for you to dwell with me?” They answered, “If you tell not a soul that the two chief disciples are dwelling here, we shall be happy, and that will be our delight in dwelling with you.” “And how is it delightful for me to dwell with you?” “We will teach the Dhamma to you for three months in your home, and we will discourse to you, and that will be your delight in dwelling with us.” “Dwell here, monks,” said he, “so long as you will,” and he allotted a pleasant residence to them. There they dwelt in the fruition of the Attainments, and no man knew of their dwelling in that place.

When they had thus past the rains they said to him, “Monk, now we have dwelt with you, and we will go to visit the Teacher,” and asked his leave to go. He agreed, and went with them on the rounds for alms in a village over against the place where they were. After their meal the elders departed from the village. Kokālika leaving them, turned back and said to the people, “Lay brethren, you are like brute animals. Here the two chief disciples have been dwelling for three months in the monastery opposite, and you knew nothing of it: now they are gone.” “Why did you not tell us, sir?” the people asked.

Then they took ghee and oil and medicines, raiment and clothes, and approached the elders, saluting them and saying: “Pardon us, sirs we knew not you were the chief disciples, we have learned it but today by the words of the venerable monk Kokālika. Pray have compassion on us, and receive these medicines and clothes.” Kokālika went after the elders with them, for he thought: “The elders are frugal, and content with little; they will not accept these things, and then they will be given to me.” But the elders, because the gift was offered at the instigation of a monk, neither accepted the things themselves nor had them given to Kokālika. The lay folk then said: “Sirs, if you will not accept these, come here once again to bless us.” The elders promised, and proceeded to the Teacher’s presence.

Now Kokālika was angry, because the elders neither accepted those things themselves, nor had them given to him. The elders, however, having remained a short while with the Teacher, each chose five hundred monks as their following, and with these thousand monks went on pilgrimage seeking alms, as far as Kokālika's country. The lay folk came out to meet them, and led them to the same monastery, and showed them great honour day by day.

Great was the store given them of clothes and of medicines. Those monks who went out with the elders dividing the garments gave of them to all the monks which had come, but to Kokālika gave none, neither did the elders give him any. Getting no clothes Kokālika began to abuse and revile the elders, “Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire; they would not accept before what was offered them, but these things they do accept. There is no satisfying them, they have no regard for another.” But the elders, perceiving that the man was harbouring evil on their account, set out with their followers to depart; nor would they return, not though the people begged them to stay yet a few days longer.

Then a young monk said: “Where shall the elders stay, laymen? Your own particular elder does not wish them to stay here.” Then the people went to Kokālika, and said: “Sir, we are told you do not wish the elders to stay here. Go to! Either appease them and bring them back, or away with you and live elsewhere!” In fear of the people this man went and made his request to the elders. “Go back, monk,” answered the elders, “we will not return.” So he, being unable to prevail upon them, returned to the monastery. Then the lay brethren asked him whether the elders had returned. “I could not persuade them to return,” said he. “Why not, monk?” they asked. And then they began to think it must be no good monks would dwell there because the man lived wrong, and they must get rid of him. “Sir,” they said, “do not stay here; we have nothing here for you.”

Thus dishonoured by them, he took bowl and robe and went to Jetavana. After saluting the Teacher, he said: “Sir, Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire, they are in the power of wicked desires!” The Teacher replied, “Say not so, Kokālika; let your heart, Kokālika, have confidence in Sāriputta and Moggallāna; learn that they are good monks.” Kokālika said: “You believe in your two chief disciples, sir; I have seen it with my own eyes; they have wicked desires, they have secrets within them, they are wicked men.” So he said thrice (though the Teacher would have stayed him), then rose from his seat, and departed. Even as he went on his way there arose over all his body boils of the size of a mustard seed, which grew and grew to the size of a ripe seed of the wood apple tree, burst, and blood ran all over him. Groaning he fell by the gate of Jetavana, maddened with pain.

A great cry arose, and reached even to the Brahmā Realm, “Kokālika has reviled the two chief disciples!” Then his spiritual teacher, the Brahmā Tudu by name, learning the fact, came with the intent of appeasing the elders, and said while poised in the air, “Kokālika, a cruel thing this you have done; make your peace with the chief disciples.” “Who are you, brother?” the man asked. “Tudu Brahmā, is my name,” said he. “Have you not been declared by the Fortunate One,” said the man, “one of those who return not? That word means that such come not back to this earth. You will become a Yakkha upon a dunghill!” Thus he upbraided the Mahābrahmā. And as he could not persuade the man to do as he advised, he replied to him, “May you be tormented according to your own word.” Then he returned to his abode of bliss. And Kokālika after dying was born again in the Lotus Hell. That he had been born there the great and mighty Brahmā told to the Tathāgata, and the Teacher told it to the monks.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks talked of the man’s wickedness, “Monks, they say Kokālika reviled Sāriputta and Moggallāna, and by the words of his own mouth came to the Lotus Hell.” The Teacher came in, and said he, “What speak you of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him.

Said the Teacher, “As now, monks, so likewise in former times, Kokālika’s tongue has worked his destruction.”

So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in the north country. When he grew up, he received a complete education at Taxila, and, renouncing sensual desire, gave up the world to become an ascetic. He won the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, and all the recluses of the Himālayas to the number of five hundred assembled together and followed him as their master. Absorption was his as he dwelt amid his disciples in the Himālayas.

In those days there was an ascetic suffering from jaundice who was chopping wood with an axe. And a chattering monk came and sat by him, and directed his work, bidding him give here a chop and there a chop, {1.432} till the jaundiced
The ascetic lost his temper. In a rage he cried, “Who are you to teach me how to chop wood?” and lifting up his keen-edged axe stretched the other dead with a single blow. And the Bodhisatta had the body buried.

Now on an ant-hill nearby the hermitage there dwelt a partridge which early and late was always piping on the top of the ant-hill. Recognising the note of a partridge, a sportsman killed the bird and took it off with him. Missing the bird’s note, the Bodhisatta asked the ascetics why they did not hear their neighbour the partridge now. Then they told him what had happened, and he linked the two events together in this verse:

1. “As died the partridge for her clamorous cry,
   So prate and chatter doomed this fool to die.”

Having developed within himself the four Divine Abidings, the Bodhisatta thus became destined to rebirth in the Brahmā Realm. [1.261]

Said the Teacher, “Monks, as now, so likewise in former days Kokālika’s tongue has worked his destruction.” And at the close of this lesson he identified the Jātaka by saying: “Kokālika was the meddling ascetic of those days, my followers the band of ascetics, and I their master.”

Ja 118 Vaṭṭakajātaka

The Story about the (Starving) Quail (1s)

In the present one merchant’s son, previously a Brahmā god, is reluctant to get involved with women, sees his chance and ordains instead, quickly attaining release. The Buddha tells how a wise quail in the past escaped death by making himself unfit for consumption by starving himself.

The Bodhisatta = the quail who escaped death (maraṇamutto vaṭṭako).

Past Compare: Mvu ii p 303 Śakuntaka (I).

Keywords: Celibacy, Fasting, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“The thoughtless man.” This story the Teacher told while at Jetavana, about the son of Uttaraseṭṭhi [Greater Treasurer]. This Uttaraseṭṭhi is said to have been a very rich man of Sāvatthi, and his wife became the mother of a righteous being from the realm of Brahmā angels, who grew up as lovely as Brahmā. [1.433] Now one day when the Kattikā [Autumn] festival had been proclaimed in Sāvatthi, the whole city gave itself up to the festivities. His companions, sons of other rich men, had all got wives, but Uttaraseṭṭhi’s son had lived so long in the Brahmā Realm that he was purged from passion. His companions plotted together to get him too a sweetheart and make him keep the feast with them. So going to him they said: “Dear friend, it is the great feast of Kattikā. Can’t we get a sweetheart for you too, and have a good time together?” At last his friends picked out a charming girl and decked her out, and left her at his house, with directions to make her way to his chamber. But when she entered the room, not a look or a word did she get from the young merchant. Piqued at this slight to her beauty, she put forth all her graces and feminine blandishments, smiling meantime so as just to show her pretty teeth. The sight of her teeth suggested bones, and his mind was filled with the idea of bones, till the girl’s whole body seemed to him nothing but a chain of bones. Then he gave her money and bade her begone. But as she came out of the house a nobleman saw her in the street and gave her a present to accompany him home.

At the end of seven days the festival was over, and the girl’s mother, seeing her daughter did not come back, went to the young merchant’s friends and asked where she was, and they in turn asked the young merchant. And he said he had paid her and sent her packing as soon as he saw her.

Then the girl’s mother insisted on having her daughter restored to her, and brought the young man before the king, who proceeded to examine into the matter. In answer to the king’s questions, the young man admitted that the girl had been passed on to him, but said he had no knowledge of her whereabouts, and no means of producing her. Then said the king, “If he fails to produce the girl, execute him.” So the young man was forthwith hauled off with his hands tied behind his back to be executed, and the whole city was in an uproar at the news. With hands laid on their breasts the people followed after him with lamentations, saying: “What means this, sir? You suffer unjustly.”

Then thought the young man {1.434} “All this sorrow has befallen me because I was living a lay life. If I can only escape this danger, I will give up the world and join the Saṅgha of the great Gotama, the Fully Awakened One.”

Now the girl herself heard the uproar and asked what it meant. Being told, she ran swiftly out, crying, “Stand aside, sirs! Let me pass! Let the king’s men see me.”
As soon as she had thus shown herself, she was handed over to her mother by the king’s men, who set the young man free and went their way. [1.262]

Surrounded by his friends, the son of Uttaraseṭṭhi went down to the river and bathed. Returning home, he breakfasted and let his parents know his resolve to give up the world. Then taking cloth for his ascetic’s robe, and followed by a great crowd, he sought out the Teacher and with due salutation asked to be admitted to the Saṅgha. A novice first, and afterwards a full monk, he meditated on the idea of Bondage till he gained Insight, and not long afterwards became an Arahant.

Now one day in the Dhamma Hall the assembled monks talked of his virtues, recalling how in the hour of danger he had recognized the excellence of the dispensation, and, wisely resolving to give up the world for its sake, had won that highest fruit which is Arahantship. And as they talked, the Teacher entered, and, on his asking, was told what was the subject of their conversation. Whereon he declared to them that, like the son of Uttaraseṭṭhi, the wise of former times, by taking thought in the hour of peril, had escaped death. So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta by change of existence was born a quail. Now in those days there was a quail-catcher who used to catch numbers of these birds in the forest and take them home to fatten. When they were fat, he used to sell them to people and so make a living. And one day he caught the Bodhisatta and brought him home with a number of other quails. Thought the Bodhisatta to himself, “If I take the food and drink he gives me, I shall be sold; while if I don’t eat it, I shall get so thin, that people will notice it and pass me over, with the result that I shall be safe. This, then, is what I must do.” So he fasted and fasted till he got so thin that he was nothing but skin and bone, and not a soul would have him at any price.

Having disposed {1.435} of every one of his birds except the Bodhisatta, the bird-catcher took the Bodhisatta out of the cage and laid him on the palms of his hand to see what ailed the bird. Watching when the man was off his guard, the Bodhisatta spread his wings and flew off to the forest. Seeing him return, the other quails asked what had become of him so long, and where he had been. Then he told them he had been caught by a fowler, and, being asked how he had escaped, replied, that it was by a device he had thought of, namely, not to take either the food or the drink which the fowler supplied. So saying, he uttered this verse:
1. “The thoughtless man no profit reaps. But see Thought’s fruit in me, from death and bondage free.”

In this manner did the Bodhisatta speak of what he had done.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the quail that escaped death in those days.”

Ja 119 Akālarāvijātaka

The Story about (the Cock) Crying at the Wrong Time (1s)

In the present one young man is talkative at all times, which brings him the blame of his fellow monks. The Buddha tells how, in a past life, he had been a cock who crowed at all the wrong times, which brought about his destruction.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the Buddha’s disciples = the pupils (antevāsika),
the monk = the cock who always cried out (akālarāvī kukkuṭo).

Keywords: Talkative, Untimely, Animals, Birds.

“No parents trained.” [1.263] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who used to be noisy at the wrong time. He is said to have come of a good Sāvatthi family and to have given up the world for the dispensation, but to have neglected his duties and despised instruction. He never took count of the hours for duties, for ministry or for reciting the texts. Throughout the three watches of the night, as well as the hours of waking, he was never quiet; so that the other monks could not get a wink of sleep.

Accordingly, the monks in the Dhamma Hall censured his conduct. Entering the Hall and learning on enquiry what they were talking about, the Teacher said: “Monks, as now, so in past times, this monk was noisy out of season, and for his unseasonable conduct was strangled.” So saying he told this story of the past. {1.436}

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a northern brahmin family, and when he grew up, learned all knowledge and became a teacher of world-wide fame with five hundred young brahmans studying under him. Now these young brahmans had a cock who crowed betimes and roused them to their studies. And this cock died. So they looked all about for another, and one of their number, when picking up firewood in the cemetery-grove, saw a cock there which he brought home and kept in a coop. But, as this second cock had been bred in a cemetery, he had no knowledge of times and seasons, and used to crow casually – at midnight as well as at daybreak. Roused by his crowing at midnight, the young brahmins fell to their studies; by dawn they were tired out and could not for sleepiness keep their attention on the subject; and when he fell crowing in broad day they did not get a chance of quiet for repeating their lesson. And as it was the cock’s crowing both at midnight and by day which had brought their studies to a standstill, they took the bird and wrung his neck. Then they told their teacher that they had killed the cock that crowed in and out of season.

Said their teacher, for their edification, “It was his bad upbringing that brought this cock to his end.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “No parents trained, no teacher taught this bird:
Both in and out of season was he heard.” [1.264]

Such was the Bodhisatta’s teaching on the matter; and when he had lived his allotted time on earth, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka as follows, “This monk was the cock of those times, who did not know when not to crow; my disciples were the young brahmins; and I their teacher.”

Ja 120 Bandhanamokkha Jātaka

The Story about Freedom from Bondage (1s)

In the present Ciñcā falsely accuses the Buddha of fathering a child on her. After Sakka reveals the falsehood, she falls into hell. The Buddha tells a story about a queen who cheated with 64 men and then falsely accused the king’s family priest of adultery, until it was discovered.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
Ānanda = the king (rājā),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = the corrupt queen (duṭṭhadevī).

Present Source: Ja 472 Mahāpaduma,
Quoted at: Ja 120 Bandhanamokkha,
Present Compare: Dhp-a XIII.9 Ciñcamāṇavikā.
Keywords: Slander, Wisdom, Devas, Women.

“While folly’s speech.” {1.437} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the brahmin-girl Ciñcā, whose history will be given in the Twelfth Book in the Mahāpadumajātaka [Ja 472].

When the One with Ten Powers first attained supreme wisdom, after disciples had multiplied, and innumerable gods and men had been born into heavenly states, and the seeds of goodness had been cast abroad, great honour was shown him, and great gifts given. The heretics were like fireflies after sunrise; they had no honours and no gifts; in the street they stood, and cried out to the people, “What is the ascetic Gotama the Buddha? We are Buddhas also! Does that gift only bring great fruit, which is given to him? That which is given to us also has great fruit for you! Give to us also, work for us!” But cry as they would, they got no honour nor gifts. Then they came together in secret, and consulted, “How can we cast a stain upon Gotama the ascetic in the face of men, and put an end to his honour and his gifts?”

Now there was at that time in Sāvatthi a certain nun, named Ciñcamāṇavikā; she was very lovely, full of all grace, like a Devaccharā; rays of brilliancy shone forth from her body. Some one uttered a counsel of cruelty thus, “By the help of Ciñcamāṇavikā we will cast a stain upon the ascetic Gotama, and put an end to his honour and the gifts he receives.” “Yes,” they all agreed, “that is the way to do it.”

She came to the monastery of the heretics, and greeted them, and stood still. The heretics said nothing to her. She said: “What blemish is there in me? Three times I have greeted you!” She said again, “Sirs, what blemish is in me? why do you not speak to me?” They replied, “Know you not, sister, that Gotama the ascetic is going about and doing us harm, cutting off all the honour and liberality that was shown us?” “I did not know it, sirs; but what can I do?” “If you wish us well, sister by your own doing bring a stain upon the ascetic Gotama, and put an end to his honour and the gifts he receives.” She replied, “Very good, sirs, leave that to me; do not trouble about it.” With these words she departed.

After that, she used all a woman’s skill in deceit. When the people of Sāvatthi had heard the Dhamma, and were coming away from Jetavana, she used to go towards Jetavana, clad in a robe dyed with cochineal, and with fragrant garlands in her hands. When any one asked her, “Whither away at this hour?” she would reply, “What have you to do with my goings and comings?” She spent the night in the heretics’ monastery, which was close by Jetavana: and when early in the morning, the lay associates of the order came forth from the city to pay their morning salutation, she would meet them as though she had spent the night in Jetavana, going towards the city. If any one asked where she had stayed, she would answer, “What are my stayings and lodgings to you?” But after some six weeks, she replied, “I spent the night in Jetavana, with Gotama the ascetic, in one fragrant cell.” Then the unconverted began to wonder, could this be true, or not.

After three or four months, she bound bandages about her belly, and made it appear as though she were with child, and wrapped a red robe around her. Then she declared that she was with child by the ascetic Gotama, and made blind fools believe. After eight or nine months, she fastened about her pieces of wood in a bundle, and over all her red robe; hands, feet, and back she caused to be beaten with the jawbone of an ox, so as to produce swellings; and made as though all her senses were wearied.

One evening, when the Tathāgata was sitting on the splendid seat of preaching, and was preaching the Dhamma, she went among the Saṅgha, and standing in front of the Tathāgata, said: “O great ascetic! You preach indeed to great multitudes; sweet is your voice, and soft is the lip that covers your teeth; but you have got me with child, and my time is near; yet you assign me no chamber for the childbirth, you give me no ghee nor oil; what you will not do yourself, you do not ask another of the lay associates to do, the king of Kosala, or Anāthapiṇḍika, or Visākhā the great lay sister. Why do you not tell one of them to do what is to be done for me? You know how to take your pleasure, but you do not know how to care for that which shall be born!” So she reviled the Tathāgata in the midst of the Saṅgha, as one might try to besmirch the moon's face with a handful of filth. The Tathāgata stopped his discourse, and roaring like a lion in clarion tones, he said: “Sister, whether that which you have said be true or false, you know and I only know.” “Yes, truly,” said she, “this happened through something that you and I only know of.”

Just at that moment, Sakka’s throne became hot. Reflecting, he perceived the reason, “Ciñcamañavikā is accusing the Tathāgata of what is not true.” Determined to clear up this matter, he came there with four Devaputtas in his company. The Devaputtas took on them the shape of mice, and all at once gnawed through the cords that bound the bundle of wood: a wind-puff blew up the robe she wore, and the bundle of wood was disclosed and fell at her feet: the toes of both her feet were cut off. The people cried out, “A wretch is accusing the Supreme Buddha!” They spat on her head, and drove her forth from Jetavana with staves and clods in their hands. And as she passed beyond the range of the Tathāgata’s vision, the great earth yawned and showed a huge cleft, flames came up from the lowest hell, and she, enveloped in it as it were with a garment which her friends should wrap about her, fell to the lowest hell and there was born again. The honour and receipts of the other heretics ceased, those of the One with Ten Powers grew more abundantly.

Next day they were conversing in the Dhamma Hall, “Monks, Ciñcamāṇavikā falsely accused the Supreme Buddha, great in virtue, worthy of all gifts! And she came to dire destruction.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they talked of, sitting there together. They told him.

On this occasion the Teacher said: “Monks, this is not the first time Ciñcā has laid false accusations against me. She did the like in other times.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into the family priest’s family, and on his father’s death became the family priest.

Now the king promised to grant whatsoever boon his queen should ask of him, and she said: “The boon I ask is an easy one; henceforth you must not look on any other woman with eyes of love.” At first he refused, but, wearied by her unceasing importunity, was obliged to give way at last. And from that day forward he never cast a glance of love at any one of his sixteen thousand dancing girls.

Now a disturbance arose on the borders of his kingdom, and after two or three engagements with the robbers, the troops there sent a letter to the king saying that they were unable to carry the matter through. Then the king was anxious to go in person and assembled a mighty host. And he said to his wife, “Dear one, I go to the frontier, where battles will rage ending in victory or defeat. The camp is no place for a woman, and you must stay behind here.”
“I can’t remain behind if you go, my lord,” said she. But finding the king firm in his decision she made the following request instead, “Every league, [1.265] send a messenger to enquire how I fare.” And the king promised to do so. Accordingly, when he marched out with his host, leaving the Bodhisatta in the city, the king sent back a messenger at the end of every league to let the queen know how he was, and to find out how she fared. Of each man as he came she asked what brought him back. And on receiving the answer that he was come to learn how she fared, they queen beckoned the messenger to her and did wrong with him. Now the king journeyed two and thirty leagues and sent two and thirty messengers, [1.438] and the queen did wrong with them all. And when he had pacified the frontier, to the great joy of the inhabitants, he started on his homeward journey, dispatching a second series of thirty-two messengers. And the queen misbehaved with each one of these, as before.

Halting his victorious army near the city, the king sent a letter to the Bodhisatta to prepare the city for his entry. The preparations in the city were done, and the Bodhisatta was preparing the palace for the king’s arrival, when he came to the queen’s apartments. The sight of his great beauty so moved the queen that she called to him to satisfy her lust. But the Bodhisatta pleaded with her, urging the king’s honour, and protesting that he shrank from all wrong and would not do as she wished. “No thoughts of the king frightened sixty-four of the king’s messengers,” said she, “and will you for the king’s sake fear to do my will?”

Said the Bodhisatta, “Had these messengers thought with me, they would not have acted thus. As for me that know the right, I will not commit this wrong.”

“Don’t talk nonsense,” said she. “If you refuse, I will have your head chopped off.”

“So be it. Cut off my head in this or in a hundred thousand existences; yet will I not do your bidding.”

“All right; I will see,” said the queen menacingly. And retiring to her chamber, she scratched herself, put oil on her limbs, clad herself in dirty clothes and feigned to be ill. Then she sent for her slaves and bade them tell the king, when he should ask after her, that she was ill.

Meantime the Bodhisatta had gone to meet the king, who, after marching round the city in solemn procession, entered his palace. Not seeing the queen, he asked where she was, and was told that she was ill. Entering the royal bed-chamber, the king caressed the queen and asked what ailed her. She was silent; but when the king asked the third time, she looked at him and said: “Though my lord the king still lives, yet poor women like me have to own a master.”

“What do you mean?”

“The family priest whom you left to watch over the city came here on pretence of seeing after the palace; and because I would not yield to his will, [1.439] he beat me to his heart’s content and went off.” [1.266]

Then the king fumed with rage, like the crackling of salt or sugar in the fire; and he rushed from the chamber. Calling his servants, he bade them bind the family priest with his hands behind him, like one condemned to death, and cut off his head at the place of execution. So away they hurried and bound the Bodhisatta.
And the drum was beaten to announce the execution.

Thought the Bodhisatta, “Doubtless that wicked queen has already poisoned the king’s mind against me, and now must I save myself from this peril.” So he said to his captors, “Bring me into the king’s presence before you slay me.” “Why so?”
said they. “Because, as the king’s servant, I have toiled greatly on the king’s business, and know where great treasures are hidden which I have discovered. If I am not brought before the king, all this wealth will be lost. So lead me to him, and then do your duty.”

Accordingly, they brought him before the king, who asked why reverence had not restrained him from such wickedness.

“Sire,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I was born a brahmin, and have never taken the life so much as of an emmet or ant. I have never taken what was not my own, even to a blade of grass. Never have I looked with lustful eyes upon another man’s wife.
Not even in jest have I spoken falsely, and not a drop of strong drink have I ever drunk. Innocent am I, sire; but that wicked woman took me lustfully by the hand, and, being rebuffed, threatened me, nor did she retire to her chamber before she had told me her secret evil-doing. For there were sixty-four messengers who came with letters from you to the queen. Send for these men and ask each whether he did as the queen bade him or not.” Then the king had the sixty-four men bound and sent for the queen. And she confessed to having had guilty intercourse with the men. Then the king ordered off all the sixty-four to be beheaded.

But at this point {1.440} the Bodhisatta cried out, “Nay, sire, the men are not to blame; for they were constrained by the queen. Wherefore pardon them. And as for the queen: she is not to blame, for the passions of women are insatiate, and she does but act according to her inborn nature. Wherefore, pardon her also, O king.”

Upon this entreaty the king was merciful, and so the Bodhisatta saved the lives of the queen and the sixty-four men, and he gave them each a place to dwell in. Then the Bodhisatta came to the king and said: “Sire, the baseless accusations of folly put the wise in unmerited bonds, but the words of the wise released the foolish.
Thus folly wrongfully binds, and wisdom sets free from bonds.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “While folly’s speech does bind unrighteously,
   At wisdom’s word the justly bound go free.” [1.267]

When he had taught the king the Dhamma in these verses, he exclaimed, “All this trouble sprang from my living a lay life. I must change my mode of life, and crave your permission, sire, to give up the world.” And with the king’s permission he gave up the world and quit his tearful relations and his great wealth to become a recluse. His dwelling was in the Himālayas, and there he won the Super Knowledges and Attainments and became destined to rebirth in the Brahmā Realm.

His teaching ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ciñcā was the wicked queen of those days, Ānanda the king, and I his family priest.”

Ja 121 Kusanāḷijātaka
The Story about the Grass (Devatā) (1s)

In the present Anāthapiṇḍika has a friend with an unfortunate name, whom he is loyal to anyway, as a true friend should be. The Buddha tells how in the past a lowly grass Devatā helped preserve the home of a Tree Devatā through his wisdom.

The Bodhisatta = the Grass Devatā (Kusanāḷidevatā), Ānanda = the Tree Devatā (Rucādevatā).
“Let great and small.” (1.441) This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about Anāthapiṇḍika’s true friend. For his acquaintances and friends and relations came to him and tried hard to stop his intimacy with a certain man, saying that neither in birth nor wealth was he Anāthapiṇḍika’s equal. But the great merchant replied that friendship should not depend on equality or inequality of externals. And when he went off to his village headman, he put this friend in charge of his wealth. Everything came to pass as in the Kālakaṇṇijātaka [Ja 83].

Tradition says that the two had made mud-pies together, and had gone to the same school; but, as years went by, the friend, whose name was Wretch [Kāḷakaṇṇī], sank into great distress and could not make a living anyhow. So he came to the rich man, who was kind to him, and paid him to look after all his property; and the poor friend was employed under Anāthaπiṇḍika and did all his business for him. After he had gone up to the rich man’s it was a common thing to hear in the house, “Stand up, Wretch,” or, “Sit down, Wretch,” or, “Have your dinner, Wretch.”

One day the Treasurer’s friends and acquaintances called on him and said: “Lord Treasurer, don’t let this sort of thing go on in your house. It’s enough to scare a Yakkha to hear such ill-omened observations as – ‘Stand up, Wretch,’ or ‘Sit down, Wretch,’ or ‘Have your dinner, Wretch.’ The man is not your social equal; he’s a miserable wretch, dogged by misfortune. Why have anything to do with him?”

“Not so,” replied Anāthaπiṇḍika, “a name only serves to denote a man, and the wise do not measure a man by his name; nor is it proper to wax superstitious about mere sounds. Never will I throw over, for his mere name’s sake, the friend with whom I made mud-pies as a child.” And he rejected their advice.

One day the great man departed to visit a village of which he was headman, leaving the other in charge of the house. Hearing of his departure certain robbers made up their mind to break into the house; and, arming themselves to the teeth, they surrounded it in the night-time. But Wretch had a suspicion that burglars might be expected, and was sitting up for them. And when he knew that they had come, he ran about as if to rouse his people, bidding one sound the conch, another beat the drum, till he had the whole house full of noise, as though he were rousing a whole army of servants. Said the robbers, “The house is not so empty as we were told; the master must be at home.” Flinging away their stones, clubs and other weapons, away they bolted for their lives.

Next day great alarm was caused by the sight of all the discarded weapons lying round the house; and Wretch was lauded to the skies by such praises as this, “If the house had not been patrolled by one so wise as this man, the robbers would have simply walked in at their own pleasure and have plundered the house. The Treasurer owes this stroke of good luck to his staunch friend.” And the moment the merchant came back from his village they hastened to tell him the whole story.

“Ah,” said he, “this is the trusty guardian of my house whom you wanted me to get rid of. If I had taken your advice and got rid of him; I should be a beggar today. It’s not the name but the heart within that makes the man.” So saying he raised his wages. And thinking that here was a good story to tell, off he went to the Teacher and gave him a complete account of it all, right through.

But, when in this case Anāṭhipiṇḍika related the danger his house had been in, the Teacher said: “Layman, a friend rightly so-called is never inferior. The standard is ability to befriend. A friend rightly so-called, though only equal or inferior to one’s self, should be held a superior, for all such friends fail not to grapple with trouble which befalls one’s self. It is your real friend that has now saved you your wealth. So in days gone by a like real friend saved a Devatā’s mansion.” Then at Anāṭhipiṇḍika’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a Devatā in the king’s pleasure gardens, and dwelt in a clump of kusa grass. Now in the same grounds near the king’s seat there grew a beautiful Wishing Tree (also called the Mukkhaka) with straight stem and spreading branches, which received great favour from the king. Here dwelt one who had been a mighty king of the Devas and had been reborn a Tree Devatā. And the Bodhisatta was on terms of intimate friendship with this Tree Devatā.

Now the king’s dwelling had only one pillar to support the roof [1.268] and that pillar grew shaky. Being told of this, the king sent for carpenters and ordered them to put in a sound pillar and make it secure. So the carpenters [1.442] looked about for a tree that would do and, not finding one elsewhere, went to the pleasure gardens and saw the Mukkhaka. Then away they went back to the king. “Well,” said he, “have you found a tree that will do?” “Yes, sire,” said they, “but we don’t like to fell it.” “Why not?” said the king. Then they told him how they had in vain looked everywhere for a tree and did not dare to cut down the sacred tree. “Go and cut it down,” said he, “and make the roof secure. I will look out for another tree.”

So they went away. And they took a sacrifice to the pleasure gardens and offered it to the tree, saying among themselves that they would come and cut it down next day. Hearing their words, the Tree Devatā knew that her home would be destroyed on the morrow, and burst into tears as she clasped her children to her breast, not knowing whither to fly with them. Her friends, the spirits of the forest, came and asked what the matter was. But not one of them could devise how to stay the carpenters’ hand, and all embraced her with tears and lamentations. At this moment up came the Bodhisatta to call upon the Tree Devatā and was told the news. “Have no fear,” said the Bodhisatta cheerfully. “I will see that the tree is not cut down. Only wait and see what I will do when the carpenters come tomorrow.”

Next day when the men came, the Bodhisatta, assuming the shape of a chameleon, was at the tree before they were, and got in at the roots and worked his way up till he got out among the branches, making the tree look full of holes. Then the Bodhisatta rested among the boughs with his head rapidly moving to and fro. Up came the carpenters; and at sight of the chameleon their leader struck the tree with his hand, and exclaimed that the tree was rotten and that they didn’t look carefully before making their offerings the day before. And off he went full of scorn for the great strong tree.

In this way the Bodhisatta saved the Tree Devatā’s home. And when all her friends and acquaintances came to see her, she joyfully sang the praises of the Bodhisatta, as the saviour of her home, saying: “Devatās of the Trees, for all our mighty power we knew not what to do; while a humble Kusa Devatā had wit to save my home for me. Truly we should choose our friends without considering whether they are superiors, equals, or inferiors, making no distinction of rank. For each according to his strength can help a friend in the hour of need.” And she repeated this verse about friendship and its duties:
1. “Let great and small and equals, all,
Do each their best, if harm befall,
And help a friend in evil pass,
As I was helped by god of grass.” [1.269]

Thus did she teach the assembled Devas, adding these words, “Wherefore, such as would escape from an evil plight must not merely consider whether a man is an equal or a superior, but must make friends of the wise whatsoever their station in life.” And she lived her life and with the Kusa Devatā finally passed away to fare according to her deeds.

His lesson ended the Teacher identified the birth by saying: “Ānanda was then the Tree Devatā, and I the Kusa Devatā.”

Ja 122 Dummedhajātaka

The Story about the Fool (1s)

In the present when Devadatta hears the Buddha being praised he is maddened by it. The Buddha tells how, when he was a state elephant in the past, a previous incarnation of Devadatta had been jealous of him, and had tried to get him killed, until he fled to another king, who was more appreciative.

The Bodhisatta = the elephant (hatthī),
Ānanda = the mahout (hatthācariya),
Sāriputta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
Devadatta = the king of Magadha (Magadharājā).

Keywords: Jealousy, Appreciation, Animals.

“Exalted station breeds a fool great woe.” [1.444] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. For the monks had met together in the Dhamma Hall, and were talking of how the sight of the Tathāgata’s perfections and all the distinctive signs of Buddhahood maddened Devadatta; and how in his jealousy he could not bear to hear the praises of the Buddha’s utter wisdom. Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked what was the subject of their conversation. And when they told him, he said: “Monks, as now, so in former times Devadatta was maddened by hearing my praises.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

---

353 [See Snp 3.7 Selasutta = MN 92].

In the past when king Magadha was ruling in Rājagaha in Magadha, the Bodhisatta was born an elephant. He was white all over and graced with all the beauty of form described above.

When born, he was white all over, like a mighty mass of silver. Like diamond balls were his eyes, like a manifestation of the five brightnesses; red was his mouth, like scarlet cloth; like silver flecked with red gold was his trunk; and his four feet were as if polished with lac. Thus his person, adorned with the Ten Perfections, was of consummate beauty.

And because of his beauty the king made him his state elephant. One festal day the king adorned the city like a city of the Devas and, mounted on the elephant in all its trappings, made a solemn procession round the city attended by a great retinue. And all along the route the people were moved by the sight of that peerless elephant to exclaim, “Oh what a stately gait! What proportions! What beauty! What grace! Such a white elephant is worthy of a Universal Monarch.” All this praise of his elephant awoke the king’s jealousy and he resolved to have it cast over a precipice and killed. So he summoned the mahout and asked whether he called that a trained elephant.

“Indeed he is well trained, sire,” said the mahout. “No, he is very badly trained.” “Sire, he is well trained.” (1.445) “If he is so well trained, can you get him to climb to the summit of Mount Vepulla?” “Yes, sire.” “Away with you, then,” said the king. And he got down from the elephant, making the mahout mount instead, and went himself to the foot of the mountain, while the mahout rode on the elephant’s back up to the top of Mount Vepulla. The king with his courtiers also climbed the mountain, and had the elephant halted at the brink of a precipice. “Now,” said he to the man, “if he is so well trained as you say, make him stand on three legs.”

And the mahout on the elephant’s back just touched the animal with his goad by way of sign and called to him, “Hi! My beauty, stand on three legs.” “Now make him stand on his two fore-legs,” said the king. And the Great Being raised his

---

354 [Ja 72 Silavanāgajātaka. I include the paragraph here.]
hind-legs and stood on his fore-legs alone. “Now on the hind-legs,” said the king, and the obedient elephant raised his fore-legs till he stood on his hind-legs alone. “Now on one leg,” said the king, and the elephant stood on one leg.

Seeing that the elephant did not fall over the precipice, the king cried, “Now if you can, make him stand in the air.”

Then thought the mahout to himself, “All Jambudīpa cannot show the match of this elephant for excellence of training. Surely the king must want to make him tumble over the precipice and meet his death.” So he whispered in the elephant’s ear, “My son, the king wants you to fall over and get killed. He is not worthy of you. If you have power to journey through the air, rise up with me upon your back and fly through the air to Benares.”

And the Great Being, endowed as he was with the marvellous powers which flow from merit, straightaway rose up into the air. Then said the mahout, “Sire, this elephant, possessed as he is with the marvellous powers which flow from merit, is too good for such a worthless fool as you: none but a wise and good king is worthy to be his master. When those who are so worthless as you get an elephant like this, they don’t know his value, and so they lose their elephant, and all the rest of their glory and splendour.” So saying the mahout, seated on the elephant’s neck, recited this verse:

1. “Exalted station breeds a fool great woe;
   He proves his own and others’ mortal foe.” {1.446}

“And now, goodbye,” said he to the king as he ended this rebuke; and rising in the air, he passed to Benares and halted in mid-air [1.271] over the royal courtyard. And there was a great stir in the city and all cried out, “Look at the state-elephant that has come through the air for our king and is hovering over the royal courtyard.” And with all haste the news was conveyed to the king too, who came out and said: “If your coming is for my benefit, alight on the earth.” And the Bodhisatta descended from the air. Then the mahout got down and bowd before the king, and in answer to the king’s enquiries told the whole story of their leaving Rājagaha. “It was very good of you,” said the king, “to come here,” and in his joy he had the city decorated and the elephant installed in his state-stable. Then he divided his kingdom into three portions, and made over one to the Bodhisatta, one to the mahout, and one he kept himself. And his power grew from the day of the Bodhisatta’s coming till all Jambudīpa owned his sovereign sway. As emperor of Jambudīpa, he was charitable and did other good works till he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was in those days the king of Magadha, Sāriputta the king of Benares, Ānanda the mahout, and I the elephant.”

Ja 123 Naṅgalīsajātaka

The Story about the Plough-Shaft (1s)

In the present one monk is always saying the wrong thing at the wrong time. The Buddha tells a story of how the same monk had indeed been faithful, but truly inept in his thinking in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo), Lāḷudāyi = the foolish brahmin student (lāḷakamāṇavo).

Keywords: Infelicity, Wrong comparison.

“For universal application.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the elder Lāḷudāyi who is said to have had a knack of always saying the wrong thing. He never knew the proper occasion for the several teachings. For instance, if it was a festival, he would croak out the gloomy text,355 “Without the walls they lurk, and where four cross-roads meet.” If it was a funeral, he would burst out with,356 “Joy filled the hearts of gods and men,” or with,357 “Oh may you see {1,447} a hundred, nay a thousand such glad days!”

Now one day the monks in the Dhamma Hall commented on his singular infelicity of subject and his knack of always saying the wrong thing. As they sat talking, the Teacher entered, and, in answer to his question, was told the subject of their talk. “Monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that Lāḷudāyi’s folly has made him say

---

355 [Khp 7 Tirokuḍḍasutta.]
356 [Khp 5 Maṅgalasutta.]
357 [These lines seem to appear only here, so it is presumably a lost sutta.]
the wrong thing. He has always been as inept as now.” So saying he told this story of the past. [1.272]

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a rich brahmin’s family, and when he grew up, was versed in all knowledge and was a world-renowned teacher with five hundred young brahmins to instruct.

At the time of our story there was among the young brahmans one who always had foolish notions in his head and always said the wrong thing; he was engaged with the rest in learning the scriptures as a pupil, but because of his folly could not master them. He was the devoted attendant of the Bodhisatta and ministered to him like a slave.

Now one day after supper the Bodhisatta laid himself on his bed and there was washed and perfumed by the young brahmin on hands, feet and back. And as the youth turned to go away, the Bodhisatta said to him, “Prop up the feet of my bed before you go.” And the young brahmin propped up the feet of the bed on one side all right, but could not find anything to prop it up with on the other side. Accordingly he used his leg as a prop and passed the night so. When the Bodhisatta got up in the morning and saw the young brahmin, he asked why he was sitting there. “Teacher,” said the young man, “I could not find one of the bed supports; so I’ve got my leg under to prop it up instead.”

Moved at these words, the Bodhisatta thought: “What devotion! And to think it should come from the most dull of all my pupils. How can I impart learning to him?” And the thought came to him that the best way was to question the young brahmin on his return from gathering firewood and leaves, as to something he had seen or done that day; and then to ask what it was like. [1.448] “For,” thought the master, “this will lead him on to making comparisons and giving reasons, and the continuous practice of comparing and reasoning on his part will enable me to impart learning to him.”

Accordingly he sent for the young man and told him always on his return from picking up firewood and leaves to say what he had seen or eaten or drunk. And the young man promised he would. So one day having seen a snake when out with the other pupils picking up wood in the forest, he said: “Teacher, I saw a snake.” “What did it look like?” “Oh, like the shaft of a plough.” “That is a very good comparison. Snakes are like the shafts of ploughs,” said the Bodhisatta, who began to have hopes that he might at last succeed with his pupil.
The Section with One Verse – 550

Another day the young brahmin saw an elephant in the forest and told his master.
“And what is an elephant like?” “Oh, like the shaft of a plough.” His master said nothing, for he thought that, as the elephant’s trunk and tusks bore a certain resemblance to the shaft of a plough, perhaps his pupil’s stupidity made him speak thus generally (though he was thinking of the trunk in particular), because of his inability to go into accurate detail. [1.273]

A third day he was invited to eat sugar-cane, and duly told his master. “And what is a sugar-cane like?” “Oh, like the shaft of a plough.” “That is scarcely a good comparison,” thought his master, but said nothing. Another day, again, the pupils were invited to eat molasses with curds and milk, and this too was duly reported.
“And what are curds and milk like?” “Oh, like the shaft of a plough.” Then the master thought to himself, “This young man was perfectly right in saying a snake was like the shaft of a plough, and was more or less right, though not accurate, in saying an elephant and a sugar-cane had the same similitude. But milk and curds (which are always white in colour) take the shape of whatever vessel they are placed in; {1.449} and here he missed the comparison entirely. This dullard will never learn.” So saying he uttered this verse:

1. “For universal application he Employs a term of limited import.
   Plough-shaft and curds to him alike unknown,
   The fool asserts these two things are the same.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Lāḷudāyi was the dullard of those days, and I the teacher of world-wide renown.”

Ja 124 Ambajātaka
The Story about the Mangoes (1s)

In the present one monk is very virtuous in all his actions, and attracts a generous support for all who dwell with him. The Buddha tells a story of how once during a drought, when living as an ascetic, he had put aside his own needs to cater to watering the animals in the forest, and how they had repaid him.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā),
the monk = the dutiful ascetic (vattasampanno tāpaso).

Keywords: Virtue, Reward, Animals.

“Toil on, my brother.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a good brahmin belonging to a noble Sāvatthi family who gave his heart to the dispensation, and going forth, became constant in all duties. Blameless in his attendance on teachers; scrupulous in the matter of foods and drinks; zealous in the performance of the duties of the chapter-house, bath-house, and so forth; perfectly punctual in the observance of the fourteen major and of the eighty minor disciplines; he used to sweep the monastery, the cells, the cloisters, and the path leading to their monastery, and gave water to thirsty folk. And because of his great goodness folk gave regularly five hundred meals a day to the monks; and great gain and honour accrued to the monastery, the many prospering for the virtues of one. And one day in the Dhamma Hall the monks fell to talking of how that monk’s goodness had brought them gain and honour, and filled many lives with joy. Entering the Hall, {1.450} the Teacher asked, and [1.274] was told, what their talk was about. “This is not the first time, monks,” said he, “that this monk has been regular in the fulfilment of duties. In days gone by five hundred ascetics going out to gather fruits were supported on the fruits that his goodness provided.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in the north, and, growing up, gave up the world and dwelt at the head of five hundred ascetics at the foot of the mountains. In those days there came a great drought upon the Himālayas, and everywhere the water was dried up, and sore distress fell upon all beasts. Seeing the poor creatures suffering from thirst, one of the ascetics cut down a tree which he hollowed into a trough; and this trough he filled with all the water he could find. In this way he gave the animals to drink. And they came in herds and drank and drank till the ascetic had no time left to go and gather fruits for himself. Heedless of his own hunger, he worked away to quench the animals’ thirst. Thought they to themselves, “So wrapped up is this ascetic in ministering to our wants that he leaves himself no time to go in quest of fruits. He must be very hungry. Let us agree that everyone of us who comes here to drink must bring such fruits as he can to the ascetic.” This they agreed to do, every animal that came bringing mangoes or jambus or breadfruits or the like, till their offerings would have filled two hundred and fifty wagons; and there was food for the whole five hundred ascetics with abundance to spare. Seeing this, the Bodhisatta exclaimed, “Thus has one man’s goodness been the means of supplying with food all these ascetics. Truly, we should always be steadfast in doing right.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “Toil on, my brother; still in hope stand fast; Nor let your courage flag and tire; Forget not him, who by his grievous fast
Reaped fruits beyond his heart’s desire.” [1.451]

Such was the teaching of the Great Being to the band of ascetics.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was the good ascetic of those days, and I the ascetics’ master.”

Ja 125 Kaṭāhakajātaka

The Story about the (Deceitful Secretary) Kaṭāhaka (1s)

In the present a monk lies about his family, fortune and fame, until he is discovered. The Buddha tells a story of a past life, in which the same person had cheated his master’s friends and married into the family, putting on airs and graces, until his master taught his wife a verse to repeat to him.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi),
the boastful monk = (the deceiving secretary) Kaṭāhaka.

Present Source: Ja 80 Bhīmasena,
Quoted at: Ja 125 Kaṭāhaka, Ja 127 Kalaṇḍuka.

Keywords: Boasting, Vanity.

“If he ’mid strangers.” [1.275] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a boastful monk. The introductory story about him is like what has already been related [Ja 80].

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain braggart among the monks. Tradition says that he used to gather round him monks of all ages, and go about deluding everyone with lying boasts about his noble descent. “Ah, monks,” he would say, “there’s no family so noble as mine, no lineage so peerless. I am a scion of the highest of princely lines; no man is my equal in birth or ancestral estate; there is absolutely no end to the gold and silver and other treasures we possess. Our very slaves and menials are fed on rice and meat-stews, and are clad in the best Benares cloth, with the choicest Benares perfumes to perfume themselves withal; while I, because I have joined the Saṅgha, have to content myself with this vile fare and this vile garb.” But another monk, after enquiring into his family estate, exposed to the monks the emptiness of this pretension.

358 cf. Vol. iv. 269 (text), and supra page 133.

So the monks met in the Dhamma Hall, and talk began as to how that monk, in spite of his vows to leave worldly things and cleave only to the dispensation which leads to safety, was going about deluding the monks with his lying boasts. While the fellow’s sinfulness was being discussed, the Teacher entered and enquired what their topic was. And they told him. “This is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that he has gone about boasting; in bygone days too he went about boasting and deluding people.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a rich Treasurer, and his wife bore him a son. And the self-same day a female slave in his house gave birth to a boy, and the two children grew up together. And when the rich man’s son was being taught to write, the young slave used to go with his young master’s tablets and so learned at the same time to write himself. Next he learned two or three handicrafts, and grew up to be a fair-spoken and handsome young man; and his name was Kaṭāhaka [Vessel]. Being employed as private secretary, he thought to himself, “I shall not always be kept at this work. The slightest fault and I shall be beaten, imprisoned, branded, and fed on slave’s fare. On the border there lives a merchant, a friend of my master’s. Why should I not go to him with a letter purporting to come from my master, and, passing myself off as my master’s son, marry the merchant’s daughter and live happily ever afterwards?

So he wrote a letter, {1.452} saying: “The bearer of this is my son. It is meet that our houses should be united in marriage, and I would have you give your daughter to this my son and keep the young couple near you for the present. As soon as I can conveniently do so, I will come to you.” This letter he sealed with his master’s private seal, and came to the border-merchant with a well-filled purse, handsome dresses, and perfumes and the like. And with a bow he stood before the merchant. “Where do you come from?” said the merchant. “From Benares.” “Who is your father?” “The Treasurer of Benares.” “And what brings you here?” “This letter will tell you,” said Kaṭāhaka, handing it to him. The merchant read the letter and exclaimed, “This gives me new life.” And in his joy he gave his daughter to Kaṭāhaka and set up the young couple, who lived in great style. But Kaṭāhaka gave himself airs, and used to find fault with the victuals and the clothes that were brought him, calling them ‘provincial.’ “These misguided provincials,” he would say, “have [1.276] no idea of dressing. And as for taste in scents and garlands, they’ve got none.”

Missing his slave, the Bodhisatta said: “I don’t see Kaṭāhaka. Where has he gone? Find him.” And off went the Bodhisatta’s people in quest of him, and searched far and wide till they found him. Then back they came without Kaṭāhaka recognizing them, and told the Bodhisatta. “This will never do,” said the Bodhisatta on hearing the news. “I will go and bring him back.” So he asked the king’s permission, and departed with a great following. And the tidings spread everywhere that the Treasurer was on his way to the borders. Hearing the news Kaṭāhaka fell to thinking of his course of action. He knew that he was the sole reason of the Treasurer’s coming, and he saw that to run away now was to destroy all chance of returning. So he decided to go to meet the Treasurer, and conciliate him by acting as a slave towards him as in the old days. Acting on this plan, he made a point of proclaiming in {1.453} public on all occasions his disapprobation of the lamentable decay of respect towards parents which showed itself in children sitting down to meals with their parents, instead of waiting upon them. “When my parents take their meals,” said Kaṭāhaka, “I hand the plates and dishes, bring the spittoon, and fetch their fans for them. Such is my invariable practice.” And he explained carefully a slave’s duty to his master, such as bringing the water, and ministering to him when he retired. And having already schooled folk in general, he had said to his father-in-law shortly before the arrival of the Bodhisatta, “I hear that my father is coming to see you. You had better make ready to entertain him, while I will go and meet him on the road with a present.” “Do so, my dear boy,” said his father-in-law.

So Kaṭāhaka took a magnificent present and went out with a large retinue to meet the Bodhisatta, to whom he handed the present with a low obeisance. The Bodhisatta took the present in a kindly way, and at breakfast time made his encampment and retired for the purposes of nature. Stopping his retinue, Kaṭāhaka took water and approached the Bodhisatta. Then the young man fell at the Bodhisatta’s feet and cried, “Oh, sir, I will pay any sum you may require; but do not expose me.”

“Fear no exposure at my hands,” said the Bodhisatta, pleased at his dutiful conduct, and entered into the city, where he was f eted with great magnificence. And Kaṭāhaka still acted as his slave.

As the Treasurer sat at his ease, the border-merchant said: “My lord, upon receipt of your letter I duly gave my daughter in marriage to your son.” And the Treasurer made a suitable reply about ‘his son’ in so kindly a way that the merchant was delighted beyond measure. But from that time forth the Bodhisatta could not bear the sight of Kaṭāhaka.

One day the Great Being sent for the merchant’s daughter and said: “My dear, please look my head over.” She did so, and he thanked her for her much-needed services, adding, “And now tell me, my dear, whether my son is a reasonable man in weal and woe, and whether you manage to get on well with him.” “My husband has only one fault. He will find fault with his food.”

“He has always had his faults, my dear; but I will tell you how to stop his tongue. I will tell you a text which you must learn carefully and repeat to your husband when he finds fault again with his food.” And he taught her the lines and shortly afterwards set out for Benares. Kaṭāhaka accompanied him part of the way, and took his leave after offering most valuable presents to the Treasurer. Dating from the departure of the Bodhisatta, Kaṭāhaka waxed prouder and prouder.

One day his wife ordered a nice dinner, and began to help him to it with a spoon, but at the first mouthful Kaṭāhaka began to grumble. Thereon the merchant’s daughter remembering her lesson, repeated the following verse:
1. “If he ’mid strangers far from home talks big,
   Back comes his visitor to spoil it all.
   Come, eat your dinner then, Kaṭāhaka.”

“Dear me,” thought Kaṭāhaka, “the Treasurer must have informed her of my name, and have told her the whole story.” And from that day forth he gave himself no more airs, but humbly ate what was set before him, and at his death passed away to fare according to his deeds. {1.455}

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This bumptious monk was the Kaṭāhaka of those days, and I the Treasurer of Benares.”

Ja 126 Asilakkhaṇajātaka

The Story about the Sword Fortune-Teller (1s)

In the present, in order to take a bribe, a brahmin Pretends he can tell whether swords are lucky or not by sniffing at them. One smith puts pepper on his sword which causes the brahmin to sneeze and cut off his nose. The Buddha tells a story in which a young man sneezed and scared off his enemies and won his bride at the same time, showing that sneezing though unlucky for one, was lucky for another.

The Bodhisatta = the nephew king (bhāgineyyarājā), the one who could read fortune in swords = the same in the past (asilakkhaṇapāṭhaka),

Keywords: Fortune, Relativity, Devas.

“Our diverse fates.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a brahmin retained by the king of Kosala because of his power of telling whether swords were lucky or not. We are told that when the king’s smiths had forged a sword, this brahmin could by merely smelling it tell whether it was [1.278] a lucky one or not. And he made it a rule only to commend the work of those smiths who gave him presents, while he rejected the work of those who did not bribe him.

---

359 The commentator explains that the wife had no understanding of the meaning of the verse, but only repeated the words as she was taught them. That is to say, the gāthā was not in the vernacular, but in a learned tongue intelligible to the educated Kaṭāhaka, but not to the woman, who repeated it parrot-fashion.
Now a certain smith made a sword and put into the sheath with it some finely-ground pepper, and brought it in this state to the king, who at once handed it over to the brahmin to test. The brahmin unsheathed the blade and sniffed at it. The pepper got up his nose and made him sneeze, and that so violently that he slit his nose on the edge of the sword.

This mishap of the brahmin came to the monk’s ears, and one day they were talking about it in the Dhamma Hall when the Teacher entered. On learning the subject of their talk, he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that this brahmin has slit his nose sniffing swords. The same fate befell him in former days.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, he had in his service a brahmin who professed to tell whether swords were lucky or not, and all came to pass as in the Story of the Present. And the king called in the surgeons and had him fitted with a false tip to his nose which was cunningly painted for all the world like a real nose; and then the brahmin resumed his duties again about the king. Now Brahmadatta had no son, only a daughter and a nephew, whom he had brought up under his own eye. And when these two grew up, they fell in love with one another. So the king sent for his councillors and said to them, “My nephew is heir to the throne. If I give him my daughter to wife, he shall be anointed king.”

But, on second thoughts, he decided that as in any case his nephew was like a son, he had better marry him to a foreign princess, and give his daughter to a prince of another royal house. For, he thought, this plan would give him more grandchildren and vest in his line the sceptres of two kingdoms. And, after consulting with his councillors, he resolved to separate the two, and they were accordingly made to dwell apart from one another. Now they were sixteen years old and very much in love, and the young prince thought of nothing but how to carry off the princess from her father’s palace. At last the plan struck him of sending for a wise woman, to whom he gave a pocketful of money.

“And what’s this for?” said she. Then he told her of his passion, and besought the wise woman to convey him to his dear princess. And she promised him success, and said that she would tell the king that his daughter was under the influence of witchcraft, but that, as the Yakkha had possessed her so long that he was off his guard, she would take [1.279] the princess one day in a carriage to the cemetery with a strong escort under arms, and there in a magic circle lay the princess on a bed with a dead man under it, and with a hundred and eight douches of scented water wash the Yakkha out of her. “And when on this pretext I bring the princess to the cemetery,” continued the wise woman, “mind that you just reach the cemetery before us in your carriage with an armed escort, taking some ground pepper with you. Arrived at the cemetery, you will leave your carriage at the entrance, and dispatch your men to the cemetery grove, while you will yourself go to the top of the mound and lie down as though dead. Then I will come and set up a bed over you on which I will lay the princess. Then will come the time when you must sniff at the pepper till you sneeze two or three times, and when you sneeze we will leave the princess and take to our heels. Thereon you and the princess must bathe all over, and you must take her home.” “Capital,” said the prince, “a most excellent device.”

So away went the wise woman to the king, and he fell in with her idea, as did the princess when it was explained to her. When the day came, the old woman told the princess their errand, and said to the guards on the road in order to frighten them, “Listen. Under the bed that I shall set up, there will be a dead man; and that dead man will sneeze. And mark well that, so soon as he has sneezed, he will come out from under the bed and seize on the first person he finds. So be prepared, all of you.”

Now the prince had already got to the place and got under the bed as had been arranged. Next the crone led off the princess and laid her upon the bed, whispering to her not to be afraid. At once the prince sniffed at the pepper and fell sneezing. And scarce had he begun to sneeze before the wise woman left the princess and with a loud scream was off, quicker than any of them. Not a man stood his ground; one and all they threw away their arms and bolted for dear life. Hereon the prince came forth and bore off the princess to his home, as had been before arranged. And the old woman made her way to the king and told him what had happened.

“Well,” thought the king, “I always intended her for him, and they’ve grown up together like ghee in rice-porridge.” So he didn’t fly into a passion, but in course of time made his nephew king of the land, with his daughter as queen-consort.

Now the new king kept on in his service the brahmin who professed to tell the temper of swords, and one day as he stood in the sun, the false tip to the brahmin’s nose got loose and fell off. And there he stood, hanging his head for very shame. “Never mind, never mind,” laughed the king. “Sneezing is good for some, but bad for others. One sneeze [1.280] lost you your nose; {1.458} while I have to thank a sneeze for both my throne and queen.” So saying he uttered this verse:

1. “Our diverse fates this moral show,
What brings me weal, may work you woe.”

So spake the king, and after a life spent in generosity and other good works, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

In this wise did the Teacher teach the lesson that the world was wrong in thinking things were definitely and absolutely good or bad in all cases alike. Lastly, he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The same man that now professes to understand whether swords are lucky or not, professed the same skill in those days; and I was myself the prince who inherited his uncle’s kingdom.”

Ja 127 Kalaṇḍukajātaka

The Story about (the Slave) Kalaṇḍuka (1s)

In the present a monk lies about his family, fortune and fame, until he is discovered. The Buddha tells a story of a past life, in which the same person had cheated his master’s friends and married into their family, putting on airs and graces, until his master discovered it and dragged him back to servitude.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi),
the monk = (the slave) Kalaṇḍuka.

Present Source: Ja 80 Bhīmasena,
Quoted at: Ja 125 Kaṭāhaka, Ja 127 Kalaṇḍuka.

Keywords: Boasting, Vanity.

“You vaunt.” This story was told by the Teacher once at Jetavana, about a boastful monk. The introductory story and the story of the past in this case are like those of Kaṭāhaka related above [Ja 80].

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain braggart among the monks. Tradition says that he used to gather round him monks of all ages, and go about deluding everyone with lying boasts about his noble descent.
“Ah, monks,” he would say, “there’s no family so noble as mine, no lineage so peerless. I am a scion of the highest of princely lines; no man is my equal in birth or ancestral estate; there is absolutely no end to the gold and silver and other treasures we possess. Our very slaves and menials are fed on rice and meat-stews, and are clad in the best Benares cloth, with the choicest Benares perfumes to perfume themselves withal; while I, because I have joined the Sangha, have to content myself with this vile fare and this vile garb.” But another monk, after enquiring into his family estate, exposed to the monks the emptiness of this pretension.

So the monks met in the Dhamma Hall, and talk began as to how that monk, in spite of his vows to leave worldly things and cleave only to the dispensation which leads to safety, was going about deluding the monks with his lying boasts. While the fellow’s sinfulness was being discussed, the Teacher entered and enquired what their topic was. And they told him. “This is not the first time, monks,” said the Teacher, “that he has gone about boasting; in bygone days too he went about boasting and deluding people.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a rich Treasurer, and his wife bore him a son. And the self-same day a female slave in his house gave birth to a boy, and the two children grew up together. And when the rich man’s son was being taught to write, the young slave used to go with his young master’s tablets and so learned at the same time to write himself. Next he learned two or three handicrafts, and grew up to be a fair-spoken and handsome young man; and his name was Kalaṇḍuka. Being employed as private secretary, he thought to himself, “I shall not always be kept at this work. The slightest fault and I shall be beaten, imprisoned, branded, and fed on slave’s fare. On the border there lives a merchant, a friend of my master’s. Why should I not go to him with a letter purporting to come from my master, and, passing myself off as my master’s son, marry the merchant’s daughter and live happily ever afterwards?

So he wrote a letter, saying: “The bearer of this is my son. It is meet that our houses should be united in marriage, and I would have you give your daughter to this my son and keep the young couple near you for the present. As soon as I can conveniently do so, I will come to you.” This letter he sealed with his master’s private seal, and came to the border-merchant with a well-filled purse, handsome dresses, and perfumes and the like. And with a bow he stood before the merchant.
“Where do you come from?” said the merchant. “From Benares.” “Who is your father?” “The Treasurer of Benares.” “And what brings you here?” “This letter will tell you,” said Kalanḍuka, handing it to him. The merchant read the letter and exclaimed, “This gives me new life.” And in his joy he gave his daughter to Kalanḍuka and set up the young couple, who lived in great style. But Kalanḍuka gave himself airs, and used to find fault with the victuals and the clothes that were brought him, calling them “provincial.” “These misguided provincials,” he would say, “have no idea of dressing. And as for taste in scents and garlands, they’ve got none.”

Kalanḍuka was in this case the name of the slave of the Treasurer of Benares. And when he had run away and was living in luxury with the daughter of the border-merchant, the Treasurer missed him and could not discover his whereabouts. So he sent a young pet parrot to search for the runaway. And off flew the parrot in quest of Kalanḍuka, and searched for him far and wide, till at last the bird came to the town where he dwelt. And just at that very time Kalanḍuka was enjoying himself on the river with his wife in a boat well-stocked with dainty fare and with flowers and perfumes. Now the nobles of that land at their water-parties make a point of taking milk with a pungent drug to drink, and so escape suffering from cold after their pastime on the water. (1.459) But when our Kalanḍuka tasted this milk, he hawked and spat it out; and in so doing spat on the head of the merchant’s daughter. At this moment up flew the parrot, and saw all this from the bough of a fig tree on the bank. “Come, come, [1.281] slave Kalanḍuka,” cried the bird, “remember who and what you are, and don’t spit on the head of this young gentlewoman. Know your place, fellow.” So saying, he uttered the following verse:

1. “You vaunt your high descent, your high degree,
   With lying tongue. Though but a bird, I know
   The truth. You’ll soon be caught, you runaway.
   Scorn not the milk then, slave Kalanḍuka.”

Recognizing the parrot, Kalanḍuka grew afraid of being exposed, and exclaimed, “Ah! Good master, when did you arrive?”

Thought the parrot, “It is not friendliness, but a wish to wring my neck, that prompts this kindly interest.” So he replied that he did not stand in need of Kalanḍuka’s services, and flew off to Benares, where he told the Lord Treasurer every thing he had seen.

“The rascal!” cried the Treasurer, and ordered Kalanḍuka to be hauled back to Benares where he had once more to put up with a slave’s fare.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was Kalanḍuka in the story, and I the Treasurer of Benares.”

Ja 128 Biḷārajātaka

The Story about the Cat (Vow) (1s)

Alternative Title: Biḷāravatajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk shows himself a deceitful person. The Buddha tells the story of a jackal who pretended to be a saint, and, when caught, was killed and eaten by rats.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the rats (mūsikarājā),
the deceitful monk = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Deceit, Vengeance, Animals.

“Where saintliness.” [1.460] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a deceitful person. When the monk’s deceit was reported to him, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time he has shown himself a deceitful person; he was just the same in times gone by.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a rat, perfect in wisdom, and as big as a young boar. He had his dwelling in the forest and many hundreds of other rats owned his sway. [1.282]

Now there was a roving jackal who espied this troop of rats and fell to scheming how to beguile and eat them. And he took up his stand near their home with his face to the sun, snuffing up the wind, and standing on one leg. Seeing this when out on his road in quest of food, the Bodhisatta conceived the jackal to be a saintly being, and went up and asked his name.

“Dhammika [Righteous] is my name,” said the jackal. “Why do you stand only on one leg?” “Because if I stood on all four at once, the earth could not bear my weight. That is why I stand on one leg only.” “And why do you keep your mouth open?” “To eat the air. I live on air; it is my only food.” “And why do you face the sun?” “To worship him.” “What uprightness!” thought the Bodhisatta, and thenceforward he made a point of going, attended by the other rats, to pay his respects morning and evening to the saintly jackal. And when the rats were leaving, the jackal seized and devoured the hindermost one of them, wiped his lips, and looked as though nothing had happened. In consequence of this the rats grew fewer and fewer, till they noticed the gaps in their ranks, and wondering why this was so, asked the Bodhisatta the reason. He could not make it out, but suspecting the jackal, {1.461} resolved to put him to the test. So next day he let the other rats go out first and himself brought up the rear. The jackal made a spring on the Bodhisatta who, seeing him coming, faced round and cried, “So this is your saintliness, you deceitful person and rascal!” And he repeated the following verse:

1. “Where saintliness is but a cloak
Whereby to deceive guileless folk
And screen a villain’s treachery,
The cat-like nature there we see.”

So saying, the king of the rats sprang at the jackal’s throat and bit his windpipe asunder just under the jaw, so that he died. Back trooped the other rats and gobbled up the body of the jackal with a ‘crunch, crunch, crunch;’ that is to say, the foremost of them did, for they say there was none left for the last-comers. And ever after the rats lived happily in peace and quiet.

His lesson ended, the Teacher made the connection by saying: “This hypocritical monk was the jackal of those days, and I the king of the rats.”

Ja 129 Aggikajātaka
The Story about (the Brahmin) Aggika (1s)

Alternative Title: Aggikabhāradvājajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk shows himself a deceitful person. The Buddha tells the story of a jackal who tricked the rat population and ate them up one by one till he was discovered.

---

360 Though the foregoing prose relates to a jackal, the verse speaks of a cat, as does the Mahābhārata in its version of this story.
The Bodhisatta = the king of the rats (mūsikarājā),
the deceitful monk = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Deceit, Greed, Animals.

‘Twas greed.” [1.283] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about another deceitful person.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was king of the rats and dwelt in the forest. Now a fire broke out in the forest, and a jackal who could not run away put his head against a tree \[1.462\] and let the flames sweep by him. The fire singed the hair off his body everywhere, and left him perfectly bald, except for a tuft like a scalp-knot\[361\] where the crown of his head was pressed against the tree. Drinking one day in a rocky pool, he caught sight of this top-knot reflected in the water. “At last I’ve got wherewithal to go to market,” thought he. Coming in the course of his wanderings in the forest to the rats’ cave, he said to himself, “I’ll hoodwink those rats and devour them,” and with this intent he took up his stand nearby, just as in the foregoing story.

On his way out in quest of food, the Bodhisatta observed the jackal and, crediting the beast with virtue and goodness, came to him and asked what his name was.

“Bhāradvāja, Votary of the Fire-God.” “Why have you come here?” “In order to guard you and yours.” “What will you do to guard us?” “I know how to count on my fingers, and will count your numbers both morning and evening, so as to be sure that as many came home at night, as went out in the morning. That’s how I’ll guard you.” “Then stay, uncle, and watch over us.”

And accordingly, as the rats were starting in the morning he set about counting them, “One, two, three,” and so again when they came back at night. And every time he counted them, he seized and ate the hindmost. Everything came to pass as in the foregoing story, except that here the king of the rats turned and said to the jackal, “It is not sanctity, \[1.284\] Bhāradvāja, Votary of the Fire-God, but gluttony that has decked your crown with that top-knot.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

\[361\] [The scalp-knot was a sign of a brahmin.]
1. “'Twas greed, not virtue, furnished you this crest.
Our dwindling numbers fail to work out right;
We've had enough, fire-votary, of you.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This monk was the jackal of those days, and I the king of the rats.”

Ja 130 Kosiyajātaka

The Story about (the Adulteress) Kosiyā (1s)

In the present a virtuous brahmin is being cheated on by his wife who makes him work for her every whim. The Buddha tells a similar story of the past, and how he advised a brahmin so as to cure his wife with an unpleasant alternative.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

Keywords: Lust, Cheating, Women.

“You may ail or eat.” {1.463} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a woman of Sāvatthi. She is said to have been the wicked wife of a good and virtuous brahmin, who was a lay brother. Her nights she spent in gadding about; while by day she did not a stroke of work, but made out to be ill and lay in bed groaning.

“What is the matter with you, my dear?” said her husband. “Wind troubles me.”
“What can I get for you?” “Sweets, savouries, rich food, rice-gruel, boiled-rice, oil, and so forth.”

The obedient husband did as she wished, and toiled like a slave for her. She meantime kept her bed while her husband was about the house; but no sooner saw the door shut on him, than she was in the arms of her lovers.

“My poor wife doesn’t seem to get any better of the wind,” thought the brahmin at last, and betook himself with offerings of perfumes, flowers, and the like, to the Teacher at Jetavana. His obeisance done, he stood before the Fortunate One, who asked him why he had been absent so long.

“Sir,” said the brahmin, “I'm told my wife is troubled with the wind, and I toil away to keep her supplied with every conceivable dainty. And now she is stout and her complexion quite clear, but the wind is as troublesome as ever. It is through ministering to my wife that I have not had any time to come here, sir.”

Said the Teacher, who knew the wife’s wickedness, “Ah! Brahmin, the wise and good of days gone by taught you how to treat a woman suffering like your wife from so stubborn an ailment. But rebirth has confused your memory so that you forget.” So saying, he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in a very distinguished family. After perfecting [1.285] his education at Taxila, he became a teacher of world-wide fame in Benares. To him flocked as pupils the young nobles and brahmans from all the princely and wealthy families. Now a country brahmin, who had learned from the Bodhisatta the three Vedas, and the eighteen Sciences, and who stopped on in Benares to look after his estate, came two or three times every day to listen to the Bodhisatta’s teachings. [1.464] And this brahmin had a wife who was a bad, wicked woman. And everything came to pass as above.

When the brahmin explained how it was that he could not get away to listen to his master’s teachings, the Bodhisatta, who knew that the brahmin’s wife was only feigning sickness, thought to himself, “I will tell him what treatment will cure the creature.” So he said to the brahmin, “Get her no more dainties, my son, but collect the urinations of cows and therein souse five kinds of fruit and so forth, and let the lot pickle in a new copper pot till the whole savours of the metal. Then take a rope or cord or stick and go to your wife, and tell her plainly she must either swallow the cure you have brought her, or else work for her food. (And here you will repeat certain lines which I will tell you.) If she refuses the remedy, then threaten to let her have a taste of the rope or stick, and to drag her about for a time by the hair, while you pummel her with your fists. You will find that at the mere threat she will be up and about her work.”

So off went the brahmin and brought his wife a mess prepared as the Bodhisatta had directed. “Who prescribed this?” said she. “The master,” said her husband. “Take it away, I won’t have it.”

“So you won’t have it, eh?” said the young brahmin, taking up the rope-end, “well then, you’ve either got to swallow down that cure or else to work for honest fare.” So saying he uttered this verse:
1. “You may ail or eat; which shall it be?
   For you can't do both, my Kosiyā.” {1.465}

Terrified by this, the woman Kosiyā realised from the moment the master inferred how impossible it was to deceive him, and, getting up, went about her work. And the consciousness that the master knew her wickedness made her repent, and become as good as she had formerly been wicked.

(So ended the story, and the brahmin’s wife, feeling that the All-enlightened Buddha knew what she was, stood in such awe of him that she did wrong no more.)

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The husband and wife of today were the husband and wife of the story, and I was the master.”

Ja 131 Asampadānajātaka

The Story about the Miser (1s)

In the present the monks are talking about Devadatta’s lack of gratitude. The Buddha tells how, in a past life, he had been Devadatta’s beneficiary, but when asked to reciprocate the latter had scorned him. When the king heard, he rectified the situation.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man Saṅkha (Saṅkhaseṭṭhi), Devadatta = the wealthy man Piliya (Piliyaseṭṭhi).

Keywords: Ingratitude, Miserliness.

“If a friend.” [1.286] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. For at that time the monks were discussing in the Dhamma Hall the ingratitude of Devadatta and his inability to recognise the Teacher’s goodness, when the Teacher himself entered and on enquiry was told the subject of their talk. “Monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that Devadatta has been ungrateful to the Tathāgata; he was just as ungrateful in bygone days.” So saying, he told this story of the past. {1.466}

In the past, when a certain king of Magadha was reigning in Rājagaha, the Bodhisatta was his Treasurer, worth eighty crores, and known as the wealthy man Saṅkha (Saṅkhaseṭṭhi). In Benares there dwelt a Treasurer also worth eighty crores, who was named Piliya, and was a great friend of Saṅkha. For some reason or other Piliya of Benares got into difficulties, and lost all his property, and was reduced to beggary. In his need he left Benares, and with his wife journeyed on foot to Rājagaha, to see Saṅkha, the last hope left him. And Saṅkha embraced his friend and treated him as an honoured guest, asking, in due course, the reason of the visit. “I am a ruined man,” answered Piliya, “I have lost everything, and have come to ask you to help me.”

“With all my heart! Have no fear on that score,” said Saṅkha. He had his strong-room opened, and gave to Piliya forty crores. Also he divided into two equal parts the whole of his property, livestock and all, and bestowed on Piliya half of his entire fortune. Taking his wealth, Piliya went back to Benares, and there dwelt.

Not long after a like calamity overtook Saṅkha, who, in his turn, lost every penny he had. Casting about whither to turn in the hour of need, he bethought him how he had befriended Piliya to half of his possessions, and might go to him for assistance without fear of being thrown out. So he set out from Rājagaha with his wife, and came to Benares. At the entrance to the city he said to her, “Wife, it is not befitting for you to trudge along the streets with me. Wait here a little till I send a carriage with a servant to bring you into the city in proper state.” So saying, he left her under shelter, and went on alone into the town, till he came to Piliya’s house, where he bade himself be announced as Saṅkha from Rājagaha, come to see his friend.

“Well, show him in,” said Piliya; but at sight of the other’s condition he neither rose to meet him, nor greeted him with words of welcome, but only demanded what brought him here. [1.287] “To see you,” was the reply. [1.467] “Where are you stopping?” “Nowhere, as yet. I left my wife under shelter and came straight to you.”

“There’s no room here for you. Take a dole of rice, find somewhere to cook and eat it, and then begone and never come to visit me again.” So saying, the rich man dispatched a servant with orders to give his unfortunate friend half a measure of bran to carry away tied up in the corner of his cloth; and this, though that very day he had had a thousand wagon-loads of the best rice threshed out and stored up in his overflowing granaries. Yes, the rascal, who had coolly taken four hundred millions, now doled out half a measure of bran to his benefactor!

Accordingly, the servant measured out the bran in a basket, and brought it to the Bodhisatta, who argued within himself whether or no he should take it. And he thought: “This ingrate breaks off our friendship because I am a ruined man. Now, if I refuse his paltry gift, I shall be as bad as he. For the ignoble, who scorn a modest gift, outrage the first idea of friendship. Be it, therefore, mine to fulfil friendship so far as in me lies, by taking his gift of bran.” So he tied up the bran in the corner of his cloth, and made his way back to where he had housed his wife.

“What have you got, dear?” said she. “Our friend Piliya gives us this bran, and washes his hands of us.” “Oh, why did you take it? Is this a fit return for the forty crores?”

“Don’t cry, dear wife,” said the Bodhisatta. “I took it simply because I wanted not to violate the principle of friendship. Why these tears?” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “If a friend plays the miser’s part,
   A simpleton’s cut to the heart; {1.468}
   His dole of bran I will take,
   And not for this our friendship break.”

But still the wife kept on crying.

Now, at that moment a farm-servant whom Saṅkha had given to Piliya was passing by and drew near on hearing the weeping of his former mistress. Recognising his master and mistress, he fell at their feet, and with tears and sobs asked the reason of their coming. And the Bodhisatta told him their story.

“Keep up your spirits,” said the man, cheerily; and, taking them to his own dwelling, there made ready perfumed baths, and a meal for them. Then he let the other slaves know that their old master and mistress had come, and after a few days marched them in a body to the king’s palace, where they made quite a commotion.

The king asked what the matter was, and they told him the whole [1.288] story. So he sent forthwith for the two, and asked Saṅkha whether the report was true that he had given four hundred millions to Piliya.

“Sir,” said he, “when in his need my friend confided in me, and came to seek my aid, I gave him the half, not only of my money, but of my livestock and of everything that I possessed.”
“Is this so?” said the king to Piliya. “Yes, sire,” said he. “And when, in his turn, your benefactor confided in you and sought you out, did you show him honour and hospitality?” Here Piliya was silent. “Did you have a half-quartern of bran doled out into the corner of his cloth?” Still Piliya was silent.

Then the king took counsel with his ministers as to what should be done, and finally, as a judgment on Piliya, ordered them to go to Piliya’s house and give the whole of Piliya’s wealth to Saṅkha.

“Nay, sire,” said the Bodhisatta, “I need not what is another’s. Let me be given nothing beyond what I formerly gave him.”

Then the king ordered that the Bodhisatta should enjoy his own again; and the Bodhisatta, with a large retinue of servants, came back with his regained wealth to Rājagaha, where he put his affairs in order, and after a life spent in generosity and other good works, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the Treasurer Piliya of those days, and I myself Saṅkha.”

Ja 132 Pañcagarujātaka

The Story about the Five Teachers (1s)

Alternative Title: Bhīrukajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks discuss how the Buddha had resisted the daughters of Māra. The Buddha tells how he resisted a host of Yakkhinis in the past and thereby gained a kingdom.

The Bodhisatta = the prince who went to Taṅkaliṣa and gained a kingdom (Takkasilaṁ gantvā rajjappattakumāro).

Present Source: Ja 96 Telapatta,
Quoted at: Ja 132 Pañcagaru.

Keywords: Temptation, Renunciation, Devas.
“Wise counsels heeding.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the Sutta concerning the Temptation by the Daughters of Māra at the Goatherds’ Banyan tree. The Teacher quoted the Sutta, beginning with its opening words:

“In all their dazzling beauty on they came,
Craving and Hate and Lust. Like cotton-down
Before the wind, the Teacher made them fly.” [1.289]

After he had recited the Sutta right through to the end, the monks met together in the Dhamma Hall and spoke of how the Daughters of Māra drew near in all their myriad charms yet failed to seduce the Fully Awakened One. For he did not as much as open his eyes to look upon them, so marvellous was he! Entering the hall, the Teacher asked, and was told, what they were discussing. “Monks,” said he, “it is no marvel that I did not so much as look upon the Daughters of Māra in this life when I have put wrong from me and have won Awakening. In former days when I was but in quest of Awakening, when wronging still dwelt within me, I found strength not to gaze even upon loveliness divine by way of lust in violation of virtue; and by that continence I won a kingdom.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was the youngest of a hundred brothers, and his adventures are to be detailed here, as above {1.470} in the Takkasilajātaka [Ja 96].

Now in those days there were Paccekabuddhas who used to come to take their meals at the palace, and the Bodhisatta ministered to them.

Thinking one day of the great number of brothers he had, the Bodhisatta asked himself whether there was any likelihood of his coming to the his father’s throne in that city, and determined to ask the Paccekabuddhas to tell him what should come to pass. Next day the Buddhas came, took the waterpot that was consecrated to holy uses, filtered the water, washed and dried their feet, and sat down to their meals at the palace, and the Bodhisatta ministered to them.

---

362 [The Palobhanasutta = SN 4.25, otherwise known as Māradhītusutta.]
363 Apparently the reference is to No. 96 [i.e. Telapattajātaka]. For a like confusion of title see note 1, p. 112.
meal. And as they sat, the Bodhisatta came and seating himself by them with a courteous salutation, put his question. And they answered and said: “Prince, you will never come to be king in this city. But in Gandhāra, two thousand leagues away, there stands the city of Taxila. If you can reach that city, in seven days you will become king there. But there is peril on the road there, in journeying through a great forest. It is double the distance round the forest than it is to pass through it. Amanussas have their dwelling therein, and Yakkhinis make villages and houses arise by the wayside. Beneath a goodly canopy embroidered with stars overhead, their magic sets a costly couch shut in by fair curtains of wondrous dye. Arranged in celestial splendour the Yakkhinis sit within their abodes, seducing wayfarers with honied words. ‘Weary you seem,’ they say; ‘come here, and eat and drink before you journey further on your way.’ Those that come at their bidding are given seats and fired to lust by the charm of their wanton beauty. But scarce have they sinned, before the Yakkhinis slay them and eat them while the warm blood is still flowing. And they ensnare men’s senses; captivating the sense of beauty with utter loveliness, the ear with sweet minstrelsy, the nostrils with heavenly odours, the taste with heavenly dainties of exquisite savour, and the touch with red-cushioned couches divinely soft. But if you can subdue your senses, and be strong in your resolve not to look upon them, then on the seventh day you will become king of the city of Taxila.”

