Introduction

Much of early Javanese culture was based on Indian forms and ideas, and its poetry is a good example of this. Not only did the themes of many of its earliest literary output come from stories that grew up in India, but even its metrical structure had a similar origin.

To anyone who is familiar with Indian prosody this will be familiar enough: heavy and light syllables alternate in fairly fixed structures giving an underlying rhythm to the verse. The majority are in simple syllabic-count metres, meaning they have fixed number of syllables in a line, with varying underlying patterns (samavṛtta).

There are other types, as in Indian prosody, such as ardhasamacatuṣpadi, which have two dissimilar lines doubled to make a verse; wisama, where all four lines are dissimilar; and even a few matracchandās verses, like Āryā, but these are much less common.

In the descriptions the following symbols are used:

- ∪ = a light syllable
- = a heavy syllable
- × = the syllable may be naturally light or heavy, but it is always taken as heavy, owing to the pause that follows it.

The forms of the verse structures are based on three variables: the length of the line, and of the sections that make up a line; the alternation of light and heavy syllables, which make rhythmic patterns within the line; and the collection of lines, similar or dissimilar, into a verse.

All syllables can be assigned a weight. In its simplest expression: short vowels in open syllables are light, all others are heavy, with light syllables being considered half the weight of the heavy ones. In later terminology, light syllables have one measure (mora, mātra), heavy syllables, two.

In this work I have drawn extensively on P. J. Zoetmulder's Appendix III on Kakawin Metres to his Kalangwan, A Survey of Old Javanese Literature from 1974. But the materials that are gathered here have been re-edited and re-presented to give a better overall picture of the metres that were actually in use in Old Javanese literature.

I have excluded works that are found only in the metrical manuals, and included those that are from extant poems. And then I have put the works in list format, so it can be seen at a glance how widespread any given metre was used in the literature.

There are three main prosodies found in Old Javanese: Wṛttāntaka, Wṛttasañcaya and Wṛttāyana. Wherever possible the titles of the metres have been taken from these prosodies, but when not found there, but in Sanskrit prosodies, the title has been placed in brackets.

However there are numerous metres found in the literature that are described neither in the Javanese nor the Sanskrit prosodies, and these are simply marked as Untitled.

In what follows references such as Rāmāyaṇa 6.202⁽¹⁾ indicate the 6th chapter (sarga), v. 202 and that there is just one verse found at this place. Rāmāyaṇa 25.66⁽²⁾ indicates the 25th chapter, and 2 verses beginning at v. 66 (i.e. vv. 66 and 67). Similarly, references such as Khāṇḍawawanadahana 40⁽¹²⁾ indicate 12 verses beginning at v. 40 of that work.

So as not to clutter the references when a verse is found in more than one place within a work, I simply add a plus sign to indicate this. So Pārthayajña 5⁽⁴⁾, + means that the metre in question can be found for four verses starting from v. 5, and in other places within the same work also.

Just short of 200 metres are described herein. Because many of the works are not available to me I have simply copied the references from Zoetmulder's work. More extensive references can be found in that work itself.