“Oh, sirs; how could I look upon the Yakkhinis after your advice to me?” So saying, the Bodhisatta besought the Paccekabuddhas to give him something to keep him safe on his journey. Receiving from them a charmed thread and some charmed sand, he first bade farewell to the Paccekabuddhas and to his father and mother; and then, going to his own abode, he addressed his household as follows, “I am going to Taxila to make myself king there. You will stop behind here.” But five of them answered, “Let us go too.”

“You may not come with me,” answered the Bodhisatta, “for I am told that the way is beset by Yakkhinis who captivate men’s senses, and destroy those who succumb to their charms. Great is the danger, but I will rely on myself and go.”

“If we go with you, prince, we should not gaze upon their baleful charms. We too will go to Taxila.” “Then show yourselves steadfast,” said the Bodhisatta, and took those five with him on his journey.
The Yakkhinis sat waiting by the way in their villages. And one of the five, the lover of beauty, looked upon the Yakkhinis, and being ensnared by their beauty, lagged behind the rest. “Why are you dropping behind?” asked the Bodhisatta. “My feet hurt me, prince. I’ll just sit down for a bit in one of these pavilions, and then catch you up.” “My good man, these are Yakkhinis; don’t hanker after them.” “Be that as it may, prince, I can’t go any further.” “Well, you will soon be shown in your real colours,” said the Bodhisatta, as he went on with the other four.

Yielding to his senses, the lover of beauty drew near to the Yakkhinis, who tempted him to wrong, and killed him then and there. Thereon they departed, and further along the road raised by magic arts a new pavilion, in which they sat singing to the music of divers instruments. And now the lover of music dropped behind and was eaten. Then the Yakkhinis went on further and sat waiting in a bazaar stocked with all sweet scents and perfumes. And here the lover of sweet-smelling things fell behind. And when they had eaten him, they went on further and sat in a provision-booth where a profusion of heavenly viands of exquisite savour was offered for sale. And here the gourmet fell behind. And when they had eaten him, they went on further, and sat on heavenly couches wrought by their magic arts. And here the lover of comfort fell behind. And him too they ate.

Only the Bodhisatta was left now. And one of the Yakkhinis followed him, promising herself that for all his stern resolution she would succeed in devouring him before she turned back. Further on in the forest, woodmen and others, seeing the Yakkhini, asked her who the man was that walked on ahead.

“He is my husband, good gentlemen.”

“Hi, there!” said they to the Bodhisatta, “when you have got a sweet young wife, fair as the flowers, to leave her home and put her trust in you, why don’t you walk with her instead of letting her trudge wearily behind you?” “She is no wife of mine, but a Yakkhini. She has eaten my five companions.” “Alas, good gentlemen,” said she, “anger will drive men to say their very wives are Yakkhinis and Petas.”

Next, she simulated pregnancy and then the look of a woman who has borne one child; and child on hip, she followed after the Bodhisatta. Everyone they met asked just the same questions about the pair, and the Bodhisatta gave just the same answer as he journeyed on.

At last he came to Taxila, where the Yakkhini made the child disappear, and followed alone. At the gates of the city the Bodhisatta entered a rest house and sat down. Because of the Bodhisatta’s efficacy and power, she could not enter too; so she arrayed herself in divine beauty and stood on the threshold.

The king of Taxila was at that moment passing by on his way to his pleasure gardens, and was snared by her loveliness. “Go, find out,” said he to an attendant, “whether she has a husband with her or not.” And when the messenger came and asked whether she had a husband with her, she said: “Yes, sir; my husband is sitting within in the chamber.”

“She is no wife of mine,” said the Bodhisatta. “She is a Yakkhini and has eaten my five companions.”

And, as before, she said: “Alas, good gentlemen, anger will drive men to say anything that comes into their heads.”

Then the man went back to the king and told him what each had said. “Treasure-trove is a royal perquisite,” said the king. And he sent for the Yakkhini and had her seated on the back of his elephant. After a solemn procession round the city, the king came back to his palace and had the Yakkhini lodged in the apartments reserved for a queen-consort. After bathing and perfuming himself, the king ate his evening meal and then lay down on his royal bed. The Yakkhini too prepared herself a meal, and donned all her splendour. And as she lay by the side of the delighted king, she turned on to her side and burst into tears. Being asked why she wept, she said: “Sire, you found me by the wayside, and the women of the harem are many. Dwelling here among enemies I shall feel crushed when they say ‘Who knows who your father and mother are, or anything about your family? You were picked up by the wayside.’ But if your majesty would give me power and authority over the whole kingdom, nobody would dare to annoy me with such taunts.”

“Sweetheart, I have no power over those that dwell throughout my kingdom; I am not their lord and master. I have only jurisdiction over those who revolt or do iniquity. So I cannot give you power and authority over the whole kingdom.”
“Then, sire, if you cannot give me authority over the kingdom or over the city, at least give me authority within the palace, that I may have rule here over those that dwell in the palace.”

Too deeply smitten with her charms to refuse, the king gave her authority over all within the palace and bade her have rule over them. Contented, she waited till the king was asleep, and then making her way to the city of the Yakkhas returned with the whole crew of Yakkhas to the palace. And she herself slew the king and devoured him, skin, tendons and flesh, leaving only the bare bones. And the rest of the Yakkhas entering the gate devoured everything as it came in their way, not leaving even a fowl or a dog alive. Next day when people came and found the gate shut, they beat on it with impatient cries, and effected an entrance – only to find the whole palace strewn with bones. And they exclaimed, “So the man was right in saying she was not his wife but a Yakkhini. In his unwisdom the king brought her home to be his wife, and doubtless she has assembled the other Yakkhas, devoured everybody, and then made off.”

Now on that day the Bodhisatta, with the charmed sand on his head and the charmed thread twisted round his brow, was standing in the rest house, sword in hand, waiting for the dawn. Those others, meantime, cleansed the palace, garnished the floors afresh, sprinkled perfumes on them, scattered flowers, hanging nosegays from the roof and festooning the walls with garlands, and burning incense in the place. Then they took counsel together, as follows:

“The man that could so master his senses as not so much as to look at the Yakkhini as she followed him in her divine beauty, is a noble and steadfast man, filled with wisdom. With such a one as king, it would be well with the whole kingdom. Let us make him our king.”

And all the courtiers and all the citizens of the kingdom were one-minded in the matter. So the Bodhisatta, being chosen king, was escorted into the capital and there decked in jewels and anointed king of Taxila.

When the kingdom had been offered to the Bodhisatta by the people, and when he had accepted it and been anointed king, the people decorated the town like a city of the gods and the royal palace like the palace of Sakka. Entering the city the Bodhisatta passed into the spacious hall of the palace and there seated himself in all his godlike beauty on his jewelled throne beneath the white umbrella of his kingship. Round him in glittering splendour stood his ministers and brahmins and nobles, while sixteen thousand dancing girls, fair as the Devaccharā, sang and danced and made music, till the palace was loud with sounds like the ocean when the storm bursts in thunder on its waters. Gazing round on the pomp of his royal state, the Bodhisatta thought how, had he looked upon the charms of the Yakkhinis, he would have perished miserably, nor ever have lived to see his present magnificence, which he owed to his following the counsels of the Paccekabuddhas. And as these thoughts filled his heart, his uttered this exalted utterance:
The Section with One Verse – 576

1. “Wise counsels heeding, firm in my resolve,
   With dauntless heart still holding on my course,
   I shunned the Rakkhasīs’ dwellings and snares,
   And found a great safe haven in my need.” {1.471}

So ended the lesson which these verses taught. And the Great Being ruled his kingdom in righteousness, and abounded in generosity and other good works till in the end he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the prince of those days who went to Taxila and won a kingdom.”

Ja 133 Ghatāsanajātaka

The Story about the Fire (1s)

In the present one monk goes for meditation, but when his hut burns down he is unable to make progress. He stays on in the village anyway. When he comes to the Buddha after the Rains Retreat, the latter tells him a story of how in a past life he had acted quickly to save his subjects when a Nāga had attacked them with fire.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the birds (sakuṇarājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the obedient birds (vacanakarā sakuṇā).

Keywords: Promptitude, Discernment, Devas, Animals, Birds.

---

364 Or is the meaning ‘like the vault of heaven filled with thunder-clouds’? cf. arṇava in the Rigveda.
“Lo! In your stronghold.” [1.290] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain monk who was given by the Teacher a subject for meditation, and, going to the borders, took up his abode in the forest near a hamlet. Here he hoped to pass the rainy season, but during the very first month his hut was burnt down while he was in the village seeking alms. Feeling the loss of its sheltering roof, he told his lay friends of his misfortune, and they readily undertook to build him another hut. But, in spite of their protestations, three months slipped away without its being rebuilt. Having no roof to shelter him, the monk had no success in his meditation. Not even the mental image had been vouchsafed to him when at the close of the rainy season he went back to Jetavana and stood respectfully before the Teacher. In the course of talk the Teacher asked whether the monk’s meditation had been successful. Then that monk related from the beginning the good and ill that had befallen him. Said the Teacher, “In days gone by, even brute beasts could discern between what was good and what bad for them and so quit betimes, ere they proved dangerous, the habitations that had sheltered them in happier days. And if beasts were so discerning, how could you fall so far short of them in wisdom?” So saying, at that monk’s request, the Teacher told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a bird. When he came to years of discretion, good fortune attended him and he became king of the birds, taking up his abode with his subjects in a giant tree which stretched its leafy branches over the waters of a lake. And all these birds, roosting in the boughs, dropped their dung into the waters below. Now that lake was the abode of Cāṇḍa, the Nāga king, who was enraged by this fouling of his water and resolved to take vengeance on the birds and burn them out. So one night when they were all roosting along the branches, he set to work, and first he made the waters of the lake to boil, then he caused smoke to arise, and thirdly he made flames dart up as high as a palm tree.

Seeing the flames shooting up from the water, the Bodhisatta cried to the birds, “Water is used to quench fire; but here is the water itself on fire. This is no place for us; let us seek a home elsewhere.” So saying, he uttered this verse:
1. “Lo! In your stronghold stands the foe,
   And fire does water burn;
   So from your tree make haste to go,
   Let trust to trembling turn.” [1.291]

And hereupon the Bodhisatta flew off with such of the birds as followed his advice; but the disobedient birds, who stopped behind, all perished.

His lesson ended, the Teacher preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof that monk became an Arahat, and identified the Jātaka by saying: “The loyal and obedient birds of those days are now become my disciples, and I myself was then the king of the birds.”

Ja 134 Jhānasodhanajātaka

The Story about the Purification of Meditation (1s)

In the present the monks are wondering at how Ven. Sāriputta can answer a question put by the Buddha that is beyond everyone else. The Buddha says that he could do this also in the past, and shows how his last words in that life had been correctly interpreted by his chief disciple.

The Bodhisatta = Mahābrahmā,
Sāriputta = the elder pupil (jeṭṭhantevāsika).

Present Source: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga,
Quoted at: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha, Present Compare: Dhp-a VII.10 Aññatara-itthi,
Past Compare: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Meditation, Devas.

“With conscious.” {1.473} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the interpretation by Sāriputta, Captain of the Dhamma, at the gate of Saṅkassa town, of a problem tersely propounded by the Teacher.365

365 [The story is related in the Dhp-a XIV.2. I include the relevant part of the story here, slightly modified from Burlingame’s translation.]
At that time the Teacher put a question concisely to that elder. This is the full story, put briefly, of the descent from the world of gods. When the venerable Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja had by his Supernormal Powers gained the sandalwood bowl in the presence of the great merchant of Rājagaha, the Teacher forbade the monks to use their miraculous Supernormal Powers.

Then the schismatics thought: “The ascetic Gotama has forbidden the use of miraculous Supernormal Powers: now he will do no miracle himself.” Their disciples were disturbed, and said to the schismatics, “Why didn’t you take the bowl by your Supernormal Powers?” They replied, “This is no hard thing for us, friend. But we think, ‘Who will display before the laity his own fine and subtle powers for the sake of a paltry wooden bowl?’ and so we did not take it. The ascetics of the Sakya class took it, and showed their Supernormal Powers for sheer foolish greed. Do not imagine it is any trouble to us to work miracles. Suppose we leave out of consideration the disciples of Gotama the ascetic: if we like, we too will show our Supernormal Powers with the ascetic Gotama himself: if the ascetic Gotama works one miracle, we will work one twice as good.”

The monks who heard this told the Fortunate One of it, “Sir, the schismatics say they will work a miracle.” Said the Teacher, “Let them do it, monks; I will do the like.” Bimbisāra, hearing this, went and asked the Fortunate One, “Will you work a miracle, sir?” “Yes, O king.” “Was there not a command given on this matter, sir?” “The command, O king, was given to my disciples; there is no command which can rule the Buddhas. When the flowers and fruit in your park are forbidden to others, the same rule does not apply to you.” “Then where will you work this miracle, sir?” “At Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” “What have I to do, then?” “Nothing, sire.”

Next day, after breaking his fast, the Teacher went to seek alms. “Whither goes the Teacher?” asked the people. The monks answered to them, “At the gate of the city of Sāvatthi, beneath Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, he is to work a twofold miracle to the confounding of the schismatics.” The crowd said: “This miracle will be what they call a masterpiece; we will go see it,” leaving the doors of their houses, they went along with the Teacher. Some of the schismatics also followed the Teacher, with their disciples, “We too,” they said, “will work a miracle, in the place where the ascetic Gotama shall work his.”
By and by the Teacher arrived at Sāvatthi. The king asked him, “Is it true, sir, you are about to work a miracle, as they say?” “Yes, it is true,” he said. “When?” asked the king. “On the seventh day from now, at the full moon of the month of July.” “Shall I set up a pavilion, sir?” “Peace, great king; in the place where I shall work my miracle Sakka will set up a pavilion of jewels twelve leagues in compass.” “Shall I proclaim this thing through the city, sir?” “Proclaim it, O king.” The king sent forth the announcer of the Dhamma on an elephant richly caparisoned, to proclaim thus, “News! The Teacher is about to perform a miracle, for the confounding of the schismatics, at the Gate of Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, seven days from now!” Each day was this proclamation made. When the schismatics heard this news, that the miracle will be done under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, they had all the mango trees near to Sāvatthi cut down, paying the owners for them.

On the night of the full moon the announcer of the Dhamma made proclamation, “This day in the morning the miracle will take place.” By the power of the gods it was as though all Jambudīpa was at the door and heard the proclamation; whosoever had it in his heart to go, they all betook themselves to Sāvatthi: for twelve leagues the crowd extended.

Early in the morning the Teacher went on his rounds seeking alms. The king’s gardener, Gaṇḍa by name, was just taking to the king a fine ripe mango fruit; thoroughly ripe, big as a bushel, when he espied the Teacher at the city gate. “This fruit is worthy of the Tathāgata,” said he, and gave it to him. The Teacher took it, and sitting down then and there on one side, ate the fruit. When it was eaten, he said: “Ānanda, give the gardener this stone to plant here on the spot; this shall be Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” The elder did so.

The gardener dug a hole in the earth, and planted it. On the instant the stone burst, roots sprouted forth, up sprang a red shoot tall as a plough-pole; even as the crowd stared it grew into a mango tree of a hundred cubits, with a trunk fifty cubits and branches of fifty cubits in height; at the same time flowers bloomed, fruit ripened; the tree stood filling the sky, covered with bees, laden with golden fruit; when the wind blew on it, sweet fruits fell; then the monks came up and ate of the fruit, and retired.
In the evening time the King of the Devas, reflecting, perceived that it was a task laid on him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things. So he sent the Devaputta Vissakamma, and caused him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things, twelve leagues in compass, covered all over with blue lotus. Thus the gods of ten thousand spheres were gathered together. The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha's seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha's seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the Rains Retreat under the great Coral Tree, seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.

The people knew not the place whither the Teacher had gone; they looked, and said: “Let us go home,” and lived in that place during the rainy season. When the rainy season was near to its end, and the feast was at hand, the great elder Moggallāna went and announced it to the Fortunate One. Thereupon the Teacher asked him, “Where is Sāriputta now?” “He, sir, after the miracle which delighted him, remained with five hundred monks in the city of Sāṅkassa, and is there still.” “Moggallāna, on the seventh day from now I shall descend by the gate of Sāṅkassa. Let those who desire to behold the Tathāgata assemble in the city of Sāṅkassa.” The elder assented, went and told the people: the whole company he transported from Sāvatthi to Sāṅkassa, a distance of thirty leagues, in the twinkling of an eye.

The Rains Retreat over, and the Invitation celebrated, the Teacher told king Sakka that he was about to return to the world of men. Then Sakka sent for Vissakamma, and said to him, “Make a stairway for the One with Ten Powers to descend into the world of men.” He placed the head of the stairway upon the peak of Sineru, and the foot of it by the gate of Sāṅkassa, and between he made three stairways side by side: one of gems, one of silver, and one of gold: the balustrade and cornice were of the seven things of price. The Teacher, having performed a miracle for the world’s emancipation, descended by the midmost stair made out of gems. Sakka carried the bowl and robe, Suyāma a yak’s-tail fan, Brahmā Lord of all beings bore a sunshade, and the deities of the ten thousand spheres worshipped with divine garlands and perfumes. When the Teacher stood at the foot of the staircase, first elder Sāriputta gave him greeting, afterwards the rest of the company.

Amidst this assembly the Teacher thought: “Moggallāna has been shown to possess supernatural power, Upāli as one who is versed in the sacred law, but the quality of high wisdom possessed by Sāriputta has not been shown. Save and except me, no other possesses wisdom so full and complete as his; I will make known the quality of his wisdom.” First of all he asked a question which is put to ordinary persons, and the ordinary persons answered it. Then he asked a question within the scope of those of the First Path, and this they of the First Path answered, but the ordinary folk knew nought of it. In the same way he asked questions in turn within the scope of those of the Second and Third Paths, of the Arahats, of the chief disciples; and in each case those who were below each grade in turn were unable to answer, but they who were above could answer. Then he put a question within the power of Sāriputta, and this the elder could answer, but the others not so. The people asked, “Who is this elder who answered the Teacher?” They were told, it was the Captain of the Dhamma, and Sāriputta was his name. “Ah, great is his wisdom!” they said. Ever afterwards the quality of the elder’s great wisdom was known to men and to gods. Then the Teacher said to him,

“Some have probations yet to pass, and some have reached the goal:
Their different behaviours say, for you do know the whole.”

Having thus asked a question which comes within a Buddha’s scope, he added, “Here is a point put with brevity, Sāriputta; what is the meaning of the matter in all its bearings?” The elder considered the problem. He thought: “The Teacher asks of the proper behaviour with which the monks attain progress, both those who are in the lower Paths and those who are Arahats?” As to the general question, he had no doubt. But then he considered, “The proper manner of behaviour may be described in many ways of speaking according to the essential elements of being, and so forth from that beginning; now in what fashion can I hit the Teacher’s meaning?” He was doubtful about the meaning. The Teacher thought: “Sāriputta has no doubt of the general question, but doubts what particular side of it I have in view. If I give no clue, he will never be able to answer, so a clue I will give him.” This clue he gave by saying: “See here, Sāriputta: you grant this to be true?” (mentioning some point). Sāriputta granted the point.

The hint thus given, he knew that Sāriputta had taken his meaning, and would answer fully, starting from the very elements of being. Then the question stood out clear before the elder, as with a hundred hints, nay, a thousand; and he, at the Teacher’s hint given, answered the question which belonged to a Buddha’s scope.

And the following was the story of the past he then told.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a northern brahmin and completed his education at Taxila. Putting sensual desires from him and renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life, he won the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, and dwelt in the Himālayas, where five hundred ascetics gathered round him. One rainy season, his chief disciple went with half the ascetics to the haunts of men to get salt and vinegar. And that was the time when the Bodhisatta should die. And his disciples, wishing to know his spiritual attainment, said to him, “What excellence have you won?” the Bodhisatta, as he expired in his forest-home, exclaimed, “Neither conscious nor unconscious.”

And the recluses did not believe the interpretation which the Bodhisatta’s chief disciple gave of the Teacher’s words. The Bodhisatta came back from the Radiant Realm, and from mid-air recited this verse:

1. “With conscious, with unconscious, too,
   Dwells sorrow. Either ill eschew.
   Pure bliss, from all corruption free,
   Springs but from bliss of Attainment.”

His lesson ended, the Bodhisatta praised his disciple and went back to the Brahmā Realm. Then the rest of the recluses believed the chief disciple.

______________________________

366 [I have filled in the lacuna with the relevant part of the story from Ja 99 Parosahassajātaka.]
His lesson taught, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “In those days Sāriputta was the chief disciple, and I Mahābrahma.”

Ja 135 Candābhajātaka

The Story about Moonlight (1s)

In the present the monks are wondering at how Ven. Sāriputta can answer a question put by the Buddha that is beyond everyone else. The Buddha says that he could do this also in the past, and shows how his last words in that life had been correctly interpreted by his chief disciple.

The Bodhisatta = Mahābrahmā, Sāriputta = the elder pupil (jeṭṭhantevāsika).

Present Source: Ja 483 Sarabhamiga,
Quoted at: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha,
Present Compare: Dhp-a VII.10 Aññatara-ittī,
Past Compare: Ja 99 Parosahassa, Ja 101 Parosata, Ja 134 Jhānasodhana, Ja 135 Candābha.

Keywords: Wisdom, Meditation, Devas.

“Who sagely meditates.” [1.292] {1.474} This story too was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana about the interpretation of a problem by the elder Sāriputta at the gate of Saṅkassa.

At that time the Teacher put a question concisely to that elder. This is the full story, put briefly, of the descent from the world of gods. When the venerable Piṇḍola Bhāradvāja had by his Supernormal Powers gained the sandalwood bowl in the presence of the great merchant of Rājagaha, the Teacher forbade the monks to use their miraculous Supernormal Powers.

Then the schismatics thought: “The ascetic Gotama has forbidden the use of miraculous Supernormal Powers: now he will do no miracle himself.” Their disciples were disturbed, and said to the schismatics, “Why didn’t you take the bowl by your Supernormal Powers?” They replied, “This is no hard thing for us, friend. But we think, ‘Who will display before the laity his own fine and subtle powers for the sake of a paltry wooden bowl?’ and so we did not take it. The ascetics of the Sakya class took it, and showed their Supernormal Powers for
The monks who heard this told the Fortunate One of it, “Sir, the schismatics say they will work a miracle.” Said the Teacher, “Let them do it, monks; I will do the like.” Bimbisāra, hearing this, went and asked the Fortunate One, “Will you work a miracle, sir?” “Yes, O king.” “Was there not a command given on this matter, sir?” “The command, O king, was given to my disciples; there is no command which can rule the Buddhas. When the flowers and fruit in your park are forbidden to others, the same rule does not apply to you.” “Then where will you work this miracle, sir?” “At Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” “What have I to do, then?” “Nothing, sire.”

Next day, after breaking his fast, the Teacher went to seek alms. “Whither goes the Teacher?” asked the people. The monks answered to them, “At the gate of the city of Sāvatthi, beneath Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, he is to work a twofold miracle to the confounding of the schismatics.” The crowd said: “This miracle will be what they call a masterpiece; we will go see it,” leaving the doors of their houses, they went along with the Teacher. Some of the schismatics also followed the Teacher, with their disciples, “We too,” they said, “will work a miracle, in the place where the ascetic Gotama shall work his.”

By and by the Teacher arrived at Sāvatthi. The king asked him, “Is it true, sir, you are about to work a miracle, as they say?” “Yes, it is true,” he said. “When?” asked the king. “On the seventh day from now, at the full moon of the month of July.” “Shall I set up a pavilion, sir?” “Peace, great king; in the place where I shall work my miracle Sakka will set up a pavilion of jewels twelve leagues in compass.” “Shall I proclaim this thing through the city, sir?” “Proclaim it, O king.” The king sent forth the announcer of the Dhamma on an elephant richly caparisoned, to proclaim thus, “News! The Teacher is about to perform a miracle, for the confounding of the schismatics, at the Gate of Sāvatthi, under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, seven days from now!” Each day was this proclamation made. When the schismatics heard this news, that the miracle will be done under Gaṇḍa’s mango tree, they had all the mango trees near to Sāvatthi cut down, paying the owners for them.
On the night of the full moon the announcer of the Dhamma made proclamation, “This day in the morning the miracle will take place.” By the power of the gods it was as though all Jambudīpa was at the door and heard the proclamation; whosoever had it in his heart to go, they all betook themselves to Sāvatthi: for twelve leagues the crowd extended.

Early in the morning the Teacher went on his rounds seeking alms. The king’s gardener, Gaṇḍa by name, was just taking to the king a fine ripe mango fruit; thoroughly ripe, big as a bushel, when he espied the Teacher at the city gate. “This fruit is worthy of the Tathāgata,” said he, and gave it to him. The Teacher took it, and sitting down then and there on one side, ate the fruit. When it was eaten, he said: “Ānanda, give the gardener this stone to plant here on the spot; this shall be Gaṇḍa’s mango tree.” The elder did so.

The gardener dug a hole in the earth, and planted it. On the instant the stone burst, roots sprouted forth, up sprang a red shoot tall as a plough-pole; even as the crowd stared it grew into a mango tree of a hundred cubits, with a trunk fifty cubits and branches of fifty cubits in height; at the same time flowers bloomed, fruit ripened; the tree stood filling the sky, covered with bees, laden with golden fruit; when the wind blew on it, sweet fruits fell; then the monks came up and ate of the fruit, and retired.

In the evening time the King of the Devas, reflecting, perceived that it was a task laid on him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things. So he sent the Devaputta Vissakamma, and caused him to make a pavilion of the seven precious things, twelve leagues in compass, covered all over with blue lotus. Thus the gods of ten thousand spheres were gathered together. The Teacher, for the confounding of the schismatics having performed a twofold miracle passing marvellous among his disciples, caused faith to spring up in multitudes, then arose and, sitting in the Buddha’s seat, declared the Dhamma. Twenty crores of beings drank of the waters of life. Then, meditating to see whither it was that former Buddhas went when they had done a miracle, and perceiving that it was to the Heaven of the Thirty-Three, up he rose from the Buddha’s seat, the right foot he placed on the top of Mount Yugandhara, and with his left strode to the peak of Sineru, he began the Rains Retreat under the great Coral Tree, seated upon the yellow-stone throne; for the space of three months he discoursed upon the Abhidhamma to the gods.
The people knew not the place whither the Teacher had gone; they looked, and said: “Let us go home,” and lived in that place during the rainy season. When the rainy season was near to its end, and the feast was at hand, the great elder Moggallāna went and announced it to the Fortunate One. Thereupon the Teacher asked him, “Where is Sāriputta now?” “He, sir, after the miracle which delighted him, remained with five hundred monks in the city of Saṅkassa, and is there still.” “Moggallāna, on the seventh day from now I shall descend by the gate of Saṅkassa. Let those who desire to behold the Tathāgata assemble in the city of Saṅkassa.” The elder assented, went and told the people: the whole company he transported from Sāvatthi to Saṅkassa, a distance of thirty leagues, in the twinkling of an eye.

The Rains Retreat over, and the Invitation celebrated, the Teacher told king Sakka that he was about to return to the world of men. Then Sakka sent for Vissakamma, and said to him, “Make a stairway for the One with Ten Powers to descend into the world of men.” He placed the head of the stairway upon the peak of Sineru, and the foot of it by the gate of Saṅkassa, and between he made three stairways side by side: one of gems, one of silver, and one of gold: the balustrade and cornice were of the seven things of price. The Teacher, having performed a miracle for the world’s emancipation, descended by the midmost stair made out of gems. Sakka carried the bowl and robe, Suyāma a yak’s-tail fan, Brahmā Lord of all beings bore a sunshade, and the deities of the ten thousand spheres worshipped with divine garlands and perfumes. When the Teacher stood at the foot of the staircase, first elder Sāriputta gave him greeting, afterwards the rest of the company.

Amidst this assembly the Teacher thought: “Moggallāna has been shown to possess supernatural power, Upāli as one who is versed in the sacred law, but the quality of high wisdom possessed by Sāriputta has not been shown. Save and except me, no other possesses wisdom so full and complete as his; I will make known the quality of his wisdom.” First of all he asked a question which is put to ordinary persons, and the ordinary persons answered it. Then he asked a question within the scope of those of the First Path, and this they of the First Path answered, but the ordinary folk knew nought of it. In the same way he asked questions in turn within the scope of those of the Second and Third Paths, of the Arahats, of the chief disciples; and in each case those who were below each grade in turn were unable to answer, but they who were above could answer. Then he put a question within the power of Sāriputta, and this the elder could answer, but the others not so. The people asked, “Who is this elder who answered the Teacher?” They were told, it was the Captain of the Dhamma, and Sāriputta was his name. “Ah, great is his wisdom!” they said. Ever afterwards the quality of the elder’s great wisdom was known to men and to gods. Then the Teacher said to him,

“Some have probations yet to pass, and some have reached the goal:
Their different behaviours say, for you do know the whole.”

Having thus asked a question which comes within a Buddha’s scope, he added, “Here is a point put with brevity, Sāriputta; what is the meaning of the matter in all its bearings?” The elder considered the problem. He thought: “The Teacher asks of the proper behaviour with which the monks attain progress, both those who are in the lower Paths and those who are Arahats?” As to the general question, he had no doubt. But then he considered, “The proper manner of behaviour may be described in many ways of speaking according to the essential elements of being, and so forth from that beginning; now in what fashion can I hit the Teacher’s meaning?” He was doubtful about the meaning. The Teacher thought: “Sāriputta has no doubt of the general question, but doubts what particular side of it I have in view. If I give no clue, he will never be able to answer, so a clue I will give him.” This clue he gave by saying: “See here, Sāriputta: you grant this to be true?” (mentioning some point). Sāriputta granted the point.

The hint thus given, he knew that Sāriputta had taken his meaning, and would answer fully, starting from the very elements of being. Then the question stood out clear before the elder, as with a hundred hints, nay, a thousand; and he, at the Teacher’s hint given, answered the question which belonged to a Buddha’s scope.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a northern brahmin and completed his education at Taxila. Putting sensual desires from him and renouncing the world for the ascetic’s life, he won the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments, and dwelt in the Himālayas, where five hundred ascetics gathered round him. One rainy season, his chief disciple went with half the ascetics to the haunts of men to get salt and vinegar. And that was the time when the Bodhisatta should die. And his disciples, wishing to know his spiritual attainment, said to him, “What excellence have you won?”

The Bodhisatta, as he expired in his forest-home, exclaimed, “Moonlight and Sunlight.” With these words he died and passed to the Radiant Realm.

Now when the chief disciple interpreted the Teacher’s words his fellows did not believe him. Then back came the Bodhisatta and from mid-air and recited this verse:

1. “Who sagely meditates on sun and moon, Shall win (when reason unto Absorption Gives place) his lot thereafter in Radiant Realms.”

Such was the Bodhisatta’s teaching, and, first praising his disciple, he went his way back to the Brahmā Realm.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Sāriputta was the chief disciple of those days, and I Mahābrahmā.”

Ja 136 Suvaṇṇahaṁsa-jātaka

The Story about the Golden Goose (1s)

In the present one nun is greedy and spoils things for the other nuns, and annoys the monks and lay people also. The Buddha tells a story of how, in a previous life, she had tried to pluck the golden feathers of her previous husband, and had lost the advantage she had.

The Bodhisatta = the golden goose king (suvaṇṇahaṁsarājā), the sisters = the daughters (tisso dhītaro),
Thullanandā = the brahmini (brāhmaṇī).

Keywords: Greed, Animals.

367 These technical lines imply that, by taking the Sun and Moon as his kammatthāna, or subject for meditation, a Buddhist, by attaining Jhāna (or Absorption) in the second (i.e. supra-rational) degree, can save himself from rebirth in a lower sphere of existence than the Ābhassaraloka or Radiant Realm of the corporeal Brahma Realm.
“Contented be.” This story was told by the Teacher about a nun named Thullanandā.

A lay brother at Sāvatthi had offered the nuns a supply of garlic, and, sending for his bailiff; had given orders that, if they should come, each nun was to receive two or three handfuls. After that they made a practice [1.475] of coming [1.293] to his house or field for their garlic. Now one holiday the supply of garlic in the house ran out, and the nun Thullanandā, coming with others to the house, was told, when she said she wanted some garlic, that there was none left in the house, it had all been used up out of hand, and that she must go to the field for it. So away to the field she went and carried off an excessive amount of garlic. The bailiff grew angry and remarked what a greedy lot these nuns were! This piqued the more moderate nuns; and the monks too were piqued at the taunt when the nuns repeated it to them, and they told the Fortunate One. Rebuking the greed of Thullanandā, the Teacher said: “Monks, a greedy person is harsh and unkind even to the mother who bore him; a greedy person cannot convert the unconverted, or make the converted grow in grace, or cause alms to come in, or save them when come in; whereas the moderate person can do all these things.” In such wise did the Teacher point the moral, ending by saying: “Monks, as Thullanandā is greedy now, so she was greedy in times gone by.” And thereupon he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin, and growing up was married to a bride of his own rank, who bore him three daughters named Nandā, Nandavatī and Sundarinandā. The Bodhisatta dying, they were taken in by neighbours and friends, while he was born again into the world as a golden mallard endowed with consciousness of its former existences. Growing up, the bird viewed its own magnificent size and golden plumage, and remembered that previously it had been a human being. Discovering that his wife and daughters were living on the generosity of others, the mallard bethought him of his plumage like hammered and beaten gold and how by giving them a golden feather at a time he could enable his wife and daughters to live in comfort. So away he flew to where they dwelt and alighted on the top of the central beam of the roof.

Seeing the Bodhisatta, [1.476] the wife and girls asked where he had come from; and he told them that he was their father who had died and been born a golden mallard, and that he had come to visit them and put an end to their miserable necessity of working for hire. “You shall have my feathers,” said he, “one by one, and they will sell for enough to keep you all in ease and comfort.” So saying, he gave them one of his feathers and departed. And from time to time he returned to give them another feather, and with the proceeds of their sale these brahmin women grew prosperous and quite well-to-do.

But one day the mother said to her daughters, “There’s no trusting animals, my children. Who’s to say your father might not go away one of these days and never come back again? Let us use our time and pluck him clean next time he comes, so as to make sure of all his feathers.” Thinking this would pain him, the daughters refused. The mother in her greed called the golden mallard to her one day when he came, and then took him with both hands and plucked him. Now the Bodhisatta’s feathers had this property that if they were plucked out against his wish, they ceased to be golden and became like a crane’s feathers. And now the poor bird, though he stretched his wings, could not fly, and the woman flung him into a barrel and gave him food there. As time went on his feathers grew again (though they were plain white ones now), and he flew away to his own abode and never came back again.

At the close of this story the Teacher said: “Thus you see, monks, how Thullanandā was as greedy in times past as she is now. And her greed then lost her the gold in the same way as her greed now will lose her the garlic. Observe, moreover, how her greed has deprived all the nuns of their supply of garlic, and learn therefrom to be moderate in your desires and to be content with what is given you, however small that may be.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “Contented be, nor itch for further store.
They seized the swan – but had its gold no more.”

So saying, the Teacher soundly rebuked the erring nun and laid down the precept that any nun who should eat garlic would have to do penance. Then, making the connection, he said: “Thullanandā was the brahmin’s wife of the story, her three sisters were the brahmin’s three daughters, and I myself the golden mallard.”
The Section with One Verse – 592

Ja 137 Babbujātaka
The Story about the Cats (1s)

In the present a married daughter visits her mother and is importuned so long she loses her husband. The Buddha tells how a mouse in the past had to share her meat with four cats, until she found a way to dispense with them.

The Bodhisatta = the stone cutter (pāṇaṭṭakamaṇīkāra), Kāṇa’s mother = the mouse (mūsika),
the four monks = the four cats (cattāro biḷāra).

Present Compare: Vin Pāc 2 (4.4).

Keywords: Attachment, Importunity, Animals.

“Give food to one cat.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the precept respecting Kāṇa’s mother. She was a lay-sister at Sāvatthi known only as Kāṇa’s mother, who had entered the Paths of emancipation and was of the disciples. Her daughter Kāṇa was married to a husband of the same caste in another village, and some errand or other made her go to see her mother. A few days went by, and her husband sent a messenger to say he wished her to come back. The girl asked her mother whether she should go, and the mother said she could not go back empty-handed after so long an absence, and set about making a cake. Just then up came a monk going his round for alms, and the mother sat him down to the cake she had just baked. Away he went [1.295] and told another monk, who came up just in time to get the second cake that was baked for the daughter to take home with her. He told a third, and the third told a fourth, and so each fresh cake was taken by a fresh comer.

The result of this was that the daughter did not start on her way home, and the husband sent a second and a third messenger after her. And the message he sent by the third was that if his wife did not come back, he should get another wife. And each message had exactly the same result. So the husband took another wife, and at the news his former wife fell weeping. Knowing all this, the Teacher put on his robes early in the morning and went with his alms-bowl to the house of 368 The name Kāṇa means ‘one-eyed’.

Kāṇā’s mother and sat down on the seat set for him. Then he asked why the daughter was crying, and, being told, spoke words of consolation to the mother, and arose and went back to the monastery.

Now the monks came to know how Kāṇā had been stopped three times from going back to her husband owing to the action of the four monks; and one day they met in the Dhamma Hall and began to talk about the matter. The Teacher came into the Hall {1.478} and asked what they were discussing, and they told him. “Monks,” said he, “think not this is the first time those four monks have brought sorrow on Kāṇā’s mother by eating of her store; they did the like in days gone by too.” So saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a stone-cutter, and growing up became expert in working stones. Now in the Kāsi country there dwelt a very rich merchant who had amassed forty crores in gold. And when his wife died, so strong was her love of money that she was reborn a mouse and dwelt over the treasure. And one by one the whole family died, including the merchant himself. Likewise the village became deserted and forlorn.

At the time of our story the Bodhisatta was quarrying and shaping stones on the site of this deserted village; and the mouse used often to see him as she ran about to find food. At last she fell in love with him; and, bethinking her how the secret of all her vast wealth would die with her, she conceived the idea of enjoying it with him. So one day she came to the Bodhisatta with a coin in her mouth. Seeing this, he spoke to her kindly, and said: “Mother, what has brought you here with this coin?” “It is for you to lay out for yourself, and to buy meat with for me as well, my son.” Nowise reluctant, he took the money and spent a halfpenny of it on meat which he brought to the mouse, who departed and ate to her heart’s content. And this went on, the mouse giving the Bodhisatta a coin every day, and he in return supplying her with meat. But it fell out one day that the mouse was caught by a cat.

“Don’t kill me,” said the mouse. “Why not?” said the cat. “I’m as hungry as can be, and really must kill you to allay the pangs.” “First, tell me whether you’re always hungry, or only hungry today.” “Oh, every day finds me hungry again.” “Well then, if this be so, I will find you always in meat; {1.479} only let me go.” [1.296] “Mind you do then,” said the cat, and let the mouse go.
As a consequence of this the mouse had to divide the supplies of meat she got from the Bodhisatta into two portions and gave one half to the cat, keeping the other for herself.

Now, as luck would have it, the same mouse was caught another day by a second cat and had to purchase her release on the same terms. So now the daily food was divided into three portions. And when a third cat caught the mouse and a like arrangement had to be made, the supply was divided into four portions. And later a fourth cat caught her, and the food had to be divided among five, so that the mouse, reduced to such short rations, grew so thin as to be nothing but skin and bone. Remark ing how emaciated his friend was getting, the Bodhisatta asked the reason. Then the mouse told him all that had befallen her.

“Why didn’t you tell me all this before?” said, the Bodhisatta. “Cheer up, I’ll help you out of your troubles.” So he took a block of the purest crystal and scooped out a cavity in it and made the mouse get inside. “Now stop there,” said he, “and don’t fail to fiercely threaten and revile all who come near.”

So the mouse crept into the crystal cell and waited. Up came one of the cats and demanded his meat. “Away, vile grimalkin,” said the mouse, “why should I supply you? Go home and eat your kittens!” Infuriated at these words, and never suspecting the mouse to be inside the crystal, the cat sprang at the mouse to eat her up; and so furious was its spring that it broke the walls of its chest and its eyes started from its head. So that cat died and its carcase tumbled down out of sight. And the like fate in turn befell all four cats. And ever after the grateful mouse brought the Bodhisatta two or three coins instead of one as before, and by degrees she thus gave him the whole of the hoard. In unbroken friendship the two lived together, till their lives ended and they passed away to fare according to their deeds.

The story told, the Buddha, uttered this verse: [1.480]

1. “Give food to one cat, number two appears:
   A third and fourth succeed in fruitful line;
   Witness the four that by the crystal died.”

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “These four monks were the four cats of those days, Kāṇā’s mother was the mouse, and I the stone-cutter.”
Ja 138 Godhajātaka
The Story about the Iguana (1s)

In the present one monk gets his living in dishonest ways. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story about a false ascetic who tried to capture and eat a lizard who was his erstwhile disciple.

The Bodhisatta = the wise iguana (godhāpaṇḍita), Sāriputta = the virtuous ascetic (sīlavatāpasa).

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla,
Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādiccupatṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Deceit, Treachery, Animals.

“With matted hair.” [1.297] This story was told by the Buddha while at Jetavana, about a deceitful monk. The incidents were like those above related.369

This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a lizard; and in a hut nearby a village on the borders there lived a rigid ascetic who had attained the five Super Knowledges, and was treated with great respect by the villagers. In an ant-hill at the end of the walk where the recluse paced up and down, dwelt the Bodhisatta, and twice or thrice each day he would go to the recluse and hear words of edification and holiness. Then with due obeisance to the good man, the Bodhisatta would depart to his own abode.

369 [It appears this references Ja 89 Kuhakajātaka, which itself references Ja 487 Uddālakajātaka. I include the story here.]

After a certain time the ascetic bade farewell to the villagers and went away. In his stead there came another ascetic, a rascally fellow, to dwell in the hermitage. Assuming the holiness of the newcomer, the Bodhisatta acted towards him as to the first ascetic. One day an unexpected storm in the dry season brought out the ants on their hills, and the lizards, coming abroad to eat them, were caught in great numbers \(1.481\) by the village folk; and some were served up with vinegar and sugar for the ascetic to eat. Pleased with so savoury a dish, he asked what it was, and learned that it was a dish of lizards. Hereon he reflected that he had a remarkably fine lizard as his neighbour, and resolved to dine off him. Accordingly he made ready the pot for cooking and sauce to serve the lizard in, and sat at the door of his hut with a mallet hidden under his yellow robe, awaiting the Bodhisatta’s coming, with a studied air of perfect peace.

At evening the Bodhisatta came, and as he drew near, marked that the ascetic did not seem quite the same, but had a look about him that boded no good. Snuffing up the wind which was blowing towards him from the ascetic’s cell, the Bodhisatta smelt the smell of lizard’s flesh, and at once realised how the taste of lizard had made the ascetic want to kill him with a mallet and eat him up. So he retired homeward without calling on the ascetic. Seeing that the Bodhisatta did not come, the ascetic judged that the lizard must have divined his plot, but marvelled how he could have discovered it. Determined that the lizard should not escape, he drew out the mallet and threw \(1.298\) it, just hitting the tip of the lizard’s tail. Quick as thought the Bodhisatta dashed into his fastness, and putting his head out by a different hole to that by which he had gone in, cried, “You deceitful person, your garb of piety led me to trust you, but now I know your villainous nature. What has a thief like you to do with ascetic’s clothing?” Thus upbraiding the false ascetic, the Bodhisatta recited this verse:
1. “With matted hair and garb of skin
   Why ape ascetic’s piety?
   A saint without, your heart within
   Is choked with foul impurity.”\textsuperscript{370} {1.482}

In this wise did the Bodhisatta expose the wicked ascetic, after which he retired into his ant-hill. And the wicked ascetic departed from that place.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The deceitful person was the wicked ascetic of those days, Sāriputta the good ascetic who lived in the hermitage before him, and I myself the lizard.”

\textbf{Ja 139 Ubhatobhaṭṭhajātaka}

\textbf{The Story about Falling Both Ways (1s)}

In the present the monks are talking about Devadatta’s twofold failure, as a monk and as a layman. The Buddha tells of a fisherman who lost his eyes while his wife got a beating by trying to hide their good luck.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
Devadatta = the fishermen (bāḷisika).

Keywords: Dissemblance, Misfortune, Devas.

\textbf{“His blinding and her beating.”} This story the Teacher told while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. We hear that the monks, meeting together in the Dhamma Hall, spoke one with another, saying that even as a torch from a pyre, charred at both ends and beduged in the middle, does not serve as wood either in forest tree or village-hearth, so Devadatta by giving up the world to follow this dispensation which leads to safety had only achieved a twofold shortcoming and failure, seeing that he had missed the comforts of a lay life yet had fallen short of his vocation as a monk.

Entering the Hall, the Teacher asked and was told what the monks were talking of together. “Yes, monks,” said he, “and so too in days gone by Devadatta came to just such another two-fold failure.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

\textsuperscript{370} Dhp v. 394.
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a Tree Devatā, and there was a certain village where [1.299] fishermen dwelt in those days. And one of these fishermen taking his tackle went off with his little boy, and cast his hook into the most likely waters known to his fellow-fishermen. Now [1.483] a snag caught his hook and the fisherman could not pull it up. “What a fine fish!” thought he. “I’d better send my boy off home to my wife and tell her to get up a quarrel and keep the others at home, so that there’ll be none to want to go shares in my prize.”

Accordingly he told the lad to run off home and tell his mother what a big fish he had hooked and how she was to engage the neighbours’ attention. Then, fearing his line might break, he flung off his coat and dashed into the water to secure his prize. But as he groped about for the fish, he struck against the snag and put out both his eyes. Moreover a robber stole his clothes from the bank. In an agony of pain, with his hands pressed to his blinded eyes, he clambered out trembling in every limb and tried to find his clothes.

Meantime his wife, to occupy the neighbours by a quarrel on purpose, had tricked herself out with a palm-leaf behind one ear, and had blacked one eye with soot from the saucepan. In this guise, nursing a dog, she came out to call on her neighbours. “Bless me, you’ve gone mad,” said one woman to her. “Not mad at all,” retorted the fisherman’s wife, “you abuse me without cause with your slanderous tongue. Come your ways with me to the village headman and I’ll have you fined eight pieces371 for slander.”

So with angry words they went off to the village headman. But when the matter was gone into, it was the fisherman’s wife who was fined; and she was tied up and beaten to make her pay the fine. Now when the Tree Devatā saw how misfortune had befallen both the wife in the village and the husband in the forest, he stood in 371 The Pāli word here, as in No. 137, is kahāpana. But there it is shewn by the context to be a golden coin; whereas here the poverty of the fisher-folk supports the view that the coin was of copper, as commonly. The fact seems to be that the word kahāpana, like some other names of Indian coins, primarily indicated a weight of any coined metal, whether gold, silver or copper.

---

the fork of his tree and exclaimed, “Ah fisherman, both in the water and on land your labour is in vain, and twofold is your failure.” So saying he uttered this verse:

1. “His blinding, and her beating, clearly show
A twofold failure and a twofold woe.” {1.484}

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the fisherman of those days, and I the Tree Devatā.”

Ja 140 Kākajātaka

The Story about the Crow (1s)

In the present one wise councillor brings justice to the courts, thereby cutting off the sources of bribery, and making himself enemies. The latter slander him to the king and see to it that he and his sons are killed. The Buddha tells a story of a crow who fouled on a brahmin, and how the brahmin tried to get his revenge by having all the crows killed.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the crows (kākarājā), Ānanda = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Past Compare: Ja 140 Kāka, Ja 404 Kapi.

Keywords: Treachery, Revenge, Animals, Birds.

“In ceaseless dread.” [1.300] This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a sagacious counsellor. The incidents will be related in the twelfth book in connection with the Bhaddasālañjātaka [Ja 465].

Now at this time there lived close to the gate a Licchavi named Mahāli, who had been educated by the same teacher as the king of Kosala’s general, Bandhula. This man was blind, and used to advise the Licchavis on all matters temporal and spiritual. Hearing the clatter of the chariot as it went over the threshold, he said: “The noise of the chariot of Bandhula the Mallian! This day there will be fear for the Licchavis!” By the tank there was set a strong guard, within and without; above it was spread an iron net; not even a bird could find room to get through. But the general, dismounting from his carriage, put the guards to flight with the blows of his sword, and burst through the iron network, and in the tank bathed his wife and gave her to drink of the water; then after bathing himself, he set Mallikā in the chariot, and left the town, and went back by the way he came.
The guards went and told all to the Licchavis. Then were the kings of the Licchavis angry; and five hundred of them, mounted in five hundred chariots, departed to capture Bandhula the Mallian. They informed Mahâli of it, and he said: “Go not! For he will slay you all.” But they said: “Nay, but we will go.” “Then if you come to a place where a wheel has sunk up to the nave, you must return. If you return not then, return back from that place when you hear the noise of a thunderbolt. If then you turn not, turn back from that place where you shall see a hole in front of your chariots. Go no further!” But they did not turn back according to his word, but pursued on and on.

Mallikâ espied them and said: “There are chariots in sight, my lord.” “Then tell me,” said he, “when they all look like one chariot.” When they all in a line looked like one, she said: “My lord, I see as it were the head of one chariot.” “Take the reins, then,” said he, and gave the reins into her hand: he stood upright in the chariot, and strung his bow. The chariot-wheel sank into the earth nave-deep. The Licchavis came to the place, and saw it, but turned not back. The other went on a little further, and twanged the bow string; then came a noise as the noise of a thunderbolt, yet even then they turned not, but pursued on and on. Bandhula stood up in the chariot and sped a shaft, and it cleft the heads of all the five hundred chariots, and passed right through the five hundred kings in the place where the girdle is fastened, and then buried itself in the earth. As they did not perceive that they were wounded they pursued still, shouting, “Stop, holloa, stop!” Bandhula stopped his chariot, and said: “You are dead men, and I cannot fight with the dead.” “What!” they said, “dead, such as we now are?” “Loose the girdle of the first man,” said Bandhula.

They loosed his girdle, and at the instant the girdle was loosed, he fell dead. Then he said to them, “You are all of you in the same condition: go to your homes, and set in order what should be ordered, and give your directions to your wives and families, and then doff your armour.” They did so, and then all of them gave up the ghost.

And Bandhula conveyed Mallikâ to Sâvatthi. She bore twin sons sixteen times in succession, and they were all mighty men and heroes, and became perfected in all manner of accomplishments. Each one of them had a thousand men to attend him, and when they went with their father to wait on the king, they alone filled the courtyard of the palace to overflowing.
One day some men who had been defeated in court on a false charge, seeing Bandhula approach, raised a great outcry, and informed him that the judges of the court had supported a false charge. So Bandhula went into the court, and judged the case, and gave each man his own. The crowd uttered loud shouts of applause. The king asked what it meant, and on hearing was much pleased; all those officers he sent away, and gave Bandhula charge of the judgement court, and thenceforward he judged aright. Then the former judges became poor, because they no longer received bribes, and they slandered Bandhula in the king’s ear, accusing him of aiming at the kingdom himself. The king listened to their words, and could not control his suspicions. “But,” he reflected, “if he be slain here, I shall be blamed.” He instigated certain men to harry the frontier districts; then sending for Bandhula, he said: “The borders are in a blaze; go with your sons and capture the brigands.” With him he also sent other men sufficient, mighty men of war, with instructions to kill him and his two-and-thirty sons, and cut off their heads, and bring them back.

While he was yet on the way, the hired brigands got wind of the general’s coming, and took to flight. He settled the people of that district in their homes, and quieted the province, and set out for home. Then when he was not far from the city, those warriors cut off his head and the heads of his sons.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a crow. One day the king’s family priest went out from the city to the river, bathed there, and having perfumed and garlanded himself, donned his bravest array and came back to the city. On the archway of the city gate there sat two crows; and one of them said to his mate, “I mean to foul on this brahmin’s head.” “Oh, don’t do any such thing,” said the other, “for this brahmin is a great man, and it is an evil thing to incur the hatred of the great. If you anger him, he may destroy the whole of our kind.” “I really must,” said the first. “Very well, you’re sure to be found out,” said the other, and flew quickly away. Just when the brahmin was under the battlements, down dropped the filth upon him as if the crow were dropping a festoon. The enraged brahmin forthwith conceived a hatred against all crows.

Now at this time it chanced that a female slave in charge of a granary spread the rice out in the sun at the granary door and was sitting there to watch it, when she fell asleep. Just then up came a shaggy goat and fell to eating the rice till the girl woke up and drove it away. Twice or three times the goat came back, as soon as she fell asleep, and ate the rice. {1.485} So when she had driven the creature away for the third time she bethought her that continued visits of the goat would consume half her store of rice and that steps must be taken to scare the animal away for good and so save her from so great a loss. So she took a lighted torch, and, sitting down, pretended to fall asleep as usual. And when the goat was eating, she suddenly sprang up and hit its shaggy back with her torch. At once the goat’s shaggy hide was all ablaze, and to ease its pain, it dashed into a hay-shed near the elephant’s stable and rolled in the hay. So the shed caught fire and the flames spread to the stables. As these stables caught fire, the elephants began to suffer, and many of them were badly burnt beyond the skill of the elephant-doctors to cure. When this [1.301] was reported to the king, he asked his family priest whether he knew what would cure the elephants. “Certainly I do, sire,” said the family priest, and being pressed to explain, said his cure was crows’ fat. Then the king ordered crows to be killed and their fat taken. And forthwith there was a great slaughter of crows, but never was any fat found on them, and so they went on killing till dead crows lay in heaps everywhere. And a great fear was upon all crows.

Now in those days the Bodhisatta had his dwelling in a great cemetery, at the head of eighty thousand crows. One of these brought tidings to him of the fear that was upon the crows. And the Bodhisatta, feeling that there was none but him who could essay the task, resolved to free his kinsfolk from their great dread. Reviewing the Ten Perfections, and selecting therefrom Loving-Kindness as his guide, he flew without stopping right up to the king’s palace, and entering in at the open window alighted underneath the king’s throne. Straightaway a servant tried to catch the bird, but the king entering the chamber forbade him.

Recovering himself in a moment, the Great Being, remembering Loving-Kindness, came forth from beneath the king’s throne and spoke thus to the king; “Sire, a king should remember the maxim that kings should not walk according to lust and other evil passions in ruling their kingdoms. Before taking action, it is meet first to examine and know the whole matter, and then only to do that which being done is salutary. If kings do that which being done is not salutary, they fill thousands with a great fear, even the fear of death. {1.486} And in prescribing crows’ fat, your family priest was prompted by revenge to lie; for crows have no fat.”
By these words the king’s heart was won, and he bade the Bodhisatta be set on a throne of gold and there anointed beneath the wings with the choicest oils and served in vessels of gold with the king’s own meats and drink. Then when the Great Being was filled and at ease, the king said: “Sage, you say that crows have no fat. How comes it that they have none?”

“In this wise,” answered the Bodhisatta with a voice that filled the whole palace, and he proclaimed the Dhamma in this verse:

1. “In ceaseless dread, with all mankind for foes,
   Their life is passed; and hence no fat have crows.”

This explanation given, the Great Being taught the king, saying: “Sire, kings should never act without examining and knowing the whole matter.” Well pleased, the king laid his kingdom at the Bodhisatta’s feet, but the Bodhisatta restored it to the king, whom he established in the Five Precepts, beseeching him to shield all living creatures from harm. And the king was moved by these words to grant immunity to all living creatures, and in particular he was unceasingly bountiful to crows. Every day he had six bushels of rice cooked for them and delicately flavoured, and this was given to the crows. But to the Great Being there was given food such as the king alone ate.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ānanda was king of Benares in those days, and I myself the king of the crows.’

Ja 141 Godhajātaka

The Story about the Iguana (1s)

In the present a monk ordained under the Buddha is easily persuaded to partake of Devadatta’s good food, rather than go on almsround. He is brought to the Buddha who tells a story about an iguana who made friends with a chameleon to his own and his friends’ destruction.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the iguanas (godhārājā), the treacherous monk = the lizard’s son, who was hard to advise (anovādako godhāpillako), Devadatta = the chameleon (kakaṇṭaka).

Present Source: Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka,
This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about a traitorous monk. The introductory incident is the same as that told in the Mahilāmukhajātaka [Ja 26].

At that time there were living in Rājagaha two friends, of whom one had taken the vows under the Teacher, while the other had taken them under Devadatta. And these continued to see one another, either casually or by visiting the monasteries. Now one day the disciple of Devadatta said to the other, “Sir, why do you daily go round for alms with the sweat streaming off you? Devadatta sits quietly at Gayāsīsa and feeds on the best of fare, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. There’s no way like his. Why create misery for yourself? Why should it not be a good thing for you to come the first thing in the morning to the monastery at Gayāsīsa and there drink our rice-gruel with a relish after it, try our eighteen kinds of solid victuals, and enjoy our excellent soft food, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings?”

Being pressed time after time to accept the invitation, the other began to want to go, and thenceforth used to go to Gayāsīsa and there eat and eat, not forgetting however to return to the Bamboo Grove at the proper hour. Nevertheless he could not keep it secret always; and in a little while it came out that he used to go to Gayāsīsa and there regale himself with the food provided for Devadatta. Accordingly, his friends asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you regale yourself on the food provided for Devadatta?” “Who said that?” said he. “So-and-so said it.” “It is true, sirs, that I go to Gayāsīsa and eat there. But it is not Devadatta who gives me food; others do that.” “Sir, Devadatta is the foe of the Buddhas; in his wickedness, he has secured the adherence of Ajātasattu and by unrighteousness got gain and honour for himself. Yet you who have taken the vows according to this dispensation which leads to safety, eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness. Come; let us bring you before the Teacher.” And, taking with them the monk, they went to the Dhamma Hall.

When the Teacher became aware of their presence, he said: “Monks, are you bringing this monk here against his will?” “Yes, sir; this monk, after taking the vows under you, eats the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness.” “Is it true, as they say, that you eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness?” “It was not Devadatta, sir, that gave it me, but others.” “Raise no quibbles here, monk,” said the Teacher. “Devadatta is a man of bad conduct and bad principle. Oh, how could you, who have taken the vows in the Buddha’s dispensation, eat Devadatta’s food, while living in the Teacher's presence? But you have always been prone to being led away, and have followed in turn every one you meet.” And, so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born an iguana. When he grew up he dwelt in a big burrow in the river bank with a following of many hundreds of other iguanas. Now the Bodhisatta had a son, a young iguana, who was great friends with a chameleon, whom he used to clip and embrace. This intimacy being reported to the iguana king, he sent for his young son and said that such friendship was misplaced, for chameleons were low creatures, and that if the intimacy was persisted in, calamity would befall the whole of the tribe of iguanas. And he enjoined his son to have no more to do with the chameleon. But the son continued in his intimacy. Again and again did the Bodhisatta speak with his son, but finding his words of no avail, and foreseeing danger to the iguanas from the chameleon, he had an outlet cut on one side of their burrow, so that there might be a means of escape in time of need.

Now as time went on, the young iguana grew to a great size, while the chameleon never grew any bigger. And as these mountainous embraces of the young giant grew painful indeed, the chameleon foresaw [1.303] that they would be the death of him if they went on a few days longer, and he resolved to combine with a hunter to destroy the whole tribe of iguanas.
One day in the summer the ants came out after a thunder-storm, and the iguanas darted here and there catching them and eating them. Now there came into the forest an iguana trapper with spade and dogs to dig out iguanas; and the chameleon thought what a haul he would put in the trapper’s way. So he went up to the man, and, lying down before him, asked why he was about in the forest. “To catch iguanas,” was the reply. “Well, I know where there’s a burrow of hundreds of them,” said the chameleon, “bring fire and brushwood and follow me.” And he brought the trapper to where the iguanas dwelt. “Now,” said the chameleon, “put your fuel in there and smoke the iguanas out. Meantime let your dogs be all round and take a big stick in your hand. Then as the iguanas dash out, strike them down and make a pile of the slain.” So saying, the treacherous chameleon withdrew to a spot nearby, where he lay down, with his head up, saying to himself, “This day I shall see the rout of my enemy.”

The trapper set to work to smoke the iguanas out; and fear for their lives drove them helter-skelter from their burrow. As they came out, the trapper knocked them on the head, and if he missed them, they fell a prey to his dogs. And so there was great slaughter among the iguanas. Realising that this was the chameleon’s doing, the Bodhisatta cried, “One should never make friends with the wicked, for such bring sorrow in their train. A single wicked chameleon has proved the bane of all these iguanas.” So saying, he escaped by the outlet he had provided, uttering this verse:

1. “Bad company can never end in good.
Through friendship with one sole chameleon
The tribe of iguanas met their end.” [1.489]

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the chameleon of those days; this traitorous monk was the disobedient young iguana, the son of the Bodhisatta; and I myself the king of the iguanas.”

---

372 Makkhikā may refer to the wings which the ants get in India at the beginning of the rainy season; cf. p. 297.
Ja 142 Sigālajātaka
The Story about the (King of the) Jackals (1s)

Alternative Title: Singālajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta goes round trying to kill the Buddha, who tells a story of the past in which a hunter had tried to fool a jackal into thinking he was dead so he could catch him, but had failed therein, and was destined for hell.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the jackals (sigālarājā), Devadatta = the scoundrel (dhutta).

Keyword: Deceit, Treachery, Animals.

“Your tightening grip.” [1.304] This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta’s going about to kill him. For, hearing the monks talking together as to this in the Dhamma Hall, the Teacher said that, as Devadatta acted now, so he acted in times gone by, yet failed – to his own grievous hurt – of his wicked purpose. And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a jackal, and dwelt in a charnel-grove with a great following of jackals of whom he was king. And at that time there was a festival held at Rājagaha, and a very wet festival it was, with everybody drinking hard. Now a parcel of rogues got hold of victual and drink in abundance, and putting on their best clothes sang and made merry over their fare. By midnight the meat was all gone, though the liquor still held out. Then on one asking for more meat and being told there was none left, said the fellow, “Victuals never lack while I am about. I’ll off to the charnel-grove, kill a jackal prowling about to eat the corpses, and bring back some meat.” So saying he snatched up a club and made his way out of the city by the sewer to the place, where he lay down, club in hand, feigning to be dead. Just then, followed by the other jackals, the Bodhisatta came up and marked the pretended corpse. Suspecting the fraud, he determined to sift the matter. So he went round to the lee side and knew by the scent that the man was not really dead. Resolving to make the man look foolish before leaving him, the Bodhisatta stole near and marked the pretended corpse. Hereon the Bodhisatta stepped back a pace or two and said: “My good man, if you had been dead, you would not have tightened your grip on your club when I was tugging at it, and so have betrayed yourself.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “Your tightening grip upon your club does show
   Your rank imposture – you’re no corpse, I know.”

Finding that he was discovered, the rogue sprang to his feet and flung his club at the Bodhisatta, but missed his aim, “Be off, you brute,” said he, “I’ve missed you this time.” Turning round, the Bodhisatta said: “True you have missed me, but be assured you will not miss the torments of the Great Hell and the sixteen Lesser Hells.”

Empty-handed, the rogue left the cemetery and, after bathing in a ditch, went back into the city by the way he had come.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the rogue of those times, and I the king of the jackals.”

Ja 143 Virocanajātaka

The Story about Shining Forth (1s)

Alternative Title: Virocājātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta makes himself out a Buddha, but loses all his disciples in a stroke. The Buddha tells a story of how a jackal wanted to emulate a lion and soon came to his destruction.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha),
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Dissimulation, Conceit, Animals.

“Your mangled corpse.” This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta’s efforts to pose as a Buddha at Gayāsīsa. For when Absorption left him and he lost the honour and profit which once were his, he in his perplexity asked the Teacher to concede the Five Points. This being refused, he made a schism in the Saṅgha and departed to Gayāsīsa with five hundred young monks, pupils of the Buddha’s two chief disciples, but as yet unversed in the Dhamma and the Regulations. With this following he performed the acts of a separate Saṅgha gathered together within the same precincts. Knowing well the time when the knowledge of these young monks should ripen, the Teacher sent the two elders to them. Seeing these, Devadatta joyfully set to work expounding far into the night with (as he flattered himself) the masterly power of a Buddha. Then posing as a Buddha he said: “The assembly, venerable Sāriputta, is still alert and sleepless. Will you be so good as to think of some Dhamma discourse to address to the monks? My back is aching with my labours, and I must rest it awhile.” So saying he went away to lie down. Then those two chief disciples taught the monks, enlightening them as to the Fruitions and the Paths, till in the end they won them all over to go back to the Bamboo Grove.

Finding the monastery emptied of the monks, Kokālika went to Devadatta and told him how the two disciples had broken up his following and left the monastery empty, “and yet here you still lie asleep,” said he. So saying he stripped off Devadatta’s outer cloth and kicked him on the chest with as little compunction as if he were knocking a roof-peg into a mud-wall. The blood gushed out of Devadatta’s mouth, and ever after he suffered from the effects of the blow.

The Teacher said to Sāriputta, “What was Devadatta doing when you got there?” And Sāriputta answered that, though posing as a Buddha, evil had befallen him. Said the Teacher, “Even as now, Sāriputta, so in former times too has Devadatta imitated me to his own hurt.” Then, at the elder’s request, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a maned lion and dwelt at Gold Den in the Himālayas. Bounding forth one day from his lair, he looked north and west, south and east, and roared aloud as he went in quest of prey. Slaying a large buffalo, he devoured the prime of the carcass, after which he went down to a pool, and having drunk his fill of crystal water turned to go towards his den. Now a hungry jackal, suddenly meeting the lion, and being unable to make his escape, threw himself at the lion’s feet. Being asked what he wanted, the jackal replied, “Lord, let me be your servant.” “Very well,” said the

---

373 The Vinaya account (Cullavagga vii. 4) omits the kicking, simply stating that Kokālika “awoke” Devadatta, and that, at the news of the defection, “warm blood gushed out of Devadatta’s mouth.”
lion, “serve me and you shall feed on prime meat.” So saying, he went with the jackal following to Gold Den. Thenceforth the lion’s leavings fell to the jackal, and he grew fat.

Lying one day in his den, the lion told the jackal to scan the valleys from the mountain top, to see whether there were any elephants or horses or buffaloes about, or any other animals of which he, the jackal, was fond. If any such were in sight, the jackal was to report and say with due obeisance, “Shine forth in your might, Lord.” Then the lion promised to kill and eat, giving a part to the jackal. So the jackal used to climb the heights, and whenever he espied below beasts to his taste, he would report it to the lion, and falling at his feet, say, “Shine forth in your might, Lord.” Hereon the lion would nimbly bound forth and slay the beast, even if it were a rutting elephant, and share the prime of the carcass with the jackal. Glutted with his meal, the jackal would then retire to his den and sleep.

Now as time went on, the jackal grew bigger and bigger till he grew haughty. “Have not I too four legs?” he asked himself. “Why am I a pensioner day by day on others’ bounty? Henceforth I will kill elephants and other beasts, for my own eating. The lion, king of beasts, only kills them because of the formula, ‘Shine forth in your might, Lord.’ I'll make the lion call out to me, ‘Shine forth in your might, jackal,’ and then I'll kill an elephant for myself.” Accordingly he went to the lion, and pointing out that he had long lived on what the lion had killed, told his desire to eat an elephant of his own killing, ending with a request to the lion to let him, the jackal, couch in the lion’s corner in Gold Den while the lion was to climb the mountain to look out for an elephant. The quarry found, he asked that the lion should come to him in the den and say, ‘Shine forth in your might, jackal.’ He begged the lion not to grudge him this much. Said the lion, “Jackal, only lions can kill elephants, nor has the world ever seen a jackal able to cope with them. Give up this fancy, and continue to feed on what I kill.” But say what the lion could, the jackal would not give way, and still pressed his request. So at last the lion gave way, and bidding the jackal couch in the den, climbed the peak and thence espied an elephant in rut. Returning to the mouth of the cave, he said: “Shine forth in your might, jackal.” Then from Gold Den the jackal nimbly bounded forth, looked around him on all four sides, and, thrice raising its howl, sprang at the elephant, meaning to fasten on its head. But missing his aim, he alighted at the elephant’s feet. The infuriated brute raised its right foot and crushed the jackal’s head, trampling the bones into powder. Then pounding the carcass into a mass, and dunging upon it, the elephant dashed trumpeting into the forest. Seeing all this, the Bodhisatta observed, “Now shine forth in your might, jackal,” and uttered this verse:

1. “Your mangled corpse, your brains mashed into clay, Prove how you shone forth in your might today.”

Thus spake the Bodhisatta, and living to a good old age he passed away in the fulness of time to fare according to his deeds.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the jackal of those days, and I the lion.”

Ja 144 Naṅguṭṭhajātaka
The Story about the (Ox) Tail (1s)

In the present the heretics practice all sorts of austerities in hope of sanctity, but the Buddha says it is all to no effect, and tells a story of how once he had been a fireworshipper till one day the fire god proved unable to protect his sacrifice, at which point he abandoned his old practices and took to the Himālayas.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic who quenched the fire (nibbutaggitāpasa).

Present Source: Ja 144 Naṅguṭṭha,
Quoted at: Ja 162 Santhava.

Keywords: False asceticism.

“Vile Jātaveda.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, touching the false austerity of the Ājīvikas, or naked ascetics. Tradition tells us that behind Jetavana they used to practise false austerities. A number of the monks seeing them there painfully squatting on their heels, swinging in the air like bats, reclining on thorns, scorching themselves with five fires, and so forth in [1.308] their various false austerities – were moved to ask the Fortunate One whether any good resulted therefrom. “None whatsoever,” answered the Teacher. “In days

374 See MN 12 Mahāsīhanādasutta, for a catalogue of ascetic austerities, to which early Buddhism was strongly opposed.
gone by, the wise and good went into the forest with their birth-fire, thinking to profit by such austerities; but, finding themselves no better for all their sacrifices to Fire and for all similar practices, straightaway doused the birth-fire with water till it went out. By focusing on the Meditation Object the Super Knowledges and Attainments were gained and a title won to the Brahmā Realm.” So saying he told this story of the past. \{1.494\}

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in the north country, and on the day of his birth his parents lit a birth-fire.

In his sixteenth year they addressed him thus, “Son, on the day of your birth we lit a birth-fire for you. Now therefore choose. If you wish to lead a family life, learn the Three Vedas; but if you wish to attain to the Brahmā Realm, take your fire with you into the forest and there tend it, so as to win Mahābrahmā’s favour and hereafter to enter into the Brahmā Realm.”

Telling his parents that a family life had no charms for him, he went into the forest and dwelt in a hermitage tending his fire. An ox was given him as a fee one day in a border-village, and when he had driven it home to his hermitage, the thought came to him to sacrifice a cow to the Lord of Fire. But finding that he had no salt, and feeling that the Lord of Fire could not eat his meat-offering without it, he resolved to go back and bring a supply from the village for the purpose. So he tied up the ox and set off again to the village.

While he was gone, a band of hunters came up and, seeing the ox, killed it and cooked themselves a dinner. And what they did not eat they carried off, leaving only the tail and hide and the shanks. Finding only these sorry remains on his return, the brahmin exclaimed, “As this Lord of Fire cannot so much as look after his own, how shall he look after me? It is a waste of time to serve him, bringing neither good nor profit.” Having thus lost all desire to worship Fire, he said: “My Lord of Fire, if you cannot manage to protect yourself, how shall you protect me? The meat being gone, you must make shift to fare on this offal.” So saying, he threw on the fire the ox tail and the rest of the robbers’ leavings and uttered this verse:
1. “Vile Jātaveda,\(^{375}\) here’s the tail for you;
   And think yourself in luck to get so much! {1.495}
   The prime meat’s gone; put up with tail today.” [1.309]

So saying the Great Being put the fire out with water and departed to become a recluse. And he won the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and ensured his rebirth in the Brahmā Realm.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “I was the ascetic who in those days quenched the fire.”

Ja 145 Rādhajātaka
The Story about (the Parrot) Rādha (1s)

In the present one monk who ordains after his marriage gradually comes once again under his wife’s power. The Buddha tells a story of the past in which one brahmin’s wife committed adultery as soon as he was away, and how they were powerless to stop her.

The Bodhisatta = (the parrot) Poṭṭhapāda, Ānanda = (his brother) Rādha, the brahmin couple = the same in the past (brāhmaṇo ca brāhmaṇī ca).

Present Source: Ja 423 Indriyajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318
   Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka,
Past Compare: Ja 145 Rādha, Ja 198 Rādha.

Keywords: Attachment, Lust, Animals, Birds.

“How many more?” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about hankering after the wife of one’s mundane life. The incidents of the introductory story will be told in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423].

_The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning temptation by the wife of one’s former days. The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher’s preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an_ ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery. So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left: she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him: taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food: when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now: we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country: be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life; send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

Against his will they took him to the Teacher and told him that he was discontent and wished to go back to worldly life.
The Teacher spoke thus to the monk, “It is impossible to keep a guard over a woman; no guard can keep a woman in the right path. You yourself found in former days that all your safeguards were unavailing; and how can you now expect to have more success?” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a parrot. A certain brahmin in the Kāsi country was as a father to him and to his younger brother, treating them like his own children. Poṭṭhapāda was the Bodhisatta’s name, and Rādha his brother’s.

Now the brahmin had a bold bad wife. And as he was leaving home on business, he said to the two brothers, “If your mother, my wife, is minded to be naughty, stop her.” “We will, papa,” said the Bodhisatta, “if we can; but if we can’t, we will hold our peace.”

Having thus entrusted his wife to the parrots’ charge, the brahmin set out on his business. Every day thenceforth his wife committed adultery; there was no end to the stream of her lovers in and out of the house. Moved by the sight, Rādha said to the Bodhisatta, “Monk, the parting injunction of our father was to stop any misconduct on his wife’s part, and now she does nothing but misconduct herself. Let us stop her.” [1.310] “Monk,” said the Bodhisatta, “your words are the words of folly. You might carry a woman about in your arms and yet she would not be safe. So do not essay the impossible.” And so saying he uttered this verse:

1. “How many more shall midnight bring? Your plan
   Is idle. Naught but wifely love could curb
   Her lust; and wifely love is quite lacking.”

And for the reasons thus given, the Bodhisatta did not allow his brother to speak to the brahmin’s wife, who continued to gad about to her heart’s content during her husband’s absence. On his return, the brahmin asked Poṭṭhapāda about his wife’s conduct, and the Bodhisatta faithfully related all that had taken place.

“Why, father,” he said, “should you have anything more to do with so wicked a woman?” And he added these words, “My father, now that I have reported my mother’s wickedness, we can dwell here no longer.” So saying, he bowed at the brahmin’s feet and flew away with Rādha to the forest.
His lesson ended, the Teacher taught the Four Truths, at the close whereof the monk who hankered after the wife of his mundane life was established in the fruition of the First Path. “This husband and wife,” said the Teacher, “were the brahmin and his wife of those days, Ānanda was Rādha, and I myself Poṭṭhapāda.”

Ja 146 Kākajātaka
The Story about the Crows (emptying the Sea) (1s)

Alternative Title: Samuddakākajātaka (Cst)

In the present some people ordain late in life and persist in going to their families for alms, and lamenting the passing of their wives, but making no progress in the monastic life. The Buddha tells how, in the past, a pair of crows had got drunk on the remains of a sacrifice, and had lost his wife in the ocean, and how he and his friends had tried to empty the ocean with their beaks.

The Bodhisatta = the Sea Devatā (Samuddadevatā),
the old monk = the crow (kāka),
his former wife = the female crow (kākī),
the aged monks = the other crows (sesakākā).

Past Compare: Dhp-a XX.8 Sambahulamahallakatthera.

Keywords: Attachment, Wasted effort, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Our throats are tired.” {1.497} This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a number of aged monks. While they were still of the world, they were rich and wealthy householders of Sāvatthi, all friends of one another; and tradition tells us that while they were engaged in good works they heard the Teacher preach. At once they cried, “We are old; what to us are house and home? Let us join the Saṅgha, and following the Buddha’s lovely dispensation make an end of sorrow.”

So they shared all their belongings amongst their children and families, and, leaving their tearful kindred, they came to ask the Teacher to receive them into the Saṅgha. But when admitted, they did not live the life of monks; [1.311] and because of their age they failed to master the Dhamma.\textsuperscript{376}

As in their life as householders, so now too when they were monks they lived together, building themselves a cluster of neighbouring huts on the skirts of the monastery. Even when they went in quest of alms, they generally made for their wives’ and children’s houses and ate there. In particular, all these old men were maintained by the bounty of the wife of one of their number, to whose house each brought what he had received and there ate it, with sauces and curries which she furnished.

An illness having carried her off, the aged monks went their way back to the monastery, and falling on one another’s necks walked about bewailing the death of their benefactress, the giver of sauces. The noise of their lamentation brought the monks to the spot to know what ailed them. And the aged men told how their kind benefactress was dead, and that they wept because they had lost her and should never see her like again.

Shocked at such impropriety, the monks talked together in the Dhamma Hall about the cause of the old men’s sorrow, and they told the Teacher too, on his entering the Hall and asking what they were discussing. “Ah, monks,” said he, “in times past, also, this same woman’s death made them go about weeping and wailing; in those days she was a crow and was drowned in the sea, and these were toiling hard to empty all the water out of the sea in order to get her out, when the wise of those days saved them.” And so saying he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Sea Devatā. Now a crow with his mate came down in quest of food to the sea-shore where, just before, certain persons had been offering to the Nāgas a sacrifice of milk, and rice, and fish, and meat and strong drink and the like. Up came the crow and with his mate ate freely of the elements of the sacrifice, and drank a great deal of the spirits. So they both got very drunk. Then they wanted to disport themselves in the sea, and were trying to swim on the surf, when a wave swept the hen-crow out to sea and a fish came and gobbled her up.

\textsuperscript{376} Buddhism combined reverence for age with mild contempt for aged novices who, after a mundane life, vouchsafed the rest of their days and faculties to a creed only to be mastered by hard thinking and ardent zeal.

“Oh, my poor wife is dead,” cried the crow, bursting into tears and lamentations. Then a crowd of crows were drawn by his wailing to the spot to learn what ailed him. And when he told them how his wife had been carried out to sea, they all began with one voice to lament. Suddenly the thought struck them that they were stronger than the sea and that all they had to do was to empty it out and rescue their comrade! So they set to work with their bills to empty the sea out by mouthfuls, betaking themselves to dry land to rest so soon as their throats were sore with the salt water. And so they toiled away till their mouths and jaws were dry and inflamed and their eyes bloodshot, and they were ready to drop for weariness. Then in despair they turned to one another and said that it was in vain they laboured to empty the sea, [1.312] for no sooner had they got rid of the water in one place than more flowed in, and there was all their work to do over again; they would never succeed in baling the water out of the sea. And, so saying, they uttered this verse:

1. “Our throats are tired, our mouths are sore;
The sea refilleth evermore.”

Then all the crows fell to praising the beauty of her beak and eyes, her complexion, figure and sweet voice, saying that it was her excellencies that had provoked the sea to steal her from them. But {1.499} as they talked this nonsense, the Sea Devatā made a fearsome sight appear from the sea and so put them all to flight. In this wise they were saved.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “The aged monk’s wife was the female crow of those days, and her husband the male crow; the other aged monks were the rest of the crows, and I the Sea Devatā.”

Ja 147 Pupharattajātaka
The Story about the Red Flower (1s)

In the present one monk still longs for his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of the two of them in a previous life, and how her insistence on getting what she wanted resulted in his painful death, while he regretted not fulfilling her desire.

The Bodhisatta = the Air Devatā (Ākāsaṭṭhadevatā),
The husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatika).

Present And Past Source: Ja 147 Puppharatta, Quoted at: Ja 297 Kāmavilāpa.

Keywords: Attachment, Regret, Devas, Women.

“I count it not as pain.” This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a monk who was overcome by passion. Being questioned by the Teacher, he admitted his frailty, explaining that he longed for the wife of his mundane life, “For, oh sir!” said he, “she is so sweet a woman that I cannot live without her.”

“Monk,” said the Teacher, “she is harmful to you. She it was that in former days was the means whereby you were impaled on a stake; and it was for bewailing her at your death that you were reborn in hell. Why then do you now long after her?”

And so saying, he told the following story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born an Air Devatā. Now in Benares there was held the night-festival of Kattikā; the city was decorated like a city of the gods, and the whole people kept holiday. And a poor man had only a couple of coarse cloths which he had washed and pressed till they were in a hundred, nay, a thousand creases. But his wife said: “My husband, I want [1.313] a safflower-coloured cloth to wear outside and one to wear underneath, as I go about at the festival hanging round your neck.”

“How are poor people like us to get safflowers?” said he. “Put on your nice clean attire and come along.”

“If I can’t have them dyed with safflower, I don’t want to go at all,” said his wife. “Get some other woman to go to the festival with you.”

“Now why torment me like this? How are we to get safflowers?”

“Where there’s a will, there’s a way,” retorted the woman. “Are there no safflowers in the king’s conservatories?” {1.500}

“Wife,” said he, “the king’s conservatories are like a pool haunted by a Rakkhasa. There’s no getting in there, with such a strong guard on the watch. Give over this fancy, and be content with what you’ve got.”
“But when it’s night-time and dark,” said she, “what’s to stop a man’s going where he pleases?”

As she persisted in her entreaties, his love for her at last made him give way and promise she should have her wish. At the hazard of his own life, he sallied out of the city by night and got into the conservatories by breaking down the fence. The noise he made in breaking the fence roused the guard, who turned out to catch the thief. They soon caught him and with blows and curses put him in fetters. In the morning he was brought before the king, who promptly ordered him to be impaled alive. Off he was hauled, with his hands tied behind his back, and led out of the city to execution to the sound of the execution-drum, and was impaled alive. Intense were his agonies; and, to add to them, the crows settled on his head and pecked out his eyes with their dagger-like beaks. Yet, heedless of his pain, and thinking only of his wife, the man murmured to himself, “Alas, I shall miss going to the festival with you arrayed in safflower-coloured cloths, with your arms twined round my neck.” So saying, he uttered this verse:

1. “I count it not as pain that, here impaled,
   By crows I’m torn. My heartfelt pain is this,
   That my dear wife will not keep holiday
   Attired in bright raiment of ruddy dye.”

And as he was babbling thus about his wife, he died and was reborn in hell.

His lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “This husband and wife were the husband and wife of those days also, and I was the Air Devatā who made their story known.”

Ja 148 Sigālajātaka
The Story about the (Greedy) Jackal (1s)

Alternative Title: Singālajātaka (Cst)

In the present five hundred monks who have recently left the lay life are seized by lust. When the Buddha understands this, he preaches about the dangers of evil thoughts, and tells a story of a jackal who was so greedy he lost all his hair and almost lost his life.

The Bodhisatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Greed, Desire, Animals.
“Once bitten, twice shy.” [1.314] [1.501] This story was told by the Teacher when at Jetavana, about subduing desires.

We are told that some five hundred rich friends, sons of merchants of Sāvatthi, by listening to the Teacher's teachings were led to give their hearts to the dispensation, and that joining the Saṅgha they lived in Jetavana in the part that Anāthapiṇḍika paved with gold pieces laid side by side.377

Now in the middle of a certain night thoughts of lust took hold of them, and, in their distress, they set themselves to lay hold once again of the sensual desires they had renounced. In that hour the Teacher raised aloft the lamp of his omniscience to discover what manner of passion had hold of the monks in Jetavana, and, reading their hearts, perceived that lust and desire had sprung up within them. Like as a mother watches over her only child, or as a one-eyed man is careful of the one eye left him, even so watchful is the Teacher over his disciples; at morning or evening, at whatsoever hour their passions war against them, he will not let his faithful be overpowered but in that self-same hour subdues the raging sensual desires that beset them. Wherefore the thought came to him, “This is like when thieves break into the city of an emperor; I will unfold the Dhamma straightaway to these monks, to the end that, subduing their sensual desires, I may raise them to Arahatship.”

So he came forth from his perfumed chamber, and in sweet tones called by name for the venerable elder, Ānanda, Treasurer of the Dhamma. And the elder came and with due obeisance stood before the Teacher to know his pleasure. Then the Teacher bade him assemble together in his perfumed chamber all the monks who dwelt in that quarter of Jetavana. Tradition says that the Teacher’s thought was that if he summoned only those five hundred monks, they would conclude that he was aware of their lustful mood, and would be debarred by their agitation from receiving the Dhamma; accordingly he summoned all the monks who dwelt there. And the elder took a key and went from cell to cell summoning the monks till all were assembled in the perfumed chamber. Then he made ready the Buddha-seat. In stately dignity like Mount Sineru resting on the solid earth, the Teacher seated himself on the Buddha-seat, making a glory shine round him of paired garlands upon garlands of six-coloured light, which divided into masses of the size of a platter, of the size of a canopy, and of the size of a tower, until, like shafts of lightning, the rays reached to the heavens above. It was just like when the sun rises, stirring the ocean to the depths.

377 Or ‘paved with crores.’ See Vin Cv vi. 4. 9, translated in Sacred Books of the East, Volume xx., page 188.

With reverent obeisance and reverent hearts, the monks entered and took their seats around him, encompassing him as it were within an orange curtain. Then in tones as of Mahābrahma the Teacher \{1.502\} said: “Monks, a monk should not harbour the three evil thoughts – sensuality, ill-will and cruelty. Never let it be imagined that wicked desires are a trivial matter. For such desires are like an enemy; and an enemy is no trivial matter, but, given opportunity, works only destruction. Even so a desire, though small at its first arising, has only to be allowed to grow, in order to work utter destruction. Desire is like poison in food, like the itch in the skin, like a viper, like the thunderbolt of Sakka, ever to be shunned, ever to be feared. Whenevery desire arises, forthwith, without finding a moment’s harbourage in the heart, it should be expelled by thought and reflection – like as a raindrop rolls at once off the leaf of the lotus. The wise of former times so hated even a slight desire that they crushed it out before it could grow larger.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was reborn into life as a jackal and dwelt in the forest by the riverside. Now an old elephant died by the banks of the Ganges, and the jackal, finding the carcass, congratulated himself on lighting upon such a store of meat. First he bit the trunk, but that was like biting a plough-handle. “There’s no eating here,” said the jackal and took a bite at a tusk. But that was like biting bones. Then he tried an ear, but that was like chewing the rim of a winnowing-basket. So he fell to on the stomach, but found it as tough as a grain-basket. The feet were no better, for they were like a mortar. Next he tried the tail, but that was like the pestle. “That won’t do either,” said the jackal; and having failed elsewhere to find a toothsome part, he tried the rear and found that like eating a soft cake. “At last,” said he, “I’ve found the right place,” and ate his way right into the belly, where he made a plenteous meal off the kidneys, heart and the rest, quenching his thirst with the blood. And when night came on, he lay down inside.
As he lay there, the thought came into the jackal’s mind, “This carcass is both meat and house to me, and wherefore should I leave it?” So there he stopped, and dwelt in the elephant’s inwards, eating away. Time wore on till the summer sun and the summer winds dried and shrank the elephant’s hide, {1.503} until the entrance by which the jackal had got in was closed and the interior was in utter darkness. Thus the jackal was, as it were, cut off from the world and confined in the interspace between the worlds. After the hide, the flesh dried up and the blood was exhausted. In a frenzy of despair, he rushed to and fro beating against his prison walls in the fruitless endeavour to escape. But as he bobbed up and down inside like a ball of rice in a boiling saucepan, soon a tempest broke and the downpour moistened the shell of the carcass and restored it to its former state, till light shone like a star through the way by which the jackal had got in. “Saved! Saved!” cried the jackal, and, backing into the elephant’s head made a rush headfirst at the outlet. He managed to get through, it is true, but only by leaving all his hair on the way. And first he ran, then he halted, and then sat down and surveyed his hairless body, now smooth as a palm-stem. “Ah!” he exclaimed, “this misfortune has befallen me because of my greed and my greed alone. Henceforth I will not be greedy nor ever again get into [1.316] the carcass of an elephant.” And his terror found expression in this verse:

1. “Once bitten, twice shy. Ah, great was my fear!
   Of elephants’ inwards henceforth I'll steer clear.”

And with these words the jackal made off, nor did he ever again so much as look either at that or at any other elephant’s carcass. And thenceforth he was never greedy again.

His lesson ended, the Teacher said: “Monks, never let desires take root in the heart but pluck them out wheresoever they spring up.” {1.504} Having preached the Four Truths, at the close whereof those five hundred monks became an Arahat and the rest won varying lesser degrees of emancipation, the Teacher identified the Jātaka as follows, “I was myself the jackal of those days.”
The Section with One Verse – 624

Ja 149 Ekapaṇḍajātaka
The Story about One Leaf (1s)

In the present one cruel prince is cured of his wickedness by the teaching of the Buddha, who then tells a similar story of the past whereby he cured one prince of his bad ways with a simile of a bitter leaf.

The Bodhisatta = the advising ascetic (ovādadāyakatāpasa), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā), the Licchavi prince = the corrupt prince (duṭṭhalakumāra).

Keywords: Cruelty, Passion, Devas.

“If poison lurk.” This story was told about the Licchavi prince Duṭṭha of Vesālī by the Teacher when he was living in the gabled house in the great forest near Vesālī. In those days Vesālī enjoyed marvellous prosperity. A triple wall encompassed the city, each wall a league distant from the next, and there were three gates with watch-towers. In that city there were always seven thousand seven hundred and seven kings to govern the kingdom, and a like number of viceroy, generals, and treasurers. Among the kings’ sons was one known as Duṭṭhalicchavikumāra [Prince Wicked of the Licchavis], a fierce, passionate and cruel young man, always punishing, like an enraged viper. Such was his passionate nature that no one could say more than two or three words in his presence; and neither parents, kindred, nor friends could make him better. So at last his parents resolved to bring the ungovernable youth to the Supreme Buddha, realising that none but he could possibly tame their son’s fierce spirit. So they brought him to the Teacher, whom, with due obeisance, they besought to read the youth a lecture.

Then the Teacher addressed the prince and said: “Prince, human beings should not be passionate or cruel or ferocious. The fierce man is one who is harsh and unkind alike to the mother that bore him, to his father and child, to his brothers and sisters, and to his wife, friends and kindred; inspiring terror like a viper darting forward to bite, like a robber springing on his victim in the forest, like a Yakkha advancing to devour, the fierce man straightaway will be reborn after this life in hell or other place of punishment; and even in this life, [1.317] however much adorned he is, he looks ugly. Be his face beautiful as the orb of the moon at the full, yet is it loathed as a lotus scorched by flames, as a disc of gold overworn with filth. It is such rage that drives men to slay themselves with the sword, to take poison, to hang themselves, and to throw themselves from precipices; and so it comes to pass that, meeting their death by reason of their own rage, they are reborn into torment. So too they who injure others, are hated even in this life and shall for their defilements pass at the body’s death to hell and punishment; and when once more they are born as men, disease and sickness of eye and ear and of every kind ever beset them, from their birth onward. Wherefore let all men show kindness and be doers of good, and then assuredly hell and punishment have no fears for then.”

Such was the power of this one lecture upon the prince that his pride was humbled forthwith; his arrogance and selfishness passed from him, and his heart was turned to kindness and love. Nevermore did he revile or strike, but became gentle as a snake with drawn fangs, as a crab with broken claws, as a bull with broken horns.

Marking this change of mood, the monks talked together in the Dhamma Hall of how the Licchavi prince Duṭṭha, whom the ceaseless exhortations of his parents could not curb, had been subdued and humbled with a single exhortation by the Supreme Buddha, and how this was like taming six rutting elephants at once. Well had it been said that, “The elephant-tamer, monks, guides the elephant he is breaking in, making it to go to right or left, backward or forward, according to his will; in like manner the horse-tamer and the ex-tamer with horses and oxen; and so too the Tathāgata, the Supreme Buddha, guides the man he would train aright, guides him whithersoever he wills along any of the eight directions, and makes his pupil discern shapes external to himself. Such is the Buddha and he alone,” – and so forth, down to the words – “He that is hailed as chief of the trainers of men, supreme in bowing men to the yoke of Dhamma.”

And here the Teacher entered the Hall and questioned them as to what they were discussing. Then they told him, and he said: “Monks, this is not the first time that a single exhortation of mine has conquered the prince; the like happened before.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

378 [See MN 137 Saḷāyatanavibhaṅgasutta.]
In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as a brahmin in the north country, and when he grew up he first learned the Three Vedas and all learning, at Taxila, and for some time lived a mundane life. But when his parents died he became a recluse, dwelling in the Himālayas, and attained the Super Knowledges and Attainments. There he dwelt a long time, till need of salt and other necessaries of life brought him back to the paths of men, and he came to Benares, where he took up his quarters in the royal pleasure gardens. Next day he dressed himself with care and pains, and in the best garb of an ascetic went in quest of alms to the city \[1.506\] and came to the king's gate. The king was sitting down and saw the Bodhisatta from the window and marked within himself how the ascetic, wise in heart and soul, fixing his gaze immediately before him, moved on in lion-like majesty, as though at every \[1.318\] footprint he were depositing a purse of a thousand pieces. “If goodness dwell anywhere,” thought the king, “it must be in this man's breast.” So summoning a courtier, he bade him bring the ascetic into the presence. And the courtier went up to the Bodhisatta and with due obeisance, took his alms-bowl from his hand. “How now, your excellency?” said the Bodhisatta. “The king sends for your reverence,” replied the courtier. “My dwelling,” said the Bodhisatta, “is in the Himālayas, and I have not the king's favour.”

So the courtier went back and reported this to the king. Bethinking him that he had no confidential adviser at the time, the king bade the Bodhisatta be brought, and the Bodhisatta consented to come.

The king greeted him on his entrance with great courtesy and bade him be seated on a golden throne beneath a royal parasol. And the Bodhisatta was fed on dainty food which had been made ready for the king's own eating.

Then the king asked where the ascetic lived and learned that his home was in the Himālayas. “And where are you going now?” “In search, sire, of a habitation for the rainy season.”

“Why not take up your abode in my pleasure gardens?” suggested the king. Then, having gained the Bodhisatta's consent, and having eaten food himself, he went with his guest to the pleasure gardens and there had a hermitage built with a cell for the day, and a cell for the night. This dwelling was provided with the eight requisites of an ascetic. Having thus installed the Bodhisatta, the king put him under the charge of the gardener and went back to the palace. So it came to pass that the Bodhisatta dwelt thenceforward in the king’s pleasure gardens, and twice or thrice every day the king came to visit him.

Now the king had a fierce and passionate son who was known as Duṭṭhakumāra [Prince Wicked], who was beyond the control of his father and kinsfolk. Councillors, brahmins and citizens all pointed out to the young man the error of his ways, but in vain. He paid no heed to their counsels. And the king felt that the only hope of reclaiming his son lay with the virtuous ascetic. So as a last chance he took the prince and handed him over to the Bodhisatta to deal with. Then the Bodhisatta walked with the prince in the pleasure gardens till they came to where a seedling Nimb tree was growing, on which as yet grew but two leaves, one on one side, one on the other.

“Taste a leaf of this little tree, prince,” said the Bodhisatta, “and see what it is like.”

The young man did so; but scarce had he put the leaf in his mouth, when he spat it out with an oath, and hawked and spat to get the taste out of his mouth, [1.319]

“What is the matter, prince?” asked the Bodhisatta.

“Sir, today this tree only suggests a deadly poison; but, if left to grow, it will prove the death of many persons,” said the prince, and forthwith plucked up and crushed in his hands the tiny growth, reciting these lines:

1. “If poison lurk in the baby tree,
   What will the full growth prove to be?”

Then said the Bodhisatta to him, “Prince, dreading what the poisonous seedling might grow to, you have torn it up and rent it asunder. Even as you acted to the tree, so the people of this kingdom, dreading what a prince so fierce and passionate may become when king, will not place you on the throne but uproot you like this Nimb tree and drive you forth to exile. Wherefore take warning by the tree and henceforth show mercy and abound in loving-kindness.”

From that hour the prince’s mood was changed. He grew humble and meek, merciful and overflowing with kindness. Abiding by the Bodhisatta’s counsel, when at his father’s death he came to be king, he abounded in generosity and other good works, and in the end passed away to fare according to his deeds.
His lesson ended, the Teacher said: “So, monks, this is not the first time that I have tamed prince Duṭṭha; I did the same in days gone by.” Then he identified the Jātaka by saying: “The Licchavi prince Duṭṭha of today was the prince Duṭṭha of the story, Ānanda the king, and I the ascetic who exhorted the prince to goodness.”

Ja 150 Sañjīvajātaka
The Story about (the Brahmin Youth) Sañjīva (1s)

In the present king Ajātasattu is afraid that his support of Devadatta will bring him a like reward and the earth will open up and swallow him. The Buddha tells a story of how in a previous life, when given a spell of resuscitation, an earlier incarnation of the king had used it to bring a tiger back to life, who had promptly killed him.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo),
King Ajātasattu = the young brahmin who brought the tiger back to life (matabyagghuṭṭhāpanako māṇavo).

Keywords: False teachers, Misused power, Animals.

“Befriend a villain.” This story was told by the Teacher when at the Bamboo Grove, about king Ajātasattu’s adherence to false teachers.³⁷⁹ For he believed in that rancorous foe of the Buddhas, the base and wicked Devadatta, and in his infatuation, wishing to do honour to Devadatta, expended a vast sum in erecting a monastery at Gayāśīsa. And following Devadatta’s wicked counsels, he slew [1.320] the good and virtuous old king his father, who had entered on the Paths, thereby destroying his own chance of winning like goodness and virtue, and bringing great woe upon himself.

Hearing that the earth had swallowed up Devadatta, he feared a like fate for himself. And such was the frenzy of his terror that he did not look out for his kingdom’s welfare, slept not upon his bed, but ranged abroad quaking in every limb, like a young elephant in an agony of pain. In fancy he saw the earth yawning for him, and the flames of hell darting forth; he could see himself fastened down on a bed of burning metal with iron lances being thrust into his body. Like a wounded chicken, not for one instant was he at peace.

³⁷⁹ See Vin Cv vii. 3. 4 – (translated in Sacred Books of the East xx. pp. 242 &c.). In the Sāmaññaphalasutta [DN 2] the Dīghanikāya gives the incidents of this introductory story and makes the king confess to having killed his father.

The desire came on him to see the Supreme Buddha, to be reconciled to him, and to ask guidance of him; but because of the magnitude of his transgressions he shrank from coming into the Buddha's presence. When the Kattikā [Autumn] festival came round, and by night Rājagaha was illuminated and adorned like a city of the gods, the king, as he sat on high upon a throne of gold, saw Jīvaka Komārabhacca sitting near. The idea flashed across his mind to go with Jivaka to the Buddha, but he felt he could not say outright that he would not go alone but wanted Jivaka to take him. No; the better course would be, after praising the beauty of the night, \{1.509\} to propose sitting at the feet of some sage or brahmin, and to ask the courtiers what teacher can give the heart peace. Of course, they would severally praise their own masters; but Jivaka would be sure to extol the Supreme Buddha; and to the Buddha the king with Jivaka would go. So he burst into fivefold praises of the night, saying: “How fair, sirs, is this clear cloudless night! How beautiful! How charming! How delightful! How lovely! What sage or brahmin shall we seek out, to see if haply he may give our hearts peace?”

Then one minister recommended Pūraṇa Kassapa, another Makkhali Gosāla, and others again Ajita Kesakambala, Kakudha Kaccāyana, Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, or Nigaṇṭha Nāṭhaputta. All these names the king heard in silence, waiting for his chief minister, Jīvaka, to speak. But Jīvaka, suspecting that the king’s real object was to make him speak, kept silence in order to make sure. At last the king said: “Well, my good Jīvaka, why have you nothing to say?” At the word Jīvaka arose from his seat, and with hands clasped in adoration towards the Fortunate One, cried, “Sire, yonder in my mango-grove dwells the Supreme Buddha with twelve hundred and fifty \(^{381}\) monks. This is the high fame that has arisen concerning him.” And here he proceeded to recite the nine titles of honour ascribed to him, \(^{380}\) These exclamations are misprinted as verse in the Pāli text. It is curious that the order is somewhat transposed here, as compared with the opening words of the Sāmaññaphalasutta.

---

\(^{381}\) [Mistakenly translated as thirteen hundred and fifty in the original.]
beginning with “Fortunate.” When he had further shown how from his birth onwards the Buddha’s powers had surpassed all the earlier presages and expectations, Jivaka said: “Unto him, the Fortunate One, let the king repair, to hear the truth and to put questions.”

His object thus attained, the king asked Jivaka to have the elephants got ready and went in royal state to Jivaka’s mango-grove, where he found in the perfumed pavilion the Tathāgata amid the Saṅgha, which was itself as tranquil as the ocean in perfect repose. Look where he would, the king’s eye saw only the endless ranks of the monks, exceeding in numbers any following he had ever seen. Pleased with the demeanour of the monks, the king bowed low and spoke words of praise. Then saluting the Buddha, he seated himself, and asked him the question, “What is the fruit of the ascetic life?” And the Fortunate One gave utterance to the Sāmaññaphala Sutta in two sections. Glad at heart, the king made his peace with the Buddha at the close of the Sutta, and rising up departed with solemn obeisance. Soon after the king had gone, the Teacher addressed the monks and said: “Monks, this king is uprooted; had not this king slain in lust for dominion that righteous ruler his father, he would have won the Arahat’s clear vision of the Dhamma, before he rose from his seat. But for his sinful favouring of Devadatta he has missed the fruit of the First Path.”

Next day the monks talked together of all this and said that Ajātasattu’s crime of parricide, which was due to that wicked and sinful Devadatta whom he had favoured, had lost him safety; and that Devadatta had been the king’s ruin. At this point the Teacher entered the Dhamma Hall and asked the subject of their conversation. Being told, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time, monks, that 382 [It refers to the well known chant: *Iti pi so Bhagavā 1) Arahanī 2) Sammāsambuddho 3) Vijjācaraṇasampanno 4) Sugato 5) Lokavidū 6) Anuttaro purisadammasārathi 7) Satthā devamanussānam 8) Buddhho 9) Bhagavā.]

---

383 [Although the discourse is not formerly divided into two bhāṇavāras, it is approximately that length.]

384 Unlike the preceding sentence, this last sentence does not occur in the Dīghanikāya. The interpolation is interesting as suggesting the license with which words were put into the Master’s mouth by Buddhist authors.
Ajātasattu has suffered for favouring the sinful; like conduct in the past cost him his life.” So saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into the family of a wealthy brahmin. Arriving at years of discretion, he went to study at Taxila, where he received a complete education. In Benares as a teacher he enjoyed world-wide fame and had five hundred young brahmins as pupils. Among these was one named Sañjīva, to whom the Bodhisatta taught the spell for raising the dead to life. But though the young man was taught this, he was not taught the counter charm. Proud of his new power, he went with his fellow-pupils to the forest wood-gathering, and there came on a dead tiger.

“Now see me bring the tiger to life again,” said he. “You can’t,” said they. “You look and you will see me do it.” “Well, if you can, do so,” said they and climbed up a tree forthwith.

Then Sañjīva repeated his charm and struck the dead tiger with a potsherd. Up started the tiger and quick as lightning sprang at Sañjīva and bit him on the throat, killing him outright. Dead fell the tiger then and there, and dead fell Sañjīva too at the same spot. So there the two lay dead side by side.

The young brahmins took their wood and went back to their master to whom they told the story. “My dear pupils,” said he, “mark herein how by reason of showing favour to the sinful and paying honour where it was not due, he has brought all this calamity upon himself.” And so saying he uttered this verse: {1.511}

1. “Befriend a villain, aid him in his need,
And, like that tiger which Sañjīva raised
To life, he straight devours you for your pains.” [1.322]

Such was the Bodhisatta’s lesson to the young brahmins, and after a life of generosity and other good deeds he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

---

385 The gloss suggests that sañjīviko, (= ’of or belonging to Sañjīva’) is an acrid pun on the meaning of Sañjīva, which means ‘alive’ – the tiger having been restored to life by Sañjīva, whom it bereft of life by way of reward.
His lesson ended the Teacher identified the Jātaka by saying: “Ajātasattu was the young brahmin of those days who brought the dead tiger to life, and I the world-famed teacher.”

End of the First Book
The Jātaka, Volume II

or, stories of the Buddha's former births.
translated from the Pāli by various hands
under the editorship of
Professor E. B. Cowell.
Vol. II. translated by W.H.D. Rouse, M. A.,
sometime fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge.
[1895]
revised by
Ānandajoti Bhikkhu
November 2021

Manibvs
Gvillelmi Robertson Smith
Svmmo Desiderio
D. D. D.
Preface

In a book like this, [2.vii] where a translation is made for the first time from a language little known, there must be mistakes. For any such I ask the indulgence of scholars; and assure them that no trouble has been spared to get accuracy. A word or phrase dismissed in a footnote as obscure or inexplicable has often cost hours of research before it has been given up.

Although it has not been possible to reproduce the rhythm of the verses, yet I hope something of the same effect has been given by keeping in each story to one metre where the Pāli has but one, and changing where it changes; and a pretty consistent rule has been observed, of giving long lines for long and short for short, two short lines being held equivalent to one long. But in different stories the same metre has often been differently translated for convenience.

For parallels I have looked through all the Pāli books as far as they are printed; but I have not had time to read them carefully, and many must have escaped me. The notes must then not be considered as exhaustive. Other illustrations have been noted where I have come across them, and I hope that students of folk-tales may be interested in one unpublished variant which I have been able to give (page 110). [2.viii]

It remains to acknowledge my indebtedness to those friends who have helped me. The members of our ‘Guild’ who are resident at Cambridge have been so kind as to revise the proofs; and to them I owe very many corrections and improvements. Mr. R. Chalmers lent me a MS. translation of a few of the ‘Stories of the Past,’ for which I thank him. But my chief thanks are due to my Teacher, Professor Cowell; who, for many years past, has with unfailing patience and kindliness helped me in my Oriental studies. I feel that what I know of these things has been his gift to me almost entirely; and I hope he may consider this book not all unworthy of his teaching.

W. H. D. Rouse
Christ’s College, Cambridge,
July 30, 1895.
Book II. Dukanipāta
The Section with Two Verses

Ja 151 Rājovādajātaka
The Story about the Advice to a King (2s)

In the present the king of Kosala sits impartially in court judging the cases, before going to see the Buddha and declaring his acts. The Buddha tells a story of two just kings of old and how precedence was decided when they met on a bridge one day.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
Sāriputta = the king of Benares's charioteer (Bārāṇasirāñño sārathi), Ānando = king Mallika (Mallikarājā),
Moggallāna = the king of Mallika’s charioteer (Mallikarañño sārathi).

Keywords: Justice, Righteousness.

“Rough to the rough.” [2.1] (2.1) This story the Teacher told while he was living in Jetavana, to explain how a king was taught a lesson. This will be set forth in the Tesakuṇājātaka [Ja 521].

It is said that one day the king of Kosala had just passed sentence in a very difficult case involving moral wrong. After his meal, with hands not yet dry, he proceeded in his splendid chariot to visit the Teacher; and the king saluted him, his feet beautiful like the open lotus flower, and sat down aside.

Then the Teacher addressed him in these words. “Why, my lord king, what brings you here at this time of day?” “Sir,” said he, “I missed my time because I was 386 Fausböll, Ten Jātakas, pp. 1 and 57; Rhys Davids, Buddhist Birth Stories, p. xxii. A similar contest of two minstrels occurs in the Kalevala (Crawford’s translation, i. p. 30). The young drives fiercely into the old, who says ‘Thou shouldst give me all the highway, for I am the older.’ ‘What matters that?’ says the other, ‘let the least wise give place.’ There they stand and each sings his legends by way of deciding the matter.

---

387 [The reference seems to be wrong, and I have not been able to find a suitable story elsewhere; the story in any case seems to be complete.]

388 Reading, with Childers (Diet. p. 613), agatigataṁ.
sitting on a difficult case, involving moral wrong; now I have finished it, and eaten, and here I am, with my hands hardly dry, to wait upon you.” “My lord king,” replied the Teacher, “to judge a cause with justice and impartiality is the right thing; that is the way to heaven. Now when you first have the advice of a being all-wise like me, it is no wonder if you should judge your case fairly and justly; but the wonder is when kings have only had the advice of scholars who are not all-wise, and yet have decided fairly and justly, avoiding the Four Ways of Wickedness, and observing the Ten Royal Virtues, and after ruling justly have gone to swell the hosts of heaven.” Then, at the king’s request, he told a story of the past. [2.2]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived by his queen consort; and the ceremonies proper to her state having been duly done,\textsuperscript{389} she was afterwards safely delivered. On his name-day, the name they gave him was prince Brahmadatta.

In course of time, he grew up, and at sixteen years went to Taxila\textsuperscript{390} for his education; where he mastered all branches of learning, and on his father’s death he became king in his stead, and ruled with uprightness and all rectitude, administering justice with no regard had to his own will or whim. And as he ruled thus justly, his ministers on their part were also just; thus, while all things were justly done, there was none who brought a false suit into court. Presently all the bustle of suitors ceased within the precincts of the palace; all day long the ministers might sit on the bench, and go away without seeing a single suitor. The courts were deserted.

Then the Bodhisatta thought to himself, “Because of my just government not one suitor comes to try issue in court; the old hubbub is quiet; the courts of law are deserted. Now I must search whether I have any fault in me; which, if I find, I will eschew it, and live a good life hereafter.” From that time he tried continually to find someone who would tell him of a fault; but of all who were about him at court he could not find one such; nothing could he hear but good of himself. “Perhaps,” he thought, “they are all so much afraid of me that they say no ill of me but only good,” and so he went about to try those who were outside his walls. But with these it was just the same. Then he made inquisition of the citizens at large, and outside the city questioned those who belonged to the suburbs at the four city gates. Still there was none who had any fault to find; nothing but praises could he hear. Lastly, with intent to try the countryside, he entrusted all government to his ministers, and mounted in his carriage, and taking only the driver with him, left the city in disguise. All the country he traversed, even to the frontier; [2.3] but not a fault-finder could he light upon; all he could hear was only his own praises. So back he turned from the marches, and set his face homewards again by the highroad.

\textsuperscript{389} Lit. “protection to the embryo;” doubtless some magical rite.

\textsuperscript{390} The great University town of India; it was in the Punjab.

Now it happened that at this very time Mallika, the king of Kosala, had done the very same thing. He too was a just king, and he had been searching for his faults; but amongst those about him there was none who had any fault to find; and hearing nothing but praise, he had been making enquiry throughout all the country, and had but then arrived at that same spot.

These two met, in a place where the carriage road was deeply sunk between two banks, and there was no room for one carriage to pass another. [2.3]

“Get your carriage out of the way!” said king Mallika’s driver to the driver of the king of Benares.

“No, no, driver,” said he, “out of the way with yours! Know that in this carriage sits the great monarch Brahmadatta, lord of the kingdom of Benares!”

“No not, driver!” replied the other, “in this carriage sits the great king Mallika, lord of the realm of Kosala! It is for you to make way, and to give place to the carriage of our king!”

“Why, here’s a king too,” thought the driver of the king of Benares. “What in the world is to be done?” Then a thought struck him; he would enquire what should be the age of the two kings, so that the younger should give way to the elder. And he made enquiry of the other driver how old his king was; but he learned that both were of the same age. Thereupon he asked the extent of this king’s power, wealth, and glory, and all points touching his caste and clan and his family; discovering that both of them had a country three hundred leagues long, and that they were alike in power, wealth, glory, and the nature of their family and lineage. Then he bethought him that place might be given to the better man; so he requested that the other driver should describe his master’s virtues. The man replied by the first verse of poetry following, in which he set forth his monarch’s faults as though they were so many virtues:

1. “Rough to the rough, king Mallika the mild with mildness sways,
Masters the good by goodness, and the bad with badness pays.
Give place, give place, O driver! Such are this monarch’s ways!” [2.4]

“Oh,” said the man of the king of Benares, “is that all you have to say about your king’s virtues?” “Yes,” said the other. “If these are his virtues, what must his vices be?” “Vices be it, then,” said he, “if you will; but let us hear what your king’s virtues may be like!” “Listen then,” rejoined the first, and repeated the second verse:

2. “He conquers wrath by mildness, the bad with goodness sways,
By gifts the miser vanquishes, and lies with truth repays.
Give place, give place, O driver! Such are this monarch’s ways!”

At these words both king Mallika and his driver descended from their carriage, and loosed the horses, and moved it out of the way, to give place to the king of Benares. Then the king of Benares gave good admonition to king Mallika, saying:
“Thus and thus [2.5] must you do,” after which he returned to Benares, and there gave alms and did good all his life, till at the last he went to swell the hosts of heaven. And king Mallika took the lesson to heart; and after traversing the length and breadth of the [2.4] land, and lighting upon none who had any fault to find, returned to his own city; where he gave alms all his life and did good, till at the end he too went to swell the hosts of heaven.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, which he began for the purpose of giving a lesson to the king of Kosala, he identified the Jātaka, “Moggallāna was then the driver of king Mallika, Ānanda was the king, Sāriputta was the driver of the king of Benares, but I myself was the king.”

---

391 Dhp v. 223.
Ja 152 Sigālajātaka

The Story about the Jackal (who was in Love) (2s)

Alternative Title: Singālajātaka (Cst)

In the present a barber falls in love with a highborn lady and dies while his love is unreciprocated. The Buddha tells how, in a past life, a jackal fell in love with a lioness, but was rejected by her; and how her brothers, trying to avenge her, and the jackal himself, all came to a bad end.

The Bodhisatta = the elder lion (jeṭṭhabhātīkasīho), certain elders = the (lion’s) six brothers,
the princess from Licchavi = the youthful lioness (sīhapotikā), the barber’s son = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Attachment, Rejection, Devas, Animals.

“This rashly undertakes.” This story the Teacher told while staying in his gabled chamber, about a barber who lived at Vesāli.

This man, as we are told, used to do shaving and hairdressing and cross-plaiting for the royal household, kings and queens, princes and princesses, indeed he did all of that kind that had to be done. He was a true believer, sheltered in the Three Refuges, resolved to keep the Five Precepts; and from time to time he would listen to the Teacher’s discourses.

One day he set out to do his work in the palace, taking his son with him. The young fellow, seeing a Licchavi girl dressed up fine and grand, like a Devaccharā, fell in love for desire of her. He said to his father, as they left the palace in company, “There is a girl, if I get her, I shall live; but if I don’t, there’s nothing but death for me.” He would not touch a morsel of food, but lay down hugging the bedstead. His father found him and said: “Why, son, don’t set your mind on forbidden fruit. You are a nobody, a barber’s son; this Licchavi girl is a highborn lady. You’re no match for her. I’ll find you somebody else; a girl of your own place and station.” But the lad would not listen to him. Then came mother, brother, and sister, aunt and uncle, all his kinsfolk, and all his friends and companions, trying to pacify him; but pacify him they could not. So he pined and pined away, and lay there until he died.

---

392 Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha.

Then the father performed his obsequies, and did what is usual to do for the spirits of the dead. [2.6] By and by, when the first edge of grief had worn off, he thought he would wait upon the Teacher. Taking a large present of flowers, scents, and perfumes, he repaired to the Great Grove, and did reverence to the Teacher, saluted him, and sat down on one side. “Why have you kept out of sight all this time, layman?” the Teacher asked. Then the man told him what had happened. Said the Teacher, “Ah, layman, ’tis not the first time he has perished by setting his heart on what he must not have; this is only what he has done before.” Then at the layman’s request, he told a story of the past. [2.5]

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a young lion in the region of the Himālayas. Of the same family there were some younger brothers, and one sister; and all of them lived in a Golden Cave.

Now nearby this cave was a Cave of Crystal on a silver hill, where a jackal lived. By and by the lions lost their parents by the stroke of death. Then they used to leave the lioness, their sister, behind in the cave, while they ranged for food; which when they obtained, they would bring it back for her to eat.

Now the jackal had caught sight of this lioness, and fell in love with her; but while the old lion and lioness lived, he could win no access. Now, when the seven brothers went to seek food, out he came from his Crystal Cave, and made all haste to the Golden Cave; where, taking his stand before the young lioness, he addressed her slyly with these seductive and tempting words:

“O lioness, I am a fourfoot creature, and so are you. Therefore do you be my mate, and I will be your husband! We will live together in friendship and amity, and you shall love me always!”

Now on hearing this the lioness thought to herself, “This jackal here is mean amongst beasts, vile, and like a man of low caste: but I am esteemed to be one of royal issue. That he to me should so speak is unseemly and evil. How can I live after hearing such things said? I will hold my breath until I shall die. “Then, bethinking her awhile, “Nay,” said she, “to die so would not be comely. My brothers will soon be home again; I will {2.7} tell them first, and then I will put an end to myself.”

The jackal, finding that no answer came, felt sure she cared nothing for him; so back he went to his Crystal Cave, and lay down in much misery.

Now one of the young lions, having killed a buffalo, or an elephant, or what not, himself ate some of it, and brought back a share for his sister, which he gave her, inviting her to eat. “No, brother,” says she, “not a bite will I eat; for I must die!” “Why must that be?” he asked. And she told him what had happened. “Where is this jackal now?” he asked. She saw him lying in the Crystal Cave, and thinking he was up in the sky, she said: “Why, brother, cannot you see him there on Silver Mountain, lying up in the sky?”

The young lion, unaware that the jackal lay in a Crystal Cave, and deeming that he was truly in the sky, made a spring, as lions do, to kill him, and struck against the crystal: which burst his heart asunder, and falling to the foot of the mountain, he perished straightaway. [2.6]

Then came in another, to whom the lioness told the same tale. This lion did even as the first, and fell dead by the mountain foot.

When six of the brother lions had perished in this way, last of all entered the Bodhisatta. When she had told her story, he enquired where was the jackal now? “There he is,” said she, “up in the sky, above Silver Mountain!” The Bodhisatta thought: “Jackals lying in the sky? Nonsense. I know what it is: he is lying in a Crystal Cave.” So he repaired to the mountain’s foot, and there he saw his six brothers lying dead. “I see how it is,” thought he, “these were all foolish, and lacked the fulness of wisdom; not knowing that this is the Crystal Cave, they beat their hearts out against it, and were killed. This is what comes of acting in rashness without due reflection,” and he repeated the first verse:

---

393 i.e. because of the transparency.
1. “Who rashly undertakes an enterprise,
Not counting all the issue may arise,
Like one who burns his mouth in eating food
Falls victim to the plans he did devise.” [2.8]

After repeating these lines, the lion continued, “My brothers wanted to kill this jackal, but did not have skill in means; so they leapt up too quickly at him, and so came by their death. This I will not do; but I will make the jackal burst his own heart as he lies there in the Crystal Cave.” So he espied out the path whereby the jackal used to go up and down, and turning that way he roared thrice the lion’s roar, that earth and heaven together were all one great roaring! The jackal lying in the Crystal Cave was frightened and astounded, so that his heart burst; and he perished on the spot incontinently.

The Teacher continued, “Thus did this jackal perish on hearing the lion roar.” And, after Fully Awakening, he repeated the second verse:

2. “On Daddara the lion gave a roar,
And made Mount Daddara resound again.
Hard by a jackal lived; he feared full sore
To hear the sound, and burst his heart in twain.” [2.9]

Thus did our lion do this jackal to death. Then he laid his brothers together in one grave, and told the sister they were dead, and comforted her; and he lived the rest of his days in the Golden Cave, until he passed away to the place which his merits had earned for him. [2.7]

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he revealed the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the layman was established in the Fruit of the First Path. “The barber’s son of today was then the jackal; the Licchavi girl was the young lioness; the six younger lions are now six elders; and I myself was the eldest lion.”
Ja 153 Sūkarajātaka\textsuperscript{394}

The Story about the Boar (2s)

In the present after Ven. Sāriputta has given a discourse, one old monk thinks to make himself look good by asking a nonsensical question. Instead, however, he is chased away and falls into a cesspit. The Buddha tells how in a previous life as a boar he had challenged a lion, and, later, realising his mistake, had covered himself in offal to ward off sure death.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha),
the elderly man = the boar.

Keywords: Vanity, Animals.

\textit{“You are a fourfoot.”} This is a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a certain elder well stricken in years.

Once, we are told, there happened to be a night service, and the Teacher had preached standing upon a slab of the jewelled staircase at the door of his scented cell. After delivering a Sugata’s discourse, he retired into his scented chamber; and the Captain of the Dhamma, saluting his Teacher, went back to his own cell again. Mahāmoggallāna too retired to his cell, and after a moment’s rest returned to ask the elder Sāriputta a question. As he asked and asked each question, the Captain of the Dhamma made it all clear, as though he were making the moon rise in the sky. There were present the four classes of disciples,\textsuperscript{395} who sat and heard it all.

Then a thought came into the mind of one aged elder. “Suppose,” he thought: “I can puzzle Sāriputta before all this crowd, by asking him some question? They will all think, ‘What a clever fellow!’ And I shall gain great credit and repute.” So he rose up in the crowd, and stepping near to the elder, stood on one side, and said: “Friend Sāriputta, I too have a question for you; will you let me speak? Give me a decision in discrimination or in undiscrimination, in refutation or in acceptation, in distinction or in counter-distinction.”\textsuperscript{396} The elder looked at him.

\textsuperscript{394} Fausböll, \textit{Ten Jātakas}, pp. 12, 63, 94 (he compares Nos. 278 and 484).
\textsuperscript{395} Monks, nuns, laymen and laywomen.
\textsuperscript{396} These words appear to be nonsense.
“This old man,” he thought, “stands within the sphere of desire still; he is empty, and knows nothing.” He said not a single word to him for very shame; laying his fan down, he rose from his seat, {2.10} and returned to his cell. And elder Moggallāna likewise returned to his cell.

The bystanders jumped up, crying, “Seize this wicked old fellow, who wouldn’t let us hear the sweet words of the sermon!” and they mobbed him. Off he ran, and fell through a hole in the corner of a cesspool just outside the monastery; when he got up he was covered all over with filth. When the people saw him, they felt sorry for it, and went away to the Teacher. He asked, “Why have you come at this unseasonable hour, laymen?” They told him what had happened. “Laymen,” said he, “this is not the only time this old man has been pulled up, and not knowing his own power, pitted himself against the strong, only to be covered all over with filth. Long, long ago he knew not his powers, pitted himself against the strong, and was covered with filth as he is covered now.” Then, at their request, he told them a story of the past. [2.8]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a lion who dwelt in a mountain cave in the Himālayas. Hard by were a multitude of boars, living by a lakeside; and beside the same lake lived a company of ascetics in huts made of leaves and the branches of trees.

One day it so happened that the lion had brought down a buffalo or elephant or some such game; and, after eating what he listed, he went down to drink at this lake. Just as he came out, a sturdy boar happened to be feeding by the side of the water. “He’ll make a meal for me some other day,” thought the lion. But fearing that if the boar saw him, he might never come there again, the lion as he came up out of the water slunk away to the side. This the boar saw; and at once the thought came into his mind, “This is because he has seen me, and is afraid! He dare not come nigh me, and off he runs for fear! This day shall see a fight between me and a lion!” So he raised his head, and made challenge against the lion in the first verse:
1. “You are a fourfoot – so am I: thus, friend, we’re both alike, you see;
   Turn, lion, turn; are you afraid? Why do you run away from me?” [2.11]

   The lion gave ear. “Friend boar,” he said, “today there will be no fight between you and me. But this day next week let us fight it out in this very spot.” And with these words, he departed.

   The boar was highly delighted in thinking how he was to fight a lion; and he told all his kith and kin about it. But the tale only terrified them. “You will be the bane of us all,” they said, “and yourself to boot. You know not what you can do, or you would not be so eager to do battle with a lion. When the lion comes, he’ll be the death of you and all of us as well; do not be so violent!” These words made the boar fear on his part. “What am I to do, then?” he asked. Then the other boars advised him to roll about in the ascetics’ dunghill for the next seven days, and let the muck dry on his body; then on the seventh day he should moisten himself with dewdrops, and be first at the trysting place; he must find how the wind should lie, and get to the windward; and the lion, being a cleanly creature, would spare his life when he had a whiff of him.

   So accordingly he did; and on the day appointed, there he was. No sooner had the lion scented him, and smelt the filth, says he, “Friend boar, a pretty trick this! Were you not all besmeared with filth, I should have had your life this very day. But as it is, bite you I cannot, nor so much as touch you with my foot. Therefore I spare your life.” And then he repeated the second verse:

   2. “O dirty boar, your hide is foul, the stench is horrible to me;
      If you would fight I yield me quite, and own you have the victory.” [2.9]

   Then the lion turned away, and procured his day’s food; and anon, after a drink at the lake, he went back again to his cave on the mountain. And the boar told his kindred how he had beaten the lion! [2.12] But they were terrified for fear the lion should come again another day and be the death of them all. So they ran away and betook them to some other place.

   When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “The boar of those days is now the ancient elder, and I myself was the lion.”
The Section with Two Verses – 646

Ja 154 Uragajātaka
The Story about the Snake (2s)

In the present two persons of high rank are always arguing with each other, and not even the king can prevent them. The Buddha teaches them loving-kindness and they are reconciled. He then tells a story of how he stopped the fighting of a Nāga and a Supaṇṇa in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the great ministers = the Nāga and Supaṇṇa (nāgo ca supaṇṇo ca).

Present Source: Ja 154 Uraga,
Quoted at: Ja 165 Nakula, Ja 273 Kacchapa.

Keywords: Reconciliation, Loving-kindness, Devas.

“Concealed within a stone.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a soldiers’ quarrel.

Tradition tells how two soldiers, in the service of the king of Kosala, of high rank, and great persons at court, no sooner caught sight of one another than they used to exchange ill words. Neither king, nor friends, nor kinsfolk could make them agree.

It happened one day that early in the morning the Teacher, looking around to see which of his disciples were ripe for release, perceived that these two were ready to enter upon the First Path. Next day he went all alone seeking alms in Sāvatthi, and stopped before the door of one of them, who came out and took the Teacher’s bowl; then led him within, and offered him a seat. The Teacher sat, and then enlarged on the profit of cultivating loving-kindness. When he saw the man’s mind was ready, he declared the Truths. This done, the other was established in the Fruit of the First Path. Seeing this, the Teacher persuaded him to take the bowl; then rising he proceeded to the house of the other. Out came the other, and after salutation given, begged the Teacher to enter, and gave him a seat. He also took the Teacher’s bowl, and entered along with him. To him the Teacher lauded the Eleven Blessings of Loving-kindness; and perceiving that his heart was ready, declared the Truths. And this done, he too became established in the Fruit of the First Path.

Thus they were both converted; they confessed their faults one to the other, and asked forgiveness; peaceful and harmonious, they were at one together. That very same day they ate together in the presence of the Fortunate One.

His meal over, the Teacher returned to the monastery. They both returned with him, bearing a rich present of flowers, scents and perfumes, of ghee, honey, and sugar. The Teacher, having preached of duty before the Saṅgha, and uttered a Sugata’s discourse, retired to his scented chamber.

Next morning, the monks talked the matter over in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend,” one would say to another, “our Teacher subdues the unsubdued. Why, here are these two grand persons, who have been quarrelling all this time, and could not be reconciled by the king himself, or friends and kinsfolk: and the Tathāgata has humbled them in a single day!” The Teacher came in, “What are you talking about,” asked he, “as you sit here together?” They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time that I have reconciled these two; in bygone ages I reconciled the same two persons.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a great multitude gathered together in Benares to keep festival. Crowds of men and of gods, of Nāgas, and Supaṇṇas, came together to see the meeting.

397 [Mettānisaṁsasutta, AN 11.16.]
398 A mythical bird, which we see is able to assume human form. Morris (Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1893, p. 26) concludes that the Supaṇṇa, or Garuḷa, was a “winged man.” The Supaṇṇa is often represented as a Winged Man in art. See Fergusson, Tree and Serpent Worship, pl. xxvi. 1, xxviii. 1, &c. Examples are numerous; e.g. British Museum, 2nd N. Gallery, ‘Brahmanism,’ side case, sect. 5 (little bronzes); a large steatite image, ibid.; Berlin, Mus. f. Völkerkunde, Indian Section, Case 45, i. c. 448, praying Supaṇṇa from Siam, with wings and bird feet. Often the Supaṇṇa is a bird of peculiar shape. One or two of each are figured in Grünwedel, Buddhistische Kunst in Indien, pp. 47-50.
It so happened that in one spot a Nāga and a Supañña were watching the goings-on together. The Nāga, not noticing that this was a Supañña beside him, laid a hand on his shoulder. And when the Supañña turned and looked round to see whose hand had been laid upon his shoulder, he saw the Nāga. The Nāga looked too, and saw that this was a Supañña; and frightened to death, he flew off over the surface of a river. The Supañña gave chase, to catch him.

Now the Bodhisatta was a recluse, and lived in a leaf-hut on the river bank. At that time he was trying to keep off the sun’s heat by putting on a wet cloth and doffing his garment of bark; and he was bathing in the river. “I will make this recluse,” thought the Nāga, “the means of saving my life.” Putting off his own proper shape, and assuming the form of a fine jewel, he fixed himself upon the bark garment. The Supañña in full pursuit saw where he had gone; but for very reverence he would not touch the garment; so he thus addressed the Bodhisatta:

“Sir, I am hungry. Look at your bark garment: in it there is a Nāga which I desire to eat.” And to make the matter clear, he repeated the first verse: {2.14}

1. “Concealed within a stone this wretched snake Has taken harbourage for safety’s sake. And yet, in reverence of your holiness, Though I am hungry, yet I will not take.”

Standing where he was in the water, the Bodhisatta said the second verse in praise of the Supañña king:

2. “Live long, preserved by Brahmā, though pursued, And may you never lack for heavenly food. Do not, in reverence of my holiness, Do not devour him, though in hungry mood.”

In these words the Bodhisatta expressed his approval, standing there in the water. Then he came out, and put on his bark garment, and took [2.11] both creatures with him to his hermitage; where he rehearsed the blessings of Loving-kindness until they were both at one. Thenceforward they lived together happily in peace and harmony.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, saying: “In those days, the two great personages were the Nāga and the Supaṇṇa, and I myself was the recluse.”

Ja 155 Gaggajātaka

The Story about (the Bodhisatta’s Father) Gagga (2s)

Alternative Title: Bhaggajātaka (Cst)

In the present the monks are disturbed by the superstitions of the people who cry out ‘Long life,’ when someone sneezes. The Buddha tells how this custom came to be in the olden days when a Yakkha could not eat anyone who gave this or a similar blessing upon sneezing.

The Bodhisatta = the (brahmin) son (putta),

Kassapa = the father (pitā),

Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),

Āṅgulimāla = the Yakkha.

Present Compare: Vin Cv 5 (2.140).

Keywords: Superstition, Blessings, Devas.

“Gagga, live a hundred years.” (2.15) This story the Teacher told when he was staying in the monastery made by king Pasenadi in front of Jetavana; it was about a sneeze which he gave.

One day, we are told, as the Teacher sat discoursing with four persons round him, he sneezed. “Long life to the Fortunate One, long life to the Buddha!” the monks all cried aloud, and made a great to-do.

The noise interrupted the discourse. Then the Teacher said to the monks, “Why, monks, if one cry ‘Long life!’ on hearing a sneeze, does a man live or die any the more for that?” They answered, “No, no, sir.” He went on, “You should not cry ‘Long life’ for a sneeze, monks. Whosoever does so is guilty of wrong.”

It is said that at that time, when the monks sneezed, people used to call out, “Long life to you, sir!” But the monks had their scruples, and made no answer. Everybody was annoyed, and asked, “Pray, why is it that the monastics about the ascetic Son of the Sakyas make no answer, when they sneeze, and somebody or other wishes them long life?"

All this was told to the Fortunate One. He said: “Monks, common folk are superstitious. When you sneeze, and they say, ‘Long life to you, sir!’ I permit you to answer, ‘The same to you.’” Then the monks asked him, “Sir, when did people begin to answer ‘Long life’ by ‘The same to you’?” Said the Teacher, “That was long, long ago,” and he told them a tale of the olden time.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a brahmin’s son of the kingdom of Kāsi; and his father was a lawyer by calling. When the lad was sixteen years old or so, his father gave a fine jewel into his charge, and they both travelled through town after town, village after village, until they came to Benares. There the man had a meal cooked in the gatekeeper’s house; and as he could find nowhere to put up, he asked where there was lodging to be had for wayfarers who came too late? The people told him that there was a building outside the city, but that it was haunted by Amanussas; but however he might lodge there if he liked. Says the lad to his father, “Have no fear of any Yakkha, father! I will subdue him, and bring him to your feet.” So he persuaded his father, and they went to the place together. The father lay down upon a bench, and his son sat beside him, massaging his feet.

Now the Yakkha that haunted the place had received it for twelve years’ service of Vessavaṇa, on these terms: that if any man who entered it should sneeze, and when long life was wished him, should answer, “Long life to you!” or, “The same to you!” all except these the Yakkha had a right to eat. The Yakkha lived upon the central rafter of the hut.

He determined to make the father of the Bodhisatta sneeze. Accordingly, by his magic power he raised a cloud of fine dust, which entered the man’s nostrils; and

---

399 A monster with white skin, three legs, and eight teeth, guardian of jewels and the precious metals, and a kind of Indian Pluto. [This is an odd description indeed!]

400 [Additional note from vol. IV:] At a sneeze, a Hindu in the N. W. Provinces will still say, “May you live a hundred years.” North Indian Notes and Queries, iv. 388.

401 See Eggeling, Śatapatha Brāhmaṇa vol. 2, p. 3, Sacred Books of the East, for the construction of the hut.
as he lay on the bench, he sneezed. The son did not cry, “Long life!” and down came the Yakkha from his perch, ready to devour his victim. But the Bodhisatta saw him descend, and then these thoughts passed through his mind. “Doubtless it is he who made my father sneeze. This must be a Yakkha that eats all who do not say ‘Long life to you.’ ” And addressing his father, he repeated the first verse as follows:

1. “Gagga, live a hundred years, aye, and twenty more, I pray!
   May no Yakkha eat you up; live a hundred years, I say!”

The Yakkha thought: “This one I cannot eat, because he said ‘Long life to you.’ But I shall eat his father,” and he came close to the father. But the man divined the truth of the matter, “This must be a Yakkha,” he thought, “who eats all who do not reply, ‘Long life to you, too!’ ” and so addressing his son, he repeated the second verse:

2. “You too live a hundred years, aye, and twenty more, I pray;
   May the Pisāca eat poison; live a hundred years, I say!” \[2.17\]

The Yakkha hearing these words, turned away, thinking: “Neither of these is for me to eat.” But the Bodhisatta put a question to him, “Come, Yakkha, how is it you eat the people who enter this building?”

“I earned the right for twelve years’ service of Vessavaṇa.” “What, are you allowed to eat everybody?” \[2.13\] “All except those who say ‘The same to you’ when another wishes them long life.”

“Yakkha,” said the lad, “you have done some wickedness in former lives, which has caused you to be born now fierce, and cruel, and a bane to others. If you do the same kind of thing now, you will pass from darkness to darkness. Therefore from this time forth abstain from such things as taking life.” With these words he humbled the Yakkha, scared him with fear of hell, established him in the Five Precepts, and made him as obedient as an errand-boy.

Next day, when the people came and saw the Yakkha, and learned how that the Bodhisatta had subdued him, they went and told the king, “My lord, some man has subdued the Yakkha, and made him as obedient as an errand-boy!” So the king sent for him, and raised him to be commander-in-chief; while he heaped honours upon the father. Having made the Yakkha a tax-gatherer, and established him in the Bodhisatta’s precepts, after giving alms and doing good he departed to swell the hosts of heaven.

\[402\] [Another name for the Yakkha.]

When the Teacher had ended this story, which he told to explain when the custom first arose of answering ‘Long life’ by ‘The same to you,’ he identified the Jātaka, “In those days, Ānanda was the king, Kassapa the father, and I myself was the lad, his son.”

Ja 156 Alīnacittajātaka

The Story about Prince Alīnacitta (2s)

In the present a monk goes to the forest and strives, but fails to attain. When brought to the Buddha he is reproved and told about a previous life as an elephant, in which his loyalty to his king had saved the kingdom from conquest, and won it for the baby king.

The Bodhisatta = prince Alīnacitta (Alīnacittakumāra),
King Suddhodana = the father (pitā),
Queen Mahāmāyā = the mother (matā),
Moggallāna = the neighbouring king of Kosala (sāmanta-Kosalarājā), Sāriputto = the elephant’s father (hatthissa pitā),
the monk who had given up = the elephant who saved a kingdom.

Present Source: Ja 462 Saṁvarajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 8 Gāmanijātaka, Ja 156 Alīnacittajātaka.

Keywords: Loyalty, Perseverance, Animals.

“Alīna took king Kosala.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a fainthearted monk. The circumstances will be set forth in the Saṁvarajātaka [Ja 462] in the eleventh Book.

This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a monk who had ceased to strive. This, we learn, was a young man of family, who lived in Sāvatthi. Having heard the Teacher’s discoursing, he renounced the world. Fulfilling the tasks imposed by his teachers and preceptors, he learned by heart both the Pātimokkhas.
When five years were past, he said: “When I have been instructed in the mode of attaining Absorption, I will go dwell in the forest.” Then he took leave of his teachers and preceptors, and proceeded to a frontier village in the kingdom of Kosala. The people were pleased with his behaviour, and he made a hut of leaves and there was attended to.

Entering upon the rainy season, zealous, eager, striving in strenuous endeavour he strove after Absorption for the space of three months: but of this not a trace could he produce. Then he thought: “Verily I am the most devoted to worldly conditions among the four classes of men taught by the Teacher! What have I to do with living in the forest?” Then he said to himself, “I will return to Jetavana, and there in beholding the beauty of the Tathāgata, and hearing his discourse sweet as honey, I will pass my days.” So he relaxed his striving; and setting forth he came in course of time to Jetavana. His preceptors and teachers, his friends and acquaintances asked him the cause of his coming. He informed them, and they reproved him for it, asking him why he had done so.

Then they led him into the Teacher’s presence. “Why, monks,” said the Teacher, “do you lead a monk here against his will?” They replied, “This monk has come here because he has relaxed his striving.”

When the Teacher asked this monk if he really were fainthearted, as was said, he replied, [2.18] “Yes, Fortunate One.” To which the Teacher said: “What, monk! In former days did you not gain supremacy over the kingdom of Benares, twelve leagues either way, and give it to a baby boy, like a lump of flesh and nothing more, and all this just by perseverance! And now that you have embraced this dispensation, are you to lose heart and faint?” And he told a story of olden days. [2.14]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, there was a village of carpenters not far from the city, in which five hundred carpenters lived. They would go up the river in a vessel, and enter the forest, where they would shape beams and planks for housebuilding, and put together the framework of one storey or two storey houses, numbering all the pieces from the mainpost onwards; these then they brought down to the river bank, and put them all aboard; then rowing down stream again, they would build houses to order as it was required of them; after which, when they received their wage, they went back again for more materials for the building, and in this way they made their livelihood.
Once it befell that in a place where they were at work in shaping timbers, a certain elephant trod upon a splinter of acacia wood, which pierced his foot, and caused it to swell up and fester, and he was in great pain. In his agony, he caught the sound of these carpenters cutting wood. “There are some carpenters who will cure me,” thought he; and limping on three feet, he presented himself before them, and lay down close by. The carpenters, noticing his swollen foot, went up and looked; there was the splinter sticking in it. With a sharp tool they made incision about the splinter, and tying a string to it, pulled it right out. Then they lanced the gathering, and washed it with warm water, and doctored it properly; and in a very short time the wound was healed.

Grateful for this cure, the elephant thought: “My life has been saved by the help of these carpenters; now I must make myself useful to them.” So ever after that, he used to pull up trees for them, or when they were chopping he would roll up the logs; or bring them their adzes and any tools they might want, holding everything in his trunk like grim death. And the carpenters, when it was time to feed him, used to bring him each a portion of food, so that he had five hundred portions in all.

Now this elephant had a young one, white all over, a magnificent high-bred creature. The elephant reflected that he was now old, and he had better bring his young one to serve the carpenters, and himself be left free to go. So without a word to the carpenters he went off into the wood, and brought his son to them, saying: “This young elephant is a son of mine. You saved my life, and I give him to you as a fee for your medical help; from henceforward he shall work for you.” So he explained to the young elephant that it was his duty to do the work which he had been used to do himself, and then went away into the forest, leaving him with the carpenters. So after that time the young elephant did all their work, faithfully and obediently; and they fed him, as they had fed the other, with five hundred portions for a meal.

His work once done, the elephant would go play about in the river, and then return again. The carpenters’ children used to pull him by the trunk, and play all sorts of pranks with him in water and out. Now noble creatures, be they elephants, horses, or men, never dung or stale in the water. So this elephant did nothing of the kind when he was in the water, but waited until he came out upon the bank.
One day, rain had fallen up river; and by the flood a half-dry cake of his dung was carried into the river. This floated down to the Benares landing place, where it stuck fast in a bush. Just then the king’s elephant keepers had brought down five hundred elephants to give them a bath. But the creatures scented this soil of a noble animal, and not one would enter the water; up went their tails, and off they all ran. The keepers told this to the elephant trainers; who replied, “There must be something in the water, then.” So orders were given to cleanse the water; and there in the bushes this lump was seen. “That’s what the matter is!” cried the men. So they brought a jar, and filled it with water; next powdering the stuff into it, they sprinkled the water over the elephants, whose bodies then became sweet. At once they went down into the river and bathed.

When the trainers made their report to the king, they advised him to secure the elephant for his own use and profit.

The king accordingly embarked upon a raft, and rowed up stream until he arrived at the place where the carpenters had settled. The young elephant, hearing the sound of drums as he was playing in the water, came out and presented himself before the carpenters, who one and all came forth to do honour to the king’s coming, and said to him, “Sire, if woodwork is wanted, what need to come here? Why not send and have it brought to you?”

“No, no, good friends,” the king answered, “ ’tis not for wood that I come, but for this elephant here.”

“He is yours, sire!” But the elephant refused to budge.

“I say, what do you want me to do, elephant?” asked the king.

“Order the carpenters to be paid for what they have spent on me, sire.”

“Willingly, friend.” And the king ordered a hundred thousand pieces of money to be laid by his tail, and trunk, and by each of his four feet. But this was not enough for the elephant; go he would not. So to each of the carpenters was given a pair of cloths, and to each of their wives robes to dress in, nor did he omit to give enough whereby his playmates the children should be brought up; then with a last look upon the carpenters, and the women, and the children, he departed in company with the king. [2.16]
To his capital city the king brought him; and city and stable were decked out with all magnificence. He led the elephant round the city in solemn procession, and thence into his stable, which was fitted up with splendour and pomp. There he solemnly sprinkled the elephant, and appointed him for his own riding; like a comrade he treated him, and gave him half of his kingdom, \(2.21\) taking as much care of him as he did of himself. After the coming of this elephant, the king won supremacy over all Jambudīpa.

In course of time the Bodhisatta was conceived by the queen consort; and when her time was near to be delivered, the king died. Now if the elephant learned news of the king’s death, it was sure to break his heart; so he was waited upon as before, and not a word said. But the next neighbour, the king of Kosala, heard of the king’s death. “Surely the land is at my mercy,” thought he; and marched with a mighty host to the city, and beleaguered it. Straight the gates were closed, and a message was sent to the king of Kosala, “Our queen is near the time of her delivery; and the astrologers have declared that in seven days she shall bear a son. If she bears a son, we will not yield the kingdom, but on the seventh day we will give you battle. For so long we pray you wait!” And to this the king agreed.

In seven days the queen bore a son. On his name-day they called him prince Alīnacitta [Winheart], because, they said, he was born to win the hearts of the people.

On the very same day that he was born, the townsfolk began to do battle with the king of Kosala. But as they had no leader, little by little the army gave way, great though it was. The courtiers told this news to the queen, adding, “Since our army loses ground in this way, we fear defeat. But the state elephant, our king’s bosom friend, has never been told that the king is dead, and a son born to him, and that the king of Kosala is here to give us battle. Shall we tell him?”

“Yes, do so,” said the queen. So she dressed up her son, and laid him in a fine linen cloth; after which she with all the court came down from the palace and entered the elephant’s stable. There she laid the babe at the elephant’s feet, \(2.22\) saying: “Teacher, your comrade is dead, but we feared to tell it you lest you might break your heart. This is your comrade’s son; the king of Kosala has put a siege about the city, and is making war upon your son; the army is losing ground; either kill your son yourself, or else win the kingdom back for him!”
At once the elephant stroked the child with his trunk, and lifted him upon his own head; then making moan and lamentation he took him down and laid him in his mother’s arms, and with the words, “I will master the king of Kosala!” he went forth hastily.

Then the courtiers put his armour and caparison upon him, and [2.17] unlocked the city gate, and escorted him there. The elephant emerging trumpeted, and frightened all the host so that they ran away, and broke up the camp; then seizing the king of Kosala by his topknot, he carried him to the young prince, at whose feet he let him fall. Some rose to kill him, but them the elephant stayed; and he let the captive king go with this advice, “Be careful for the future, and be not presumptuous by reason that our prince is young.”

After that, the power over all Jambudīpa fell into the Bodhisatta’s own hand, and not a foe was able to rise up against him. The Bodhisatta was consecrated at the age of seven years, as king Alīnacitta; just was his reign, and when he came to life’s end he went to swell the hosts of heaven.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, having become perfectly enlightened, he repeated this couple of verses:

1. “Alīna took king Kosala, ill pleased with all he had;
   By capturing the greedy king, he made his people glad.

2. So any brother, reliant, strong in will,
   When righteousness is practised peace to win,
   He who so walks, shall gain the victory
   And all the fetters utterly destroy.” [2.23]

And so the Teacher, bringing his teaching to a climax in the deathless and great Nibbāna, went on to declare the Truths, and then identified the Jātaka, after the Truths, this discontented monk became an Arahat, “She who now is Mahāmāyā was then the mother; this discontented monk was the elephant who took the kingdom and handed it over to the child; Sāriputta was the father elephant, and I myself was the young prince.”
The Section with Two Verses – 658

Ja 157 Guṇajātaka
The Story about Virtue (2s)

Alternative Title: Sigālajātaka (Comm)

In the present the king of Kosala gives 1,000 robes to Ven. Ānanda. 500 he gives to monks in need, and 500 to his attendant monk, who passes them to other novices. The king asks the Buddha if this is right, and the latter tells a story of how a jackal saved a lion, and the lion thereafter looked after the jackal and his family.

The Bodhisatta = the lion (sīha),
Ānanda = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 92 Mahāsāra,
Quoted at: a 157 Guṇa, Ja 259 Tīrīṭavaccha, Ja 302 Mahā-assāroha.

Keywords: Gratitude, Obligation, Animals.

“The strong will always have their way.” This was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana after elder Ānanda received a present of a thousand robes. The elder had been preaching to the ladies of the king of Kosala’s palace as described above in the Mahāsārajātaka [Ja 92].

Once the wives of the king of Kosala thought among themselves, as follows, “Very rare is the coming of a Buddha; and very rare is birth in a human form with all one’s faculties in perfection. Yet, though we have happened on a human form in a Buddha’s lifetime, we cannot go at will to the monastery to hear the truth from his own lips, to do obeisance, and to make offerings to him. We live here as in a box. Let us ask the king to send for a fitting monk to come here and teach us the truth. Let us learn what we can from him, and be charitable and do good works, to the end that we may profit by our having been born at this happy juncture.” So they all went in a body to the king, and told him what was in their minds; and the king gave his consent.

Now it fell out on a day that the king was minded to take his pleasure in the royal pleasure gardens, and gave orders that the grounds should be made ready for his coming. As the gardener was working away, he espied the Teacher seated at the foot of a tree. So he went to the king and said: “The pleasure gardens is made ready, sire; but the Fortunate One is sitting there at the foot of a tree.” “Very good,” said the king, “we will go and hear the Teacher.” Mounting his chariot of state, he went to the Teacher in the pleasure gardens.

Now there was then seated at the Teacher’s feet, listening to his teaching, a lay brother named Chattapāṇi [Parasol Holder], who had entered the Third Path. On catching sight of this lay brother, the king hesitated; but, on reflection that this must be a virtuous man, or he would not be sitting by the Teacher for instruction, he approached and with a bow seated himself on one side of the Teacher. Out of reverence for the supreme Buddha, the lay brother neither rose in the king’s honour nor saluted his majesty; and this made the king very angry. Noticing the king’s displeasure, the Teacher proceeded to extol the merits of that lay brother, saying: “Sire, this lay brother is master of all tradition; he knows by heart the discourses that have been handed down; and he has set himself free from the bondage of passion.” “Surely,” thought the king, “he whose praises the Teacher is telling can be no ordinary person.” And he said to him, “Let me know, lay brother, if you are in need of anything.” “Thank you,” said the man. Then the king listened to the Teacher’s teaching, and at its close rose up and ceremoniously withdrew.

Another day, meeting that same lay brother going after breakfast umbrella in hand to Jetavana, the king had him summoned to his presence and said: “I hear, lay brother, that you are a man of great learning. Now my wives are very anxious to hear and learn the truth; I should be glad if you would teach them.” “It is not meet, sire, that a layman should expound or teach the truth in the king’s harem; that is the prerogative of the monks.”

Recognising the force of this remark, the king, after dismissing the layman, called his wives together and announced to them his intention of sending to the Teacher for one of the monks to come as their instructor in the Dhamma. Which of the eighty chief disciples would they have? After talking it over together, the ladies with one accord chose Ānanda the elder, surnamed the Treasurer of the Dhamma [Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika]. So the king went to the Teacher and with a courteous greeting sat down by his side, after which he proceeded to state his wives’ wish, and his own hope, that Ānanda might be their teacher. The Teacher, having consented to send Ānanda, the king’s wives now began to be regularly taught by the elder and to learn from him.
As he preached there in the manner described, [2.24] a thousand robes, worth each a thousand pieces of money, were brought to the king. Of these the king [2.18] gave five hundred to as many of his queens. The ladies put these aside and made them a present to our elder, and then the next day in their old ones went to the palace where the king took breakfast. The king remarked, “I gave you dresses worth a thousand pieces each. Why are you not wearing them?” “My lord,” they said, “we have given them to the elder.” “Has elderĀnanda got them all?” he asked. They said: “Yes, he has.” “The Supreme Buddha,” said he, “allows only three robes. Ānanda is doing a little trade in cloth, I suppose!”

He was angry with the elder; and after breakfast, visited him in his cell, and after greeting, sat down, with these words: “Pray, sir, do my ladies learn or listen to your preaching?”

“Yes, sire; they learn what they ought, and what they ought to hear, they hear.”

“Oh, indeed. Do they only listen, or do they make you presents of upper garments or under-garments?”

“Today, sire, they have given me five hundred robes worth a thousand pieces each.”

“And you accepted them, sir?”

“Yes, sire, I did.”

“Why, sir, didn’t the Teacher make some rule about three robes?”

“True, sire, for every monk three robes is the rule, speaking of what he uses for himself. But no one is forbidden to accept what is offered; and that is why I took them – to give them to monks whose robes are worn out.”

“But when these monks get them from you, what do they do with their old ones?”

‘Sire, it is not permitted to waste the gifts of the faithful; so they chop up the old towel into bits, and mix the bits with clay, which they use for mortar in building their houses.”

“A gift, sir, ought not to be destroyed, not even a towel.”

“Well, sir king, we destroy no gifts, but all are used somehow.”

This conversation pleased the king so much, that he sent for the other five hundred robes which remained, and gave them to the elder. Then, after receiving his thanks, he greeted the elder in solemn state, and went his way.

The elder gave the first five hundred robes to monks whose robes were worn out. But the number of his fellow monastics was just five hundred. One of these, a young monk, was very useful to the elder; sweeping out his cell, serving him with food and drink, giving him toothbrush and water for cleansing his mouth, looking after the privies, living rooms, and sleeping rooms, and doing all that was needed for hand, foot, or back. To him, as his by right for all his great service, the elder gave all the five hundred robes which he had received afterwards. The young monk in his turn distributed them among his fellow-students. These all cut them up, dyed them yellow as a kaṇikāra flower; then dressed therein they waited upon the Teacher, greeted him, and sat down on one side.

“Sir,” they asked, “is it possible for a holy disciple who has entered on the First Path to be a respecter of persons in his gifts?” “No, monks, it is not possible for holy disciples to be respecters of persons in their gifts.” “Sir, our spiritual teacher, the Treasurer of the Dhamma, gave five hundred robes, each worth a thousand pieces, to a young monk; and he has divided them amongst us.” “Monks, in giving these Ānanda was no respecter of persons. {2.26} That young fellow was a very useful servant; so he made the present to his own attendant for the sake of his service, for the sake of his goodness, [2.19] and by right, thinking that one good turn deserves another, and with a wish to do what gratitude demands. In former days, as now, wise men acted on the principle one good turn deserves another.” And then, at their request, he told them a story of the past.

---

403 Pterospermum acerifolium.
In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a lion living in a cave on the hills. One day he came out from his lair and looked towards the mountain foot. Now all round the foot of that mountain stretched a great piece of water. Upon some ground that rose out of this was a quantity of soft green grass, growing on the thick mud, and over this mud ran rabbits and deer and such light creatures, eating of the grass. On that day, as usual, there was a deer eating grass upon it.

“I'll have that deer!” thought the lion; and with a lion’s leap he sprang from the hillside towards it. But the deer, frightened to death, scampered away bellowing.

The lion could not stop his onset; down on the mud he fell, and sank in, so that he could not get out; and there he remained seven days, his feet fixed like four posts, with not a morsel to eat.

Then a jackal, hunting for food, chanced to see him; and set off running in high terror. But the lion called out to him, “I say, jackal, don’t run – here am I, caught fast in the mud. Please save me!” Up came the jackal. “I could pull you out,” says he, “but I much fear that once out you might eat me.” “Fear nothing, I won’t eat you,” says the lion. “On the contrary, I’ll do you great service; only get me out somehow.”

The jackal, accepting this promise, worked away the mud around his four feet, and the holes wherein his four feet were fixed he dug further towards the water; then the water ran in, and made the mud soft. Then he got underneath the lion, saying: “Now, sir, one great effort,” making a loud noise and striking the lion’s belly with his head. The lion strained every nerve, and scrambled out of the mud; he stood on dry land. After a moment’s rest, he plunged in the lake, and washed and scoured the mud from him.

Then he killed a buffalo, and with his fangs tore up its flesh, of which he proffered some to the jackal, saying: “Eat, comrade!” and himself after the jackal had done did eat too. After this, the jackal took a piece in his mouth. “What’s that for?” the lion asked. “For your humble servant my mate, who awaits me at home.” “All right,” says the lion, taking a bit for his own mate. “Come, comrade,” says he again, “let us stay awhile on the mountain top, and then go to the lady’s house.” So there they went, and the lion fed the female jackal; and after they were both satisfied, he said: “Now I am going [2.20] to take care of you.” So he conducted them to the place where he dwelt, and settled them in a cave near to the entrance of his own.

Ever after that, he and the jackal used to go hunting together, leaving their mates behind; all kinds of creatures they would kill, and eat to their hearts’ content, and then bring back some for the two others.

And as time went on, the female jackal and the lioness had each two cubs, and they all lived happily together.

One day, a sudden thought struck the lioness. “My lion seems very fond of the jackal and his mate and young ones. What if there be something wrong between them! That must be the cause why he is so fond of them, I suppose. Well, I will plague her and frighten her, and chase her away from this place.”

So when the lion and the jackal were away on the hunt, she plagued and terrified the jackal’s mate, asking her why she stayed there, why she did not run away? And her cubs frightened the young jackals after the same fashion. The female jackal told her mate what had been said. “It is clear,” said she, “that the lion must have dropped a hint about us. We have been here a long time; and now he will be the death of us. Let us go back to the place where we lived before!”

On hearing this, the jackal approached the lion, with these words. “Teacher, we have been here a long time. Those who stay too long outstay their welcome. While we are away, your lioness scolds and terrifies my mate, by asking why she stays, and telling her to begone; your young ones do the same to mine. If any one does not like a neighbour, he should just bid him go, and send him about his business; what is the use of all this plaguing?” So saying, he repeated the first verse:

1. “The strong will always have their way; it is their nature so to do; Your mate roars loud; and now I say I fear what once I trusted to.” [2.29]

The lion listened; then turning to his lioness, “Wife,” said he, “you remember how once I was out hunting for a week, and then brought back this jackal and his mate with me?” “Yes, I remember.” “Well, do you know why I stayed away all that week?” “No, sir.” “My wife, in trying to catch a deer, I made a mistake, and stuck fast in the mud; there I stayed – for I could not get out – a whole week without food. My life was saved by this jackal. This my friend saved my life! A friend in need is a friend indeed, be he great or small. Never again must you put a slight upon my comrade, or his wife, or his family.” And then the lion repeated the second verse:

2. “A friend who plays a friendly part, however small and weak he be,
He is my kinsman and my flesh and blood, a friend and comrade he;
Despise him not, my sharp-fanged mate! This jackal saved my life for me.”

[2.21]

The lioness, when she heard this tale, made her peace with the jackal’s mate, and ever after lived at amity with her and her young ones. And the young of the two pairs played together in their early days, and when the parents died, {2.30} they did not break the bond of friendship, but lived happily together as the old ones had lived before them. Indeed, the friendship remained unbroken through seven generations.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the end of the Truths some entered on the First Path, some on the Second, some on the Third, and some the Fourth, “Ānanda was the jackal in those days, and the lion was I myself.”

Ja 158 Suhanujātaka

The Story about (the Horse) Suhanu (2s)

In the present two monks separately are always cruel with others, until they come together, and then are very friendly. The Buddha tells a similar story of how two horses were difficult to control, but when they met were friendly with each other.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the two corrupt monks = the two horses (dve assā).

Keywords: Like attraction, Animals.

“Birds of a feather.” This story the Teacher told while at Jetavana, about two hot-tempered monks.

It happened that there were two monks, passionate, cruel, and violent, one living at Jetavana and one in the country. Once the country monk came to Jetavana on some errand or other. The novices and young monks knew the passionate nature of this man, so they led him to the cell of the other, all agog to see them quarrel.
No sooner did they spy one another, those two hot-tempered men, than they ran into each other’s arms, stroking and caressing hands, and feet, and back!

The monks talked about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, these passionate monks are cross, cruel, angry to everybody else, but with each other they are the best of friends, cordial and sympathetic!” The Teacher came in, asking what they sat there talking about? They told him. Said he, “This, monks, is not the only time that these men, who are cross, cruel, and angry to all else, have shown themselves cordial, and friendly, and sympathetic to each other. It happened just so in olden days,” and so saying, he told a story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was his do-all, a courtier who advised him on things temporal and things spiritual. Now this king was of a somewhat covetous nature; and he had a brute of a horse, named Mahāsoṇa, or Big Chestnut.

Some horse-dealers from the north country brought down five hundred horses; and word was sent to the king that these horses had arrived. Now heretofore the Bodhisatta had always asked the dealers to fix their own price, and then paid it in full. But now the king, being displeased with him, summoned another of his court, to whom he said,

“Friend, make the men name their price; then let loose Big Chestnut so that he goes amongst them; make him bite them, and when they are weak and wounded get the men to reduce their price.”

“Certainly,” said the man; and so he did.

The dealers in great dudgeon told the Bodhisatta what this horse had done.

“Have you not such another brute in your own city?” asked the Bodhisatta. Yes, they said, there was one named Suhanu [Strongjaw], and a fierce and savage brute he was. “Bring him with you the next time you come,” the Bodhisatta said; and this they promised to do.

So the next time they came this brute came with them. The king, on hearing how the horse-dealers had arrived, opened his window to look at the horses, and caused Chestnut to be let loose. Then as the dealers saw Chestnut coming, they let Strongjaw loose. No sooner had the two met, than they stood still licking each other all over!

The king asked the Bodhisatta how it was. “Friend,” said he, “when these two rogue horses come across others, they are fierce, wild, and savage, they bite them, and make them ill. But with each other – there they stand, licking one another all over the body! What’s the reason of this?” “The reason is,” said the Bodhisatta, “that they are not dissimilar, but like in nature and character.” And he repeated this couple of verses:

1. “Birds of a feather flock together: Chestnut and Strongjaw both agree:
   In scope and aim both are the same – there is no difference I can see. [2.32]

2. Both savage are, and vicious both; both always bite their tether;
   So wrong with wrongest, and vice with vice, must e’en agree together.”

Then the Bodhisatta went on to warn the king against excessive covetise, and the spoiling of other men’s goods; and fixing the value, he made him pay the proper price. The dealers received the due value, and went away well satisfied; and the king, abiding by the Bodhisatta’s admonition, at last passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “The bad monks were then these two horses, Ānanda was the king, and I was the wise counsellor.”

Ja 159 Morajātaka

The Story about the Peacock (2s)

In the present one monk falls away from the spiritual life after seeing a woman in fine dress. The Buddha tells a story of how a golden peacock who had kept the precepts and protected himself for seven generations also fell when he heard a peahen’s voice.

The Bodhisatta = the golden peacock (suvāṇṇamora),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Past Compare: Ja 159 Mora, Ja 491 Mahāmora.

Keywords: Attraction, Lust, Animals, Birds.
“There he rises, king all-seeing.” [2.23] [2.33] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about a discontented monk. This monk was led by some others before the Teacher, who asked, “Is it true, monk, as I hear, that you are discontent?” “Yes, sir.” “What have you seen that should make you do so?” “A woman dressed up in magnificent attire.” Then said the Teacher, “What wonder that womankind should trouble the wits of a man like you! Even wise men, who for seven hundred years have done no wrong, on hearing a woman’s voice have transgressed in a moment; even the holy become impure; even they who have attained the highest honour have thus come to disgrace – how much more the unholy!” and he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into this world as a peacock. The egg which contained him had a shell as yellow as a kāṇikāra bud; and when he broke the shell, he became a golden peacock, fair and lovely, with beautiful red lines under his wings. To preserve his life, he traversed three ranges of hills, and in the fourth he settled, on a plateau of a golden hill in Daṇḍaka. When day dawned, as he sat upon the hill, watching the sun rise, he composed a Brahmā spell to preserve himself safe in his own feeding-ground, the charm beginning, “There he rises,”

1. “There he rises, king all-seeing,
   Making all things bright with his golden light.
   You I worship, glorious being,
   Making all things bright with your golden light,
   Keep me safe, I pray,
   Through the coming day.” [2.34]

Worshipping the sun on this wise by the verse here recited, he repeats another in worship of the Buddhas who have passed away, and all their virtues:
2. “All saints, the righteous, wise in holy lore,
These do I honour, and their aid implore:
All honour to the wise, to wisdom honour be,
To freedom, and to all that freedom has made free.”
Uttering this charm to keep himself from harm,
The peacock went feeding. [404] [2.24] [2.35]

So after flying about all day, he came back at even and sat on the hilltop to see the sun go down; then as he meditated, he uttered another spell to preserve himself and keep off evil, the one beginning, “There he sets,”

3. [405] “There he sets, the king all-seeing,
He that makes all bright with his golden light.
You I worship, glorious being,
Making all things bright with your golden light.
Through the night, as through the day,
Keep me safe, I pray.

4. All saints, the righteous, wise in holy lore,
These do I honour and their aid implore:
All honour to the wise, to wisdom honour be,
To freedom, and to all that freedom has made free.”
Uttering this charm to keep himself from harm,
The peacock fell sleeping. [406] [2.36]

Now there was a hunter who lived in a certain village of wild huntsmen, near Benares. Wandering about among the Himālayas hills he noticed the Bodhisatta perched upon the golden hill of Daṇḍaka, and told it to his son.

It so befell that on a day one of the wives of the king of Benares, Khemā by name, saw in a dream a golden peacock holding a Dhamma discourse. This she told to the king, saying that she longed to hear the discourse of the golden peacock. The king asked his courtiers about it; and the courtiers said: “The brahmins will be sure to know.” The brahmins said: “Yes, there are golden peacocks.” When asked, where? They replied, “The hunters will be sure to know.” The king called the hunters together and asked them. Then this hunter answered, “O lord king, there is a golden hill in Daṇḍaka; and there a golden peacock lives.” “Then bring it here – kill it not, but just take it alive.”

The hunter set snares in the peacock’s feeding-ground. But even when the peacock stepped upon it, the snare would not close. This the hunter tried for seven years, but catch him he could not; and there he died. And queen Khemā too died without obtaining her wish.

The king was angry because his queen had died for the sake of a peacock. He caused an inscription to be made upon a golden plate to this effect, “Among the Himālayas mountains is a golden hill in Daṇḍaka. There lives a golden peacock; and whoso eats of its flesh becomes ever young and immortal.” This he enclosed in a casket.

After his death, the next king read this inscription: and he thought: “I will become ever young and immortal,” so he sent another [2.25] hunter. Like the first, this hunter failed to capture the peacock, and died in the quest. In the same way the kingdom was ruled by six successive kings.

Then a seventh arose, who also sent forth a hunter. The hunter observed that when the golden peacock came into the snare, it did not shut to, {2.37} and also that he recited a charm before setting out in search of food. Off he went to the marches, and caught a peahen, which he trained to dance when he clapped his hands, and at snap of finger to utter her cry. Then, taking her along with him, he set the snare, fixing its uprights in the ground, early in the morning, before the peacock had recited his charm. Then he made the peahen utter a cry. This unwonted sound – the female’s note – woke desire in the peacock’s breast; leaving his charm unsaid, he came towards her; and was caught in the net. Then the hunter took hold of him and conveyed him to the king of Benares.

The king was delighted at the peacock’s beauty; and ordered a seat to be placed for him. Sitting on the proffered seat, the Bodhisatta asked, “Why did you have me caught, O king?”

“Because they say all that eat of you become immortal and have eternal youth. So I wish to gain youth eternal and immortality by eating of you,” said the king.
“So be it – granted that all who eat of me become immortal and have eternal youth. But that means that I must die!”

“Of course it does,” said the king.

“Well – and if I die, how can my flesh give immortality to those that eat of it?

“Your colour is golden; therefore (so it is said) those who eat your flesh become young and live so for ever.”

“Sir,” replied the bird, “there is a very good reason for my golden colour. Long ago, I held imperial sway over the whole world, reigning in this very city; I kept the Five Precepts, and made all people of the world keep the same. For that I was born again after death in the World of the Thirty-Three; there I lived out my life, but in my next birth I became a peacock in consequence of some wrong; however, golden I became because I had previously kept the Precepts.”

“What? Incredible! You an imperial ruler, who kept the Precepts! Born gold-coloured as the fruit of them! A proof, pray you!”

“What is it?”

“Well, sire, when I was monarch, I used to pass through mid-air seated in a jewelled carriage, which now lies buried in the earth beneath the waters of the royal lake. Dig it up from beneath the lake, and that shall be my proof.”

The king approved the plan; he caused the lake to be drained, and dug out the chariot, and believed the Bodhisatta. Then the Bodhisatta addressed him thus:

“Sire, except Nibbāna, which is everlasting, all things else, being composite in their nature, are unsubstantial, transient, and subject to living and death.” Discoursing on this theme he established the king in keeping of the Precepts.

---

407 Perhaps because they are supposed to live as long as gold lasts. On the same principle, pieces of jade are placed in the coffin of the Chinese, to preserve the soul of the dead. Groot, in a work on Chinese religions, quotes a Chinese writer of the 4th century, who says: “He who swallows gold will exist as long as gold; he who swallows jade will exist as long as jade;” and recommends it for the living (cp. Groot, Religious Systems of China, i. pp. 271, 273).
Peace filled the king’s heart; he bestowed his kingdom upon the Bodhisatta, and showed him the highest respect. The Bodhisatta returned the gift; and after a few days’ sojourn, he rose up in the air, and flew back to the golden hill of Daṇḍaka, with a parting word of advice, “O king, be careful!” And the king on his part clave to the Bodhisatta’s advice; and after giving alms and doing good, passed away to fare according to his deeds.

This discourse ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, now after the Truths the discontented monk became a Saint, “Ānanda was the king of those days, and I myself was the golden peacock.”

Ja 160 Vinīlakajātaka

The Story about the Crossbreed (2s)

Alternative Title: Vinīlajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta tries to imitate the Buddha. The Buddha tells a story of a crossbreed bird who tries to lord it over his pure bred peers, and is sent to the dunghill for his troubles.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Videha (Videharājā), Ānanda = the (goose’s) father (pitā),
the two chief disciples = the two young geese (dve haṁsapotakā),
Devadatta = the hybrid goose (vinīlaka).

Keywords: Vanity, Imitation, Animals, Birds.

“As yonder king goes galloping.” This story the Teacher told during a sojourn in Veḷuvana, how Devadatta imitated the Buddha.

The two chief disciples went to visit Gayāsīsa, where Devadatta imitated the Buddha, and fell; the elders then both returned, after delivering a discourse, taking with them their own pupils. On arriving at Veḷuvana, the Teacher asked them what Devadatta had done when he saw them? {2.39} “Sir,” they said, “he 408 Sāriputta and Moggallāna. See Cullavagga, vii. 4 (translation in Vinaya Texts, iii. 256 ff.).

409 A mountain near Gayā in Behar. It is now called Brahmathati (see Rājendralāla Mitra, Buddha Gayā, p. 23).
imitated the Buddha, and was utterly destroyed.” The Teacher answered, “It is not only now, Sāriputta, that Devadatta came to dire destruction by mimicking me; it was just the same before.” Then at the elder’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Videha was reigning at Mithilā in the realm of Videha, the Bodhisatta became a son of his queen consort. He grew up in due course, and was educated at Taxila; and on his father’s decease he inherited his kingdom.

At that time a certain king of the golden geese paired with a crow at the feeding-grounds, and to them was born a son. He was like neither mother nor father. All dingy blue-black he was, and accordingly they gave him Vinīlaka [Dingy] to his name. The goose-king often visited his offspring; and he had besides two other sons, geese like himself. These remarked that he often used to go to the regions where mankind do frequent, and asked him what should be the reason. “My sons,” said he, “I have a mate there, a crow, and she has given me a son, whose name is Vinīlaka. He it is I go to visit.” “Where do they live?” they asked. “On a palm-top near Mithilā in the kingdom of Videha,” describing the spot. “Father,” they said, “where men are, there is fear and peril. You ought not to go there; let us go and fetch him to you.”

So they took a stick, and perched Vinīlaka upon it; then catching the ends in their beaks, they flew over the city of Mithilā.

At that moment king Videha chanced to be sitting in a magnificent carriage drawn by a team of four milk-white thoroughbreds, as he made a triumphal circuit of the city. Vinīlaka saw him, and thought he, “What is the difference between king Videha and me? He is riding in state around his capital in a chariot drawn by four white horses; and I am carried in a vehicle drawn by a pair of geese.” So as he passed through the air he repeated the first verse: [2.40]

1. “As yonder king goes galloping with his milk-white four-in-hand, Vinīlaka has a pair of geese, to bear him o’er the land!”

These words made the geese angry. Their first thought was, “Let us drop him here, and leave him!” But then again they bethought them, “What will our father say!” So for fear of rebuke, they brought the creature to their father, and recounted all that he had done. The father grew angry when he heard it, “What!” said he, “are you my sons’ superior, that you make yourself master over them, and treat them like horses in a carriage? You don’t know your measure. This is no place for you; get you back to your mother!” And with this censure he repeated the second verse:

2. “Vinīlaka, there’s danger here; this is no place for you;
By village gates your mother waits – there you must hasten too.” [2.28]

With this censure, he bade his sons convey the bird to the dunghill outside the city of Mithilā; and so they did.

This lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka. “Devadatta in those days was Vinīlaka, the two elders were the two young geese, Ānanda was the father goose, and I was king Videha myself.”

Ja 161 Indasamānagottajātaka

The Story about (the Seer) Indasamānagotta (2s)

In the present one newly ordained monk doesn’t like to carry out his duties and wants to go his own way. The Buddha tells a story of an obstinate ascetic who kept a pet elephant, against the advice of his teacher, and was duly killed by it.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā), the monk who could not be taught = (the unteachable) Indasamānagotta.

Present Source: Ja 427 Gijjhā,
Quoted at: Ja 116 Dubbaca, Ja 161 Indasamānagotta, Ja 369 Mittavinda, Ja 439 Catudvāra.

Keywords: Obstinacy, Disobedience, Animals.

“Friendship with evil.” [2.41] This is a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a wilful person; and the circumstances will be found in the Gijjhajātaka [Ja 427], of the Ninth Book.

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana concerning a disobedient monk. He was, they say, of gentle birth, and though ordained in the dispensation that leads to safety, was admonished by his well-wishers, masters, teachers, and fellow-students to this effect, “Thus must you advance and thus retreat; thus look at or away from objects; thus must the arm be stretched out or drawn back; thus are the inner and outer garment to be worn; thus is the bowl to be held, and when you have received sufficient food to sustain life, after self-examination, thus are you to partake of it, keeping guard over the door of the senses; in eating you are to be moderate and exercise watchfulness; you are to recognize such and such duties towards monks who come to or go from the monastery; these are the fourteen sets of monastic duties, and the eighty great duties to be duly performed; these are the thirteen ascetic practices; all these are to be scrupulously performed.” Yet was he disobedient and impatient, and did not receive instruction respectfully, but refused to listen to them, saying: “I do not find fault with you. Why do you speak thus to me? I shall know what is for my good, and what is not.”

Then the monks, hearing of his disobedience, sat in the Dhamma Hall, telling of his faults. The Teacher came and asked them what it was they were discussing, and sent for the monk and said: “Is it true, monk, that you are disobedient?” And he confessed that it was so.

The Teacher said to this monk, “In olden days, as now, you were wilful and careless of wise men’s advice, and you were trampled to death by a mad elephant because of it.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born of a brahmin family. On growing up he left his worldly home and took to the ascetic life, and in time became the leader of a company of five hundred ascetics, who all lived together in the region of the Himālayas.

Amongst these ascetics was a wilful and unteachable person named Indasamanāgotta. He had a pet elephant. The Bodhisatta sent for him when he found this out, and asked if he really did keep a young elephant? Yes, the man said, he had an elephant which had lost its dam. “Well,” the Bodhisatta said, “when elephants grow up they kill even those who foster them; so you had better not keep it any longer.” “But I can’t live without him, my teacher!” was the reply. “Oh, well,” said the Bodhisatta, “you’ll live to repent it.” Howbeit he still reared the creature, and by and by it grew to an immense size.

It happened once that the ascetics had all gone far afield to gather roots and fruits in the forest, and they were absent for several days. At the first breath of the south wind this elephant fell in a frenzy. [2.29] “Destruction to this hut!” he thought: “I’ll smash the water-jar! I’ll overturn the stone bench! I’ll tear up the pallet! I’ll kill the ascetic, and then off I’ll go!” So he sped into the jungle, and waited watching for their return.

The master came first, [2.42] laden with food for his pet. As soon as he saw him, he hastened up, thinking all was well. Out rushed the elephant from the thicket, and seizing him in his trunk, dashed him to the ground, then with a blow on the head crushed the life out of him; and madly trumpeting, he scampered into the forest.

The other ascetics brought this news to the Bodhisatta. Said he, “We should have no dealings with the bad,” and then he repeated these two verses:

1. “Friendship with evil let the good eschew,
The good, who know what duty bids them do:
They will work mischief, be it soon or late,
Even as the elephant his master slew.

2. But if a kindred spirit you shall see,
In virtue, wisdom, learning like to you,
Choose such a one to be your own true friend;
Good friends and blessing go in company.” [2.43]

In this way the Bodhisatta showed his band of ascetics that it is well to be docile and not obstinate. Then he performed Indasamānagotta’s obsequies, and cultivating the Divine Abidings, came at last into Brahmā’s Realm.

After concluding this discourse, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “This unruly fellow was then Indasamānagotta, and I was myself the teacher of the ascetic band.”

Ja 162 Santhavajātaka
The Story about (Good and Bad) Company (2s)

In the present the heretics practice all sorts of austerities, including worshipping the sacred fire, in hope of sanctity, but the Buddha says it is all to no effect, and tells a story of the past in which an ascetic with much trouble built a hut and worshipped the fire until one day it burnt down his dwelling, at which point he abandoned the practice and went to the Himālayas.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa).

Present Source: Ja 144 Naṅguttha,
Quoted at: Ja 162 Santhava.

Keywords: False asceticism.

“Nothing is worse.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about feeding the sacred fire. The circumstances are the same as those of the Naṅguttajātaka [Ja 144] related above.

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, touching the false austerity of the Ājīvikas, or naked ascetics. Tradition tells us that behind Jetavana they used to practise false austerities. A number of the monks saw them there painfully squatting on their heels, swinging in the air like bats, reclining on thorns, scorching themselves with five fires, and so forth in their various false austerities.

The monks, on seeing those who kept up the fires, said to the Fortunate One, “Sir, here are topknot ascetics practising all sorts of false asceticism. What’s the good of it?” “There is no good in it,” said the Teacher. “It has happened before that even wise men have imagined some good in feeding the sacred fire, but after doing this for a long time, have found out that there is no good in it, and have quenched it with water, and beat it down, beat it down with sticks, never giving it so much as a look afterwards.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family. When he was about sixteen years old, his father and mother took his birth-fire[^41] and spoke to him thus, “Son, will you take your birth-fire into the [^41]: Cp. vol. i. no. 61, and 144, init.; a sacred fire was also kindled at a wedding, to be used for sacrifice and constantly kept up (Manu, 3. 67). So too now, the Agni-hotṛi in Kumaon begins fire-worship from the date of his marriage. The sacred fire of the woods, and worship the fire there; or will you learn the Three Vedas, settle down as a married man, and live in the world?” Said he, “No worldly life for me: I will worship my fire in the woodland, and go on the way to heaven.” So taking his birth-fire, he bade farewell to his parents, and entered the forest, where he lived in a hut made of branches and leaves and worshipped the fire.

One day he had been invited to some place where he received a present of rice and ghee. “This rice,” he thought: “I will offer to Mahābrahmā.” So he took home the rice, and made the fire blaze. Then with the words, “With this rice I feed the sacred flame,” he cast it upon the fire. Scarce had this rice dropped upon it, all full of fat as it was – when a fierce flame leapt up which set his hermitage alight. Then the brahmin hurried away in terror, and sat down some distance off. “There should be no dealings with the wicked,” said he, “and so this fire has burnt the hut which I made with so much trouble!” And he repeated the first verse:

1. “Nothing is worse than evil company;
   I fed my fire with plenteous rice and ghee;
   And lo! the hut which gave me such ado
   To build it up, my fire has burnt for me.”

“I’ve done with you now, false friend!” he added; and he poured water upon the fire, and beat it out with sticks, and then buried himself in the mountains. There he came upon a black deer licking the faces of a lion, a tiger, and a panther. This put it into his mind how there was nothing better than good friends; and therewith he repeated the second verse:

2. “Nothing is better than good company;
   Kind offices of friendship here I see; [2.45]
   Behold the lion, tiger, and leopard
   The black deer licks the faces of all three.” [2.31]

With these reflections the Bodhisatta plunged into the depths of the mountains, and there he embraced the true ascetic life, cultivating the Super Knowledges and Attainments, until at his life’s end he passed into Brahmā’s Realm.

marriage altar is carried in a copper vessel to his fire-pit. It is always kept alight, and from it must be kindled his funeral pyre (North Indian Notes and Queries, iii. 284).
After delivering this discourse, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days I was the ascetic of the story.”

Ja 163 Susīmajātaka
The Story about (King) Susīma (2s)

In the present laymen decide on giving a gift to the Buddha, and the heretics, although they do not like it, cannot prevent it. The Buddha tells a story of how, in ancient times, a youth had learned the Vedas and elephant lore in one night, so as to be able to fulfil his duties, and sustain his family's income, which the brahmins tried to take from them.

The Bodhisatta = the young brahmin (māṇava),
Sāriputta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo),
Ānanda = king Susīma (Susīmo rājā),
King Suddhodana = the father (pitā),
Mahāmāyā = the mother (mātā).

Keywords: Deserving of gifts, Quick wit.

“Five score black elephants.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about arbitrary giving of alms.

We hear that at Sāvatthi, a family used sometimes to give alms to the Buddha and his disciples, sometimes they used to give to the heretics, or else the givers would form themselves into companies, or again the people of one street would club together, or the whole of the inhabitants would collect voluntary offerings, and present them.

On this occasion all the inhabitants had made such a collection of all necessaries; but counsels were divided, some demanding that this be given to the heretics, some speaking for those who followed the Buddha. Each party stuck to their point, the disciples of the heretics voting for the heretics, and the disciples of Buddha for Buddha’s company. Then it was proposed to divide upon the question, and accordingly they divided; those who were for the Buddha were in the majority.

So their plan was followed, and the disciples of the heretics could not prevent the gifts being offered to the Buddha and his followers.

The citizens gave invitation to the Buddha’s company; for seven days they set rich offerings before them, and on the seventh gave over all the articles they had collected. The Teacher returned thanks, after which he instructed a host of people in the fruition of the Paths. Next he returned to Jetavana; and when his followers had done their duties, he delivered a Sugata’s discourse standing before his scented chamber, into which he then retired.

At evening time the monks talked the matter over together in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, how the heretics’ disciples tried to prevent this from coming to the saints! Yet they couldn’t do it; all the collection of articles was laid before the saints’ own feet. Ah, how great is the Buddha’s power!” “What is this you are talking about now together?” asked the Teacher, coming in. They told him. “Monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that the disciples of the heretics have tried to thwart an offering which should have been made to me. They did the same before; but always these articles have been finally laid at my feet.” So saying, he told them a tale of long ago.

In the past there lived in Benares a king Susīma; and the Bodhisatta was the son of his family priest’s lady. When he was sixteen years old, his father died. The father while he lived was Teacher of the Ceremonies in the king’s elephant festivals. He alone had right to all the trappings and appointments of the elephants which came into the place of festival. By this means he gained as much as ten millions at each festival.

At the time of our story the season for an elephant festival came round. And the brahmins all flocked to the king, with these words, “O great king! The season for an elephant festival has come, and a festival should be made. But this your family priest’s son is very young; he knows neither the three Vedas nor the lore of elephants. Shall we conduct the ceremony?” To this the king consented.

Off went the brahmins delighted. “Aha,” they said, “we have barred this lad from performing the festival. We shall do it ourselves, and keep the gains!”

But the Bodhisatta’s mother heard that in four days there was to be an elephant festival. “For seven generations,” thought she, “we have managed the elephant festivals from father to son. The old custom will pass from us, and our wealth will all melt away!” She wept and wailed. “Why are you weeping?” asked her son. She told him. Said he, “Well, mother, shall I conduct the festival?” “What, you, sonny? You don’t know the three Vedas or the elephant lore; how can you do it?” “When are they going to have the festival, mother?” “Four days from now, my son.” “Where can I find teachers who know the three Vedas by heart, and all the elephant lore?” “Just such a famous teacher, my son, lives in Taxila, in the realm of Gandhāra, two thousand leagues away.” “Mother,” says he, “our hereditary right we shall not lose. One day will take me to Taxila; one night will be enough to teach me the three Vedas and the elephant lore; on the morrow I will journey home; and on the fourth day I will manage the elephant festival. Weep no more!” With these words he comforted his mother.

---

412 An elephant trainer’s manual, the hastisūtram or hastiśikṣā, cf. Mallinātha, Raghuvarṇa, vi. 27.

Early next morning he broke his fast, and set out all alone for Taxila, which he reached in a single day. Then seeking out the teacher, he greeted him and sat on one side. “Where have you come from?” the teacher asked. “From Benares, Teacher.” “To what end?” “To learn from you the three Vedas and the elephant lore.” “Certainly, my son, you shall learn it.” [2.33]

“But, sir,” said our Bodhisatta, “my case is urgent.” Then he recounted the whole matter, adding, “In a single day I have traversed a journey of two thousand leagues. Give me your time for this one night only. Three days from now there is to be an elephant festival; I will learn the whole after one lesson.”

The Teacher consented. Then the lad washed his master’s feet, and laid before him a fee of a thousand pieces of money; [2.48] he sat down on one side, and learned his lesson by heart; even as the day broke, he finished the three Vedas and the elephant lore. “Is there any more, sir?” asked he. “No, my son, you have it all.” “Sir,” he went on, “in this book such a verse comes in too late, such another has gone astray in the reading. This is the way to teach your pupils for the future,” and then he corrected his teacher’s knowledge for him.

After an early meal he took his leave, and in a single day he was back again in Benares, and greeting his mother. “Have you learned your lesson, my boy?” said she. He answered, yes; and she was delighted to hear it.

Next day, the festival of the elephants was prepared. A hundred elephants were set in array, with golden trappings, golden flags, all covered with a network of fine gold; and all the palace courtyard was decked out. There stood the brahmins, in all their fine gala dress, thinking to themselves, “Now we shall do the ceremony, we shall do it!” Presently came the king, in all his splendour, and with him the ornaments and other things that were used.

The Bodhisatta, apparend like a prince, at the head of his suite, approached the king with these words.

“Is it really true, O great king, that you are going to rob me of my right? Are you going to give other brahmins the managing of this ceremony? Have you said that you mean to give them the various ornaments and vessels that are used?” and he repeated the first verse as follows:

1. “Five score black elephants, with tusks all white
   Are thine, in gold caparison bedight.
   ‘To you, and you I give them’ – do you say,
   Remembering my old ancestral right?” [2.49]

King Susīma, thus addressed, then repeated the second verse:

2. “Five score black elephants, with tusks all white,
   Are mine, in gold caparison bedight.
   ‘To you, and you I give them’ – so I say,
   My lad, remembering your ancestral right.”

Then a thought struck the Bodhisatta; and he said: “Sire, if you do remember my ancient right and your ancient custom, why do you neglect me and make others the masters of your festival?” “Why, I [2.34] was told that you did not know the three Vedas or the elephant lore, and that is why I have caused the festival to be managed by others.” “Very well, sire. If there is one amongst all these brahmins who can recite a portion of the Vedas or the elephant lore against me, let him stand forward! Not in all Jambudīpa is there one save me who knows the three Vedas and the elephant lore for the ordering of an elephant festival!” [2.50] Proud as a lion’s roar rang out the answer! Not a brahmin did rise and contend with him. So the Bodhisatta kept his ancestral right, and conducted the ceremony; and laden with riches, he returned to his own home.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, some entered on the First Path, some on the Second, some the Third, and some the Fourth. “Mahāmāyā was at that time my mother, king Suddhodana was my father, Ānanda was king Susīma, Sāriputta the famous Teacher and I myself was the young brahmin.”

Ja 164 Gijjhajātaka

The Story about the Vulture (who supported his Mother)

(2s)

In the present one monk supports his parents who have fallen into poverty and have no one left at home to support them. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story about a merchant who saved some vultures and how they repaid his good deed.

The Bodhisatta = the vulture who supported his mother (mātuposakagijjha), Sāriputta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 540 Sāma,
Quoted at: Ja 164 Gijjha, Ja 398 Sutano, Ja 399 Gijjha, Ja 455 Mātiposaka, Ja 484 Sālikedāra, Ja 513 Jayaddisa, Ja 532 Sonananda.

Keywords: Filial piety, Gratitude, Animals, Birds.

“A vulture sees a corpse.” This story the Teacher told about a monk who had his mother to support. The circumstances will be related under the Sāmajātaka [Ja 540].

This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a certain monk who supported his mother. They say that there was a wealthy merchant at Sāvatthī, who was worth eighteen crores; and he had a son who was very dear and winning to his father and mother. One day the youth went upon the terrace of the house, and opened a window and looked down on the street; and when he saw the great crowd going to Jetavana with perfumes and garlands in their hands to hear the Dhamma preached, he exclaimed that he would go too.

So having ordered perfumes and garlands to be brought, he went to the monastery, and having distributed robes, medicines, drinks, etc. to the assembly and honoured the Fortunate One with perfumes and garlands, he sat down on one side. After hearing the Dhamma, and perceiving the evil consequences of desire and the blessings arising from adopting the ascetic life, when the assembly broke up he asked the Fortunate One for ordination, but he was told that the Tathāgatas do not ordain anyone who has not obtained the permission of his parents; so he went away, and lived a week without food, and having at last obtained his parents' consent, he returned and begged for ordination. The Teacher sent a monk who ordained him; and after he was ordained he obtained great honour and gain; he won the favour of his teachers and preceptors, and having received full orders he mastered the Dhamma in five years.

Then he thought to himself, “I live here distracted – it is not suitable for me,” and he became anxious to reach the goal of spiritual insight; so having obtained instruction in meditation from his teacher, he departed to a frontier village and dwelt in the forest, and there having entered a course of insight, however much he laboured and strove for twelve years, he failed to attain any special insight.

His parents also, as time went on, became poor, for those who hired their land or carried on merchandise for them, finding out that there was no son or brother in the family to enforce the payment, seized what they could lay their hands upon and ran away as they pleased, and the servants and labourers in the house seized the gold and coin and made off therewith, so that at the end the two were reduced to an evil plight and had not even a jug for pouring water; and at last they sold their dwelling, and finding themselves homeless, and in extreme misery, they wandered begging for alms, clothed in rags and carrying potsherds in their hands.

Now at that time a monk came from Jetavana to the son’s place of abode; he performed the duties of hospitality and, as he sat quietly, he first asked whence he was come; and learning that he was come from Jetavana he asked after the health of the Teacher and the principal disciples and then asked for news of his parents, “Tell me, sir, about the welfare of such and such a merchant’s family in Sāvatthi.” “O friend, don’t ask for news of that family.” “Why not, sir?” “They say that there was one son in that family, but he has become an ascetic in this dispensation, and since he left the world that family has gone to ruin; and at the present time the two old people are reduced to a most lamentable state and beg for alms.”

When he heard the other’s words he could not remain unmoved, but began to weep with his eyes full of tears, and when the other asked him why he wept, “O sir,” he replied, “they are my own father and mother, I am their son.” “O friend, your father and mother have come to ruin through you – do you go and take care of them.” “For twelve years,” he thought to himself, “I have laboured and striven but never been able to attain the Path or the Fruit: I must be incompetent; what have I to do with the ascetic life? I will become a householder and will support my parents and give away my wealth, and will thus eventually become destined for heaven.”

So having determined he gave up his abode in the forest to the elder, and the next day departed and by successive stages reached the monastery at the back of Jetavana which is not far from Sāvatthi. There he found two roads, one leading to Jetavana, the other to Sāvatthi. As he stood there, he thought: “Shall I see my parents first or the One with Ten Powers?” Then he said to himself, “In old days I saw my parents for a long time, from henceforth I shall rarely have the chance of seeing the Buddha; I will see the Fully Awakened One today and hear the Dhamma, and then tomorrow morning I will see my parents.” So he left the road to Sāvatthi and in the evening arrived at Jetavana.

Now that very day at daybreak, the Teacher, as he looked upon the world, had seen the potentialities of this young man, and when he came to visit him he praised the virtues of parents in the Mātiposakasutta [SN 7.19]. As he stood at the end of the assembly of elders and listened, he thought: “If I become a householder I can support my parents; but the Teacher also says, ‘A son who has become an ascetic can be helpful,’ I went away before without seeing the Teacher, and I failed in such an imperfect ordination; I will now support my parents while still remaining an ascetic without becoming a householder.” So he took his ticket and his ticket-food and gruel, and felt as if he had committed a wrong deserving expulsion after a solitary abode of twelve years in the forest. In the morning he went to Sāvatthi and he thought to himself, “Shall I first get the gruel or see my parents?” He reflected that it would not be right to visit them in their poverty empty-handed; so he first got the gruel and then went to the door of their old house.

When he saw them sitting by the opposite wall after having gone their round for the alms given in broth, he stood not far from them in a sudden burst of sorrow with his eyes full of tears. They saw him but knew him not; then his mother, thinking that it was someone standing for alms, said to him, “We have nothing fit to be given to you, be pleased to pass on.” When he heard her, he repressed the grief which filled his heart and remained still standing as before with his eyes full of tears, and when he was addressed a second and a third time he still continued standing.

At last the father said to the mother, “Go to him; can this be your son?” She rose and went to him and, recognising him, fell at his feet and lamented, and the father also joined his lamentations, and there was a loud outburst of sorrow. To see his parents he could not control himself, but burst into tears; then, after yielding to his feelings, he said: “Do not grieve, I will support you,” so having comforted them and made them drink some gruel, and sit down on one side, he went again and begged for some food and gave it to them, and then went and asked for alms for himself, and having finished his meal, took up his abode at a short distance off.

From that day forward he watched over his parents in this manner; he gave them all the alms he received for himself, even those at the fortnightly distributions, and he went on separate expeditions for his own alms, and ate them; and whatever food he received as provision for the rainy season he gave to them, while he took their worn-out garments and dyed them with the doors fast closed and used them himself; but the days were few when he gained alms and there were many when he failed to win anything, and his inner and outer clothing became very rough.

As he watched over his parents he gradually grew very pale and thin and his friends and intimates said to him, “Your complexion used to be bright, but now you have become very pale – has some illness come upon you?” He replied, “No illness has come upon me, but a hindrance has befallen me,” and he told them the history. “Sir,” they replied, “the Teacher does not allow us to waste the offerings of the faithful, you do an unlawful act in giving to laymen the offerings of the faithful.” When he heard this he shrank away ashamed.

But not satisfied with this they went and told it to the Teacher, saying: “So and so, sir, has wasted the offerings of the faithful and used them to feed laymen.”

The Teacher asked him whether he, a monk, was really supporting persons who were still living in the world. This the monk admitted, “How are they related to you?” the Teacher went on. “They are my parents, sir.” “Excellent, excellent,” the Teacher said; and bade the monks not be angry with this monk. “Wise men of old,” said he, “have done service even to those who were not of kin to them; but this man’s task has been to support his own parents.” So saying, he told them this story of bygone days.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life as a young vulture on Vulture Peak, and had his mother and father to nourish. [2.35]

Once there came a great wind and rain. The vultures could not hold their own against it; half frozen, they flew to Benares, and there near the wall and near the ditch they sat, shivering with the cold.

A merchant of Benares was issuing from the city on his way to bathe, when he spied these miserable vultures. He got them together in a dry place, made a fire, sent and brought them some cowflesh from the cattle’s burning-place, and put someone to look after them.

When the storm fell, {2.51} our vultures were all right and flew off at once among the mountains. Without delay they met, and thus took counsel together. “A Benares merchant has done us a good turn; and one good turn deserves another, as the saying is: so after this when any of us finds a garment or an ornament it must be dropped in that merchant’s courtyard.” So thenceforward if they ever noticed people drying their clothes or finery in the sun, watching for an unwary moment, they snatched them quickly, as hawks swoop on a bit of meat, and dropped them in the merchant’s yard. But he, whenever he observed that they were bringing him anything, used to cause it to be laid aside.

They told the king how vultures were plundering the city. “Just catch me one vulture,” says the king, “and I will make them bring it all back.” So snares and traps were set everywhere; our dutiful vulture was caught. They seized him with intent to bring him to the king. The merchant aforesaid, on the way to wait upon his majesty, saw these people walking along with the vulture. He went in their company, for fear they might hurt the vulture. They gave the vulture to the king, who examined him.

---

413 This seems to be another form of the “Grateful Beasts” incident which so often occurs in folk-tales.
“You rob our city, and carry off clothes and all sorts of things,” he began. “Yes, sire.” “Whom have they been given to?” “A merchant of Benares.” “Why?” “Because he saved our lives, and they say one good turn deserves another; that is why we gave them to him.”

“Vultures, they say,” said the king, “can spy a corpse a hundred leagues away; and can’t you see a trap set ready for you?” And with these words he repeated the first verse:

1. “A vulture sees a corpse that lies one hundred leagues away:
   When you alight upon a trap do you not see it, pray?” [2.52]

The vulture listened, then replied by repeating the second verse:

2. “When life is coming to an end, and death’s hour draws anigh, Though you may come close up to it, nor trap nor snare you spy.”

After this response of the vulture, the king turned to our merchant. “Have all these things really been brought to you, then, by the vultures?” [2.36]

“Yes, my lord.” “Where are they?” “My lord, they are all put away; each shall receive his own again – only let this vulture go!” He had his way; the vulture was set at liberty, and the merchant returned all the property to its owners.

This lesson ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the dutiful monk was established in the fruition of the First Path, “Ānanda was the king of those days; Sāriputta was the merchant; and I myself was the vulture that supported his parents.”

Ja 165 Nakulajātaka

The Story about the Mongoose (2s)

In the present two persons of high rank are always arguing with each other, and not even the king can prevent them. The Buddha teaches them loving-kindness and they are reconciled. He then tells a story of how he stopped the fighting of a snake and a mongoose in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the two ministers = the snake and the mongoose (sappo ca nakulo ca).

Present Source: Ja 154 Uraga,
Quoted at: Ja 165 Nakula, Ja 273 Kacchapa.

Keywords: Reconciliation, Loving-kindness, Animals.

“Creature, your egg-born enemy.” This story the Teacher told during a sojourn at Jetavana, about two officers who had a quarrel. The circumstances have been given above in the Uragajātaka [Ja 154].

Tradition tells how two soldiers, in the service of the king of Kosala, of high rank, and great persons at court, no sooner caught sight of one another than they used to exchange ill words. Neither king, nor friends, nor kinsfolk could make them agree.

It happened one day that early in the morning the Teacher, looking around to see which of his friends were ripe for release, perceived that these two were ready to enter upon the First Path. Next day he went all alone seeking alms in Sāvatthi, and stopped before the door of one of them, who came out and took the Teacher’s bowl; then led him within, and offered him a seat. The Teacher sat, and then enlarged on the profit of cultivating loving-kindness. When he saw the man’s mind was ready, he declared the Truths. This done, the other was established in the Fruit of the First Path. Seeing this, the Teacher persuaded him to take the bowl; then rising he proceeded to the house of the other. Out came the other, and after salutation given, begged the Teacher to enter, and gave him a seat. He also took the Teacher’s bowl, and entered along with him. To him the Teacher lauded the Eleven Blessings of Loving-kindness; and perceiving that his heart was ready, declared the Truths. And this done, he too became established in the Fruit of the First Path.

Thus they were both converted; they confessed their faults one to the other, and asked forgiveness; peaceful and harmonious, they were at one together. That very same day they ate together in the presence of the Fortunate One.

His meal over, the Teacher returned to the monastery. They both returned with him, bearing a rich present of flowers, scents and perfumes, of ghee, honey, and sugar. The Teacher, having preached of duty before the Saṅgha, and uttered a Sugata’s discourse, retired to his scented chamber.

Next morning, the monks talked the matter over in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend,” one would say to another, “our Teacher subdues the unsubdued. Why, here are these two grand persons, who have been quarrelling all this time, and could not be reconciled by the king himself, or friends and kinsfolk: and the Tathāgata has humbled them in a single day!’ The Teacher came in, ‘What are you talking about,’ asked he, ‘as you sit here together?’

Here, as before, the Teacher said: ‘This is not the first time, monks, these two nobles have been reconciled by me; in former times I reconciled them too.’ Then he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a certain village as one of a brahmin family. When he came of age, he was educated at Taxila; then, renouncing the world he became a recluse, cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and dwelt in the region of the Himālayas, living upon wild roots and fruits which he picked up in his goings to and fro.

At the end of his cloistered walk lived a mongoose in an ant-heap; and not far off, a snake lived in a hollow tree. These two, snake and mongoose, were perpetually quarrelling. The Bodhisatta preached to them the misery of quarrels and the blessing of peace, and reconciled the two together, saying: ‘You ought to cease your quarrelling and live together at one.’

When the serpent was abroad, the mongoose at the end of the walk lay with his head out of the hole in his ant-hill, and his mouth open, and thus fell asleep, heavily drawing his breath in and out. The Bodhisatta saw him sleeping there, and asking him, ‘Why, what are you afraid of?’ repeated the first verse:

1. ‘Creature, your egg-born enemy a faithful friend is made:
   Why sleep you there with teeth all bare? Of what are you afraid?’

   “Father,” said the mongoose, “never despise a former enemy, but always suspect him,” and he repeated the second verse:

---

414 Lit. ‘O viviparous one.’
2. “Never despise an enemy nor ever trust a friend:
A fear that springs from unfeared things uproots and makes an end.” {2.54}

“Fear not,” replied the Bodhisatta. “I have persuaded the snake to do you no harm; distrust him no more.” With this advice, he proceeded to cultivate the four Divine Abidings, and set his face toward Brahmā’s Realm. And the others too passed away to fare hereafter according to their deeds.

Then this lesson ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The two noblemen were at that time snake and mongoose, and I was myself the ascetic.”

Ja 166 Upasālhajātaka
The Story about (the Brahmin) Upasālha (2s)

Alternative Title: Upasāḷakajātaka (Cst)

In the present a brahmin is concerned that the place where he will be cremated is pure, and no outcaste had been cremated there before him. The Buddha tells them of a previous life in which he pointed out that every place on earth has seen endless people die on it.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the father and son = the same in the past (pitāputtā).

Keywords: Fastidiousness, Death.

“Fourteen thousand Upasāḷhas.” This story the Teacher told while at Jetavana, about a brahmin named Upasālha, who was fastidious in the matter of cemeteries.

This man, we learn, was rich and wealthy; but, though he lived over against the monastery, he showed no kindness to the Buddhas, being given to heresy. But he had a son, wise and intelligent. When he was growing old, the man said to his son, “Don’t let my body be burnt in a cemetery where any outcaste can be burnt, but find some uncontaminated place to burn me in.” “Father,” said the young fellow, “I know no cemetery fit to burn your body in. My father, take the lead and point out the place where I shall have you burnt.” So the brahmin consenting led his son out of the city to the top of Vulture Peak, and then said he, “Here, my son, no outcaste is ever burnt; here I would have you burn me.” Then he began to descend the hill in his son’s company.
On that day, in the evening, the Teacher was looking around to see which of his friends was ripe for release, and perceived that this father and son were ready to enter upon the First Path. So he took their road, and came to the foot of the hill, like a hunter waiting for his quarry; there he sat till they should come down from the top. Down they came, and noticed the Teacher. He gave them greeting, and asked, “Where are you bound, brahmins?” The young man told him their errand. “Come along, then,” said the Teacher, “show me the place your father pointed out.” So he and they two together climbed up the mountain. “Which place?” he asked. “Sir,” said the lad, “the space between these three hills is the one he showed me.” The Teacher said: “This is not the first time, my lad, that your father has been nice in the matter of cemeteries; he was the same before. Nor is it only now that he has pointed you out this place for his burning; long ago he pointed out the very same place.” And at his request the Teacher told them a tale of long ago.

In the past, in this very city of Rājagaha, lived this same brahmin Upasāḷhaka, and he had the very same son. At that period the Bodhisatta had been born in a brahmin family of Magadha land; and when his education was finished, he embraced an ascetic life, cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and lived a long time in the region of the Himālayas, plunged in mystic exaltation.

Once he left his hermitage on Vulture Peak to go buy salt and seasoning. While he was away, this brahmin spoke in just the same way to his son, as now. The lad begged him to point out a proper place, and he came and pointed out this very place. As he was descending, with his son, he observed the Bodhisatta, and approached him, and the Bodhisatta put the same question as I did just now, and received the son’s answer. “Ah,” said he, “we’ll see whether this place which your father has shown you is contaminated or not,” and made them go with him up the hill again. “The space between these three hills,” said the lad, “is pure.” “My lad,” the Bodhisatta replied, “there is no end to the people who have been burned in this very spot. Your own father, born a brahmin, as now, in Rājagaha, and bearing the very same name of Upasāḷhaka, has been burnt on this hill in fourteen 415 This added suffix [-ka] makes no practical difference in the word: it is often put on to adjectives and substantives without affecting their meaning. But sometimes it has a diminutive force.

---

thousand births. On the whole earth there's not a spot to be found where a corpse has not been burnt, which has not been a cemetery, which has not been covered with skulls.”

This he discerned by the faculty of knowing all previous lives: and then he repeated these two verses: [2.56]

1. “Fourteen thousand Upasāḷhas have been burnt upon this spot,
Nor is there the wide world over any place where death is not.

2. Where is kindness, truth, and justice, temperance and self-control,
There no death can find an entrance; there goes each saintly soul.” [2.39]

When the Bodhisatta had thus discoursed to father and son, he cultivated the four Divine Abidings and went his way to Brahmā’s Realm.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths father and son were established in the Fruit of the First Path. “The father and son were the same then as they are now, and the ascetic was I myself.”

Ja 167 Samiddhijātaka

The Story about (the Monk) Samiddhi (2s)

In the present one monk is in the peak of his manhood, a Devadhītā tries to tempt him, but he rebukes her as he knows not the time of his death. The Buddha tells a story of how he was similarly tempted in a past life.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the Devadhītā = the same in the past (Devadhītā).

Keywords: Temptation, Asceticism, Devas.

“Begging monk, do you know.” This story was told by the Teacher while he was staying in Tapoda Park near Rājagaha, about elder Samiddhi [Goodluck].

Once venerable Samiddhi had been wrestling in the spirit all night long. At sunrise he bathed; then he stood with his under garment on, holding the other in his hand, as he dried his body, all yellow as gold. Like a golden statue of exquisite workmanship he was, the perfection of beauty; [2.57] and that is why he was called Samiddhi.
A Devadhītā, seeing the elder’s surpassing beauty, fell in love with him, and addressed him thus. “You are young, monk, and fresh, a mere stripling, with black hair, bless you! You have youth, you are lovely and pleasant to the eyes. Why should a man like you turn ascetic without a little enjoyment? Take your pleasure first, and then you shall become ascetic and do what the ascetics do!” He replied, “Nymph, at some time or other I must die, and the time of my death I know not; that time is hid from me. Therefore in the freshness of my youth I will follow the solitary life, and make an end of suffering.”

Finding she received no encouragement, the Devadhītā at once vanished. The elder went and told his Teacher about it. Then the Teacher said: “Not now alone, Samiddhi, are you tempted by a Devadhītā. In olden days, as now, Devadhītā tempted ascetics.” And then at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a brahmin’s son in a village of Kāsi. Coming of years, he attained perfection in all his studies, and embraced the ascetic life; and he lived in the Himālayas, nearby a natural lake, cultivating the Super Knowledges and Attainments. [2.40]

All night long he had wrestled in the spirit; and at sunrise he bathed himself, and with one bark garment on and the other in his hand, he stood, letting the water dry off his body. At that moment a Devadhītā observed his perfect beauty, and fell in love with him. Tempting him, she repeated this first verse:

1. “Begging brother, do you know
   What of joy the world can show?
   Now’s the time – there is no other:
   Pleasure first, then – begging brother!” {2.58}

The Bodhisatta listened to the Devatā’s address, and then replied, declaring his set purpose, by repeating the second verse:
2. “The time is hid – I cannot know
When is the time that I must go:
Now is the time: there is no other:
So I am now a begging brother.”

When the Devadhītā heard the Bodhisatta’s words, she vanished at once.

After this discourse the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The Devadhītā is the same in both stories, and the ascetic at that time was I myself.”

Ja 168 Sakuṇagghiṭṭāka
The Story about the Falcon (2s)

In the present the Buddha teaches the monks a discourse outlining their proper objectives, and what to avoid. He then tells a story of the past in which a quail was caught by a falcon, but managed to escape him when on home ground.

The Bodhisatta = the quail (lāpa),
Devadatta = the falcon (sena).

Keywords: Suitability, Focus, Animals, Birds.

“A quail was in his feeding-ground.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about his meaning in the Discourse about the Bird Preaching.

One day the Teacher called the monks, saying: “When you seek alms, monks, keep each to your own district.” And repeating that Discourse from the Mahāvagga which suited the occasion, {2.59} he added, “But wait a moment: previously others even in the form of animals refused to keep to their own [2.41] districts, and by poaching on other people’s preserves, they fell into the way of their enemies, and then by their own intelligence and resource got free from the hands of their enemies.” With these words he related a story of the past.

---

416 The commentator, in explaining this passage, adds another couplet: “Life, sickness, death, the putting off the flesh, Rebirth – these five are hidden in this world.”

417 [Sakuṇagghisutta, SN 47.6.]
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a young quail. He got his food in hopping about over the clods left after ploughing.

One day he thought he would leave his feeding ground and try another; so off he flew to the edge of a forest. As he picked up his food there, a falcon spied him, and attacking him fiercely, he caught him fast.

Held prisoner by this falcon, our quail moaned, “Ah! How very unlucky I am! How little sense I have! I'm poaching on Someone else's preserves! O that I had kept to my own place, where my fathers were before me! Then this falcon would have been no match for me, I mean if he had come to fight!”

“Why, quail, says the falcon, “what’s your own ground, where your fathers fed before you?” “A ploughed field all covered with clods!” At this the falcon, relaxing his strength, let go. “Off with you, quail! You won't escape me, even there!”

The quail flew back and perched on an immense clod, and there he stood, calling, “Come along now, falcon!”

Straining every nerve, poising both wings, down swooped the falcon fiercely upon our quail, “Here he comes with a vengeance!” thought the quail; and as soon as he saw him in full career, just turned over and let him strike full against the clod of earth. The falcon could not stop himself, and struck his breast against the earth; this broke his heart, and he fell dead with his eyes starting out of his head. [2.60]

When this tale had been told, the Teacher added, “Thus you see, monks, how even animals fall into their enemies' hands by leaving their proper place; but when they keep to it, they conquer their enemies. Therefore do you take care not to leave your own place and intrude upon another's. O monks, when people leave their own station Māra finds a door, Māra gets a foothold. What is foreign ground, monks, and what is the wrong place for a monk? I mean the Five Pleasures of Sense. What are these five? The Lust of the Eye... [and so on]. This, monks, is

---

418 Māra is Death, and is used by Buddha for the Evil One.
419 The passage is corrupt. We must read ‘cakkhu-ādi-viññeyyā.’
the wrong place for a monk.” Then growing perfectly enlightened he repeated the first verse:

1. “A quail was in his feeding ground, when, swooping from on high.
A falcon came; but so it fell he came to death thereby.” [2.42]

When he had thus perished, out came the quail, exclaiming, “I have seen the back of my enemy!” and perching upon his enemy’s breast, he gave voice to his exalted utterance in the words of the second verse:

2. “Now I rejoice at my success: a clever plan I found
To rid me of my enemy by keeping my own ground.”

This discourse at an end, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka. At the conclusion of the Truths many monks were established in the Paths or their Fruition, “Devadatta was the falcon of those days, and the quail was I myself.”

Ja 169 Arakajātaka
The Story about (the Teacher) Araka (2s)

In the present the Buddha teaches the monastics the benefits of practising loving-kindness. He then tells how he gave a similar teaching as an ascetic in a previous life and attained heaven when he passed away.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher Araka (Arako satthā), the Buddha’s disciples = the sage’s followers (isigaṇa).

Keywords: Loving-kindness, Compassion.

“The heart that boundless pity feels.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about the Discourse on Loving-kindness.

On one occasion the Teacher thus addressed the Saṅgha, “Monks, loving-kindness practised with all devotion of thought, {2.61} meditated upon, increased, made a vehicle of progress, made your one object, practised, well begun, may be expected to produce Eleven Blessings.420 What are these eleven? Happy he sleeps and happy

420 [See AN 11.15 Mettāniṁsasuttaṁ, or Mettāsuttaṁ.]
he awakes; he sees no bad dreams; men love him; Amanussas guard him; fire, poison, and sword come not near him; quickly he becomes absorbed in mind; his look grows calm; he dies undismayed; without need of further wisdom he goes to Brahmag’s Realm. Loving-kindness, monks, practised with renunciation of one’s wishes” and so forth, “may be expected to produce these Eleven Blessings. Praising the loving-kindness which holds these Eleven Blessings, monks, a monk ought to show kindness to all creatures, whether expressly commanded or not, he should be a friend to the friendly, aye a friend to the unfriendly, and a friend to the indifferent: thus to all without distinction, whether expressly hidden or not, he should show loving-kindness: he should show sympathy with joy and sorrow and practise equanimity; he should do his work by means of the four Divine Abidings. By so doing he will go to Brahmag’s Realm even without Path or Fruit. Wise men of old by cultivating loving-kindness for seven years, have dwelt in Brahmag’s Realm seven ages, each with its one period to wax and one to wane.”

And he told them a story. [2.43]

In the past, in a former age, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin’s family. When he grew up, he forsook his sensual desires and embraced the ascetic life, and attained the four Divine Abidings. His name was Araka, and he became a Teacher, and lived in the Himâlayas region, with a large body of followers. Admonishing his band of sages, he said: “A recluse must show loving-kindness, sympathetic must he be both in joy and sorrow, and full of equanimity; for this thought of loving-kindness attained by resolve prepares him for Brahmag’s Realm.” And explaining the blessing of loving-kindness, he repeated these verses:

1. “The heart that boundless pity feels for all things that have birth,
   In heaven above, in realms below, and on this middle earth,

---

421 See Childers, Dict. p. 185 b. The belief still lives. Two gentlemen who visited the Chief of Chinese Lamaism and the High Priest of Buddhism in Pekin, in 1890, talked with them over the decline of Buddhism in this age. Both admitted it, the [43] Buddhist attributing it to want of government support, while the Lama thought it was because this is a waning period in religion; but as the waxing follows the waning he looked forward to a revival. (Baptist Missionary Herald, 1890.)
2. Filled full of pity infinite, infinite generosity,
   In such a heart nought narrow or confined can ever be.”  {2.62}

Thus did the Bodhisatta discourse to his pupils on the practice of loving-kindness and its blessings. And without a moment’s interruption of his Absorption, he was reborn in the Brahmā Realm, and for seven ages, each with his time to wax and wane, he came no more to this world.

After finishing this discourse, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The band of sages of that time are now the Buddha’s followers; and I myself am he that was the Teacher Araka.”

Ja 170 Kakaṇṭakajātaka
The Story about (the Proud) Chameleon (2s)

There is no story of the present. In a previous life a chameleon shows his respect to a king and is amply rewarded, but when one day he is given a coin he wears it with pride, and the king becomes angry.

The Bodhisatta = paṇḍita Mahosadha.

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 170 Kakaṇṭaka.

Keywords: Pride, Conceit, Animals.

{2.63} This Kakaṇṭakajātaka will be given below in the Mahā-ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

On a day the king went with the sage [Mahosadha] into the park; when a chameleon, which lived on the top of the arched gateway, saw the king approach, came down and lay flat upon the ground. The king seeing this asked, “What is he doing, wise sir?” “Paying respect to you, sire.” “If so, let not his service be without reward; give him a largess.” “Sire, a largess is of no use to him; all he wants is something to eat.” “And what does he eat?” “Meat, sire.” “How much ought he to have?” “A farthing’s worth, sire.” “A farthing’s worth is no gift from a king,” said the king, and he sent a man with orders to bring regularly and give to the chameleon a half-anna’s worth of meat. This was done thereafter. But on a fast day, when there is no killing, the man could find no meat; so he bored a hole through the half-anna piece, and strung it upon a thread, and tied it upon the chameleon’s neck. This made the creature proud. That day the king again went into the park; but the chameleon as he saw the king draw near, in pride of wealth made himself equal to the king, thinking within himself, “You may be very rich, Vedeha, but so am I.” So he did not come down, but lay still on the archway, stroking his head. The king seeing this said: “Wise sir, this creature does not come down today as usual; what is the reason?” And he recited the first verse:

1. “That chameleon used not to climb upon the archway: explain, Mahosadha, why the chameleon has become stiff-necked.”

The sage perceived that the man must have been unable to find meat on this fast day when there was no killing, and that the creature must have become proud because of the coin hung about his neck; so he recited this verse:

2. “The chameleon has got what he never had before, a half-anna piece; hence he despises Vedeha lord of Mithilā.”

The king sent for the man and questioned him, and he told him all about it truly. Then he was more than ever pleased with the sage, who (it seemed) knew the thoughts of the chameleon, without asking any questions, with a wisdom like the supreme wisdom of a Buddha; so he gave him the revenue taken at the four gates. Being angry with the chameleon, he thought of discontinuing the gift, but the sage told him that it was unfitting and dissuaded him.

Ja 171 Kalyāṇadhhammagātaka
The Story about the Beautiful (2s)

In the present while one householder goes to listen to the Buddha, his relatives misunderstand the situation and think he has ordained, and start to talk about it. On his way back he hears what the people are saying, and decides to live up to the rumour, goes back and ordains. The Buddha tells a story of a similar event in one of his past lives.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasiseṭṭhi), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Past Compare: Jm 20 Śreṣṭhi.

Keywords: Expectation, Aspiration.
“O king, when people hail us.” [2.44] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a deaf mother-in-law.

It is said that there was a householder in Sāvatthi, one of the faithful, a true believer, who had fled to the Three Refuges, endowed with the Five Precepts. One day he set out to listen to the Teacher at Jetavana, bearing plenteous ghee and condiments of all sorts, flowers, perfumes, etc. At the same time, his wife’s mother started to visit her daughter, and brought a present of solid food and gruel. She was a little hard of hearing.

After dinner – one feels a little drowsy after a meal – she said, by way of keeping herself awake, “Well, and does your husband live happily with you? Do you agree together?” “Why, mother, what a thing to ask! You could hardly find a holy ascetic who is so good and virtuous as he!” The good woman did not quite take in what her daughter said, but she caught the word, “Ascetic” and cried she, “O dear, why has your husband turned ascetic!” and a great to-do she made. Everybody who lived in that house heard it, and cried, “News – the householder has turned ascetic!” People heard the noise, and a crowd gathered at the door to find out what it was. “The householder who lives here has turned ascetic!” was all they heard.

Our householder listened to the One with Ten Power’s sermon, then left the monastery to return to the city. Midway a man met him, who cried, “Why, master, they do say you’ve turned ascetic, and all your family and servants are crying at home!” [2.64] Then these thoughts passed through his mind. “People say I have turned ascetic when I have done nothing of the kind. A lucky speech must not be neglected; this day an ascetic I must be.” Then and there he turned right round, and went back to the Teacher. “You paid your visit to the Buddha,” the Teacher said, “and went away. What brings you back here again?” The man told him about it, adding, “A lucky speech, sir, must not be neglected. So here I am, and I wish to become an ascetic.” Then he received the lesser and the greater orders, and lived a good life; and very soon he became an Arahat.

The story got known amongst the Saṅgha. One day they were discussing it all together in the Dhamma Hall, on this fashion, “I say, friend, householder So-and-so took orders because he said ‘a lucky speech must never be neglected,’ and now he has became an Arahat!” The Teacher came in and wanted to know what it was they were talking about. They told him. Said he, “Monks, wise men in days long past also went forth because they said that a lucky speech must never be neglected,” and then he told them a story of olden days.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a rich merchant’s son; and when he grew up and his father died he took his father’s place.

Once he had gone to pay his respects to the king; and his mother-in-law came on a visit to her daughter. She was a little hard of hearing, and all happened just as it has happened above. The husband was on [2.45] his way back from paying his respects to the king, when he was met by a man, who said: “They say you have turned ascetic, and there’s such a hullabaloo in your house!” The Bodhisatta, thinking that lucky words must never be neglected, turned right round and went back to the king. The king asked what brought him back again. “My lord,” said he, “all my people are bewailing me, I am told, because I have turned ascetic, when I have done nothing of the kind. But lucky words must not be neglected, and an ascetic I will be. I crave your permission to become an ascetic!” And he explained the circumstances by the following verses: [2.65]

1. “O king, when people hail us by the name
   Of holy, we must make our acts the same:
   We must not waver nor fall short of it;
   We must take up the yoke for very shame.

2. O king, this name has been bestowed on me:
   Today they cry how holy I must be:
   Therefore I would an ascetic live and die;
   I have no taste for joy and revelry.”

Thus did the Bodhisatta ask the king’s leave to embrace the ascetic life. Then he went away to the Himālayas, and becoming an ascetic he cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments and at last came to Brahmā’s Realm.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, identified the Jātaka, “Ānanda was king in those days, and I myself was the rich Benares merchant.”
The Section with Two Verses – 702

Ja 172 Daddarajātaka

The Story about (the Jackal’s) Roar (2s)

In the present Kokālika wanted to be one of those who recited the scriptures, and was invited to do so, but when he appeared in front of the Saṅgha he could not remember one verse. The Buddha tells a story of a jackal who joined in with lions when they roared and was scorned for his vanity.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the lions (sīharājā),
Rāhula = the young lion (sīhapotaka),
Kokālika = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 172 Daddara,
Quoted at: Ja 188 Sīhakoṭṭhuka, Ja 189 Sīhacamma.

Keywords: Recitation, Vanity, Animals.

“Who is it with a mighty cry.” This is a story which the Teacher told at Jetavana about one Kokālika. At this time we hear that there were a number of very learned monks in the district of Manosilā, who spoke out like young lions, loud enough to bring down the heavenly Ganges,\(^{422}\) while reciting passages of scripture before the Saṅgha. As they recited their texts, Kokālika (not knowing what an empty fool he showed himself) thought he would like to do the same. So he went about among the monks saying: “They don’t ask me to recite a piece of scripture. If [2.46] they were to ask me, I would do it.” All the Saṅgha got to know of it and they thought they would try him. “Friend Kokālika,” they said, “give the Saṅgha a recital of some scriptures today.” To this he agreed, not knowing his folly; that day he would recite before the Saṅgha.

He first partook of gruel made to his liking, ate some food, and had some of his favourite soup. At sundown the gong sounded for sermon time; all the Saṅgha gathered together. The ‘yellow robe’ which he put on was blue as a bluebell; his outer robe was pure white. Thus clad, he entered the meeting, greeted the elders, stepped up to a Dhamma Seat under a grand jewelled pavilion, holding an elegantly carved fan, and sat down, ready to begin his recitation. But just at that moment beads of sweat began to start out all over him, and he felt ashamed. The first verse of the first verse he repeated; but what came next he could not think. So rising from the seat in confusion, he passed out through the meeting, and sought his own cell. Someone else, a real scholar, recited the scripture. After that all the monks knew how empty he was.

\(^{422}\) The Milky Way. See the Story of the Present to No. 1, above.

One day the monks fell a talking of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, it was not easy to see formerly how empty Kokālika is; but now he has given tongue of his own accord, and shown it.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were discussing together. They told him. He said: “Monks, this is not the first time Kokālika has betrayed himself by his voice; the very same thing happened before,” and then he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a young lion, and was the king of many lions. With a suite of lions he dwelt in Silver Cave. Near by was a jackal, living in another cave.

One day, after a shower of rain, all the lions were together at the entrance of their leader’s cave, roaring loudly and gambolling about as lions do. As they were thus roaring and playing, the jackal too lifted up his voice. “Here’s this jackal, giving tongue along with us!” said the lions; they felt ashamed, and were silent. When they all fell silent, the Bodhisatta’s cub asked him this question. “Father, all these lions that were roaring and playing about have fallen silent for very shame on hearing that creature. What creature is it that betrays itself thus by its voice?” and he repeated the first verse:

1. “Who is it with a mighty cry makes Daddara resound? Who is it, Lord of Beasts? And why has he no welcome found?”

At his son’s words the old lion repeated the second verse:

2. “The jackal, of all beasts most vile, ’tis he that makes that sound: The lions loathe his baseness, while they sit in silence round.”

“Monks,” the Teacher added, “ ’tis not the first time Kokālika has betrayed himself by his voice; it was just the same before,” and bringing his discourse to an end, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Kokālika was the jackal, Rāhula was the young lion, and I was myself the lion king.”
In the present one monk gets his living in dishonest ways. When the Buddha finds out he tells a story of a monkey who tried to disguise himself as an ascetic, but was chased back into the jungle.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Rāhula = the young ascetic (tāpasakumāra),
the cheating monk = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla,
Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādīccupāṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Deceit, Disguise, Animals.

“Father, see! A poor old fellow.” [2.47] [2.68] This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about a rogue. The circumstances will be explained in the Uddālaṇjātaka [Ja 487], Book xiv.

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a dishonest monk. This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him.

Here too the Teacher said: “Monks, not this once only has the fellow turned out a rogue; in days of yore, when he was a monkey, he played tricks for the sake of a fire.” And he told a tale of days long gone by.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family in a village of Kāsi. When he came of years, he received his education at Taxila, and settled down in life.
His lady in time bore him a son; and when the child could just run to and fro, she died. The husband performed her obsequies, and then, said he, “What is home to me now? I and my son will live the life of ascetics.” Leaving his friends and kindred in tears, he took the lad to the Himālayas, became an ascetic, and lived on the fruits and roots which the forest yielded.

On a day during the rainy season, when there had been a downpour, he kindled some sticks, and lay down on a pallet, warming himself at the fire. And his son sat beside him massaging his feet.

Now a wild monkey, miserable with cold, spied the fire in the leaf-hut of our ascetic. “Now,” he thought, “suppose I go in: they’ll cry out monkey! monkey! and beat me back: I shan’t get a chance of warming myself. I have it!” he cried. “I’ll get an ascetic’s dress, and get inside by a trick!” So he put on the bark dress of a dead ascetic, lifted his basket and crooked stick, and took his stand by the hut door, where he crouched down beside a palm tree. The lad saw him, and cried to his father (not knowing he was a monkey) “Here’s an old ascetic, sure enough, miserably cold, come to warm himself at the fire.” [2.69] Then he addressed his father in the words of the first verse, begging him to let the poor fellow in to warm himself:

1. “Father, see! A poor old fellow huddled by a palm tree there!
   Here we have a hut to live in; let us give the man a share.” [2.48]

When the Bodhisatta heard this, up he got and went to the door. But when he saw the creature was only a monkey, he said: “My son, men have no such face as that; ’tis a monkey, and he must not be asked in here.” Then he repeated the second verse:

2. “He would but defile our dwelling if he came inside the door;
   Such a face – ’tis easy telling – no good brahmin ever bore.”

The Bodhisatta seized a brand, crying, “What do you want there?” threw it at him, and drove him away. The monkey dropped his bark garments, sprang up a tree, and buried himself in the forest.

Then the Bodhisatta cultivated the four Divine Abidings until he came unto Brahmā’s Realm.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “This tricky monk was the monkey of those days; Rāhula123 was the ascetic’s son, and I myself was the ascetic.”

Ja 174 Dūbhiyamakkaṭajātaka
The Story about the Treacherous Monkey (2s)

Alternative Title: Dubbhiyamakkaṭajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta’s lack of gratitude is notorious amongst the monks. The Buddha tells a story about a previous life in which he helped a thirsty monkey, only for the monkey to make his droppings fall on the head of his benefactor.

The Bodhisatta = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
Devadatta = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Keywords: Ingratitude, Treachery, Animals.

“Plenty of water.” {2.70} This story the Teacher told in his sojourn at Veḷuvana, about Devadatta. One day it happened that the monks were talking in the Dhamma Hall about Devadatta's ingratitude and treachery to his friends, when the Teacher broke in, “Not this once only, monks, has Devadatta been ungrateful and treacherous to his own friends. He was just the same before.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family in a certain Kāsi village, and when he grew of age, married and settled down. Now in those days there was a certain deep well by the highway in Kāsi, which had no way [2.49] down to it. The people who passed by that way, to win merit, used to draw water by a long rope and a bucket, and fill a trough for the animals; thus they gave the animals water to drink. All around lay a mighty forest, wherein troops of monkeys dwelt.

It happened by a chance that for two or three days the supply of water which wayfarers used to draw ceased; and the creatures could get nothing to drink. A

---

123 Gotama Buddha’s son.
monkey, tormented with thirst, walked up and down by the well looking for water.

Now the Bodhisatta came that way on some errand, drew water for himself, drank it, and washed his hands; then he noticed our monkey. Seeing how thirsty he was, the traveller drew water from the well and filled the trough for him. Then he sat down under a tree, to see what the creature would do.

The monkey drank, sat down near, and pulled a monkey-grimace, to frighten the Bodhisatta. “Ah, you bad monkey!” said he, at this, “when you were thirsty and miserable, I gave you plenty of water; and now you make monkey-faces at me. Well, well, help a rascal and you waste your pains.” And he repeated the first verse:

1. “Plenty of water did I give to you
   When you were massaging hot and thirsty too:
   Now full of mischief you sit chattering,
   With wicked people best have nought to do.”

Then this spiteful monkey replied, “I suppose you think that’s all I can do. Now I'll drop something on your head before I go.” Then, repeating the second verse, he went on:

2. “A well-conducted monkey who did ever hear or see?
   I leave my droppings on your head; for such our manners be.”

As soon as he heard this the Bodhisatta got up to go. But at the very instant this monkey from the branch where he sat dropped it like a festoon upon his head; and then made off into the forest shrieking. The Bodhisatta washed, and went his way. {2.72}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, after saying: “It is not only now that Devadatta is so, but in former days also he would not acknowledge a kindness which I showed him,” he identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was the monkey then, and the brahmin was I myself.”
Ja 175 Ādiccupaṭṭhānajātaka
The Story about Worshipping the Sun (2s)

In the present there is a rogue; we are told no more about him. The Buddha tells a story of a monkey who dressed himself up as an ascetic in order to receive alms, but who was chased off with sticks and clods.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s group (isigaṇa),
the cheating monk = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Present Source: Ja 487 Uddāla,
Quoted at: Ja 89 Kuhaka, Ja 138 Godha, Ja 173 Makkaṭa, Ja 175 Ādiccupaṭṭhāna, Ja 336 Brahāchatta, Ja 377 Setaketu.

Keywords: Deceit, Animals.

“There is no tribe.” [2.50] This is a story told by the Teacher in Jetavana, about a rogue. 424

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling in Jetavana, about a dishonest monk. This man, even though dedicated to the dispensation that leads to safety, notwithstanding to gain life’s necessaries fulfilled the threefold cheating practice [seeking requisites, seeking honour and hinting].

The monks brought to light all the evil parts in the man as they conversed together in the Dhamma Hall, “Such a one, monks, after he had dedicated himself to this dispensation which leads to safety, yet lives in deceit!” The Teacher came in, and would know what they talked of there. They told him. Said he, “This is not now the first time; he was deceitful before,” and so saying he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a brahmin family of Kāsi. Coming of years, he went to Taxila, and there completed his education. Then he embraced the ascetic life, cultivated the Super

424 [I include the standard story here, which comes from Ja 487 Uddālajātaka.]
Knowledges and Attainments, and becoming the preceptor of a large band of pupils he spent his life in the Himālayas.

There for a long time he abode; until once in need of salt and seasoning, he came down from the highlands to a border village, where he stayed in a leaf-hut. When they were absent seeking alms, a mischievous monkey used to enter the hermitage, and turn everything upside down, spill the water out of the jars, smash the jugs, and finish by making a mess in the cell where the fire was.

The rains over, the ascetics thought of returning, and took leave of the villagers, “For now,” they thought, “the flowers and fruit are ripening on the mountains.” “Tomorrow,” was the answer, “we will come to your dwelling with our alms; you shall eat before you go.” So next day they brought there plenty of food, solid and liquid. The monk thought to himself, “I'll trick these people and cajole them into giving me some food too.” So he put on the air of a holy man seeking alms, and close by the ascetics he stood, worshipping the sun. When the people saw him, they thought: “Holy are they who live with the holy,” and repeated the first verse:

1. “There is no tribe of animals but hath its virtuous one:
   See how this wretched monkey here stands worshipping the sun!”

After this fashion the people praised our monkey’s virtues. But the Bodhisatta, observing it, replied, “You don’t know the ways of a mischievous monkey, or you would not praise one who little deserves praise,” adding the second verse:

2. “You praise this creature’s character because you know him not;
   He has defiled the sacred fire, and broke each waterpot.” [2.51]

When the people heard what a rascally monkey it was, seizing sticks and clods they pelted him, and gave their alms to the monks. The sages returned to the Himālayas; and without once interrupting their Absorption they came at last to Brahmā’s Realm.

At the end of this discourse, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “This deceitful person was in those days the monkey; the Buddha’s followers were the company of sages; and their leader was I myself.”
In the present a king of Kosala wants to go on an expedition with his army, but first he sought the counsel of the Buddha, who tells a story of monkey who lost one pea, and dropped all the other peas he had when seeking to find the lost one.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañditāmacca), Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 176 Kalāyamutṭhi, Quoted at: Ja 226 Kosiya.

Keywords: Contentment, Greed, Animals.

“A foolish monkey.” {2.74} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a king of Kosala.

One rainy season, disaffection broke out on his borders. The troops stationed there, after two or three battles in which they failed to conquer their adversaries, sent a message to the king. In spite of the season, in spite of the rains, he took the field, and encamped before Jetavana. Then he began to ponder. “’Tis a bad season for an expedition; every crevice and hollow is full of water; the road is heavy: I’ll go visit the Teacher. He will be sure to ask ‘whither away,’ then I’ll tell him. It is not only in things of the future life that our Teacher protects me, but he protects in the things which we now see. So if my going is not to prosper, he will say ‘It is a bad time to go, sire;’ but if I am to prosper, he will say nothing.” So into Jetavana he came, and after greeting the Teacher sat down on one side.

“Whence come you, O king,” asked the Teacher, “at this unseasonable hour?” “Sir,” he replied, “I am on my way to quell a border rising; and I come first to bid you farewell.” To this the Teacher said: “So it happened before, that mighty monarchs, before setting out for war, have listened to the word of the wise, and turned back from an unseasonable expedition.” Then, at the king’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, he had a councillor who was his right-hand man and gave him advice in things spiritual and temporal.
There was a rising on the frontier, and the [2.52] troops there stationed sent the king a letter. The king started, rainy season though it was, and formed a camp in his park. The Bodhisatta stood before the king. At that moment the people had steamed some peas for the horses, and poured them out into a trough. One of the monkeys that lived in the park jumped down from a tree, filled his mouth and hands with the peas, then up again, and sitting down in the tree he began to eat. As he ate, one pea fell from his hand upon the ground. Down dropped at once all the peas from his hands and mouth, [2.75] and down from the tree he came, to hunt for the lost pea. But that pea he could not find; so he climbed up his tree again, and sat still, very glum, looking like someone who had lost a thousand in some lawsuit.

The king observed what the monkey had done, and pointed it out to the Bodhisatta. “Friend, what do you think of that?” he asked. To which the Bodhisatta made answer, “King, this is what fools of little wit are wont to do; they spend a pound to win a penny,” and he went on to repeat the first verse:

1. “A foolish monkey, living in the trees,
   O king, when both his hands were full of peas,
   Has thrown them all away to look for one:
   There is no wisdom, sire, in such as these.”

Then the Bodhisatta approached the king, and addressing him again, repeated the second verse:

2. “Such are we, O mighty monarch, such all those that greedy be;
   Losing much to gain a little, like the monkey and the pea.” [2.76]

On hearing this address the king turned and went straight back to Benares. And the outlaws hearing that the king had set forth from his capital to make mincemeat of his enemies, hurried away from the borders.

At the time when this story was told, the outlaws ran away in just the same fashion. The king, after listening to the Teacher's utterances, rose and took his leave, and went back to Sāvatthi.

The Teacher, after this discourse was at an end, identified the Jātaka, “In those days Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the wise councillor.”
The Story about the Ebony Tree (2s)

Alternative Title: Tindukajātaka (Cst)

In the present the Buddha’s wisdom is being praised. He tells a story of how, in the olden days, he had calmed a trapped troop of monkeys he was leading, until an escape could be had from the predicament they were in.

The Bodhisatta = the lord of the monkeys (vānarinda),
the Buddha’s disciples = the group of monkeys (vānaragaṇa),
Mahānāma = the nephew.

Present Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga,
Quoted at: Ja 177 Tiṇḍuka, Ja 387 Sūci, Ja 402 Sattubhasta, Ja 515 Sambhava, Ja 528 Mahābodhi.

Keywords: Resourcefulness, Calm, Animals, Devas.

“All around us see them stand.” [2.53] This is a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about the Perfection of Wisdom.

One day the monks sat in the Dhamma Hall and described the Tathāgata’s Perfection of Wisdom, “Monks, the Tathāgata is greatly wise, his wisdom is vast, ready, swift, sharp, crushing heretical doctrines, after having converted, by the power of his own knowledge, the brahmins Kūṭadanta and the rest, the ascetics Sabhiya and the rest, the thieves Angulimāla and the rest, the Yakkhas Āḷavaka and the rest, the Devas Sakka and the rest, and the Brahmās Baka and the rest, made them humble, and ordained a vast multitude as ascetics and established them in the fruition of the paths of sanctification.”

As in the Mahābodhijātaka [Ja 528], and the Ummaggajātaka [Ja 538], on hearing his own knowledge praised, he remarked, “Not only is the Tathāgata wise this one time, but he was wise before, and had skill in means,” and he told the following story of the past.

425 [I include the story above.]
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a monkey, and with a troop of eighty thousand monkeys he lived in the Himālayas. Not far off was a village, sometimes inhabited and sometimes empty. And in the midst of this village was an ebony\textsuperscript{126} tree, with sweet fruit, covered with twigs and branches. When the place was empty, all the monkeys used to go there and eat the fruit.

Once, in the fruiting time, the village was full of people, a bamboo palisade set about it, and the gates guarded. And this tree \{2.77\} stood with all its boughs bending beneath the weight of the fruit. The monkeys began to wonder, “There’s such and such a village, where we used to get fruit to eat. I wonder has that tree fruit upon it or no; are the people there or no?” At last they sent a scout to spy. He found that there was fruit on the tree, and the village was crammed with people. When the monkeys heard that there was fruit on the tree, they determined to get that sweet fruit to eat; and waxing bold, a crowd of them went and told their chief. The chief asked was the village full or empty; full, they said. “Then you must not go,” said he, “because men are very deceitful.” “But, sire, we’ll go at midnight, when everybody is fast asleep, and then eat!” So this great company obtained leave of their chief, and came down from the mountains, and waited on a great rock nearby until the people retired to rest; in the middle watch, when people were asleep, they climbed the tree and began eating of the fruit.

A man had to get up in the night for some necessary purpose; he went out into the village, and there he saw the monkeys. At once he gave the alarm; out the people came, armed with bow and quiver, or holding any \[2.54\] sort of weapon that came to hand, sticks, or lumps of earth, and surrounded the tree, “When dawn comes,” thought they, “we have them!”

The eighty thousand monkeys saw these people, and were scared to death. Thought they, “We have no help but from our chief only,” so to him they came, and recited the first verse:

\textsuperscript{126} \textit{Tiṇḍuka, Diospyros Embryopteris} (Childers).
1. “All around us see them stand, warriors armed with bow and quiver,
All around us, sword in hand: who is there who can deliver?” {2.78}

At this the monkey chief answered, “Fear not; human beings have plenty to do. It is the middle watch now; there they stand, thinking – ‘We’ll kill them!’ but we will find some other business to hinder this business of theirs.” And to console the monkeys he repeated the second verse:

2. “Men have many things to do; something will disperse the meeting;
See what still remains for you; eat, while fruit is left for eating.”

The Great Being comforted the monkey troop. If they had not had this crumb of comfort their hearts would have broken and they would have perished. When the Great Being had consoled the monkeys, he cried, “Assemble all the monkeys together!” But in assembling them, there was one they could not find, his nephew, a monkey named Senaka. So they told him that Senaka was not among the troop. “If Senaka is not here,” said he, “have no fear; he will find a way to help you.”

Now at the time when the troop sallied forth, Senaka had been asleep. Later he awoke, and could not see any body about. So he followed their tracks, and by and by he saw all the people hastening up. “Some danger for our troop,” thought he. Just then he spied, in a hut on the outskirts of the village, an old woman, fast asleep, before a lighted fire. And making as though he were a village child going out to the fields, Senaka seized a firebrand, {2.79} and standing well to windward, set light to the village. Then did every man leave the monkeys, and hurried up to quench the fire. So the monkeys scampered away, and each brought one fruit for Senaka.

When this discourse came to an end, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Mahānāma Sakka was the nephew Senaka of those days; the Buddha’s followers were the monkey troop; and I myself was their chief.”

Ja 178 Kacchapajātaka
The Story about the Turtle (2s)

In the present one young man saves himself by escaping from his disease-ridden home, while all his family dies. The Buddha tells a story of how a turtle who was too attached to his home met with a disastrous end.
The Bodhisatta = the potter (kumbhakāra),
Ānanda = the turtle (kacchapa).

Keywords: Attachment, Animals.

“Here was I born.” [2.55] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, how a man got rid of the plague.

It is said that the plague once broke out in a family of Sāvatthi. The parents said to their son, “Don’t stay in this house, son; make a hole in the wall and escape somewhere, and save your life.” Then come back again – in this place a great hoard is buried; dig it up, and restore the family fortunes, and a happy life to you!”

The young fellow did as he was bid; he broke through the wall, and made his escape. When his complaint was cured, he returned and dug the treasure up, with which he set up his household.

One day, laden with oil and ghee, clothes and raiment, and other offerings, he repaired to Jetavana, and greeted the Teacher, and took his seat. The Teacher entered into converse with him. “We hear,” said he, “that you had the plague in your house. How did you escape it?” He told the Teacher all about it. Said he, “In days of yore, as now, friend layman, when danger arose, there were people who were too fond of home to leave it, and they perished thereby; while those who were not too fond of it, but departed elsewhere, saved themselves alive.” And then at his request the Teacher told a story about the past.

---

427 Ahivātarogo occurs in the comm. on Therīgāthā (P. T.S. 1893), p. 120, line 20, but no hint as to its meaning is given. The word should mean, “snake-wind-disease,” perhaps malarial fever, which e.g. in the Terai is believed to be due to snake’s breath. Or is it possible that ahi, which may mean the navel, could here be the bowels, and some such disease as cholera be meant? [CPED lists the disease as bubonic plague, but on what authority I don’t know.]

428 It is noteworthy that here the same means is used to outwit the spirit of disease as is often taken to outwit the ghosts of the dead; who might be supposed to guard the door, but not the parts of the house where there was no outlet.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a village as a potter’s son. He plied the potter’s trade, and had a wife and family to support.

At that time there lay a great natural lake close by the great river of Benares. When there was much water, river and lake were one; but when the water was low, {2.80} they were apart. Now fish and turtles know by instinct when the year will be rainy and when there will be a drought. So at the time of our story the fish and turtles which lived in that lake knew there would be a drought; and when the two were one water, they swam out of the lake into the river. But there was one turtle that would not go into the river, because, said he, “Here I was born, and here I have grown up, and here is my parents’ home, leave it I cannot!” [2.56]

Then in the hot season the water all dried up. He dug a hole and buried himself in the place where the Bodhisatta used to come for clay. There the Bodhisatta came to get some clay; with a big spade he dug down, till he cracked the turtle’s shell, turning him out on the ground as though he were a large piece of clay. In his agony the creature thought: “Here I am, dying, all because I was too fond of my home to leave it!” and in the words of these verses following he moaned:

1. “Here was I born, and here I lived; my refuge was the clay;
And now the clay has played me false in a most grievous way;
You, you I call, O Bhaggava,429 hear what I have to say!

2. Go where you can find happiness, where’er the place may be;
Forest or village, there the wise both home and birthplace see;
Go where there’s life; nor stay at home for death to master thee.” {2.81}

So he went on and on, talking to the Bodhisatta, till he died. The Bodhisatta picked him up, and collecting all the villagers addressed them thus, “Look at this turtle. When the other fish and turtles went into the great river, he was too fond of home to go with them, and buried himself in the place where I get my clay. Then as I was digging for clay, I broke his shell with my big spade, and turned him out on the ground in the belief that he was a large lump of clay. Then he called to mind what he had done, lamented his fate in two verses, and expired. So you see he came to his end because he was too fond of his home. Take care not to be like this turtle. Don’t say to yourselves, ‘I have sight, I have hearing, I have smell, I have taste, I have touch, I have a son, I have a daughter, I have numbers of men and maids for my service, I have precious gold;’ do not cleave to these things with craving and desire. Each being passes through three planes of existence.” Thus did he exhort the crowd with all a Buddha’s skill. The discourse was noised abroad all over Jambudīpa, and for full seven thousand years it was remembered. All the crowd abode by his exhortation; and gave alms and did good until at last they went to swell the hosts of heaven.

429 “Addressing the potter.” Commentator.

When the Teacher had made an end, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the young man was established in the Fruit of the First Path. He ended by saying: “Ānanda was then the turtle, and the Potter was I myself.”

Ja 179 Satadhammajātaka

The Story about (the Proud Brahmin) Satadhamma (2s)

In the present many monks are found to be earning their living in a wrong way, throwing away their chance of true gains in the dispensation. The Buddha tells a story of a brahmin who took food from the Bodhisatta, who was an outcaste at the time, and could never forgive himself for it.

The Bodhisatta = the son of the outcaste (caṇḍālaputta), Ānanda = the young brahmin (māṇava).

Keywords: Right livelihood, Suitability, Devas.

“What a trifle.” [2.57] {2.82} This story the Teacher told while sojourning in Jetavana, about the twenty-one unlawful ways of earning a livelihood.

At one time there were a great many monks who used to get a living by being physicians, or runners, doing errands on foot, exchanging alms for alms, and the like, the twenty-one unlawful callings. All this will be set forth in the \[430\] World of Sense, World of Form, World of Formless Existence.

\[431\] The offence meant is giving a share of alms on one day, and receiving the like the next day, to save the trouble of seeking alms daily.
Sāketajātaka [Ja 237]. 432 When the Teacher found out that they got their living thus, he said: “Now there are a great many monks who get their living in unlawful ways. Those who get their living thus will not escape birth as Yakkhas or Petas; they will become beasts of burden; they will be born in hell; for their benefit and blessing it is necessary to hold a discourse which bears its own moral clear and plain.”

So he summoned the Saṅgha together, and said: “Monks, you must not win your necessaries by the one-and-twenty unlawful methods. Food won unlawfully is like a piece of redhot iron, like a deadly poison. These unlawful methods are blamed and rebuked by disciples of all Buddhas and Paccekabuddhas. For those who eat food gained by unlawful means there is no laughter and no joy. Food got in this way, in my dispensation, is like the leavings of a Caṇḍāla. To partake of it, for a disciple of the Dhamma, is like partaking of the leavings of a Caṇḍāla.” And with these words, he told a story about the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of a man of the lowest caste. When he grew up, he took the road for some purpose, taking for his provision some rice grains in a basket.

At that time there was a young fellow in Benares, named Satadhamma. He was the son of a householder, a northern brahmin. He also took the road for some purpose, but neither rice grains nor basket had he. The two met upon the highway.

Said the young brahmin to the other, “What caste are you of?” He replied, “Of the lowest. And what are you?” {2.83} “Oh, I am a northern brahmin.” “All right, let us journey together,” and so together they fared along. Breakfast time came. The Bodhisatta sat down where there was some nice water, and washed his hands, and opened his basket. “Will you have some?” said he. “Tut, tut,” says the other, “I want none, you low fellow.” “All right,” [2.58] says the Bodhisatta. Careful to waste none, he put as much as he wanted in a leaf apart from the rest, fastened up his basket, and ate. Then he took a drink of water, washed his hands and feet, and picked up the rest of his rice and food. “Come along, young sir,” said he, and they started off again on their journey.

432 [The Jātaka does not discuss the subject at hand. In Ja 469, the wrong ways are further described as follows: The monks gained their livelihood in the twenty-one unlawful ways; they associated with the nuns, and sons and daughters were born to them; monks forsook the duties of the Saṅgha, and nuns forsook the duties of nuns, lay brethren and sisters the duties of such, brahmans did no longer the duties of a brahmin: men for the most part followed the ten paths of evil-doing, and as they died thus filled the hosts of all states of suffering.]

All day they tramped along; and at evening they both had a bath in some nice water. When they came out, the Bodhisatta sat down in a nice place, undid his parcel, and began to eat. This time he did not offer the other a share. The young gentleman was tired with walking all day, and hungry to the bottom of his soul; there he stood, looking on, and thinking: “If he offers me any, I’ll take it.” But the other ate away without a word. “This low fellow,” thought the young man, “eats every scrap without a word. Well, I’ll beg a piece; I can throw away the outside, which is defiled, and eat the rest.” And so he did; he ate what was left. As soon as he had eaten, he thought: “How I have disgraced my birth, my clan, my family! Why, I have eaten the leavings of a low born churl!” Keen indeed was his remorse; he threw up the food, and blood came with it. “Oh, what a wicked deed I have done,” he wept, “all for the sake of a trifle!” and he went on in the words of the first verse: {2.84}

1. “What a trifle! And his leavings! Given too against his will! And I am a highborn brahmin! And the stuff has made me ill!”

Thus did the young gentleman make his lamentation; adding, “Why did I do such a wicked thing just for life’s sake?” He plunged into the jungle, and never let any eye see him again, but there he died forlorn.

When this story was ended, the Teacher repeated, “Just as the young brahmin, monks, after eating the leavings of a Caṇḍāla, found that neither laughter nor joy was for him, because he had taken improper food; so whosoever has embraced this dispensation, and gains a livelihood by unlawful means, when he eats the food and supports his life in any way that is blamed and disapproved by the Buddha, will find that there is no laughter and no joy for him.” Then, after Fully Awakening, he repeated the second verse:

2. “He that lives by being wicked, who cares not if he does wrong, Like the brahmin in the story, has no joy of what he wins.” {2.85}
When this discourse was concluded, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths many monks entered upon the Paths and the Fruit thereof, saying: “At the time of the story I was the low-caste man.”

Ja 180 Duddadajātaka

The Story about the Difficulty of (Giving) Gifts (2s)

In the present two brothers get together and give alms to the Buddha, and to the Saṅgha, who then praises their good deed. The Buddha then tells a story of how rich and poor banded together to give alms to a holy man in the past.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā), the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s group (isigaṇa).

Keywords: Generosity, Faith.

“Tis hard to do as good men do.” [2.59] This story the Teacher told while in Jetavana, about alms given in common. Two friends at Sāvatthi, young men of good position, made a collection, providing all the necessaries to give the Buddha and his followers. They invited them all, provided bounty for seven days, and on the seventh presented them with all their requisites. The eldest of these saluted the Teacher, and said, sitting beside him, “Sir, amongst the givers some gave much and some gave little; but let it bear much fruit for all alike.” Then he offered the gift. The Teacher's reply was, “In giving these things to the Buddha and his followers, you, my lay friends, have done a great deed. In days of old wise men gave their bounty thus, and thus offered their gifts.” Then at his request he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a brahmin family of Kāsi. When he grew up, he was thoroughly educated at Taxila; after which he renounced the world, and took up the ascetic life, and with a band of disciples went to live in the Himālayas. There he lived a long time.

Once having need to procure salt and seasoning, he went on pilgrimage through the countryside, and in course of it he arrived at Benares. There he settled in the king’s park; and on the following morning he and his company went begging to some village outside the gates. The people gave him alms. Next day he sought alms in the city. The people were all glad to give him their alms. They clubbed together and made a collection; and provided plenty for the band of ascetics. After the presentation their spokesman offered his gift with the same words as above. The Bodhisatta replied, “Friend, where faith is, no gift is small.” And he returned his thanks in these verses following: {2.86}

1. “Tis hard to do as good men do, to give as they can give,
Bad men can hardly imitate the life which good men live.

2. And so, when good and evil go to pass away from earth,
The bad are born in hell below, in heaven the good have birth.”

This was his thanksgiving. He remained in the place for the four months of the rains, and then returned to the Himālayas; where he practised all the modes of holy meditation, and without a single interruption continued in them until he joined the hosts of heaven.

When this discourse came to an end the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time,” said he, “the Buddha’s company was the body of ascetics, and I myself was their leader.”

Ja 181 Asadisajātaka

The Story about (Prince) Asadisa (2s)

In the present the Buddha talks about how he gave up his kingdom for the spiritual life, and then tells a story of how he renounced a throne in the past, and the great deeds he did as a master archer, including saving his former kingdom with just one shot of an arrow.

The Bodhisatta = prince Asadisa (Asadisakumāra), Ānanda = the younger brother (kaniṭṭhabhāta).

Past Compare: Mvu ii p 113 Śarakṣepa.

---

433 Cittapasādo.

434 Hardy Manual of Buddhism, 114. The latter part of the story is given very briefly in Mvu 2. 82-3, Śarakṣepanajātaka. It is figured on the Bharhut Stūpa, see Cunningham, p. 70, and plate xxvii. 13; and possibly on the Sanchi Stūpa, see Fergusson, Tree and Serpent Worship, pl. xxXvi. p. 181.
Keywords: Renunciation, Skill, Devas.

“Prince Asadisa, skilled in archers’ craft.” [2.60] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about the Great Renunciation. The Teacher said: “Not now alone, monks, has the Tathāgata made the Great Renunciation: in other days he also renounced the white parasol of royalty, and did the same.” And he told a story of the past. [2.87]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was conceived as the son of the queen consort. She was safely delivered; and on his nameday they gave him the name of Asadisakumāra [prince Peerless]. About the time he was able to walk, the queen conceived one who was also to be a wise being. She was safely delivered, and on the nameday they called the babe Brahmadattakumāra [prince Heaven-sent].

When prince Asadisa was sixteen, he went to Taxila for his education. There at the feet of a world-famed teacher he learned the Three Vedas and the Eighteen Arts; in the science of archery he was peerless; then he returned to Benares.

When the king was on his deathbed he commanded that prince Asadisa should bhe king in his stead, and prince Brahmadatta heir apparent. Then he died; after which the kingship was offered to Asadisa, who refused, saying that he cared not for it. So they consecrated Brahmadatta to be king by sprinkling him. Asadisa cared nothing for glory, and wanted nothing.

While the younger brother ruled, Asadisa lived in all royal state. The slaves came and slandered him to his brother, “Prince Asadisa wants to be king!” said they. Brahmadatta believed them, and allowed himself to be deceived; he sent some men to take Asadisa prisoner.

One of prince Asadisa’s attendants told him what was afoot. He waxed angry with his brother, and went away into another country. After arriving there, he sent in word to the king that an archer was come, and awaited him. “What wages does he ask?” the king enquired. “A hundred thousand a year.” “Good,” said the king, “let him enter.” [2.61]

Asadisa came into the presence, and stood waiting. “Are you the archer?” asked the king. “Yes, sire.” “Very well, I take you into my service.” After that Asadisa remained in the service of this king. But the old archers were annoyed at the wage which was given him, “Too much,” they grumbled.

One day it so happened that the king went out into his park. There, at foot of a mango tree, where a screen had been put up before a certain stone seat of ceremony, he reclined upon a magnificent couch. He happened to look up, and there right at the treetop he saw a cluster of mango fruit. “It is too high to climb for,” thought he; so summoning his archers, he asked them whether they could cut off that cluster with an arrow, and bring it down for him. “Oh,” they said, “that is not much for us to do. But your majesty has seen our skill often enough. The newcomer is so much better paid than we, that perhaps you might make him bring down the fruit.”

Then the king sent for Asadisa, and asked him if he could do it. “Oh yes, your Majesty, if I may choose my position.” “What position do you want?” “The place where your couch stands.” The king had the couch removed, and gave place.

Asadisa had no bow in his hand; he used to carry it underneath his body-cloth; so he must needs have a screen. The king ordered a screen to be brought and spread for him, and our archer went in. He doffed the white cloth which he wore over all, and put on a red cloth next his skin; then he fastened his girdle, and donned a red waistcloth. From a bag he took out a sword in pieces, which he put together and girt on his left side. Next he put on a mailcoat of gold, fastened his bow-case over his back, and took out his great rams-horn bow, made in several pieces, which he fitted together, fixed the bowstring, red as coral; put a turban upon his head; twirling the arrow with his nails, he threw open the screen and came out, looking like a Nāga prince just emerging from the riven ground. He went to the place of shooting, arrow set to bow, and then put this question to the king. “Your Majesty,” said he, “am I to bring this fruit down with an upward shot, or by dropping the arrow upon it?”

“My son,” said the king, “I have often seen a mark brought down by the upward shot, but never one taken in the fall. You had better make the shaft fall on it.”

“Your Majesty,” said the archer, “this arrow will fly high. Up to the heaven of the Four Great Kings it will fly, and then return of itself. You must please be patient till it returns.” The king promised. Then the archer said again, “Your Majesty, this arrow in its upshot will pierce the stalk exactly in the middle; and when it comes down, it will not swerve a hair’s-breadth either way, but hit the same spot to a nicety, and [2.62] bring down the cluster with it.” Then he sped the arrow forth swiftly. As the arrow went up it pierced the exact centre of the mango stalk. By the time the archer knew his arrow had reached the place of the Four Great Kings, he let fly another arrow with greater speed than the first. This struck the feather of the first arrow, and turned it back; then itself went up as far as the heaven of the Thirty-Three. There the deities caught and kept it.

The sound of the falling arrow as it cleft the air was as the sound of a thunderbolt. “What is that noise?” asked every man. “That is the arrow falling,” our archer replied. The bystanders were all frightened to death, for fear the arrow should fall on them; but Asadisa comforted them. “Fear nothing,” said he, “and I will see that it does not fall on the earth.” Down came the arrow, not a hairbreadth out either way, but neatly cut through the stalk of the mango cluster. The archer caught the arrow in one hand and the fruit in the other, so that they should not fall upon the ground. “We never saw such a thing before!” cried the onlookers, at this marvel. {2.90} How they praised the great man! How they cheered and clapped and snapped their fingers, thousands of kerchiefs waving in the air! In their joy and delight the courtiers gave presents to Asadisa amounting to ten millions of money. And the king too showered gifts and honours upon him like rain.

While the Bodhisatta was receiving such glory and honour at the hands of this king, seven kings, who knew that there was no prince Asadisa in Benares, drew a circle around the city, and summoned its king to fight or yield. The king was frightened out of his life. “Where is my brother?” he asked. “He is in the service of a neighbouring king,” was the reply. “If my dear brother does not come,” said he, “I am a dead man. Go, fall at his feet in my name, appease him, bring him here!” His messengers came and did their errand. Asadisa took leave of his master, and returned to Benares. He comforted his brother and bade him fear nothing; then scratched a message upon an arrow to this effect, “I, prince Asadisa, am returned. I mean to kill you all with one arrow which I will shoot at you. Let those who care for life make their escape.” This he shot so that it fell upon the very middle of a golden dish, from which the seven kings were eating together. When they read the writing they all fled, half-dead with fright.

---

435 In the Mahāvastu it is wrapped round it (2. p. 82. 14, pariveṭhitvā).

Thus did our prince put to flight seven kings, without shedding even so much blood as a little fly might drink; then, looking upon his younger brother, he renounced his sensual desires, and forsook the world, cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and at his life’s end came to Brahmā’s Realm. [2.63] {2.91}

“And this is the way,” said the Teacher, “that prince Asadisa routed seven kings and won the battle; after which he took up the ascetic life.” Then becoming perfectly enlightened he uttered these two verses:

1. “Prince Asadisa, skilled in craft, a doughty chief was he;
   Swift as the lightning sped his shaft great warriors’ bane to be.

2. Among his foes what havoc done! Yet hurt he not a soul;
   He saved his brother; and he won the grace of self-control.” {2.92}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Ānanda was then the younger brother, and I was myself the elder.”

Ja 182 Saṅgāmāvacarajātaka
The Story about the Entry into Battle (2s)

In the present Ven. Nanda is lax in effort, thinking of his former love. The Buddha promises him a reward much greater than his fiancee, and he decides to strive harder. The other monks, though, scorn him for having such lowly ends, and he makes even greater effort and attains Awakening. The Buddha tells a story about an elephant who was scared of war, but when advised by his trainer, won a kingdom.

The Bodhisatta = the mahout (hatthācariya),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Nanda = the elephant (hatthī).

Present Compare: Udāna 3.2 Nanda, Dhp-a I.9 Nandatthera.

Keywords: Striving, Effort, Devas, Animals.

“O elephant, a hero you.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about elder Nanda.
The Teacher, on his first return to Kapila city, had received into the Saṅgha prince Nanda, his younger brother, and returned to Sāvatthi after and stayed there. Now Ven. Nanda, as he was leaving his home, after taking the bowl, in the Tathāgata’s company, remembered how Janapadakalyāṇī was looking out of a window, with her hair half combed, and she said: “Why, prince Nanda is off with the Teacher! – Come back soon, dear lord!” remembering this, I say, he grew downcast and despondent, yellower and yellower, and the veins stood knotted over his skin.

When the Teacher learned of this, he thought: “What if I could establish Nanda as an Arahant!” To Nanda’s cell he went, and sat on the seat which was offered him. “Well, Nanda,” he asked, “are you content with our dispensation?” “Sir,” replied Nanda, “I am in love with Janapadakalyāṇī, and I am not content.” “Have you been on pilgrimage in the Himālayas, Nanda?” “No, sir, not yet.” “Then we will go.” “But, sir, I have no Supernormal Powers; how can I go?” “I will take you, Nanda.” So saying, the Teacher took him by the hand, and thus passed through the air.

On the way they passed over a burnt field. There, upon the charred stump of a tree, with nose and tail half gone, hair scorched off, and her hide a cinder, nothing but skin, all covered with blood, sat a female monkey. “Do you see that monkey, Nanda?” the Teacher asked. “Yes, sir.” “Take a good look at her,” said he. Then he pointed out, stretching over sixty leagues, the uplands of Manosilā, the seven great lakes, Anotatta and the rest, the five great rivers, the whole Himālaya highlands, with the magnificent hills named of Gold, of Silver, and of Gems, and hundreds of other lovely spots. Next he asked, “Nanda, have you ever seen the abode of the Thirty-Three?” {2.93} “No, sir, never,” was the reply. “Come along, Nanda,” said he, “and I will show you the abode of the Thirty-Three.”

Therewith he brought him to the Yellowstone Throne, and made him sit on it. Sakka, King of the Devas in two heavens, came with his host of gods, gave greeting and sat down on one side. His handmaids to the number of twenty-five million, and five hundred Accharā with doves’ feet, came and made greeting, then sat down on one side. The Teacher made Nanda look at these five hundred Accharā again and again, with desire after them. “Nanda” said he, “do you see 436 The throne of Sakka (Indra).

these dove-footed Accharā? “Yes, sir.” “Well, which is prettier – they or Janapadakalyāṇī?” “Oh, sir! As that wretched ape was in comparison with Janapadakalyāṇī, so is she compared with these!” “Well, Nanda, what are you going to do?” “How is it possible, sir, to win these nymphs?” “By living as an ascetic, sir,” said the Teacher, “one may win these nymphs.” The lad said: “If the Fortunate One pledges his word that an ascetic life will win these nymphs, an ascetic life I will lead.” “Agreed, Nanda, I pledge my word. Well, sir,” said he, “don’t let us make a long business of it. Let us be off, and I will become an ascetic.”

The Teacher brought him to Jetavana back again. The elder began to follow the ascetic life.

The Teacher recounted to Sāriputta, the Captain of the Dhamma, how his younger brother had made him pledge himself in the midst of the gods in the heaven of the Thirty-Three about the Devaccharā. In the same manner, he told the story to elder Mahāmoggallāna, to elder Mahākassapa, to elder Anuruddha, to elder Ānanda, the Treasurer of the Dhamma, eighty great disciples in all; and then, one after the other, he told it to the other monks.

The Captain of the Dhamma, elder Sāriputta, asked elder Nanda, “Is it true, as I hear, friend, that you have the One with Ten Powers’ pledged word that you shall win the Devaccharā in the heaven of the Thirty-Three, by passing your life as an ascetic? Then,” he went on, “is not your holy life all bound up with womankind and lust? If you live chaste just for the sake of women, what is the difference between you and a labourer who works for hire?” This saying quenched all the fire in him and made him ashamed of himself. In the same way all the eighty chief disciples, and all the rest of the monks, made this worthy monk ashamed. “I have been wrong,” thought he; in all shame and remorse, he got up his courage, and set to work to develop his spiritual insight. Soon he became an Arahat. He came to the Teacher, and said: “Sir, I release the Fortunate One from his promise.” The Teacher said: “If you have become an Arahat, Nanda, I am thereby released from my promise.”

When the monks heard of this, they began to talk about it over in their Dhamma Hall. “How docile that elder Nanda is, to be sure! Why, friend, one word of advice awakened his sense of shame; at once he began to live as an ascetic and now he is an Arahat!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about together. They told him. “Monks,” said he, “Nanda was just as docile in former days as he is now,” and then he told them a story.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as an elephant-trainer’s son. When he grew up, he was carefully taught all that pertains to the training of elephants. He was in the service of a king who was an enemy to the king of Benares. He trained this king’s elephant of state to perfection.

The king determined to capture Benares. Mounting upon his state elephant, he led a mighty host against Benares, and laid siege to it. Then he sent a letter to the king of the city, “Fight, or yield!” The king chose to fight. Walls and gates, towers and battlements he manned with a great host, and defied the foe.

The hostile king armed his state elephant, and clad himself in armour, took a sharp goad in his hand, and drove his beast towards the city. “Now,” [2.65] said he, “I’ll storm this city, and kill my enemy, and get his realms into my hands,” But at sight of the defenders, who cast boiling mud, and stones from their catapults, and all kinds of missiles, the elephant was scared out of his wits and would not come near the place. Thereupon up came the trainer, crying, “Son, a hero like you is quite at home in the battle-field! [2.95] In such a place it is disgraceful to turn tail!” And to encourage his elephant, he uttered these two verses:

1. “O elephant, a hero you, whose home is in the field:
   There stands the gate before you now: why do you turn and yield?

2. Make haste! Break through the iron bar, and beat the pillars down!
   Crash through the gates, made fast for war, and enter in the town!”

The elephant listened; one word of advice was enough to turn him. Winding his trunk about the shafts of the pillars, he tore them up like so many toadstools: he beat against the gateway, broke down the bars, and forcing his way through entered the city and won it for his king.

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “In those days Nanda was the elephant, Ānanda was the king, and the trainer was I myself.”
In the present many householders who attained the paths and fruits live with the Buddha, and attend his meals. These behave properly, but their attendants are loud and rude. The Buddha tells a story of 500 thoroughbreds who were given strong drink but maintained their dignity, and 500 donkeys who, being given the leftovers of that drink, became unruly.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the laymen = the 500 Sindh horses (pañcasatā sindhavā), the poor boys = the 500 donkeys (pañcasatā gadrabhā).

Past Compare: Vin Pār (3.1), Dhp-a VI.8 Pañcasatabhikkhu.

Keywords: Nobility, Sobreity, Animals.

“This sorry draught.” This story the Teacher told while at Jetavana, about five hundred persons who ate leftovers.

At Sāvatthi, we learn, were five hundred persons who had left the stumbling-block of a worldly life to their sons and daughters, {2.96} and lived all listening to the Teacher’s teaching. Of these, some were in the First Path, some in the Second, some in the Third, all had embraced this dispensation. They that invited the Teacher invited these also. But they had five hundred attendants waiting upon them, to bring them toothbrushes, mouth-water, and garlands of flowers; these lads used to eat their leftovers. After their meal, and a nap, they used to run down to the Aciravatī, and on the river bank they would wrestle like very Mallians, shouting all the time. But the five hundred lay brethren were quiet, made very little noise, courted solitude. [2.66]

The Teacher happened to hear the attendants shouting. “What is that noise, Ānanda?” he asked. “The attendants, who eat the leftovers,” was the reply. The Teacher said: “Ānanda, this is not the only time these attendants have fed on 437 The introductory story is varied in Dhp-a VI.8.

438 The Mallians were a tribe of professional wrestlers.
leftovers, and made a great noise after it; they used to do the same in the olden days; and then too these lay brethren were just as quiet as they are now.” So saying, at his request, the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of one of his courtiers, and became the king’s adviser in all things both temporal and spiritual. Word came to the king of a revolt on the frontier. He ordered five hundred chargers to be got ready, and an army complete in its four parts.\textsuperscript{439} With this he set out, and quelled the rising, after which he returned to Benares.

When he came home, he gave order, “As the horses are tired, let them have some juicy food, some grape juice to drink.” The steeds took this delicious drink, then retired to their stables and stood quietly each in his stall.

But there was a mass of leavings, with nearly all the goodness squeezed out of it.
The keepers asked the king what to do with that. “Knead it up with water,” was his command, “strain through a towel, and give it to the donkeys who carry the horses’ provender.” This wretched stuff the donkeys drank up. It maddened them, and they galloped about the palace yard braying loudly.

From an open window the king saw the Bodhisatta, and called out to him.\textsuperscript{[2.97]} “Look there! How mad these donkeys are from that sorry drink! How they bray, how they caper! But those fine thoroughbreds that drank the strong liquor, they make no noise; they are perfectly quiet, and jump not at all. What is the meaning of this?” and he repeated the first verse:

\begin{quote}
1. “This sorry draught, the goodness all strained out,\textsuperscript{440}
Drives all these asses in a drunken rout:
The thoroughbreds, that drank the potent juice,
Stand silent, nor do they caper about.”
\end{quote}

And the Bodhisatta explained the matter in the second verse:

\begin{quote}

\textsuperscript{439} Elephants, horse, chariots, infantry.
\textsuperscript{440} Dhp-a VI.8.
2. “The low-born churl, though he but taste and try,
   Is frolicsome and drunken by and by:
   He that is gentle keeps a steady brain
   Even if he drain most potent liquor dry.”

When the king had listened to the Bodhisatta’s answer, he had the donkeys driven out of his courtyard. Then, abiding by the Bodhisatta’s [2.67] advice, he gave alms and did good until he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka as follows, “At that time these attendants were the five hundred asses, these lay brethren were the five hundred thoroughbreds, Ānanda was the king, and the wise courtier was I myself.”

Ja 184 Giridantajātaka

The Story about (the Horse Trainer) Giridanta (2s)

Alternative Title: Giridattajātaka (Cst)

In the present a monk ordained under the Buddha is easily persuaded to partake of Devadatta’s good food, rather than go on almsround. He is brought to the Buddha who tells a story about a war horse who imitated his lame trainer. When a fit trainer was brought for him he stopped being lame himself.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (amaccapaṇḍita), the hostile monk = the horse (assa),
Devadatta = (the horse trainer) Giridanta.

Present Source: Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 141 Godhajātaka, Ja 184 Giridantajātaka, Ja 186 Dadhivāhanajātaka, Ja 397 Manojajātaka.

Keywords: Example, Imitation, Animals.

“This story the Teacher told while staying in Veḷuvana Park, about keeping bad company. The circumstances have already been recounted under the Mahilāmukhajātaka [Ja 26].

This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta, who, having secured the adherence of prince Ajātasattu, had attained both gain and honour. Prince Ajātasattu had a monastery built for Devadatta at Gayāsīsa, and every day brought to him five hundred pots of perfumed three-year-old rice flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. All this gain and honour brought Devadatta a great following, with whom Devadatta lived on, without ever stirring out of his monastery.

At that time there were living in Rājagaha two friends, of whom one had taken the vows under the Teacher, while the other had taken them under Devadatta. And these continued to see one another, either casually or by visiting the monasteries. Now one day the disciple of Devadatta said to the other, “Sir, why do you daily go round for alms with the sweat streaming off you? Devadatta sits quietly at Gayāsīsa and feeds on the best of fare, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. There’s no way like his. Why create misery for yourself? Why should it not be a good thing for you to come the first thing in the morning to the monastery at Gayāsīsa and there drink our rice-gruel with a relish after it, try our eighteen kinds of solid victuals, and enjoy our excellent soft food, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings?”

Being pressed time after time to accept the invitation, the other began to want to go, and thenceforth used to go to Gayāsīsa and there eat and eat, not forgetting however to return to the Bamboo Grove at the proper hour. Nevertheless he could not keep it secret always; and in a little while it came out that he used to go to Gayāsīsa and there regale himself with the food provided for Devadatta. Accordingly, his friends asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you regale yourself on the food provided for Devadatta?” “Who said that?” said he. “So-and-so said it.” “It is true, sirs, that I go to Gayāsīsa and eat there. But it is not Devadatta who gives me food; others do that.” “Sir, Devadatta is the foe of the Buddhas; in his wickedness, he has secured the adherence of Ajātasattu and by unrighteousness got gain and honour for himself. Yet you who have taken the vows according to this dispensation which leads to safety, eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness. Come; let us bring you before the Teacher.” And, taking with them the monk, they went to the Dhamma Hall.

When the Teacher became aware of their presence, he said: “Monks, are you bringing this monk here against his will?” “Yes, sir; this monk, after taking the vows under you, eats the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness.” “Is it true, as they say, that you eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness?” “It was not Devadatta, sir, that gave it me, but others.” “Raise no quibbles here, monk,” said the Teacher. “Devadatta is a man of bad conduct and bad principle. Oh, how could you, who have taken the vows in the Buddha’s dispensation, eat Devadatta’s food, while living in the Teacher’s presence? But you have always been prone to being led away, and have followed in turn every one you meet.”

Again, as before, the Teacher said: “In former days this monk kept bad company just as he does now.” Then he told a story of the past.

In the past, there was a king named Sāma [Blackie], reigning in Benares. In those days the Bodhisatta was one of a courtier’s family, and grew up to be the king’s temporal and spiritual adviser. Now the king had a state horse named Paṇḍava, and one Giridanta was his trainer, a lame man. The horse used to watch him as he tramped on and on in front, holding the halter; and knowing him to be his trainer, limped too.

Somebody told the king how the horse was limping. The king sent surgeons. They examined the horse, but found him perfectly sound; and so accordingly made report. Then the king sent the Bodhisatta. “Go, friend,” said he, “and find out all about it.” He soon found out that the horse was lame because he went about with a lame trainer. So he told the king what it was. “It’s a case of bad company,” said he, and went on to repeat the first verse:

1. “Thanks to the groom, poor Paṇḍava is in a parlous state:
   No more displays his former ways, but needs must imitate.” [2.68]

“Well, now, my friend,” said the king, “what’s to be done?” “Get a good groom,” replied the Bodhisatta, “and the horse will be as good as ever.” Then he repeated the second verse: [2.99]

2. “Find but a fit and proper groom, on whom you can depend,
   To bridle him and exercise, the horse will quickly mend;
   His sorry plight will be set right; he imitates his friend.”

The king did so. The horse became as good as before. The king showed great honour to the Bodhisatta, being pleased that he knew even the ways of animals.

The Teacher, when this discourse was ended, identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was Giridanta in those days; the monk who keeps bad company was the horse; and the wise counsellor was I myself.”
Ja 185 Anabhiratijātaka

The Story about Discontent (2s)

In the present one young brahmin learns the Vedas, but through the worries and occupations of his household life he forgets what he had learned. The Buddha tells a similar story from the past, showing how only a tranquil mind has good recollection.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the young brahmin = the same in the past (māṇava).

Keywords: Clarity, Recall.

“Thick, muddy water.” This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, and it was about a young brahmin.

A young brahmin, as they say, belonging to Sāvatthi, had mastered the Three Vedas, and used to teach the mantras to a number of young brahmins and nobles. In time he settled down as a married man. His thoughts being now busy with wealth and ornaments, serving men and serving women, lands and substance, kine and buffaloes, sons and daughters, he became subject to passion, error and folly. This obscured his wits, so that he forgot how to repeat his mantras in due order, and every now and then the charms did not come clear in his mind.

This man one day procured a quantity of flowers and sweet scents, and these he took to the Teacher in Jetavana. After his greeting, he sat down on one side.

The Teacher talked pleasantly to him. “Well, young sir, you are a teacher of the mantras. Do you know them all by heart?” “Well, sir, I used to know them all right, but since I married my mind has been darkened, and I don’t know them any longer.” “Ah, young sir,” the Teacher said, “just the same happened before; at first your mind was clear, and you knew all your verses perfectly, but when your mind was obscured by passions and sensual desires, you could no longer clearly see them.” Then at his request the Teacher told the following story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the family of a brahmin householder. When he grew up, he studied under a far-famed teacher of Taxila, where he learned all the mantras. After returning to Benares he taught these mantras to a large number of brahmin and noble youths.
Amongst these youths was one young brahmin who had learned the Three Vedas by heart; he became a master of ritual, and could repeat the whole of the sacred texts without stumbling in a single line. By and by he married and settled down. Then household cares clouded his mind, and no longer could he repeat the mantras.

One day his teacher paid him a visit. “Well, young sir,” he enquired, “do you know all your verses off by heart?” “Since I have been the head of a household,” was the reply, “my mind has been clouded, and I cannot repeat them.” “My son,” said his teacher, “when the mind is clouded, no matter how perfectly the mantras have been learned, they will not stand out clear. But when the mind is serene there is no forgetting them.” And thereupon he repeated the two verses following:

1. “Thick, muddy water will not show
Fish or shell or sand or gravel that may lie below:
So with a clouded wit:
Nor your nor other’s good is seen in it.

2. Clear, quiet waters ever show
All, be it fish or shell, that lies below;
So with unclouded wit:
Your own and other’s good shows clear in it.”

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the young brahmin entered upon the Fruit of the First Path, “In those days, this youth was the young brahmin, and I was his teacher.”

---

441 Or it may mean ‘a pupil-teacher.’
442 There is an irregularity in this verse, the Pali having an extra line. I have reproduced this by making line 2 of an irregular length.
In the present a monk ordained under the Buddha is easily persuaded to partake of Devadatta’s good food, rather than go on almsround. He is brought to the Buddha who tells a story of how a sweet mango tree and its fruits were turned bitter by being surrounded by nimb trees.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paṇḍitāmacca).

Present Source: Ja 26 Mahilāmukhajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 141 Godhajātaka, Ja 184 Giridantajātaka, Ja 186 Dadhivāhanajātaka, Ja 397 Manojajātaka.

Keywords: Association, Conduct.

“Sweet was once the mango’s savour.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, on the subject of keeping bad company. The circumstances were the same as above.444

This story was told by the Teacher while at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta, who, having secured the adherence of prince Ajātasattu, had attained both gain and honour. Prince Ajātasattu had a monastery built for Devadatta at Gayāsīsa, and every day brought to him five hundred pots of perfumed three-year-old rice flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. All this gain and honour brought Devadatta a great following, with whom Devadatta lived on, without ever stirring out of his monastery.

At that time there were living in Rājagaha two friends, of whom one had taken the vows under the Teacher, while the other had taken them under Devadatta. And these continued to see one another, either casually or by visiting the monasteries. Now one day the disciple of Devadatta said to the other, “Sir, why do you daily

443 Fausböll, Five Jātakas, pp. 1 and 20; Rhys Davids, Buddhist Birth Stories, p. xvi. This tale belongs to the same group as Grimm no. 36, The Wishing Table, the Gold-Ass, and the Cudgel in the Sack: no. 54, The Knapsack, the Hat and the Horn to which see the bibliographical note in Hunt’s edition.

444 [Ja 184. I include the story here.]
go round for alms with the sweat streaming off you? Devadatta sits quietly at Gayāśīsa and feeds on the best of fare, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings. There’s no way like his. Why create misery for yourself? Why should it not be a good thing for you to come the first thing in the morning to the monastery at Gayāśīsa and there drink our rice-gruel with a relish after it, try our eighteen kinds of solid victuals, and enjoy our excellent soft food, flavoured with all the choicest flavourings?"

Being pressed time after time to accept the invitation, the other began to want to go, and thenceforth used to go to Gayāśīsa and there eat and eat, not forgetting however to return to the Bamboo Grove at the proper hour. Nevertheless he could not keep it secret always; and in a little while it came out that he used to go to Gayāśīsa and there regale himself with the food provided for Devadatta. Accordingly, his friends asked him, saying: “Is it true, as they say, that you regale yourself on the food provided for Devadatta?” “Who said that?” said he. “So-and-so said it.” “It is true, sirs, that I go to Gayāśīsa and eat there. But it is not Devadatta who gives me food; others do that.” “Sir, Devadatta is the foe of the Buddhas; in his wickedness, he has secured the adherence of Ajātasattu and by unrighteousness got gain and honour for himself. Yet you who have taken the vows according to this dispensation which leads to safety, eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness. Come; let us bring you before the Teacher.” And, taking with them the monk, they went to the Dhamma Hall.

When the Teacher became aware of their presence, he said: “Monks, are you bringing this monk here against his will?” “Yes, sir; this monk, after taking the vows under you, eats the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness.” “Is it true, as they say, that you eat the food which Devadatta gets by unrighteousness?” “It was not Devadatta, sir, that gave it me, but others.” “Raise no quibbles here, monk,” said the Teacher. “Devadatta is a man of bad conduct and bad principle. Oh, how could you, who have taken the vows in the Buddha’s dispensation, eat Devadatta’s food, while living in the Teacher’s presence? But you have always been prone to being led away, and have followed in turn every one you meet.”

Again the Teacher said: “Monks, bad [2.70] company is evil and injurious; why should one talk of the evil effects of bad company on human beings? In days long gone by, even a vegetable, a mango tree, whose sweet fruit was a dish fit for the gods, turned sour and bitter through the influence of a noisome and bitter nimb tree.” Then he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, four brahmins, brothers, of the land of Kāsi, left the world and became ascetics; they built themselves four huts in a row in the highlands of the Himālayas, and there they lived.

The eldest brother died, and was born as Sakka. Knowing who he had been, he used to visit the others every seven or eight days, and lend them a helping hand.

One day, he visited the eldest of the ascetics, and after the usual greeting, took his seat to one side. [2.102] “Well, sir, how can I serve you?” he enquired. The ascetic, who was suffering from jaundice, replied, “Fire is what I want.” Sakka gave him a razor-axe. (A razor-axe is so called because it serves as razor or as axe according as you fit it into the handle.) “Why,” said the ascetic, “who is there to get me firewood with this?” “If you want a fire, sir,” replied Sakka, “all you have to do is to strike your hand upon the axe, and say – ‘Fetch wood and make a fire!’ The axe will fetch the wood and make you the fire.”

After giving him this razor-axe he next visited the second brother, and asked him the same question, “How can I serve you, sir?” Now there was an elephant track by his hut, and the creatures annoyed him. So he told Sakka that he was annoyed by elephants, and wanted them to be driven away. Sakka gave him a drum. “If you beat upon this side, sir,” he explained, “your enemies will run away; but if you strike the other, they will become your firm friends, and will encompass you with an army in fourfold array.” Then he handed him the drum.

Lastly he made a visit to the youngest, and asked as before how he could serve him. He too had jaundice, and what he said was, “Please give me some curds.” Sakka gave him a milk-bowl, with these words, “Turn this over if you want anything, and a great river will pour out of it, and will flood the whole place, and it will be able even to win a kingdom for you.” With these words he departed.

After this the axe used to make fire for the eldest brother, the second used to beat upon one side of his drum and drive the elephants away, and the youngest had his curds to eat.

About this time a wild boar, that lived in a ruined village, lit upon a gem possessed of magic power. Picking up the gem in his mouth, he rose in the air by its magic.
From afar he could see an isle in mid-ocean, and there he resolved to live. So descending he chose a pleasant spot beneath a mango tree, and there he made his abode. [2.71]

One day he fell asleep under the tree, with the jewel lying in front of him. Now a certain man from the Kāsi country, who had been turned out of doors by his parents as a never-do-well, had made his way to a seaport, where he embarked on shipboard as a sailors’ drudge. In mid-sea the ship was wrecked, and he floated upon a plank to this island. As he wandered in search of fruit, he espied our boar fast asleep. Quietly he crept up, seized the gem, and found himself by magic rising through the air! He alighted on the mango tree, and pondered. “The magic of this gem,” he thought, “has taught that boar to be a sky-walker; that’s how he got here, I suppose. Well! I must kill him and make a meal of him first; and then I’ll be off.” So he snapped off a twig, dropping it upon the boar’s head. The boar woke up, and seeing no gem, ran trembling up and down. The man up in the tree laughed. The boar looked up, and seeing him ran his head against the tree, and killed himself.

The man came down, lit a fire, cooked the boar and made a meal. Then he rose up in the sky, and set out on his journey.

As he passed over the Himālayas, he saw the ascetics’ settlement. So he descended, and spent two or three days in the eldest brother’s hut, entertaining and entertained, and he found out the virtue of the axe. He made up his mind to get it for himself. So he showed our ascetic the virtue of his gem, and offered to exchange it for the axe. The ascetic longed to be able to pass through mid-air, and struck the bargain. The man took the axe, and departed; but before he had gone very far, he struck upon it, and said: “Axe! Smash that ascetic’s skull and bring the gem to me!” Off flew the axe, clove the ascetic’s skull, and brought the gem back.

Then the man hid the axe away, and paid a visit to the second brother. With him the visitor stayed a few days, and soon discovered the power of his drum. Then he exchanged his gem for the drum, as before, and as before made the axe cleave the owner’s skull. After this he went on to the youngest of the three 445 This was one of the supernatural powers much coveted by Buddhists.

---

ascetics, found out the power of the milk-bowl, gave his jewel in exchange for it, and as before sent his axe to cleave the man’s skull. Thus he was now owner of jewel, axe, drum, and milk-bowl, all four.

He now rose up and passed through the air. Stopping nearby Benares, he wrote a letter which he sent by a messenger’s hands, that the king must either fight him or yield. On receipt of this message the king sallied forth to seize the scoundrel. But he beat on one side of his drum, and was promptly surrounded by an army in fourfold array. When he saw that the king had deployed his forces, he then overturned the milk-bowl, and a great river poured forth; multitudes were drowned [2.72] in the river of curds. Next he struck upon his axe. “Fetch me the king’s head!” cried he; away went the axe, and came back and dropped the head at his feet. Not a man could raise a hand against him.

So encompassed by a mighty host, he entered the city, and caused himself to be anointed king under the title of king Dadhivāhana, or Carried-on-the-Curds, and he ruled righteously.

One day, as the king was amusing himself by casting a net into the river, he caught a mango fruit, fit for the gods, which had floated down from lake Kaṇṇamunḍa. When the net was hauled out, the mango was found, and shown to the king. It was a huge fruit, as big as a basin, round, and golden in colour. The king asked what the fruit was: Mango, said the foresters. He ate it, and had the seed planted in his park, and watered with milk-water.

The tree sprouted up, and in three years it bore fruit. Great was the worship paid to this tree; milk-water was poured about it; perfumed garlands with five spray were hung upon it; wreaths were festooned about it; a lamp was kept burning, and 446 The meaning of gandhapañcangaṅgulikāṁ is uncertain. Perhaps a garland in which sprouts or twigs were arranged radiating like the fingers of a hand. See Morris in Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1884, s.v. See vol. i. p. 71 for a different rendering; but there gandhena pañcangulikāṁ datvā seems rather to mean “making five-finger wreaths with scent.” The spread hand is in many places a symbol used to avert the evil eye. In some villages of India it is marked on the house walls (North Ind. N. and Q., i. 42); it is carved on Phoenician tombstones (see those in the Bibliotheque Nationale in Paris); and I have seen it in all parts of Syria, on the houses of Jews, Christians, and Moslems.

---

fed with scented oil; and all round it was a screen of cloth. The fruit was sweet, and had the colour of fine gold. King Dadhivāhana, before sending presents of these mangoes to other kings, \( \{2.105\} \) used to prick with a thorn that place in the stone where the sprout would come from, for fear of their growing the like by planting it. When they ate the fruit, they used to plant the stone; but they could not get it to take root. They enquired the reason, and learned how the matter was.

One king asked his gardener whether he could spoil the flavour of this fruit, and turn it bitter on the tree. Yes, the man said he could; so his king gave him a thousand pieces and sent him on his errand.

So soon as he had arrived in Benares, the man sent a message to the king that a gardener was come. The king admitted him to the presence. After the man had saluted him, the king asked, “You are a gardener?” “Yes, sire,” said the man, and began to sound his own praises. “Very well,” said the king, “you may go and assist my park-keeper.” So after that these used both to look after the royal grounds.

The newcomer managed to make the park look more beautiful by forcing flowers and fruit out of their season. This pleased the king, \( \{2.73\} \) so that he dismissed the former keeper and gave the park into sole charge of the new one. No sooner had this man got the park into his own hands than he planted nimbs and creepers about the choice mango tree. By and by the nimbs sprouted up. Above and below, root with root, and branch with branch, these were all entangled with the mango tree. Thus this tree, with its sweet fruit, grew bitter as the bitter-leaved nimb by the company of this noxious and sour plant. As soon as the gardener knew that the fruit had gone bitter, he took to his heels.

King Dadhivāhana went walking in his pleasure gardens, and took a bite of the mango fruit. The juice in his mouth tasted like a nasty nimb; swallow it he could not, so he coughed it up and spat it out. Now at that time the Bodhisatta was his temporal and spiritual counsellor. The king turned to him. “Wise sir, this tree is as carefully cared for as ever, and yet its fruit has gone bitter. What’s the meaning of it?” and asking this question, he repeated the first verse: \( \{2.106\} \)

1. “Sweet was once the mango’s savour, sweet its scent, its colour gold: What has caused this bitter flavour? For we tend it as of old.”

The Bodhisatta explained the reason in the second verse:
2. “Round about the trunk entwining, branch with branch, and root with root,
See the bitter creeper climbing; that is what has spoilt your fruit;
And so you see bad company will make the better follow suit.”

On hearing this the Bodhisatta caused all the nimbs and creepers to be removed, and their roots pulled up; the noxious soil was all taken away, and sweet earth put in its place; and the tree was carefully fed with sweet water, milk-water, scented water. Then by absorbing all this sweetness its fruit grew sweet again. The king put his former gardener in charge of the park, and after his life was done passed away to fare according to his deeds.

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days I was the wise counsellor.”

Ja 187 Catumaṭṭajātaka

The Story about being Polished in Four Ways (2s)

Alternative Title: Catumaṭṭhajātaka (Cst)

In the present one vain old monk comes and sits with the two chief disciples and offers to teach them. They walk away in disgust. The Buddha tells a story of how a jackal interrupted the virtuous talk of two geese and a Devatā in a tree, and how they flew away back to the Himālayas.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), Sāriputta and Moggallānā = the two young geese (dve haṁsapotakā), the old monk = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Vanity, Suitability, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Sit and sing.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about an old monk. Once, we are told, the two chief disciples were sitting together, questioning and answering; when up came an old monk, and [2.74] made a third. {2.107} Taking a seat, he said: “I have a question too, sirs, which I should like to ask you, and if you have any difficulty, you may put it to me.” The elders were disgusted; they rose up and left him. The Saṅgha who listened to the discourse of the elders, after the meeting broke up, came to the Teacher; he asked what brought them there untimely and they told him what had happened. He replied, “This is not the first time, monks, that Sāriputta and Moggallāna have been disgusted with this man, and left him without a word; it was just the same in olden days.” And he proceeded to tell a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Tree Devatā that lived in a forest. Two young geese flew down from Mount Cittakūṭa and perched upon this tree. They flew about in search of food, returned there again, and after resting flew back to their mountain home. As time went on and on, the Devatā struck up a friendship with them. Coming and going, they were great friends, and used to talk about the dispensation to one another before they parted.

It happened one day as the birds sat on the treetop, talking with the Bodhisatta, that a jackal, halting at the foot of the tree, addressed the young geese in the words of the following verse:

1. “Sit and sing upon the tree
   If in private you would be.
   Sit upon the ground, and sing
   Verses to the beasts’ own king!”

Filled with disgust, the young geese took wing and flew back to Cittakūṭa. When they were gone, the Bodhisatta repeated the second verse for the jackal’s benefit:

2. “Fairwing here to fairwing sings,
   God to god sweet converse brings;
   Perfect beauty, you must then
   Back into your hole again!”  \(108\) \footnote{Lit. ‘lovely in four points,’ \textit{i.e.} as the commentator explains ‘in form, in birth, in voice, in quality’, said sarcastically.}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “In those times the old man was the jackal, Sāriputta and Moggallāna the two young geese, and I myself was the Tree Devatā.”
Ja 188 Sīhakoṭṭhukajātaka

The Story about the Lion and the Jackal (2s)

Alternative Title: Sīhakotthujātaka (Cst)

In the present Kokālika wanted to be one of those who recited the scriptures, and was invited to do so, but when he appeared in front of the Saṅgha he could not remember one verse. The Buddha tells a story of crossbreed, who looked like a lion, but sounded like his mother, a jackal. When he tried to roar all the other lions were embarrassed by his sound.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the animals (migarājā),
Rāhula = the (king’s) son (sajātiputta),
Kokālika = the jackal (sigāla).

Present Source: Ja 172 Daddara,
Quoted at: Ja 188 Sīhakoṭṭhuka, Ja 189 Sīhacamma.

Keywords: Imitation, Vanity, Animals.

“Lion’s claws and lion’s paws.” [2.75] This is a story told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about Kokālika. They say that Kokālika one day hearing a number of wise monks preaching, desired to preach himself; all the rest is like the circumstances given in a previous tale.448

At this time we hear that there were a number of very learned monks in the district of Manosilā, who spoke out like young lions, loud enough to bring down the heavenly Ganges, while reciting passages of scripture before the Saṅgha. As they recited their texts, Kokālika (not knowing what an empty fool he showed himself) thought he would like to do the same. So he went about among the monks saying: “They don’t ask me to recite a piece of scripture. If they were to ask me, I would do it.” All the Saṅgha got to know of it and they thought they would try him. “Friend Kokālika,” they said, “give the Saṅgha a recital of some scriptures

448 No. 172; compare no. 189. Kokālika is often alluded to in this way; cp. nos. 117, 481. There is a story in the Cullavagga i. 18. 3, turning on a similar point; a hen has a chick by a crow, and when it would cry cock-a-doodle-doo it caws, and vice versa (Vinaya Texts, Sacred Books of the East, ii. p. 362). [I include Kokālika’s story here.] today.” To this he agreed, not knowing his folly; that day he would recite before the Saṅgha.

He first partook of gruel made to his liking, ate some food, and had some of his favourite soup. At sundown the gong sounded for sermon time; all the Saṅgha gathered together. The ‘yellow robe’ which he put on was blue as a bluebell; his outer robe was pure white. Thus clad, he entered the meeting, greeted the elders, stepped up to a Dhamma Seat under a grand jewelled pavilion, holding an elegantly carved fan, and sat down, ready to begin his recitation. But just at that moment beads of sweat began to start out all over him, and he felt ashamed. The first verse of the first verse he repeated; but what came next he could not think. So rising from the seat in confusion, he passed out through the meeting, and sought his own cell. Someone else, a real scholar, recited the scripture. After that all the monks knew how empty he was.

One day the monks fell a talking of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, it was not easy to see formerly how empty Kokālika is; but now he has given tongue of his own accord, and shown it.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were discussing together. They told him.

This time again the Teacher on hearing of it said: “Not this once only has Kokālika been shown up for what he was worth by means of his own voice; the very same thing happened before.” And he told a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a lion in the Himālayas mountains, and he had a cub by a female jackal who mated with him. The cub was just like his father in toes, claws, mane, colour, figure – all these; but in voice he was like his mother.

One day, after a shower of rain, all the lions were gambolling together and roaring; the cub thought he would like to roar too, and yelped like a jackal. On hearing which all the lions fell silent at once! Another cub of the same sire, own brother of this one, heard the sound, and said: “Father, that lion is like us in colour and everything except in voice. Who’s he?” in asking which question he repeated the first verse:
1. “Lion’s claws and lion’s paws,
   Lion’s feet to stand upon;
   But the bellow of this fellow
   Sounds not like a lion’s son!” (2.109)

In answer the Bodhisatta said: “It’s your brother, the jackal’s cub; like me in form, but in voice like his mother.” Then he gave a word of advice to the other cub, “My dear son, as long as you live here keep a quiet tongue in your head. If you give tongue again, they’ll all find out that you are a jackal.” To drive the advice home he repeated the second verse:

2. “All will see what kind you be
   If you yelp as once before;
   So don’t try it, but keep quiet:
   Yours is not a lion’s roar.”

After this advice the creature never again so much as tried to roar.

When the Teacher had finished this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “In those days Kokālika was the jackal, Rāhula was the brother cub, and the king of beasts was I myself.”

Ja 189 Sīhacammajātaka

The Story about the Lion’s Skin (2s)

In the present Kokālika wanted to be one of those who recited the scriptures, and was invited to do so, but when he appeared in front of the Saṅgha he could not remember one verse. The Buddha tells a story of a merchant who used to throw a lion-skin over his donkey before putting him out to graze. But when confronted by villagers he revealed his true nature by braying, and was beaten to death.

The Bodhisatta = the wise farmer (paṇḍitakassaka),
Kokālika = the jackal (sigāla),
Devadatta = the merchant (vāṇija).

Present Source: Ja 172 Daddara,

Fausböll, Five Jātakas, pp. 14 and 39; Rhys Davids, Buddhist Birth Stories, p. v. This is Aesop’s Ass in the Lion’s Skin.
"Nor lion, nor tiger I see." [2.76] This story, like the last, was about Kokālika, told by the Teacher in Jetavana.

At this time we hear that there were a number of very learned monks in the district of Manosiḷā, who spoke out like young lions, loud enough to bring down the heavenly Ganges, while reciting passages of scripture before the Saṅgha. As they recited their texts, Kokālika (not knowing what an empty fool he showed himself) thought he would like to do the same. So he went about among the monks saying: “They don’t ask me to recite a piece of scripture. If they were to ask me, I would do it.” All the Saṅgha got to know of it and they thought they would try him. “Friend Kokālika,” they said, “give the Saṅgha a recital of some scriptures today.” To this he agreed, not knowing his folly; that day he would recite before the Saṅgha.

He first partook of gruel made to his liking, ate some food, and had some of his favourite soup. At sundown the gong sounded for sermon time; all the Saṅgha gathered together. The ‘yellow robe’ which he put on was blue as a bluebell; his outer robe was pure white. Thus clad, he entered the meeting, greeted the elders, stepped up to a Dhamma Seat under a grand jewelled pavilion, holding an elegantly carved fan, and sat down, ready to begin his recitation. But just at that moment beads of sweat began to start out all over him, and he felt ashamed. The first verse of the first verse he repeated; but what came next he could not think. So rising from the seat in confusion, he passed out through the meeting, and sought his own cell. Someone else, a real scholar, recited the scripture. After that all the monks knew how empty he was.

One day the monks fell a talking of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, it was not easy to see formerly how empty Kokālika is; but now he has given tongue of his own accord, and shown it.” The Teacher entered, and asked what they were discussing together. They told him.

This time he wanted to intone. The Teacher on hearing of it told the following story.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a farmer’s family, and when he grew up he got a livelihood by tillage.

At the same time there was a merchant who used to go about hawking goods, which a donkey carried for him. Wherever he went, he used to take his bundle off the ass, and throw a lionskin over him, and then turn him loose in the rice and barley fields. When the watchmen saw this creature, they imagined him to be a lion, and so did not come near him.

One day this hawker stopped at a certain village, and while he was getting his own breakfast cooked, he turned the ass loose in a barley field with the lionskin on. The watchmen thought it was a lion, and did not come near, but fled home and gave the alarm. All the villagers armed themselves, and hurried to the field, shouting and blowing on conchs and beating drums. The ass was frightened out of his wits, and gave a hee-haw! Then the Bodhisatta, seeing that it was a donkey, repeated the first verse:

1. "Nor lion nor tiger I see,
   Not even a leopard is he:
   But a donkey – the wretched old hack!
   With a lion-skin over his back!"

As soon as the villagers learned that it was only an ass, they cudgelled him till they broke his bones, and then went off with the lion-skin. When the merchant appeared, and found that his ass had come to grief, he repeated the second verse:

2. "The donkey, if he had been wise,
   Might long the green barley have eaten;
   A lion-skin was his disguise:
   But he gave a hee-haw, and got beaten!" [2.77]

As he was in the act of uttering these words, the ass expired. The merchant left him, and went his way.

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, "At that time Kokālika was the ass, and the wise farmer was I myself."
In the present one layman, wrapped up in contemplation of the Buddha, walks across the waves of a river. The Buddha tells a story in which two people were stranded on an island, but because of the virtue of one of them he was rescued by a Devatā. He only agreed to be saved if he could share merit with his companion, and he too could come.

The Bodhisatta = the Sea Devatā (Samuddadevatā),
Sāriputta = the king of the Nāgas (Nāgarājā),

Keywords: Meditation, Sharing, Devas.

“The fruit of sacrifice.” \(2.111\) This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about a believing layman. This was a faithful, pious soul, an elect disciple. One evening, on his way to Jetavana, he came to the bank of the river Aciravatī, when the ferrymen had pulled up their boat on the shore in order to attend service; as no boat could be seen at the landing-stage, and our friend’s mind being full of delightful thoughts of the Buddha, he walked into the river.\(^{450}\) His feet did not sink below the water. He got as far as mid-river walking as though he were on dry land; but there he noticed the waves. Then his Absorption subsided, and his feet began to sink. Again he strung himself up to high tension, and walked on over the water. So he arrived at Jetavana, greeted the Teacher, and took a seat on one side. The Teacher entered into conversation with him pleasantly. “I hope, good layman,” said he, “you had no mishap on your way.” “Oh, sir,” he replied, “on my way I was so absorbed in thoughts of the Buddha that I set foot upon the river; but I walked over it as though it had been dry ground!” “Ah, friend layman,” said the Teacher, “you are not the only one who has kept safe by remembering the virtues of the Buddha. In olden days pious laymen have been shipwrecked in mid-ocean, and saved themselves by remembering the Buddha’s virtues.” Then, at the man’s request, he told a story of the past.

In the past, in the days when Kassapa was Supreme Buddha, a disciple, who had entered on the Paths, took passage on board ship in company with a barber of some considerable property. The barber’s wife had given him in charge of our friend, to look after him for better and for worse.

A week later, the ship was wrecked in mid-ocean. These two persons clinging to one plank were cast up on an island. There the barber killed some birds, and cooked them, offering a share of his meal to the lay brother. “No, thank you,” said he, “I have had enough.” He was thinking to himself, “In this place there is no help for us except the Three Jewels,” and so he pondered upon the blessings of the Three Jewels. As he pondered and pondered, a Nāga king who had been born in that isle changed his own body to the shape of a great ship. The ship was filled with the seven kinds of precious things. A spirit of the sea was the helmsman. The three masts were made of sapphire, the anchor of gold, the ropes of silver, and the planks were golden.

The sea-spirit stood on board, crying, “Any passengers for Jambudīpa?” The lay brother said: “Yes, that’s where we are bound for.” “In with you then – on board with you!” He went aboard, and wanted to call his friend the barber. “You may come,” says the helmsman, “but not he.” “Why not?” “He is not a man of holy life, that’s why,” said the other, “I brought this ship for you, not for him.” “Very well: the gifts I have given, the virtues I have practised, the powers I have developed – I give him the fruit of all of them!” “I thank you, master!” said the barber. “Now,” said the sea-spirit, “I can take you aboard.” So he conveyed them both overseas, and sailed upstream to Benares. There, by his power, he created a store of wealth for both of them, and spoke to them thus:

“Keep company with the wise and good. If this barber had not been in company with this pious layman, he would have perished in the midst of the deep.” Then he uttered these verses in praise of good company:

---

451 The Three Jewels are the Buddha, the Dhamma, the Saṅgha. For the seven precious things (or jewels), see Childers, p. 402 b.

452 lakāro or laṅkūro. I do not know what the word means. Prof. Cowell suggests “anchor,” the Mod. Persian for which is langar. [CPED lists it as a sail, but this seems unlikely given the context.]
1. “Behold the fruit of sacrifice, virtue, and piety:
   A serpent in ship-shape conveys the good man o'er the sea.

2. Make friendship only with the good, and keep good company;
   Friends with the good, this barber could his home in safety see.” [2.113]

Thus did the spirit of the sea hold forth, poised in mid-air. Finally he went to his own abode, taking the Nāga king along with him.

The Teacher, after finishing this discourse, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the pious layman entered on the Fruit of the Second Path, “On that occasion the converted lay brother attained Nibbāna; Sāriputta was the Nāga king, and the sea-spirit was I myself.”

Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka

The Story about (the Family Priest) Ruhaka (2s)

In the present one monk who ordains after his marriage gradually comes once again under his wife’s power. The Buddha tells a story of how a brahmin was made a fool of by his wife, who made him dress and act like a horse. When shamed in front of the king he chased her out and got a new wife.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
the dissatisfied monk = (the family priest) Ruhaka,
his former wife = the brahmini (brāhmaṇī).

Present Source: Ja 423 Indriyajātaka,
Quoted at: Ja 13 Kaṇḍinajātaka, Ja 145 Rādhajātaka, Ja 191 Ruhakajātaka, Ja 318 Kaṇaverajātaka, Ja 380 Āsaṅkajātaka, Ja 523 Alambusājātaka.

Keywords: Attachment, Shame, Women.

“Even a broken bowstring.” [2.79] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about temptation arising from a former wife. The circumstances will be explained in the Eighth Book, in the Indriyajātaka [Ja 423].

_The Teacher told this tale while dwelling in Jetavana, concerning temptation by the wife of one’s former days. The story is that a young man of good family at Sāvatthi heard the Teacher's preaching, and thinking it impossible to lead a holy life, perfectly complete and pure, as a householder, he determined to become an ascetic in the dispensation which leads to safety and so make an end of misery._
So he gave up his house and property to his wife and children, and asked the Teacher to ordain him. The Teacher did so. As he was the junior in his going about for alms with his teachers and instructors, and as the monks were many, he got no chair either in laymen’s houses or in the refectory, but only a stool or a bench at the end of the novices, his food was tossed him hastily on a ladle, he got gruel made of broken lumps of rice, solid food stale or decaying, or sprouts dried and burnt; and this was not enough to keep him alive. He took what he had got to the wife he had left: she took his bowl, saluted him, emptied it and gave him instead well-cooked gruel and rice with sauce and curry.

The monk was captivated by the love of such flavours and could not leave his wife. She thought she would test his affection. One day she had a countryman cleansed with white clay and set down in her house with some others of his people whom she had sent for, and she gave them something to eat and drink. They sat eating and enjoying it. At the house-door she had some bullocks bound to wheels and a cart set ready. She herself sat in a back room cooking cakes. Her husband came and stood at the door. Seeing him, one old servant told his mistress that there was an elder at the door. “Salute him and bid him pass on.”

But though he did so repeatedly, he saw the monk remaining there and told his mistress. She came, and lifting up the curtain to see, she cried, “This is the father of my sons.” She came out and saluted him: taking his bowl and making him enter she gave him food: when he had eaten she saluted again and said: “Sir, you are a saint now: we have been staying in this house all this time; but there can be no proper householder’s life without a master, so we will take another house and go far into the country: be zealous in your good works, and forgive me if I am doing wrong.” For a time her husband was as if his heart would break. Then he said: “I cannot leave you, do not go, I will come back to my worldly life; send a layman’s garment to such and such a place, I will give up my bowl and robes and come back to you.” She agreed. The monk went to his monastery, and giving up his bowl and robes to his teachers and instructors he explained, in answer to their questions, that he could not leave his wife and was going back to worldly life.

Against his will they took him to the Teacher and told him that he was discontent and wished to go back to worldly life. The Teacher said: “Is this tale true?” “It is, Lord.” “Who causes you to fall back?” “My wife.”
Then the Teacher said to this monk, “That is a woman who does you harm. In former times, too, she put you to the blush before the king and his whole court, and gave you good reason to leave your home.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when king Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born of his chief queen. He came of age, and his father passed away; and then he became king and ruled in righteousness.

The Bodhisatta had a family priest named Ruhaka, and this Ruhaka had an old brahmin woman to wife.

The king gave the brahmin a horse fitted with all its trappings, and he mounted the horse and went to wait upon the king. As he rode along on the back of his richly caparisoned steed, the people on this side and that were loud in its praise, “See that fine horse!” they cried, “what a beauty!”

When he came home again, he went into his mansion and told his wife. {2.114}

“Goodwife,” said he, “our horse is passing fine! Right and left the people are all speaking in praise of it.”

Now his wife was no better than she should be, and full of deceit; so she made reply to him thus.

“Ah, husband, you do not know wherein lies the beauty of this horse. It is all in his fine trappings. Now if you would make yourself fine like the horse, put his trappings on yourself and go down into the street, prancing along horse-fashion. You will see the king, and he will praise you, and all the people will praise you.”

This fool of a brahmin listened to it all, but did not know what she purposed. So he believed her, and did as she had said. All that saw him laughed aloud, “There goes a fine teacher!” said they all. And the king cried shame on him. “Why, my Teacher,” said he, “has your bile gone wrong? Are you crazy?” At this the brahmin thought that he must have behaved amiss, and he was ashamed. So he was angry with his wife, and made haste home, saying to himself, “The woman has shamed me [2.80] before the king and all his army: I will chastise her and turn her out of doors!”

453 Compare Pañcatantra iv. 6 (Benfey, ii. p. 307).

But the crafty woman found out that he had come home in anger; she stole a march on him, and departed by a side door, and made her way to the palace, where she stayed four or five days. When the king heard of it, he sent for his family priest, and said to him,

“My Teacher, all womankind are full of faults; you ought to forgive this lady,” and with intent to make him forgive he uttered the first verse:

1. “Even a broken bowstring can be mended and made whole:
   Forgive your wife, and cherish not this anger in your soul.” [2.115]

Hearing this, Ruhaka uttered the second:

2. “While there is bark [454] and workmen too
   ‘Tis easy to buy bowstrings new.
   Another wife I will procure;
   That’s enough of this one, for sure.”

So saying, he sent her away, and took him another brahmin woman to wife.

The Teacher, after finishing this discourse, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the tempted monk was established in the fruit of the First Path, “On that occasion the former wife was the same, Ruhaka was the tempted monk, and I was the king of Benares.”

Ja 192 Sirikāḷakaṇṇijātaka [455]

The Story about Good Luck (2s)

There is no present day story. In the past an unlucky young man, after completing his studies, is given a very beautiful maiden to wife, but he scorns her, and the king takes her...

---

453 Reading mudūsu, ‘fresh (bark),’ from the fibre of which bowstrings were sometimes made.
to wife instead. Later on the road the queen sees her former husband and despises him with a smile. The Bodhisatta explains why.

The Bodhisatta = (pañḍita) Mahosadha.

Past Source: Ja 546 Mahā-ummagga, Quoted at: Ja 192 Sirikāḷakaṇṇi.

Keywords: Fortune, Suitability, Women.

“Should a woman be virtuous and fair,” This story will be given in the Mahā-ummaggajātaka [Ja 546].

Now a lad Piṅguttara living in Mithilā came to Taxila, and studied under a famous teacher, and soon completed his education; then after diligent study he proposed to take leave of his teacher and go. But in this teacher's family there was a custom, that if there should be a daughter ripe for marriage she should be given to the eldest pupil. This teacher had a daughter beautiful as a Devakaññā, so he said: “My son, I will give you my daughter and you shall take her with you.” Now this lad was unfortunate and unlucky, but the girl was very lucky. When he saw her he did not care for her; but though he said so, he agreed, not wishing to disregard his master's words, and the brahmin married the daughter to him.

Night came, when he lay upon the prepared bed; no sooner had she got into the bed than up he got groaning and lay down upon the floor. She got out and lay beside him, then he got up and went to bed again; when she came into the bed again he got out – for ill luck cannot mate with good luck. So the girl stayed in bed and he stayed on the ground. Thus they spent seven days. Then he took leave of his teacher and departed taking her with him.

On the road there was not so much as an exchange of talk between them. Both unhappy they came to Mithilā. Not far from the town, Piṅguttara saw a fig tree covered with fruit, and being hungry he climbed up and ate some of the figs. The girl also being hungry came to the foot of the tree and called out, “Throw down some fruit for me too.” “What!” says he, “have you no hands or feet? Climb up and get it yourself.” She climbed up also and ate. No sooner did he see that she had climbed than he came down quickly, and piled thorns around the tree, and made off saying to himself, “I have got rid of the miserable woman at last.” She could not get down, but remained sitting where she was.

456 [I have updated this quotation to fit with the translation.]
The Section with Two Verses – 756

Now the king, who had been amusing himself in the forest, was coming back to town on his elephant in the evening time when he saw her, and fell in love; so he sent to ask had she a husband or no. She replied, “Yes, I have a husband to whom my family gave me; but he has gone away and left me here alone.” The courtier told this tale to the king, who said: “Treasure trove belongs to the Crown.” She was brought down and placed on the elephant and conveyed to the palace, where she was sprinkled with the water of consecration as his queen consort. Dear and darling she was to him; and the name Udumbarā or queen Fig was given to her because he first saw her upon a fig tree.

One day after this, they who dwelt by the city gate had to clean the road for the king to go disporting into his park; and Piṅguttara, who had to earn his living, tucked up his clothes and set to work clearing the road with a hoe. Before the road was clean the king with queen Udumbarā came along in a chariot; and the queen seeing the wretch clearing the road could not restrain her triumph, but smiled to see the wretch there. The king was angry to see her smile, and asked why she did so. “My lord,” she said, “that road-cleaner fellow is my former husband, who made me climb up the fig tree and the piled thorns about it and left me; when I saw him I could not help feeling triumphant at my good fortune, and smiled to see the wretch there.” The king said: “You lie, you laughed at someone else, and I will kill you!” And he drew his sword. She was alarmed and said: “Sire, pray ask your wise men!” The king asked Senaka whether he believed her. “No, my lord, I do not,” said Senaka, “for who would leave such a woman if he once possessed her?” When she heard this she was more frightened than ever. But the king thought: “What does Senaka know about it? I will ask the sage,” and asked him reciting this verse:

1. “Should a woman be virtuous and fair, and a man not desire her – do you believe it Mahosadha?”

The sage replied:
2. “O king, I do believe it: the man would be an unlucky wretch; good luck and ill luck never can mate together.”

Ja 193 Cullapadumajātaka

The Shorter Story about (King) Paduma (2s)

Alternative Title: Cūḷapadumajātaka (Cst)

In the present a young monk, being driven by his desire for a young woman, is on the verge of quitting. The Buddha tells a story of how, when he was a young prince, he had saved and helped his wife in every circumstance, only to be betrayed and almost killed by her. When later she comes begging to his kingdom, he condemns her but lets her go free.

The Bodhisatta = king Paduma (Padumarājā),
Ānanda = the iguana king (godharājā),
Devadatta = the handicapped (thief) (kuṇṭha),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = the (Bodhisatta’s) wife (bhariyā),
the elder monks = the six brothers (ča bhātaro).

Present Source: Ja 527 Ummadantī, Quoted at: Ja 61 Asātamanta, Ja 193 Cullapaduma.

Keywords: Lust, Betrayal, Women, Devas.

“’Tis I – no other.” [2.81] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana about a discontented monk. The circumstances will be explained in the Ummadantījātaka [Ja 527].

The story tells that one day, as he was going his rounds in Sāvatthi for alms, he saw a woman of surpassing beauty, magnificently attired, and fell in love with her, and on returning home to his monastery he was unable to divert his thoughts from her. From that time, as it were, pierced with love's shafts and sick with desire he became as lean as a wild deer, with his veins standing out on his body, and as sallow as sallow could be. He no longer took delight in any one of the Four

[457] See Pañcatantra iv. 5 (Benfey, ii. p. 305); Thibetan Tales, no. xxi. “How a Woman requites Love.”
Postures, or found pleasure in his own thoughts, but giving up all the services due to a teacher he abandoned the use of instruction, inquiry and meditation.

His fellow-monks said: “Sir, once you were calm in mind and serene of countenance, but now it is not so. What can be the cause?” they asked. “Sirs,” he answered, “I have no pleasure in anything.” Then they bade him be happy, saying: “To be born [in the time of] a Buddha is a hard matter: so also is the hearing of the True Dhamma, and the attaining to birth as a human being. But you have attained to this, and, yearning to put an end to sorrow, you left your weeping kinsfolk and becoming a believer adopted the ascetic life. Why then do you now fall under the sway of passion? These evil passions are common to all ignorant creatures, from live worms upwards, and such of these passions as are material in their origin, they too are insipid. Desires are full of sorrow and despair: misery in this case ever increases more and more. Desire is like a skeleton or a piece of meat. Desire is like a torch made of a wisp of hay or a light from embers. Desire vanishes like a dream or a loan, or the fruit of a tree. Desire is as biting as a sharp-pointed spear, or as a serpent’s head. But you, verily, after embracing such a Buddha’s dispensation as this and becoming an ascetic, have now fallen under the sway of such harmful passions.” When by their admonitions they failed to make him grasp their teaching, they brought him before the Teacher in the Dhamma Hall. And when he said: “Why, monks, have you brought this monk here against his will?” they answered, “They tell us, he is discontent.”

When this monk was asked by the Teacher whether he were really discontent, he replied that he was. “Who,” said the Teacher, “has caused you to fall back?” He replied that he had seen a woman dressed up in finery, and overcome by passion he had fallen back. Then the Teacher said: “Monk, womankind are all ungrateful and treacherous; wise men of old were even so stupid as to give the blood from their own right knee for them to drink, and made them presents all their life long, and yet did not win their hearts.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when king Brahmadatta reigned over Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as his chief queen’s son. On his name-day, they called him prince Paduma, the Lotus prince. After him came six younger brothers. One after another these seven came of age and married and settled down, living as the king’s companions.
One day the king looked out into the palace courts, and as he looked he saw these men with a great following on their way to wait upon himself. He conceived the suspicion that they meant to slay him, and seize his kingdom. So he sent for them, and after this fashion bespake them.

“My sons, you may not dwell in this town. So go elsewhere, and when I die you shall return and take the kingdom which belongs to our family.”

They agreed to their father’s words; and went home weeping and wailing. “It matters not where we go!” they cried; and taking their wives with them, they left the city, and journeyed along the road. By and by they came to a wood, where they could get no food or drink. And being unable to bear the pangs of hunger, they determined to save their lives at the women’s cost. They seized the youngest brother’s wife, and slew her; they cut up her body into thirteen parts, and ate it. But the Bodhisatta and his wife set aside one portion, and ate the other between them.

Thus they did six days, and slew and ate six of the women; and each day the Bodhisatta set one portion aside, so that he had six portions saved. [2.82]

On the seventh day the others would have taken the Bodhisatta’s wife to kill her; but instead he gave them the six portions which he had kept. “Eat these,” said he, “tomorrow I will manage.” They all did eat the flesh; and when the time came that they fell asleep, the Bodhisatta and his wife made off together.

When they had gone a little space, the woman said: “Husband, I can go no further.” So the Bodhisatta took her upon his shoulders, and at sunrise he came out of the wood. When the sun was risen, said she, “Husband, I am thirsty!”

“There is no water, dear wife!” said he. But she begged him again and again, until he struck his right knee with his sword, {2.117} and said: “Water there is none; but sit you down and drink the blood here from my knee.” And so she did.

By and by they came to the mighty Ganges. They drank, they bathed, they ate all manner of fruits, and rested in a pleasant spot. And there by a bend of the river they made an ascetic’s hut and took up their abode in it.

Now it happened that a robber in the regions of Upper Ganges had been guilty of high treason. His hands and feet, and his nose and ears had been cut off, and he was laid in a canoe, and left to drift down the great river. To this place he floated, groaning aloud with pain. The Bodhisatta heard his piteous wailing.

“While I live,” said he, “no poor creature shall perish because of me!” and to the river bank he went, and saved the man. He brought him to the hut, and with astringent lotions and ointments he tended his wounds.

But his wife said to herself, “Here is a nice lazy fellow he has fetched out of the Ganges, to look after!” and she went about spitting for disgust at the fellow.

Now when the man’s wounds were growing together, the Bodhisatta had him to dwell there in the hut along with his wife, and he brought fruits of all kinds from the forest to feed both him and the woman. And as they thus dwelt together, the woman fell in love with the fellow, and did wrong. Then she desired to kill the Bodhisatta, and said to him, “Husband, as I sat on your shoulder when I came out from the forest, I saw that hill, and I vowed that if ever you and I should be saved, and come to no harm, I would make offering to the Devatā of the hill. Now this spirit haunts me: and I desire to pay my offering!”

“Very good,” said the Bodhisatta, not knowing her guile. He prepared an offering, and delivering to her the vessel of offering, he climbed the hill-top. {2.18}

Then his wife said to him, “Husband, not the hill-spirit, but you are my chief of gods! Then in your honour first of all I will offer wild flowers, and walk reverently [2.83] round you, keeping you on the right, and salute you: and after that I will make my offering to the mountain spirit.” So saying, she placed him facing a precipice, and pretended that she was fain to salute him in reverent fashion. Thus getting behind him, she smote him on the back, and hurled him down the precipice. Then she cried in her joy, “I have seen the back of my enemy!” and she came down from the mountain, and went into the presence of her lover.

Now the Bodhisatta tumbled down the cliff; but he stuck fast in a clump of leaves on the top of a fig tree where there were no thorns. Yet he could not get down the hill, so there he sat among the branches, eating the figs. It happened that a huge iguana used to climb the hill from the foot of it, and would eat the fruit of this fig tree. That day he saw the Bodhisatta and took to flight. On the next day, he came and ate some fruit on one side of it. Again and again he came, till at last he struck up a friendship with the Bodhisatta. “How did you get to this place?” he asked; and the Bodhisatta told him how.

“Well, don’t be afraid,” said the iguana; and taking him on his own back, he descended the hill and brought him out of the forest. There he set him upon the high road, and showed him what way he should go, and himself returned to the forest.

The other proceeded to a certain village, and dwelt there till he heard of his father’s death. Upon this he made his way to Benares. There he inherited the kingdom which belonged to his family, and took the name of king Paduma; the ten rules of righteousness for kings he did not transgress, and he ruled uprightly. He built six alms halls, one at each of the four gates, one in the midst of the city, and one before the palace; and every day he distributed in gifts six hundred thousand pieces of money.

Now the wicked wife took her lover upon her shoulders, and came forth out of the forest; and she went begging among the people, and collected rice and gruel to support him withal. {2.119} If she was asked what the man was to her, she would reply, “His mother was sister to my father, he is my cousin;^{458} to him they gave me. Even if he were doomed to death I would take my own husband upon my shoulders, and care for him, and beg food for his living!”

“What a devoted wife!” said all the people. And thenceforward they gave her more food than ever. Some of them also offered advice, saying: “Do not live in this way. King Paduma is lord of Benares; he has set all Jambudīpa in a stir by his bounty. It will delight him to see you; so delighted will he be, that he will give you rich gifts. Put your husband [2.84] in this basket, and make your way to him.” So saying, they persuaded her, and gave her a willow basket.

The wicked woman placed her lover in the basket, and taking it up she repaired to Benares, and lived on what she got at the alms halls. Now the Bodhisatta used to ride to an alms-hall upon the back of a splendid elephant richly dressed; and after giving alms to eight or ten people, he would set out again for home. Then ^{458} The Sanskrit version says “his kinsfolk persecuted him,” which gives a reason for the state he was seen in. the wicked woman placed her lover in the basket, and taking it up, she stood where the king was used to pass. The king saw her. “Who is this?” he asked. “A devoted wife,” was the answer. He sent for her, and recognised who she was. He caused the man to be put down from the basket, and asked her, “What is this man to you?”

“He is the son of my father’s sister, given me by my family, my own husband,” she answered.

“Ah, what a devoted wife!” cried they all: for they knew not the ins and outs of it; and they praised the wicked woman.

“What – is the scoundrel your cousin? Did your family give him to you?” asked the king, “Your husband, is he?”

She did not recognise the king; and, “Yes, my lord!” said she, as bold as you like.

“And is this the king of Benares’ son? Are you not the wife of prince Paduma, the daughter of such and such a king, your name so and so? Did not you drink the blood from my knee? Did you not fall in love with this rascal, and throw me down a precipice? Ah, you thought that I was dead, and here you are with death written upon your own forehead – and here am I, alive!” {2.120}

Then he turned to his courtiers. “Do you remember what I told you, when you questioned me? My six younger brothers slew their six wives and ate them; but I kept my wife unhurt, and brought her to Ganges’ bank, where I dwelt in an ascetic’s hut: I hauled a condemned criminal out of the river, and supported him; this woman fell in love with him, and threw me down a precipice, but I saved my life by showing kindness. This is no other than the wicked woman who threw me off the crag: this, and no other, is the condemned wretch!” And then he uttered the following verses:

1. “‘Tis I – no other, and this queen is she;
The handless cheat, no other, there you see;
Said she – ‘This is the husband of my youth.’
Women deserve to die; they have no truth.
2. With a great club beat out the scoundrel's life
Who lies in wait to steal his neighbour's wife.
Then take the faithful harlot by and by,
And shear off nose and ears before she die."  {2.121}

But although the Bodhisatta could not swallow his anger, and ordained this punishment for them, he did not do accordingly; but he [2.85] smothered his wrath, and had the basket fixed upon her head so fast that she could not take it off; the villain he had placed in the same, and they were driven out of his kingdom.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk entered on the Fruit of the First Path, “In those days certain elders were the six brothers, the young lady Ciñcā was the wife, Devadatta was the criminal, Ānanda was the iguana, and king Paduma was I myself.”

Jā 194 Maṇicorajātaka
The Story about the Jewel Thief (2s)

In the present Devadatta goes about trying to kill the Buddha, who tells a story where an unjust king tried to steal the virtuous wife of the Bodhisatta by first having his head cut off. Sakka is alerted and intervenes and the Bodhisatta becomes the new and righteous king.

The Bodhisatta = the king raised by Sakka (Sakkadattiyarājā), Rāhulamātā = (his wife) Sujātā,
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Devadatta = the unrighteous king (adhammikarājā).

Keywords: Virtue, Lust, Devas.

“You gods are here.” This story the Teacher told during a stay in Veḷuvana, how Devadatta tried to kill him. Hearing that Devadatta went about to kill him, he said: “Monks, this is not the only time that Devadatta has been trying to kill me; he tried to do so before, and failed.” Then he told them this story.

In the past Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, when the Bodhisatta came to life as the son of a householder who lived in a village not far from the city.
When he came to years, they fetched a young lady of family from Benares to marry him. She was a fair and lovely maiden, beautiful as a Devaccharā, graceful like a twining creeper, ravishing as a Kinnarī. Her name was Sujātā; she was faithful, virtuous, and dutiful. She always did duly her duty to her lord and his parents. This girl was very dear and precious to the Bodhisatta. {2.122} So they two dwelt together in joy, and unity, and oneness of mind.

One day Sujātā said to her husband, “I have a wish to see my mother and father.”

“Very good, my wife,” replied he, “make ready food sufficient for the journey.” He caused food of all sorts to be cooked, and placed the provisions in a wagon; since he drove the vehicle, he sat in front, and his wife behind. To Benares they went; and there they unyoked the wagon, and washed, and ate. Then the Bodhisatta yoked the oxen [2.86] again, and sat in front; and Sujātā, who had changed her dress and adorned herself, sat behind.

As the wagon entered the city, the king of Benares happened to he making a solemn circuit round the place mounted upon the back of a splendid elephant; and he passed by that place. Sujātā had come down out of the cart, and was walking behind on foot. The king saw her: her beauty so attracted his eye, that he became enamoured of her. He called one of his suite. “Go,” said he, “and find out whether that woman has a husband or no.” The man did as he was bid, and came back to tell the king. “She has a husband, I am told,” said he, “do you see that man sitting in the cart yonder? He is her husband.”

The king could not smother his passion, and a wrong thought entered into his mind. “I will find some way of getting rid of this fellow,” he thought, “and then I will take the wife myself.” Calling to a man, he said: “Here, my good fellow, take this jewelled crest, and make as though you were passing down the street. As you go, drop it in the wagon of that man.” So saying, he gave him a jewelled crest, and dismissed him. The man took it, and went; as he passed the wagon, he dropped it in; then he returned, and reported to the king that it was done. “I have lost a jewelled crest!” cried the king; the whole place was in an uproar.

“Shut all the gates!” the king gave order, “cut off the outlets! Hunt the thief!” The king’s followers obeyed. The city was all confusion! The other man, taking some others with him, went up to the Bodhisatta, crying, “Hello! Stop your cart! {2.123} The king has lost a jewelled crest; we must search your cart!” And search it he did, till he found the jewel which he had put there himself. “Thief!” cried he, seizing the Bodhisatta; they beat him and kicked him; then binding his arms behind him they dragged him before the king, crying out, “See the thief who stole your jewel!” “Off with his head!” was the king’s command. They scourged him with whips, and tormented him at every street corner, and cast him out of the city by the south gates.

Now Sujātā left the wagon, and stretching out her arms she ran after him, wailing as she went, “O my husband, it is I who brought you into this woeful plight!” The king’s servants threw the Bodhisatta upon his back, with the intent to cut off his head. When she saw this, Sujātā thought upon her own goodness and virtue, reflecting thus within herself, “I suppose there can be no spirit here strong enough to stay the hand of cruel and wicked men, who work mischief to the virtuous,” and weeping and wailing she repeated the first verse:

1. “No gods are here: they must be far away;
No gods, who over all the world hold sway:
Now wild and violent men may work their will,
For here is no one who could say them nay.” [2.87]

As this virtuous woman thus lamented, the throne of Sakka, King of the Devas, grew hot as he sat upon it. [2.124] “Who is it that would make me fall from my throne?” thought Sakka. Then he was aware of what was befalling. “The king of Benares,” he thought, “is doing a very cruel deed. He is making the virtuous Sujātā miserable; now I must go there!” So descending from the heavenly world, by his own power he dismounted the wicked king from the elephant on whose back he was riding, and laid him upon his back in the place of execution, but the Bodhisatta he caught up, and decked him with all kinds of ornaments, and made the king’s dress come upon him, and set him on the back of the king’s elephant. The servants lifted the axe and smote off a head – but it was the king’s head; and when it was off, they knew that it was the head of the king.

Sakka took upon him a visible body, and came before the Bodhisatta, and consecrated him to be king; and caused the place of chief queen to be given to Sujātā. And as the courtiers, the brahmans and householders, and the rest, saw Sakka, King of the Devas, they rejoiced, saying: “The unrighteous king is slain! Now have we received from the hands of Sakka a king who is righteous!” And Sakka stood poised in the air, and declared, “This your righteous king from this time forth shall rule in righteousness. If a king be unrighteous, god sends rain out of season, and in season he sends no rain: and fear of famine, fear of pestilence, fear of the sword – these three fears come upon men for him.” Thus did he instruct them, and spake this second verse:

2. “For him no rain falls in the time of rain,
But out of season pours and pours amain.
A lord comes down from heaven upon the earth.
Behold the reason why this man is slain.”  [2.125]

Thus did Sakka admonish a great concourse of folk, and then he went straight to his divine abode. And the Bodhisatta reigned in righteousness, and then went to swell the hosts of heaven.

The Teacher, having ended this discourse, thus identified the Jātaka, “At that time Devadatta was the wicked king; Anuruddha was Sakka; Sujātā was Rāhula’s mother; but the king by Sakka’s gift was I myself.”

Ja 195 Pabbatūpattharajātaka
The Story about the Valley (2s)

In the present a courtier had an affair in the king of Kosala’s harem, and he asked advice of the Buddha as to what he should do. The Buddha told a story of a similar event in the past, and the wise advice he had given at that time.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Lust, Forgiveness.

“A happy lake.” [2.88] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about the king of Kosala.

We are told that a certain courtier intrigued in the royal harem. The king inquired into the matter, and when he found it all out exactly he determined to tell the Teacher. So he came to Jetavana, and saluted the Teacher; told him how a courtier had intrigued, and asked what he was to do. The Teacher asked him whether he found the courtier useful to him, and whether he loved his wife. “Yes,” was the reply, “the man is very useful; he is the mainstay of my court; and I do love the woman.” “Sire,” replied the Teacher, “when servants are useful, and women are
The Section with Two Verses – 767

dear, there is no harming them. In olden days too kings listened to the words of the wise, and were indifferent to such things.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a courtier’s family. When he came of age, he became the king’s counsellor in things temporal and spiritual.

Now one of the king’s court intrigued in the harem, and the king learned all about it. “He is a most useful servant,” he thought, “and the woman is dear to me. I cannot destroy these two. (2.126) I will put a question to some wise man of my court; and if I must put up with it, put up with it I will; if not, then I will not.”

He sent for the Bodhisatta, and bade him be seated. “Wise sir,” said he, “I have a question to ask you.”

“Ask it, O king! I will make answer,” replied the other. Then the king asked his question in the words of the first couplet:

1. “A happy lake lay sheltered at the foot of a lovely hill,
   But a jackal used it, knowing that a lion watched it still.”

“Surely,” thought the Bodhisatta, “one of his courtiers must have intrigued in the harem,” and he recited the second couplet:

2. “Out of the mighty river all creatures drink at will:
   If she is dear, have patience – the river’s a river still.” (2.127)

Thus did the Great Being advise the king.

And the king abode by this advice, and he forgave them both, bidding them go and do wrong no more. And from that time they ceased. And the king gave alms, and did good, till at his life’s end he went to fill the hosts of heaven. (2.89)

And the king of Kosala also, after hearing this discourse, forgave both these people and remained indifferent.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time Ānanda was the king, and I myself was the wise counsellor.”
Ja 196 Valāhassajātaka
The Story about the Cloud-Horse (2s)

In the present one monk is tempted to go back to the lay life by the sight of a woman in her finery. The Buddha tells a story of how Yakkhinis used to capture lost merchants, take them to husband and then devour them when they were finished with them. The Bodhisatta in the guise of a flying horse managed to save half of those in captivity, who later become his disciples.

The Bodhisatta = the flying horse king (valāhakassarājā), the Buddha’s disciples = the 250 merchants who followed his advice (valāhakassarājassa vacanakarā āḍḍhateyyasatā vāṇījā).

Keywords: Lust, Good advice, Devas, Women.

“They who will neglect.” This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about a monk who had become discontent.

When the Teacher asked him if it was really true that he was discontent, the monk replied that it was true. Being questioned for the reason, he replied that his passion had been aroused by seeing a finely dressed woman. Then the Teacher thus addressed him:

“Monk, these women tempt men by their figure and voice, scents, perfumes, and touch, and by their wiles and dalliance; thus they get men into their power; and as soon as they perceive that this is done, they ruin them, character, wealth and all, by their evil ways. This gives them the name of Yakkhini. In former days also a troop of Yakkhinis tempted a caravan of traders, and got power over them; and afterwards, when they got sight of other men, they killed every one of them, and then devoured them, crunching them in their teeth while the blood ran down over both cheeks.” And then he told a story of the past.

In the past, there was in the island of Ceylon a Yakkha town called Sirīsavatthu, peopled by Yakkhinis. When a ship is wrecked, these adorn and deck themselves, and taking rice and gruel, with trains of slaves, and their children on their hip, they come up to the merchants. \[2.128\] In order to make them imagine that theirs is a city of human beings, they make them see here and there men ploughing and tending kine, herds of cattle, dogs, and the like. Then approaching the merchants they invite them to partake of the gruel, rice, and other food which they bring.
The merchants, all unaware, eat of what is offered. When they have eaten and drunken, and are taking their rest, the Yakkhas address them thus, “Where do you live? Where do you come from? Whither are you going, and what errand brought you here?” “We were shipwrecked here,” they reply. “Very good, noble sirs,” the others make answer, “’tis three years ago since our own husbands went on board ship; they must have perished. You are merchants too; we will be your wives.” Thus they lead them astray by their women’s wiles, and tricks, and dalliance, until they get them into the Yakkha city; then, if they have any others already caught, they bind these with magic chains, and cast them into the house of torment. And if they find no shipwrecked men in the place where they dwell, they scour the coast as far as the river Kalyāṇī on one side and the island of Nāgadīpa on the other. This is their way.

Now it happened once that five hundred shipwrecked traders were cast ashore near the city of these Yakkhinis. The Yakkhas came up to them and enticed them, till they brought them to their city; those whom they had caught before, they bound with magic chains and cast them into the house of torment. Then the chief Yakkhini took the chief man, and the others took the rest, till five hundred had the five hundred traders; and they made the men their husbands. Then in the night time, when her man was asleep, the chief Yakkhini rose up, and made her way to the house of death, slew some of the men and ate them. The others did the same. When the eldest Yakkhini returned from eating men’s flesh, her body was cold. The eldest merchant embraced her, and perceived that she was a Yakkhini. “All the five hundred of them must be Yakkhas!” he thought to himself, “we must make our escape!”

So in the early morning, when he went to wash his face, he bespake the other merchants in these words. “These are Yakkhinis, and not human beings! As soon as other shipwrecked men can be found, they will make them their husbands, and will eat us; come – let us escape!”

---

Two hundred and fifty of them replied, “We cannot leave them: go you, if you will, but we will not flee away.”

Then the chief trader with two hundred and fifty, who were ready to obey him, fled away in fear of the Yakkhinis.

Now at that time, the Bodhisatta had come into the world as a flying horse,\(^\text{460}\) white all over, and beaked like a crow, with hair like muñja grass,\(^\text{461}\) possessed of Supernormal Powers, able to fly through the air. From the Himālayas he flew through the air until he came to Ceylon. There he passed over the ponds and tanks of Ceylon, and ate the paddy that grew wild there. As he passed on thus, he thrice uttered human speech filled with mercy, saying: “Who wants to go home? Who wants to go home?” The traders heard his saying, and cried, “We are going home, master!” joining their hands, and raising them respectfully to their foreheads. “Then climb up on my back,” said the Bodhisatta. Therat some of them climbed up, some laid hold of his tail, and some remained standing, with a respectful salute. Then the Bodhisatta took up even those who stood still saluting him, and conveyed all of them, even two hundred and fifty, to their own country, and set down each in his own place; then he went back to his place of dwelling.

And the Yakkhinis, when other men came to that place, slew those two hundred and fifty who were left, and devoured them.

The Teacher now said, addressing the monks, “Monks, even as these traders perished by falling into the hands of Yakkhinis, but the others by obeying the behest of the wonderful horse each returned safe home again; so, even so, they who neglect the advice of the Buddhas, both monks and nuns, lay brethren and lay sisters, \(^{2.130}\) come to great misery in the four hells, places where they are punished under the five fetters, and so forth. But those who abide by such advice come to the three kinds of fortunate birth, the six heavens of sense, the twenty \(^{460}\) On one side of a pillar in a Buddhist railing at Mathura, is a flying horse with people clinging to it, perhaps intended for this scene (Anderson, Catalogue of the Indian Museum, i. p. 189).

---

\(^{461}\) Saccharum Muñja.
Brahmā Realms, and reaching the state of the imperishable Nibbāna they attain great blessedness.” Then, after Fully Awakening, he recited the following verses:

1. “They who will neglect the Buddha when he tells them what to do,
   As Yakkhinis ate the merchants, likewise they shall perish too.

2. They who hearken to the Buddha when he tells them what to do,
   As the bird-horse saved the merchants, they shall win their safety too.”

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk entered on the Fruit of the First Path, and many others entered on the Fruit of the First, Second, Third or Fourth, “The Buddha’s followers were the two hundred and fifty who followed the advice of the horse, and I was the horse myself.”

Ja 197 Mittāmittajātaka

The Story about Friends and Foes (2s)

In the present one monk places his trust in his teacher, only to be violently rebuffed by him. When the Buddha hears of it he tells a story of an ascetic who kept a wild elephant, and how it killed him, leading the Bodhisatta to show how to distinguish friend from foe.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gañasatthā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s group (isigaṇa),
the preceptor = the elephant (hatthī),
the co-resident monk = the ascetic who kept an elephant (hatthiposakatāpasa).

Keywords: Confidence, Wisdom, Animals.

“He smiles not.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Sāvatthi, about a certain monk.

This monk took a piece of cloth, that had been given to his teacher, feeling confident that if he took it his teacher would not be angry. Then he made a shoe-bag of it, and took his leave. When this teacher asked why he took it, he replied he had felt confident, if he did, that his teacher would not be angry. The teacher flew into a passion, [2.131] got up and struck him a blow. “What confidence is there between you and me?” he asked.

This fact became known among the Saṅgha. One day the monks were all together talking about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, young monk [2.92] So-and-so felt so confident of his teacher's friendship, that he took a piece of cloth, and made it into a shoe-bag. Then the teacher asked him what confidence there was between them, flew into a passion, jumped up, and gave him a blow.” The Teacher came in, and asked them what they were talking of as they sat there together. They told him. Then he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that this man has disappointed the confidence of his fellow. He did the same before.” And then he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a brahmin’s son in the realm of Kāsi. When he came of age, he renounced the world; he caused to grow in him the Super Knowledges and Attainments, and took up his abode in the region of the Himālayas with a band of disciples. One of this band of ascetics disobeyed the voice of the Bodhisatta, and kept a young elephant which had lost its mate. This creature by and by grew big, then killed its master and made off into the forest. The ascetics did his obsequies; and then, coming about the Bodhisatta, they put this question to him.

“Sir, how may we know whether one is a friend or an enemy?”

This the Bodhisatta declared to them in the following verses:

1. “He smiles not when he sees him, no welcome will he show,
   He will not turn his eyes that way, and answers him with ‘No’.

2. These are the marks and tokens by which your foe you see:
   These if a wise man sees and hears he knows his enemy.” [2.132]

In these words the Bodhisatta declared the marks of friend and foe. Thereafter he cultivated the Divine Abidings, and entered the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “The monk in question was he who kept the pet elephant, his teacher was the elephant, the Buddha’s followers were then the band of ascetics, and I myself was their chief.”
In the present one monk is tempted to go back to the lay life by the sight of a woman in her finery. The Buddha tells a story of how two adopted parrots were asked to keep their eye on a brahmin’s wife when their master was away, how she did wrong, and killed one of the parrots when questioned about her behaviour.

The Bodhisatta = (the parrot) Rādha, Ānanda = (his brother) Poṭṭhapāda.

Past Compare: Ja 145 Rādha, Ja 198 Rādha.

Keywords: Lust, Murder, Animals, Birds.

“I come, my son.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about a monk who was discontent.

We hear that the Teacher asked him if he really were discontent; and he replied, yes, he was. Being asked the reason, he replied, “Because my passions [2.93] were aroused on seeing a woman in her finery.” Then the Teacher said: “Monk, there is no guarding women. In days of yore, watchers were placed to guard the doors, and yet they could not keep them safe; even when you have got them, you cannot keep them.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a young parrot. His name was Rādha, and his youngest brother was named Poṭṭhapāda. While they were yet quite young, both of them were caught by a fowler and handed over to a brahmin in Benares. The brahmin cared for them as if they were his children. [2.133] But the brahmin’s wife was a wicked woman; there was no guarding her.

There are many variants of this story. Compare Gesta Romanorum, (Early Eng. Text Soc.), no. 45, pp. 174 ff.; Boke of the Knight de la Tour Landry (same series), p. 22. Compare no. 145. [I have restored the title as it doesn’t appear in the printed edition. It is given in the Table of Contents, and in the Text.]
The husband had to go away on business, and addressed his young parrots thus. “Little dears, I am going away on business. Keep watch on your mother in season and out of season; observe whether or not any man visits her.” So off he went, leaving his wife in charge of the young parrots.

As soon as he was gone, the woman began to do wrong; night and day the visitors came and went – there was no end to them. Poṭṭhapāda, observing this, said to Rādha, “Our master gave this woman into our charge, and here she is doing wickedness. I will speak to her.”

“Don’t,” said Rādha. But the other would not listen. “Mother,” said he, “why do you do wrong?”

How she longed to kill him! But making as though she would fondle him, she called him to her.

“Little one, you are my son! I will never do it again! Here, then, the dear!” So he came out; then she seized him crying, “What! You preach to me! You don’t know your measure!” and she wrung his neck, and threw him into the oven.

The brahmin returned. When he had rested, he asked the Bodhisatta: “Well, my dear, what about your mother – does she do wrong, or no?” and as he asked the question, he repeated the first couplet:

1. “I come, my son, the journey done, and now I am at home again: Come tell me; is your mother true? Does she make love to other men?”

Rādha answered, “Father dear, the wise speak not of things which do not conduce to blessing, whether they have happened or not,” and he explained this by repeating the second couplet: [2.134]

2. “For what he said he now lies dead, burnt up beneath the ashes there: It is not well the truth to tell, lest Poṭṭhapāda’s fate I share.” [2.94]

Thus did the Bodhisatta hold forth to the brahmin; and he went on, “This is no place for me to live in either,” then bidding the brahmin farewell, he flew away to the woods.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the discontented monk reached the Fruit of the First Path, “Ānanda was Poṭṭhapāda, and I myself was Rādha.”
Ja 199 Gahapatijātaka
The Story about the Householder (2s)

In the present one monk is tempted to go back to the lay life by the sight of a woman in her finery. The Buddha tells a story of how a brahmin’s wife cheated on him with a headman, how he caught them, and punished them for their behaviour.

Devadatta = the village headman,
The Bodhisatta = the householder who censured him (niggahakārako gahapati).

Keywords: Adultery, Punishment, Women.

“I like not this.” This story the Teacher told, also about a discontented monk, during a sojourn in Jetavana, and in the course of his address he said: “Womankind can never be guarded; somehow or other they will do wrong and trick their husbands.” And then he told the following story.

In the past, in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in the realm of Kāsi as a householder’s son: and coming of age he married and settled down. Now his wife was a wicked woman, and she intrigued with the village headman. The Bodhisatta heard of it, and bethought him how he might put her to the test. [2.135]

At that time all the grain had been carried away during the rainy season, and there was a famine. But it was the time when the corn had just sprouted; and all the villagers came together, and besought help of their headman, saying: “Two months from now, when we have harvested the grain, we will pay you in kind,” so they got an old ox from him, and ate it.

One day, the headman watched his chance, and when the Bodhisatta was gone abroad he visited the house. Just as the two were happy together, the Bodhisatta came in by the village gate, and set his face towards home. The woman was looking towards the village gate, and saw him. “Why, who’s this?” she wondered, looking at him as he stood on the threshold. “It is he!” She knew him, and she told the headman. He trembled in terror. [2.95]

“Don’t be afraid,” said the woman, “I have a plan. You know we have had meat from you to eat: make as though you were seeking the price of the meat; I will climb up into the granary; and stand at the door of it, crying. ‘No rice here!’ while you must stand in the middle of the room, and call out insisting, again and again, ‘I have children at home; give me the price of the meat!’ ”

So saying, she climbed up to the granary, and sat in the door of it. The other stood in the midst of the house, and cried, “Give me the price of the meat,” while she replied, sitting at the granary door, “There is no rice in the granary; I will give it when the harvest is home: leave me now!”

The goodman entered the house, and saw what they were about. “This must be that wicked woman’s plan,” he thought, and he called to the headman.

“Sir headman, when we had some of your old ox to eat, we promised to give you rice for it in two months’ time. Not half a month has passed; then why do you try to make us pay now? That’s not the reason you are here: you must have come for something else. I don’t like your ways. That wicked and sinful woman yonder knows that there is no rice in the garner, but she has climbed up, and there she sits, crying [2.136] ‘No rice here!’ and you cry ‘Give!’ I don’t like your doings, either of you!” and to make his meaning clear, he uttered these lines:

1. “I like not this, I like not that; I like not her, I say,
Who stands beside the granary, and cries ‘I cannot pay!’

2. Nor you, nor you, sir! Listen now: my means and store are small;
You gave me once a skinny cow, and two months’ grace withal;
Now, ere the day, you bid me pay! I like it not at all.”

So saying, he seized the headman by the lock of hair on the top of his head, dragged him out into the courtyard, threw him down, and as he cried, “I’m the headman!” mocked him thus, “Damages, please, for injury done to the chattels under another man’s watch and ward!” while he thrashed him till the man was faint. Then he took him by the neck and cast him out of the house. The wicked woman he seized by the hair of her head, pulled her away from the garner, knocked her down, and threatened her, “If you ever do this kind of thing again, I’ll make you remember it!”

From that day forward the headman did not even look at that house, and the woman did not dare to transgress even in thought. [2.137]
When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths, at the conclusion of which the discontented monk reached the Fruit of the First Path. “The goodman who punished that headman was I myself.”

Ja 200 Sādhusīlajātaka

The Story about Good Precepts (2s)

In the present one brahmin cannot decide between suitors for his four daughters and asks the Buddha’s advice. The Buddha tells of a similar occurrence in the past, and how, as Bodhisatta, he advised choosing the virtuous suitor as being the most suitable.

The Bodhisatta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo), the brahmin = the same in the past (brāhmaṇa).

Keywords: Virtue, Suitability.

“One is good.” [2.96] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a brahmin.

This man, we are told, had four daughters. Four suitors wooed them; one was fine and handsome, one was old and well advanced in years, the third a man of family, and the fourth was good. He thought to himself, “When a man is settling his daughters and disposing of them, whom should he give them to? The handsome man or the oldish man, or one of the other two, the highly born or the very virtuous man?” Ponder as he would, he could not decide. So he thought he would tell the matter to the Supreme Buddha, who would be sure to know; and then he would give the girls to the most suitable wooer. So he had a quantity of perfumes and garlands prepared, and visited the monastery. Saluting the Teacher, he sat on one side, and told him everything from beginning to end; then he asked, “To which of these four should I give my daughters?” To this the Teacher replied, “In olden days, as now, wise men asked this question; but now that rebirth has confused your memory, you cannot remember the case.” And then at his request the Teacher told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta ruled in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as a brahmin’s son. He came of age, and received his education at Taxila; then on returning he became a famous teacher.
Now there was a brahmin who had four daughters. These four were wooed by four persons as told above. The brahmin could not decide to whom to give them. “I will enquire of the teacher,” he thought, “and then he shall have them to whom they should be given.” So he came into the teacher’s presence, and repeated the first couplet:

1. “One is good, and one is noble; one has beauty, one has years. Answer me this question, brahmin; of the four, which best appears?”

Hearing this, the teacher replied, “Even though there be beauty and the like qualities, a man is to be despised if he fail in virtue. Therefore the former is not the measure of a man; those that I like are the virtuous.” And in explanation of this matter, he repeated the second couplet:

2. “Good is beauty, to the aged show respect, for this is right, Good is noble birth; but virtue – virtue, that is my delight.”

When the brahmin heard this, he gave all his daughters to the virtuous wooer.

The Teacher, when this discourse was ended, declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the brahmin attained the Fruit of the First Path, “This brahmin was the brahmin then, and the famous teacher was I myself.”

Ja 201 Bandhanāgārajātaka

The Story about the Prison (2s)

In the present some monks see prisoners bound tight in prison and ask the Buddha about fetters. The Buddha explains these are not the strongest fetters, but attachment to family and sense desire are even stronger, but explains that in the past some managed to break even these bonds, and tells a story about a previous life he had.

The Bodhisatta = the man who left his family and ordained (puttadāraṁ pahāya nikkhamitvā pabbajito puriso),
King Suddhodana = his father (pitā),
Mahāmāyā = the mother (mātā),
Rāhulamātā = his wife (bhariyā),
Rāhula = his son (putta).
Keywords: Attachment, Desire.

“Not iron fetters.” [2.139] This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about the prison-house.

At the time of this story we hear that a gang of burglars, highwaymen, and murderers had been caught and brought before the king of Kosala. The king ordered them to be made fast with chains, and ropes, and fetters. Thirty country monks, desirous of seeing the Teacher, had paid him a visit and offered their salutations. Next day, as they were seeking alms, they passed the prison and noticed these rascals. In the evening, after their return from the day’s rounds, they approached the Tathāgata, “Sir,” they said, “today, as we were seeking alms, we saw in the prison-house a number of criminals bound fast in chains and fetters, being in great misery. They could not break these fetters, and run away. Is there any fetter stronger than these?”

The Teacher replied, “Monks, those are fetters, it is true; but the fetters which consist of a craving for wealth, corn, sons, wives and children are stronger than they are a hundred-fold, nay a thousand-fold. Yet even those fetters, hard to break as they are, have been broken by wise men of old, who went to the Himālayas and became ascetics.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, while Brahmadatta ruled over Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a poor man’s family. When he grew up, his father died. He earned wages, and supported his mother. His mother, much against his will, brought a wife home for him, and soon after died. Now his wife conceived. Not knowing that she had conceived, he said to her, “Wife, you must earn your living; I will renounce the world.” Then said she, “Nay, for I am with child. [2.140] Wait and see the child that is born of me, and then go and become an ascetic.” To this he agreed. So when she was delivered, he said: “Now, wife, you are safely delivered, and I must turn ascetic.” “Wait,” said she, “till the time when the child is weaned.” And after that she conceived again.

“If I agree to her request,” thought the Bodhisatta, “I shall never get away at all. I will flee without saying a word to her, and become an ascetic.” So he told her nothing, but rose up in the night, and fled away. [2.98]
The city guards seized him. “I have a mother to support,” said he, “let me go!” thus he made them let him go free, and after staying in a certain place, he passed out by the chief gate and made his way to the Himālayas, where he lived as a recluse; and caused the Super Knowledges and Attainments to spring up within him, as he dwelt in the rapture of meditation. As he dwelt there, he exulted, saying: “The bond of wife and child, the bond of passion, so hard to break, is broken!” and he uttered this exalted utterance:

1. “Not iron fetters – so the wise have told
   Not ropes, or bars of wood, so fast can hold
   As passion, and the love of child or wife,
   Of precious gems and earrings of fine gold.

2. These heavy fetters – who is there can find Release from such? These are the ties that bind:
   These if the wise can burst, then they are free,
   Leaving all love and all desire behind!” {2.141}

And the Bodhisatta, after uttering this exalted utterance, without breaking his Absorption attained to the Brahmā Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths: at the conclusion of the Truths, some entered the First Path, some the Second, some the Third, and some the Fourth. “In the story, Mahāmāyā was the mother, king Suddhodana was the father, Rāhula’s mother was the wife, Rāhula himself the son, and I was the man who left his family and became an ascetic.”

Ja 202 Keḷisīlajātaka

The Story about Mocking (2s)

In the present some monks mock Ven. Lakuṇṭaka, a dwarf Arahat they think is a novice. The Buddha tells how in a past life the monk had been a king and had mocked old people and made life difficult for them until Sakka came down to teach him a lesson in impermanence.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Lakuṇṭakabhaddiya = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Conceit, Impermanence, Devas.
“Geese, herons, elephants.” [2.142] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about Lakuṇṭaka the venerable and good.

Now this venerable Lakuṇṭaka, we learn, was well known in the dispensation of the Buddha, a famous man, speaking sweet words, a honeyed preacher, having the analytic knowledges, with his passions perfectly subdued, but in stature the smallest of all the eighty elders, no bigger than a novice, like a dwarf kept for amusement.

One day, he had been to the gate of Jetavana to salute the Tathāgata, when thirty brothers from the country arrived at the gate on their way to salute him too. When they saw the elder, they imagined him to be some novice; they pulled the corner of his robe, they caught his hands, held his head, tweaked his nose, got him by the ears and shook him, and handled him very rudely; then after putting aside their bowl and robe, they visited the Teacher and saluted him. Next they asked him, “Sir, we understand that you have an elder who goes by the name of Lakuṇṭaka the Good, a honeyed preacher. Where is he?” “Do you want to see him?” the Teacher asked. “Yes, sir.” “He is the man you saw by the gate, and twitched his robe and pulled him about with great rudeness before you came here.” “Why, sir,” asked they, “how is it that a man devoted to prayer, full of high aspirations, a true disciple — how is it he is so insignificant?” “Because of his own defilements,” answered the Teacher; and at their request he told them a story.

In the past, when king Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta became Sakka, King of the Devas. Brahmadatta could not endure to look upon anything old or decrepit, whether elephant, horse, ox, or what not. He was full of pranks, and whenever he saw any such, he would chase them away; old carts he had broken up; any old women that he saw he sent for, and beat upon the belly, then stood them up again and gave them a scare; he made old men roll about and play on the ground like tumblers. If he saw none, but only heard that there was a greybeard in such and such a town, he sent for him thence and took his sport with him.

At this the people for very shame sent their parents outside the boundaries of the kingdom. No more did men tend or care for their mother and father. The king’s friends were as wanton as he. As men died, they filled up the four worlds of unhappiness; the company of the gods grew less and less.

Sakka saw that there were no newcomers among the Devaputtas; and he cast about him what was to be done. At last he hit upon a plan. “I will humble him!” thought Sakka; and he took upon him the form of an old man, and placing two jars of buttermilk in a crazy old wagon, he yoked to it a pair of old oxen, and set out upon a feast day. Brahmadatta, mounted upon a richly caparisoned elephant, was making a solemn procession about the city, which was all decorated; and Sakka, clad in rags, and driving this cart, came to meet the king. When the king saw the old cart, he shouted, “Away with that cart, you!” But his people answered, “Where is it, my lord? We cannot see any cart!” (for Sakka by his power let it be seen by no one but the king). And, coming up to the king repeatedly, at last Sakka, still driving his cart, smashed one of the jars upon the king’s head, and made him turn round; then he smashed the other in like manner. And the buttermilk trickled down on either side of his head. Thus was the king plagued and tormented, and made miserable by Sakka’s doings. [2.100]

When Sakka saw his distress, he made the cart disappear, and took his proper shape again. Poised in mid-air, thunderbolt in hand, he upbraided him, “O wicked and unrighteous king! Will you never become old yourself? Will not age assail you? Yet you sport and mock, and do despite to those who are old! It is through you alone, and these doings of yours, that men die on every hand, and fill up the four worlds of unhappiness, and that men cannot care for their parents’ welfare! If you do not cease from this, I will cleave your head with my thunderbolt. Go, and do so no more.”

With this rebuke, he declared the worth of parents, and made known the advantage of reverencing old age; after which discourse he departed to his own place. From that time forward the king never so much as thought of doing anything like what he had done before. [2.144]

This story ended, the Teacher, after Fully Awakening, recited these two couplets:

\[
\text{apāye} = \text{hell, birth as an animal, birth as a peta (ghost), birth among the Asuras (demons or fallen spirits).}
\]
The Section with Two Verses – 783

1. “Geese, herons, elephants, and spotted deer

Though all unlike, alike the lion fear.

2. Even so, a child is great if he be clever;

Fools may be big, but great they can be never.”

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths some of those monks entered on the First Path, some on the Second, and some upon the Fourth, “The excellent Lakuṇṭaka was the king in the story, who made people the butt for his jests and then became a butt himself, while I myself was Sakka.”

Ja 203 Khandhavattajātaka

The Story about the Vow (that Protects) the Constituent Parts (2s)

Alternative Title: Khandajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk dies of a snake bite. The Buddha tells a story about sages of old who learned a protection charm, and were kept safe from snakes and other dangerous animals.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher of a group (gaṇasatthā), the Buddha’s disciples = the seer’s followers (isigaṇa).

Past Compare: Vin Cv 5 (2.109).

Keywords: Danger, Protection, Animals.

“Virūpakka snakes I love.” This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about a certain monk.

---

464 These lines occur in Samyuttanikāya, [SN 21.5].
465 See Cullavagga v. 6 (iii. 75 in Vinaya Texts, Sacred Books of the East), where the verses occur again. The verses partly recur in the ‘Bower MS,’ a Sanskrit MS lately found in the ruins of an ancient city in Kashgaria (see Journal of the Pali Text Society, 1893, p. 64). The kinds of snakes mentioned cannot be identified. Snake charms are extremely common in Sanskrit; there are many in the Atharva Veda [cf. also AN 4:67.]
As he sat, we are told, at the door of his living room, chopping sticks, a snake crept out of a rotten log, and bit his toe; he died on the spot. All the monastery learned how he had come by his sudden death.

In the Dhamma Hall [2.101] they began talking about it; saying how monk So-and-so was sitting at his door, chopping wood, when a snake bit him, and he died immediately of the bite. [2.145] The Teacher came in, and wanted to know what they were discussing as they sat there together. They told him. Said he, “Monks, if our monk had practised loving-kindness towards the four royal races of serpents, that snake would not have bitten him: wise ascetics in by-gone days, before the Buddha was born, by using kindness to these four royal races, were released from the fear that sprang from these serpents.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, during the reign of Brahmadatta king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a young brahmin of Kāsi. When he came of age, he quelled his passions and took upon him the life of an ascetic; he developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments; he built a hermitage by the bend of the Ganges near the foot of the Himañayas, and there he dwelt, surrounded by a band of ascetics, lost in the rapture of meditation.

At that time there were many kinds of snakes upon the Ganges bank, which did mischief to the ascetics, and many of them perished by snake-bite. The ascetics told the matter to the Bodhisatta. He summoned all the ascetics to meet him, and thus addressed them, “If you showed goodwill to the four royal races of snakes, no serpents would bite you. Therefore from this time forward do you show goodwill to the four royal races.” Then he added this verse:

1. “Virūpakkha snakes I love,
   Erāpatha snakes I love,
   Chabbyāputta snakes I love,
   Kaṇhāgotamas I love.”

After thus naming the four royal families of the snakes, he added, “If you can cultivate goodwill towards these, no snake creature will bite you or do you harm.” Then he repeated the second verse: [2.146]
2. “Creatures all beneath the sun,
   Two feet, four feet, more, or none
   How I love you, every one!”

Having declared the nature of the love within him, he uttered another verse by way of prayer:

3. “Creatures all, two feet or four,
   You with none, and you with more,
   Do not hurt me, I implore!” [2.102]

Then again, in general terms, he repeated one verse more:

4. “All you creatures that have birth,
   Breathe, and move upon the earth,
   Happy be you, one and all,
   Never into mischief fall.” [2.147]

Thus did he set forth how one must show love and goodwill to all creatures without distinction; he reminded his hearers of the virtues of the Three Jewels, saying: “Infinite is the Buddha, infinite the Dhamma, and infinite the Saṅgha.” He said: “Remember the quality of the Three Jewels,” and thus having shown them the infinity of the Three Jewels, and wishing to show them that all beings are finite, he added, “Finite and measurable are creeping things, snakes, scorpions, centipedes, spiders, lizards, mice.” Then again, “As the passions and sensual desires in these creatures are the qualities which make them finite and limited, let us be protected night and day against these finite things by the power of the Three Jewels, which are infinite; wherefore remember the worth of the Three Jewels.” Then he recited this verse:

466 All the verses hitherto given match, and are to be taken together as the “first gāthā.” The other is in a different metre, and is the “second gāthā.” [An ingenious idea, which I reject.]
5. “Now I am guarded safe, and fenced around;
Now let all creatures leave me to my ground.
All honour the Fortunate One I pay,
And the seven Buddhas who have passed away.”

And bidding them also remember the seven Buddhas while they did honour, the Bodhisatta composed this guardian charm and delivered it to his band of sages. Thenceforward the sages bore in mind the Bodhisatta’s admonition, and cherished loving-kindness, and remembered the Buddha’s virtues. As they did this, all the snake kind departed from them. And the Bodhisatta cultivated the Divine Abidings, and attained to Brahmā’s Realm.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “The Buddha’s followers were then the followers of the sage; and their Teacher was I myself.”

Ja 204 Vīrakajātaka
The Story about (the Hero Crow) Vīrika (2s)

In the present Devadatta makes himself out a Buddha, but loses all his disciples in a stroke. The Buddha tells a story about a crow who tried to imitate a cormorant, and died when he dived underwater.

The Bodhisatta = (the hero crow) Vīrika,
Devadatta = (the foolish crow) Saviṭṭhaka.

Keywords: Imitation, Vanity, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“O have you seen.”

This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about imitating the Buddha.

When the elders had gone with their followers to visit Devadatta, the Teacher asked Sāriputta what Devadatta had done when he saw them. The reply was that

---

467 For the seven Buddhas, see Wilson, Select Works, ii. 5.
468 Sāriputta and Moggallāna visited the arch-heretic to try if they could win back his followers to the Master. The story of their visit, and how it succeeded, is told in the Vinaya, Cullavagga, vii. 4 foll. (translated in Sacred Books of the East, Vinaya Texts, iii. 256). See also vol. i. no. 11.
he had imitated the Buddha. The Teacher rejoined, “Not only now has Devadatta imitated me and thereby come to ruin; he did just the same before.” Then, at the elder’s request, he told a story of the past. {2.149}

In the past, while Brahmadatta reigned as king in Benares, the Bodhisatta became a cormorant, and dwelt by a certain pool. His name was Vīraka, the Hero.

There arose a famine in Kāsi. Men could not spare food for the crows, nor make offerings to Yakkhas and Nāgas. One by one the crows left the famine-stricken land, and betook them to the woods.

A certain crow named Saviṭṭhaka, who lived at Benares, took with him his lady crow and went to the place where Vīraka lived, making his abode beside the same pool.

One day, this crow was seeking food about the pool. He saw how Vīraka went down into it, and made a meal off some fish; and afterwards came up out of the water again, and stood drying his feathers. “Under the wing of that crow,” he thought, “plenty of fish are to be got. I will become his servant.” So he drew near.

“What is it, sir?” asked Vīraka. “I want to be your servant, my lord!” was the reply.

Vīraka agreed, and from that time the other served him. And from that time, Vīraka used to eat enough fish to keep him alive, and the rest he gave to Saviṭṭhaka as soon as he had caught them; and when Saviṭṭhaka had eaten enough to keep him alive, he gave what was over to his wife.

After a while pride came into his heart. “This crow,” said he, “is black, and so am I: in eyes and beak and feet, too, there is no difference between us. I don’t want his fish; I will catch my own!” So he told Vīraka that for the future he intended to go down to the water and catch fish himself. Then Vīraka said: “Good friend, you do not belong to a [2.104] tribe of such crows as are born to go into water and catch fish. Don’t destroy yourself!”

---

469 [See Ja 143 Virocanajātaka, for more details about these events.]
But in spite of this attempt to dissuade him, Saviṭṭhaka did not take the warning to heart. Down he went to the pool, down into the water; but he could not make his way through the weeds and come out again – there he was, entangled in the weeds, with only the tip of his beak appearing above the water. So not being able to breathe he perished there beneath the water. {2.150}

His mate noticed that he did not return, and went to Vīraka to ask news of him. “My lord,” she asked, “Saviṭṭhaka is not to be seen, where is he?” And as she asked him this, she repeated the first verse:

1. “O have you seen Saviṭṭhaka, O Vīraka, have you seen
   My sweet-voiced mate whose neck is like the peacock in its sheen?”

When Vīraka heard it, he replied, “Yes, I know where he is gone,” and recited the second verse:

2. “He was not born to dive beneath the wave,
   But what he could not do he needs must try;
   So the poor bird has found a watery grave,
   Entangled in the weeds, and left to die.”

When the lady-crow heard it, weeping, she returned to Benares.

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was then incarnate as Saviṭṭhaka, and I myself was Vīraka.”

Ja 205 Gaṅgeyyajātaka

The Story about the Ganges (Fish) (2s)

In the present two young monks are unsure which one of them is the most handsome, so they ask an old monk, who declares he is more handsome than they are. The Buddha tells a story of two fish who similarly asked a turtle to decide which of them was more handsome, only for him to declare that he was the most handsome of all!

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the old man = the turtle (kacchapa), two young monks = the two fish (dve macchā).

---

470 [Additional note from Vol. IV:] For the first verse compare Dhp p. 146.
Keywords: Vanity, Devas, Animals, Fish.

“Fine are the fish.” [2.151] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about two young monks.

These two young fellows, we are told, belonged to a good family of Sāvatthi, and had embraced the dispensation. But they, not realising the impurity of the body, sang the praises of their beauty, and went about bragging of it. [2.105]

One day they fell into a dispute on this point, “You’re handsome, but so am I,” said each of them; then, spying an aged elder sitting not far away, they agreed that he was likely to know whether they were handsome or not. Then they approached him with the question, “Sir, which of us is handsome?” The elder replied, “Friends, I am more handsome than either of you.” At this the young men reviled him, and went off, grumbling that he told them something they did not ask, but would not tell them what they did.

The Saṅgha became aware of this event; and one day, when they were all together in the Dhamma Hall, they began talking about it. “Friend, how the old elder shamed those two young fellows whose heads were full of their own beauty!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking of now as they sat together. They told him. He rejoined: “This, is not the only time, monks, that our friends were full of the praises of their own beauty. In olden times they used to go about boasting of it as they do now.” And then he told them a story.

In the past, during the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Tree Devatā on the bank of the Ganges. At the point where Ganges and Jumna meet, two fish met together, one from the Ganges and one from the Jumna. “I am beautiful!” said one, “and so are you!” and then they fell to quarrelling about their beauty. Not far from the Ganges they saw a turtle lying on the bank. “That fellow shall decide whether or no we are beautiful!” said they; and they went up to him. “Which of us is beautiful, friend turtle,” they asked, “the Ganges fish or the Jumna fish? “The turtle answered, “The Ganges fish is beautiful, and 471 Reading an-anuyuñjitvā.

---

the Jumna fish is beautiful: but I am more beautiful than you both.” And to explain it, he uttered the first verse: {2.152}

1. “Fine are the fish of Jumna stream, the Ganges fish are fine,
   But a four-footed creature, with a tapering neck like mine,
   Round like a spreading banyan tree, must all of them outshine.”

When the fish heard this, they cried, “Ah, you rascally turtle! You won’t answer our question, but you answer another one!” and they repeated the second verse:

2. “We ask him this, he answers that: indeed a strange reply!
   By his own tongue his praise is sung: I like it not, not I!”

When this discourse was concluded, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days the young monks were the two fish, the old man was the turtle, and I was the Tree Devatā who saw the whole thing from the Ganges bank.”

Ja 206 Kuruṅgamigajātaka

The Story about the Antelope (2s)

In the present Devadatta is going around trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story of how he had done a similar thing in the past – when the Bodhisatta was an antelope, and Devadatta a hunter – and how he had been thwarted by his friends, the woodpecker and the turtle.

The Bodhisatta = the antelope (kuruṅgamiga),
Moggallāna = the turtle (kacchapa),
Sāriputta = the woodpecker (satapatta),
Devadatta = the hunter (luddaka).

Keywords: Friends, Cooperation, Animals, Birds.

“Come, turtle.” [2.106] This story the Teacher told at Veḷuvana, about Devadatta. News came to the Teacher that Devadatta was plotting his death. “Ah, monks,” said he, “it was just the same long ago; Devadatta tried then to kill me, as he is trying now.” And he told them this story. {2.153}

Figured on the Bharhut Stūpa (Cunningham, p. 67, and pl. xxvii. 9).
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became an Antelope, and lived within a forest, in a thicket near a certain lake. Not far from the same lake, sat a woodpecker perched at the top of a tree; and in the lake dwelt a turtle. And the three became friends, and lived together in amity.

A hunter, wandering about in the wood, observed the Bodhisatta’s footprint at the going down into the water; and he set a trap of leather, strong, like an iron chain, and went his way. In the first watch of the night the Bodhisatta went down to drink, and got caught in the noose: whereat he cried the cry of capture. Thereupon the woodpecker flew down from her tree-top, and the turtle came out of the water, and consulted what was to be done.

Said the woodpecker to the turtle, “Friend, you have teeth – bite this snare through; I will go and see to it that the hunter keeps away; and if we both do our best, our friend will not lose his life.” To make this clear he uttered the first verse:

1. “Come, turtle, tear the leather snare, and bite it through and through, And of the hunter I’ll take care, and keep him off from you.”

The turtle began to gnaw the leather thong; the woodpecker made his way to the hunter’s dwelling. At dawn of day the hunter went out, knife in hand. As soon as the bird saw him start, he uttered a cry, flapped his wings, and struck him in the face as he left the front door. “Some bird of ill omen has struck me!” thought the hunter; he turned back, and lay down for a little while. Then he rose up again, and took his knife. The bird reasoned within himself, “The first time he went out by the front door, so now he will leave by the back!” and he sat down behind the house. {2.154} The hunter, too, reasoned in the same way, “When I went out by the front door, I saw a bad omen, now will I [2.107] go out by the back door!” and so he did. But the bird cried out again, and struck him in the face. Finding that he was again struck by a bird of ill omen, the hunter exclaimed, “This creature will not let me go!” and turning back he lay down until sunrise, and when the sun was risen, he took his knife and started.

The woodpecker made all haste back to his friends, “Here comes the hunter!” he cried. By this time the turtle had gnawed through all the thongs but one tough thong: his teeth seemed as though they would fall out, and his mouth was all smeared with blood. The Bodhisatta saw the young hunter coming on like lightning, knife in hand: he burst the thong, and fled into the woods. The woodpecker perched upon his tree-top. But the turtle was so weak, that he lay where he was. The hunter threw him into a bag, and tied it to a tree.

The Bodhisatta observed that the turtle was taken, and determined to save his friend’s life. So he let the hunter see him, and made as though he were weak. The hunter saw him, and thinking him to be weak, seized his knife and set out in pursuit. The Bodhisatta, keeping just out of his reach, led him into the forest; and when he saw that they had come far away, gave him the slip and returned swift as the wind by another way. He lifted the bag with his horns, threw it upon the ground, ripped it open and let the turtle out. And the woodpecker came down from the tree.

Then the Bodhisatta thus addressed them both, “My life has been saved by you, and you have done a friend’s part to me. Now the hunter will come and take you; so do you, friend woodpecker, migrate elsewhere with your brood, and you, friend turtle, dive into the water.” They did so.

The Teacher, after Fully Awakening, uttered the second verse: {2.155}

2. “The turtle went into the pond, the deer into the wood,
And from the tree the woodpecker carried away his brood.”

The hunter returned, and saw none of them. He found his bag torn; picked it up, and went home sorrowful. And the three friends lived all their life long in unbroken amity, and then passed away to fare according to their deeds.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was the huntsman, Sāriputta the woodpecker, Moggallāna the turtle, and I was the Antelope.”

Ja 207 Assakajātaka
The Story about (King) Assaka (2s)

In the present one monk is growing dissatisfied owing to his attachment to his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of how the monk was once a king who grieved when his queen passed away. The Bodhisatta cured him of his grief when he showed him she was now reborn as a dung-beetle, and cared not for him any more.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Sāriputta = the young brahmin (māṇava),
the dissatisfied monk = king Assaka (Assakarājā), his former wife = (queen) Uparī.

Keywords: Attachment, Grief, Animals.

“Once with the great king Assaka.” [2.108] This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about someone who was distracted by the recollection of a former wife. He asked the monk whether he were really lovesick. The man said, Yes. “Whom are you in love with?” the Teacher continued. “My late wife,” was the reply. Then the Teacher said: “Not this once only, monk, have you been full of desire for this woman; in olden days her love brought you to great misery.” And he told a story.

In the past, there was a king Assaka reigning in Potali, which is a city of the kingdom of Kāsi. His queen consort, named Ubbarī, was very dear to him; she was charming, and graceful, and beautiful, passing the beauty of women, though not so fair as a goddess. She died, and at her death the king was plunged in grief, and became sad and miserable. He had her body laid in a coffin, and embalmed with oil and ointment, and laid beneath the bed; and there he lay without food, weeping and wailing. [2.156] In vain did his parents and kinsfolk, friends and courtiers, monks and laymen, bid him not to grieve, since all things pass away; they could not move him. As he lay in sorrow, seven days passed by.

Now the Bodhisatta was at that time an ascetic, who had gained the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments; he dwelt at the foot of the Himālayas. He was possessed of the divine eye, and as he looked round Jambudīpa with his heavenly vision, he saw this king lamenting, and straightaway resolved to help him. By his Supernormal Powers he rose in the air, and alighted in the king’s park, and sat down on the ceremonial stone, like a golden image.

A young brahmin of the city of Potali entered the park, and seeing the Bodhisatta, he greeted him and sat down. The Bodhisatta began to talk pleasantly with him. “Is the king a just ruler?” he asked.

“Yes, sir, the king is just.” replied the youth, “but his queen is just dead; he has laid her body in a coffin, and lies down lamenting her; and today is the seventh day since he began. Why do you not free the king from this great grief? Virtuous beings like you ought to overcome the king’s sorrow.”
“I do not know the king, young man,” said the Bodhisatta, “but if he were to come and ask me, I would tell him the place where she has now come into the flesh again, and make her speak herself.”

“Then, venerable sir, stay here until I bring the king to you,” said the youth. The Bodhisatta agreed, and he hastened into the king’s presence, and told him about it. “You should visit this being with the divine eye!” he told the king.

The king was overjoyed, at the thought of seeing Ubbarī; and he entered his chariot and drove to the place. Greeting the Bodhisatta, he sat down on one side, and asked, “Is it true, as I am told, that you know where my queen has come into being again?”

“Yes, I do, my lord king,” replied he. Then the king asked where it was.

The Bodhisatta replied, “O king, she was intoxicated with her beauty, and so fell into negligence and did not do fair and virtuous acts; so now she has become a little dung-worm in this very park.”

“I don’t believe it!” said the king. “Then I will show her to you, and make her speak,” answered the Bodhisatta. “Please make her speak!” said the king.

The Bodhisatta commanded, “Let the two that are busy rolling a lump of cow-dung, come forth before the king!” and by his power he made them do it, and they came. The Bodhisatta pointed one out to the king, “There is your queen Ubbarī, O king! She has just come out of this lump, following her husband the dung-worm. Look and see.”

“What! My queen Ubbarī a dung-worm? I don’t believe it!” cried the king. “I will make her speak, O king!” “Pray make her speak, venerable sir!” said he.

The Bodhisatta by his power gave her speech. “Ubbarī!” said he. “What is it, venerable sir?” she asked, in a human voice. “What was your name in your former character?” the Bodhisatta asked her. “My name was Ubbarī, sir,” she replied, “the consort of king Assaka.”

“Tell me,” the Bodhisatta went on, “which do you love best now – king Assaka, or this dung-worm?”
“O sir, that was my former birth,” said she. “Then I lived with him in this park, enjoying shape and sound, scent, savour and touch; but now that my memory is confused by rebirth, what is he? Why, now I would kill king Assaka, and would smear the feet of my husband the dung-worm with the blood flowing from his throat!” and in the midst of the king’s company, she uttered these verses in a human voice:

1. “Once with the great king Assaka, who was my husband dear,
   Beloving and beloved, I walked about this garden here.

2. But now new sorrows and new joys have made the old ones flee,
   And dearer far than Assaka my worm is now to me.” [2.110] {2.158}

When king Assaka heard this, he repented on the spot; and at once he caused the queen’s body to be removed and washed his head. He saluted the Bodhisatta, and went back into the city; where he married another queen, and ruled in righteousness. And the Bodhisatta, having instructed the king, and set him free from grief, returned again to the Himālayas.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the lovesick monk reached the Fruit of the First Path, “Your late wife was Ubbarī; you, the lovesick monk, were king Assaka; Sāriputta was the young brahmin; and the ascetic was I myself.”

Ja 208 Suṁsumārajātaka

The Story about the (Murderous) Crocodile (2s)

Alternative Title: Susumārajātaka (Cst)

---

473 cf. Markaṭajātaka, Mahāvastu ii. 208; Cariyāpiṭaka, iii. 7; Morris, Contemporary Review vol. 39, quoting Griffis, Japanese Fairy World, p. 153. A monkey outwits a crocodile in Ja 57, above. The following variant, from Russia (Moscow district) may be of interest. It was given me by Mr I. Nestor Schnurmann, who heard it from his nurse (about 1860). Once upon a time, the king of the Fishes was wanting in wisdom. His advisers told him that once he could get the heart of the fox, he would become wise. So he sent a deputation, consisting of the great magnates of the sea, whales and others. “Our king wants your advice on some state affairs.” The fox, flattered,
In the present Devadatta is going around trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story of how a crocodile had desired to eat the heart of a monkey, but the monkey tricked him into believing he had left his heart on a tree, and escaped.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the monkeys (kapirājā), Ciñcamāṇavikā = the (female) crocodile (suṁsumārī),
Devadatta = the (male) crocodile (suṁsumāra).

Past Compare: Ja 57 Vānarinda, Ja 208 Suṁsumāra, Ja 224 Kumbhīla, Ja 342 Vānara, Cp 27 Kapiṛājacariyā, Mvu iii p 40 Vānara (II).

Keywords: Desire, Trickery, Animals.

“Jambu plum, jack fruit.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about Devadatta's attempts to murder him. When he heard of these attempts, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time that Devadatta has tried to murder me; he did the same before, and yet could not so much as make me afraid.” Then he told this story.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life at the foot of the Himālayas as a monk. He grew strong and sturdy, big of frame, well-to-do, and lived by a curve of the river Ganges in a forest haunt.

Now at that time there was a crocodile dwelling in the Ganges. The crocodile’s mate saw the great frame of the monkey, and she conceived a longing for his heart to eat. So she said to her lord, “Sir, I desire to eat the heart of that great king of the monkeys!”

---

A whale took him on his back. On the way the waves beat upon him; at last he asked what they really wanted. They said, what their king really wanted was to eat his heart, by which he hoped to become clever. He said, “Why didn’t you tell me that before? I would gladly sacrifice my life for such a worthy object. But we foxes always leave our hearts at home. Take me back and I’ll fetch it. Otherwise I’m sure your king will be angry.” So they took him back. As soon as he got near the shore, he leaped on land, and cried “Ah you fools! Have you ever heard of an animal not carrying his heart with him?” and ran off. The fish had to return empty.

474 These attempts of Devadatta, and how they were foiled, are set forth in Cullavagga, vii. iii. 6 foll., translation in Sacred Books of the East, Vinaya Texts, iii. 243 f.
“Good wife,” said the crocodile, “I live in the water and he lives on dry land: how can we catch him?”

“By hook or by crook,” she replied, “caught he must be. If I don’t get him, I shall die.”

“All right,” answered the crocodile, consoling her, “don’t trouble yourself. I have a plan; I will give you his heart to eat.”

So when the Bodhisatta was sitting on the bank of the Ganges, after taking a drink of water, the crocodile drew near, and said: “Sir monkey, why do you live on bad fruits in this old familiar place? On the other side of the Ganges there is no end to the mango trees, and labuja trees, with fruit sweet as honey! Is it not better to cross over and have all kinds of wild fruit to eat?”

“Lord crocodile,” the monkey made answer, “deep and wide is the Ganges: how shall I get across?”

“If you will go, I will mount you on my back, and carry you over.”

The monkey trusted him, and agreed. “Come here, then,” said the other, “up on my back with you!” Up the monkey climbed. But when the crocodile had swum a little way, he plunged the monkey under the water.

“Good friend, you are letting me sink!” cried the monkey. “What is that for?”

Said the crocodile, “You think I’m carrying you out of pure good nature? Not a bit of it! My wife has a longing for your heart, and I want to give it her to eat!”

“Friend,” said the monkey, “it is nice of you to tell me. Why, if our heart were inside us when we go jumping among the tree-tops, it would be all knocked to pieces!” “Well, where do you keep it?” asked the other.

The Bodhisatta pointed out a fig tree, with clusters of ripe fruit, standing not far off. “See,” said he, “there are our hearts hanging on that fig tree.”

---

473 Artocarpus Lacucha (Childers).
“If you will show me your heart,” said the crocodile, “then I won’t kill you.” “Take me to the tree, then, and I will point it out to you hanging upon it.”

The crocodile brought him to the place. The monkey leapt off his back, and climbing up the fig tree sat upon it. “O silly crocodile!” said he, “you thought that there were creatures that kept their hearts in a tree-top! You are a fool, and I have outwitted you! You may keep your fruit to yourself. Your body is great, but you have no intelligence.” And then to explain this idea he uttered the following verses:

1. “Jambu plum, jack-fruit, mangoes too across the water there I see; Enough of them, I want them not; my fig is good enough for me!
2. Great is your body, verily, but how much smaller is your wit! Now go your ways, sir crocodile, for I have had the best of it.”

The crocodile, feeling as sad and miserable as if he had lost a thousand pieces of money, went back sorrowing to the place where he lived.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “In those days Devadatta was the crocodile, the lady Ciñcā was his mate, and I was the monkey.”

Ja 209 Kakkarajātaka

The Story about the Chicken (2s)

Alternative Title: Kukkuṭajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is very clever at taking care of himself. When the Buddha hears of it, he tells about a previous life in which the monk had been a bird who took good care to avoid being caught by a hunter.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā), the young monk = the chicken (kukkuṭa), Devadatta = the hunter (luddaka).

476 Compare the latter part of the Second Śakuntakajātaka, Mahāvastu ii. 250; the first line of the first verse and the whole of the second are nearly the same.
Past Compare: Mvu ii p 317 Šakuntaka (II).

Keywords: Taking care, Evasion, Devas, Animals, Birds.

“Many a tree have I seen.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about a monk who was one of the fellow-students of elder Sāriputta, Captain of the Dhamma.

This fellow, as we learn, was clever at taking care of his person. Food very hot or very cold he would not eat, for fear it should do him harm. He never went out for fear of being hurt by cold or heat; and he would not have rice which was either over-boiled or too hard.

The Saṅgha learned how much care he took of himself. In the Dhamma Hall, they all discussed it. “Friend, what a clever fellow monk So-and-so is in knowing what is good for him!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking of as they sat there together. They told him. Then he rejoined, “Not only now is our young friend careful for his personal comfort. He was just the same in olden days.” And he told them a story.

In the past, in the reign of Brahmadatta, king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a Tree Devatā in a forest glade. A certain fowler, with a decoy bird, hair noose, and stick, went into the forest in search of birds. He began to follow one old bird which flew off into the woods, trying to escape. The bird would not give him a chance of catching it in his snare, but kept rising and alighting, rising and alighting. So the fowler covered himself with twigs and branches, and set his noose and stick again and again. But the bird, wishing to make him ashamed of himself, sent forth a human voice and repeated the first verse:

1. “Many a tree have I seen
Growing in the woodland green:
But, O tree, they could not do
Any such strange things as you!”

So saying, the bird flew off and went elsewhere. When it had gone, the fowler repeated the second verse: (2.162)
2. “This old bird, that knows the snare,
Off has flown into the air;
Forth from out his cage has broken,
And with human voice has spoken!”

So said the fowler; and having hunted through the woods, took what he could catch and went home again.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was the fowler then, the young dandy was the bird, and the Tree Devatā that saw the whole thing was I myself.”

Ja 210 Kandagalakajātaka

The Story about (the Woodpecker) Kandagalaka (2s)

In the present Devadatta is going around trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story about how a woodpecker had helped another bird in finding food, but the latter desiring to dig out the food himself had broken his beak on an acacia wood tree.

The Bodhisatta = (the woodpecker) Khadiravaniya, Devadatta = (the woodpecker) Kandagalaka.

Keywords: Vanity, Imitation, Animals, Birds.

“O friend.” This was told by the Teacher, during a stay in Veļuvana, about Devadatta’s attempts to imitate him. When he heard of these attempts to imitate him, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time Devadatta has destroyed himself by imitating me; the same thing happened before.” Then he told this story. [2.114]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta entered into life as a woodpecker. In a wood of acacia trees he lived, and his name was Khadiravaniya, the bird of the acacia wood. He had a comrade named Kandagalaka, who got his food in a wood full of good fruit.

One day the friend went to visit Khadiravaniya. “My friend is come!” thought Khadiravaniya; and he led him into the acacia wood, and pecked at the tree-

---

477 See above, note to Ja 208. [See Ja 143 Virocanajātaka, for more details about these events.]
trunks until the insects came out, which he gave to his friend. As each was given him, the friend pecked it up, and ate it, as if it were a honey cake. As he ate, pride arose in his heart. [2.163] “This bird is a woodpecker,” he thought, “and so am I.
What need for me to be fed by him? I will get nay own food in this acacia wood!”
So he said to Khadiravaniya,

“Friend, don’t trouble yourself – I will get my own food in the acacia wood.” Then said the other, “You belong to a tribe of birds which finds its food in a forest of pithless silk-cotton trees, and trees that bear abundant fruit; but the acacia is full of pith, and hard. Please do not do so!”

“What!” said Kandagalaka – am I not a woodpecker?” And he would not listen, but pecked at an acacia trunk. In a moment his beak snapped off, and his eyes bade fair to fall out of his head, and his head split. So not being able to hold fast to the tree, he fell to the ground, repeating the first verse:

1. “O friend, what is this thorny, cool-leaved tree
   Which at one blow has broke my beak for me?”

Having heard this, Khadiravaniya recited the second verse:

2. “This bird was good for rotten wood
   And soft; but once he tried,
   By some ill hap, hard trees to tap;
   And broke his skull, and died.” [2.164]

So said Khadiravaniya; and added, “O Kandagalaka, the tree where you broke your head is hard and strong!” But the other perished then and there.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was Kandagalaka, but Khadiravaniya was I myself.”
Ja 211 Somadatta-jātaka

The Story about (the Clever Son) Somadatta (2s)

In the present one monk can hardly speak in front of two or three others because he is so nervous. The Buddha tells a story about a brahmin in the past who learned a verse for one whole year, but was so nervous he reversed the sense when he recited it to the king.

The Bodhisatta = (the clever son) Somadatta, Lāḷudāyī = his father (Somadattassa pitā).

Past Compare: Dhp-a XI.7 Lāḷudāyitthera.

Keywords: Poor memory, Nerves.

“All the year long never ceasing.” [2.115] This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about elder Lāḷudāyī, or Udāyī the Simpleton.

This man, we learn, was unable to get out a single sound in the presence of two or three people. He was so very nervous, that he said one thing when he meant another.

It happened that the monks were speaking of this as they sat together in the Dhamma Hall. [2.165] The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking of as they sat there together. They told him. He answered, “Monks, this is not the first time that Lāḷudāyī has been a very nervous man. It was just the same before.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a certain brahmin family in the kingdom of Kāsi. When he came of age, he went to study at Taxila. On returning he found his family poor; and he bade his parents farewell and set out to Benares, saying to himself, “I will set up my fallen family again!”

At Benares he became the king’s attendant; and he grew very dear to the king and became a favourite.

Fausböll, Five Jātkas, p. 31; Comm. on Dhp verse 152 (p. 317 of F.’s edition).

[He also figures in Ja 123 Naṅgalīsajātaka.]
Now his father lived by ploughing the land, but he had only one pair of oxen; and one of them died. He came before the Bodhisatta, and said to him, “Son, one of my oxen is dead, and the ploughing does not go on. Ask the king to give you one ox!”

“No, Father,” answered he, “I have but just now seen the king; I ought not to ask him for oxen now: you ask him.”

“My son,” said his father, “you do not know how bashful I am. If there are two or three people present I cannot get a word out. If I go to ask the king for an ox, I shall end by giving him this one!”

“Father,” said the Bodhisatta, “what must be, must be. I cannot ask the king; but I will train you to do it.” So he led his father to a cemetery where there were clumps of sweet grass; and tying up tufts of it, he scattered them here and there, and named them one by one, pointing them out to his father, “That is the king, that is the viceroy, this is the chief captain. Now, Father, when you come before the king, you must first say – ‘Long live the king!’ and then repeat this verse, to ask for an ox,” and this is the verse he taught him:

“I had two oxen to my plough, with which my work was done,
But one is dead! O mighty prince, please give me another one!” [2.116] [2.166]

For the space of a whole year the man learned this couplet; and then he said to his son, “Dear Somadatta, I have learned the lines! Now I can say it before any man! Take me to the king.”

So the Bodhisatta, taking a suitable present, led his father into the king’s presence. “Long live the king!” cried the brahmin, offering his present.

“Who is this brahmin, Somadatta?” the king asked.

“Great king, it is my father,” he answered.

“Why has he come here?” asked the king. Then the brahmin repeated his couplet, to ask for the ox:
“I had two oxen to my plough, with which my work was done,
But one is dead! O mighty prince, please take the other one!”

The king saw that there was some mistake. “Somadatta,” said he, smiling, “you have plenty of oxen at home, I suppose?”

“If so, great king, they are your gift!”

At this answer the king was pleased. He gave the man, for a brahmin’s offering, sixteen oxen, with fine caparison, and a village to live in, and sent him away with great honour. The brahmin ascended a carriage drawn by Sindh horses, pure white, and went to his dwelling in great pomp.

As the Bodhisatta sat beside his father in the chariot, said he, “Father, I taught you the whole year long, and yet when the moment came you gave your ox to the king!” and he uttered the first verse:

1. “All the year long never ceasing with unwearied diligence
   Where the sweet grass grows in clusters day by day he practised it:
   When he came amid the courtiers all at once he changed the sense;
   Practice truly nought avails if a man has but little wit.”  [2.167]

When he heard this, the brahmin uttered the second verse:

2. “He that asks, dear Somadatta, takes his chance between the two
   May get more, or may get nothing: when you ask, ’tis ever so.”

When the Teacher by this story had shown how Simpleton Udāyī had been just as bashful before as he was then, he identified the Jātaka, “Lāḷudāyī was the father of Somadatta, and I was Somadatta myself.”

Ja 212 Ucchiṭṭhabhattajātaka
The Story about the Left-Over Rice (2s)

In the present one monk longs for his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of the two of them in a former life, and how she served him up the leftover rice of her lover, and was not worthy of being attached to.

The Bodhisatta = the acrobat (naṭaputta), the dissatisfied monk = the brahmin (brāhmaṇa),
his former wife = the brahmini (brāhmaṇī).
In the past, while Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as one of a family of poor acrobats, that lived by begging. So when he grew up, he was needy and squalid, and by begging he lived.

There was at the time, in a certain village of Kāsi, a brahmin whose wife was bad and wicked, and did wrong. [2.168] And it befell that the husband went abroad one day upon some matter, and her lover watching his time went to visit the house. After she had received him, he said: “I will eat a bit before I go.” So she made ready the food, and served up rice hot with sauce and curry, and gave it him, bidding him eat; she herself stood at the door, watching for the brahmin’s coming. And while the lover was eating, the Bodhisatta stood waiting for a morsel.

At that moment the brahmin set his face for home. And his wife saw him drawing nigh, and ran in quickly, “Up, my man is coming!” and she made her lover go down into the store-room. The husband came in; she gave him a seat, and water for washing the hands; and upon the cold rice that was left by the other she turned out some hot rice, and set it before him. He put his hand into the rice, and felt that it was hot above and cold below. “This must be someone else’s leavings,” thought he; and so he asked the woman about it in the words of the first verse:

1. “Hot at top, and cold at bottom, not alike it seems to be:
I would ask you for the reason: come, my lady, answer me!”

Again and again he asked, but she, fearing lest her deed should be discovered, held her peace. Then a thought came into our gymnast’s mind. “The man down in the store-room must be a lover, and this is the master of the house; the wife says nothing, for fear that her deed be made manifest. So ho! I will declare the whole matter, and show the brahmin that a man is hidden in his larder!” [2.169] And he told him the whole [2.118] matter; how that when he had gone out from his house, another had come in, and had done wrong; how he had eaten the first rice, and the wife had stood by the door to watch the road; and how the other man had been hidden in the store-room. And in so saying, he repeated the second verse:

2. “I am a gymnast, sir: I came on begging here intent;
    He that you seek is hiding in the store-room, where he went!”

By his top-knot he haled the man out of the store-room, and bade him take care not to do the like again; and then he went away. The brahmin rebuked and beat them both, and gave them such a lesson that they were not likely to do the same again. Afterwards he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended his discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the lovesick monk reached the Fruit of the First Path, “Your late wife was then the brahmin’s lady; you, the lovesick monk, were the brahmin himself; and I was the gymnast.”

Ja 213 Bharujātaka

The Story about (the King of) Bharu (2s)

In the present the heterodox sects are losing out because of the popularity of the Buddha and the Saṅgha, and decide to bribe the king so they can build a monastery alongside the Jetavana. The Buddha tells the king a story of how two groups of ascetics were turned against each other and tried bribing the king for his favour, before realising their mistake and leaving for more remote dwellings.

The Bodhisatta = the elder seer (jeṭṭhaka-isī).

Keywords: Heretics, Jealousy.

“The king of Bharu.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about the king of Kosala.

Now we read that magnificent presents were made to the Fortunate One and his company, and they were held in great respect, as it is written: ‘At that time the Fortunate One was honoured and revered, respected, reverenced, highly esteemed, and received rich presents – robes, food, lodgement, drugs and medicines, and provisions; and the Saṅgha was honoured, etc. (as before); but the pilgrims of heterodox schools were not honoured, etc. (as before).” Well, the sectaries, finding that honour and gifts diminished, convened a secret meeting for deliberation. “Since the appearance of the ascetic Gotama,” they said, “honour and gifts come no more to us, but he has got the best of both. What can be the reason of his good fortune?” Then one of them spoke as follows. “Ascetic Gotama has the best and chief place in all Jambudīpa to live in, and that is the reason of his success.” Then the others said: “If this is the reason, we will make a rival settlement above Jetavana, and then we shall receive presents.” This was the conclusion they came to.

“But,” thought they, “if we make our settlement unknown to the king, the monks will prevent us. If he accepts a present, he will not be disinclined to break up their settlement. So we had best bribe him to give us a place for ours.”

So by the intervention of his courtiers, they offered a hundred thousand pieces to the king, with this message, “Great king, we want to make a rival settlement in Jetavana. If the monks tell you they won’t permit it, please do not give them any answer.” To this the king agreed, because he wanted the bribe.

After thus conciliating the king, the schismatics got an architect and put the work in hand. There was a good deal of noise about it.

“What is all this great noise and tumult, Ānanda?” the Teacher asked. “The noise,” said he, “is some sectaries who are having a new settlement built.” “That is not a fit place,” he rejoined, “for them to settle. These sectaries are fond of noise; there’s no living with them.” Then he called the Saṅgha together, and bade them go inform the king, and have the building put a stop to.

The monks went and stood by the palace door. The king, as soon as he heard of their coming, knew they must be come about stopping the new settlement. But he had been bribed, and so he ordered his attendants to say the king was not at home. The monks went back and told the Teacher. The Teacher guessed that a bribe had been given, and sent his two chief disciples. But the king, as soon as he heard of 480 This appears to be a regular formula; the Sanskrit equivalent occurs in Divyāvadāna, p. 91.

481 Sāriputta and Moggallāna.
their coming, gave the same order as before; and they too returned and told the Teacher. The Teacher said: “Doubtless the king is not able to stay at home today; he must be out.”

Next forenoon, he dressed himself, took his bowl and robe, and with five hundred monks walked to the door of the palace. The king heard them come; he descended from the upper story, and took from the Buddha his alms-bowl. Then he gave rice and gruel to him and his followers, and with a salutation sat down on one side.

The Teacher began an exposition for the king’s benefit, in these words. “Great king, other kings in by-gone days have taken bribes, and then by making virtuous people quarrel together have been dispossessed of their kingdom, and been utterly destroyed.” And then, at his request, the Teacher told a story of the past. {2.171}

In the past, king Bharu was reigning over the kingdom of Bharu. At the same time the Bodhisatta was teacher of a group of monks. He was an ascetic who had acquired the five Super Knowledges and eight Attainments; and he dwelt a long time in the region of the Himālayas.

He came down from the Himālayas to buy salt and seasoning, followed by five hundred ascetics; and they came by stages to the city of Bharu. He went begging through the city; and then coming forth from it, he sat down by the northern gate, at the root of a banyan tree all covered with twigs and branches. There he made a meal, and there he took up his abode.

Now when that band of ascetics had dwelt there for the space of half a moon, there came another teacher with another five hundred, who went seeking alms about the city, and then came out and sat beneath just such another banyan tree by the south gate, and ate, and dwelt there. And the two bands abode there so long as they would, and then returned again to the Himālayas.

When they had gone, the tree by the south gate withered away. Next time, they who had dwelt under it came first, and perceiving that their tree was withered, they first went on their rounds throughout the city, seeking alms, and then passing out by the northern gate, they ate and lived under the banyan tree that was by that gate. And the other band, coming afterwards, went their rounds in the city, and then made ready their meal and would have dwelt by their own tree. “This is not your tree, ’tis ours!” they cried; and they began to quarrel about the tree. The quarrel waxed great; these said: “Take not the place where we dwelt previously!” and those, “This time we came first; do not you take it!” So crying aloud each that they were the owners of it, they all went to the king’s palace.

The king ordered that they who had first dwelt there should hold it. Then the others thought: “We will not allow ourselves to say that we have been beaten by these!” They looked about them with divine vision, and observing the body of a chariot fit for an emperor to use, they took it and offered it as a gift to the king, begging him to give them too possession of the tree. He took their gift, and ordained that both should dwell under the tree; and so they were there all masters together. Then the other ascetics fetched the jewelled wheels of the same chariot, and offered them to the king, praying him, “O mighty king, make us to possess the tree alone!” And the king did so.

Then the ascetics repented, and said: “To think that we, who have overcome the love of riches and the lust of the flesh, and have renounced the world, should fall to quarrelling by reason of a tree, and offer bribes for it! This is no seemly thing.” And they went away in all haste till they came to the Himālayas. And all the spirits that dwelt in the realm of Bharu with one mind were angry with the king, and they brought up the sea, and for the space of three hundred leagues they made the kingdom of Bharu as though it were not. And so for the sake of the king of Bharu alone, all the inhabitants of the kingdom perished thus.

When the Teacher had ended this tale, after Fully Awakening, he uttered the following verses:

1. “The king of Bharu, as old stories say,
   Made holy ascetics quarrel on a day:
   For which wrong it happened that he fell dead,
   And with him all his kingdom perished. [2.121]”

482 One of the Abhiñās or Spiritual Knowledges; see above.
2. Wherefore the wise do not approve at all
When that desire into the heart does fall.
He that is free from guile, whose heart is pure,
All that he says is ever true and sure.\[483\] [2.173]

When the Teacher had ended this story, he added, “Great king, one should not be under the power of desire. Two ascetics ought not to quarrel together.” Then he identified the Jātaka, “In those days, I was the leader of the sages.” When the king had entertained the Tathāgata, and he had departed, the king sent some men and had the rival settlement destroyed, and the sectaries became homeless.

Ja 214 Puṇṇanadījātaka
The Story about the Full River (2s)

In the present the monks are talking about the Buddha’s wisdom. The Buddha explains that even in past lives he had been wise and resourceful and tells how he interpreted a verse and a present of a cooked crow from a king, and so won favour with him again.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Keywords: Wisdom, Resourcefulness.

“That which can drink.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about the Perfection of Wisdom.

On one occasion, the monks were gathered in the Dhamma Hall, talking of the Tathāgata’s wisdom. “Friend, the Supreme Buddha’s wisdom is great, and wide, cutting, and quick, sharp, penetrating, and full of resource.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they talked about as they sat there together. They told him. “Not only is the Tathāgata wise this one time, but he was wise before, and had skill in means.” And then he told them a story.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as the son of the court family priest. When he grew up, he studied at Taxila;

\[483\] In commenting upon this line, the Commentator says: “And those who at that time spoke the truth, blaming king Bharu for taking a bribe, found standing room upon a thousand islands which are yet to be seen today about the island of Nālijkera.”
and at his father's death he received the office of family priest, and he was the king's counsellor in things human and divine.

Afterwards the king opened his ear to those who provoke quarrels, and in anger bade the Bodhisatta dwell before his face no more, and sent him away from Benares. So he took his wife and family with him, and lived in a certain village of Kāsi. Afterward the king remembered his goodness, and said to himself: [2.122]

“It is not meet that I should send a messenger to fetch my teacher. I will compose a verse of poetry, [2.174] and write it upon a leaf; I will cause crow's flesh to be cooked; and after I have tied up letter and meat in a white cloth, I will seal it with the king’s seal, and send it to him. If he is wise, when he has read the letter and seen that it is crow's-meat, he will come; if not, then he will not come.” And so he wrote on the leaf this verse:

1. “That which can drink when rivers are in flood;
That which the corn will cover out of sight;
That which forebodes a traveller on the road
O wise one, eat! My riddle read aright.”

This verse did the king write upon a leaf, and sent it to the Bodhisatta. He read the letter, and thinking: “The king wishes to see me,” he repeated the second verse: [2.175]

---

484 Kākapeyya, both in Sanskrit and in Pali, is proverbial for rivers at the flood. For Sanskrit see Pāṇini, 2. 1. 33, where some comm. say ‘deep,’ some ‘shallow.’ The commentator here says: “They call rivers Kākapeyya when a crow standing on the bank can stretch out its neck and drink.” Buddhaghosa, quoted by Rhys Davids in note to Buddhist Suttas, Sacred Books of the East, p. 178, says the same. Kākaguyha is corn tall enough to hide a crow; see Pāṇ. 3.2.5 and the Kāśikā’s comment, with the commentator’s note here. In the dictionary of Vacaspati, vol. 2, p. 1846, col. 1, it is said “When the crow cries Khare Khare, a traveller is coming.” The commentator here says: “If people wish to know whether an absent friend is coming back, they say – Caw, crow, if so-and-so is coming! and if the crows caw, they know that he will come.” – This verse riddles on these three proverbs and beliefs. (For part of this note I am indebted to Prof. Cowell.)
2. “The king does not forget to send me crow:
Geese, herons, peacocks – other birds there are:
If he gives one, he’ll give the rest, I know;
If he sent none at all ’twere worse by far.”

Then he caused his vehicle to be made ready, and went, and looked upon the king.
And the king, being pleased, set him again in the place of the king’s family priest.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Ānanda was the king in those days, and I was his family priest.”

Ja 215 Kacchapa Jātaka

The Story about the (Talkative) Turtle (2s)

In the present Kokālika blames the two chief disciples, and because of what he says, falls into hell. The Buddha explains that it was ever so in the past, and tells a story of a turtle who was being carried to the Himālayas, but opened his mouth, lost his grip and fell to his death.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (amaccapanḍita),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
the two senior monks = the two young geese (dve haṁsapotakā),
Kokālika = the turtle (kacchapa).

Present Source: Ja 481 Takkāriya,
Quoted at: Ja 117 Tittira, Ja 215 Kacchapa, Ja 272 Vyaggha, Ja 331 Kokālika, Past Compare: Dhp-a XXV.3 Kokālika.

Keywords: Slander, Talkativeness, Devas, Animals.

---

485 I am not sure of the meaning of these obscure lines, but this is the best I can make of it. The commentator says: “When he gets crow’s flesh he remembers to send me some; surely he will remember when he gets geese, etc.” The phrase – “Geese, herons, peacocks,” is a reminiscence of the verse quoted in Ja 202, above.

“The turtle needs must speak.” [2.123] This is a story told by the Teacher while staying in Jetavana, about Kokālika. The circumstances which gave rise to it will be set forth under the Mahātakkārijātaka [Ja 481].

During one rainy season the two chief disciples, desiring to leave the multitude and to dwell apart, took leave of the Teacher, and went into the kingdom where Kokālika was. They repaired to the residence of Kokālika, and said this to him, “Monk Kokālika, since for us it is delightful to dwell with you, and for you to dwell with us, we would abide here three months.” “How,” said the other, “will it be delightful for you to dwell with me?” They answered, “If you tell not a soul that the two chief disciples are dwelling here, we shall be happy, and that will be our delight in dwelling with you.” “And how is it delightful for me to dwell with you?” “We will teach the Dhamma to you for three months in your home, and we will discourse to you, and that will be your delight in dwelling with us.” “Dwell here, monks,” said he, “so long as you will,” and he allotted a pleasant residence to them. There they dwelt in the fruition of the Attainments, and no man knew of their dwelling in that place.

When they had thus past the rains they said to him, “Monk, now we have dwelt with you, and we will go to visit the Teacher,” and asked his leave to go. He agreed, and went with them on the rounds for alms in a village over against the place where they were. After their meal the elders departed from the village. Kokālika leaving them, turned back and said to the people, “Lay brethren, you are like brute animals. Here the two chief disciples have been dwelling for three months in the monastery opposite, and you knew nothing of it: now they are gone.” “Why did you not tell us, sir?” the people asked.

Then they took ghee and oil and medicines, raiment and clothes, and approached the elders, saluting them and saying: “Pardon us, sirs we knew not you were the chief disciples, we have learned it but today by the words of the venerable monk Kokālika. Pray have compassion on us, and receive these medicines and clothes.” Kokālika went after the elders with them, for he thought: “The elders are frugal, and content with little; they will not accept these things, and then they will be given to me.” But the elders, because the gift was offered at the instigation of a monk, neither accepted the things themselves nor had them given to Kokālika. The lay folk then said: “Sirs, if you will not accept these, come here once again to bless us.” The elders promised, and proceeded to the Teacher’s presence.
Now Kokālika was angry, because the elders neither accepted those things themselves, nor had them given to him. The elders, however, having remained a short while with the Teacher, each chose five hundred monks as their following, and with these thousand monks went on pilgrimage seeking alms, as far as Kokālika’s country. The lay folk came out to meet them, and led them to the same monastery, and showed them great honour day by day.

Great was the store given them of clothes and of medicines. Those monks who went out with the elders dividing the garments gave of them to all the monks which had come, but to Kokālika gave none, neither did the elders give him any. Getting no clothes Kokālika began to abuse and revile the elders, “Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire; they would not accept before what was offered them, but these things they do accept. There is no satisfying them, they have no regard for another.” But the elders, perceiving that the man was harbouring evil on their account, set out with their followers to depart; nor would they return, not though the people begged them to stay yet a few days longer.

Then a young monk said: “Where shall the elders stay, laymen? Your own particular elder does not wish them to stay here.” Then the people went to Kokālika, and said: “Sir, we are told you do not wish the elders to stay here. Go to! Either appease them and bring them back, or away with you and live elsewhere!” In fear of the people this man went and made his request to the elders. “Go back, monk,” answered the elders, “we will not return.” So he, being unable to prevail upon them, returned to the monastery. Then the lay brethren asked him whether the elders had returned. “I could not persuade them to return,” said he. “Why not, monk?” they asked. And then they began to think it must be no good monks would dwell there because the man did wrong, and they must get rid of him. “Sir,” they said, “do not stay here; we have nothing here for you.”

Thus dishonoured by them, he took bowl and robe and went to Jetavana. After saluting the Teacher, he said: “Sir, Sāriputta and Moggallāna are full of wicked desire, they are in the power of wicked desires!” The Teacher replied, “Say not so, Kokālika; let your heart, Kokālika, have confidence in Sāriputta and Moggallāna; learn that they are good monks.” Kokālika said: “You believe in your two chief disciples, sir; I have seen it with my own eyes; they have wicked desires, they have secrets within them, they are wicked men.” So he said thrice
(though the Teacher would have stayed him), then rose from his seat, and departed. Even as he went on his way there arose over all his body boils of the size of a mustard seed, which grew and grew to the size of a ripe seed of the wood apple tree, burst, and blood ran all over him. Groaning he fell by the gate of Jetavana, maddened with pain.

A great cry arose, and reached even to the Brahmā Realm, “Kokālika has reviled the two chief disciples!” Then his spiritual teacher, the Brahmā Tudu by name, learning the fact, came with the intent of appeasing the elders, and said while poised in the air, “Kokālika, a cruel thing this you have done; make your peace with the chief disciples.” “Who are you, brother?” the man asked. “Tudu Brahmā, is my name,” said he. “Have you not been declared by the Fortunate One,” said the man, “one of those who return not? That word means that such come not back to this earth. You will become a Yakkha upon a dunghill!” Thus he upbraided the Mahābrahmā. And as he could not persuade the man to do as he advised, he replied to him, “May you be tormented according to your own word.” Then he returned to his abode of bliss. And Kokālika after dying was born again in the Lotus Hell. That he had been born there the great and mighty Brahmā told to the Tathāgata, and the Teacher told it to the monks.

In the Dhamma Hall the monks talked of the man’s wickedness, “Monks, they say Kokālika reviled Sāriputta and Moggallāna, and by the words of his own mouth came to the Lotus Hell.” The Teacher came in, and said he, “What speak you of, monks, as you sit here?” They told him.

Here again the Teacher said: “This is not the only time, monks, that Kokālika has been ruined by talking; it was the same before.” And then he told the story as follows.

In the past Brahmadatta was king of Benares, and the Bodhisatta, being born to one of the king’s court, grew up, and became the king’s adviser in all things human and divine. But this king was very talkative; and when he talked there was no chance for any other to get in a word. [2.176] And the Bodhisatta, wishing to put a stop to his much talking, kept watching for an opportunity.

Now there dwelt a turtle in a certain pond in the region of the Himālayas. Two young wild geese, searching for food, struck up an acquaintance with him; and by and by they grew close friends together. One day these two said to him, “Friend turtle, we have a lovely home in the Himālayas, on a plateau of Mount Cittakūṭa, in a cave of gold! Will you come with us?"

"Why," said he, "how can I get there?" "Oh, we will take you, if only you can keep your mouth shut, and say not a word to any body." "Yes, I can do that," says he, "take me along!"

So they made the turtle hold a stick between his teeth; and themselves taking hold so of the two ends, they sprang up into the air.

The village children saw this, and exclaimed, "There are two geese carrying a turtle by a stick!"

By this time the geese flying swiftly had arrived at the space above the palace of the king, at Benares. The turtle wanted to cry out [2.124] "Well, and if my friends do carry me, what is that to you, you caitiffs?" and he let go the stick from between his teeth, and falling into the open courtyard he split in two. What an uproar there was! "A turtle has fallen in the courtyard, and broken in two!" they cried. The king, with the Bodhisatta, and all his court, came up to the place, and seeing the turtle asked the Bodhisatta a question. "Wise sir, what made this creature fall?"

"Now's my time!" thought he. "For a long while I have been wishing to admonish the king, and I have gone about seeking my opportunity. No doubt the truth is this: the turtle and the geese became friendly; the geese must have meant to carry him to the Himālayas, and so made him hold a stick between his teeth, and then lifted him into the air; then he must have heard some remark, and wanted to reply; and not being able to keep his mouth shut he must have let himself go; [2.177] and so he must have fallen from the sky and thus come by his death." So thought he; and addressed the king, "O king, they that have too much tongue, that set no limit to their speaking, ever come to such misfortune as this," and he uttered the following verses:

1. "The turtle needs must speak aloud,
   Although between his teeth
   A stick he bit: yet, spite of it,
   He spoke – and fell beneath."
2. And now, O mighty master, mark it well.
See you speak wisely, see you speak in season.
To death the turtle fell:
He talked too much: that was the reason.”

“He is speaking of me!” the king thought to himself; and asked the Bodhisatta if it was so.

“Be it you, O great king, or be it another,” replied he, “whosoever talks beyond measure comes by some misery of this kind,” and so he made the thing manifest. And thenceforward the king abstained from talking, and became a man of few words. {2.178}

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Kokālika was the turtle then, the two famous elders were the two wild geese, Ānanda was the king, and I was his wise adviser.”

Ja 216 Macchajātaka

The Story about the (Lamenting) Fish (2s)

In the present one monk is wavering because of having thoughts of his former wife. The Buddha tells a story of a fish who was caught, but whose lament over what his wife might think of him saved him from being roasted.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
the dissatisfied monk = the fish (maccha),
his former wife = the fish’s wife (macchī).

Present Source: Ja 102 Paññika,
Quoted at: Ja 216 Maccha.

Keywords: Attachment, Lamentation, Animals, Fish.

“'Tis not the fire.” [2.125] This story the Teacher told during a stay in Jetavana, about one who hankered after a former wife. The Teacher asked this monk, “Is it true, monk, what I hear, that you are lovesick?” “Yes, sir.” “For whom?” “For my late wife.” Then the Teacher said to him, “This wife, monk, has been a mischief to you. Long ago by her means you came near being spitted and roasted for food, but wise men saved your life.” Then he told a tale of the past.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was his family priest. Some fishermen drew out a fish\(^{487}\) which had got caught in their net, and cast it upon hot sand, saying: “We will cook it in the embers, and eat.” So they sharpened a spit. And the fish fell weeping over his mate, and said these two verses:

1. “'Tis not the fire that burns me, nor the spit that hurts me sore;
   But the thought my mate may call me a faithless paramour.

2. "'Tis the flame of love that burns me, and fills my heart with pain;
   Not death is the due of loving; O fishermen, free me again!” [2.179]

At that moment the Bodhisatta approached the river bank; and hearing the fish’s lament, he went up to the fishermen and made them set the fish at liberty.

This discourse ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the lovesick monk reached the Fruit of the First Path. “The wife was in those days the fish’s mate, the lovesick monk was the fish, and I myself was the family priest.”

Ja 217 Seggujātaka

The Story about (Daughter) Seggu (2s)

In the present a layman doesn’t visit the Buddha for a long time while arranging his daughter’s marriage. The Buddha tells a story of a greengrocer in the past who tested his daughter before giving her in marriage to a suitable young man.

The Bodhisatta = the Tree Devatā (Rukkhadevatā),
the father = the same in the past (pitā),
the daughter = the same in the past (dhītā).

Keywords: Virtue, Devas, Women.

---

\(^{487}\) [Some of the elements of this story have been lost, making it hardly understandable for the moral it purports to illustrate. The story is told better in Ja 34 Macchajātaka, in the first book.]
“All the world’s on pleasure bent.” [2.126] This story the Teacher told, while dwelling at Jetavana, about a greengrocer who was a lay brother.

The circumstances have already been given in the First Book.488

This story was told by the Teacher while at Jetavana, about a lay brother who was a greengrocer in Sāvatthī and made a living by the sale of various roots and vegetables, and pumpkins and the like. Now he had a pretty daughter who was as good and virtuous as she was pretty, but was always laughing. And when she was asked in marriage by a family of his own station in life, he thought: “She ought to be married, but she’s always laughing; and a bad girl married into a strange family is her parents’ shame. I must find out for certain whether she is a good girl or not.”

So one day he made his daughter take a basket and come with him to the forest to gather herbs. Then to try her, he took her by the hand with whispered words of love. Straightaway the girl burst into tears and began to cry out that such a thing would be as monstrous as fire rising out of water, and she besought him to forbear. Then he told her that his only intent was to try her, and asked whether she was virtuous. And she declared that she was and that she had never looked on any man with eyes of love. Calming her fears and taking her back home, he made a feast and gave her in marriage. Then feeling that he ought to go and pay his respects to the Teacher, he took perfumes and garlands in his hand and went to Jetavana.

Here again the Teacher asked him where he had been so long; and he replied, “My daughter, sir, is always smiling. After testing her, I gave her in marriage to a young gentleman. As this had to be done, I had no opportunity of paying you a visit.” To this the Teacher answered, “Not only now is your daughter virtuous, but virtuous she was in days of yore; and as you have tested her now, so you tested her in those days.” And at the man’s request he told a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was a Tree Devatā.

488 No. 102 Paññikajātaka, where recurs the second verse.
This same pious greengrocer took it into his head to test his daughter. He led her into the woods, \{2.180\} and seized her by the hand, making as though he had conceived a passion for her. And as she cried out in woe, he addressed her in the words of the first verse:

1. “All the world’s on pleasure bent;
   Ah, my baby innocent!
   Now I’ve caught you, pray don’t cry;
   As the town does, so do I.”

When she heard it, she answered, “Dear Father, I am a maid, and I know not the lust of the flesh,” and weeping she uttered the second verse:

2. “He that should keep me safe from all distress,
   The same betrays me in my loneliness;
   My father, who should be my sure defence,
   Here in the forest offers violence.”

And the greengrocer, after testing his daughter thus, took her home, and gave her in marriage to a young man. Afterwards he passed away and traveled on according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the end of the Truths the greengrocer entered on the Fruit of the First Path, “In those days, father and daughter were the same as now, and the Tree Devatā that saw it all was I myself.”

---

Ja 218 Kūṭavāṇijajātaka
The Story about the Cheating Merchant (2s)

In the present one merchant tries to cheat another out of his share by delaying to pay him. The Buddha tells a story of a man who told his friend 500 ploughshares were eaten by mice, but his victim then told him his son had been taken by a hawk. The Bodhisatta settles both improbabilities with wisdom.

The Bodhisatta = the judge (vinicchayāmacca), the wise merchant = the same in the past (paṇḍitavāṇija),
the cheating merchant = the same in the past (kūṭavāṇija).

Keywords: Cheating, Prevarication.
“Well planned indeed!” [2.127] [2.181] This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about a dishonest trader.

There were two traders of Sāvatthi, one pious and the other a cheat. These two joined partnership, and loaded five hundred wagons full of wares, journeying from east to west for trade; and returned to Sāvatthi with large profits.

The pious trader suggested to his partner that they should divide their stock. The rogue thought to himself, “This fellow has been roughing it for ever so long with bad food and lodging. Now he’s at home again, he’ll eat all sorts of dainties and die of a surfeit. Then I shall have all the stock for myself.” What he said was, “Neither the stars nor the day are favourable; tomorrow or the next day we’ll see about it,” so he kept putting it off. However, the pious trader pressed him, and the division was made. Then he went with scents and garlands to visit the Teacher; and after a respectful obeisance, he sat on one side. The Teacher asked when he had returned. “Just a fortnight ago, sir,” said he. “Then why have you delayed to visit the Buddha?” The trader explained. Then the Teacher said: “It is not only now that your partner is a rogue; he was just the same before,” and at his request told him a story of the past.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into this world as the son of one in the king’s court. When he grew up he was made a Lord Justice.

At that time, two traders, one from a village and one of the town, were friends together. The villager deposited with the townsman five hundred ploughshares. The other sold these, and kept the price, and in the place where they were he scattered mouse dung. By and by came the villager, and asked for his ploughshare. “The mice have eaten them up!” said the cheat, and pointed out the mouse dung to him. [2.128]

“Well, well, so be it,” replied the other, “what can be done with things which the mice have eaten?

Now at the time of bathing he took the other trader’s son, and set him in a friend’s house, in an inner chamber, bidding them not suffer him to go out any where. [2.182] And having washed himself he went to his friend’s house.

“Where is my son?” asked the cheat.

“Dear friend,” he replied, “I took him with me and left him on the river side; and when I was gone down into the water, there came a hawk, and seized your son in his extended claws, and flew up into the air. I beat the water, shouted, struggled – but could not make him let go.”

“Lies!” cried the rogue. “No hawk could carry off a boy”

“Let be, dear friend: if things happen that should not, how can I help it? Your son has been carried off by a hawk, as I say.”

The other reviled him. “Ah, you scoundrel! You murderer! Now I will go to the judge, and have you dragged before him!” And he departed. The villager said: “As

______________________________________________________________________________

489 Here, in the last sentence but one, and in the verses the singular phālanī is used. It is possible this may be a collective, but more likely that it harks back to a simpler and older version, where only one is spoken of. Readers cannot fail to have marked the fondness of the Jātaka editor for round numbers, especially five hundred.

490 Things gnawed by mice or rats were unlucky; cp. vol. 1. p. 372 (Pāli), Tevijjasutta Mahāsīla i (translation in Sacred Books of the East, Buddhist Suttas, p. 196). The man here goes further than he need; if the mice had but nibbled the ploughshares perhaps he might throw them away. We may also have a reference to an old proverb, found both in Greek and Latin: “where mice eat iron” meant “nowhere.” Herondas 3. 76 οὐδ’ ὅκου χάρις οἱ μῶς ὁμοίως τὸν σίδηρον τρώγουσιν. Seneca, Apocolocyntosis chap. 7 (to Claudius in heaven) venisti huc ubi mures ferrum rodunt [art thou come hither where the mice gnaw iron.] you please,” and went to the court of justice. The rogue addressed the Bodhisatta thus:

“My lord, this fellow took my son with him to bathe, and when I asked where he was, he answered, that a hawk had carried him off. Judge my cause!”

“Tell the truth,” said the Bodhisatta, asking the other.

“Indeed, my lord,” he answered, “I took him with me, and a falcon has carried him off.”

“But where in the world are there hawks which carry off boys?”

“My lord,” he answered, “I have a question to ask you. If hawks cannot carry off boys into the air, can mice eat iron ploughshares?”

“What do you mean by that?”

“My lord, I deposited in this man’s house five hundred ploughshares. The man told me that the mice had devoured them, and showed me the droppings of the mice that had done it. My lord, if mice eat ploughshares, then hawks carry off boys: but if mice cannot do this, neither will hawks carry the boy off. This man says the mice ate my ploughshares. Give sentence whether they are eaten or no. {2.183} Judge my cause!”

“He must have meant,” thought the Bodhisatta, “to fight the trickster with his own weapons. Well devised!” said he, and then he uttered these two verses:

1. “Well planned indeed! The biter bit,
The trickster tricked – a pretty hit!
If mice eat ploughshares, hawks can fly
With boys away into the sky! [2.129]
2. A rogue out-rogued with tit for tat!
   Give back the plough, and after that Perhaps the man who lost the plough
   May give your son back to you now!"\textsuperscript{491} {2.184}

Thus he that had lost his son received him again, and he received his ploughshare that had lost it; and afterwards both passed away to fare according to their deeds.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The cheat in both cases was the same, and so was the clever man; I myself was the Lord Chief Justice.”

\textbf{Ja 219 Garahitajātaka}
\textbf{The Story about Blaming (2s)}

In the present one monk can make no progress owing to discontent. The Buddha tells a story about a monkey who lived with a king and understood mankind’s wrongdoing, before being set free and reporting it to his fellows. They blocked their ears rather than listen.

The Bodhisatta = the lord of the monkeys (vānarinda),
the Buddha’s disciples = the group of monkeys (vānaragaṇa).

Keywords: Censure, Tale telling, Animals.

\textbf{“The gold is mine.”} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a monk who was downcast and discontent.

This man could not concentrate his mind on any single object, but his life was all full of discontent; and this was told to the Teacher. When asked by the Teacher if he really were discontented, he said yes; asked why, he replied that it was through his passions. “O monk!” said the Teacher, “this passion has been despised even by the lower animals; and can you, a monk in such a dispensation, yield to discontent \textsuperscript{491} A like repartee is found in \textit{North Ind. N. and O.} iii. 214 (\textit{The Judgement of the Jackal}); Swynnerton, Ind. \textit{Nights Entertainments}, p. 142 (\textit{The Traveller and the Oilman}); and a story of an oilman in Stumme's \textit{Tunisische Märchen}, vol. ii. arising from the passion that even brutes despise?” Then he told him a story of the past.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned over Benares, the Bodhisatta came into the world as a monkey, in the region of the Himālayas. A forester caught him, brought him home and gave him to the king. For a long time he dwelt with the king, serving him faithfully, and he learned a great deal about the manners of the world of men. The king was [2.130] pleased at his faithfulness. He sent for the forester, and bade him set the monkey free in the very place where he had been captured; and so he did.

All the monkey tribe gathered together upon the face of a huge rock, to see the Bodhisatta now that he had come back to them; and they spoke pleasantly to him.

“Sir, where have you been living this long time?” “In the king’s palace at Benares.”
“Then how did you get free?” “The king made me his pet monkey, and being pleased with my tricks, he let me go.”

The monkeys went on, “You must know the manner of living in the world of men:
{2.185} tell us about it too – we want to hear!”

“Don’t ask me the manner of men’s living,” said the Bodhisatta. “Do tell – we want to hear!” they said again.

“Mankind,” said he, “both princes and brahmins, cry out – ‘Mine! Mine!’ They know not of the impermanence, by which the things that be are not. Hear now the way of these blind fools,” and he spoke these verses:

1. “‘The gold is mine, the precious gold!’ so cry they, night and day:
These foolish folk cast never a look upon the holy way.

2. There are two masters in the house; one has no beard to wear,
But has long breasts, ears pierced with holes, and goes with plaited hair;
His price is told in countless gold; he plagues all people there.” {2.186}

On hearing this, all the monkeys cried out, “Stop, stop! We have heard what it is not meet to hear!” and with both hands they stopped their ears tight. And they liked not the place, because they said: “In this place we heard a thing not seemly,” so they went elsewhere. And this rock went by the name of Garahitapiṭṭhi Rock, or the Rock of Blaming.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths this monk reached the Fruit of the First Path. “The Buddha’s present followers were that troop of monkeys, and their chief was I myself.”

Ja 220 Dhammaddhajajātaka

The Story about (the Family Priest) Dhammaddhaja (2s)

Alternative Title: Dhammaddhajajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta is going around trying to kill the Buddha. The latter tells a story about how how in the past a corrupt official had tried to get him killed using various strategems, but with the help of Sakka he was always defeated. Eventually he was tasked with finding a man with four good qualities to look after a palace – and again he managed to find one.

The Bodhisatta = (the family priest) Dhammaddhaja,
Sāriputta = (the ornament maker) Chattapāṇi,
Devadatta = (the general) Kāḷaka.

Keywords: Corruption, Envy, Devas.

“You look as though.” [2.131] This was told by the Teacher while staying at the Bamboo Grove, about attempts to murder him. On this occasion, as before, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time Devadatta has tried to murder me and has not even frightened me. He did the same before.” And he told this story.

In the past a king named Yasapāṇi [Fame Bearer], reigned at Benares. His chief captain was named Kāḷaka [Blackie]. At that time the Bodhisatta was his family priest, and had the name of Dhammaddhaja [Banner of the Dhamma]. There was also a man Chattapāṇi [Parasol Bearer], a maker of ornaments to the king. The king was a good king. But his chief captain swallowed bribes in the judging of causes; he was a backbiter; he took bribes, and defrauded the rightful owners.

On a day, one who had lost his suit was departing from the court, weeping and stretching out his arms, [2.187] when he fell in with the Bodhisatta as he was going 492 Here we have the “Hero’s Tasks” in a new form.

---

to pay his service to the king. Falling at his feet, the man cried out, telling how he had been worsted in his cause, “Although such as you, my lord, instruct the king in the things of this world and the next, the commander-in-chief takes bribes, and defrauds rightful owners!”

The Bodhisatta pitied him. “Come, my good fellow,” said he, “I will judge your cause for you!” and he proceeded to the court-house. A great company gathered together. The Bodhisatta reversed the sentence, and gave judgement for him who was in the right. The spectators applauded. The sound was great. The king heard it, and asked, “What sound is this I hear?”

“My lord king,” they answered, “it is a cause wrongly judged that has been judged aright by the wise Dhammaddhaja; that is why there is this shout of applause.”

The king was pleased and sent for the Bodhisatta. “They tell me,” he began, “that you have judged a cause?” “Yes, great king, I have judged that which Kāḷaka did not judge aright.” [2.132]

“Be you judge from this day,” said the king, “it will be a joy for my ears, and prosperity for the world!” He was unwilling, but the king begged him, “In mercy to all creatures, sit in judgement!” and so the king won his consent.

From that time Kāḷaka received no presents; and losing his gains he spoke calumny of the Bodhisatta before the king, saying: “O mighty king, the wise Dhammaddhaja covets your kingdom!” But the king would not believe; and bade him say not so.

“If you do not believe me,” said Kāḷaka, “look out of the window at the time of his coming. Then you will see that he has got the whole city into his own hands.”

The king saw the crowd of those that were about him in his judgement hall. “There is his retinue,” thought he. He gave way. “What are we to do, captain?” he asked. “My lord, he must be put to death.” [2.188] “How can we put him to death without having found him out in some great wickedness?”

“There is a way,” said the other. “What way?” “Tell him to do what is impossible, and if he cannot, put him to death for that.” “But what is impossible to him?”

“My lord king,” replied he, “it takes two years or twice two for a garden with good soil to bear fruit, being planted and tended. Send you for him, and say – ‘We want a garden to disport ourselves in tomorrow. Make us a garden! This he will not be able to do; and we will slay him for that fault.”

The king addressed himself to the Bodhisatta. “Wise sir, we have sported long enough in our old garden; now we crave to sport in a new. Make us a garden! If you cannot make it, you must die.”

The Bodhisatta reasoned, it must be that Kāḷaka has set the king against me, because he gets no presents. “If I can,” he said to the king, “O mighty king, I will see to it.” And he went home. After a good meal he lay upon his bed, thinking. Sakka’s throne grew hot. Sakka reflecting perceived the Bodhisatta’s difficulty. He made haste to him, entered his chamber, and asked him, “Wise sir, what think you on?” poised the while in mid-air.

“Who are you?” asked the Bodhisatta. [2.133] “I am Sakka.” “The king bids me make a garden: that is what I am thinking upon.” “Wise sir, do not trouble: I will make you a garden like the groves of Nandana and Cittalatā! In what place shall I make it?”

“In such and such a place,” he told him. Sakka made it, and returned to the city of the gods.

Next day, the Bodhisatta beheld the garden there in very truth, and sought the king’s presence. “O king, the garden is ready: go to your sport!”

The king came to the place, and beheld a garden girt with a fence of eighteen cubits, vermilion tinted, having gates and ponds, beautiful with all manner of trees laden heavy with flowers and fruit! “The sage has done my bidding,” said he to Kāḷaka, “now what are we to do?”

493 This was supposed to happen when a good man was in straits. Some modern superstitions, turning upon the pity of a god for creatures in pain, may be seen in North Ind. N. and Q. iii. 285. As this: “Hot oil is poured into a dog’s ear and the pain makes him yell. It is believed that his yells are heard by Raja Indra, who in pity stops the rain.”
“O mighty king!” replied he, “if he can make a garden in one night, can he not seize upon your kingdom?”

“Well, what are we to do?” “We will make him perform another impossible thing.” “What is that?” asked the king. “We will bid him make a lake possessed of the seven precious jewels!”

The king agreed, and thus addressed the Bodhisatta: “Teacher, you have made a park. Make now a lake to match it, with the seven precious jewels. If, you cannot make it, you shall not live!”

“Very good, great king,” answered the Bodhisatta, “I will make it if I can.”

Then Sakka made a lake of great splendour, having a hundred landing-places, a thousand inlets, covered over with lotus plants of five different colours, like the lake in Nandana.

Next day, the Bodhisatta beheld this also, and told the king, “See, the lake is made!” And the king saw it, and asked of Kāḷaka what was to be done.

“Bid him, my lord, make a house to suit it,” said he.

“Make a house, Teacher,” said the king to the Bodhisatta, “all of ivory, to suit with the park and the lake: if you do not make it, you must die!”

Then Sakka made him a house likewise. The Bodhisatta beheld it next day, and told the king. When the king had seen it, he asked Kāḷaka again, what was to do. Kāḷaka told him to bid the Bodhisatta make a jewel to suit the house. The king said to him, “Wise sir, make a jewel to suit with this ivory house; I will go about looking at it by the light of the jewel: if you cannot make one, you must die! “Then Sakka [2.134] made him a jewel too. Next day the Bodhisatta beheld it, and told the king. [2.190] When the king had seen it, he again asked Kāḷaka what was to be done.

“Mighty king!” answered he, “I think there is some Devatā who does each thing that the brahmin Dhammaddhaja wishes. Now bid him make something which even a divinity cannot make. Not even a deity can make a man with all four
So the king said: “Teacher, you have made a park, a lake, and a palace, and a jewel to give light. Now make me a keeper with four virtues, to watch the park; if you cannot, you must die.”

“So be it,” answered he, “if it is possible, I will see to it.” He went home, had a good meal, and lay down. When he awoke in the morning, he sat upon his bed, and thought thus. “What the great king Sakka can make by his power, that he has made. He cannot make a park-keeper with four virtues. This being so, it is better to die forlorn in the woods, than to die at the hand of other men.” So saying no word to any man, he went down from his dwelling and passed out of the city by the chief gate, and entered the woods, where he sat him down beneath a tree and reflected upon the dispensation of the good. Sakka perceived it; and in the fashion of a forester he approached the Bodhisatta, saying, “Brahmin, you are young and tender: why sit you here in this wood, as though you had never seen pain before?” As he asked it, he repeated the first verse:

1. “You look as though your life must happy be;
   Yet to the wild woods you would homeless go,
   Like some poor wretch whose life was misery,
   And pine beneath this tree in lonely woe.” {2.191}

To this the Bodhisatta made answer in the second verse:

2. “I look as though my life must happy be;
   Yet to the wild woods I would homeless go,
   Like some poor wretch whose life was misery,
   And pine beneath this tree in lonely woe,
   Pondering the truth that all the saints do know.”

Then Sakka said: “If so, then why, brahmin, are you sitting here?”

---

494 Caturaṅga-samannāgam; it is an odd coincidence that the Pythagoreans called the perfect man τετράγωνος, ‘four-square’ (see the poem of Simonides, in Plat. Prot. 339 B).
“The king,” he made answer, “requires a park-keeper with four good qualities; such a one cannot be found; so I thought: “Why perish by the hand of man? I will off to the woods, and die a lonely death. So here I came, and here I sit.”

Then the other replied, “Brahmin, I am Sakka, King of the Devas. By [2.135] me was your park made, and those other things. A park-keeper possessed of four virtues cannot be made; but in your country there is one Chattapāṇi, who makes ornaments for the head, and he is such a man. If a park-keeper is wanted, go and make this workman the keeper.” With these words Sakka departed to his divine city, after consoling him and bidding him fear no more. {2.192}

The Bodhisatta went home, and having broken his fast, he repaired to the palace gates, and there in that spot he saw Chattapāṇi. He took him by the hand, and asked him, “Is it true, as I hear, Chattapāṇi, that you are endowed with the four virtues?”

“Who told you so?” asked the other. “Sakka, King of the Devas.” “Why did he tell you?” He recounted all, and told the reason. The other said,

“Yes, I am endowed with the four virtues.” The Bodhisatta taking him by the hand led him into the king’s presence. “Here, mighty monarch, is Chattapāṇi, endowed with four virtues. If there is need of a keeper for the park, make him keeper.”

“Is it true, as I hear,” the king asked him, “that you have four virtues?” “Yes, mighty king.” “What are they?” he asked.

“I envy not, and drink no wine;
No strong desire, no wrath is mine,” said he.

“Why, Chattapāṇi,” cried the king, “did you say you have no envy?” “Yes, O king, I have no envy.” “What are the things you do not envy?”
“Listen, my lord!” said he; and then he told how he felt no envy in the following lines:

```
A family priest once in bonds I threw
Which thing a woman made me do:
He built me up in holy lore;
Since when I never envied more.”
```

Then the king said: “Dear Chattapāṇi, why do you abstain from strong drink?”

And the other answered in the following verse:

```
A family priest once in bonds I threw
Which thing a woman made me do:
He built me up in holy lore;
Since when I never envied more.”
```

The following is the commentary on these lines. The story is that of No. 120, where the first verse of those which follow, is given. “This is the meaning. In former days, I was a king of Benares like this, and for a woman’s sake I imprisoned a chaplain. The free are bound, when folly has her say; When wisdom speaks, the bound go free away. Just as in the Birth now spoken of, this Chattapāṇi became king. The queen intrigued with sixty-four of the slaves. She tempted the Bodhisatta, and when he would not consent she tried to ruin him by speaking calumny of him; then the king threw him into prison. The Bodhisatta was brought before him bound, and explained the real state of the case. Then he was set free himself; and then he got the king to release all those slaves who had been imprisoned, and advised him to forgive both the queen and them. All the rest is to be understood exactly as explained above. It was in reference to this he said “A chaplain once in bonds I threw – Which thing a woman made me do: He built me up in holy lore; Since then I never envied more.” But then I thought, ‘I have avoided sixteen thousand women, and I cannot satisfy this one in the way of passion. Such is the anger of women, hard to satisfy. It is like being angry, saying, ‘Why is it dirty?’ when a worn garment is dirty; it is like being angry, saying, ‘Why does it become like this?’ when after a meal some passes into the draught. I made a resolve that henceforth no envy should arise in me by way of passion, lest I should fail to become a saint. From that time I have been free from envy. This is the point of saying, ‘Since when I never envied more.’ ”

The commentator tells the following story to illustrate this verse. “I was once,” says the speaker, “a king of Benares; I could not live without strong drink and meat. Now in that city animals might not be slaughtered on the Sabbath (uposathadivasesu); so the cook had prepared some meat for my Sabbath meal the day before (the 13th of the lunar fortnight). This, being badly kept, the dogs ate. The cook durst not come before the king on the Sabbath to serve his rich and varied repast in the upper chamber.
“Once I was drunken, and I ate
My own son’s flesh upon my plate;
Then, touched with sorrow and with pain,
Sware never to touch drink again.” {2.194}

Then the king said: “But what, dear sir, makes you indifferent, without love?” The man explained it in these words: {497} without meat, so he asked the queen’s advice. “My lady, today I have no meat; and without it I dare not offer a meal to him, what am I to do?” Said she, “The king is very fond of my son. As he fondles him, he hardly knows whether he exists or not. {194} I will dress my son up, and give him into the king’s hands, and while he plays with him you shall serve his dinner; he will not notice.” So she dressed up her darling son, and put him into the king’s hands. As he was playing with the lad, the cook served the dinner. The king, mad with drink, and seeing no meat upon the dish, asked where the meat was. The answer was that no meat was to be had that day because there was no killing on the Sabbath. “Meat is hard to get for me, is it?” he said; and then he wrung his dear son’s neck as he sat in his arms, and killed him; threw him down before the cook, and told him to look sharp and cook it. The cook obeyed, and the king ate his own son’s flesh. For dread of the king not a soul durst weep or wail or say a word. The king ate, and went to sleep. Next morning, having slept off his intoxication, he asked for his son. Then the queen fell weeping at his feet, and said, “Oh, sir, yesterday you killed your son and ate his flesh!” The king wept and wailed for grief, and thought: “This is because of drinking strong drink!” Then, seeing the mischief of drinking, I made a resolution that lest I should never become a saint, I would never touch this deadly liquor; taking dust, and rubbing it upon my mouth. From that time I have drunk no strong drink. This is the point of the lines, “Once I was drunken.”

497 The commentator tells this story: “The meaning is, Once upon a time I was a king named Kitavasa, and a son was born to me. The fortune-tellers said that the boy would perish of lack of water. So he was named Dutthakumara. When he grew up, he was viceroy. The king kept his son close to him, before or behind; and to break the prophecy had tanks made at the four city gates and here and there inside the city; he made halls in the squares and crossways, and set water jars in them. One day the young man, dressed finelly, went to the park by himself. On his way he saw a Pacceka-Buddha in the road, and many people spoke to him, praised him, did obeisance before him. {2.195} ‘What!’ thought the prince, ‘when such as I am passing by, do people show all this respect to thatder shavepate?’ Angry, he dismounted from the elephant, and asked “King Kitavāsa was my name;
A mighty king was I;
My boy the Buddha’s basin broke
And so he had to die.” (2.195)

Said the king then, “What was it, good friend, that made you to be without anger?”
And the other made the matter clear in these lines:

“As Araka, for seven years
I practised generosity;
And then for seven ages dwelt
In Brahmā’s Realm on high.”

When Chattapāṇi had thus explained his four attributes, the king made a sign to his attendants. And in an instant all the court, monastic and laymen and all, rose up, and cried out upon Kālaka, “Fie, bribe-swallowing thief and scoundrel! You couldn’t get your bribes, and so you would murder the wise man by speaking ill of him!” They seized him by hand and foot, and bundled him out of the palace; and catching up whatever they could get hold of, this a stone, and this a staff, they broke his head and did him to death: and dragging him by the feet they cast him upon a dunghill.

the Buddha if he had received his food. ‘Yes,’ was the reply. The prince took it from him, cast it on the ground, rice and bowl together, and crushed it to dust under his feet.
‘The man is lost, verily!’ said the Buddha, and looked into his face. ‘I am Prince Duṭṭha, son of king Kitavāsa!’ said the prince – ‘what harm will you do me, by looking angrily at me and opening your eyes?’ The Buddha, having lost his food, rose up in the air and went off to a cave at the foot of Nanda, in Northern Himalaya. At that very moment the prince’s evil-doing began to bear fruit, and he cried – ‘I burn! I burn!’ His body burst into flame, and he fell down in the road where he was; all the water that there was near disappeared, the conduits dried up, then and there he perished, and passed into hell. The king heard it, and was overcome with grief. Then he thought – ‘This grief is come upon me because my son was dear to me. If I had had no affection, I had had no pain. From this time forward I resolve that I will fix my affection on nothing, animate or inanimate.’ ”
Thenceforward the king ruled in righteousness, until he passed away and traveled on according to his deeds.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was the Commander Kāḷaka, Sāriputta was the artisan Chattapāṇi, and I was Dhammaddhaja.”

Ja 221 Kāśāvajātaka

The Story about the Renunciant’s Robe (2s)

In the present laymen club together and offer robes to Devadatta. The Buddha, hearing about it, tells a story of how a hunter had dressed as a Paccekabuddha in order to kill elephants, and how he had rebuked him for dishonouring the robes.

The Bodhisatta = the master of the herd (yūthapati), Devadatta = the man who killed elephants (hatthinārakapurisa).

Keywords: Dissemblance, Cheating.

“If any man.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about Devadatta.

It was occasioned by something that happened at Rājagaha. At one period the Captain of the Dhamma was living with five hundred monks at the Bamboo Grove. And Devadatta, with a body of men, wicked, like himself, lived at Gayāsīsa.

At that time the citizens of Rājagaha used to club together for the purpose of almsgiving. A trader, who had come there on business, brought a magnificent perfumed yellow robe, asking that he might become one of them, and give this garment as his contribution. The townspeople brought plenty of gifts. All that was contributed by those who had clubbed together consisted of ready money. There was this garment left. The crowd which had come together said: “Here is this beautiful perfumed robe left over. Who shall have it – elder Sāriputta, or Devadatta?” Some were in favour of Sāriputta; others said: “Elder Sāriputta will stay here a few days, and then go travelling at his own sweet will; but Devadatta always lives near our city; he is our refuge in good fortune or ill. Devadatta shall have it!” They made a division, and those who voted for Devadatta were in the majority. So to Devadatta they gave it. He had it cut in strips, and sewn together, and coloured like gold, and so he wore it upon him.

At the same time, thirty monks went from Rājagaha to Sāvatthi to salute the Teacher. After greetings had been exchanged, they told him all this affair, adding, “And so, sir, Devadatta wears this mark of the saint, which suits him ill enough.” “Monks,” said the Teacher, “this is not the first time that Devadatta has put on the garb of a saint, a most unsuitable dress. He did the same before.” And then he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta came into this world as an elephant in the Himālayas region. [2.139] Lord of a herd that numbered eighty thousand wild elephants, he dwelt in the forest land.

A poor man that lived in Benares, seeing the workers of ivory in the ivory bazaar making bangles and all manner of ivory trinkets, asked them would they buy an elephant’s tusks, if he should get them. To which they answered, yes.

So he took a weapon, and clothing himself in a yellow robe, he put on the guise of a Paccekabuddha,498 with a covering band about his head. Taking his stand in the path of the elephants, he slew one of them with his weapon, and sold the tusks of it in Benares; and in this manner he made a living. After this he began always to slay the very last elephant in the Bodhisatta’s troop. Day by day the elephants grew fewer and fewer.

Then they went and asked the Bodhisatta how it was that their numbers dwindled. He perceived the reason. “Some man,” he thought, “stands in the place where the elephants go, having made himself like a Paccekabuddha in appearance. Now can it be he that slays the elephants? I will find him out.” So one day he sent the others on before him {2.198} and he followed after. The man saw the Bodhisatta, and made a rush at him with his weapon. The Bodhisatta turned and stood. “I will beat him to the earth, and kill him!” thought he, and stretched out his trunk – when he saw the yellow robes which the man wore. “I ought to pay respect to those sacred robes!” said he. So drawing back his trunk, he cried, “O man! Is not that dress, the \[498\] One who has attained the knowledge needful for attaining Nibbāna, but does not preach it to men.

flag of an Arahat, unsuitable to you? Why do you wear it?” and he repeated these lines:

1. “If any man, yet full of wrong, should dare
   To don the yellow robe, in whom no care
   For temperance is found, or love of truth,
   He is not worthy such a robe to wear.

2. He who has spued out wrong, who everywhere
   Is firm in virtue, and whose chief care
   Is to control his passions, and be true,
   He well deserves the yellow robe to wear.”

With these words, the Bodhisatta rebuked the man, and bade him never come there again, else he should die for it. Thus he drove him away.

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was the man who killed the elephants, and the head of the herd was I.”

Ja 222 Cullanandiyajātaka

The Story about (the Monkey) Little Nanda (2s)

Alternative Title: Cūlanandiyajātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta goes about trying to kill the Buddha, who tells a story from a past life in which a hunter had mercilessly killed him, when he was a monkey tending for his mother. Shortly afterwards, because of his wickedness, the earth swallowed up the hunter, fulfilling his teacher’s prediction.

The Bodhisatta = (the monkey) Great Nanda (Mahānanda), Mahāpajāpatigotamī = his (blind) mother (mātā),
Ānanda = (the monkey) Little Nanda (Cūlanandiya),
Sāriputta = the world-famous teacher (disāpāmokkho ācariyo),
Devadatta = the hunter (luddaka).

Keywords: Cruelty, Mercilessness, Animals.

---

"I call to mind." [2.140] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta.

One day the monks fell talking in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, that man Devadatta is harsh, cruel, and tyrannical, full of baneful devices against the Supreme Buddha. He flung a stone,\(^500\) he even used the aid of Nāḷāgiri;\(^501\) pity and compassion there is none in him for the Tathāgata.”

The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about as they sat there. They told him. Then he said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has been harsh, cruel, merciless. He was so before.” And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a monkey named Nandiya [Jolly]; and dwelt in the Himālayas region; and his youngest brother bore the name of Cūḷanandiya [Little Jolly]. These two headed a band of eighty thousand monkeys, and they had a blind mother in their home to care for.

They left their mother in her lair in the bushes, and went amongst the trees to find sweet wild fruit of all kinds, which they sent back home to her. The messengers did not deliver it; and, tormented with hunger, she became nothing but skin and bone. Said the Bodhisatta to her, “Mother, we send you plenty of sweet fruits: then what makes you so thin?” “My son, I never get it!” [2.200]

The Bodhisatta pondered. “While I look after my herd, my mother will perish! I will leave the herd, and look after my mother alone.” So calling his brother, “Monk,” said he, “do you tend the herd, and I will care for our mother.”

“Nay, brother,” replied he, “what care I for ruling a herd? I too will care only for our mother!” So the two of them were of one mind, and leaving the herd, they brought their mother down out of the Himālayas, and took up their abode in a banyan tree of the border-land, where they took care of her. [2.141]

---

\(^{500}\) For the stone-throwing see Cullavagga vii. 3. 9; Hardy, Manual, p. 320.

\(^{501}\) A fierce elephant, let loose at Devadatta’s request to kill the Buddha. See Cullavagga vii. 3. 11 f. (Vinaya Texts, Sacred Books of the East, iii. 247 f.); Milinda, iv. 4. 44 (where he is called Dhanapālaka, as supra vol. i. 57); Hardy, Manual, p. 320.
Now a certain brahmin, who lived at Taxila, had received his education from a famous teacher, and afterward he took leave of him, saying that he would depart. This teacher had the power of divining from the signs on a man’s body; and thus he perceived that his pupil was harsh, cruel, and violent. “My son,” said he, “you are harsh, and cruel, and violent. Such persons do not prosper at all seasons alike; they come to dire woe and dire destruction. Be not harsh, nor do what you will afterwards repent.” With this counsel, he let him go.

The youth took leave of his teacher, and went his way to Benares. There he married and settled down; and not being able to earn a livelihood by any other of his arts, he determined to live by his bow. So he set to work as a huntsman; and left Benares to earn his living. Dwelling in a border village, he would range the woods girt with bow and quiver, and lived by sale of the flesh of all manner of beasts which he slew.

One day, as he was returning homewards after having caught nothing at all in the forest, he observed a banyan tree standing on the verge of an open glade. “Perhaps,” he thought, “there may be something here.” And he turned his face towards the banyan tree. Now the two brothers had just fed their mother with fruits, and were sitting behind her in the tree, when they saw the man coming. “Even if he sees our mother,” they said, “what will he do?” and they hid amongst the branches. Then this cruel man, as he came up to the tree and saw the mother monkey weak with age, and blind, thought to himself, “Why should I return empty-handed? I will shoot this female monkey first!” \[2.201\] and lifted up his bow to shoot her. This the Bodhisatta saw, and said to his brother, “Cūḷanandiya, my dear, this man wants to shoot our mother! I will save her life. When I am dead, do you take care of her.” So saying, down he came out of the tree, and called out, “O man, don’t shoot my mother! She is blind, and weak for age. I will save her life; don’t kill her, but kill me instead!” and when the other had promised, he sat down in a place within bowshot. The hunter pitilessly shot the Bodhisatta; when he dropped, the man prepared his bow to shoot the mother monkey. Cūḷanandiya saw this, and thought to himself, “That hunter wants to shoot my mother. Even if she only lives a day, she will have received the gift of life; I will give my life for hers.”

Accordingly, down he came from the tree, and said: “O man, don’t shoot my mother! I give my life for hers. Shoot me – take both us brothers, and spare our mother’s life!” The hunter consented, and Cūlānandiya squatted down within bowshot. The hunter shot this one too, and killed him, “It will do for my children at home,” thought he – and he shot the mother too; hung them all three on his carrying pole, and set his face homewards.

At that moment a thunderbolt fell upon the [2.142] house of this wicked man, and burnt up his wife and two children with the house: nothing was left but the roof and the bamboo uprights.

A man met him at the entrance to the village, and told him of it. Sorrow for his wife and children overcame him: down on the spot he dropped his pole with the game, and his bow, threw off his garments, and naked he went homewards, wailing with hands outstretched. Then the bamboo uprights broke, and fell upon his head, and crushed it. The earth yawned, flame rose from hell. As he was being swallowed up in the earth, he thought upon his master’s warning: {2.202} “Then this was the teaching that the brahmin Pārāsariya gave me!” and lamenting he uttered these verses:

1. “I call to mind my teacher’s words: so this was what he meant!
   Be careful you should nothing do of which you might repent.

2. Whatever a man does, the same he in himself will find;
   The good man, good; and evil he that evil has designed;
   And so our deeds are all like seeds, and bring forth fruit in kind.”

Lamenting thus, he went down into the earth, and came to life in the depths of hell.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, by which he showed how in other days, as then, Devadatta had been harsh, cruel, and merciless, he identified the Jātaka in these words, “In those days Devadatta was the hunter, Sāriputta was the famous teacher, Ānanda was Cūlānandiya, the noble lady Gotamī was the mother, and I was the monkey Nandiya.”
The Section with Two Verses – 841

Ja 223 Puṭabhättajātaka
The Story about the Parcel of Rice (2s)

In the present one wealthy man hides a gift of rice he has received on a journey from his wife and eats it all himself. The Buddha tells a story about a queen who was unable to give gifts to the ascetics, as the king did not support her well.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (pañḍitāmacca), the husband and wife = the same in the past (jayampatikā).

Past Compare: Ja 223 Puṭabhatta, Ja 333 Godha, Mvu ii p 91 Godha.

Keywords: Miserliness, Deceit.

“Honour for honour.” This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a landed proprietor.

Tradition has it that once a landowner who was a citizen of Sāvatthi did business with a landowner from the country. {2.203} Taking his wife with him, he visited this man, his debtor; but the debtor averred that he could not pay. The other, in anger, set out for home without having broken his fast. On the road, some people met him; and seeing how famished the man was, gave him food, bidding him share it with his wife. [2.143]

When he got this, he grudged his wife a share. So addressing her he said: “Wife, this is a well-known haunt of thieves, so you had better go in front.” Having thus got rid of her, he ate all the food, and then showed her the pot empty, saying: “Look here, wife! They gave me an empty pot!” She guessed that he had eaten it all up himself, and was much annoyed.

As they both passed by the monastery in Jetavana, they thought they would go into the park and get a drink of water. There sat the Teacher, waiting on purpose to see them, like a hunter on the trail, seated under the shade of his perfumed cell. He greeted then kindly, and said: “Lay sister, is your husband kind and loving?” “I love him, sir,” she replied, “but he does not love me; let alone other days, this very day he was given a pot of food on the way, and gave not a bit to me, but ate it all himself.” “Lay sister, so it has always been – you loving and kind, and he loveless; but when by the help of the wise he learns your worth, he will do you all honour.” Then, at her request, he told a story of the past.
In the past, while Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was the son of one of the king’s court. On coming of age he became the king’s adviser in things temporal and spiritual. It happened that the king was afraid of his son, lest he might injure him; and sent him away. Taking his wife, the son departed from that city, and came to a village of Kāsi, where he dwelt. By and by when the father died, his son hearing of it set out to go back to Benares, “That I may receive the kingdom which is my birthright,” said he. On his way one gave him a mess of pottage, saying: “Eat, and give to your wife also.” But he gave her none, and did eat it all himself. {2.204} Thought she, “A cruel man this, indeed!” and she was full of sorrow.

When he had come to Benares, and received his kingdom, he made her the queen consort; but thinking: “A little is enough for her,” he showed her no other consideration or honour, not so much as to ask her how she did.

“This queen,” thought the Bodhisatta, “serves the king well, and loves him; but the king spends not a thought upon her. I will make him show her respect and honour.”

So he came to the queen, and made salutation, and stood aside. “What is it, dear sir?” she asked.

“Lady,” he asked, “how can we serve you? Ought you not to give the elderly a piece of cloth or a dish of rice?”

“Dear sir, I never receive anything myself; what shall I give to you? When I received, did I not give? But now the king gives me nothing at all; let alone giving anything else, as he was going along the road he received a bowl of rice, and never gave me a bit – he ate it all himself.”

“Well, madam, will you be able to say something in the king’s presence?”

“Yes,” she replied. [2.144]

“Very well then. Today, when I stand before the king, when I ask my question do you give the same answer; this very day will I make your goodness known.” So the Bodhisatta went on before, and stood in the king’s presence. And she too went and stood near the king.
Then said the Bodhisatta, “Madam, you are very cruel. Ought you not to give the elderly a piece of cloth or a dish of food?” And she made answer, “Good sir, I myself receive nothing from the king; what can I give to you?”

“Are you not the queen consort?” said he.

“Good sir,” said she, “what boots the place of a queen consort, when no respect is paid? What will the king give me now? When he received a dish of rice on the road, he gave me none, but ate it all himself.” And the Bodhisatta asked him, “Is it so, O king?” And the king assented. When the Bodhisatta saw that the king assented, “Then lady,” said he, “why dwell here with the king after he has become unkindly? In the world, union without love is painful. While you dwell here, loveless union with the king will bring you sorrow. These folk honour him that honours, and when one honours not – as soon as you see it, you should go elsewhere; they that dwell in the world are many.” And he repeated the verses following:

1. “Honour for honour, love for love is due:
   Do good to him who does the same to you:
   Observance breeds observance; but ’tis plain
   None need help him who will not help again.

2. Return neglect for negligence, nor stay
   To comfort him whose love is passed away.
   The world is wide; and when the birds descry
   That trees have lost their fruit – away they fly.”

Hearing this, the king gave his queen all honour; and from that time forward they dwelt together in friendship and harmony. {2.206}

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he declared the Truths, and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths the husband and wife entered on the Fruit of the First Path. “The husband and wife are the same in both cases, and the wise counsellor was I myself.”

Ja 224 Kumbhīlajātaka

The Story about the Crocodile (2s)

Alternative Title: Kumbhilajātaka (Cst)
In the present Devadatta sets out to kill the Buddha, who replies that he did this in the past also, and tells a story of how, when he was a monkey, he outwitted a crocodile and escaped being eaten.

The Bodhisatta = the lord of the monkeys (vānarinda),
Devadatta = the crocodile (kumbhīla),
Ciñcamāṇavikā = the (crocodile's) wife (bhariyā).

Present Source: Ja 57 Vānarinda,
Quoted at: Ja 224 Kumbhīla,
Past Compare: Ja 57 Vānarinda, Ja 208 Suśumāra, Ja 224 Kumbhīla, Ja 342 Vānara, Cp 27 Kapirājacāriyā, Mvu iii p 40 Vānara (II).

Keywords: Trickery, Animals.

“O Ape.” [2.145] This story the Teacher told at the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta.502

Being informed of Devadatta’s murderous intent, the Teacher said: “This is not the first time, monks, that Devadatta has gone about seeking to kill me; he did just the same in bygone days, but failed to work his wicked will.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

In the past when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came to life again as a monkey. When full-grown, he was as big as a mare’s foal and enormously strong. He lived alone on the banks of a river, in the middle of which was an island whereon grew mangoes and breadfruits, and other fruit trees. And in mid-stream, halfway between the island and the riverbank, a solitary rock rose out of the water. Being as strong as an elephant, the Bodhisatta used to leap from the bank on to this rock and thence on to the island. Here he would eat his fill of the fruits that grew on the island, returning at evening by the way he came. And such was his life from day to day.

Now there lived in those days in that river a crocodile and his mate; and she, being with young, was led by the sight of the Bodhisatta journeying to and fro to conceive a longing for the monkey's heart to eat. So she begged her lord to catch the monkey for her. Promising that she should have her fancy, the crocodile went off and took his stand on the rock, meaning to catch the monkey on his evening journey home.

502 [Only this line and the two verses are given in the text. The first verse occurs also in Ja 57 Vānarindajātaka, from which I bring in the story.]

After ranging about the island all day, the Bodhisatta looked out at evening towards the rock and wondered why the rock stood so high out of the water. For the story goes that the Bodhisatta always marked the exact height of the water in the river, and of the rock in the water. So, when he saw that, though the water stood at the same level, the rock seemed to stand higher out of the water, he suspected that a crocodile might be lurking there to catch him. And, in order to find out the facts of the case, he shouted, as though addressing the rock, “Hi! Rock!” And, as no reply came back, he shouted three times, “Hi! Rock!” And as the rock still kept silence, the monkey called out, “How comes it, friend rock, that you won’t answer me today?”

“Oh!” thought the crocodile, “so the rock's in the habit of answering the monkey. I must answer for the rock today.” Accordingly, he shouted, “Yes, monkey; what is it?” “Who are you?” said the Bodhisatta. “I'm a crocodile.” “What are you sitting on that rock for? “To catch you and eat your heart.” As there was no other way back, the only thing to be done was to outwit the crocodile. So the Bodhisatta cried out, “There’s no help for it then but to give myself up to you. Open your mouth and catch me when I jump.”

Now you must know that when crocodiles open their mouths, their eyes shut. So, when this crocodile unsuspiciously opened his mouth, his eyes shut. And there he waited with closed eyes and open jaws! Seeing this, the wily monkey made a jump on to the crocodile's head, and thence, with a spring like lightning, gained the bank. When the cleverness of this feat dawned on the crocodile, he said: “Monkey, he that in this world possesses the four virtues overcomes his foes. And you, I think, possess all four.” And, so saying, he repeated this verse:

1. “Whose, O monkey-king, like you, combines
   Truth, foresight, fixed resolve, and fearlessness,
   Shall see his routed foemen turn and flee.
2. Without these blessings is no victory:
Truth, wisdom, self-control, and piety.”

And with this praise of the Bodhisatta, the crocodile betook himself to his own dwelling-place.

Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time then, monks, that Devadatta has gone about seeking to kill me; he did just the same in bygone days too.” And, having ended his lesson, the Teacher showed the connection and identified the Jātaka by saying: “Devadatta was the crocodile of those days, the brahmin-girl Ciñcā was the crocodile’s wife, and I myself the monkey-king.”

Ja 225 Khantivaṇṇanajātaka
The Story in Praise of Patience (2s)

Alternative Title: Khantivaṇṇajātaka (Cst)

In the present a courtier had an affair in the king of Kosala’s harem, and the king asked the Buddha advice as to what he should do. The Buddha told a story of courtier who was intriguing in the harem, while his attendant was intriguing with his own wife! When he complained about the attendant the king explained his own course of action was to be patient.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Keywords: Adultery, Forgiveness, Women.

“There is a man.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about the king of Kosala. A very useful subordinate intrigued in the harem. Even though he knew about the culprit, the king pocketed the affront, because the fellow was useful, and told the Teacher of it. The Teacher said: “Other kings in days long gone by have done the same,” and at his request, told the following story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, a man of his court fell into an intrigue in the king’s harem, and an attendant of this courtier did the same thing in the courtier’s house. The man could not endure to be thus affronted. So he led the other before the king, saying: “My lord, I have a servant who does all manner of work, and he has made me a cuckold: what must I do with him?” and with the question he uttered this first verse following

503 [cf. Ja 195 Pabbatūpattharajātaka.]

1. “There is a man within my house, a zealous servant too;
   He has betrayed my trust, O king! Say – what am I to do?” [2.146]

On hearing this, the king uttered the second verse:

2. “I too a zealous servant have; and here he stands, indeed!
   Good men, I know, are rare enow: so patience is my tip.”

The courtier saw that these words of the king were aimed at him; and for the future did do no wrong in the king’s house. And the servant likewise, having come to know that the matter had been told to the king, in the future did that thing no more.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “I was the king of Benares.” And the courtier on this occasion found out that the king had told of him to the Teacher, and never did such a thing again.

Ja 226 Kosiya Jātaka

The Story about the (Impatient) Owl (2s)

In the present the king of Kosala wants to go on an expedition with his army, but first he sought the counsel of the Buddha, who tells a story of an owl who came to the bamboo at the wrong time and was killed by a bunch of crows.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (panḍitāmacca),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

Present Source: Ja 176 Kalāyamutṭhi,
Quoted at: Ja 226 Kosiya.

Keywords: Contentment, Timing, Animals, Birds.
“There is a time.” [2.208] A story told by the Teacher at Jetavana, about the king of Kosala. This king started to quell a border rising at a bad season of the year. The circumstances have been described already.\(^{504}\)

One rainy season, disaffection broke out on his borders. The troops stationed there, after two or three battles in which they failed to conquer their adversaries, sent a message to the king. In spite of the season, in spite of the rains, he took the field, and encamped before Jetavana. Then he began to ponder. “‘Tis a bad season for an expedition; every crevice and hollow is full of water; the road is heavy: I’ll go visit the Teacher. He will be sure to ask ‘whither away;’ then I’ll tell him. It is not only in things of the future life that our Teacher protects me, but he protects in the things which we now see. So if my going is not to prosper, he will say ‘It is a bad time to go, sire;’ but if I am to prosper, he will say nothing.” So into Jetavana he came, and after greeting the Teacher sat down on one side.

“Whence come you, O king,” asked the Teacher, “at this unseasonable hour?” “Sir,” he replied, “I am on my way to quell a border rising; and I come first to bid you farewell.” To this the Teacher said: “So it happened before, that mighty monarchs, before setting out for war, have listened to the word of the wise, and turned back from an unseasonable expedition.”

The Teacher as before told the king a story.

In the past, the king of Benares having started for the field of war at an unseasonable time, set up a camp in his park. At that time an owl entered a thicket of bamboos, and hid in it. There came a flock of crows, “We will catch him,” they said, “so soon as he shall come out.” And they compassed it around. Out he came before his time, nor did he wait until the sun should set; and tried to make his escape. The crows surrounded him, and pecked him with their beaks till he fell to the ground. The king asked the Bodhisatta, “Tell me, wise sir, why are the crows attacking this owl?” And the Bodhisatta made answer, “They that leave their dwelling before the right time, great king, fall into just such misery as this. Therefore before the time one should not leave one’s [2.147] dwelling place.” And to make the matter clear, he uttered this pair of verses:

---

\(^{504}\) [Ja 176. I include the story here.]
1. “There is a time for everything: who forth from home will go
   One man or many, out of time, will surely meet some woe;
   As did the owl, unlucky fowl! Pecked dead by many a crow.

2. Who masters quite each rule and rite; who others’ weakness knows;
   Like wise owls, he will happy be, and conquer all his foes.” [2.209]

When the king heard this, he turned back home again.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Ānanda was then the king, and the wise courtier was I myself.”

Ja 227 Gūthapāṇajātaka

The Story about the Muckworm (2s)

In the present one youth harrasses the monks as they go round for alms, so much so they abandon the village. One monk rectifies the situation by giving him a good beating. The Buddha then tells a story of how in a previous life an elephant had killed a dung-beetle with excrement.

The Bodhisatta = the Devatā who lived in the thicket (vanasaṇḍe nivutthadevatā), the monk = the elephant (vāraṇa),
the handicapped man = the muckworm (gūthapāṇaka).

Keywords: Harrassment, Vanity, Devas, Animals.

“Well matched.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling at Jetavana, about one of the monks.

There stood at that time, about three-quarters of a league from Jetavana, a market town, where a great deal of rice was distributed by ticket, and special meals were given. Here lived an inquisitive lout, who pestered the young monks and novices who came to share in the distribution – [2.210] “Who are for solid food? Who for drink? Who for moist food?” And he made those who could not answer feel ashamed, and they dreaded him so much that they would not go to that village.

---

505 Gāvutaddhayojanamatte. It may possibly mean ‘an eighth.’
One day, a monk came to the ticket-hall, with the question, “Any food for distribution in such-and-such a village, sir?” “Yes, friend,” was the answer, “but there’s a roughneck here asking questions; if you can’t answer them, he abuses and reviles you. He is such a pest that nobody will go near the place.” “Sir,” said the other, “give me an order on the place, and I’ll humble him, and make him modest, and so influence him that whenever he sees you after this, he’ll feel inclined to run away.”

The monks agreed, and gave the necessary order. The monk walked to our village, and at the gate of it he put on his robe. The loafer spied him – was at him like a mad ram, with, “Answer me a question, monk!” “Layman, let me go first about the village for my broth, and then come back with it to the waiting hall.”

When he returned with his meal, the man repeated his question. The monk answered, “Leave me to finish my broth, to sweep the room, and to fetch my ticket’s worth of rice.” So he fetched the rice; then placing his bowl in this very man’s hands, he said: “Come, now I’ll answer your question.”

Then he led him outside the village, folded his outer robe, put it on his shoulder, and taking the bowl from the other, stood waiting for him to begin. The man said: “Monk, answer me one question.” “Very well, so I will,” said the monk; and with one blow he felled him to the ground, bruised his eyes, beat him, dropped filth in his face, and went off, with these parting words to frighten him, “If ever again you ask a question of any monk who comes to this village, I’ll see about it!” After this, he took to his heels at the mere sight of a monk.

By and by all this became known among the Saṅgha. One day they were talking about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Friend, I hear that monk So-and-so dropped filth in the face of that loafer, and left him!” The Teacher came in, and wanted to know what they were all talking about as they sat there. They told him. Said he, “Monks, this is not the first time this monk attacked the man with dirt, but he did just the same before.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, those citizens of the kingdoms of Aṅga and Magadha who were travelling from one land to the other, used to stay in a house on the marches of the two kingdoms, and there they drank liquor and ate the flesh of fish, and early in the morning they yoked their carts and went away. At the time when they came, a certain dung-beetle, led by the odour of dung, came to the place where they had drunken, and saw some liquor shed upon the ground, and for thirst he drank it, and returned to his lump of dung intoxicated. When he climbed upon it the moist dung gave way a little. “The world cannot hear my weight!” he bawled out. At that very instant a maddened elephant came to the spot, and smelling the dung went back in disgust. The beetle saw it. “That creature,” he thought, “is afraid of me, and see how he runs away! – I must fight with him!” and so he challenged him in the first verse:

1. “Well matched! For we are heroes both: here let us issue try:
Turn back, turn back, friend elephant! Why would you fear and fly?
Let Magadha and Aṅga see how great our bravery!”

The elephant listened, and heard the voice; he turned back towards the beetle, and said the second verse, by way of rebuke:

2. “Not with my feet will I kill you, nor with tusks, nor with trunk,
With excrement I will kill you, the rotten destroys the rotten!” (2.212)

And so, dropping a great piece of dung upon him, and making water, he killed him then and there; and scampered into the forest, trumpeting.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days, this lout was the dung-beetle, the monk in question was the elephant, and I was the Tree Devatā who saw it all from a clump of trees.”

Ja 228 Kāmanītajātaka
The Story about being Guided by Desire (2s)

In the present one brahmin, after careful tending his crops with the intention of giving a gift to the Buddha and the Saṅgha, loses all in all night’s flood. The Buddha then tells a story of the past in which a greedy king loses his chance to gain three kingdoms, before being taught the folly of desire, and putting his grief aside.

The Bodhisatta = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
the lustful brahmin = the king (of Benares) (rājā).

_____________________________

506 [This verse was translated into Latin in the original: Non pede, longinquave manu, non dentibus utar: Stercore, cui stercus cura, perisse decet.]
“Three forts.” [2.149] This story the Teacher told at Jetavana about a brahmin named Kāmanīta. The circumstances will be explained in the Twelfth Book, and the Kāmajātaka [Ja 467].

A brahmin, so they say, who dwelt at Sāvatthi, was felling trees on the bank of the Aciravatī, in order to cultivate the land. The Teacher, when he visited Sāvatthi for alms, perceiving his destiny, went out of his road to talk sweetly with him. “What are you doing, brahmin?” he asked. “O Gotama,” said the man, “I am cutting a space free for cultivation.” “Very good,” he replied, “go on with your work, brahmin.”

In the same manner the Teacher came and talked with him when the felled trunks were all away, and the man was clearing his acre, and again at plowing time, and at making the little embanked squares for water. Now on the day of sowing, the brahmin said: “Today, O Gotama, is my plowing festival. When this corn is ripe, I will give alms in plenty to the Saṅgha, with the Buddha at their head.” The Teacher accepted his offer, and went away. On another day he came, and saw the brahmin watching the corn. “What are you doing, brahmin?” asked he. “Watching the corn, O Gotama!” “Very good, brahmin,” said the Teacher, and away he went. Then the brahmin thought: “How often Gotama the ascetic comes this way! Without doubt he wants food. Well, food I will give him.” On the day when this thought came into his mind, when he went home, there he found the Teacher come also. Theret arose in the brahmin a wondrous great confidence.

By and by, when ripe was the corn, the brahmin resolved, tomorrow he would reap the field. But while he lay in bed, in the upper reaches of the Aciravatī the rain fell heavily; down came a flood, and carried the whole crop away to the sea, so that not one stalk was left. When the flood subsided, and the brahmin beheld the destruction of his crops, he had not the strength to stand; pressing his hand to his heart – for he was overcome with great sorrow – he went weeping home, and lay down lamenting.

In the morning the Teacher saw this brahmin overwhelmed with his woe, and he thought: “I will be the brahmin’s support.” So next day, after his alms-round in Sāvatthi, on his return from receipt of food he sent the monks back to their monastery, and himself with the junior who attended him visited the man’s house. When the brahmin heard of his coming, he took heart, thinking: “My friend must be come for a kindly talk.” He offered him a seat; the Teacher entering sat upon the seat indicated, and asked, “Why are you downhearted, brahmin? What has happened to displease you?” “O Gotama!” said the man, “from the time that I cut down the trees on the bank of the Aciravatī, you know what I have been doing. I have been going about, and promising gifts to you when that crop should be ripe: now a flood has carried off the whole crop, away to the sea, nothing is left at all! Grain has been destroyed to the amount of a hundred wagon-loads, and so I am deep in grief!” “Why, will what is lost come back for grieving?” “No, Gotama, that will it not.” “If that is so, why grieve? The wealth of beings in this world, or their corn, when they have it, they have it, and when it is gone, why, gone it is. No composite thing but is subject to destruction; do not brood over it.” Thus comforting him, the Teacher repeated the Kāma discourse as appropriate to his case. At the conclusion of the discourse, the mourning brahmin was established in the Fruit of the First Path. The Teacher having eased him of his pain, arose from his seat, and returned to the monastery.

All the town heard how the Teacher had found such a brahmin pierced with the pangs of grief, had consoled him and established him in the Fruit of the First Path.

The monks talked of it in the Dhamma Hall, “Hear, sirs! The One with Ten Powers made friends with a brahmin, grew intimate, took his opportunity to declare the Dhamma to him, when pierced with the pangs of grief, eased him of pain, and established him in the Fruit of the First Path!” The Teacher came in, and asked, “What do you speak of, monks, as you sit here together?” They told him. He replied, “This is not the first time, monks, I have cured his grief, but I did the same long, long ago,” and with these words he told a story of the past.

[The king of Benares had two sons.] And of these two sons the elder went to Benares, and became king; the youngest was the viceroy. He that was king was given over to the desire of riches, and the lust of the flesh, and was greedy of gain.

At the time, the Bodhisatta was Sakka, King of the Devas. And as he looked out upon Jambudīpa, and observed that the king of it was given over to these sensual desires, he said to himself, “I will chastise that king, and make him ashamed.” So taking the semblance of a young brahmin, he went to the king and looked at him. “What wants this young fellow?” the king asked.

Said he, “Great king, I see three towns, prosperous, fertile, having elephants, horses, chariots and infantry in plenty, full of ornaments of gold and fine gold. These may be taken with a very small army. I have come here to offer to get them for you!”

“When shall we go, young man?” asked the king. “Tomorrow, sire.” “Then leave me now; tomorrow early you shall go.”

“Good, my king, hasten to prepare the army!” And so saying [2.213] Sakka went back again to his own place.

Next day the king caused the drum to beat, and an army to be made ready; and having summoned his courtiers, he thus bespoke them: “Yesterday a young brahmin came and said that he would conquer for me three cities – Uttarapañcāla, Indapatta, and Kekaka. Wherefore now we will go along with that man and conquer those cities. Summon him in all haste!”

“What place did you assign him, my lord, to dwell in?” “I gave him no place to dwell in,” said the king. “But you gave him wherewith to pay for a lodging!” [2.150] “Nay, not even that.” “Then how shall we find him?” “Seek him in the streets of the city,” said the king.

They sought, but found him not. So they came before the king, and told him, “O king, we cannot see him.”

Great sorrow fell upon the king. “What glory has been snatched from me!” he groaned; his heart became hot, his blood became disordered, dysentery attacked him, the physicians could not cure him.

After the space of three or four days, Sakka meditated, and was aware of his illness. Said he, “I will cure him,” and in the semblance of a brahmin he went and stood at his door. He caused it to be told the king, “A brahmin physician is come to cure you.”

On hearing it, the king answered, “All the great physicians of the court have not been able to cure me. Give him a fee, and let him go.” Sakka listened, and made reply, “I want not even money for my lodging, nor will I take fee for my craft. I will cure him: let the king see me!”

“Then let him come in,” said the king, on receiving this message. Then Sakka went in, and wishing victory to the king, sat on one side. “Are you going to cure me?” the king asked.

He replied, “Even so, my lord.” “Cure me, then!” said the king. “Very good, sire. Tell me the symptoms of your disease, and how it came about – what you have eaten or drunken, to bring it on, or what you have heard or seen.”

“Dear friend, my disease was brought upon me by something that I heard.” Then the other asked, “What was it?” {2.214}

“Dear sir, there came a young brahmin who offered to win and give me power over three cities; and I gave him neither lodging, nor wherewithal to pay for one. He must have grown angry with me, and gone away to some other king. So when I bethought me how great a glory had been snatched away from me, this disease came upon me; cure, if you can, this which has come upon me for my covetousness.” And to make the matter clear he uttered the first verse:

1. “Three forts, each built high upon a mount,
   I want to take, whose names I here recount:507
   And there is one thing further that I need Cure me, O brahmin, me the slave of greed!”

Then Sakka said: “O king, by medicines made with roots you cannot [2.151] be cured, but you must be cured with the simple of knowledge,” and he uttered the second verse as follows: {2.215}

2. “There are, who cure the bite of a black snake;
   The wise heal those Amanussa-possessed.
   The slave of greed no doctor can make whole;
   What cure is there for the discontent soul?”

So spake the Great Being to explain his meaning, and he added this yet beyond, “O king, what if you were to get those three cities, then while you reigned over 507 The names of Pañcāla, Kuru, and Kekaka are given.

these four cities, could you wear four pairs of robes at once, eat out of four golden dishes, lie on four state beds? O king, one ought not to be mastered by desire. Desire is the root of all evil; when desire is increased, he that cherishes it is cast into the eight great hells, and the sixteen lowest hells, and into all kinds and manner of misery.’’

So the Great Being terrified the king with fear of hell and misery, and discoursed to him. And the king, by hearing his discourse, got rid of his heartbreak, and in a moment he became whole of his disease. {2.216} And Sakka, after giving him instruction, and establishing him in virtue, went away to the world of gods. And the king thenceforward gave alms and did good, and he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The monk who is a slave to his desires was at that time the king; and I myself was Sakka.”

Ja 229 Palāyijātaka

The Story about (the King) who Fled (2s)

Alternative Title: Palāyitajātaka (Cst)

In the present one ascetic goes about arguing with all he meets, when he comes to Jetavana he is intimidated by the size of the gate, and decides not to enter and argue. The Buddha tells a story of a mighty king who got up a huge army, but when he saw the gate of the city he intended to overthrow he was intimidated and decided to withdraw.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Taxila (Takkaśilarājā), the roaming wanderer = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Past Compare: Ja 229 Palāyi, Ja 230 Dutiyapalaśi.

Keywords: Overestimation, Vanity.

“Lo, my elephants.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a mendicant, with vagrant tastes.

He traversed the whole of Jambudīpa for the purpose of arguing, and found no one to contradict him. At last he got as far as Sāvatthi, and asked was there any one there who could argue with him. The people said: “There is one who could argue with a thousand such – all-wise, chief of men, the mighty Gotama, lord of the faith, who bears down all opposition, there is no adversary in all Jambudīpa who can dispute with him. As the billows break upon the shore, so all arguments break against his feet, and are dashed to spray.” Thus they described the qualities of the Buddha. [2.152]

“Where is he now?” asked the mendicant. “He is at Jetavana,” they replied. “Now I'll get up a debate with him!” said the mendicant. So attended by a large crowd he made his way to Jetavana. On seeing the gate towers of Jetavana, which prince Jeta had built at a cost of ninety millions of money, he asked whether that was the palace where the ascetic Gotama lived. The gateway of it, they said. “If this be the gateway, what will the dwelling be like!” he cried. “There’s no end to the perfumed chambers!” the people said. “Who could argue with such a monk as this?” he asked; and hurried off at once.

The crowd shouted for joy, and thronged into the park. “What brings you here before your time?” asked the Teacher. They told him what had happened. Said he, “This is not the first time, laymen, that he hurried away at the mere sight of the gateway of my dwelling. He did the same before.” And at their request, he told a story of the past. {2.217}

In the past, it befell that the Bodhisatta reigned king in Taxila, of the realm of Gandhāra, and Brahmadatta in Benares. Brahmadatta resolved to capture Taxila; wherefore with a great host he set forth, and took up a position not far from the city, and set his army in array, “Here be the elephants, here the horses, the chariots here, and here the footmen: thus do you charge and hurl with your weapons; as the clouds pour forth rain, so pour you forth a rain of arrows!” and he uttered this pair of verses:

1. “Lo, my elephants and horses, like the storm-cloud in the sky!
   Lo, my surging sea of chariots shooting arrow-spray on high!
   Lo, my host of warriors, striking sword in hand, with blow and thrust, Closing in upon the city, till their foes shall bite the dust!”

---

508 The Jetavana monastery is represented on the Bhārhut Stūpa (Cunningham, pl. LVII); for the gandhakūṭī, see pl. xxviii, fig. 3.
2. Rush against them – fall upon them! Shout the war-cry – loudly sing!
While the elephants in concert raise a clamorous trumpeting!
As the thunder and the lightning flash and rumble in the sky,
So be now your voice uplifted in the loud long battle-cry!” {2.218}

So cried the king. And he made his army march, and came before the gate of the city; and when he saw the towers on the city gate, he asked whether that was the king’s dwelling. “That,” they said, “is the gate tower.” “If the gate tower be such as this, of what sort will the king’s palace be?” he asked. And they replied, “Like to Vejayanta, the palace of Sakka!” On hearing it, the king said: “With so glorious a king we shall never be able to fight!” And having seen no more than the tower set upon the city gate, he turned and fled away, and came again to Benares.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Our mendicant wanderer was then the king of Benares, and I was the king of Taxila myself.”

Ja 230 Dutiyapalāyijātaka

The Second Story about (the King) who Fled (2s)

Alternative Title: Dutiyapalāyitajātaka (Cst)

In the present one ascetic goes about arguing with all he meets, when he meets the Buddha he is intimidated by the radiance of his face, and decides not to argue. The Buddha tells a story of a mighty king who got up a huge army, but when he saw the radiance of the face of the king he intended to overthrow he was intimidated and decided to withdraw.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
the roaming wanderer = the king of Gandhāra (Gandhārarājā).

Past Compare: Ja 229 Palāyi, Ja 230 Dutiyapalāyī.

Keywords: Overestimation, Vanity.

“Countless are my banners.” [2.153] {2.219} This story the Teacher told while living at Jetavana, about this same wanderer mendicant.

At that time, the Teacher, with a large company round him, sitting on the beautifully adorned throne of the truth, upon a vermillion dais, was discoursing like a young lion roaring with a lion’s roar. The mendicant, seeing the One with Ten Powers’ form like the form of Brahmā, his face like the glory of the full moon, and his forehead like a plate of gold, turned round where he had come, in the midst of the crowd, and ran off, saying: “Who could overcome a man like this?”

The crowd went in chase, then came back and told the Teacher. He said: “Not only now has this mendicant fled at the mere sight of my golden face; he did the same before.” And he told a story of the past.

In the past, the Bodhisatta was king in Benares, and in Taxila reigned a certain king of Gandhāra. This king, desiring to capture Benares, went and compassed the city about with a complete army of four divisions. And taking his stand at the city gate, he looked upon his army, and said he, “Who shall be able to conquer so great an army as this?” and describing his army, he uttered the first verse:

1. “Countless are my banners: rival none they own:
   Flocks of crows can never stem the rolling sea
   Never can the storm-blast beat a mountain down:
   So, of all the living none can conquer me!” (2.220)

Then the Bodhisatta disclosed his own glorious countenance, in fashion as the full moon; and threatening him, thus spoke, “Fool, babble not vainly! Now will I destroy your host, as a maddened elephant crushes a thicket of reeds!” and he repeated the second verse:

2. “Fool! And have you never yet a rival found?
   You are hot with fever, if you seek to wound
   Solitary savage elephants like me!
   As they crush a reed-stalk so will I crush thee!”

When the king of Gandhāra heard him threaten thus, he looked up, and beholding his wide forehead like a plate of gold, for fear of being captured himself he turned and ran away, and came again even unto his own city.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The vagrant wanderer was at that time the king of Gandhāra, and the king of Benares was I myself.”
Ja 231 Upāhanajātaka
The Story about the Shoes (2s)

In the present Devadatta repudiates the Buddha and become his foe, leading to his own destruction. The Buddha tells a story of an elephant trainer and his pupil, and how the latter judged himself of the same worth as the former, until he was shown to have less skill in front of the king.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
Devadatta = the pupil (antevāsika).

Keywords: Overestimation, Vanity.

“As when a pair of shoes.” [2.154] This story the Teacher told in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta. The monks gathered together in the Dhamma Hall, and began to discuss the matter. “Friend, Devadatta having repudiated his teacher, and become the foe and adversary of the Tathāgata, has come to utter destruction.” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were talking about as they sat there. They told him. The Teacher said: “Monks, this is not the first time that Devadatta has repudiated his teacher, and become my enemy, and come to utter destruction. The same thing happened before.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born as the son of an elephant trainer. When he grew up, he was taught all the art of managing the elephant. And there came a young villager from Kāsi, and was taught of him. Now when the future Buddhas teach any, they do not give a stingy dole of learning; but according to their own knowledge so teach they, keeping nothing back. So this youth learned all the branches of knowledge from the Bodhisatta, without omission; and when he had learned, said he to his master: {2.222} “Teacher, I will go and serve the king.”

“Good, my son,” said he; and he went before the king, and told him how that a pupil of his would serve the king. Said the king, “Good, let him serve me.” “Then do you know what fee to give?” said the Bodhisatta.

“A pupil of yours will not receive so much as you; if you receive a hundred, he shall have fifty; if you receive two, to him shall one be given.” So the Bodhisatta went home, and told all this to his pupil.
“Teacher,” said the youth, “all your knowledge do I know, piece for piece. If I shall have the like payment, I will serve the king; but if not, then I will not serve him.” And this the Bodhisatta told to the king.

Said the king, “If the young man could do even as you – if he is able to show skill for skill with you, he shall receive the like.” And the Bodhisatta told this to the pupil, and the pupil made answer, “Very good, I will.” “Tomorrow,” said the king, “do you make exhibition of your skill.” “Good, I will; let proclamation be made by beat of drum.” And the king caused it to be proclaimed, “Tomorrow the master and the pupil will [2.155] make show together of their skill in managing the elephant. Tomorrow let all that wish to see gather together in the courtyard of the palace, and see it.”

“My pupil,” thought the teacher to himself, “does not know all my resources.” So he chose an elephant, and in one night he taught him to do all things awry. He taught him to back when bidden go forward, and to go forward when told to back; to lie down when bidden to rise, and to rise when bidden to lie down; to drop when told to pick up, and to pick up when told to drop.

Next day mounting his elephant he came to the palace yard. And his pupil also was there, mounted upon a beautiful elephant. There was a great concourse of people. They both showed all their skill. But the Bodhisatta gave his elephant reverse orders; [2.223] “Go on!” said he, and it backed up, “Back up!” and it ran forward, “Stand up!” and it lay down, “Lie down!” and it stood up, “Pick it up!” and the creature dropped it, “Drop it!” and he picked it up. And the crowd cried, “Go to, you rascal! Do not raise your voice against your master! You do not know your own measure, and you think you can match yourself against him!” and they assailed him with clods and staves, so that he gave up the ghost then and there. And the Bodhisatta came down from his elephant, and approaching the king, addressed him thus:

“O mighty king! For their own good men get them taught; but there was one to whom his learning brought misery with it, like an ill-made shoe,” and he uttered these two verses:
1. “As when a pair of shoes which one has bought
For help and comfort cause but misery, Chafing the feet till they grow burning hot
And making them to fester by and by:

2. Even so an underbred ignoble man,
Having learned all that he can learn from you,
By your own teaching proves your very bane:
The lowbred churl is like the ill-made shoe.” \[2.224\]

The king was delighted, and heaped honours upon the Bodhisatta.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified this Jātaka as follows, “Devadatta was the pupil, and I myself was the teacher.”

Ja 232 Vīṇāṭhūṇajātaka

The Story about the (Broken) Lute (2s)

Alternative Title: Vīṇāguṇajātaka (Cst)

In the present a young woman seeing a bull honoured mistakenly thinks it is because of his hump, and seeks out a hunchbacked man to elope with. The Buddha tells a story of a similar happening in the past, and how she was brought home again.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasīṣeṭṭhi), the wealthy man’s daughter = the same in the past (sēṭṭhidhītā).

Keywords: False analogy, Appearances, Women.

“Your own idea.” \[2.156\] This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about a young lady.

She was the only daughter of a rich merchant of Sāvatthi. She noticed that in her father’s house a great fuss was made over a fine bull, and asked her nurse what it meant. “Who is this, nurse, that is honoured so?” The nurse replied that it was a right royal bull.

---

The commentator would take tam as for attānam, “he hurts himself,” not “thee,” but this is hardly possible. The verses do not seem to fit the story very exactly.
Another day she was looking from an upper storey down the street, when lo, she spied a hunchback. (2.225) Thought she, “In the cow tribe, the leader has a hump. I suppose it’s the same with men. That must be a right, royal man, and I must go and be his humble follower.” So she sent her maid to say that the merchant’s daughter wished to join herself to him, and he was to wait for her in a certain spot. She collected her treasures together, and disguising herself; left the mansion and went off with the hunchback.

By and by all this became known in the town and among the Saṅgha. In the Dhamma Hall, the monks discussed its bearings, “Friend, there is a merchant’s daughter who has eloped with a hunchback!” The Teacher came in, and asked what they were all talking about together. They told him. He replied, “This is not the first time, monks, that she has fallen in love with a hunchback. She did the same before.” And he told them a story.

In the past, while Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a rich man’s family in a certain market town. When he came of age, he lived as a householder, and was blessed with sons and daughters, and for his son’s wife he chose the daughter of a rich citizen of Benares, and fixed the day.

Now the girl saw in her home honour and reverence offered to a bull. She asked of her nurse, “What is that?” “A right royal bull,” said she. And afterward the girl saw a hunchback going through the street. “That must be a right royal man!” thought she; and taking with her the best of her belongings in a bundle, she went off with him.

The Bodhisatta also, having a mind to fetch the girl home, set out for Benares with a great company; and he travelled by the same road.

The pair went along the road all night long. All night long the hunch-back was overcome with thirst; and at the sunrise, he was attacked by colic, and great pain came upon him. So he went off the road, dizzy with pain, and fell down, like a broken lute-stick, huddled together; the girl too sat down at his feet. The Bodhisatta observed her sitting at the hunch-back’s feet, and recognised her. Approaching, he talked with her, repeating the first verse: (2.226)
1. “Your own idea! This foolish man can’t move without a guide,
This foolish hunchback! ’Tis not you should be by his side.” [2.157]

And hearing his voice, the girl answered by the second verse:

2. “I thought the crookback king of men, and loved him for his worth,
Who, like a lute with broken strings, lies huddled on the earth.”

And when the Bodhisatta perceived that she had only followed him in disguise, he caused her to bathe, and adorned her, and took her into his carriage and went to his home.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The girl is the same in both cases; and the merchant of Benares was I myself.”

Ja 233 Vikaṇṭakajātaka

The Story about the Barb (2s)

Alternative Title: Vikaṇṭajātaka (Cst)

In the present one monk is overcome with desire and about to fall away. The Buddha tells a story about a crocodile who, hearing the king call the fish to their meal, came to feed on the fish for himself, was harpooned and eventually died.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā),
the Buddha’s disciples = the fish (maccha),
Devadatta = the crocodile (suṇīsumāra).

Keywords: Attachment, Greed, Animals, Fish.

“The barb is in your back.” [2.227] This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about a discontented monk.

He was brought into the Dhamma Hall, and asked if he were really discontent; to which he replied yes. When asked why, he replied, “Because of the quality of desire.” The Teacher said: “Desire is like two-barbed arrows for getting lodgement in the heart; once there, they kill, as the barbed arrows killed the crocodile.” Then he told them a story.

In the past, the Bodhisatta was king of Benares, and a good king he was. One day he entered his park, and came to the side of a lake. And those who were clever with dance and song began to dance and to sing. The fish and turtles, eager to hear the sound of song, flocked together and went along beside the king. And the king, seeing a mass of fish as long as a palm trunk, asked his courtiers, “Now why do these fish follow me?” Said the courtiers, “They are coming to offer their services to their lord.”

The king was pleased at this saying, that they were come to serve him, and ordered rice to be given to them regularly. At the time of feeding some of the fish came, and some did not; and rice was wasted. They told the king of it. “Henceforward,” said the king, “at the time for [2.158] the giving of rice let a drum be sounded; and at the sound of the drum, when the fish flock together, give the food to them.” From thenceforth the feeder caused a drum to sound, and when they flocked together gave rice to the fish. As they were gathered thus, eating the food, came a crocodile and ate some of the fish. The feeder told the king. The king listened. “When the crocodile is eating the fish,” said he, “pierce him with a harpoon, and capture him.” [2.228]

“Good,” the man said. And he went aboard a boat, and so soon as the crocodile was come to eat the fish, he pierced him with a harpoon. It went into his back. Mad with pain, the crocodile went off with the harpoon. Perceiving that he was wounded, the feeder spake to him by this verse:

1. “The barb is in your back, go where you may.
The beat of drum, calling my fish to feed,
Brought you, pursuing, greedy, on the way
Which brought you also to your direst need.”

When the crocodile got to his own place, he died.

To explain this matter, the Teacher having become perfectly enlightened spake the second verse as follows:

2. “So, when the world tempts any man to wrong
Who knows no law but his own will and wish,
He perishes amid his friends and kin,
Even as the crocodile that ate the fish.” [2.229]

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths, the discontented monk reached the Fruit of the First Path, “In those days I was the king of Benares.”
The Section with Two Verses – 866

Ja 234 Asitābhujātaka
The Story about (Princess) Asitābhū (2s)

Alternative Title: Asitābhujātaka (Cst)

In the present one young woman is despised by her husband, listens to Dhamma, enters the path, ordains and becomes Awakened. The Buddha tells a story in which she gained high Attainments in a similar story from a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasā), the husband and wife = the prince and princess (rājaputto ca rājadhītā ca).

Keywords: Aspiration, Attainment, Devas, Women.

“Now desire has gone.” This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, about a young girl.

Tradition tells us that a certain man at Sāvatthi, a servant of the Teacher's two chief disciples, had one beautiful and happy daughter. When she grew up, she married into a family as good as her own. The husband, without consulting anybody, used to enjoy himself elsewhere at his own sweet will. She took no notice of his disrespect; but invited the two chief disciples, made them presents, and listened to their preaching, until she reached the Fruit of the First Path. After this she spent all her time in the enjoyment of the Path and the Fruit; at last, thinking that as her husband did not want her, there was no need for her to remain in the household, she determined to embrace the ascetic life. She informed her parents of her plan, carried it out, and became a saint.

Her story became known amongst the Saṅgha; and one day they were discussing it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, the daughter of such and such a family strives to attain the highest good. Finding that her husband did not care for her, she made rich presents to the chief disciples, listened to their preaching, and gained the Fruit of the First Path; she took leave of her parents, became an ascetic, and then a saint. So, friend, the girl sought the highest good.” While they were talking, the Teacher came in and asked what it was all about. They told him. He said: “This is not the first time, monks, that she seeks the highest; she did so in olden days as well.” And he told a story of the past.
In the past, when Brahmadatta was king in Benares, the Bodhisatta was living as an ascetic, in the Himālayas region; and he had cultivated the Super Knowledges and Attainments. Then the king of Benares, observing how magnificent was the pomp of his son prince Brahmadatta, was filled with suspicion, and banished his son from the realm. [2.230]

The youth with his wife Asitābhū made their way to the Himālayas, and took up his abode in a hut of leaves, with fish to eat, and all manner of wild fruits. He saw a woodland Kinnarī, and became enamoured of her. “Her will I make my wife!” said he, and not thinking of Asitābhū, he followed after her steps. His wife seeing that he followed after the Kinnarī, was angry. “The man cares nought for me,” she thought, “what have I to do with him?” So she came to the Bodhisatta, and did him reverence: she learned what she must needs do to be initiated, and by focusing on the Meditation Object, she developed the Super Knowledges and Attainments, bade the Bodhisatta farewell, and returning stood at the door of her hut of leaves.

Now Brahmadatta followed the Kinnarī, but saw not by what way she went; and baulked of his desire he set his face again for the hut. Asitābhū saw him coming, and rose up in the air; and poised upon a plane in the air of the colour of a precious stone, she said to him, “My young lord! ’Tis through you that I have attained this Absorption!” and she uttered the first verse:

1. “Now desire has gone,
   Thanks to you, and found its ending:
   Like a tusk, once sawn,
   None can make it one by mending.” [2.160]

So saying, as he looked, she rose up and departed to another place. And when she had gone, he uttered the second verse, lamenting: [2.231]

2. “Greed that knows no stay,
   Lust, the senses all confusing,
   Steals our good away,
   Even as now my wife I’m losing.”

And having moaned in this verse, he dwelt alone in the forest, and at his father’s death he received the sovereignty.
After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “These two people were then the prince and princess, and I was the ascetic.”

Ja 235 Vacchanakhajātaka

The Story about (the Wanderer) Vacchanakha (2s)

In the present a supporter of Ven. Ānanda's tries to tempt him back to the lay life by offering him half his wealth. Ven. Ānanda refuses though, as the household life is full of suffering. The Buddha tells a story of similar events which unfolded in a previous life.

The Bodhisatta = (the wanderer) Vacchanakha,
Roja the Mallian = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasīṣṭṭhi).

Keywords: Attachment, Desire.

“Houses in the world are sweet.” This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about Roja the Mallian.

We learn that this man, who was a lay friend of Ānanda’s, sent the elder a message that he should come to him. The elder took leave of the Teacher, and went. He served the elder with all sorts of food, and sat down on one side, engaging him in a pleasant conversation. Then he offered the elder a share of his house, tempting him by the five channels of desire. “Ānanda, sir, I have at home great store of live and dead stock. I will divide it and give you half; let us live in one house together!” The elder declared to him the suffering which is involved in desire; then rose from his seat, and returned to the monastery.

When the Teacher asked whether he had seen Roja, he replied that he had. “What did he say to you?” “Sir, Roja invited me to return to the world; then I explained to him the suffering involved in desires and the worldly life.” The Teacher said: “Ānanda, this is not the first time that Roja the Mallian has invited ascetics to return to the world; he did the same before,” and then, at his request, he told a story of the past. {2.232}

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was one of a family of brahmins who lived in a certain market town. Coming to years, he took up the ascetic life, and dwelt for a long time amid the Himālayas.

He went to Benares to purchase salt and seasoning, and lived in the king’s grounds; next day he entered Benares. [2.161]
Now a certain rich man of the place, pleased at his behaviour, took him home, gave him to eat, and receiving his promise to abide with him, caused him to dwell in the garden and attended to his wants. And they conceived a friendship each for the other.

One day, the rich man, by reason of his love and friendship for the Bodhisatta, thought this within himself, “The life of an ascetic is unhappy. I will persuade my friend Vacchanakha to unfrock himself; I will part my wealth in two, and give half to him, and we both will dwell together.”

So one day, when the meal was done, he spake sweetly to his friend and said: “Good Vacchanakha, unhappy is the ascetic’s life; ’tis pleasant to live in a house. Come now, let us both together take our pleasure as we will.” So saying, he uttered the first verse:

1. “Houses in the world are sweet,
   Full of food, and full of treasure;
   There you have your fill of meat –
   Eating, drinking at your pleasure.”

The Bodhisatta on hearing him, thus replied, “Good sir, from ignorance you have become greedy in desire, and call the householder’s life good, and the life of the ascetic bad; listen now, and I will tell you how bad is the householder’s life,” and he uttered the second verse: {2.233}

2. “He that has houses peace can never know,
   He lies and cheats, he must deal many a blow
   On others’ shoulders, nought this fault can cure:
   Then who into a house would willing go?”

With these words the great Buddha told the defects of a householder’s life, and went into the garden again.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Roja the Mallian was the Benares merchant, and I was Vacchanakha the mendicant.”
Ja 236 Bakajātaka

The Story about the (Deceitful) Heron (2s)

In the present one deceitful monk is brought to the Buddha, who tells a story of how a heron had stood in the water trying to fool the fish into believing he was no threat to them, only to be discovered by the king of the fish.

The Bodhisatta = the king of the fish (maccharājā),
the monk = the deceitful heron (baka).

Keywords: Deceit, Treachery, Animals, Birds.

“See that twice-born bird.” This story the Teacher told while staying in Jetavana, about a deceitful person. When he was brought before the Teacher, the Teacher said: “Monks, he was a deceitful person of old just as he is now,” and told the following story. [2.162] [2.234]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a fish in a certain pond in the Himālayas region, and a great shoal went with him. Now a crane desired to eat the fish. So in a place near the pond he drooped his head, and spread out his wings, and looked vacantly, vacantly at the fish, waiting till they were off their guard. At the same moment the Bodhisatta with his shoal came to that place in search of food. And the shoal of fish on seeing the crane uttered the first verse:

1. “See that twice-born bird, how white
Like a water-lily seeming;
Wings outspread to left and right
Oh, how pious! Dreaming, dreaming!”

Then the Bodhisatta looked, and uttered the second verse:

510 “A crane’s sleep” is an Indian proverb for trickery.
511 dijo is used of a bird as born in the egg and from the egg. It is also applied to brahmins, and so conveys an additional notion of piety.
2. “What he is you do not know,
   Or you would not sing his praises.
   He is our most treacherous foe;
   That is why no wing he raises.”

Thereupon the fish splashed in the water and drove the crane away.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “This deceitful person was the crane, and I was the chief of the shoal of fish.”

Ja 237 Sāketajātaka

The Story about (the Brahmin) Sāketa (2s)

In the present an old brahmin greets the Buddha as his son, and calling his wife she too talks about him as her son. The Buddha tells how those who have been dear to each other in previous lives are dear also in their present lives.

The Bodhisatta = the son (putta),
the husband and wife = the brahmin and brahmini (brāhmaṇo ca brāhmaṇī ca).

Present and Past Source: Ja 68 Sāketa,
Quoted at: Ja 237 Sāketa,
Present and Past Compare: Dhp-a XVII.5 Sāketabrāhmaṇa.

Keywords: Attraction, Connection.

“Why are hearts cold.” This story the Teacher told during a stay near Sāketa, about a brahmin named Sāketa. Both the circumstances that suggested the story and the story itself have already been given in the First Book.512 [2.163]

This story was told by the Teacher, while at Añjanavana, about a certain brahmin. Tradition says that when the Fortunate One with his disciples was entering the city of Sāketa, an old brahmin of that place, who was going out, met him in the gateway. Falling at the One with Ten Powers' feet, and clasping him by the ankles, the old man cried, “Son, is it not the duty of children to cherish the old age of their parents? Why have you not let us see you all this long time? At last I have seen you; come, let your mother see you too.” So saying, he took the Teacher with him to his house; and there the Teacher sat upon the seat prepared for him, with his disciples around him. Then came the brahmin’s wife, and she too fell at the feet of the Fortunate One, crying, “My son, where have you been all this time? Is it not the duty of children to comfort their parents in their old age?” Hereon, she called to her sons and daughters that their brother was come, and made them salute the Buddha. And in their joy the aged pair showed great hospitality to their guests. After his meal, the Teacher recited to the old people the Sutta concerning old-age; and, when he had ended, both husband and wife won fruition of the Second Path. Then rising up from his seat, the Teacher went back to Añjanavana.

512 [Ja 68. I include the story here.]

Meeting together in the Dhamma Hall, the monks fell to talking about this thing. It was urged that the brahmin must have been well aware that Suddhodana was the father, and Mahāmāyā the mother, of the Tathāgata; yet none the less, he and his wife had claimed the Tathāgata as their own son – and that with the Teacher’s assent. What could it all mean? Hearing their talk, the Teacher said: “Monks, the aged pair were right in claiming me as their son.” And so saying, he told this story of the past.

Monks, in ages past this brahmin was my father in 500 successive births, my uncle in a like number, and in 500 more my grandfather. And in 1500 successive births his wife was respectively my mother, my aunt, and my grandmother. So I was brought up in 1500 births by this brahmin, and in 1500 by his wife. {2.235}

And when the Tathāgata had gone to the monastery, the monk asked, “How, sir, did the love begin?” and repeated the first verse:

1. “Why are hearts cold to one – O Buddha, tell! And love another so exceeding well?”

The Teacher explained the nature of love by the second verse:

2. “Those love they who in other lives were dear, As sure as grows the lotus in the mere.”

After this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “These two people were the brahmin and his wife in the story; and I was their son.”
The Section with Two Verses – 873

Ja 238 Ekapadajātaka
The Story about One Word (2s)

In the present one boy asks his father a question about the ‘Door,’ and his father takes him to the Buddha to get the answer. The Buddha tells a story about how a similar question was asked in the past, and how he as Bodhisatta had answered it.

The Bodhisatta = the wealthy man of Benares (Bārāṇasīsēṭṭhi),
the son = the same in the past (putta).

Keywords: Skill, Brevity.

“Tell me one word.” [2.236] This story the Teacher told in Jetavana, about a certain landowner.

We are told that there was a landowner who lived at Sāvatthi. One day, his son sitting on his hip asked him what is called the “Door” question. He replied, “That question requires a Buddha; nobody else can answer it.” So he took his son to Jetavana, and saluted the Teacher. “Sir,” said he, “as my son sat on my hip, he asked me the question called the ‘Door.’ I didn’t know the answer, so here I am to ask you to give it.” Said the Teacher, “This is not the first time, layman, that the lad has been a seeker after the way to accomplish his ends, and asked wise men this question; he did so before, and wise men in olden days gave him the answer; but by reason of a multitude of rebirths, he has forgotten it.” And at his request the Teacher told a tale of the olden time.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta came into this world as a rich merchant’s son. He grew up, and when in course of time the father died, he took his father’s place as a merchant. [2.164]

And his son, a young boy, sitting on his hip, asked him a question, “Father,” said he, “tell me a thing in one word which embraces a wide range of meaning,” and he repeated the first verse:

_____________________________________

513 This question referred to the means of entering on the Paths.
“Tell me one word that all things comprehends: By what, in short, can we attain our ends?”

His father replied with the second:

“One thing for all things precious – that is skill: Add virtue and add patience, and you will Do good to friends and to your foes do ill.” (2.237)

Thus did the Bodhisatta answer his son’s question. The son used the way which his father pointed out to accomplish his purposes, and by and by he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher declared the Truths and identified the Jātaka, at the conclusion of the Truths father and son reached the Fruit of the First Path, “This man was then the son, and I was the merchant of Benares myself.”

Ja 239 Haritamātajātaka
The Story about the Green Frog (2s)

Alternative Title: Haritamaṇḍūkajātaka (Cst)

In the present Ajātasattu, after killing his father, finds himself at war with his uncle, and victory goes back and forth. The Buddha tells a story of a water snake who used to eat fish, but when caught in a fish trap, was set upon and killed by the fish.

The Bodhisatta = the black frog (nīlamaṇḍūka), Ajātasattu = the poisonous water snake (udakāsīvisa).

Keywords: Relative strength, Position, Animals, Fish.

“When I was in their cage.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in the Bamboo Grove, about Ajātasattu.

Mahākosala, the king of Kosala’s father, when he married his daughter to king Bimbisāra, had given her a village in Kāsi to support her. After Ajātasattu murdered Bimbisāra, his father, the queen very soon died of love for him. Even after his mother's death, Ajātasattu still enjoyed the revenues of this village. But the king of Kosala determined that no parricide should have a village which was his by right of inheritance, and made war upon him. Sometimes the uncle got the best of it, and sometimes the nephew. And when Ajātasattu was victor, he raised his banner and marched through the country back to his capital in triumph; but when he lost, all downcast he returned without letting any one know.

It happened on a day that the monks sat talking about it in the Dhamma Hall.
“Friend,” so one would say, “Ajātasattu is delighted when he beats his uncle, and when he loses he is cast down.” The Teacher, entering the Hall, asked what they were discussing this time; \{2.238\} and they told him. He said: “Monks, this is not the first time that the man has been happy when he conquered, and miserable when he did not.” And he told them a story. [2.165]

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta became a green frog. At the time people set wicker cages in all pits and holes of the rivers, to catch fish withal. In one cage were a large number of fish. And a water-snake, eating fish, went into the trap himself. A number of the fish thronging together fell to biting him, until he was covered with blood. Seeing no help for it, in fear of his life he slipped out of the mouth of the cage, and lay down full of pain on the edge of the water. At the same moment, the green frog took a leap and fell into the mouth of the trap. The snake, not knowing to whom he could appeal, asked the frog that he saw there in the trap, “Friend frog, are you pleased with the behaviour of yonder fish?” and he uttered the first verse:

1. “When I was in their cage, the fish did bite Me, though a snake. Green frog, does that seem right?”

Then the frog answered him, “Yes, friend snake, it does: why not? If you eat fish which get into your demesne, \{2.239\} the fish eat you when you get into theirs. In his own place, and district, and feeding ground no one is weak.” So saying, he uttered the second verse:

2. “Men rob as long as they can compass it;
   And when they cannot – why, the biter's bit!”

The Bodhisatta having pronounced his opinion, all the fish observing the snake’s weakness, cried, “Let us seize our foe!” and came out of the cage, and did him to death then and there, and then departed.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Ajātasattu was the water-snake, and the green frog was I.”
The Story about (the Unjust King) Mahāpiṅgala (2s)

In the present, after attacking the Buddha multiple times, Devadatta is finally swallowed up by the earth and everyone rejoices. The Buddha tells a story of how one vicious king’s death was celebrated except by one porter, who feared hell would reject him and he might come to life again.

Devadatta = (the unjust king) Mahāpiṅgala, the Bodhisatta = his son (putta).

Keywords: Fear, Cruelty, Devas.

“The tawny king.” This story the Teacher told at the Jetavana, about Devadatta the heretic.

Devadatta for nine months had tried to compass the destruction of the future Buddha, and had sunk down into the earth by the gateway of Jetavana. [2.166]

Then they that dwelt at Jetavana and in all the country round about were delighted, saying: “Devadatta the enemy of Buddha has been swallowed up in the earth: the adversary is slain, and the Teacher has become perfectly Awakened!” (2.240) And hearing these words spoken many a time and oft, the people of all the continent of Jambudīpa, and all the Yakkhas, and Bhūtas, and Devas were delighted likewise.

One day, all the monks were talking together in the Dhamma Hall, and thus would they say, “Monk, since Devadatta sank into the earth, what a number of people are glad, saying, Devadatta is swallowed up by the earth!” The Teacher entered, and asked, “What are you all talking about here, monks?” They told him. Then said he, “This is not the first time, O monks, that multitudes have rejoiced and laughed aloud at the death of Devadatta. Long ago they rejoiced and laughed as they do now.” And he told them a story.

In the past reigned at Benares a wicked and unjust king named Mahāpiṅgala, the tawny king, who did sinfully after his own will and pleasure. With taxes and fines, and many mutilations and robberies, he crushed the folk as it were sugar-cane in a mill; he was cruel, fierce, ferocious. For other people he had not a grain of pity; at home he was harsh and implacable towards his wives, his sons and daughters, to his brahmin courtiers and the householders of the country. He was like a speck of dust that falls in the eye, like gravel in the broth, like a thorn sticking in the heel.

Now the Bodhisatta was a son of king Mahāpiṅgala. After this king had reigned for a long time, he died. When he died all the citizens of Benares were overjoyed and laughed a great laugh; they burnt his body with a thousand cartloads of logs, and quenched the place of burning with thousands of jars of water, and consecrated the Bodhisatta to be king: they caused a drum of rejoicing to beat about the streets, for joy that they had got them a righteous king. They raised flags and banners, and decked out the city; at every door was set a pavilion, and scattering parched corn and flowers, they sat them down upon the decorated platforms under fine canopies, and did eat and drink. The Bodhisatta himself sat upon a fine divan on a great raised dais, in great magnificence, with a white parasol stretched above him. The courtiers and householders, the citizens and the doorkeepers stood around their king.

But one doorkeeper, standing not far from the king, was sighing and sobbing. “Good Porter,” said the Bodhisatta, observing him, “all the people are making merry for joy that my father is dead, but you stand weeping. Come, was my father good and kind to you?” And with the question he uttered the first verse: [2.167]

1. “The tawny king was cruel to all men;
   Now he is dead, all freely breathe again.
   Was he, the yellow-eyed, so very dear?
   Or, porter, why do you stand weeping here?”

The man heard, and answered, “I am not weeping for sorrow that Piṅgala is dead. My head would be glad enough. For king Piṅgala, every time he came down from

---

514 -jaṅghakahāpaṇādigahanena I take to mean ‘the taking away of legs, money, etc.’ Possibly jaṅgha (taking it independently) may mean something like ‘boot’ or ‘stocks,’ but I can find no authority for this. [It means taking away people (jaṅgha) and money (kahāpaṇa).]
the palace, or went up into it, would give me eight blows over the head with his fist, like the blows of a blacksmith’s hammer. So when he goes down to the other world, he will deal eight blows on the head of Yama, the gatekeeper of hell, as though he were striking me. Then the people there will cry: ‘He is too cruel for us!’ And will send him up again. And I fear he will come and deal fisticuffs on my head again, and that is why I weep.” To explain the matter he uttered the second verse:§15 [2.242]

2. “The tawny king was anything but dear:
   It is his coming back again I fear.
   What if he beat the king of death, and then
   The king of death should send him back again?”

Then said the Bodhisatta, “That king has been burnt with a thousand cartloads of wood; the place of his burning has been soaked with water from thousands of pitchers, and the ground has been dug up all round; beings that have gone to the other world, except by force of fate,§16 do not return to the same bodily shape as they had before; do not be afraid!” To comfort him, he repeated the following verse:

   “Thousands of loads of wood have burnt him quite,
   Thousands of pitchers quenched what still did burn;
   The earth is dug about to left and right
   Fear not – the king will never more return.”

After that, the porter took comfort. And the Bodhisatta ruled in righteousness; and after giving gifts and doing other good acts, he passed away to fare according to his deeds.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Devadatta was Piṅgala; and his son was I myself.”

§15 [Additional note from Vol. IV:] For the second and third verses compare Dhp p. 149.

§16 Reading aañatra gativasā, ‘except by the power of rebirth.’
Ja 241 Sabbadāṭhajātaka
The Story about (the Jackal) Sabbadāṭha (2s)

Alternative Title: Sabbadāṭhijātaka (Cst)

In the present Devadatta is prospering, until the Buddha overcame the elephant Nāḷāgiri, which was sent to kill him, at which point his reputation faded. The Buddha tells a story of a jackal who learned a spell and subdued the animal kingdom, until he was tricked into bringing about his own destruction.

The Bodhisatta = the family priest (purohita),
Sāriputta = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Devadatta = the jackal (sigāla).

Keywords: Fraud, Spells, Animals.

“Even as the jackal.” [2.168] This story the Teacher told while staying in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta.

Devadatta, having won favour in the eyes of Ajātasattu, yet could not make the repute and support which he received last any time. Ever since they saw the miracle done when Nāḷāgiri was sent against him, the reputation and receipts of Devadatta began to fall off. (2.243)

So one day, the monks were all talking about it in the Dhamma Hall, “Monks, Devadatta managed to get reputation and support, yet could not keep it up. This happened in olden days in just the same way.” And then he told them a story.

In the past, Brahmadatta was king of Benares, and the Bodhisatta was his family priest; and he had mastered the three Vedas and the eighteen branches of knowledge. He knew the mantra entitled ‘Of subduing the world.’

One day, the Bodhisatta thought that he would recite this spell; so he sat down in a place apart upon a flat stone, and there went through his reciting of it. It is said

---

517 A great elephant was let loose for the purpose of destroying the Buddha, but only did him reverence: Cullavagga, vii. 3. 11 (Sacred Books of the East, Vinaya Texts, iii. 247); Hardy, Manual of Buddhism, p. 320; Milindapañha iv. 4. 30 (translation in Sacred Books of the East, i. 288).
that this spell could be taught to no one without use of a special rite; for which reason he recited it in the place just described. It so happened that a jackal lying in a hole heard the spell at the time that he was reciting it, and got it by heart. We are told that this jackal in a previous existence had been some brahmin who had learned the charm ‘Of subduing the world.’

The Bodhisatta ended his recitation, and rose up, saying: “Surely I have that spell by heart now.” Then the jackal arose out of his hole, and cried, “Ho, brahmin! I have learned the spell better than you know it yourself!” and off he ran. The Bodhisatta set off in chase, and followed some way, crying, “That jackal will do a great mischief – catch him, catch him!” But the jackal got clear off into the forest.

The jackal found a female jackal, and gave her a little nip upon the body. “What is it, master?” she asked. “Do you know me,” he asked, “or do you not?”518 “I do not know you.” He repeated the spell, and thus got under his orders several hundreds of jackals, and gathered round him all the elephants and horses, lions and tigers, swine and deer, and all other fourfooted creatures; and their king he became, under the title of Sabbadāṭha, or All-tusk, and the she-jackal he made his consort. On the back of two elephants stood a lion, and on the lion’s back sat Sabbadāṭha, the jackal king, along with his consort the she-jackal; and great honour was paid to them.

Now the jackal was tempted by his great honour, and became puffed up with pride, and he resolved to capture the kingdom of Benares. So with all the fourfooted creatures in his train, he came to a place near to Benares. His host covered twelve leagues of ground. From his position there he sent a message to the king, “Give up your kingdom, or fight for it.” The citizens of Benares, smitten with terror, shut close their gates and stayed within.

Then the Bodhisatta drew near the king, and said to him, “Fear not, mighty king! Leave me the task of fighting with the jackal king, Sabbadāṭha. Except only me, no one is able to fight with him at all.” Thus he gave heart to the king and the citizens. “I will ask him at once,” he went on, “what he will do in order to take the 518 Perhaps ājānāmi, “I do know you.”

city.” So he mounted the tower over one of the gates, and cried out, “Sabbadāṭha, what will you do to get possession of this realm?”

“I will cause the lions to roar, and with the roaring I will frighten the multitude: thus will I take it!”

“Oh, that’s it,” thought the Bodhisatta, and down he came from the tower. He made proclamation by beat of drum that all the dwellers in the great city of Benares, over all its twelve leagues, must stop up their ears with flour. The multitude heard the command; they stopped up their own ears with flour, so that they could not hear each other speak: nay, they even did the same to their cats and other animals.

Then the Bodhisatta went up a second time into the tower, and cried out, “Sabbadāṭha!” “What is it, brahmin?” said he. “How will you take this realm?” he asked. “I will cause the lions to roar, and I will frighten the people, and destroy them; thus will I take it!” he said.

“You will not be able to make the lions roar; these noble lions, with their tawny paws and shaggy manes, will never do the bidding of an old jackal like you! The jackal, stubborn with pride, answered, “Not only will the other lions obey me, but I’ll even make this one, upon whose back I sit, roar alone!”

“Very well,” said the Bodhisatta, “do it if you can.” So he tapped with his foot on the lion which he sat upon, to roar. [2.170]

And the lion resting his mouth upon the elephant’s temple, roared thrice, without any manner of doubt. The elephants were terrified and dropped the jackal down at their feet; they trampled upon his head and crushed it to atoms. Then and there Sabbadāṭha perished. And the elephants, hearing the roar of the lion, were frightened to death, and wounding one another, they all perished there. The rest of the creatures, deer and swine, down to the hares and cats, perished then and there, all except the lions; and these ran off and took to the woods. There was a heap of carcases covering the ground for twelve leagues.

The Bodhisatta came down from the tower, and had the gates of the city thrown open. By beat of drum he caused proclamation to be made throughout the city, “Let all the people take the flour from out of their ears, and they that desire meat, meat let them take!” The people all ate what fresh meat they could, and the rest they dried and preserved.

It was at this time, according to tradition, that people first began to dry meat.

The Teacher having finished this discourse, identified the Jātaka by the following verses, after Fully Awakening:

1. “Even as the jackal, stiff with pride,
   Craved for a mighty host on every side,
   And all toothed creatures came
   Flocking around, until he won great fame:

2. Even so the man who is supplied
   With a great host of men on every side,
   As great renown has he
   As had the jackal in his sovereignty.” {2.246}

“In those days Devadatta was the jackal, Ānanda was the king, and I was the family priest.”

Ja 242 Sunakhajātaka
The Story about (the Gnawing) Dog (2s)

In the present the monks are talking about a dog who had been brought up near to their monastery, been sold and taken away, but quickly found his way back home. The Buddha told a similar story from the past of a dog who was tied on a leash, but bit through it when his new owners slept and made his escape.

The Bodhisatta = the wise man (panḍitapurisa), the dog = the same in the past (sunakha).

Keywords: Skill, Familiarity, Animals.

“Foolish Dog.” This story the Teacher told while living in Jetavana, about a dog that used to be fed in the resting hall by the Ambala tower.

It is said that from a puppy this dog had been kept there and fed by some water-carriers. In course of time it grew up there to be a big dog. Once a [2.171] villager happened to see him; and he bought him from the water-carriers for an upper garment and a rupee; then, fastening him to a chain, led the dog away. The dog was led away, unresisting, making no sound, and followed and followed the new master, eating whatever was offered. “He’s fond of me, no doubt,” thought the man; and let him free from the chain. No sooner did the dog find himself free, than off he went, and never stopped until he came back to the place he started from.

Seeing him, the monks guessed what had happened; and in the evening, when they were gathered in the Dhamma Hall, they began talking about it. “Friend, here’s the dog back again in our resting hall! How clever he must have been, to get rid of his chain! No sooner free, than back he ran!” The Teacher, entering, asked what they were all talking about as they sat together. They told him. He rejoined, “Monks, this is not the first time our dog was clever at getting rid of his chain; he was just the same before.” And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a rich family of the kingdom of Kāsi; and when he grew up, he set up a house of his own. There was a man in Benares who had a dog which had been fed on rice till it grew fat. {2.247} And a certain villager who had come to Benares saw the dog; and to the owner he gave a fine garment and a piece of money for the dog, which he led off bound by a strap. Arrived at the outskirts of a forest, he entered a hut, tied up the dog, and lay down to sleep. At that moment the Bodhisatta entered the forest on some errand, and beheld the dog made fast by a thong; whereat he uttered the first verse:

1. “Foolish dog! Why don’t you bite
   Through that strap that holds you tight?
   In a trice you would be free,
   Scampering off merrily!”

On hearing this verse, the dog uttered the second:

2. “Resolute – determined, I
   Wait my opportunity:
   Careful watch and ward I keep Till the people are asleep.”

So spake he; and when the company were asleep, he gnawed through the strap, and returned to his master’s house in great glee. {2.248}
When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The dogs are the same, and I was the wise man.”

Ja 243 Guttilajātaka

The Story about (the Heavenly Musician) Guttila (2s)

In the present Devadatta learned all he knew from the Buddha, but repudiated him. The Buddha tells a story of a musician who taught his pupil, only for the pupil to challenge him in public. When Sakka found out, he helped the master win the contest and took him to heaven.

The Bodhisatta = the heavenly musician Guttila (Guttilagandhabba),
Ānanda = the king (of Benares) (rājā),
Anuruddha = (the King of the Devas) Sakka,
Devadatta = (the musician) Mūsila.

Past Compare: Vv 33 Guttilavimāna.

Keywords: Respect, Skill, Devas.

“I had a pupil once.” [2.172] This story the Teacher told in the Bamboo Grove, about Devadatta.

On this occasion the monks said to Devadatta, “Friend Devadatta, the Supreme Buddha is your teacher; of him you learned the Three Piṭakas and how to produce the four kinds of Absorption; you really should not act the enemy to your own teacher!” Devadatta replied, “Why, friends, Gotama the ascetic my teacher? Not a bit: was it not by my own power that I learned the Three Piṭakas, and produced the four Absorptions?” He refused to acknowledge his teacher.

The monks fell talking of this in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend! Devadatta repudiates his teacher! He has become an enemy of the Supreme Buddha! And what a miserable fate has befallen him!” In came the Teacher, and enquired what they were all talking of together. They told him. “Ah, monks,” said he, “this is not the first time that Devadatta has repudiated his teacher, and shown himself my enemy, and come to a miserable end. It was just the same before.” And then he told the following story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born in a musician’s family. His name was teacher Guttila. When he grew up, he mastered all the branches of music, and under the name of Guttila Gandhabba he became the chief of his kind in all Jambudīpa. He married no wife, but maintained his blind parents. 519

At that time certain traders of Benares made a journey to Ujjeni for trade. A holiday was proclaimed; they all clubbed together; they procured scents and perfumes and ointments, and all manner of foods and meats. “Pay the hire,” they cried, “and fetch a musician!”

It happened that at the time a certain Mūsila [2.249] was the chief musician in Ujjeni. Him they sent for, and made him their musician. Mūsila was a player on the lute; and he tuned his lute up to the highest key, to play upon. But they knew the playing of Guttila Gandhabba, and his music seemed to them like scratching on a mat. So not one of them showed pleasure. When Mūsila saw that they expressed no pleasure, he said to himself, “Too sharp, I suppose,” and tuning his lute down to the middle tone, he played it so. Still they sat indifferent. Then he thought: “I suppose they know nothing about it,” and making as though he [2.173] too were ignorant, he played with the strings all loose. As before, they made no sign. Then Mūsila asked them, “Good merchants, why do you not like my playing?”

“What! Are you playing?” cried they. “We imagined that you must be tuning up.”

“Why, do you know any better musician,” he asked, “or are you too ignorant to like my playing?”

Said the merchants, “We have heard the music of Guttila Gandhabba, at Benares; and yours sounds like women crooning to soothe their babies.”

“Here, take your money back,” said he, “I don’t want it. Only when you go to Benares, please take me with you.”

They agreed, and took him back to Benares with them; they pointed out the dwelling of Guttila, and departed every man to his own house.

519 Guttila is one of the four men who “even in their earthly bodies attained to glory in the city of the gods.” Milinda, iv. 8. 25 (translation in Sacred Books of the East, ii. 145).
Mūsila entered the Bodhisatta’s dwelling; he saw his beautiful lute where it stood, tied up: he took it down, and played upon it. At this the old parents, who could not see him because they were blind, cried out: “The mice are gnawing at the lute! Shoo! Shoo! The rats are biting the lute to pieces!”

At once Mūsila put down the lute, and greeted the old folks. “Where do you come from?” asked they. He replied, “I come from Ujjeni to learn at the feet of the teacher.” “Oh, all right,” said they. He asked where the teacher was.

“He is out, father; but he will be back today,” came the answer. Mūsila sat down and waited until he came; then after some friendly words, he told his errand. Now the Bodhisatta was skilled in divining from the lineaments of the body. He perceived that this was not a good man; so he refused. “Go, my son, this art is not for you.” Mūsila clasped the feet of the Bodhisatta’s parents, to help his suit, and prayed them, “Make him teach me!” Again and again his parents besought the Bodhisatta to do so; until he could not stand it any longer, and did as he was asked. And Mūsila went along with the Bodhisatta into the king’s palace.

“Who is this, master?” asked the king, on seeing him. “A pupil of mine, great king!” was the reply. By and by he got the ear of the king.

Now the Bodhisatta did not stint his knowledge, but taught his pupil everything which he knew himself. This done, he said: “Your knowledge is now perfect.”

Thought Mūsila, “I have now mastered my art. This city of Benares is the chief city in all Jambudīpa. My teacher is old; here therefore I must stay.” So he said to his teacher, “Sir, I would serve the king.” “Good, my son,” he replied, “I will tell the king of it.”

He came before the king, and said: “My pupil wishes to serve your highness. Fix what his fee shall be.”

The king answered, “His fee shall be half of yours.” And he came and told it to Mūsila. Mūsila said: “If I receive the same as you, I will serve; but if not, then I will not serve him.” “Why?” “Say, do I not know all that you know?” “Yes, you do.” “Then why does he offer me the half?”

The Bodhisatta informed the king what had passed. The king said: “If he is as perfect in his art as you, he shall receive the same as you do.” This saying of the king the Bodhisatta told to his pupil. The pupil consented to the bargain; and the king, being informed of this, replied, “Very good. What day will you compete together?” “Be it the seventh day from this, O king.”

The king sent for Mūsila. “I understand that you are ready to try issue with your master?” “Yes, your Majesty,” was the reply.

The king would have dissuaded him. “Don’t do it,” said he, “there should never be rivalry between master and pupil.”

“Hold, O king!” cried he, “yes, let there be a meeting between me and my teacher on the seventh day; we shall know which of us is master of his art.”

So the king agreed; and he sent the drum beating round the city with this notice, “Oyez! On the seventh day Guttila the teacher, and Mūsila the pupil, will meet at the door of the royal palace, to show their skill. Let the people assemble from the city, and see their skill!”

The Bodhisatta thought within himself, “This Mūsila is young and fresh, I am old and my strength is gone. What an old man does will not prosper. If my pupil is beaten, there is no great credit in that. If he beats me, death in the woods is better than the shame which will be my portion.” So to the woods he went, but he kept returning through fear of death and going back to the wood through fear of shame. And in this way six days passed by. The grass died as he walked, and his feet wore away a path.

At that time, Sakka’s throne became hot. Sakka meditated, and perceived what had happened. “Guttila Gandhabba is suffering much sorrow in the forest by reason of his pupil. I must help him!” So he went in haste and stood before the Bodhisatta. “Teacher,” said he, “why have you taken to the woods?”

“Who are you?” asked the other. “I am Sakka.”

---

Reading antevāsike.

---

520 Reading antevāsike.
Then said the Bodhisatta, “I was in fear of being worsted by my pupil, O King of the Devas; and therefore did I flee to the woods.” And he repeated the first verse:\footnote{521}{These verses, together with those which follow on page 255, and others, occur in the \textit{Vimānavatthu}, no. 33 (p. 28 in the \textit{PTS} ed.), \textit{Guttīlavimāna} [Vv 33].}

1. “I had a pupil once, who learned of me
   The seven-stringed lute’s melodious minstrelsy;
   He now would fain his teacher’s skill outdo.
   O Kosiya!\footnote{522}{A title of Indra; the word means an Owl (Sanskrit \textit{Kauśika}): it is one of the many Indian clan names that are also names of animals.} Do you my helper be!”

“Fear not,” said Sakka, “I am your defence and refuge,” and he repeated the second verse:

2. “Fear not, for I will help you at your need;
   For honour is the teacher’s rightful meed.
   Fear not! Your pupil shall not rival you,
   But you shall prove the better man indeed.”

“As you play, you shall break one of the strings of your lute, and play upon six; and the music shall be as good as before. Mūsila too shall break a string, and he shall not be able to make music with his lute; then shall he be defeated. And when you see that he is defeated, you shall break the second string of your lute, and the third, even unto the seventh, and you shall go on playing with nothing but the body; and from the ends of the broken strings the sound shall go forth, and fill all the land of Benares for a space of twelve leagues.” \footnote{2.253}{With these words he gave the Bodhisatta three playing-dice, and went on, “When the sound of the lute has filled all the city, you must throw one of these dice into the air; and three hundred Accharā shall descend and dance before you. While they dance throw up the second, and three hundred shall dance in front of your lute; then the third, and then three hundred more shall come down and dance within the arena. I too will come with them; go on, and fear not!”}
In the morning the Bodhisatta returned home. At the palace door a pavilion was set up, and a throne was set apart for the king. He came down from the palace, and took his seat upon the divan in the decorated pavilion. All around him were thousands of slaves, women beautously apparetled, courtiers, brahmins, citizens. All the people of the town had come together. In the courtyard they were fixing the seats circle on circle, tier above tier. The Bodhisatta, washed and anointed, had eaten of all manner of finest meats; and lute in hand he sat waiting in his appointed place. Sakka was there, invisible, poised in the air, surrounded by a great company. However, the Bodhisatta saw him. Mūsila too was there, and sat in his own seat. All around was a great concourse of people.

First the two played each the same piece. When they played, both the same, the multitude was delighted, and gave abundant applause. Sakka spoke to the Bodhisatta, from his place in the air, “Break one of the strings!” said he. Then the Bodhisatta broke the bee-string; and the string, though broken, gave out a sound from its broken end; it seemed like music divine. Mūsila too broke a string; but after that no sound came out of it. His teacher broke the second, and so on to the seventh string: he played upon the body alone, and the sound continued, and filled the town: the multitude in thousands waved and waved their kerchiefs in the air, in thousands they shouted applause.

The Bodhisatta threw up one of the dice into the air, and three hundred Accharā descended and began to dance. And when he had thrown the second and third in the same manner, there were nine hundred Accharā dancing as Sakka had said. Then the king made a sign to the multitude; up rose the multitude, and cried, “You made a great mistake in matching yourself against your teacher! You know not your measure!” Thus they cried out against Mūsila; and with stories and staves, and anything that came to hand, they beat and bruised him to death, and seizing him by the feet, they cast him upon a dustheap.

The king in his delight showered gifts upon the Bodhisatta, and so did they of the city. Sakka likewise spake pleasantly to him, and said: “Wise sir, I will soon send my charioteer Mātali with a carriage drawn by a thousand thoroughbreds; and you shall mount upon my divine carriage, drawn by a thousand steeds, and travel to heaven,” and he departed.

When Sakka was returned, and sat upon his throne, made all of a precious stone, the Devadhītā asked him, “Where have you been, O king?” Sakka told them in full all that had happened, and praised the virtues and good parts of the Bodhisatta. Then said the Devadhītā, “O king, we long to look upon this teacher; fetch him here!”

“We musicians, O great king,” said he, “live by practice of our art. For a recompense I will play.” “Play on, and I will recompense you.”

“I care for no other recompense but this. Let these Devadhītā tell me what acts of virtue brought them here; then will I play.” [2.255] [2.177] Then said the Devadhītā, “Gladly will we tell you of the virtues that we have practised; but first do you play to us, teacher.”

For the space of a week the Bodhisatta played to them, and his music surpassed the music of heaven. On the seventh day he asked the Devadhītā of their virtuous lives, beginning from the first. One of them, in the time of the Buddha Kassapa, had given an upper garment to a certain monk; and having renewed existence as an attendant of Sakka, had become chief among the Devakaññā, with a retinue of a thousand Accharā: of her the Bodhisatta asked, “What did you do in a previous existence, that has brought you here?” The manner of his question and the gift she had given have been told in the Vimāna story, [523] they spoke as follows:

“O brilliant Devatā, like morning star,
Shedding your light of beauty near and far,524
Whence springs this beauty? Whence this happiness?
Whence all the blessings that the heart can bless?

523 [Vv 33.]
524 These two lines occur in the Comm. to the Dhp p. 99. See also note on the First Verse, above.
I ask you, Devī excellent in might,
Whence comes this all-pervading wondrous light?
When you were mortal woman, what did you
To gain the glory that surrounds you now?”

“Chief among men and chief of women she
Who gives an upper robe in generosity.
She that gives pleasant things is sure to win
A home divine and fair to enter in.

Behold this habitation, how divine!
As fruit of my good deeds this home is mine
A thousand Accharā stand at my call;
Fair nymphs – and I the fairest of them all.

And therefore am I excellent in might;
Hence comes this all-pervading wondrous light!” {2.256}

Another had given flowers for worship to a monk who craved an alms. Another had been asked for a scented wreath of five sprays for the shrine, and gave it.
Another had given sweet fruits. Another had given fine essences. Another had given a scented five-spray to the shrine of Kassapa, the One with Ten Powers.
Another had heard the discourse of monks or nuns in wayfaring, or such as had taken up their abode in the house of some family. Another had stood in the water, and given water to a monk who had eaten his meal on a boat. Another living in the world had done her duty by mother-in-law and father-in-law, never losing her temper. Another had divided even the share that she received, and so did eat, and was virtuous. Another, who had been a slave in some household, without anger and without pride had given away a share of her own portion, and had been born again as an attendant upon the King of {2.178} the Gods. So also all those who are written in the story of Guttilavimāna, thirty and seven Devadhītā, were asked by the Bodhisattā what each had done to come there, and they too told what they had done in the same way by verses.

On hearing all this, the Bodhisattā exclaimed, “‘Tis good for me, in truth, truly
’tis very good for me, that I came here, and heard by how very small a merit great glory has been attained. Henceforward, when I return to the world of men, I will give all manner of gifts, and perform good deeds.” And he uttered this exalted utterance:
“O happy dawn! O happy must I be!\footnote{Vimānavatthu p. 31.} O happy pilgrimage, whereby I see These Devatās, like Accharās, \textit{(2.257)} And hear their sweet discourse! Henceforth I swear Full of sweet peace, and generosity, Of temperance, and truth my life shall be, Till I come there where no more sorrows are.”

Then after seven days had passed, the king of heaven laid his commands upon Mātali the charioteer, and he seated Guttila in the chariot and sent him to Benares. And when he came to Benares, he told the people what he had seen with his own eyes in heaven. From that time the people resolved to do good deeds with all their might.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “In those days Devadatta was Mūsila, Anuruddha was Sakka, Ānanda was the king, and I was Guttila Gandhabba.”

\textbf{Ja 244 Vīticchajātaka}
\textbf{The Story about the Desireless One (2s)}

Alternative Title: Vigaticchajātaka (Cst)

In the present one wanderer travels through Jambudīpa arguing his case. When he meets the Buddha he is worsted. The Buddha tells a story of how a similar thing happened in a past life, and the rebuke he gave on that occasion.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
the wanderer = the same in the past (paribbājaka).

Keywords: Vanity, Wisdom.

\textit{What he sees.} This story the Teacher told at Jetavana, about a turntail vagrant who wandered about the country.

It is said that this man could not find any one to argue with him in all Jambudīpa; till he came to Sāvatthi, and asked whether any one could dispute with him. “Yes,” he was told, “the Supreme Buddha;” hearing which, he and a multitude with him repaired to Jetavana, and put a question to the Teacher, [2.179] while he was discoursing in the midst of the four kinds of disciples. The Teacher answered his question, and then put one to him in return. This the man failed to answer, got up, and turned tail. The crowd sitting round exclaimed, “One word, sir, vanquished the itinerant!” Said the Teacher, “Yes, monks, and just as I have vanquished him now with one word, so I did before.” Then he told a story of olden days.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin in the kingdom of Kāsi. He grew up, and mastered his passions; and embracing the ascetic life, {2.258} he dwelt a long time in the Himālayas.

He came down from the highlands, and took up his abode near a considerable town, in a hut of leaves built beside a bend of the river Ganges. A certain pilgrim, who found no one that could answer him throughout all Jambudīpa, came to that town. “Is there anyone,” asked he, “who can argue with me?”

“Yes,” they said, and told him the power of the Bodhisatta. So, followed by a great multitude, he made his way to the place where the Bodhisatta dwelt, and after greeting him, took a seat.

“Will you drink,” he asked, “of the Ganges water, infused with wild wood odours?”

The pilgrim tried to catch him in his words. “What is Ganges? Ganges may be sand, Ganges may be water, Ganges may be the near bank, Ganges may be the far bank!”

Said the Bodhisatta to the pilgrim, “Besides the sand, the water, the here and the further bank, what other Ganges can you have?” The pilgrim had no answer for this; he rose up, and went away. When he had gone the Bodhisatta spake these verses by way of discourse to the assembled multitude:

1. “What he sees, he will not have;
What he sees not he will crave.
He may go a long way yet,
What he wants he will not get.
2. He condemns what he has got;
   Once 'tis gained, he wants it not.
   He craves everything always,
   Who craves nothing earns our praise.” {2.259}

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “The vagrant is the same in both cases, and I myself was then the ascetic.”

Ja 245 Mūlapariyāyajātaka
The Story about the Root Discourse (2s)

In the present some brahmins learn from the Buddha, and then think they know all that he knows, but when he teaches a particularly deep discourse they cannot understand it. The Buddha tells a story of how in the past he had faced the same slight, and had asked questions of the pupils which they couldn’t answer.

The Bodhisatta = the teacher (ācariya),
the monks = the 500 young brahmins (pañcasatā māṇavakā).

Keywords: Book learning, True wisdom.

“Time all consumes.” [2.180] This is a story told by the Teacher while he stayed near Ukkaṭṭhā, in the Subhagavana Park, in connection with the Discourse on the Succession of Causes.

At that time, it is said, five hundred brahmins who had mastered the three Vedas, having embraced this dispensation, studied the Three Piṭakas. These learned, they became intoxicated with pride, thinking to themselves, “The Supreme Buddha knows just the Three Piṭakas, and we know them too. So what is the difference between us?” They discontinued their waiting upon the Buddha, and went about with an equal following of their own.

One day the Teacher, when these men were seated before him, repeated the Discourse on the Succession of Causes, 526 and adorned it with the eight grounds. They did not understand a word. The thought came into their mind, “Here we have been believing that there were none so wise as we, and of this we understand nothing. There is none so wise as the Buddhas: O the excellence of the Buddhas!”

526 [MN 1.]
After this they were humbled, as quiet as serpents with their fangs extracted.

When the Teacher had stayed as long as he wished in Ukkaṭṭhā, he departed to Vesāli; and at Gotama’s shrine he repeated the Discourse on the Gotamaka Shrine.527 There was a quaking of a thousand worlds! Hearing this, these monks became saints.

But however, after the Teacher had finished repeating the Discourse on the Succession of Causes, during his visit to Ukkaṭṭhā (2.260) the monks discussed the whole affair in the Dhamma Hall. “How great is the power of the Buddhas, friend! Why, these brahmin mendicants, who used to be so drunk with pride, have been humbled by the Discourse on the Succession of Causes!” The Teacher entered and asked what their talk was about. They told him. He said: “Monks, this is not the first time that I have humbled these men, who used to carry their heads so high with pride; I did the same before.” And then he told them a tale of the olden time.

In the past, when Brahmadatta reigned in Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin; who, when he grew up, and mastered the Three Vedas, became a far-famed teacher, and instructed five hundred pupils in sacred verses. These five hundred, having given their best energy to their work, and perfected their learning, said within themselves, “We know as much as our teacher: there is no difference.”

Proud and stubborn, they would not come before their teacher’s face, nor do their round of duty.

One day, they saw their master seated beneath a jujube tree; and desiring to mock him, they tapped upon the tree with their fingers. “A worthless tree!” said they.

[2.181]
The Bodhisatta observed that they were mocking him. “My pupils,” he said: “I will ask you a question.” They were delighted. “Speak on,” they said, “we will answer.”

527 [Gotamakacetiyasutta, AN 3.126.]
Their teacher asked the question by repeating the first verse:

1. “Time all consumes, even time itself as well. Who is't consumes the all-consumer? Tell!”

The youths listened to the problem; but not one amongst them could answer it. Then said the Bodhisatta, “Do not imagine that this question is in the Three Vedas. You imagine that you know all that I know, and so you act like the jujube tree. You don't know that I know a great deal which is unknown to you. Leave me now: I give you seven days – think over this question for so long.”

So they made salutation, and departed each to his own house. There for a week they pondered, yet they could make neither head nor tail of the problem. On the seventh day, they came to their teacher, and greeted him, sitting down.

“Well, you of auspicious speech, have you solved the question?”

“No, we have not,” said they.

Again the Bodhisatta spoke in reproof, uttering the second verse:

2. “Heads grow on necks, and hair on heads will grow: How many heads have ears, I wish to know?”

“Fools are you,” he went on, rebuking the youths, “you have ears with holes in them, but not wisdom,” and he solved the problem. They listened. “Ah,” they said, “great are our teachers!” and they craved his pardon, and quenching their pride they waited upon the Bodhisatta.

When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “At that time these monks were the five hundred pupils; and I myself was their teacher.”

____________________________

528 Kālaghaso, the ‘consumer of time,’ is he who, by destroying the thirst for existence, so lives as not to be born again (Commentator’s explanation).

529 The jujube fruit is often contrasted with the cocoa nut, as being only externally pleasing, see Hitop. i. 95.
Ja 246 Telovādajātaka
The Story concerning the Advice about Oil (2s)

Alternative Title: Bālovādajātaka (Cst)

In the present the ascetic Nāthaputta blames the Buddha for eating meat. The Buddha tells a story of a past life in which he has been similarly blamed, and how he had said that it is not the one who eats, but the one who kills who is to blame for the meat.

The Bodhisatta = the ascetic (tāpasa),
Nigaṇṭha Nāthaputta = the landlord (kuṭumbika).

Keywords: Killing, Blame.

“The wicked kills.” [2.182] This is a story which the Teacher told while staying in his gabled chamber near Vesāli, about Sīhasenāpati.

It is said that this man, after he had fled to the refuge, offered hospitality and then gave food with meat in it. The naked ascetics on hearing this were angry and displeased; they wanted to do the Tathāgata a mischief, “The ascetic Gotama,” sneered they, “with his eyes open, eats meat prepared on purpose for him.”

The monks discussed this matter in their Dhamma Hall, “Friend, Nāthaputta the naked ascetic530 goes about sneering, because, he says, ‘The ascetic Gotama eats meat prepared on purpose for him, with his eyes open.’” Hearing this, the Teacher rejoined, “This is not the first time, monks, that Nāthaputta has been sneering at me for eating meat which was got ready for me on purpose; he did just so in former times.” And he told them a story.

In the past, when Brahmadatta was king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born a brahmin. When he came of age he embraced the ascetic life.

He came down from the Himālayas to get salt and seasoning, and next day walked the city, begging alms. A certain wealthy man designed to annoy the ascetic. So 530 He is one of the six titthiyas (Heretics), and generally called Nāthagutta (which is probably the right spelling here). The ‘naked ascetics’ were probably the Jains.

he brought him to his dwelling, and pointed out a seat, and then served him with fish.

After the meal, the man sat on one side, and said: “This food was prepared on purpose for you, by killing living creatures. Not upon my head is this wrong, but upon yours!” And he repeated the first verse:

1. “The wicked kills, and cooks, and gives to eat:
   He is defiled with wrong that takes such meat.” [2.263]

On hearing this, the Bodhisatta recited the second verse:

2. “The wicked may for gift slay wife or son,
   Yet, if the holy eat, no wrong is done.”[531] [2.183]

And the Bodhisatta with these words of instruction rose from his seat and departed.

This discourse ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Nāthaputta, the naked ascetic was this wealthy man, and I was the ascetic.”

Ja 247 Pādañjali jātakā

The Story about (Prince) Pādañjali (2s)

Alternative Title: Pādañjali jātakā (Cst)

In the present one monk curls his lips at the teaching of the chief disciples, which leads to them walking away. The Buddha tells a story about how the same person had curled his lips in a previous life, whether right or wrong was pronounced, and was deemed a fool.

The Bodhisatta = the wise minister (paññī),
Lāludāyi = (the lazy prince) Pādañjali.

Keywords: Lack of discretion, Foolishness.

531 “…those who take life are in fault, but not the persons who eat the flesh; my monastics have permission to eat whatever food it is customary to eat in any place or country, so that it be done without the indulgence of the appetite, or evil desire.” Hardy, Manual, p. 327.
“Surely this lad.” This story the Teacher told while dwelling in Jetavana, about the elder Lāḷudāyi.

One day, it is said, the two chief disciples were discussing a question. The monks who heard the discussion praised the elders. Elder Lāḷudāyi, who sat amongst the company, curled his lip with the thought: “What is their knowledge compared with mine?” When the monks noticed this, they left him. The company broke up.

The monks were talking about it in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend, did you see how Lāḷudāyi curled his lip in scorn of the two chief disciples?” On hearing which the Teacher said: “Monks, in olden days, as now, Lāḷudāyi had no other answer but a curl of the lip.” Then he told them a story. {2.264}

In the past, when king Brahmadatta was reigning in Benares, the Bodhisatta was his adviser in things spiritual and temporal. Now the king had a son, Pādañjali by name, an idle lazy loafer. By and by the king died. His obsequies over, the courtiers talked of consecrating his son Pādañjali to be king. But the Bodhisatta said: “Tis a lazy fellow, an idle loafer – shall we take and consecrate him king?”

The courtiers held a trial. They sat the youth down before them, and made a wrong decision. They adjudged something to the wrong owner, and asked him, “Young sir, do we decide rightly?”

The lad curled his lip. “He is a wise lad, I think,” thought the Bodhisatta, “he must know that we have decided wrongly,” and he recited the first verse:

1. “Surely the lad is wise beyond all men.
   He curls his lip – he must see through us, then!” [2.184]

Next day, as before, they arranged a trial, but this time judged it aright. Again they asked him what he thought of it.

Again he curled his lip. Then the Bodhisatta perceived that he was a blind fool, and repeated the second verse:

2. “Not right from wrong, nor bad from good he knows:
   He curls his lip – but no more sense he shows.”

The courtiers became aware that the young man Pādañjali was a fool, and they made the Bodhisatta king.
When the Teacher had ended this discourse, he identified the Jātaka, “Lāḷudāyi was Pādañjali, and I was the wise courtier.”

Ja 248 Kiṁsukopamajātaka

The Story about the Flame of the Forest (2s)

In the present four monks become Arahats, but along different paths, and wonder how all paths lead to the same destination. The Buddha then tells a story about people who see a tree at different times, and describe it very differently, but it is the same tree.

The Bodhisatta = the king of Benares (Bārāṇasirājā).

Keywords: Variety, Perspective.

“All have seen.” [2.265] This story the Teacher told while staying at Jetavana, on the Discourse about the Flame of the Forest.\

Four monks, approaching the Tathāgata, asked him to explain the means by which Absorption may be induced. This he explained. This done, they dispersed to the several places where they spent their nights and days. One of them, having learned the Six Sense Spheres, became a saint; another did so after learning the Five Elements of Being, the third after learning the Four Principal Elements, the fourth after learning the Eighteen Constituents of Being. Each of them recounted to the Teacher the particular excellence which he had attained. A thought came into the mind of one of them; and he asked the Teacher, “There is only one Nibbāna for all these modes of meditation; how is it that all of them lead to becoming an Arahat?” Then the Teacher asked, “Is not this like the people who saw the Flame of the Forest?” As they requested him to tell them about it, he repeated a tale of bygone days.

In the past Brahmadatta the king of Benares had four sons. One day they sent for the charioteer, and said to him, “We want to see a Flame of the Forest; show us one!” [2.185]

---

532 Kiṁsuka = Butea Frondosa [In the original it was often translated as the Judas tree, here I have preferred the more neutral Flame of the Forest. Also see Kiṁsukopamasutta, SN 35.245.]
“Very well, I will,” the charioteer replied. But he did not show it to them all together. He took the eldest at once to the forest in the chariot, and showed him the tree at the time when the buds were just sprouting from the stem. To the second he showed it when the leaves were green, to the third at the time of blossoming, and to the fourth when it was bearing fruit.

After this it happened that the four brothers were sitting together, and someone asked, “What sort of a tree is the Flame of the Forest?” Then the first brother answered, “Like a burnt stump!” And the second cried, “Like a banyan tree!” And the third, “Like a piece of meat!” And the fourth said: “Like the acacia!”

They were vexed at each other’s answers, and ran to find their father. “My lord,” they asked, “what sort of a tree is the Flame of the Forest?”

“What did you say to that?” he asked. They told him the manner of their answers.

Said the king, “All four of you have seen the tree. Only when the charioteer showed you the tree, you did not ask him ‘What is the tree like at such a time?’ or ‘at such another time?’ You made no distinctions, and that is the reason of your mistake.” And he repeated the first verse:

1. “All have seen the Flaming tree
   What is your perplexity?
   No one asked the charioteer
   What its form the livelong year!”

The Teacher, having explained the matter, then addressed the monks, “Now as the four brothers, because they did not make a distinction and ask, fell in doubt about the tree, so you have fallen in doubt about what is right,” and, becoming Perfectly Awakened, he uttered the second verse:

533 It has pink flowers.
2. “Who know the right with some deficiency Feel doubt, like those four brothers with the tree.”

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “At that time I was the king of Benares.”

Ja 249 Sālakajātaka

The Story about the Brother-in-Law (2s)

In the present one elderly monk ordains a novice, but is unkind to him, and the novice disrobes. Having enticed him back into robes, he is again unkind. The Buddha tells a story of a monkey who was beaten on return to his owner, and how he ran off into the forest to escape being beaten again.

The Bodhisatta = the grain merchant (dhaññavāṇija), the great elder = the snake catcher (ahituṇḍika),
the novice = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Keywords: Bad treatment, Promises.

“Like my own son.” [2.186] This story the Teacher told while living in Jetavana, about a distinguished elder.

It is said that he had ordained a youth, whom he treated unkindly. The novice at last could stand it no longer, and returned to the world. Then the elder tried to coax him. {2.267} “Look here, lad,” said he, “your robe shall be your own, and your bowl too; I have another bowl and robe which I'll give you. Join us again!”

At first he refused, but at last after much asking he did so. From the day he joined the Saṅgha the elder maltreated him as before. Again the lad found it too much, and left the order. As the elder begged him again several times to join, the lad replied, “You can neither do with me nor without me; let me alone – I will not join!”

The monks got talking about this in the Dhamma Hall. “Friend,” they said, “a sensitive lad that! He knew the elder too well to join us.” The Teacher came in and asked what they were talking about. They told him. He rejoined, “Not only is the lad sensitive now, monks, but he was just the same of old; when once he saw the faults of that man, he would not accept him again.” And he told a story of the past.
In the past, in the reign of Brahmadatta king of Benares, the Bodhisatta was born into a landowner’s family, and gained a living by selling corn. Another man, a snake-charmer, had trained a monkey, made him swallow an antidote, and making a snake play with the monkey he gained his livelihood in this way.

A merrymaking had been proclaimed; this man wished to make merry at the feast, and he entrusted the monkey to this merchant, bidding him not neglect it. Seven days after he came to the merchant, and asked for his monkey. The monkey heard his master’s voice, and came out quickly from the grain shop. At once the man beat him over the back with a piece of bamboo; then he took him off to the woods, tied him up and fell asleep. So soon as the monkey saw that he was asleep, he loosed his bonds, scampered off and climbed a mango tree. He ate a mango, and dropped the stone upon the snake-charmer’s head. The man awoke, and looked up: there was the monkey. “I’ll wheedle him!” he thought, “and when he comes down from the tree, I’ll catch him!” So to wheedle him, he repeated the first verse:

1. “Like my own son you shall be,
   Teacher in our family: \( \{2.268\} \)
   Come down, Nuncle\(^{534}\) from the tree –
   Come and hurry home with me.” \[2.187\]

The monkey listened, and repeated the second verse:

2. “You are laughing in your sleeve!
   Have you quite forgot that beating?
   Here I am content to live
   (So good-bye) ripe mangoes eating.”

Up he arose, and was soon lost in the wood; while the snake-charmer returned to his house grieving.

When this discourse was ended, the Teacher identified the Jātaka, “Our novice was the monkey. The elder was the snake-charmer, and I myself was the corn merchant.”

\(^{534}\) sālaka, lit. ‘brother-in-law,’ often used as a term of abuse.
In the present one monk is being very deceitful, and it sets the monks to talking about him. The Buddha explains that in a previous life he had been a monkey, had dressed as an ascetic to try and gain a warm fire, but was discovered and chased away.

The Bodhisatta = the (ascetic) father (pitā),
Rāhula = the son (putta),
the deceiving monk = the monkey (makkaṭa).

Keywords: Deceit, Appearances, Animals.

“A holy sage.” This story was told by the Teacher while living at Jetavana, about a deceitful monk.

